With a quick start Dornsdoff looks up in the dark, cold, immovable face of the aristocrat; it holds not the slightest trace of any kind of emotion. Yet in this hour he remembers the many legends of his race—legends that bespeak their swift, dark, fiery passions for the women of their love—and a savage exultation fastens upon him, for he knows that the throes of death will be as ease to this haughty man before him, compared with the secret agony and travail of that confession. He bows coldly, and prepares to leave, his motive accomplished.

"I might have known," he says, with that polished manner that he assumes at will, "that I could trust the cause of justice in the hands of Count Toboskie."

The count responds with a bow, and in the next moment he is alone. A deathly weakness has suddenly settled upon him in the full glory of his magnificent manhood. He goes into an inner chamber where the lights have not yet been lit; he wants to be alone, away from all earthly sight, in his boundless misery.

To do him justice, he firmly believes Maize guilty; no merciful doubts have come to him in his woe. He believes her guilty because he, of all the world, has more cause for suspicion, because to him is an inner knowledge more powerful than all the evidence revealed to the public.

He knows that in one thing she has been wronged—that the accusation of shameful intimacy between her and Lagors is a foul slander; but the doubt of this, instead of shaking his suspicion of her guilt, but confirms it the more powerfully. He cannot doubt that she murdered him, since, by Lagors's own confession, she had been most bitterly wronged by him. And though at the time of his explanation she was unconscious of that wrong, it is evident that she afterwards became aware of it, and avenged her injury by the blood of her enemy. In all his intercourse with her he remembers that she has always confessed to a nature of revenge. In this hour, standing there in the intense darkness of his palace chamber, he recalls those fatal words uttered the morning of her accident:

"You know that a Greek could be nothing but swift and revengeful where vengeance is righteous!"

Ever since the horrible tragedy those miserable words have echoed in his soul. He doubts not that the wild, half-savage instincts of her nation held as holy such a vengeance, and, thinking of the wrong she avenged, in this moment he is almost constrained to pronounce it the same.

He stands there in the darkness, his clinched hand resting on the window; in his soul has pierced the iron of a deathless anguish. He has been wounded in his tenderest point—his good faith. Despite that spirit of strife between them, he had believed in her with all his soul, and the enormity of her crime and the sweetness of her angel face have slaughtered all life for him. It never comes to him that a time may be when his idol will be purified—when, crushed and stricken though she now be, she may rise up to new heights in her strong womanhood. He only stands there in the dusk, scented by the perfume of hidden flowers, his hands clinched and his teeth set like a mastiff's.

CHAPTER XXX.—GYPSY'S GOOD ANGEL FOR EVER VANISHES.

THE crisis of Gypsy's illness passed, and, contrary to the opinion of the physician, the frail, smitten spirit struggled weakly back to life. But her recovery is slow and tedious, and now, after nearly two months have elapsed since the commencement of her illness, she sits up for the first time in all those weary weeks. She is very changed as she reclines in an easy chair in her boudoir, this particular morning, but looks as beautiful as ever, with a pathetic, infantile cast to her loveliness that is almost touching. She is clad in a white robe of soft, clinging cashmere, with falls of lace around her throat and wrists; all her long, luxuriant hair has been cut off, the remainder having naturally arranged itself in short, bright ringlets around a head strictly Grecian in its beauty. All that rich glory of coloring has entirely faded from her cheeks, but her face is lovelier in its pallor than in the days of her rosiest health. Her eyes, large, blue and lustrous, are languidly beautiful, and continually hold a hunted, piteous light, very appealing.

She is wondrous with the soft, ethereal beauty of an angel, that looks as if it must melt and fade away as one gazes, beautiful as a painter's dream. Was ever the fiend in the form of a woman's sin and weakness gulsed in so dazzling and alluring a figure? Jack, standing looking at her with all his great, stricken soul in his eyes, thinks of all the lovely things the earth holds, his wife is the loveliest.

"You will soon be well now, dear," he says, breaking the silence.

Gypsy moves her head restlessly.

"I don't want ever to be well again," she says, and her voice is a trifle cross.

A spasm of pain shoots athwart Jack's face.

"You must live for my sake," he says, gently.

"There is nothing to live for," she says, again, with her old careless selfishness, taking no heed of her husband's trouble. "Oh, Jack, I do so want to see Maize. There is no one in the world so much to me as she is. She is so grand, so beautiful! Jack, mayn't I go and see her soon?"

"Yes, dear, if you continue to improve."

"Oh, I will improve. I will," she cries. Despite the weakness and mistakes of this poor erring soul, there is yet in her that strong, maternal instinct characteristic of the sex—she loves her child. "And how long before she can come home? Oh, I miss her so! I am listening always for her step."

Jack gives an evasive answer, and, kissing Gypsy, hastens precipitately out of the room. By advice of the doctor, the full extent of Maize's danger has been kept from her. She does not dream that it will result in anything but a disagreeable scandal, though she has been informed that, until the affair is settled, Maize is compelled by the law to remain at a city hotel, which is a species of imprisonment.

Jack has not more than disappeared when she stoops over and, picking up an English paper that has dropped from his pocket, carelessly glances over it in quest of home news. Suddenly her glance becomes riveted, and as she reads her whole appearance becomes changed. At last the sheet drops from her fingers, and she sinks back in her chair rigid as death.

At that moment Valentine enters the chamber. Appalled at the terrifying appearance of the invalid, she hastens across the room and bends above her.

"Gypsy?" she calls.

The staring, wide opened eyes of poor Gypsy look mutely up at her.

"Gypsy, for heaven's sake! what is the matter with you?"

With one small, quivering finger the stricken woman points to the paper, and her lips, from which all the color has drained, twitch with a voiceless movement.

Valentine looks, and sees in the English paper a short paragraph to the effect that, despite talented counsel and powerful friends, there is little doubt that Lord Ashhurst's daughter will be held guilty of murder, and punished accordingly.

Valentine looks at the mute, quivering pile in the chair, and her eyes suddenly grow chill and resolute.

"Well?" she says, and her voice holds but little sympathy for her stricken companion.

Gypsy raises herself with a despairing gesture, and looks up piteously at Valentine.

"Is it true?" she whispers.

"Yes, it is true," is the cold reply, while the steady eyes cover the quivering woman.

For a moment Gypsy sits as if stunned; then her hands lock convulsively and her face deepens in its blanched hue.

"Oh, my God!" The words escape her in the stifled cry of great anguish, as she sits motionless, staring up at her companion.

"I am sorry for you," says Valentine; "but you would have found it out some time. But this is Jack's carelessness."

Suddenly Gypsy springs to her feet. Her manner is wild; her eyes flash with an insane light, at once fierce and appalling; in her voice is the wailing cry of a lost soul.

"Oh, my God—my God! and you have kept it from me all this time. Was ever woman so bitterly lied to! Oh, my darling—my darling! my beautiful Maize! I will go to her! You shall not keep us apart. Let me be! I will go to her!" She struggles fiercely with Valentine's detaining hand.

"You will do nothing of the kind," says the cold, clear voice of her persecutor.

Digitized by Google

"I will—I will! No one shall keep me from her! I am your slave—your victim! I always have been; but I do not fear you now!" The poor, weak, tempest-tossed soul is struggling bravely with the little of purity it possesses. "I am going to her. You shall not keep me from my child. Poor, ruined, persecuted girl! Give me my cloak and hood—I must hasten. Oh, my darling—my poor little baby-girl!" She breaks out into wild sobs, and presses one hand to her head.

"You are mad!" Valentine's voice is chill and inflexible as steel, and holds a mortal anger. But as Gypsy has said, she does not fear her now.

"Say what you please, but I shall go to her. If you refuse to let me, I will wait until Jack comes and make him take me. Ah! what a heinous crime—Maize languishing in prison! But it shall not be. I will liberate her, for she is innocent—she could never have committed that crime. She is too grand and proud and noble! But she shall not suffer! Oh, Maize—Maize! Oh, my God—my God! What shall I do! Oh, if I had never been born!"

Valentine looks at her with her angry, dilating eyes.

"Would to God that you never had!" she says, fiercely.

"Let go of my hand," cries Gypsy, frantic with excitement. "I am going to her. Do you think you can keep us apart, you fiend incarnate? Do you think I will sit by and see her hung—do you think I will even see her branded with another's sin? Ah, no! your worm has turned, she shall be saved! You would be happy if you could see her strung up by her neck; you always hated her; you would be happy then, very happy! But I will come between you and your enjoyment. Yes, I, your slave! You think I dare not do it? You think I have not the courage? I will show you. I——"

"You are mad!" Valentine again interrupts, with her chill, disdainful voice. "You are raving! There is every evidence in the world that Maize committed the crime——"

"You lie! Oh, my God! if I was only strong," pants Gypsy.

"But you see you are not strong," replies Valentine, with a contemptuous laugh. "As I say, every one believes Maize guilty. I believe it; you must believe it. It may be bitter at first, but you must school yourself to believe it. She is—not a person even in your own order doubts it. The strongest evidence is against her! It is believed that she was the last one with Lagora alive, and then she was alone with him in his chamber." The woman stands in the appalling strength of her grand womanhood, mercilessly leading on to its utter ruin the weaker spirit of her slave—that spirit that is making its last final effort to break away from its bondage of sin—to step upwards out of its fit of darkness.

Valentine bends closer to Gypsy, and her large eyes, fully charged with their peculiar power, look straight into the blue ones with their wild, terrified light, and her voice is chill with a deadly questioning:

"Who did kill him, if not Maize?"

Gypsy stands silent and wrings her small, soft hands.

"You see," pursues Valentine, in that hard, steady voice, "there is absolutely no one else upon whom the suspicion could fall. When you say that Maize is innocent you are going contrary to reason, and are making an assertion that you cannot prove. The world believes her the murderess. I believe it, you must believe it!"

Again that hoarse cry of great suffering breaks from Jack Ashhurst's wife.

"Never—never! In the past you have done everything with me, but you can never force me to believe that," she cries. "I know too well that she is innocent. Oh, my poor child—my poor child!"

Valentine is amazed at this show of tenderness and fidelity on the part of Gypsy, amazed and greatly angered.

"'Your poor child' is a murderess and being tried for her life," she says, brutally, "and the sooner you accustom yourself to the idea the better, for it must cling to you all your life."

A wild, delirious light comes in Gypsy's azure eyes, and she throws out her hands as if to ward off a curse.

"Yes, all my life," she repeats, and her voice is hollow and changed—"always to cling to me! Oh, my God! never to lay it down—never to lose it for a single day, or an hour, or a minute!"

Valentine's beautiful hand closes with a savage force upon the frail wrist of Gypsy, and her eyes grow hot and lurid.

"Are you practicing for theatricals?" she inquires, while her fine, delicate nostrils quiver with rage. "Gypsy, have done with this madness and act like a sensible woman. You have but one lesson to learn—Maize is a murderess."

"She is not! Oh, you wicked, devilish woman! What if she was with Count Lagora? You know well what took her there—she thought I was there, and went to save me. Poor, faithful child! But she shall not suffer for another's crime! I have studied it all out, and I know that she found that note and went to bring me home, thinking I had gone. And I will tell them this, and they will see what motive took her there."

Valentine is fully roused. She keeps her eyes drooping upon Gypsy with their intense expression—the pupils expand, grow faintly amber in their secret depths, and dazzlingly luminous. Lady Ashhurst shudders, and strives desperately to escape from that powerful glance, but the scathing eyes hold hers powerless.

"Very well," Valentine's voice is low and mocking. "I advise you to go immediately and tell the authorities that Count Lagora was enamored of you. They will then see the note with its allusion to the past; and, above all, they will be very desirous of information concerning Claudio Despucio, and that Summer in Greece. I believe Jack never heard that you spent a season in Athens. Oh, well, he will find it out, and it will be a nice little history for him—Jack, who has sworn by his wife's honor. And, of course, the papers will take up the hue and the cry, and it will float back to England, and you will be discussed in club and ballroom. You know you have some enemies at home, Gypsy—Lady Houghton, Blanche Rivers, and a few other celebrities. I can see how Lady Blanche's black eyes will flash over her chocolate, as she entertains Chetewood, De Vigne and Delancie with the choice bits of your story. You know Blanche always was jealous of you, and she won't show you much mercy with the men. She will dress you off in the brightest colors, and her tongue is sharp with its wit."

While she has been speaking a pitiful change comes over Gypsy. All the light and life die out of her face, and her eyes grow wild and haggard, while her small hands clinch. She seems to shrink away—to shrink further and further in herself, as the scoffing, pitiless words fall upon her ear. Valentine knows her nature better than she knows her own—all its failures, its weaknesses and its sin are seen by her penetrating vision; and she plays upon this poor, erring soul like a harpster upon his chords, bringing forth at will her evilest attributes and deadliest sin. She looks at the trembling, cowering form, the dilated eyes, the ashen, quivering face, but no pity touches her at sight of her wreck.

"Come," she says, derisively, "why do you hesitate? Are you not going to Jack with your story—are you not going to immolate yourself in Maize's cause? Come, here are your cloak and hood; I have obeyed you. I am ready to go with you to the magistrate."

But Gypsy draws back from her grasp and sinks in a chair. The most powerful chord in her nature has been touched—self-interest; and she sits shivering as with cold and smitten with a deadly terror.

"Come, I am ready," urges Valentine, scornfully, "it is not possible that you have so soon given out?"

"Hush!" It is all Gypsy says, but it shows the struggle, the weakness and anguish of her soul. "I can't do it," she finally cries out, and her small form sways to and fro; "you knew I couldn't when you spoke to me like that. It is your fault. If you had let me be, I would have saved her; I would have gone before my courage gave way, before I had time to think of self!"

"It is not too late yet. I am ready to accompany you."

The great, hunted, azure eyes flash up at her torturer in despairing wrath.

"I cannot do it, and you know it! Go out of my sight and don't come in it again to-day! Oh, I hate you, I hate you! I wish I despised sin as I despise you! If I die first I will curse you with my everlasting curse!"

Without a word Valentine goes out. She knows that the last chance of Maize's rescue has fled. Though stricken with agony and remorse, Gypsy will be mute as death.

She goes out into the fairness of the young day. In her, too, has come a wondrous change; some chance ring in the wild, mad voice of her victim has stricken her with a strange pain. "Her everlasting curse!" She shudders as the flood of sunlight smites her ashen face; her mouth is parched, her brain throbs, her limbs shiver, and her great eyes look blind and mad as she glances up at the sunlit heavens with a quiver in her straight, cold lips.

"My God! and all this for a woman's sin, a man's faithlessness!" Her hands are clinched tightly as she turns and re-enters the castle.

(To be continued.)

GOLD MINING IN GEORGIA.

UNTIL the close of the civil war mining in Georgia was confined mostly to the northeastern counties and to one or two mines in the Alatoona Mountains, in Cherokee County. It was carried on chiefly by panning, or pan-washing, and a large part of the population around Dahlonega made a living in this way. Statistics show that $29,000,000 had been panned out in the Counties of Lumpkin, Hall, Paulding and Cherokee. The mines in Cherokee and Paulding were the freshest, those around Dahlonega, where the United States mint was situated, being the first worked. Then came the rush to California, and the Georgia mines were neglected, except by plodding people, who preferred to wash out enough gold for bare support rather than cultivate the soil. Lately, however, the interest in the Georgia mines has been revived, not only in that State, but in the North and West as well; and in the last two years discoveries have been made which, the Georgians claim, demonstrate that their gold belt is as rich as the average California fields. This gold belt is a well-defined geological formation, beginning in Nova Scotia, coming to the surface in Duchess County, New York, cropping out freely in Virginia, North and South Carolina and Georgia, and finally disappearing in Alabama, the general direction being from northeast to southwest.

The gold belt of Georgia is in primary formation, confined to about fifty counties, of which Lumpkin, White and Hall have produced about fifty million dollars in gold since 1828. The first gold found in the United States was found in North Carolina in 1799. In 1829 and 1830, in Nachoochee Valley, Ga., the mining excitement was great. About 10,000 adventurers congregated in a short time, and "camped out." In 1830 the State took formal action, forcing the United States Government to make a treaty with the Indians, and regular mining was commenced. Gold sold for sixty to seventy-five cents per pennyweight. In 1837-8 a United States branch mint was established at Dahlonega, but was abandoned during the war, and the place was afterwards used for an agricultural school.

The portion of the Northeast Georgia which embraces the main developments in gold mining, and the most striking characteristics of mountain, valley and waterfall in the State, lies within Cherokee, Forsythe, Hall, Dawson, Lumpkin, White and Habersham Counties, a belt about 100 miles long and 30 miles wide, north of and immediately along the Atlanta and Charlotte Air Line Railroad.

As early as 1832 Auraria was the largest and most important town in Northern Georgia. It was 160 miles northwest of Augusta, its nearest point of communication with the outside world—over clayey hills almost impassable in wet seasons. Six miles further up towards the mountains the town of Dahlonega was located in 1832 or 1833, upon more hills than old Rome. The first stamp-mill in the vicinity of Dahlonega, and probably in the State, was a crude affair on Cane Creek, near the present somewhat famous Pigeon Creek Mine. This was nearly all wood, as the cost of hauling from machinery from Augusta was $3 per cwt. The next mill was an improvement, built upon the Yahoola River, by merchants, in 1838 or 1839.

In 1840 Dr. Singleton, a wealthy cotton planter of South Carolina, who owned a valuable mine in the quartz ridge along the Yahoola River, about 300 miles east of Erin, built the first iron stamp mill in the State—a very crude affair compared with some of those lately built upon the same property. The want of water has always been the great drawback to mining in the Dahlonega Hills. In 1854 and 1855 a firm, who were largely interested in mines, undertook to bring water from a point on the Yahoola River, twenty miles northeast of the town, having to cross the stream three miles from town, at an elevation of 150 feet, to get the water where it was needed. An expensive wooden trestle was built, which lasted only a few years. Since the war the old "Yahoola Ditch" franchise has fallen into the hands of a Cleveland gentleman, who has substituted wrought-iron pipes three feet in diameter, as inverted siphons, to cross the ravines, and has extended the ditch three or four miles further to the famous Pigeon Creek Mine, where the first successful experiment in hydraulic mining, with the "Little Giant," east of the Mississippi River, has been made. To get the water to this mine, the valley of Cane Creek, 300 feet deep, had to be crossed. This gave a head to the "Little Giant" of 130 feet.

The rock, which consists principally of decomposed quartz, is separated from the main body in open cuts on the hillside, and, with sledge-hammers, broken up into fragments varying in size from that of a man's fist to double or treble that size. The cuts from which these rocks are separated are carefully made wider at the top, narrowing to a small channel at the bottom. They just represent, along the hillside, the space covered by the letter V, lying at an angle varying from 45 deg. to 75 deg. along the slope of the hill, with the deepest part of the cut extending through the centre of the area thus described. From the bottom angle of the figure V a narrow cut on the face of the hill, say from two to three feet wide, and varying, according to the slope of the hill, from a perpendicular depth of from ten to forty or fifty feet into the hill, forms the channel through which, when the water is let on from the reservoir at the top of the hill, the ore is driven on to the floor of the mill at the base of the mountain. By this method a mass of ore—say from seventy-five to one hundred tons—is "flooded" to the mill within ten minutes from the time when the water is turned on from above. It is this great economy—rendering hauling of ores unnecessary—which forms one of the main elements of the value of all the mines in this section of country.

If the prognosis of the inhabitants of Northern Georgia is correct, there is good reason to believe that emigration to that region will be as active and steady as they could desire. If the gold is there in sufficient quantities to warrant the opening of the veins, capital will soon be seeking investment there, and labor will prefer working the mines that are within thirty-six hours of New York to those of the Pacific Slope.

The tourist may obtain a fair idea of the country by a trip over the Piedmont and the Atlanta and Charlotte Air Line Railways, the latter of which is built on the southern highland bench of the Blue Ridge, at an altitude of 1,000 to 1,500 feet, skirting bald peaks, bridging great ravines, and overlooking at times fair, far-reaching valleys and the wide plains to the south, or giving views of the Blue Ridge, which rises almost constantly in sight in a parallel line north.

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

The Sydney Papers state that some important gold discoveries have been made in the Bathurst district near Tuena, and that in one claim a bushel of broken quartz yielded two pounds of gold. A very rich gold-field has also been found at the Margaret River, in the Northern Territory of South Australia.

M. Herve-Mangon, the director of the Conservatoire des Arts et Métiers, has compiled a catalogue of the celebrated Vaucanson collection; it will be very shortly placed at the disposal of the public in the Portefeuille Industriel, a special library opened in the Conservatoire for the communication of designs and documents relating to industry.

The French Parliament has voted a sum of 200,000 francs for purchasing from the City of Paris the grounds which had been rented for a nominal sum to M. Leverrier by the Municipal Council, and had been already annexed by the great astronomer to the Observatory. The reason for this resolution is the impending erection of a new monument, which, according to the provision of the French law, cannot be built except on ground the freehold of which belongs to the Government.

On August 8th the pupils of all the schools of the Arts et Métiers of France met at Liancourt to celebrate the 100th anniversary of the foundation by the Duc de la Rochefoucauld Liancourt of the first establishment of this kind at his private residence. There are four of these useful schools—Aix, Angers, Chalons and Cluses—in existence in France, and one in Algeria, of very recent creation, at Deliys. It is said that each of the two provinces of Oran and Constantine will establish, at their own expense, a similar institution.

On July 13th, at the end of the French legislative session, the Minister of Marine and the Colonies presented to the Lower House a credit of 1,200,000 francs for establishing fortified posts from Medina on the Senegal to Bafoulabe on the Niger, on the route which will be followed by the projected railway for connecting these two large rivers. It includes also several other items connected with the same scheme. It was adopted on the same day and voted by the Senate on the 15th, so that the first step may be said to have been taken for the establishment of the connecting link between Algiers and St. Louis, via Timbuctoo.

The German African Society (Deutsche Afrikanische Gesellschaft) has at the present moment not less than six different expeditions travelling through Central Africa. The large funds necessary for the outfitting of these numerous travelers are raised partly through private subscription and partly through subsidies of the German Government. Among the travelers are (1) Dr. M. Buchner, who, starting from San Paolo de Loanda in an easterly direction, may have already reached the large lakes of the Upper Nile or the Upper Congo; (2) Dr. Oscar Lenz, who is on the way from Morocco to Timbuctoo, whence he will proceed to Senegambia; (3) a large expedition, comprising Dr. Böhm, Von Schöler, De Kayser, etc., which will establish a station near the Tanganyika Lake, in connection with the stations of the International Association; (4) Gerhard Rohlfs and Dr. Stecker will soon proceed to Abyssinia, and thence the latter through the Galina country to the sea-coast; (5) Dr. Pogge, together with several other travelers, will shortly start from San Paolo de Loanda for the interior, to establish a German station in the neighborhood of the Muata Janvo, about in the middle of the Continent; finally (6) Herr Flegel will follow the course of the Binue upwards, and explore the sources of that river. The German African Society has certainly developed under the presidency of Dr. Nachtigall a very unusual activity, and it is only to be hoped that these great efforts in the interest of the exploration of Africa may have good results.

PERSONAL GOSSIP.

OLE BULL, the well-known violinist, died at Bergen, Norway, on August 18th, in the 71st year of his age.

SIR GARNET WOLSELEY is selected by the British Government to attend the grand imperial military manœuvres at Berlin in the Autumn.

A BERLIN dispatch says that Count Henry Von Arnim denies a rebearing, and has expressed readiness to submit himself to Prussian jurisdiction.

THE statement is made that the Duke of Norfolk intends seeing Monsignor Capel through his money troubles. This means advances of $20,000.

IT is said that definite arrangements have been completed for the first appearance of Edwin Booth at the Princess Theatre, in London, in October.

HON. EUGENE SCHUYLER has succeeded, through the mediation of the British Minister, in arranging trade relations between Roumania and the United States.

SALVINI, the Italian tragedian, has signed a contract whereby he engages to play five months in this country, beginning November 29th. He will be supported by an American company.

THE Marquis of Stafford, eldest son of the Duke of Sutherland, is to be married at the close of the season to Miss Gerard, daughter of Lord Gerard, the head of one of the old Catholic Lancashire families.

GENERAL JOSEPH B. KIDDO, U. S. A., died in New York City on August 19th, from the effects of wounds received during the rebellion. He was a native of Pennsylvania and was 45 years of age.

MISS ADELAIDE NEILSON, the actress, who died in Paris on August 15th, was driving in the Bois de Boulogne on Saturday evening when she was seized with sudden illness and was conveyed to the nearest restaurant, where she expired. A post-mortem examination attributes her death to dropsy of the heart, accelerated by extreme indigestion.

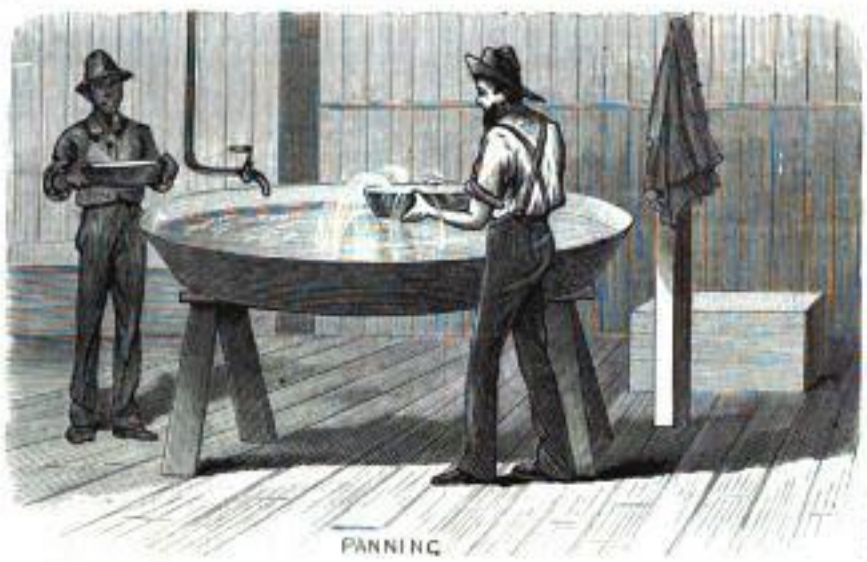
MR. JAMES E. TAYLOR, for many years connected with the Art Department of this establishment, has just received an order from General Sherman for a large water-color of the grand review of the army at the national capital in 1865. Mr. Taylor has already executed several orders for the General of the Army illustrative of historical scenes in military and Indian life.

A HANDSOME writing-table has been made at the command of the Queen out of a portion of the timber of the old Arctic ship Resolute, which was lately broken up. Her Majesty intends to present it to the President of the United States "as a memorial of the courtesy and loving kindness which dictated the offer of the Resolute." It will, of course, be placed in the White House.

EX-GOVERNOR COBURN of Maine is eighty years old, and looks after his financial affairs with the same interest that he manifested thirty years ago. Mr. Coburn is the richest man in the State. He is not a church member, but gives largely of his wealth to churches and institutions of learning. He is an ardent Republican and contributes to the success of the cause. He is unmarried, strictly temperate, and enjoys the reputation of being honest and honorable.

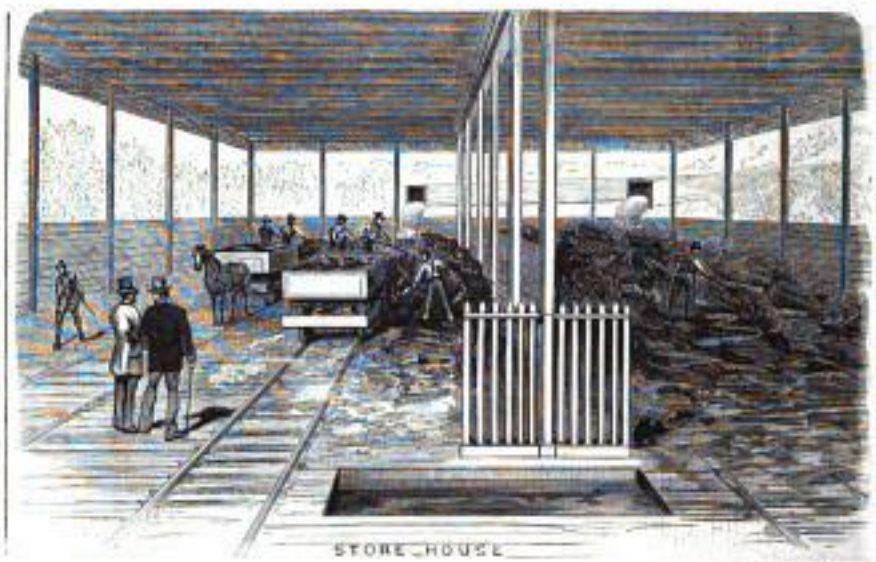
IT is announced that Mr. Herbert Spencer, the well known scientific philosophic writer, intends next year to make a tour round the world by way of the United States and Japan. He will devote two years to it, taking sociological observations at the more important points on the route. One or two scientific friends and one of his secretaries will accompany him on the tour, which will be the immediate preliminary to the completion of his philosophical system as originally planned.

A ROMAN CATHOLIC peer of distinguished lineage died on August 5th—Baron Clifford of Chudleigh, a Count of the Holy Roman Empire. The celebrated Fair Rosamond was the elder daughter of his first recognized ancestor, who lived in the reign of Henry II. Another ancestor was Sir Lewis de Clifford, who has been much noticed by historians as a chief zealot among the Lollards, and who made a famous recantation before Thomas Arundle, Archbishop of Canterbury. The fourth Baron was once of the celebrated Cabal Administration. The mother of the late peer was a daughter of Thomas Weld, who, after the death of his wife, took Orders from the Pope and was created a Cardinal in 1830. The new peer was born at Rome.



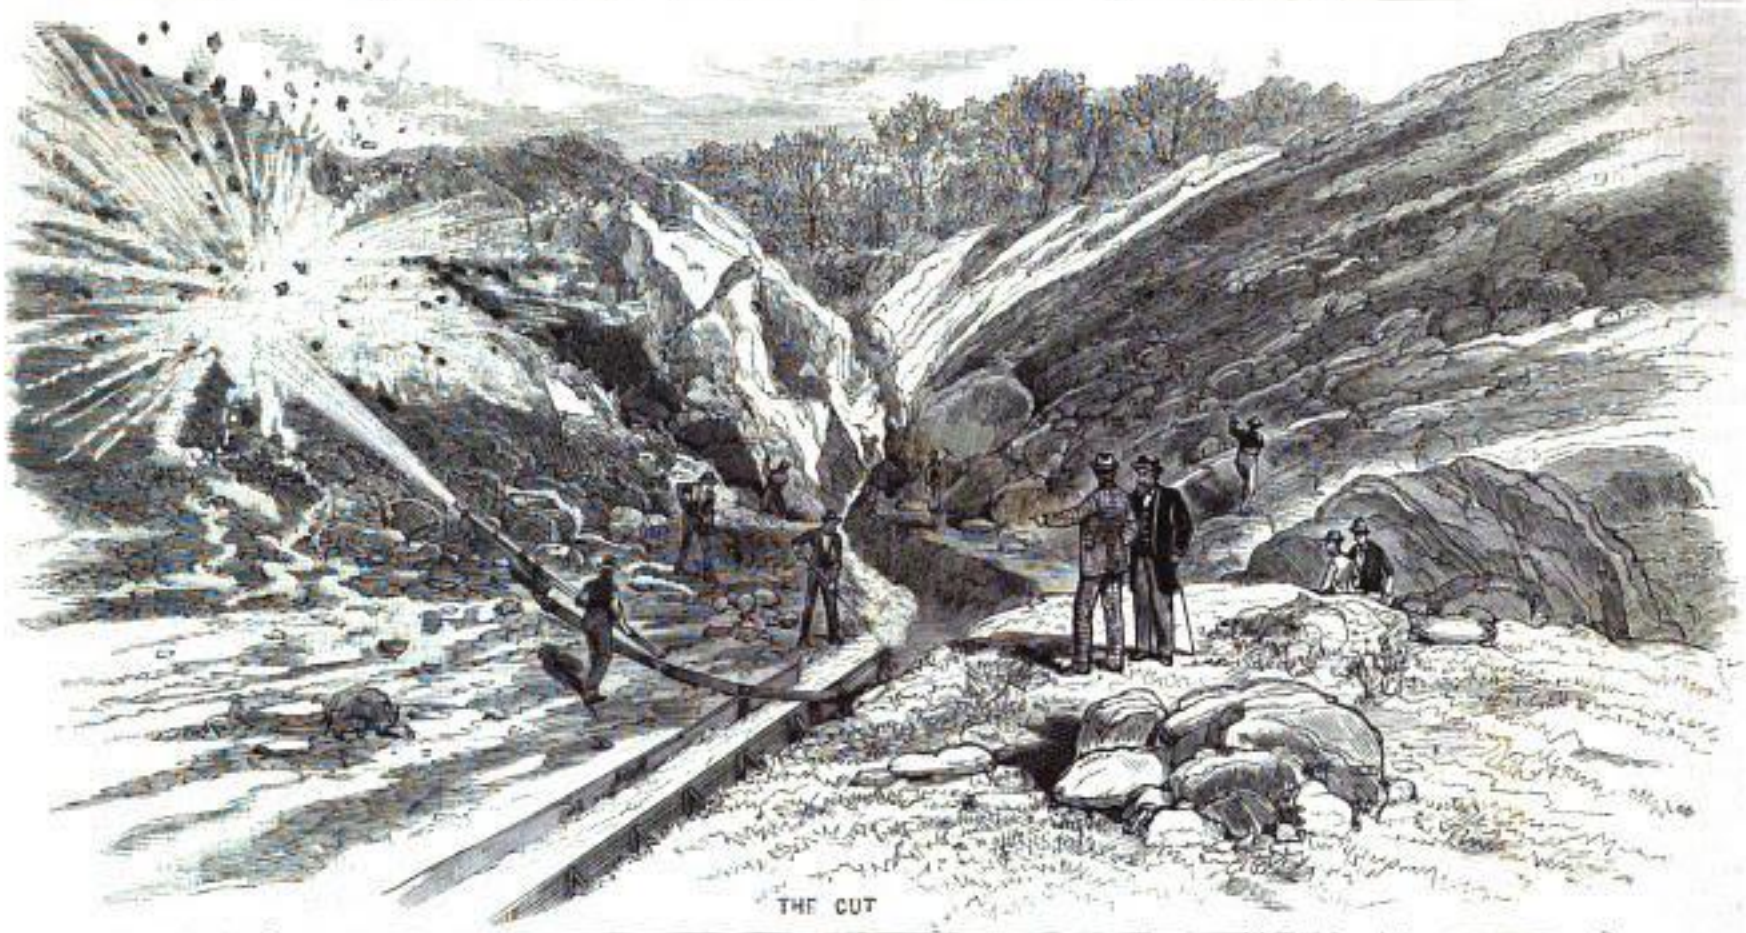
LORD STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE, better known as Sir Stratford Canning, died August 15th at the ripe old age of ninety-two years. In his day and generation he made a stir in the world, and his services to the British State won for him, successively, a baronetcy and a peerage and the Garter. His career as a diplomat began in the far away time when our grandfathers were young. He was a full fledged Minister Plenipotentiary in the year 1814, and in 1815 he was present at the Vienna Congress that reconstructed Europe after Napoleon's fall. His fame rests, however, upon what he accomplished while Envoy at Constantinople during the sixteen years between 1842 and 1858—a period covering that of the Crimean war.

EX-GOVERNOR HERSCHEL V. JOHNSON died at his residence in Jefferson County, Ga., on August 16th, in the sixty-eighth year of his age. He was Presidential elector in 1844, United States Senator in 1848, Judge in 1849, and Governor of Georgia from 1853 to 1857. He was also the Democratic candidate for Vice-President with Douglas in 1860, and a member of the Secession Convention in Georgia in 1861, when he opposed vigorously the policy of leaving the Union. In 1863 he was elected to the Confederate States Senate, and presided over the State Constitutional Convention in 1865. In 1866 he was elected United States Senator, but was not permitted to take his seat. In 1873 he was elected Circuit Judge of the State, which position he held at the time of his death.

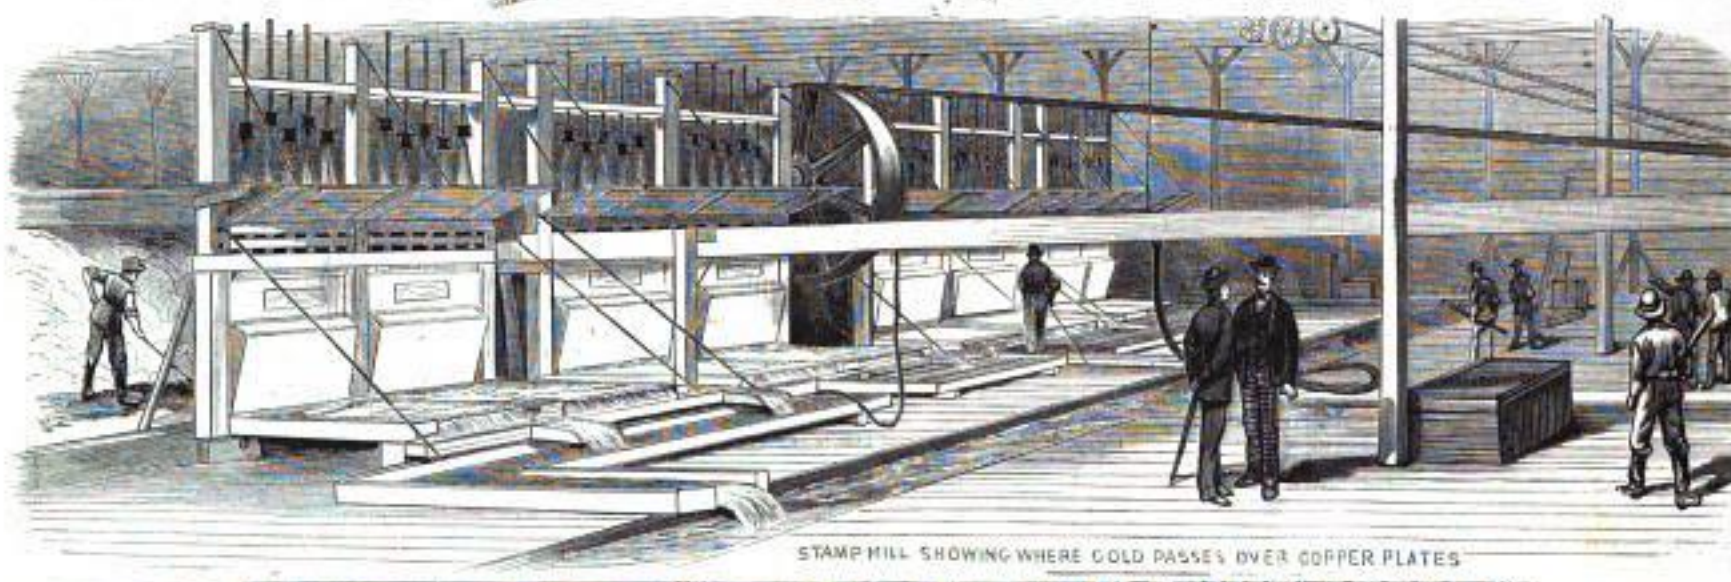


THE vehement opposition offered by the Bonaparte family to the engagement contracted some months ago by Prince Roland Bonaparte and Mlle. Blanc, principal heiress to the enormous fortune amassed by the late high priest of rouge-et-noir at Monaco, has proved fruitless, and the wedding day of the happy pair is fixed for the first of October next. The mother of the future princess has caused a splendid villa to be erected for the young couple in the Casino of Florence, whither they will repair at the conclusion of their honeymoon. Prince Roland holds a commission in the republican army as sub-lieutenant of artillery, and, being totally destitute of private means, has hitherto contrived to live upon his pay. By his marriage he will become the wealthiest scion of the house of Bonaparte.

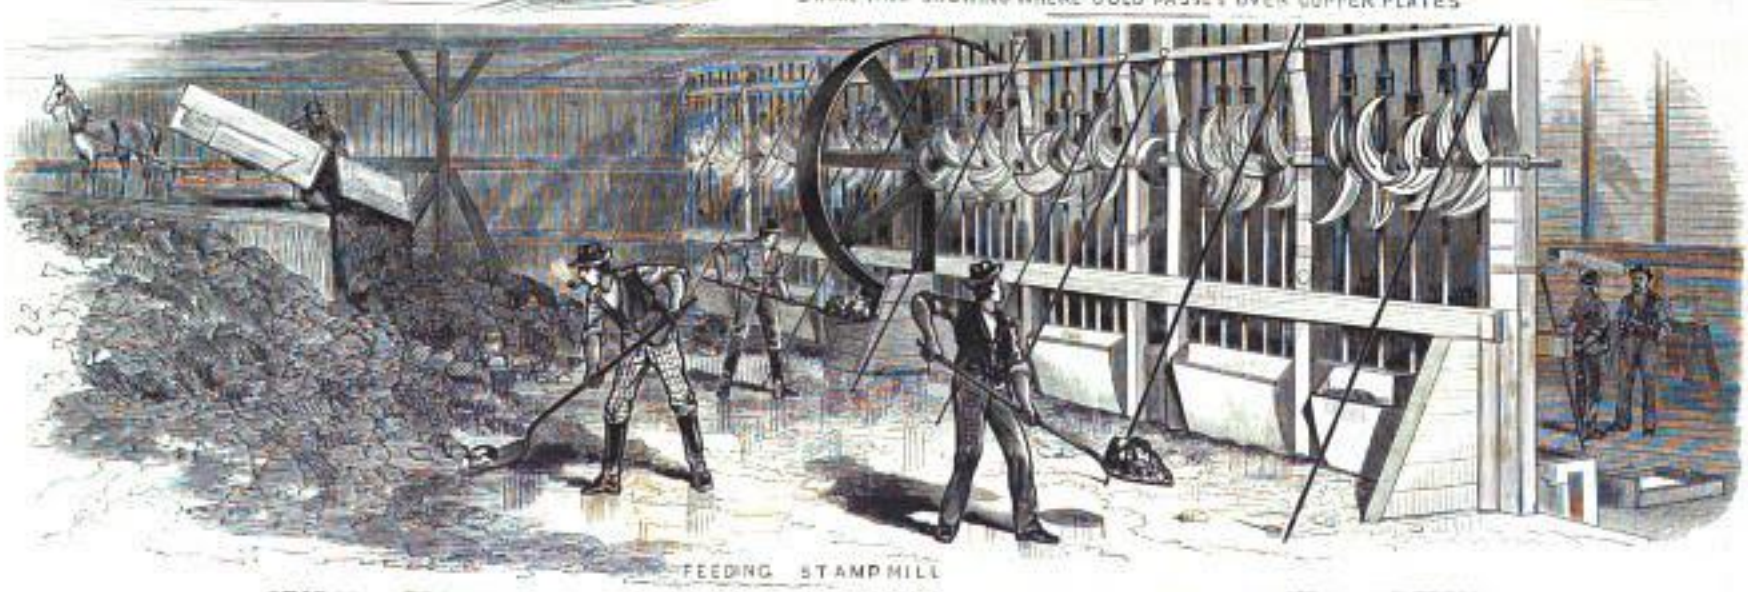
MEISSONIER, when in Paris, lives near the Parc Monceau. The frontage is at the top of the Boulevard Malesherbes, just at the beginning of the Avenue de Villiers. Dumas and Sarah Bernhardt are his neighbors. The house is Italian renaissance. There is little to see outside beyond a large expanse of masonry, as neatly joined as a piece of cabinet-work; but within are the terraces and arcades which form such charming backgrounds in the pictures of the Italian school. Pass the porte-cochère and you are in a spacious courtyard, in one corner whereof you see a richly carved Gothic stairway with an arched terrace forming the boundary on the other side. Not a bit of the decoration but has been done from his own designs. You pass from the courtyard up a staircase, rich in carved paneling, to the prime wonder of the house—the immense studio. Behind is a smaller atelier, and in this Meissonier works.



Digitized by Google



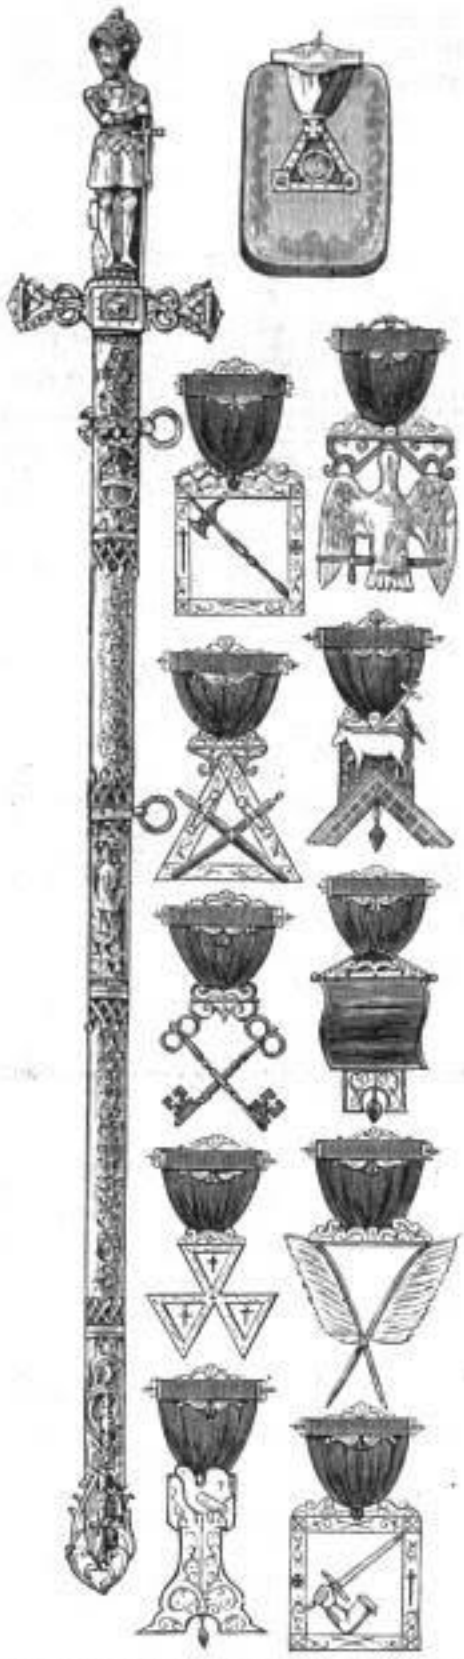
PANNING.



STORE-HOUSE.

THE CUT.

STAMP MILL SHOWING WHERE GOLD PASSES OVER COPPER PLATES.



FEEDING STAMP MILL.

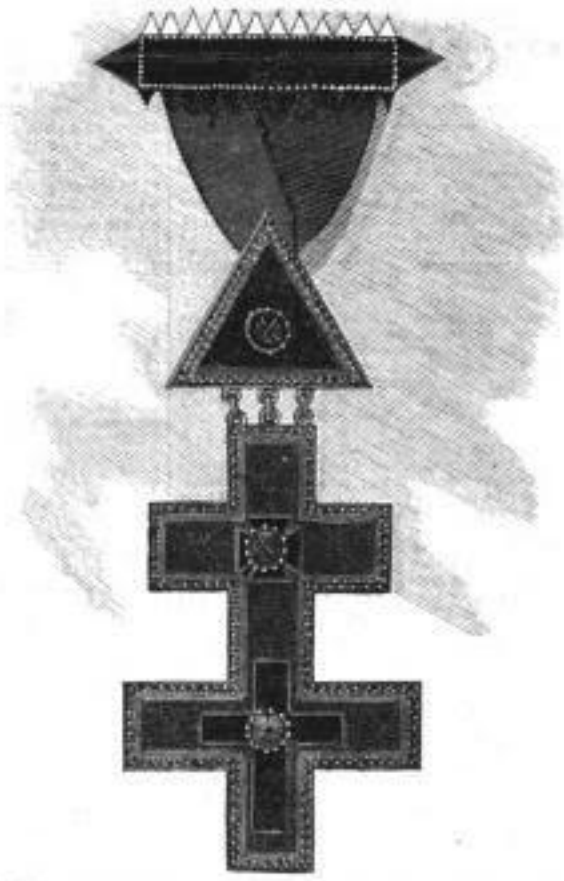
GEORGIA.—PROGRESS OF AMERICAN INDUSTRY—GOLD-MINING AT THE DAHLONEGA DISTRICT.
FROM SKETCHES BY WALTER GOATER.—SEE PAGE 11.

Digitized by Google

HON. H. B. BIGELOW, REPUBLICAN CANDIDATE FOR GOVERNOR OF CONNECTICUT. — FROM A PHOTO. BY PACH. — SEE PAGE 6.

THE DIAMOND-MOUNTED SWORD, "TRIENNIAL COMMITTEE" BADGE, AND SET OF COMMANDERY JEWELS.

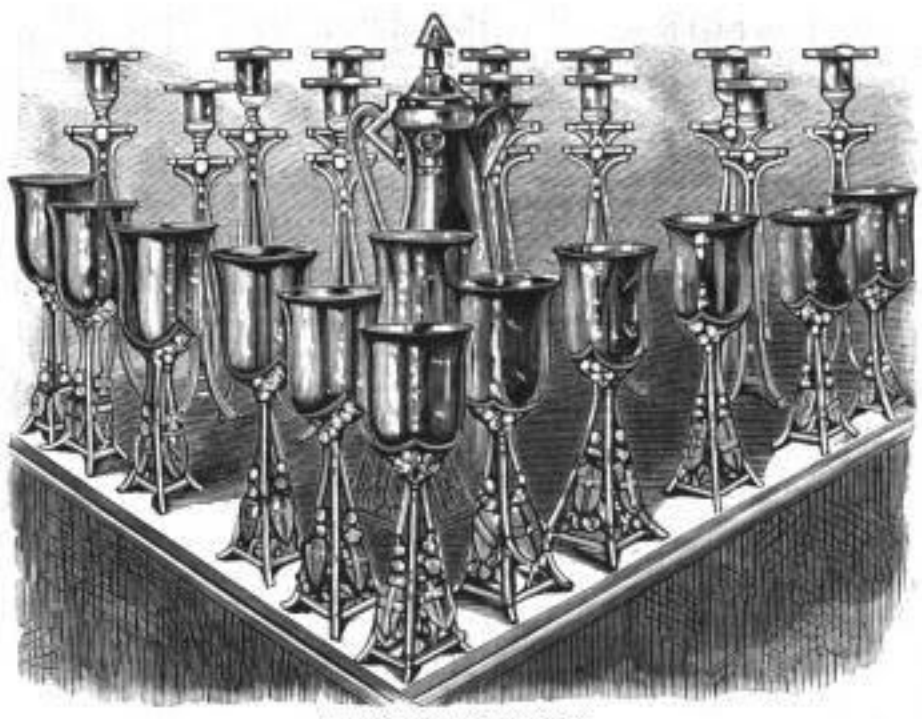
on the outside, is a red velvet cross, and on the inside, "Triennial Conclave, Chicago, August 17th, 1880."



There were also sixteen solid gold badges for this number of the triennial committee. These badges, also designed and made by Peacock, are very beautiful in workmanship and design. On the pin is engraved the name of the recipient, and below this, connected by a black-and white ribbon, is the date "1880" on a small piece of gold. Hanging from this is a two-inch triangle. On the upper corner is the coat-of-arms of the Apollo, on the right the Chicago, and on the left, the St. Bernard Commandery. The sides of the triangle are each set with four pearls, to represent the twelve lights.

HON. DAVID H. JEROME, REPUBLICAN CANDIDATE FOR GOVERNOR OF MICHIGAN.
FROM A PHOTO. BY DAN W. SMITH. — SEE PAGE 6.

THE GRAND STANDARD.



THE GRAND COMMANDERY JEWELS — DOUBLE OR PATRIARCHAL CROSS.

THE TRIENNIAL CONCLAVE OF KNIGHTS TEMPLAR.

THE Triennial Conclave of Knights Templar at Chicago last week was, undoubtedly, the most brilliant affair of the kind ever undertaken in this country. One of the great attractions of the occasion was the grand prize drill which took place at Chicago Jockey Club Park on August 18th. The exhibition was witnessed by an immense concourse of spectators. The prizes were seven in number. The first was a magnificent sword, with twenty-eight diamonds in the setting, and double that many rubies and emeralds. It has also large diamonds on each side of the helmet of the knight which forms the handle, another at the hilt of this golden knight's sword, and at each of the angles of the triangle at the ends of the cross-bar of the sword, and others on the sheath. The sides of the triangle just mentioned are completely filled with rubies and emeralds, while encircling the central part of the handle is a circle of small diamonds. Emeralds and rubies are worked in beautiful designs in other parts of the handle and sheath. The sword, designed and made by C. D. Peacock, of State and Washington Streets, Chicago, has a beautifully-polished black-walnut case, with a silver and ebony handle, and a silver inscription plate, with the words, "First Prize at Chicago, August 17th, 1880." The case is lined with blue satin. This prize was won by Raper Commandery, of Indianapolis.

Another drill Prize made by the same jeweler is a complete set of commandery badges. The eminent commander's badge is a solid gold pin, pendent from which is a triangle and cross. The triangle has a large diamond in the centre. The other badges are solid silver, with beautiful designs, and, on the average, cover a space of two and a half inches square. The set consists of fifteen pieces, one each for the eminent commander, generalissimo, captain general, treasurer, secretary, senior and junior wardens, prelate, four guards, standard and sword bearers, and warden. This jewelry is set in a black velvet-covered case, on the cover of which,

THE GRAND LIBATION SET.

Within the triangle is a circle with "Triennial Committee" upon it in black enamel. In the centre of the circle is a monogram of the three local commanderies.

One of the most coveted prizes was the Grand Standard, manufactured by Messrs. G. F. Foster, Son & Co., of Chicago. The body of the banner is heavy white silk, and in dimension is six feet high by five feet wide. The centre-piece is a passion cross worked in light gold bullion and surrounded by intricate scroll-work, embroidered in pure gold bullion. This part of the ornamentation occupied the time of several persons for over five weeks. On the transcript of the cross in the centre is a double triangle forming a square, on which is executed in oil the figures of mounted crusaders in full ancient armor, at the head of a line of dismounted crusaders, also in complete knightly armor. The inscriptions on the banner above the cross and below it are worked in gold bullion, and are respectively the words: "In Hoc Signo Vinces," and "Non Nobis Sed Nomine, tuo da Gloriam." From the point of the standard pole, which is surmounted with a gold patriarchal cross, to the end of the standard-bar, the tips of which are affixed with golden spear-points and crescents, a black velvet canopy trails in graceful folds. The fringe of the banner is composed of gold tassels of delicate and handsome design. The cost of this standard was nearly $500. The banner was an extra special prize to accompany the first prize—the sword, already described.

Two other important prizes, manufactured by Giles Brothers & Co., were a grand libation set and a grand commander's jewel. The first consists of twenty-five pieces, quadruple plate of fine silver, and are exquisite in design and workmanship. The twelve candlesticks, some twelve inches high, have a triangular base supporting three silver uprights terminating in a triangle which bears the socket, the horizontal face of which is a Maltese cross. Half way up the uprights is a triangular brace, on the three sides of which are respectively the armorial shields of the Apollo, Chicago and St. Bernard Commanderies in gold. The base of the twelve goblets, which

ILLINOIS.—PRIZES AWARDED THE SUCCESSFUL COMMANDERIES OF KNIGHTS TEMPLAR, AFTER THE COMPETITIVE DRILL, AUGUST 18TH.
FROM PHOTOGRAPHS BY MOSHER.

Digitized by Google

are gold-lined, is the same as the candlesticks. The pitcher preserves the triangular formation throughout, and simplicity and richness characterize the entire design. The case which contains the set is ornate in design and finish, and appropriately symbolized with Templar devices. The grand commandery jewel is a superb piece of artistic goldsmithery. It is a double or patriarchal cross connected by three links to a triangle above, which is the red ribbon and gold pin. At the lower transcript of the cross is a raised passion cross in black enamel set with a magnificent diamond. At the upper transcript is a Maltese cross set with a ruby. The centre of the triangle is a fine emerald. The gems are about a carat and half, and of the first water. The edges of the cross proper and triangle form the three steps of Masonry in red, green and yellow gold, and are triangulated upon the face. The pin preserves its Masonic character by inscribing a parallelogram bordered by triangulation. These prizes are valued at $1,000 each. The remaining prizes, two in number, were a bouquet set, embracing six dozen pieces of granite glass and silverware, and a set of "robes" for Red Cross council. The photos of the prizes from which our illustrations are made were supplied by Mosher, of Chicago.

The second prize was awarded to De Molai Commandery, of Louisville; third prize to Reed Commandery, of Dayton, Ohio; and fourth prize to Damascus Commandery, of St. Paul. The special prize for mounted men was awarded to the De Molai Commandery, of Grand Rapids.

The Postal Service.

THE rapid growth of the country is well illustrated by some figures recently compiled at the Post Office Department. The whole number of post-offices in the country at present is 42,677, which is an increase of nearly 2,000 during the last twelve months, the number on the 30th of June, 1879, having been but 40,855. The increase during the last year has been much more rapid than in the previous twelve months. Pennsylvania stands first on the list in point of numbers, with 3,420, New York coming second, with 2,938. The number of presidential offices, that is, of those where the compensation exceeds $1,000, is 1,764, an increase of 53 during the past year. New York has a larger number of such offices than Pennsylvania—189 to 161—despite the fact that Pennsylvania leads in the whole number of post-offices.

The Empire Agricultural State.

THE Chicago Tribune says: The State of Illinois has achieved the high position of the Empire Agricultural State of America, and under circumstances which lead to the certainty that its pre-eminence in this respect will be maintained long into the future. In point of population it has been for a number of years the fourth State in the Union, being exceeded only by New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio; the present census will probably show it to have a population somewhat in excess of Ohio, but in agricultural production, both as to quantities and values, it has taken its place at the head of the column.

The State contains an area of 55,410 square miles, equal to 35,462,400 acres of land. Perhaps there is not in the world an equal block of land where there is so small a proportion unadapted to the plow, or which is lost to agriculture by reason of mountains, barrens, swamps or overflows of water. Deducting the land devoted to railroads, right of way, to wagon roads, to cities, towns and villages, and there remains in Illinois 80,000 square miles of land which, for general fertility and adaptability to agriculture, has no superior, if it have an equal, in the world. The rainfall ranges from sufficient to abundant, but never excessive, except upon the low lands, and these are being reclaimed by tile-drainage, while the temperature is evidenced by the almost unfailing production which extends to every county of the State, from the lake to the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers. The deep, rich soil, the equable temperature, the adequate rainfall—all unite in rendering the State of Illinois capable of a greater average production of food-crops per acre within her limits than is possible for any other State on the continent. Nor are her crops limited as to kind. Nearly every staple production of the soil is produced in Illinois—all varieties of grain, with the addition of amber sugar-cane, and even cotton in the southern counties, with a prolific production of a vast variety of vegetables and of many small fruits which promises to be one of the most profitable character.

In 1878 the productive lands of Illinois were thus divided:

	Acres.		Acres.
Wheat	3,969,963	Corn	7,627,733
Oats	1,456,644	Meadows	2,302,888
Other field products	731,228	Inclosed pastures	3,760,071
Woodlands	8,607,993	Orchards	294,648

The wheat crop of 1878 was estimated at 36,000,000 bushels, corn at 343,000,000, oats at 44,000,000. Since then this acreage, as well as that devoted to other crops, has been largely increased. Of the product of the farms in this State in 1879 we have no official figures except in a few of the principal items. The Hon. B. B. Gillham, President of the Illinois Agricultural Society, in his report, now in press, gives some returns corrected to a late date, and the exhibit of Illinois compares with the whole country as follows:

	Crop of No. 1879 in United States.	Crop of No. 1879 in Illinois.
Corn, bushels	1,514,809,000	205,913,377
Wheat, bushels	448,755,000	49,041,393
Hay, tons	35,648,000	2,578,766
Oats, bushels	364,263,000	54,634,569
Rye, bushels	20,046,000	4,138,824
Cattle, number	39,264,500	1,662,305
Horses, number	10,938,700	887,318

From the figures it will be seen that in 1879 Illinois produced one-fifth of all the corn produced in the United States, and more than one-tenth of all the wheat. In both of these crops this State exceeded any other State in the Union, and in these particulars this excess over the other fertile States of the Union will in all probability be maintained.

But the productiveness of Illinois is not confined to wheat and corn. The total number of hogs killed and packed in the United States last year was, in round numbers, 11,000,000, of which Illinois sent to market as her crop 2,700,000, which is over 21 per cent. The oat crop of Illinois amounted to 15 per cent. of all produced in the Union; and in the production of rye, barley, hay, butter, cheese, seeds and potatoes and other root crops, Illinois ranks high among her sister States.

Mr. Gillham, in his report, tabulates comparatively the annual products of the gold and silver mines of the United States from 1874 to 1879, both inclusive, and the value of the corn crop of Illinois in the same years. All the gold and silver gathered from the mines in these six years aggregated $477,613,792, while the value of the corn crop in Illinois was $470,256,013. The corn fields of Illinois alone have been as productive as all the bonanzas and other mines in all the country.

In the meantime, while the State of Illinois is fairly entitled to be called the Empire Agricultural State of the Union, because of the greater magnitude of her farm productions, both as to quantity and value, the State has grown rich in the extent and value of her manufactures. Her abundance of coal, her great water-power, her means of transportation, the abundance of raw material, and the immense population which surrounds the great central market at Chicago, furnish to the great manufacturers of the country inducements not exceeded by those of any other section. It is more economical to bring the workshop and the workman where the food is produced in sight of the factory, and where the millions of consumers of manufactured goods are in close proximity and can make their exchange of commodities at less cost. Thus, while Illinois is growing rapidly as one of the manufacturing States of the Union, her supremacy as an agricultural State continues to assert itself at each returning season of seed-time and harvest.

Foreign Armies.

NOTHING is more remarkable in Europe than the recent rapid increase of the armies of the leading States, and certainly nothing is more injurious to the best interests of the people at large. France, Germany and Russia, not to speak of Italy and Austria, have been bending every energy and employing all their available revenue in the last ten years to strengthen their vast military bodies. The increment of the Russian forces during the last quarter of a century is shown by a document lately published in St. Petersburg. At the beginning of 1853 the Russian Army numbered 27,716 officers and 908,382 men, including reserve, local, auxiliary and Cossack troops. During the Crimean war (1854-56), the force of the Empire was, of course, largely increased, and comprised, January 1st, 1856, according to official reports, 41,817 officers and 2,257,454 men. How many of these were in the field or fit for actual service, is not even approximately known. The active army then numbered, it is said, about 25,000 officers and 1,200,000 men; the reserves, 7,876 officers and 272,158 men; the irregular forces, 3,640 officers and 158,691 men; the militia and Cossacks, some 540,000, all told. Vast deductions must naturally be made from these figures in counting an effective force. In 1863, for example, when the returns of the Minister of War exhibited the regular troops at 838,987 men, careful examination reduced it to 285,000 men—considerably less than one-half. In November, last year, the Russian Army comprised, nominally, 908 generals, 31,414 officers, and 866,423 men, while at the same date the reserve numbered 742,168 men, and the Cossacks 53,422 men, with about 196,000 on furlough. It is not likely, however, that any such force could be brought into the field. A German military writer recently proved that the revenue annually devoted to the maintenance of the Russian Army would be inadequate to sustain so large a body, even if administered on the most economical principles, and nothing is so administered in Russia. There is no greater difference in scarcely anything than between an army on paper and an army in the field, particularly in Russia.

Life at the Azores.

TO FIND a place to live in at once comfortable and cheap is usually a vain search, for all travelers know, as a rule, that the cheap places are not comfortable, and that the comfortable places are not cheap. St. Michael, the largest of the Azores, seems to be an exception, from the account of an American who has been spending some time at Ponta Delgada and Ribeira Grande, two considerable towns on that island. He calls it, on the whole, the best spot on earth, and the poor man's Eden. The soil is fertile, the climate healthful, mild and delightful, the scenery charming, and the inhabitants are noted for simplicity and kindness. Labor is very cheap, and consequently the streets of the towns and the roads leading there are kept very clean and in excellent order. Eggs can be bought for five cents a dozen; good beef for three cents a pound; fowls for twelve cents a piece, and comfortable dwellings hired for $7 a month. For $600 a year one can live well; for $700 handsomely, and for $1,000 superbly, keeping carriage and horses. The whole island is picturesque, containing many beautiful gardens, which are well taken care of. The land is owned by a few rich people, and rented at the rate of $50 to $60 an acre. The peasants perform all the labor in the country proper, go barefooted and live so economically that $100 a year suffices for the expenses of a small family. The fashions in dress have not changed for a century, either among the upper or lower classes. The women wear copakes—garments resembling the ulsters worn here by the other sex, and reaching the whole length of the figure. The head-covering, termed a capilla, attached to the copake, is like one of the old New England bonnets, and is pulled over the face when a stranger approaches. The natives never attempt to see the countenances of their friends, whom they recognize by their feet, looking down, not up, as they pass anybody in the street or on the road. St. Michael, which is about thirty miles square, appears, indeed, to be a miniature paradise, at least for men of small means. It is very unfashionable, however, whether women would like it. How could they enjoy an island where fashions never change during a lifetime, and where only one sort of garment is worn? So much of the contemporaneous woman's time is occupied in ordinary civilization, with taking off and putting on clothes, that she would suffer excessively at St. Michael for lack of congenial employment.

Boston Baked Beans.

THOUGH Boston has acquired some fame as a large consumer of this esculent, baked beans have been from time immemorial a favorite dish throughout New England. The sturdy men and women of generations ago, who braved dangers and hardships in planting an independent colony, added strength to their sinews and muscles by eating simple food, of which baked beans were a much cherished ingredient, and of all ancient dishes none have stood better the test of time and the caprices of the appetites of the people. But it is a little singular that, while New England is so large a consumer of baked beans, and New Englanders—more especially the residents of Boston—have acquired the mystery of cooking them perfectly, the dish is not in much favor elsewhere, and that the knowledge of baking them properly is exceedingly limited. It may be said that one circumstance is due to the other—that is, that where it is not known how to bake beans properly, they are naturally not a popular article of diet. If the method and process of baking were patented, it could scarcely be more exclusively held by New Englanders. Custom has prescribed either Saturday night or Sunday morning as the "correct time" for eating baked beans, and the scene at the baker's then is the busiest of the week. Among the hundreds of bakers in Boston, there are but few who do not "put to soak" on Friday night from one to five barrels of beans, which, added to the number cooked in private dwellings, will give one a conception of how well deserving is Boston of her fame as a bean-consuming city. A well-informed gentleman estimates that the consumption of beans in Boston is about 300 barrels per week, or about 32,000 barrels per year. One reason why Boston baked beans are considered better than any others is that almost invariably they are baked in brick ovens over night. Besides baking a quantity to sell, the bakers, for the nominal sum of five cents per pot, receive and bake the beans that are prepared by their customers, thus adding materially to their own profits and the convenience of the public. It is a fact, certainly not universally known, that there is in Boston an establishment devoted exclusively to the baking of beans, entirely separate from the canning institution. It is the only establishment of the kind in the world, probably, and it is exceedingly doubtful whether it could live anywhere else. At all events, attempts have been made to establish similar institutions elsewhere, and nothing but failure has been the result, and it is now plain enough that a bean-eating community is requisite to support a bean-baking establishment. The success of the Boston bean-bakery was assured from the start, and its enterprising proprietor has climbed up the road to wealth by the bean-pole, without assistance from the pole. Every night in the week the fire under the spacious brick oven is in full blast, and two teams are kept busy daily in delivering the pots and their smoking-hot contents. Of the customers of the bakery fully one-half are restaurant-keepers, who pay 20 cents for two quarts of beans, and then retail them at 10, 15 and 25 cents per plate. The bakery consumes from 1,800 to 3,800 pounds of beans per week, and its oven has the capacity to bake 450 pots in a single night. It is, perhaps, worthy of note that the bakery is located in a fashionable quarter of the city.

FUN.

A CASE of suspended animation—Swinging in a hammock.

THE watermelon is like a book. It isn't red until it is opened.

A CHEAP Summer excursion—a trip on the light fantastic toe.

CHEATING never prospers—except, perhaps, in trading horses.

A SMOKER in an open horse car takes a rear seat for his money.

OF all the bottles that have been thrown overboard from imperiled ships, no despairing man gave up hope so utterly as to fling into the sea a bottle of fine old brandy.

"MY umbrella is getting decidedly shabby," said a young man about town one night last week. "I believe I will have to strike another prayer-meeting the first rainy night."

HE opened the door cautiously, and poking his head in a suggestive sort of way, as if there was more to follow, inquired: "Is this the editorial rinktum?" "The what, my friend?" "Is this the rinktum—sinktum—sanctum, or some such place where the editors live?" "This is the editorial room, yes, sir. Come in." "No, I guess I won't come in. I wanted to see what a rinktum was like, that's all. Looks like our garret, only wuss. Good-day."

THIS is how a Twenty-fourth Ward man told it: "Judge Wheeler sent for me. I went down, and he received me cordially. He said: 'I have heard of the wonderful things you have accomplished by knocking down five persons and assaulting six others, and I am proud of you.' Then he offered a toast, 'Guilty, or not guilty?' to which I responded in a brief but elegant speech, setting forth the importance of the occasion that had brought us together. After the usual ceremonies, I was requested to lend the city ten dollars."

A DAY or two ago as a colored bootblack was passing a down-town bar-room and fruit-store he picked up the stump of a cigar from the gutter and went into the store and asked for a match. He was met with the reply, "We don't keep matches to give away." The boy started out, but stopped at the door, turned back and asked the proprietor, "Do you sell 'em?" He purchased a box, paid his two cents and lit his stump, after which he closed the box and asked the proprietor to put it on the shelf and "next time a gem'an asks you for a match just give 'im one out'n my box."

ON West street, the other day, "Where are you going, my pretty maid?" asked a benevolent old gentleman, as he chucked under the chin a little tot of a six-year-old, who was walking gravely along with a basket on her arm. "Give thee good day, graybeard," replied the midget, simply. "My father bade me to the shambles his for a fat haunch." "W-w-what?" ejaculated the old party. "Haply thou knowest him, the good man Skidmore?" inquired the tiny dame. "N-o-o," said the gentleman, much puzzled at the evident earnestness of the child. "You're a quaint little thing. Come with me, and I'll buy you some candy." "Alack! I am forbid to tarry, gentle sir. I need be blithe. Their patience stays upon my coming." "Good-by," said the old gentleman. "Rest you merry, master," and dipping a chubby little courtesy, the mite trotted off. "Bless my soul! what an extraordinary child!" said the gentleman to a neighbor, who had been looking on. "Oh! that's nothing," replied the other. "You see, she's the daughter of Bilson, the heavy man at the theatre, and I suppose they talk so much of that kind of lingo in the family that it comes natural to her. Doesn't hear anything else, you see."

NO CURE, NO PAY.

DR. PIERCE'S Family Medicines are guaranteed to cure; for particulars see wrappers and pamphlets. They are reliable; have not sprung into popularity in a week or month, and gone out of favor as rapidly; but, being sustained by merit, have won a world-wide reputation, necessitating a branch in London to supply foreign countries, while the home sales are enormous throughout the United States. Golden Medical Discovery purifies and enriches the blood, preventing fevers, and curing all skin and scrofulous affections, stimulating the liver to action, relieving biliousness, and curing consumption, which is scrofula of the lungs. If the bowels are costive, take Pierce's Pellets (little pills). Both sold by druggists.

CHICAGO, Ill., May 5th, 1879.

WORLD'S DISPENSARY MEDICAL ASSOCIATION:

Gentlemen—For years I have been a great sufferer. My trouble first started with ague chills and constipations. This left me in 1878 with a racking cough and frequent bleedings from the lungs. Since this time I have been continually doctoring, consulting physicians without number. From them I received no benefit or encouragement. The most noted physicians of our city who last visited me expressed their opinions in the brief but hopeless words: "Take good care of yourself the few days you have to live; we cannot help you." I grew steadily worse under their treatment. One day, through reading your Memorandum Book, I learned of the Golden Medical Discovery. With but little hope of relief I purchased a bottle and took it. To my surprise and satisfaction it did me more good than all the drugs I had taken the year around. I am now steadily using it with benefit, and recommend it to all to be just what it is advertised.

Sincerely yours, JAMES P. McGRATH,
50 Wight Street.

THE most efficacious stimulants to excite the appetite are ANGOSTURA BITTERS, prepared by Doctor J. G. B. Siegert & Sons. Beware of counterfeits. Ask your grocer or druggist for the genuine article. J. W. Hancox, Agent, 51 Broadway, N. Y.

AFTER years of travel to and from health resorts, and after a most careful trial of all the various prescriptions, ladies have given up in despair with an almost total loss of appetite, pale, bloodless, languid, and without ambition; finally, having learned of DR. BROWNING'S TONIC AND ALTERATIVE, although having been sick for years, gain flesh and a fine constitution upon investing a small amount in it. Price 50 cents and $1. For sale by the Proprietor, W. Champion Browning, 1117 Arch Street, Philadelphia, and all druggists.

FISK & HATCH,
Bankers,
AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT BONDS,
And other desirable Investment Securities,
No. 5 Nassau St., New York,

Buy and sell all issues of Government Bonds, in large or small amounts, at current market prices, and will be pleased to furnish information in reference to all matters connected with investments in Government Bonds.

We are prepared to give information in regard to first-class Railway Securities, and to execute orders for the same.

Buy and sell all marketable Stocks and Bonds on commission, at the Stock Exchange and in the open market.

Receive accounts of Banks, Bankers, Merchants and others, and allow interest on daily balances; and for those keeping accounts with us we collect United States coupons, and registered interest, and other coupons, dividends, etc., and credit without charge.

☞ We give special attention to orders from Banks, Bankers, Institutions and investors out of the city, by Mail or Telegraph, to buy or sell Government Bonds, State and Railroad Bonds, Bank Stocks, Railroad Stocks, and other securities.

We have issued the Seventh Edition of "Memoranda Concerning Government Bonds," copies of which can be had on application.

FISK & HATCH.

WHAT changed your gray hair to its natural color? MRS. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER. Every Druggist sells it.

HE MEANT TO, and he didn't; and so when he was badly hurt, he found he wasn't insured in THE TRAVELERS.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE makes a delightful and healthy drink with water and sugar only.

THE constantly increasing sale of BURNETT'S COCOAINE confirms the opinion of the best judges, that it is equal, if not superior, to any domestic or foreign. It also received the highest award at the Centennial Exhibition.

THE pleasure of a stranger in visiting a great city is largely dependent on the hotel where he stops. None can be so unhesitatingly recommended as the ST. NICHOLAS. In the very centre of life and business, superbly kept according to the modern idea of a palatial hotel, every attention is exhausted to subserve the enjoyment of the fastidious guest. The rates have been reduced in accordance with the general tendency of the times.

Stuttering cured by RAUB'S APPLIANCES. Send for description to RAUB & Co., Box 2230, New York.

Bouquetiere.

The Bouquetiere is the Adieu of Perfection for securing the Bouquet to Coat, Dress, Belt or Hair. Simple and durable; in Gilt or Bronze. Mailed free on receipt of price, 25 cents each five for $1; or per dozen, $2.

GEORGE B. COOPER (Sole Agent),
No. 27 Union Square, N. Y.

CANDY Send one, two, three or five dollars for a retail sample box, etc., by express, of the best Candies in America, put up elegantly, and strictly pure. Refers to all Chicago.

C. F. GUNTHER, Confectioner, 78 Madison St., Chicago.

Frank Leslie's Pleasant Hours.

A MONTHLY PICTORIAL JOURNAL of LIGHT, PLEASING LITERATURE, INTERESTING AND BEAUTIFULLY ILLUSTRATED STORIES, COMPLETE IN EACH NUMBER.

PLEASING TALES, ADVENTURES, ANECDOTE, AND MIRTH-PROVOKING ILLUSTRATIONS.

For sale by all newsdealers, price 15 cents. Annual subscription, $1.50, postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Newspaper Advertising Bureau.

BY ADDRESSING GEO. P. ROWELL & CO., 10 Spruce St., New York, the exact cost of any proposed line of advertising can be learned. 100-page pamphlet, 10c.

[From Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, March 20th, 1880.]

THE PHILADELPHIA PREMIUM BOOK CO., No. 810 Chestnut St., Philada., Pa., is advertising new and standard books at the lowest retail prices, presenting a gift with each. Its managers are some of the best business gentlemen of Philadelphia, and its list of premiums embraces many handsome and costly articles. The enterprise has thus far met with great success by reason of the prompt and generous manner in which it has fulfilled its promises.

Send for their Catalogue of Choice Reading for 1880.

Frank Leslie's

BUDGET,

A MONTHLY VARIETY MAGAZINE,

Spicy and Entertaining.

Each Number contains 98 pages quarto, and over 100 beautiful illustrations.

Published on the 1st of every month, and for sale by all Newsdealers. Annual subscription, $1.50; single copies, 15 cents; sent postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Digitized by Google

J. H. HAVERLY'S AMUSEMENT ENTERPRISES

HAVERLY'S FIFTH AVENUE THEATRE,
Broadway and Twenty-eighth St., N. Y.
Will open Sept. 1st with
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor and Manager.
HAVERLY'S FOURTEENTH STREET THEATRE, N.Y.
Cor. Sixth Avenue and Fourteenth Street.
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor and Manager.
HAVERLY'S NIBLO'S GARDEN THEATRE, N. Y.
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor and Manager.
HAVERLY'S THEATRE, BROOKLYN,
Johnson and Washington Streets.
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor and Manager.
HAVERLY'S THEATRE, CHICAGO.
Cor. Dearborn and Monroe Sts.
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor and Manager.
HAVERLY'S UNITED MASTODON MINSTRELS.
J. H. HAVERLY'S GRAND ATHLETIC AND PEDESTRIAN ENTERPRISES.
FRED. J. EBERSBACH, Manager.
HAVERLY'S WIDOW BEDOTT COMEDY CO.
HAVERLY'S GENUINE COLORED MINSTRELS.
Also controlling, at all times, a large additional number of Leading Attractions, and always ready to negotiate with Grand Opera, Stars (with or without company), Combinations and Amusement Enterprises generally.

Old Dominion Steamship Co.

FOR NORFOLK, RICHMOND, OLD POINT COMFORT, THE VIRGINIA SPRINGS, THE SOUTH, SOUTHWEST AND WEST,
From Pier 43, N. R., Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday, 3 P.M.

FOR LEWES AND REHOBOTH BEACH, DELAWARE,
From Pier 37, N. R., Monday, Wednesday and Friday, 3 P.M.

Elegant passenger accommodations on all steamers.
General Office, 197 Greenwich St., N. Y.
W. B. STANFORD, Gen.

Starin's Glen Island.

NEW ROCHELLE HARBOR, LONG ISLAND SOUND.
THE ELEGANT STEAMERS
Laura M. Starin and St. Nicholas,
Will leave for GLEN ISLAND daily and Sundays from Pier No. 19, N. R., Jewell's Wharf, Brooklyn; Thirty third Street, E. R. For time tables see daily papers.
Grand Concert in Pavilion Daily.
A RHODE ISLAND CLAM-BAKE served daily from 12 M. to 6 P. M., for 75 cents, in the magnificent Dining-hall of the Club-House, under the supervision of
HIRAM D. MAXFIELD,
The celebrated caterer.
MAMMOTH DANCING PAVILION, BILLIARDS, BOWLING ALLEYS, RIFLE RANGES, BOATING AND BATHING.
EXCURSION TICKETS (round trip), 40 cents; single, 25 cents. Clam bake 75 cents.
SHELTER ISLAND.
Steamer J. H. STARIN leaves pier No. 19, N. R., foot of Cortlandt Street, MONDAYS and FRIDAYS, at 2 P. M., for Shelter Island and New Haven. A sail of four hours by daylight across the Sound, after leaving the City of Elms. Fare, single, $1.25; excursion, $2.25.
STARIN'S EXCURSIONS.

MANHATTAN BEACH.

VIA GREENPOINT.
Steamer SYLVAN GROVE, from foot of Twenty-third Street, E. R., at 8.45, 9.45, 10.45, and half hourly to 8.45 P.M. Returning, leave Manhattan Beach at 7.35, 10, 11.05 A. M.; 12 05, 12.30, and every half-hour to 10.30 P. M.
VIA BAY RIDGE.
Steamers THOS. COLLYER and MATTEAWAN from 22d St., N.R., at 9.10, 10.25 A.M., and hourly to 8.25 P.M.
Leaving LEROY STREET ten minutes and PIER No. 6 thirty minutes after leaving 23d St. The boats leaving 23d St. at 7.25 and 8.25 P.M. do not stop at Leroy and Pier 6.
The steamer D. R. MARTIN leaves foot of Whitehall Street at 9.25 A.M. hourly to 8.25 P.M. Trains from Manhattan Beach connecting with D. R. Martin for Whitehall Street, leave hourly from 8.20 A.M. to 12.20 P.M., 1.25 to 6.25 P.M., 7.20 to 9.20 P.M. Trains connecting with steamer for Pier 6, Leroy St. and 23d St. leave every hour from 11 A.M. to 9.15 and 10.40 P.M.
GILMORE'S FULL BAND and LEVY every afternoon and evening.

COLORED & PLAIN FASHION PLATES
IMPORTED MONTHLY FOR
Frank Leslie's
LADY'S MAGAZINE
—AND—
Gazette of Fashion.
This Publication is Acknowledged to be the Fashion Standard of America.

"FRANK LESLIE'S LADY'S MAGAZINE for August is out. Two handsome double colored fashion plates are given, followed by a large double sheet showing the latest styles of seaside, country, promenade, house and evening toilets, children's costumes, etc. Articles on the latest fashions, descriptions of styles, children's dresses, the latest in hairdressing, Paris bonnets and hats, street toilet, watering-place toilets, etc., are given. 'What should be Worn, and What should Not,' is an interesting article, containing much 'fashionable' intelligence. Many pages of stories, sketches, poetry, all illustrated, are given, making a very attractive and entertaining number."—Monmouth Democrat, Freehold, N. J.

"FRANK LESLIE'S LADY'S MAGAZINE comes to us full of choice reading and most fully illustrated. The colored plates, accompanied with full and accurate descriptions of each costume, are the most satisfactory representations of the styles now worn, and at once give the color, design and material used."—St. Louis (Mo.) Mag.

"FRANK LESLIE'S LADY'S MAGAZINE is specially profuse in its illustrations and fashion plates. It gives the latest Parisian plates, and is, what it claims to be, a 'mirror of fashion.' Aside from its claims in that special department, it contains a great deal of literary matter, much of which is reputably illustrated. Price $3.50 a year."—Morning Star, Wilmington, N. C.

Every Number contains full and accurate descriptions of the prevailing Styles of Ladies' and Children's Dresses, Hats, Bonnets, etc., etc.; the latest styles of Fichus, Collarettes and Jabots; the latest style of Hairdressing, etc., etc.
The readers of the LADY'S MAGAZINE have the earliest information of the constant change in Fashions, as its reports appear simultaneously with those in the journals of Paris.
Each number is embellished with beautiful engravings finished in the highest style of art, and the contents are highly interesting and entertaining, consisting of stories, sketches, poems, novelettes, amusing sketches, etc., etc.

Published on the 15th of each month. Annual subscription, $3.50, postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

H.W. JOHNS' ASBESTOS
LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING, BOILER COVERINGS
Steam Packing, Sheathings, Fireproof Coatings, Cements
Send for Samples, Illustrated Pamphlet and Price List.
H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO., 87 Maiden Lane, N.Y.

ESPECIAL NOTICE

The Commonwealth Distribution Co.

Is authorized by charter from the Legislature of Kentucky for educational purposes, AND IS THE ONLY LOTTERY CO. EVER DECLARED LEGAL BY THE UNITED STATES COURT.
The United States Circuit Court on March 31st rendered the following decisions:
1. THAT THE COMMONWEALTH DISTRIBUTION COMPANY IS LEGAL.
2. ITS DRAWINGS ARE FAIR.
The P. M. General at Washington, after careful investigation, has also declared the Company to be legal and its drawings fair, and entitled to the free use of the mails.

24th

Popular Drawing COMMONWEALTH DISTRIBUTION COMPANY takes place in public at Macauley's Theatre Louisville, Ky., on THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 30TH
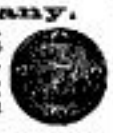
1,960 prizes, $112,400, distributed; capitals, $30,000, $10,000, $5,000; 10 of $2,000; 1,947 others, from $500 down to $10. Tickets, $2; halves, $1.
Authorized by the Legislature and sustained by the courts of Kentucky.
Address R. M. BOARDMAN, Courier-Journal Building, Louisville, Ky.; or R. M. BOARDMAN, 309 Broadway, N. Y.; or W. PORTER, 1,227 Broadway, N. Y.; or T. J. COMMERFORD, 212 Broadway, New York.



ON 30 DAYS TRIAL
We send on 30 Days' Trial our ELECTRO-VOLTAIC BELTS, BANDS, Suspensories, Trusses, and other appliances, to those suffering from Nervous Debility, Weaknesses, or Lost Vitality from any cause; or to those afflicted with Rheumatism, Paralysis, Dyspepsia, Liver or Kidney troubles, etc., etc.; or Rupture. Speedy cures guaranteed. Our Illustrated Pamphlet Free. Address VOLTAIC BELT CO., Marshall, Mich.

CHAMPLIN'S
LIQUID PEARL
Is used by Actresses, Opera Singers, and Ladies of Fashion, to create the distinguished appearance so much admired by every one. By its use the roughest skin is made to rival the most delicate texture of youthful beauty. Use the LIQUID PEARL according to directions, and you need no longer complain of a freckled, tanned or sunrie complexion. Sold by all druggists. Price 50 cents a bottle. Beware of imitations. CHAMPLIN & CO., Prop'rs, Buffalo, N. Y.

DEAFNESS CURED
and Hearing Perfectly Restored by using our NEW AND IMPROVED INVISIBLE TYMPANUM. Cheapest and most efficient appliance ever offered for the cure of Deafness. Can be worn at all times. By their use all sounds are distinctly heard. Circulars with testimonials sent upon application.
AMERICAN TYMPANUM CO., 212 Broadway, N. Y.

L.S.L.
Take Notice!
This is the only Lottery ever voted on by the people of a State, and, under a late decision of the United States Supreme Court at Washington, is the only Legal Lottery now in the United States, all other charters having been repealed or having no existence.
This institution was regularly incorporated by the Legislature of the State for Educational and Charitable purposes in 1868, for the term of Twenty-five Years, to which contract the inviolable faith of the State was pledged, which pledge has been renewed by an overwhelming popular vote, securing its franchise in the new Constitution adopted December 2d, A. D. 1879, with a capital of $1,000,000, to which it has since added a reserve fund of over $350,000.
ITS GRAND SINGLE NUMBER DISTRIBUTION has always taken place on September 14th.
M. A. DAUPHIN,
NEW ORLEANS, LA.,
Or same person at 319 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

SCHMITT & KOEHNE.
Central Park Brewery
AND
Bottling Company.

Brewery, Bottling Department and Office, 158—165 East Fifty-ninth Street, Ice-house and Rock-vaults, Fifty-sixth and Fifty-seventh Street, Avenue A and East River, N. Y.

BOHEMIAN and LAGER BEER.
The finest Beer for family use. The best Shipping Beer in bottles, warranted to keep in any climate for months and years.

GUN BREECH LOADING DOUBLE SHOT GUN, warranted quality, only $10.50. Sent C.O.D. to examine and try, also sealed Gun, 32 calibre, plated 5-shot Revolver for $1.50, agents Telbot $1.10, or Both Incl. Pocket Knife, Hold Stamps taken. M. S. BOOSINGER & CO., N.Y. City.

Imitation Gold Watches.
$8, $10, $15, $20 and $25 each; Chains $2 to $12 to match. Jewelry of the same. Sent C.O.D., by Express. Send stamp for Illustrated Circular. ONEIDA METAL WATCH FACTORY, 320 Broadway, N. Y. Box 3686.

MAMMARIAL BALM restores and develops the bust. Warranted sure and safe. Price, $1. NEW ENGLAND MEDICAL INSTITUTE, 24 Tremont Row, Boston, Mass.

50 Chromo, Snowflake and Lace Cards, with name, 10c, 40 all chromos, 10c. Star Printing Co., Northford, Ct.

$777 A YEAR and expenses to agents. Outfit free. Address, P. O. VICKERY, Augusta, Maine.

50 Elegant Cards, New Chromo, Shells, Gilt-edge, etc., with name, 10c. G. A. SPRING, Northford, Ct.

50 New Style Cards, Lithographed in bright colors, 10c. 60 Ag'ts Samples 10c. Conn. Card Co., Northford, Ct.

Agents Wanted.

THE BONANZA FOR BOOK-AGENTS
is selling our two splendidly illustrated books, Lives of HANCOCK and GARFIELD
the first written by his lifelong friend, Hon. J. W. FORNEY, an author of national fame, and an ardent admirer of the "superb soldier"; the second written by his comrade-in-arms and personal friend, Gen. JAS. S. BRISBIN, an author of wide celebrity. Both official, authentic, immensely popular, selling beyond precedent. Agents double profits by selling both. Outfit $1.00, each. Act quick and coin money. HUBBARD BROS., 723 Chestnut St., Phila.

$350 A MONTH—AGENTS WANTED—To sell the best selling articles in the world; 1 sample free. Address Jay Bronson, Detroit, Mich.

100 COPIES ONLY $5.
THE LIFE OF GEN. HANCOCK.
Retail, 15 cents per copy. Wholesale, 50 copies, $3, or one hundred for $5. Contains SPLENDID CABINET LIKENESS. Outsells all other books. AGENTS WANTED. Send us money order, registered letter, or draft.
BARCLAY & CO.,
21 North 7th St., Philadelphia, Pa.

BIG PAY to sell our Rubber Printing Stamps. Samples free. Taylor Bros. & Co., Cleveland, O.

IT PAYS to sell our Rubber Hand-Printing Stamps. Circulars free. G. A. HARPER & BRO., Cleveland, O.

ROYAL
HAVANA LOTTERY
A GRAND
EXTRAORDINARY DRAWING
AT HAVANA, CUBA. Has always drawn
SEPTEMBER 4th.
Only 18,000 Tickets Issued.
CAPITAL PRIZE, 500,000 Spanish Dollars.
532 Prizes, amounting to 1,350,000 Pesos.
Tickets have always been $75; halves, $37.50; quarters, $18.75; tenths, $7.50; twentieths, $3.75.
LOUISIANA STATE LOTTERY—Has always drawn Aug. 10th and Sept. 14th. Tickets have always been $2; half tickets, $1.
KENTUCKY STATE LOTTERY—Has always drawn Aug. 16th and 31st. Tickets, $1.
COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY—Has always drawn Aug. 31st. Tickets have always been $2; halves, $1. Prizes cashed. Full information sent free. Address, J. DUFF & CO., Bankers, 42 Nassau St., (corner Liberty), New York.

Frank Leslie's
PLEASANT HOURS.
An Unfailing Source of Entertainment.
EIGHTY PAGES OCTAVO,
Consisting of interesting, amusing, beautifully illustrated Stories, Sketches, Tales, Adventures, Anecdotes, etc., etc., complete in each number.
"Pleasant Hours" will prove an effectual relief to the tedium of travel.
Published monthly, and for sale by all newsdealers, price 15 cents. Annual subscription, $1.50, postpaid.
Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Little Havana Lottery,
OR SUPPLEMENT TO
THE ROYAL HAVANA LOTTERY.
CHASE & CO., New Haven, Conn., Managers.
The Grand Extraordinary Drawing has always taken place SATURDAY, SEPT. 4.

1 Grand Prize		$7,000
1 " "		1,000
1 " "		500
1 " "		100
10 Prizes, $125 each		1,250
12 " 25 "		300
486 " 12 "		5,832
20 Approximation Prizes		536
533 Prizes, U. S. Currency, amounting to		$16,617

ONLY 18,000 TICKETS.
Whole Tickets, $2; Halves, $1; Quarters, 50 cents.
JACKSON & Co., Bankers, 82 Nassau Street, New York.
CLIFTS & Co., 200 Broadway, New York.
JOHN W. CLARK, 1703 N. Y. Ave., Washington, D. C.
Responsible Agents Wanted.
CHASE & CO., General Agents, New Haven, Conn.

FRANK LESLIE'S
Illustrated Newspaper
$1.50
FOR 22 WEEKS
OF THE PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN,
Beginning with No. 1,200.
Political subjects will be ably represented editorially, and fully illustrated, during this period.
Address,
FRANK LESLIE'S PUBLISHING HOUSE,
53, 55, 57 PARK PLACE, NEW YORK.

JUDGE FOR YOURSELF
By sending 25c. money or 40c. postage stamps, with age, you will receive by return mail a correct picture of your future husband or wife, with name and date of marriage. Address, M. FOX, Box 38, Fultonville, N. Y.

GENUINE SECRETS WORTH MILLIONS RELIABLE
Canadian Manufacturer in a Quiet Home Discloses Completion in 6 hours' Greatest Wealth Producing Health Restoring Love! Book FREE—or Circ'l. Parker & Co., Toronto, Ont.

MINIATURE CAMPAIGN BANNERS on cards, in pretty colors, with handsome pictures of each candidate of the four nominations. Something new, and sells fast. $2 per 100; 5 for 15 cts. Circulars for Watches and Microscopes. A chance for boys and others to make money. Address, GEO. J. SHEPARD, Waterbury, Conn.

COMPREHENSIVE, INTERESTING AND CHEAP.
Frank Leslie's
POPULAR MONTHLY.
The Largest, Most Attractive, and Cheapest Magazine in the World.
THE SEPTEMBER NUMBER NOW READY
With the following varied and brilliant
CONTENTS:
"THE CAMPAIGN OF 1880."—THE NOMINEES OF THE TWO PARTIES. Ten illustrations and portraits.
"SOME GOSSIPING PAPERS." By Mrs. Barrow.
"THE OLD AND THE NEW ACADIA." By Frank Norton. Ten illustrations.
"THE WASHINGTONS OF YORKSHIRE." Five illustrations.
"CUSTOMS OF OLD SPAIN—SPANISH WEDDING DANCES." Four illustrations.
"VICTOR HUGO." By the Author of "Roman Violets," etc. Six illustrations and portrait.
"THEODORE, KING OF ABYSSINIA." By A. H. Guernsey. Fifteen illustrations.
"TURIN." By Lady Blanche Murphy. Eight illustrations.
"LODGERS AND BOARDERS IN LOWER LIFE." By Andrew Wilson, Ph. D. Nine illustrations.
SERIAL AND SHORT STORIES.—"Nyl Gaika," by Eliza W. Pierce; concluded. "The Romance of Captain Beatty's Life"; illustrated. "Helman's Oaths," an Arizona Romance, by W. G. Stadford; illustrated. "The Robbers of the Gorge," by F. E. Hamilton; illustrated. "Miss Prescott's Three Lovers, and How their Wooing Sped," by Amanda M. Douglas; illustrated. "A Queen of Bohemia," by Marguerite Y. Aymar; illustrated. "Given Up by his Friends"; illustrated. "The Mistake of my Life"; illustrated—etc., etc.
SKETCHES.—"Wm. Kenman, the Kentucky Ranger"; illustrated. "Only in Fun," by Karl Drury; illustrated. "The Three Ocelots"; illustrated. "Outwitting a Highwayman"; illustrated. "A Singular Old Maid," by Prudence Bowen; illustrated. "How Senator Linda's Life was Saved"; illustrated. "Russian State Prisons," Etc., etc.
POEMS.—"A Barmecidal Feast," by Richard Dowling. "Far Away." "My Lady," by Rita. "Remember," by Ethel De Fonblanque. "The Ballad of Cassandra." "The Sheep's Petition." "Southwick," by J. G. Whittier; illustrated—etc., etc.
MISCELLANY.—"Spanish Relics near Tallahassee." "Why Lace is so Costly." "Sunday Afternoon in Germany." "Suspended Animation." "Glass Beads." "A Pretty Climbing Vine—The Ground Nut"; illustrated. "Glass and its History." "Boxwood." "Power of a Growing Tree." "Recent Progress in Science." "Entertaining Column," etc., etc.
128 QUARTO PAGES—OVER 100 ILLUSTRATIONS
A Beautiful Colored Plate Frontispiece,
"THE BRIDEGROOM STIRRUP-CUP IN ANDALUSIA."
Single copies, 25 cents; annual subscription, $3; six months, $1.50; four months, $1.
SEND 25 CENTS FOR SPECIMEN COPY
Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

THE GREAT FAMILY JOURNAL
Frank Leslie's
CHIMNEY CORNER,
THE
Leading Literary Family Journal.
New Literary and Artistic Attractions appear in Rapid Succession.
The CHIMNEY CORNER is the only weekly that publishes healthy and unsensational Fiction; the Novels and Stories are attractive and interesting, and are contributed by the most popular writers. The contents embrace also Biography, Travels, Incidents of all Times and Countries, Foreign Manners and Customs, Essays, Well-chosen Matter for Young Readers, Examples for the Aspiring Youth of Both Sexes, Natural History in a popular form, the Wonders of Nature, Science, Art, and Human Ingenuity, Adventures with Wild Men and Beasts, Narratives of Daring and Peril, Social Hints, etc., etc.
Each Number contains sixteen pages, eight of which are embellished with beautiful engravings.
Published every Monday. For sale by all newsdealers. Price, single copies, 10 cents. Annual subscription, $4; three months, $1—postpaid.
Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Digitized by Google

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT!

Keep the Blood cool and the Brain clear by the use of

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT

N.Y. Central & Hudson River R.R.

THE BEST ROUTE EAST OR WEST.

Through Cars between New York or Boston and Chicago or St. Louis.

See NIAGARA FALLS, SARATOGA and the HUDSON.

C. B. MEEKER, General Passenger Agent.

THE Admiration
OF THE WORLD.
Mrs. S. A. Allen's
WORLD'S Hair Restorer
IS PERFECTION!

FOR its wonderful life-giving properties to faded or falling hair, and QUICKLY CHANGING GRAY OR WHITE HAIR to its natural youthful COLOR and BEAUTY.

IT IS NOT A DYE.

It requires only a few applications to restore gray hair to its youthful color and lustrous beauty, and induce luxuriant growth, and its occasional use is all that is needed to preserve it in its highest perfection and beauty. DANDRUFF is quickly and permanently removed. SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

NICOLL THE TAILOR.

SPRING & SUMMER STYLES.
Diagonals, Worsteds, English Tweeds and Cassimeres.
MADE TO ORDER.

ELECTRIC LIGHTS used in BOTH STORES.
620 BROADWAY,
AND
139 to 151 Bowery, New York.

Samples and Rules for Self-Measurement
SENT BY MAIL.

TRUSS EGGLESTON SENSIBLE TRUSS. Made on new principles. Send for Circulars. Eggleston Truss, Chicago, Ill.

COLUMBIA BICYCLE

The Bicycle has proved itself to be a permanent, practical road-vehicle, and the number in daily use is rapidly increasing. Professional and business men, seekers after health or pleasure, all join in bearing witness to its merits. Send 3c. stamp for catalogue with price list and full information.

THE POPE MFG. CO., 59 Summer St., Boston, Mass.

OPIUM Morphine Habit Cured in 10 to 20 days. No pay till Cured. DR. J. STEPHENS, Lebanon, Ohio

FIRM'S Can for Explosive Fluids.

PATENTED JAN. 21st, 1879.

P. O. Box 4272, New York.

The OLDEST and BEST of the JUVENILE PUBLICATIONS.

Frank Leslie's
Boys' & Girls' Weekly

Is now publishing the following admirable serial stories, all beautifully illustrated:

"Swoppy"; Or, The Adventures of a Yankee Boy." By NAT USHER.

"Trap-door Tom."

"Jim Jeffs: Or, The Mystery of the House by the River." By NED BUNTLINE.

"Left to Himself." By COMMODORE AH LOOK.

"The Pearl of the Sahara; Or, The Adventures of Two American Boys." By COMMODORE ROBIN.

"Hal Harkforward and Tom Tallyho's Schooldays." By BRACKENRIDGE HEMYNG (Jack Harkaway).

"Nelly Blake's Schooldays."

Sold by all newsdealers. Price 5 cents a copy, $2.50 a year, postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

EUREKA!

A chief feature of the present canvass is the activity with which partisan villifiers invade the sanctity of private correspondence in quest of evidence against political candidates.

IN TRAVELING, Use a Few Drops of Brown's Ginger in the Water you Drink. Frederick Brown, Philada.

INMAN ROYAL MAIL STEAMERS

For QUEENSTOWN and LIVERPOOL.

NOTICE.—The steamers of this line take Lieutenant Maury's lane route at all seasons of the year.

CITY OF MONTREAL...Thursday, August 26, 9.30 A.M.
CITY OF RICHMOND...Saturday, September 4, 3 P.M.
CITY OF CHESTER...Thursday, September 9, 4.30 A.M.
CITY OF BRUSSELS...Thursday, September 16, 3 P.M.

From Pier 37, North River, foot of Charlton St.

Cabin, $80 and $100. Return tickets on favorable terms. Steerage, $28. Drafts at lowest rates.

Saloons, state-rooms, smoking and bathrooms amidships.

These steamers do not carry cattle, sheep or pigs.

JOHN G. DALE, Agent, 31 and 33 Broadway, New York.
G. A. FAULK, 105 South Fourth Street, Philadelphia.
L. H. PALMER, 3 Old State House, Boston.
F. C. BROWN, 22 South Clark Street, Chicago.

KEEP'S SHIRTS,

Gloves, Umbrellas, Underwear, Etc.

SAMPLES AND CIRCULARS MAILED FREE.

KEEP MANUFACTURING COMPANY,
631, 633, 635, 637 Broadway, N.Y.

SPECTACLES, Eye, Field and Opera Glasses, Microscopes, Barometers, Thermometers, Compasses, at reduced prices. B. & J. BECK, 1016 Chestnut Street, Phila. Send 3 stamps for Illustrated Catalogue of 146 pages. Mention this paper.

Do Your Own Printing $3 PRESS prints cards, labels, &c. (Self-inker $4.) Larger size for larger work. For old or young. Great money-maker. A paying business anywhere for all or spare time. Send two stamps for catalogue of All-about Presses, Type, Cards, Paper, &c., to the Manufacturers KELSEY & Co., Meriden, Conn.

FOR SALE.

"INTERLAKEN,"

THE COUNTRY HOME OF
THE LATE FRANK LESLIE, ESQ.,

Consisting of 62 acres, situated on LAKE SARATOGA, and extending back to Lake Lonely.

The house contains twelve rooms, gas and water.

The stable, finished in fine woods, has six box-stalls.

Finely appointed billiard-room, and three handsomely furnished sleeping-rooms over coach-house.

Gardener's cottage.

Conservatories profusely stocked with rare plants.

The furniture, steam-yacht, sail and row boats, French omnibus, etc., will be sold with the place.

Apply to

HOMER MORGAN, 2 Pine Street; or,
V. K. STEVENSON, 1 Pine St., and 35 E. 17th St.

FISHERMEN!
TWINES AND NETTING!

MANUFACTURED BY
WM. E. HOOPER & SONS, Baltimore, Md.

☞ Send for Price-List, naming your County and State.

Summer Excursions at Low Rates.

Newport, Martha's Vineyard, Nantucket, Isle of Shoals, Old Orchard Beach, Mount Desert, Moosehead and Rangeley Lakes, White Mountains, Saratoga, Niagara Falls, Montreal, Quebec, &c. Send for list of

FALL RIVER LINE TOURS AND EXCURSIONS,
Furnished from

GEO. L. CONNOR, Gen. Pass. Agt., P. O. Box 452, N. Y.

KIDNEY-WORT

The Only Medicine
That Acts at the Same Time on
The Liver, the Bowels and the Kidneys.

These great organs are the natural cleansers of the system. If they work well, health will be perfect; if they become clogged, dreadful diseases are sure to follow with

TERRIBLE SUFFERING.

Biliousness, Headache, Dyspepsia, Jaundice, Constipation and Piles, or Kidney Complaints, Gravel, Diabetes, or Rheumatic Pains and Aches, are developed because the blood is poisoned with the humors that should have been expelled naturally.

KIDNEY-WORT

will restore the healthy action and all these destroying evils will be banished; neglect them and you will live but to suffer.

Thousands have been cured. Try Hand you will add one more to the number. Take it and health will once more gladden your heart.

Why Suffer longer from the torment of an Aching back? Why bear such distress from Constipation and Piles?

KIDNEY-WORT will cure you. Try a package at once and be satisfied.

It is a dry vegetable compound and

One Package makes six quarts of Medicine.

Your Druggist has it, or will get it for you. Insist upon having it. Price, $1.00.

WELLS, RICHARDSON & CO., Proprietors,
10 (Will send post paid.) Burlington, Vt.

14 STOP ORGANS
SUB BASS & Oct. Coupler, 4 Set Reeds, $65
Pianos $125 and upwards, easy on trial. Catalogue free. Address, DANIEL F. BEATTY, Washington, N.J.

A KEY THAT WILL WIND AND WATCH AND NOT WEAR OUT
SOLD by Watchmakers. By mail, 20 cents. Circulars free. J. Stacy & Co., 34 Dey St., N.Y.

ATTRACTIVE, INTERESTING AND EDIFYING.

Frank Leslie's
SUNDAY MAGAZINE.

The September Number Now Ready

CONTENTS.

"THE BENEDICTINES." Four Illustrations.
"FLORENCE THE BEAUTIFUL: AN HISTORICAL AND ARTISTIC SKETCH." Eight Illustrations.
"PETER PAUL RUBENS." Three Illustrations.
"THE PHARAOHS." By Herbert Lee. Illustrated.
"THE IDOLATRY OF ANCIENT EGYPT." Illustrated.
"THE CHILDREN OF THE BIBLE—No. VIII. TIMOTHY." Illustrated.
"THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER." Illustrated.
"THE BISHOP AND CATHEDRAL OF TRURO." Three Illustrations.
"THE ORIGIN OF THE PASSION PLAY."
"MOHAMMEDANISM."
"FOLK LORE OF PALESTINE." Etc., etc.

ESSAYS.—"On Preaching the Word," by Bishop Perry. "The Roman Breviary." "A Buddhist Tract." "Noah's Ark." "Christianity and Children." "The Cry of Need in the Book of Psalms." Etc., etc.

SERIAL AND SHORT STORIES.—"Se-be, the Nail-maker's Daughter," by the Author of "Gideon's Rock," etc.; concluded. "Hester Morgan's Husband," by L. T. Meade; Chapters I.-VIII.; Illustrated. "A Modern Cinderella," by M. T. Caldor; Illustrated. "The Nurse's Story"; Illustrated. "A Girl's Ambition," by Annett P. Watson; Illustrated. "Maid Marjory," by the Author of "Little Fingers"; Chap. V.-IX.; Illustrated. Etc., etc.

SKETCHES.—"Balaam"; Illustrated. "The Crusades"; Illustrated. "A Contented Farmer"; Illustrated. "Lost in Sahara," by Alfred H. Guernsey; Illustrated. "The Monkeys and the Baby"; Illustrated. "The Story of an Illustrious Painter"; Illustrated. "Marriage in Japan," by the Rev. Ross C. Houghton, M.A. Etc., etc.

POEMS.—"September"; Illustrated. "The Church Month," by Frances Ridley Havergal. "Three Angels." "A Rest." "The Marquis of the Months," by Austin Dobson. "The Vacant Chair," by Augusta Stetson Garrett. "Children's Laughter," by Edwin Charles Wrenford. "The Orchard Well"; Illustrated. "Does it Rain?"; Illustrated.

MISCELLANY.—"The Goddess Kali"; Illustrated. "Interesting Incident." "Cover of the Book of Gospels of Archbishop Aribert"; Illustrated. "St. Gervase and St. Protase"; Illustrated. "The Donker's Protector"; Illustrated. "Nebo, Author of Writing." "Sackcloth." "Show Him the Apple." "The Prayer of Childhood." "Cromwell Prevented from Sailing"; Illustrated. "The Gutteberg Monument at Frankfort"; Illustrated. "David's Wanderings." "The Mother of the Virgin." Etc., etc. "Religious Notes and News." "Editor's Portfolio." "Obituary Notices." "Recreations for Sunday Afternoon." Music—"Nearer my God to Thee." Etc., etc.

128 QUARTO PAGES—OVER 100 ILLUSTRATIONS.

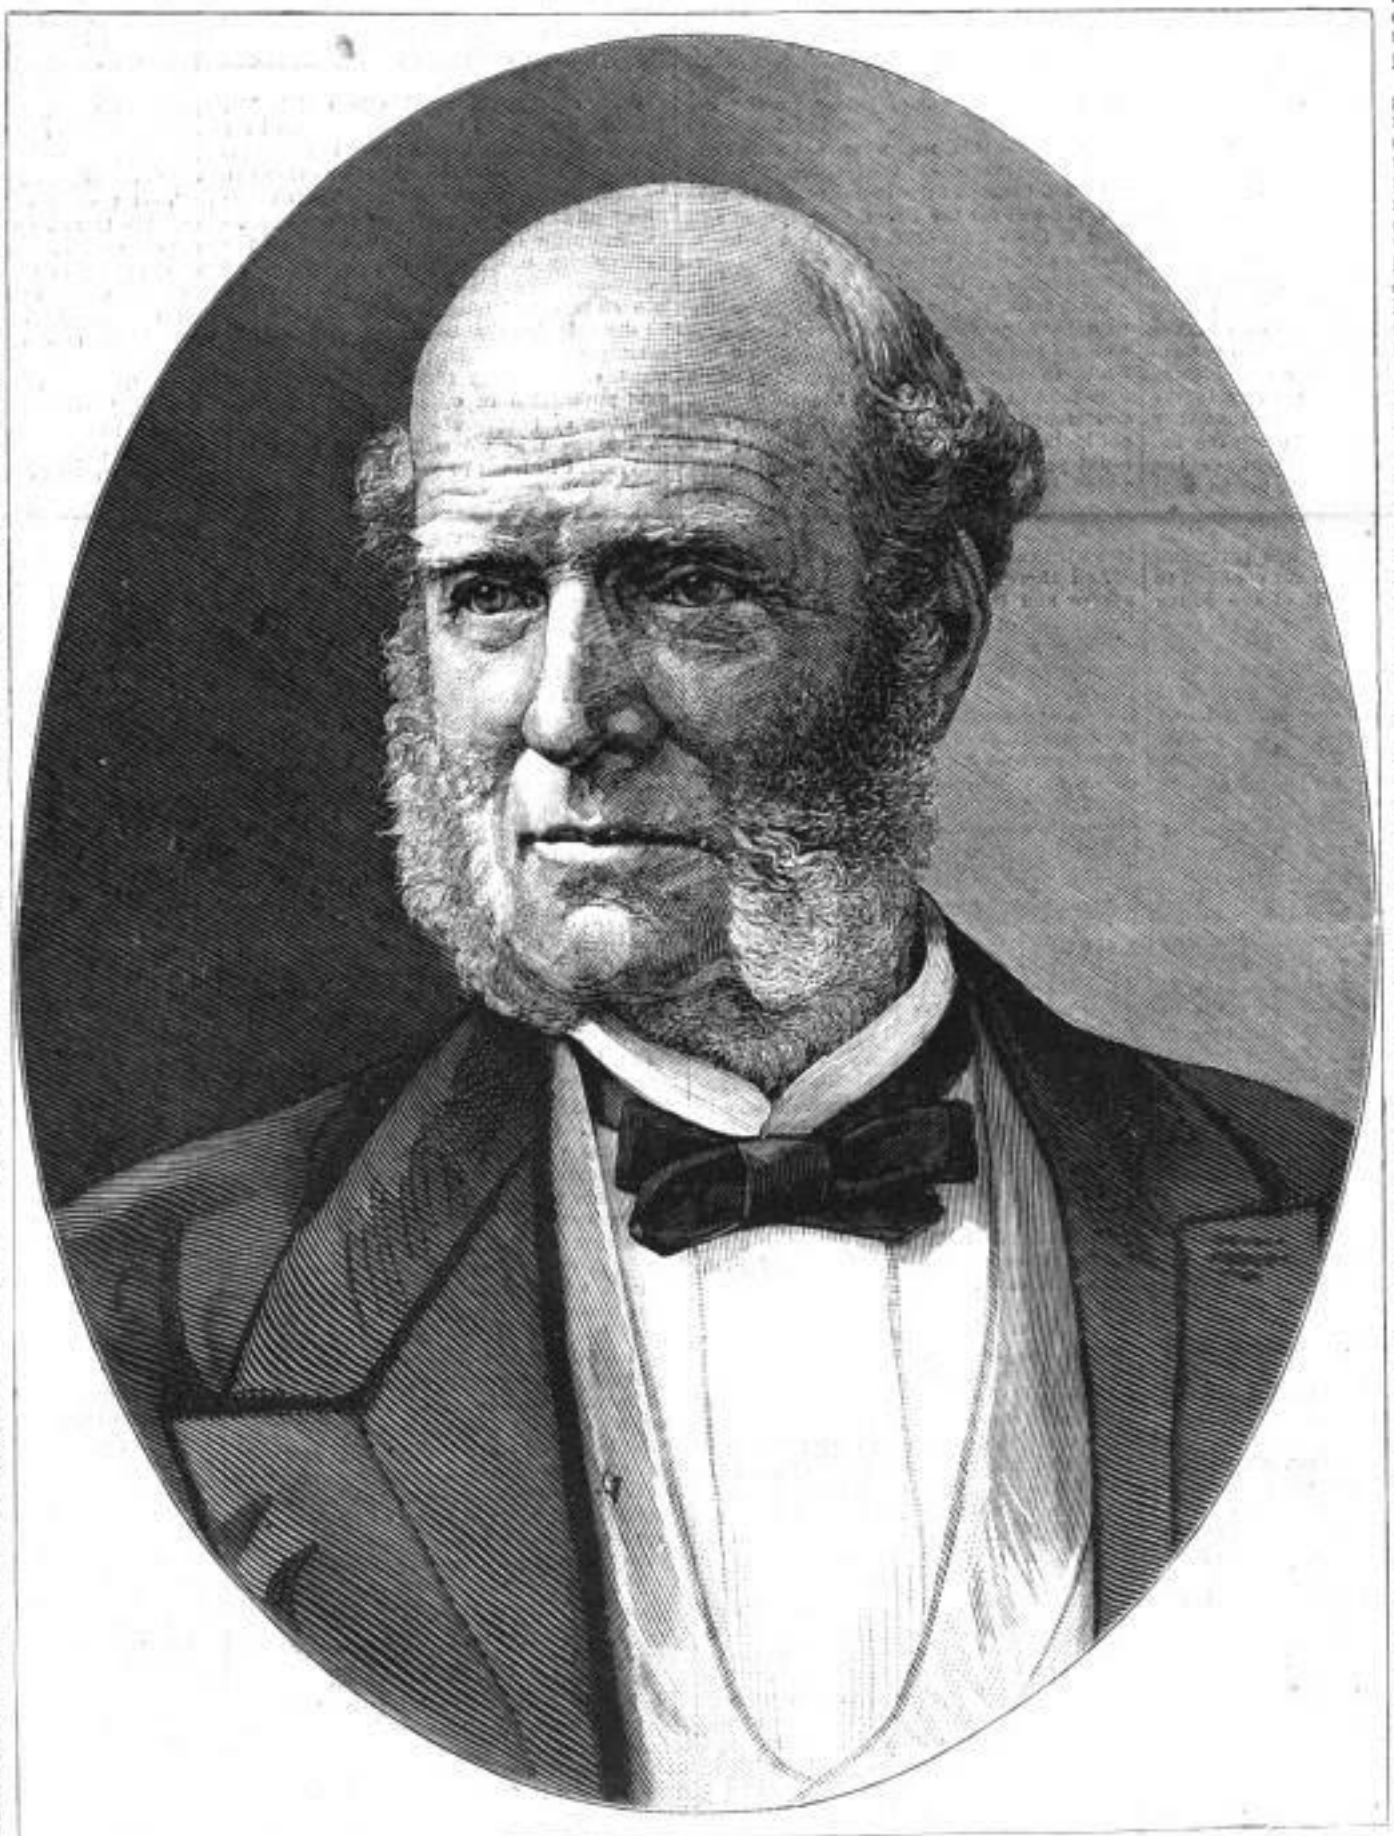
Single copy, 25 cents; or $3 a year; six months, $1 50; four months, $1—postpaid.

SEND 25 CENTS FOR A SPECIMEN COPY.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER



Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1880, by F. W. Ehelano, Assignee, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.—Entered at the Post Office, New York, N.Y., as Second-class Matter.

No. 1,302.—Vol. LI. NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 11, 1880. [Price 10 Cents. $4.00 Yearly. 13 Weeks, $1.00.

THOMAS HUGHES, Q.C.

"TOM" HUGHES, who is now in our midst, is the second son of John Hughes, of Donington Priory, Berkshire, England. He was born October 20th, 1823, and is consequently in his fifty-seventh year. He was educated at Rugby, under Dr. Arnold, and at Oriel College, Oxford, where he took his B.A. degree in 1845. Entering as a student at Lincoln's Inn, he was called to the Bar in January, 1848. In 1856 "Tom Brown's Schooldays" took a delighted public by storm, followed by the "Scouring of the White Horse" in 1858. "Tom Brown at Oxford" made his bow in 1861, and in 1869 "Alfred the Great." Mr. Hughes sat in the British Parliament for Lambeth from 1865 to 1868, when he was returned to St. Stephen's for Frome, which he continued to represent until 1874, the date at which Mr. Gladstone, in a fit of dyspepsia, threw up the reins of Government. "Tom" Hughes was appointed a Queen's Counsel in 1869, and in the following year paid this country a visit. Mr. Hughes to-day looks as hale, as hearty, as clean run as he did ten years ago, and, save for a few additional gray hairs in his mutton-chop whiskers, and a tendency to shine on the top of the head, he appears fit to keep a wicket on any cricket field in Merrie England—his eyes are bright, eager and penetrating—or to take an oar with a 'Varsity eight, as there is not a loose ounce of flesh inside his English homespun garments. "Tom" Hughes has come amongst us for the purpose of personally opening the industrial settlement on the Cumberland Highlands in Tennessee, originally founded by the Boston (Mass.) Board of Aid to Land Ownership.

During the recent hard times in this country, several influential Bostonians organized an association, called the "Boston Board of Aid to Land Ownership," which had for its object to "promote association migration to fertile, unoccupied lands; to aid their development into agricultural townships and homesteads, by these means contributing to a redistribution of labor—its diversion from trade and manufacture, where in surplus, to tillage of the earth—the basis of all industries, and the primary source of all wealth." By the passing away of the hard times, the necessity of this organization was in part obviated, and by a singular chain of circumstances it passed into English hands. When the organization was last before the public, it was stated that investigations were being made with a view to purchasing land in Tennessee. This land has been bought or bonded, and Mr. Thomas Hughes is now here to inaugurate the opening of the enterprise. Mr. Hughes is one of the best known living Englishmen, and through his earlier and later writings he has become known to the young men of England and America as a trusted adviser, with living sympathy and a direct interest in their prosperity. He takes especial interest in them during the formation period of their lives—while they are at the academies—and so they come to consult him as to their professions and business in life. He is also known for his great activity in various enterprises in England for the improvement of the social condition of the lower classes. He has been one of the most successful organizers of various civil service and tradesmen's co-operative associations. He has now come to this country to inaugurate this great colonization enterprise under the auspices of the Board of which he is chairman, and with an aim much above the ordinary speculative character of such undertakings. This Board seeks to establish a new community under especially favorable circumstances as to the average intelligence, competency and moral character of its population. It seeks a homogeneous community. It is not intended for those who might be called of the impoverished class, but it is mainly for the advantage of the tenant farmers of England, who suffer under the present system of land tenure, and for the sons of the gentry and well-to-do tradesmen and manufacturers, for whom the avenues of employment in England are practically barred by the redundant population, and by the block in most of the avenues of gain. Such classes especially are now compelled to turn attention to foreign lands. The English colonies, excepting Canada, are too remote or too unhealthy, hence the current has turned to the United States, and Mr. Hughes has found in this country, where he is known, honored and trusted, a field for the exercise of his practical philanthropy and public spirit, peculiarly suited to his theories of yore, and his present aims.

THOMAS HUGHES, Q.C.

From a Photograph Taken by Sarony expressly for "Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper."

It is not necessary to go into the development of the movement; suffice it to say that three trips of exploration in the West were made, but without result. The fourth trip was made to the tableland of Eastern Tennessee, and this is what Mr. Hughes had to say to the representative of Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, who waited upon him at the Fifth Avenue Hotel:

"The process of scrutinizing titles, identifying parcels and dealing with squatters, occupied the greater part of 1879; and it was not till the beginning of the present year that the first purchase of the Board was finally completed. This has been followed by others, until, at the present time the Board are the owners of a tract of land comprising 50,000 acres at least, including the site selected for the first town. This is a spot of great beauty, surrounded on three sides by the Clear Fork and White Oak rivers, which here effect a junction. It is between six and seven miles from the Cincinnati Southern Railway, from which it is approached by a road through the lands of the Board, running along a ridge which rises steadily and gently to the town site. This ridge is specially adapted to fruit cultivation; the Board therefore proposes to divide it into small homesteads of from forty to fifty acres, to be sold to persons intending to engage in this industry. The necessary surveys to enable them to do this are now in progress, as is also the laying out and building of the road from the railway.

"The survey of the town site has been finished for some time, and the lots, varying from 25 feet frontage by 150 feet in depth in the centre, to four acres in the outskirts of the town, are plotted out ready for purchasers. The survey of the minerals, which is being made for the Board by Mr. C. Wilson—Assistant Manager of the English "Shire Oaks Colliery"—confirms the reports of American witnesses as to the existence of valuable deposits of coal and iron on the estate.

(Continued on page 22.)

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,
53, 55 & 57 PARK PLACE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 11, 1880.

NOTICE.

FRANK LESLIE'S PUBLISHING HOUSE,
53, 55 and 57 Park Place, New York City, N. Y.
P. O. Box 4121.

NEW YORK, January 17th, 1880.

Under the assignment, and with the assent of Mrs. Miriam F. Leslie, the widow of Frank Leslie, and his sole legatee under his will, the publications of the House will be continued as heretofore under the management of the undersigned.

All communications should be addressed to 57 Park Place, or to P. O. Box 4121, New York City, N. Y.

I. W. ENGLAND, Assignee.

THE "SOLID SOUTH."

IT is a great anomaly, abstractly considered, that the politics of a people should be determined practically by the color of their skin—that the whites of the South should, in the main, be Democrats, and that the blacks of the South should, in the main, be Republicans. But when we come to inquire into the origin and genesis of this anomaly we find that its roots are planted in human sentiments and in historical prejudices, which it is the effort of the mere partisan to foster and perpetuate in the interest of a selfish political propagandism. So it comes to pass that for a white man to act with the Republican Party at the South is to incur something like a ban of personal opprobrium, and for a black man to act with the Democratic Party is to incur the ostracism of his own race, and sometimes the penalties of actual violence. It adds to the misery and peril of this anomalous condition of things that each party lays the responsibility for its existence at the door of the other, and takes no share of the burden on its own shoulders. The resentments engendered by defeat in war, by the conceived hardships of the Reconstruction laws, and by the admitted infamies of the "carpet-bag governments" at the South, are still seen to be a bond of political sympathy among the Southern whites, while gratitude for the boon of emancipation and political enfranchisement is assumed by the Republicans of the North to be still so lively in the breasts of the Southern blacks that they count every colored voter as much the natural and indefeasible adherent of the Republican Party as if he were bound to it by an indissoluble tie.

And partisan complacency with this "solidity" of the whites in the one party and of the blacks in the other is not confined to the South. The Democrat of the North exults in it as the sheet-anchor of his political hopes in the pending Presidential canvass. It seems to him a "coigne of vantage" that he is able to start in his political computations with the one hundred and thirty-eight electoral votes of the South. And it is plain that the Republican managers of the North, while professing a large degree of sorrow and shame at the political "wickedness" of the Southern whites, are secretly very well satisfied with a state of affairs which gives them a lever power by which they hope to array the "Solid North" against the "Solid South." As the political "North" is stronger than the political "South," they see that a "short cut" to victory lies through this path, if only the one "solidity" can be made to produce the other as the natural contre-coup of antagonistic forces in the body politic. Our readers may remember that this scheme of political propagandism was deliberately expounded and inculcated by the late Senator Morton as being the only way in which the Republicans could take compensation for the Southern States lost to them by the pacific methods and constitutional policy of President Hayes.

In the present distempered state of public feeling it is not easy to tell which of the two historical parties of the country is likely to be the greater loser by the sectional antagonisms in which each of them lives and moves and has its being. The "Solid South" is a heavy weight for the Democrats to carry at the North, not because it is "solid," but because it is "solid" on the color line, and, therefore, on a line which, recurring outside of legitimate politics, lends itself ready-made to all the purposes of cheap declamation and of angry recrimination on the part of their opponents. And then, in turn, this cheap declamation and this angry recrimination of the Republican managers, in the presence of a civil schism which they seem more anxious to perpetuate than to cure, are an offense to very many at the North who have come to think that the pacification of the country is the first and highest duty of statesmanship in an epoch so far removed from the close of the late civil war, when the passions of war should no longer be a ground of appeal in current politics.

If it be idle to hope that the Republicans will desist from their sectional appeals against the South so long as it remains "solid" in the Democratic ranks, so, on the other hand, it is equally idle to hope that this "solidity" will be broken so long as the whites of the South are held and regarded as the natural and unalterable enemies of the Constitution and the Union. As each of these fanaticisms derives its chief strength and best support from the other, the comparative vitality of each may be seen in the comparative vivacity of the antagonistic fanaticism on which it feeds. At the close of the war it was natural that hatred of "the North" should be a potential factor in the politics of "the South," so far as the Southern whites are concerned, and that antipathy for the Southern whites should be a potential factor in the politics of the North, while as yet the bitter memories of the war were keen and fresh in every bosom. But we are now more than fifteen years removed from the cessation of hostilities between the two belligerent sections. The fruits of the war have been gathered, under the auspices of the Republican Party and at its dictation, into the three constitutional amendments which stand as its confession of the ends for which the war was fought. With the full consent of the Republican Party the late insurgent States have been restored to their rightful political autonomy under the Constitution. The "rebel Brigadiers" have been admitted to their seats in the Senate and House of Representatives. A rebel officer was selected by President Grant to expound, for a time, the laws of the land in the chair of the Attorney-General of the United States. A rebel General was placed by President Hayes in the office of Postmaster-General, and another rebel general, who led in the fiercest onset of the Confederates at Gettysburg, has been sent by the same Republican President to represent the country at Constantinople.

In the face of facts like these, it is surely more and more out of season for the Republicans to fight over again the battles of the war, and this, too, when a Union General, "the hero of Gettysburg," is the standard-bearer of the Democrats. In vain was the war for the Union ever fought and won if the whites of the South are to be placed under the ban of a perpetual ineligibility because of the part they took, or their fathers took, in that Titanic struggle. In vain have pardon and amnesty been proclaimed to the late insurgent people of the Southern States if, at the return of each Presidential election, they are to be held and treated as "alien enemies" who cannot be intrusted, in the government of the country, even with that proportional share which falls to them as a small minority section compared with the North and West, and a minority doomed to grow less and less with each decennial census of the land.

And there are signs in Virginia, in Tennessee and Georgia, that the Democratic "solidity" of the South is in a state of dissolution and thaw. The color line is ceasing to be the only line of cleavage in the politics of the South. Practical questions and domestic interests are there coming to the front in State politics, and they are kept from coming to the front in National politics only because there has not been found wisdom enough in the Republican leaders to adopt the pacific and conservative policy initiated by President Hayes at the beginning of his Administration.

A NEW AGRICULTURAL COLONY.

THOMAS HUGHES, Q. C., author of "School Days at Rugby," and widely known as a sturdy friend of America, is interested in an agricultural colonization scheme which proposes the State of Tennessee for its field of operations. There is nothing remarkable in this fact, since Mr. Hughes is known to be a man of popular sympathies; but, in reading the report of his arrival in New York one is struck by the character of his retinue. From the names of lords and ladies, professional men, gentlemen's sons and individuals of high mercantile and financial connections in his train, it would be easy to imagine that it was proposed to colonize the British aristocracy. But his fellow-travelers come, possibly, only as financial and social factors in the enterprise, and without any definite intention of stock-farming.

The undertaking is very comprehensive. Three hundred thousand acres of land in one of the most charming sections of a State second to none in natural scenery and climate, and seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars in capital, suggest a very liberal scheme and great future possibilities. The immediate object is to provide homes for persons who, preferring an agricultural life, have no door of opportunity open to them as tenant farmers in England. The scheme will scarcely end with a merely agricultural colony. On the bosom of all these broad acres a city may spring up, and there will be factories and workshops and commercial bazaars for the profit and convenience of the inhabitants. It may be a literal New England in the heart of old Tennessee, a conjunction not anticipated at the time of the death of the late Confederacy. But the scheme, as described by its projectors, seems to be rather beyond the reach of the indigent and impecunious. It is designed for the benefit of those who can bring some wealth and considerable influence to aid in enhancing the value of the property invested; as the management will be somewhat exclusive, the enterprise can scarcely be called a philanthropic one. It should be regarded rather as a financial adventure—a co-operative body of small and large agricultural capitalists, engaged in speculation in a field not heretofore opened by business enterprise. But it will be a good undertaking. The members of this Board of Aid to Land Ownership, as the company is called, will put their capital to a very popular use, and, incidentally, benefit all who can avail themselves of their offers of assistance.

The tendency of the age is in the direction of co-operative enterprise. Men are surrendering their sense of individualism and learning the force that comes with united action. But it is a little singular that those who have the least necessity for co-operation are the first to discover its advantages. Our capitalists have combined, and great financial triumphs are the result. But labor, filled rather with envy than emulation at the success of capital, seems to revel in the spirit of disunion, and to fight shy of all organization more perfect than Trades Unions—those representatives of demoralization and ineffectual strikes. When workingmen undertake to co-operate, their schemes are generally too elaborate to succeed, and they fail through the very complexity of the interests involved. It may be that we shall never see successful co-operation among those who would be most benefited by its operations until there are philanthropists enough of independent means to organize the forces that seem now determined to neutralize and destroy each other.

Such enterprises as this in which Mr. Hughes is engaged are to be welcomed for the example furnished in their administration. In their isolated operations they can be of little benefit to society. Their membership is necessarily small; and the individuals who can avail themselves of the opportunity offered by the distinguished gentleman and his associates will not be missed in the districts from which they will be drawn. In the beginning they will be mainly agriculturists, too; and the movement can scarcely touch the question of over-population in cities. It is from the plethora of people where they congregate in masses that we suffer, and until the movement in favor of agricultural colonization has become comprehensive enough to thin out the excess of population, it can be of but little general benefit.

But right here we are confronted by another difficulty. It is the propensity of the race to herd together in large communities. The history of the world is the history of great cities; and if you were to take two hundred thousand people from New York to-morrow and locate them on farms, there would be two hundred and fifty thousand farmers and people from the rural districts ready to rush in on the day after to-morrow and fill up their places. In the crudeness and inexperience of the newcomers, too, they would not be half so well satisfied with a dinner of paving stones as their predecessors. We can never get rid of populous cities, and they will cease to be over-populated when their inhabitants have improved upon their social science. When that times comes the word over-populated will become obsolete, and the larger the city the better for both country and town.

But, in the example furnished by colonization schemes, there can be discovered some light which may guide to great results hereafter. Disguised in whatever form the managers please, an agricultural colony is a co-operative enterprise, and as such it represents a beneficent principle, destined eventually to work the regeneration of our social system. When men have learned to thoroughly co-operate in all their undertakings, whether financial or industrial, we shall reach the beginning of another and better era, and see the removal of many of the evils that now distract society. Possibly the new epoch may come quickly by a general and spontaneous movement, or it may be delayed, and we may have a long road to travel before reaching the end. If the latter rate of progression represents the future, such schemes as the enterprise encouraged by Mr. Hughes will form good stepping-stones. If they furnish landmarks by the way and help us over the quagmires, we shall have reason to feel ourselves greatly indebted to their projectors

THE FALL TRADE.

IT is gratifying to notice that the prospects for the Autumn trade are, on the whole, quite favorable both in the foreign and domestic branches of our commerce. The estimates of our wheat crop this year now approximate 500,000,000 bushels, and though there has latterly been some modification of the reports current several months ago of a considerable falling off in the European crop, yet it now appears certain that the yield in Great Britain will be no larger than last year; the German harvest, moreover, has been delayed and injured by excessively hot weather; and Russia, our great rival in the wheat trade, will not have nearly as much to spare for exportation as last year. It is now probable that we shall have at least 200,000,000 bushels of wheat to spare this season, though only half of this may be required. The prices of this cereal in the markets are lower at present than last year, but this will be equalized by the larger yield.

The corn crop this year will also be very large, and will add materially to the wealth of the country. The prospects for a full average yield, at least, of other cereals are also promising. We have just marketed a crop of 5,000,000 bales of cotton, worth $250,000,000; and for the crop year beginning September 1st, the current estimates at the Cotton Exchange are from 6,000,000 to 6,500,000 bales. Should the latter calculation prove true, it means over $300,000,000 more in the pockets of our people for the raw cotton—to say nothing of the enormous sums to be obtained from the sale of manufactured goods. The exports of raw cotton for the past season, it may be added, have been the largest ever known in the history of the trade; and our country, it is pleasing to know, has once more assumed the supremacy in the cotton trade which it lost during the war. The nearest approach to the exports of 3,900,000 bales for the past cotton year was in 1860, when the foreign shipments reached 3,775,000 bales.

Although the foreign exports of cotton goods, since January 1st, have shown some falling off, the prospects for this Autumn are, in the main, quite favorable, and it appears more than likely that the scales may be turned before the end of the year. As it is, the exports from New York alone thus far are close to 65,000 packages, valued at no less than $4,600,000, which is certainly some advance since 1871, when for the corresponding period the shipments reached only 13,000 packages valued at $958,000.

Then there is our petroleum traffic. The exports from New York since January 1st have been 195,000,000 gallons, the total for all our shipping ports being over 250,000,000 gallons, worth at a modest calculation at least $20,000,000. The production of crude petroleum now approximates the almost fabulous aggregate of 80,000 barrels per day. There is always a supply of several million barrels at the wells in Pennsylvania, of which there are in the largest district—the Bradford—now no less than 7,300. Here is what might not inappropriately be termed a streaming tide of wealth, mysterious in its source and wonderful as Aladdin's lamp. Crude oil now sells at about 90 cents per barrel, which is certainly a large decline since the days when $5 was quoted; and yet there is "money in it" even at present prices—what we lack in this respect being made up to a considerable extent in the increased production. There is now in this market, as well as in Baltimore and Philadelphia, a good demand for oil to supply the Fall trade with Europe.

The foreign Autumn traffic in our dairy products will, according to present appearances, reach an imposing aggregate. Within a few years the exports of cheese—our largest staple in this branch of trade—have risen to 124,000,000 pounds, which shows a remarkable increase within a few years. It is noticeable, too, that our exports of butter, which were formerly quite insignificant, are increasing year by year, Great Britain being our largest customer for this product as well as cheese. As late as 1876 we exported only 4,660,000 pounds of butter, whereas, for the last two or three years the shipments have averaged nearly 21,000,000 pounds. As our annual production of butter is estimated at 1,500,000,000 pounds and of cheese 350,000,000 pounds, we have enough to spare for any foreign demand that may arise. Some idea of the importance to the country of our dairy interests may be derived from the fact that two years ago our production of butter and cheese was worth 830,000,000, or one-seventh more than the value of the wheat crop, and one-third more than that of the cotton crop for that year. Our great rival in the dairy trade with Great Britain is France, which has a prohibitory tariff; but if our trade continues to grow as it has of late years we need not fear foreign competition. We have 3,000 manufactories of cheese, 13,000,000 milch cows, and have $1,300,000,000 invested in pasture lands. Prices of both butter and cheese it may be stated are considerably higher than last year.

The trade in hog products promises very favorably this Fall. The number of hogs packed at the principal points in the West shows a very marked increase compared with last year, and the foreign exports of products are beginning to show a proportionate increase. The shipments of lard East from the marts alluded to since last November—the beginning of the season—have been no less than 313,000,000 pounds against 274,000,000 pounds the previous season; while the shipments of meats to the seaboard have exceeded 700,000,000 pounds, being an excess of 5,000,000 pounds over last season. Here we have in exact figures 1,018,000,000 pounds of lard and meats, worth, at a very modest calculation, $75,000,000; while the actual foreign exports from New York alone, since January 1st, have been 182,000,000 pounds of lard and 334,000,000 pounds of meats, besides 180,000 barrels of pork. No wonder the granger rejoices on every side, especially as he is getting prices an important item higher than last year.

Digitized by Google

Then we have a wool-clip just coming to market which promises to reach 250,000,000 pounds, which shows an increase. Farmers have been getting unusually high prices for their wool, and they are even now about fifteen per cent. higher than last year, though at the moment the tendency is towards lower quotations. The prospects point to a brisk trade both in wool and woolen goods this Fall, though prices may seek a lower level before there is much of a revival in trade. Manufacturers in different parts of the country talk cheerfully of the Autumn prospects, and at the latest advices from Europe there was an active demand for American goods. It need scarcely be remarked that our wool-clip annually adds materially to the national wealth.

Turning again to the Southern States, it is worthy of note that not only cotton but other crops peculiar to that region, namely, sugar, rice and tobacco, are contributing largely to a more prosperous condition of things south of Mason & Dixon's line; and that crops of these products are likely to be large this year. Since the war Louisiana has devoted considerable attention to rice culture, and with such success that the incoming crop is estimated at 50,000,000 pounds, which will certainly be worth close to $3,000,000. In the Carolinas, too, large crops of rice of late years have been a real blessing to the agricultural classes. Formerly we imported large quantities of rice from Rangoon and Patna in the East Indies, but now the home culture is almost, if not quite, sufficient for our needs.

Thus, in looking somewhat hastily over the field, we find that the prospects for our Autumn trade are on the whole satisfactory, and all classes are likely to be benefited directly or indirectly by this fact. One of the most favorable features—one though mentioned last is far from least—is the cheapness of money, which now ranges from one-half to two per cent., while at this time last year the market was tight and very much higher. This easiness of the money market, of course, greatly assists in marketing the crops and enables merchants to hold the products for fair prices. Plentiful crops mean prosperity to the farmers and a large traffic in our cities, all classes thus partaking of the wealth of the soil.

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

THE feeling which had grown up in Europe as to the settled peace between France and Germany has received a rude shock by the speech of Gambetta at Cherbourg, and the tone which the German press has adopted in treating it. In his speech he said the army was no longer recruited among those who made a trade of fighting, but from the best and purest blood in France. He combatted the views of those persons who thought that too much attention was paid to military affairs, and pointed out that the only means by which France could regain her lost position was by the aid of the army. As this was almost a declaration of his belief that Alsace and Lorraine would be retaken by force of arms, if the opportunity should offer itself, it is not strange that the press of Germany should call attention to Gambetta's speech and should criticise it severely. The North German Gazette says it is better that Germany should know exactly how things are, and should familiarize herself with the idea of another war with France. The maintenance of a powerful army is necessary; but the Gazette wishes it to be fully understood that the first threat of breaking the peace did not come from Germany.

The situation in Turkey remains practically unchanged. The collective note of the Powers has been presented to the Porte. It declares that, as the new boundary was definitely marked out by the Conference of Berlin, they must decline to allow any reopening of the question. The Porte has offered to cede the Dulcigno district with the exception of Gruda and Dinosh. The Turkish ministers also declare that they are fully conscious of the necessity of settling the question in Montenegro, in order to strengthen their diplomatic and military positions in regard to Greece, and to destroy the influence of Russia, the special protector of Montenegro. At the same time, the Sultan is averse to taking any harsh measures to compel the transfer of territory, and the Albanians continue their preparations for resistance. The Powers, on the other hand, do not seem to act with any concert, and their failure to make the promised naval demonstration in Albanian waters has led the Sultan to hope that they cannot agree among themselves. The coast of Albania is very rocky and wild, and it would be exceedingly dangerous to send a fleet of armor-clad vessels thither during the equinoctial gales. Meanwhile there is a growing discontent with the Sultan among his own subjects, and a seditious proclamation, which has been industriously circulated, has given utterance to this feeling.

The siege of Candahar still continues, and although not very close is sufficiently so to keep the besieged upon the constant qui vive. Several sorties have been made, and in one of them the British suffered rather seriously, losing several officers. The Afghan artillery is remarkably good for a semi-barbarous army. The smiths of Cabul have always been noted for their fine work, and some time ago they were impressed into the Government employ to make guns. Shere Ali was famous for his skill as an artillerist, and once sent his chief smith to Peshawur to study the various arms in the workshops there. This smith brought back wooden models of the Armstrong and other rifled cannon, and a manufactory of guns and small arms was started at Bala Hissar. The consequence is that the Afghans now possess some ninety rifled cannon, mostly field and mountain pieces, but well adapted to the country in which the Afghans delight to make warfare.

The agitation in Ireland has not lessened. The English newspapers make light of the so-called "organizations." It is admitted that there are a few fanatics banded together calling themselves Fenians, but it is denied that they have any power, and they are not nearly as dangerous as the Parnellites. The latter are at present directing their energies against the Irish constabulary, a body of men recruited altogether in Ireland and officered by Irishmen. It is said that they are merely a military force without the red coats. On the other hand, the efficiency of the Irish constabulary is allowed on all hands, and although there is no danger of a rebellion in Ireland which would require military aid to quell, yet there is much danger to life and property, and the constabulary is exactly the body suited to deal with it.

One curious effect of Mr. Parnell's obstructive policy has been the creation of a small party of strong Conservatives who imitate the Irish obstructive tactics. The principal members of it are Lord Randolph Churchill, a son of the Duke of Marlborough; Lord Elcho, a son of the Earl of Wemyss; and Mr. Gorst. None of these young men have ever been known in public life before, and their present position is a thoroughly novel one. This new obstructive element seems to be entirely uncontrolled in their actions, and on several occasions, when Sir Stafford Northcote, the Conservative leader of the House of Commons, disassociated himself from them, they showed such a bold front that the Government and Opposition were both alarmed. It is so unusual to find any break in the ranks of the Conservative Party that this movement is attracting an amount of attention quite out of proportion either with the abilities or influence of the "Tory obstructives."

The revolution in Cuba may now be said to be over. The insurgents have surrendered and have been sent to Spain. It is found that the captured rebels are so numerous that there is not sufficient room for them in the penal settlements in North Africa, and it is proposed to send several of them to the Marianna Islands, a group near the Philippine. As these islands are desolate and inhabited by only savages and rats, the insurgents are naturally adverse to being banished to those unattractive places. They also allege that they surrendered on the distinct understanding that they should be allowed to remain in Spain. A large part of the Spanish force in Cuba has been withdrawn, but 8,000 recruits are to be sent out in October.

Great excitement is prevalent in Madrid concerning the accouchement of the Queen, which is expected immediately. The Queen, accompanied by her mother, has visited all the principal churches, praying for a safe delivery, and she has made frequent presents and distributions of alms to the churches and among the poor. All the ambassadors, ministers and high functionaries of State are assembled awaiting the propitious event, and eighty halberdiers are in constant attendance at the palace, ready to rush out and advise those great personages of the approaching event. The birth of an heir is of the greatest importance, as it will consolidate the dynasty and add to the popularity of the Queen.

THE Democratic Party in Tennessee, in taking ground for the honest settlement of the debt of the State, has set an example to the Democrats of Virginia which we should be glad to see them copy. The debt of Tennessee is about $24,000,000. The creditors have indicated their willingness to compromise at one-half. The majority of the Democrats favor the payment of this amount, while a minority propose to repudiate all but about $2,000,000 of the debt. The repudiationists have nominated a distinct ticket, and hope to get some help from the Republicans in their war upon the credit of the State. So far there are no indications that the latter will connect themselves to a policy so utterly dishonorable; but if they shall do so, they will deserve the defeat and humiliation which will pretty surely overtake them.

THERE is a class of temperance advocates who are for ever bringing ridicule and disaster upon their cause by their stupid efforts to accomplish the impossible. Thus, in Maine and New Jersey this year, they are favoring independent tickets for State officers on the one idea of temperance, ignoring as of no sort of consequence all the grave questions of public policy which so much more nearly concern the people. Now, temperance in the use of intoxicating drinks is a good thing, but nobody but a fanatic or fool believes that men can be reclaimed from drinking habits by carrying the question into politics. Reforms are accomplished mainly by moral forces, and to neglect these is simply to invite defeat. The Maine and New Jersey zealots are probably incapable of learning wisdom from adverse experience, but it is quite certain that they will, in the coming elections, receive a rebuke which will not lack in emphasis or directness.

A SHARP lesson was given certain tenement-house owners the other day by Judge Russell of the Superior Court. An injunction had been issued restraining the persons in question from completing a certain tenement-house unless they complied with the law in regard to proper spaces for light and ventilation. Despite this order the building was completed according to the original plans, and was rented to several families, who began to occupy it. Judge Russell, on the application of counsel for the Board of Health, granted a motion to punish the defendants for contempt of court, and they were fined $250 each, and directed, under pain of heavier penalties, to begin before September 6th the work of making the construction of the building conform to law.

THE Night Medical Service in this city, established under Act of the Legislature for the purpose of providing the deserving poor with medical assistance in case of sudden emergency during the hours of the night, is now in full operation, 327 physicians having been enrolled for duty as necessity may demand. The names of these physicians are registered at the station houses, whence they may be called for service. Each is allowed $3 a visit, but if the persons requiring aid are unable to pay the amount, then the police captain of the district is to certify to that fact, and the physician becomes entitled to receive that sum from the public funds. Three thousand dollars have been appropriated for the purpose in order to carry out the provisions of the Act, and if the experiment thus initiated proves successful, the amount will be increased as the necessity of the service requires.

THE Republicans in the Middle States are giving less prominence to the Southern question than they did at the outset of the campaign, and are directing their assaults especially against the financial and tariff records of the Democracy. On these points, especially in New York, Pennsylvania and New Jersey, where there are large manufacturing interests, the Republicans have the advantage of position, and they are making the most of them. The fact that business is prosperous and workingmen generally have employment at remunerative wages, is also against the Democracy, who can offer nothing better, by way of "changes," than is now enjoyed by the industrial classes. If the Republicans could make their fight at large upon this rather than the sectional issue, their chances of success would be greater than they can be with their present plan of battle.

THE influx of gold from Europe is attaining large proportions. The importations for the current year began on the 2d of August, and already amount to about $10,000,000, including $1,200,000 in American coin. Last year, when the importations commenced on the 12th of August, the total for that season reached the unprecedented sum of $75,000,000, and was at that point checked only by the importation of large quantities of iron, hundreds of thousands of tons of the baser metal coming as substitute for the gold, in exchange for American provisions. Opinions differ among those who deal heavily in gold as to the probable aggregate of this year's importations. Some think that the total influx of gold will run far above last year, and point to the fact that it is already in advance of the figures for a corresponding period last year. Other bankers think the total will not go above $30,000,000, but do not fortify their opinion by any facts not within the general knowledge.

THE death of General Albert J. Myer terminates a career of singular usefulness and honor. As chief signal officer of the army General Myer rendered services of inestimable importance to the commerce and agriculture of the country, while his efforts and influence contributed to the development of meteorological science throughout the world to an extent which is not even yet fully appreciated. The Weather Bureau, so-called, was peculiarly his own creation. The system of observations and reports which he established, and which now covers the entire country, has resulted in the saving of millions upon millions of dollars to the farming and commercial interests. The results of observations taken in all parts of the Union are telegraphed thrice daily to Washington, where they are tabulated; the probabilities are then deduced, and these are instantly sent to all Boards of Trade, Chambers of Commerce, Merchants' Exchanges, and scientific societies, and to the principal places, especially seaports, all over the country. They are also published in all the daily newspapers, and so reach the great majority of our population once or twice daily. Storm signals are displayed at New York and all the principal seaports whenever a storm is expected, and no careful seaman ventures out of port when the red light is burning or the red flag flying. General Myer was a man of great force of character and high culture, and was, besides, an enthusiast in the work to which he had devoted his life. Had he lived a few years longer, he would have no doubt succeeded in establishing an international meteorological system, including as its chief feature the taking of simultaneous weather observations at all points in the world reached by telegraphic communication. This was the ambition of his life, and he had already made considerable progress in that direction. Dying in the prime of his powers, he leaves his great work to be finished by others, but his fame is sure, since it rests on solid achievements in the interest of all mankind.

NEWS OF THE WEEK

Domestic.

VICTORIA and his band of bo-tiles are reported as starving in Mexico.

A FIRE at St. Paul, Minn., August 25d, destroyed property valued at $900,000.

PRESIDENT HAWES, of Hamilton College, has resigned after fourteen years' service.

HON. HORACE MAYNARD entered upon his duties as Postmaster-General last week.

THE Army of the Cumberland will hold its reunion in Toledo on September 22d and 23d.

THE Iowa Republicans have renominated J. A. T. Hall for Secretary of State, and named W. V. Lucas for Auditor.

A CONVENTION of deaf mutes of the United States was held at Cincinnati last week. All the proceedings were carried on by signs.

A DISPATCH, dated August 27th, stated that the well-known Ute chief, Ouray, had Bright's disease, and that he would probably die before morning.

ON the Charter Oak Course, Hartford, Conn., August 27th, St. Julien beat his own and the fastest time on record, running the mile in 2.11¼.

THE President has decided not to issue any proclamation as to commercial relations with the Chilean until the Chinese Commission makes a report.

THE New York Republican State Committee has decided not to call a State Convention, and nominated Judge Folger for Chief Judge of the Court of Appeals.

THE Republicans of Colorado have nominated Governor Pitkin for re-election. The Democrats of Kansas have nominated E. G. Ross for Governor, with a full State ticket.

THE Industrial League of America has issued an address showing increased manufactures in iron, steel, silk, pottery and worsted, and urging the importance of a protective policy.

PRESIDENT HAYES left Washington last week for a visit to the West and the Pacific Coast. He will probably extend his travels to Oregon, and return to the capitol about November 1st.

A REUNION of General Garfield's regiment (Forty-second Ohio) was held at Ashland, in that State, August 25th. The attendance was from eight to ten thousand. A speech was made by General Garfield.

THE Greenbackers of New Jersey have nominated General Thomas H. Hedsey for Governor. General Weaver, the Greenback candidate for President, having completed a tour of Arkansas and Indiana, now goes to Maine, where he is announced to make several speeches.

THE twenty-ninth meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science was held in Boston last week. The Association was welcomed to the city by addresses from Mayor Prince and Governor Long. A number of interesting papers on scientific topics were read.

THE coroner's juries charged with inquiring into the accident on the Atlantic City (N. J.) Railroad, some weeks since, by which over twenty lives were lost, have returned verdicts fixing the responsibility on the conductor and engineer of the second section of the train on which the disaster happened.

THE Supreme Lodge of Knights of Pythias, in session at St. Louis last week, elected the following officers for the ensuing term of two years: Supreme Chancellor, Judge G. W. Lindsey, of Maryland; Supreme Vice-Chancellor, Judge John P. Linton, Pennsylvania; Supreme Prelate, the Rev. W. Bryce Thompson, Tennessee; Supreme Master of the Exchequer, John P. Stamphan, Indiana.

THE Local Inspectors of Steam Vessels have transmitted to Stephen R. Kirby, Supervising Inspector of the district, their report in regard to the disaster that resulted in the destruction of the steamboat Seawanhaka and the loss of forty lives. The inspectors give at length their reasons for arriving at the conclusion that the boilers of the boat were intact when it was beached, and that the cause of the fire was back draft forcing the gases and flame from the grate bars.

AFTER the New York Democratic State Central Committee met on August 27th at the St. James Hotel, a committee headed by Lester B. Faulkner called on John Kelly and obtained from him the terms on which the wing of the Democracy which he represents would be willing to unite with the other. As a result of these negotiations, the State Committee issued a call for a State Convention to be held in Saratoga on September 29th. It is understood that the delegation from this city will be divided between Irving Hall and Tammany Hall.

Foreign.

GERMANY has definitely abandoned the intention to acquire and colonize the Samoan Islands.

THE Conference for the Reform of the Law of Nations has begun its sessions at Berne, Switzerland.

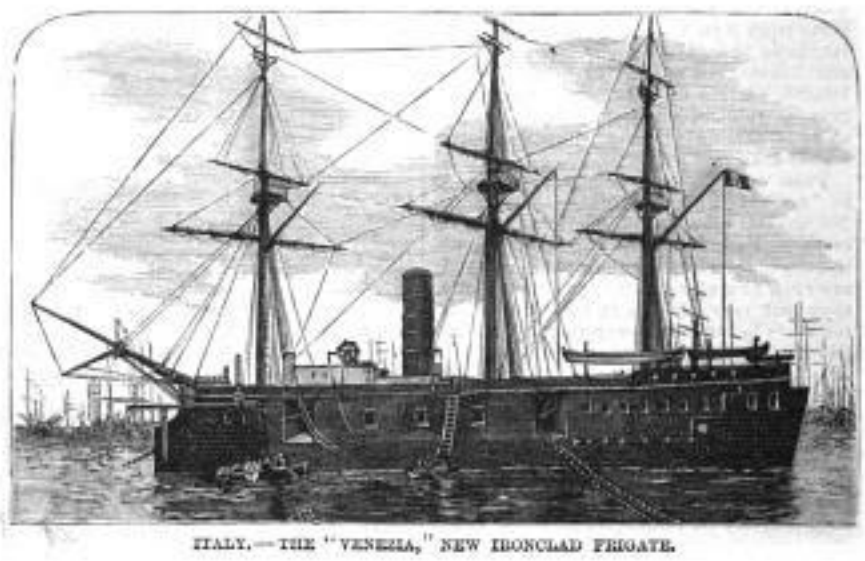
PRECAUTIONS are being taken against the expected resistance to evictions in the West of Ireland. Iron huts for the police are in course of construction at places where trouble is thought likely to occur.

MR. GLADSTONE is making a cruise around the British coast accompanied by the Earl of Rosebery. A rumor has been circulated that the cruise was less for the benefit of the Premier's health than to enable him to visit some disaffected portions of Ireland.

RIZA PASHA assembled the chiefs of the Albanian League at Scutari on August 24th. As they refused to yield to his demands in regard to the cession of territory to Montenegro, he sought to detain them in arrest, but the inhabitants rescued them and threatened Riza Pasha with death.

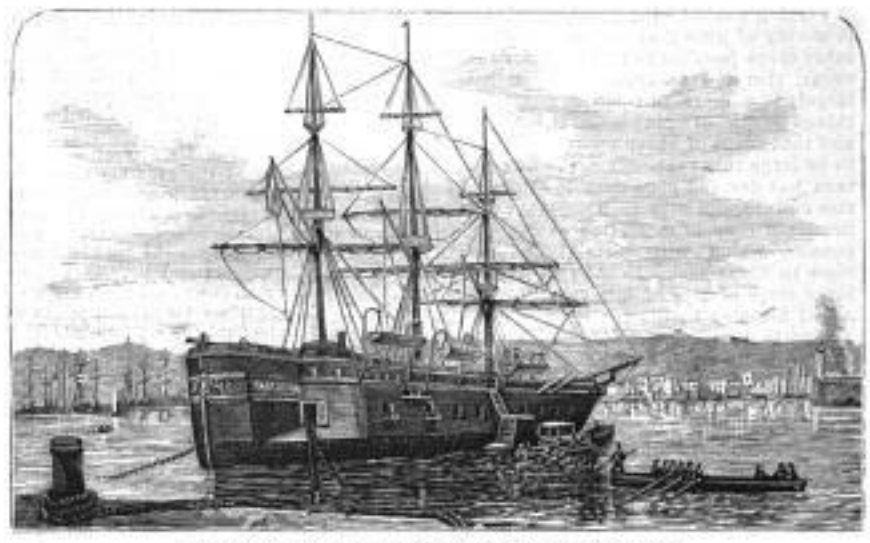
A DISASTROUS hurricane recently passed over the island of Jamaica. Thousands of people are houseless. The crops were destroyed. In Kingston the barracks were destroyed. Eight large and thirty-two small vessels were wrecked in the harbor. Famine is imminent, and help is required for the starving thousands.

A PROCLAMATION is being circulated in Constantinople attacking the Sultanate and demanding the restoration of Islamism in its purity. The discontent of the Moslem population is increasing. An outbreak at Aleppo is feared, and there is great agitation at Damascus and Diarbekr. The Sultan is alarmed at the prospect that the Powers will employ coercion against him on the Greek frontier question.

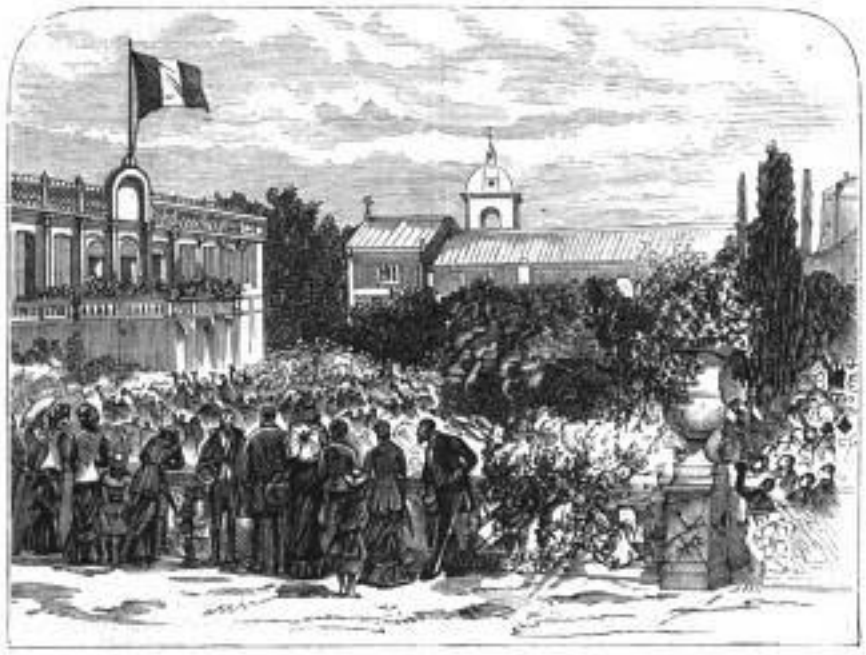


THE House of Lords on Friday night adopted, by a vote of 75 to 49, the amendment to omit the section of the Employers' Liability Bill entitling claims to be preferred against an employer in case of injury caused by any of his servants, in spite of the vigorous opposition of the Government. Lord Beaconsfield moved an amendment limiting the duration of the Act to two years, which was rejected by a vote of 72 to 46.

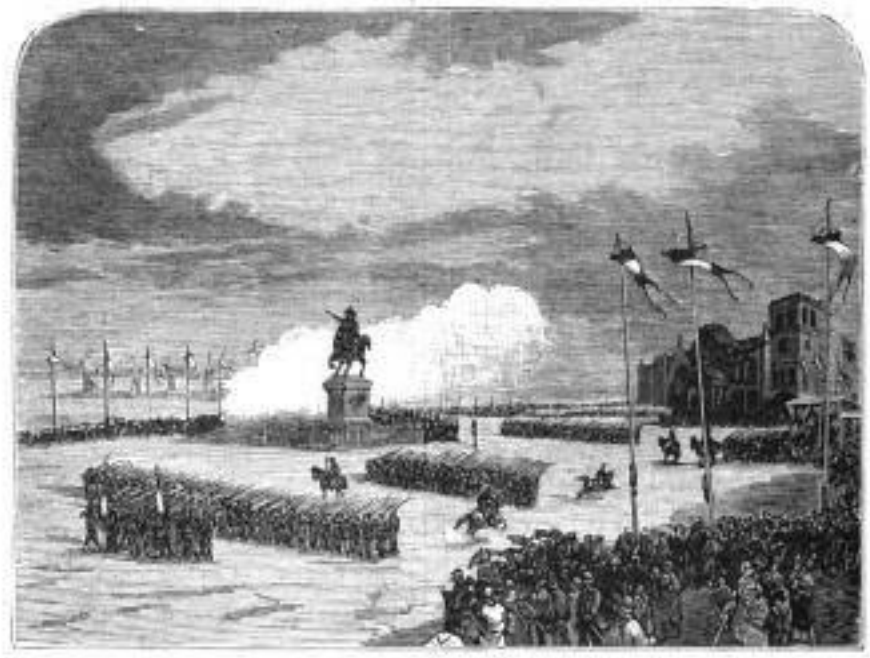
Digitized by Google



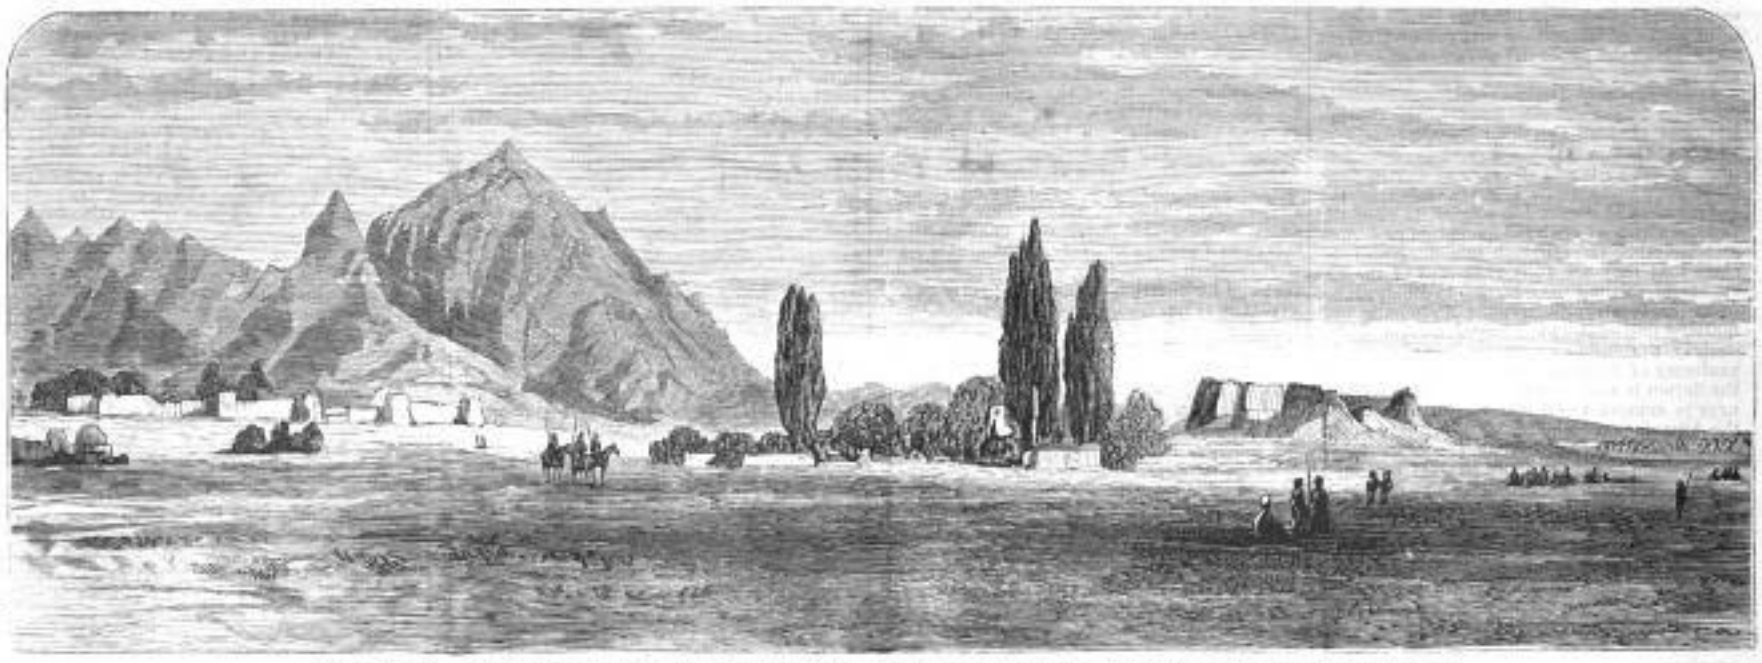
The Pictorial Spirit of the Illustrated Foreign Press.—SEE PAGE 23.



AFGHANISTAN.—GUNS CROSSING THE KHOJACK PASS, EN ROUTE TO CANDAHAR.

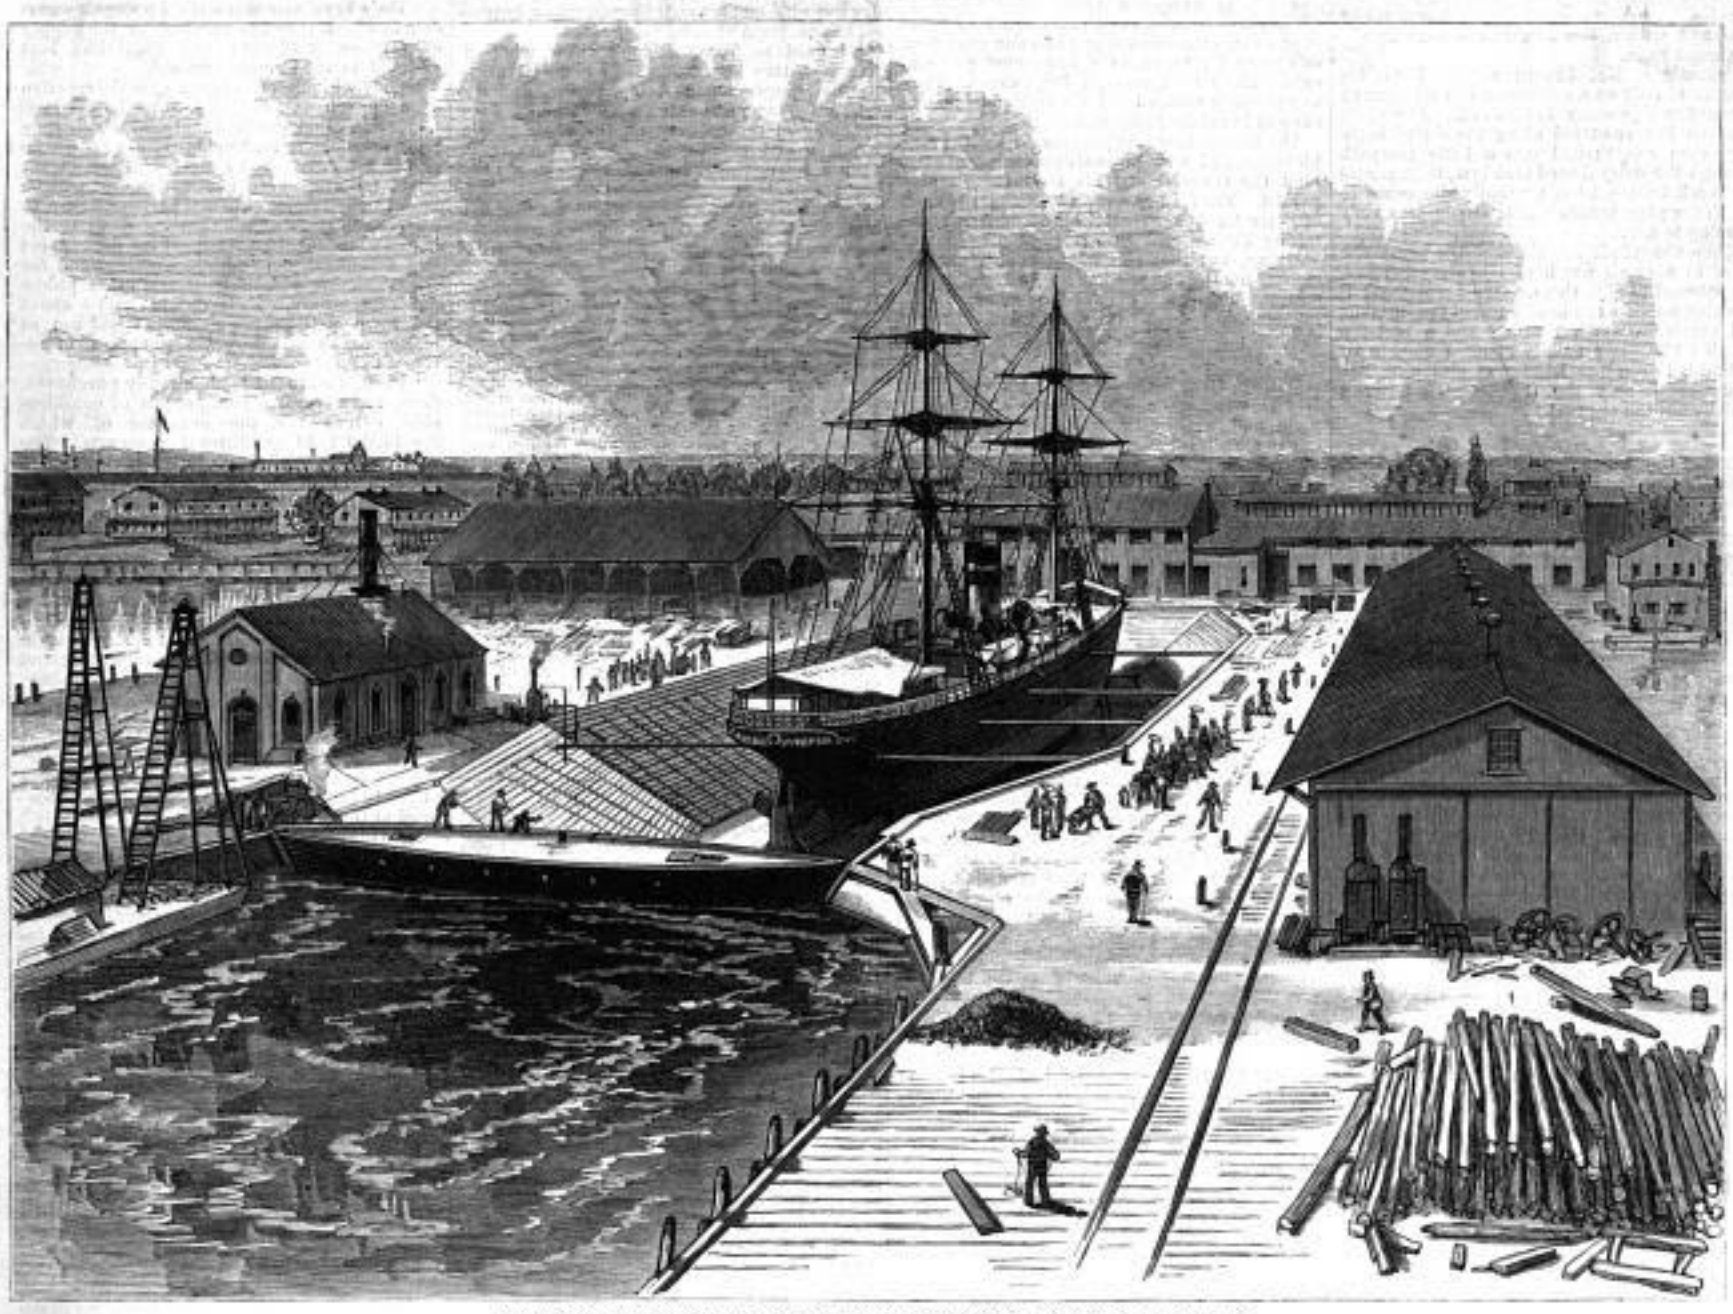


ITALY.—THE "VENEZIA," NEW IRONCLAD FRIGATE.



ITALY.—THE "PALESTRO," NEW IRONCLAD FRIGATE.

TURKEY.—SERENADE, BY THE GREEK POPULATION, TO THE FRENCH AMBASSADOR, PERA.



FRANCE.—THE NAVAL FÊTE-DAY CELEBRATION AT CHERBOURG, AUGUST 8TH-9TH.

AFGHANISTAN.—KHUSHK-I-NAKHUD, THE SCENE OF THE LATE BATTLE BETWEEN AYOUB KHAN AND GENERAL BURROWS.

Digitized by Google

INTERIOR OF THE DRY DOCK.

APPEARANCE OF THE DOCK DURING ITS OCCUPATION BY AN OCEAN STEAMSHIP.

MARYLAND.—THE SOUTH IN 1880—THE GREAT DRY DOCK AT LOCUST POINT, ADJOINING FORT M'HENRY, BALTIMORE.—SEE PAGE 23.

Digitized by Google

A BIRTHDAY MESSAGE.

I.

I CANNOT see your lovely face to-day,
Nor clasp and kiss you in be old sweet way.
Since fate has set our lives so far apart,
I can but hope that you have peace of heart.
God keep you stainless as He made you fair.
Dieuvle, ma Dieuvle, ma plus chère.

II.

Love holds the key that locks my prison-door;
Must it remain close-barred for evermore?
He knows my desolation and my need,
And yet I must be mute: I may not plead
To breathe again with you his free, glad air
Dieuvle, ma Dieuvle, ma plus chère.

III.

Ah, me! that heart's-desire should be in vain,
That empty husks are given our souls for grain!
Ah, me! that in the chalice of the years
Our wine is blent with bitter gall of tears!
Ah, me! I can but leave you in God's care,
Dieuvle, ma Dieuvle, ma plus chère.

JOHN MORAN.

LINK BY LINK.

THE shower was ended. A brisk western breeze was rapidly tearing away the gray thunder-clouds, from the face of the June sky, and the sun shone down with renewed fervor.

"As hot as 'twas before the rain!" exclaimed Mrs. Curtis, as she opened her parasol and leisurely stepped from the Heywood drygoods store in which she had, half an hour before, taken shelter from the storm.

"Yes, it is, ma'am," said Mr. Brown, the proprietor, handing her the bundles she had bought from him, and he added: "You'll have a hot walk under this brilin'-hot sun. Better run in to our house an' stay ter tea. You hain't seen the twins yet. Smartest little critters ever was. Mrs. Brown's gettin' on finely and will be glad to see you."

"Thanks; I'd like to, but I must hurry home and can my currants. Besides, I wouldn't undertake that long walk through the pine woods after dark for anything in the world. It's gloomy enough in the daytime. Give my respects to your wife; tell her I'll drop in soon and see her and the babies. Good-day."

"Good-day," said Brown, and he added, as he saw Mrs. Curtis hurrying down the street, "Queer critter!"

Yes, by all the inhabitants of Heywood, Mrs. Curtis was called peculiar. She was upwards of fifty years, tall and erect, with iron-gray hair, ruddy cheeks and keen, dark eyes. And decidedly she was a person that minded her own business. She had lived in Heywood over five years, yet in all that time not a single person had been able to glean any information concerning her past life. All that could be ascertained was that she was a widow, childless and with a little property, consisting of a comfortable cottage surrounded by a few acres of land, and with a few hundred dollars in the Heywood bank.

Meanwhile, Mr. Brown returned to his counter to wait on a customer, and Mrs. Curtis pursued her journey homeward. For some distance her road led along the dusty highway, then she turned into a little footpath through the daisy-dotted meadow, then across the creek bridge, until presently she came to the dense pine woods whose shade was very pleasing to her.

When about half way through the woods she came to a small patch of late strawberries. She stooped to pick them. Her brown, hard-working hands were nearly full of the luscious red berries, when a rustling and a footstep startled her. She hastily glanced up. In an instant an iron-like hand was clutching her throat, and—only the frightened, wildwood birds could tell the rest!

* * * * *

About two miles from the village of Heywood, and on the banks of Briar Creek, dwelt Peter Groat. He was a Dutchman, who, with his family, had lately come to America, and in the previous Autumn had bought a few acres of land bordering the creek. Here he had erected a small but comfortable house, and was, to all appearances, an honest, hard-working man. The only thing that could be said against him by a few grumblers was that he was too "close," clinging tightly to his hard-earned pennies, and ever on the lookout for more. But this was certainly excusable when it was known that he had a mortgage on his farm, which, together with the wants of a rapidly increasing family, was enough to make any man greedy of gain.

It was the evening of the day on which our story began. Peter, surrounded by his wife and children, sat placidly smoking his pipe on the little grass-plot in front of house.

The supper had been eaten, the cows milked, the pigs fed, the chickens housed from thievish rats, and all the family, young and old, felt entitled to a season of rest. Hans and Fritz were turning somersaults on the soft grass; Gretchen, the flaxen haired lassie, was feeding a pet robin; Franz, the six months baby, was cuddled up to his mother's breast, contentedly smacking his lips over his evening meal.

The sun went down: the shadows deepened. The clock in the distant village struck the hour of eight. Peter Groat rose, shook the ashes from his pipe, and said:

"Come, kinder, it is late. The dew is falling, and let's to bed."

"Vater! vater!" suddenly cried Hans and Fritz, running up from the gate, "there is a man coming in our yard—a stranger!"

Peter slowly sauntered down to meet the newcomer.

He was an elderly man, with a tanned and rugged face, sandy hair sprinkled with gray, and dark, deep set eyes, somewhat inflamed. His clothes were of good material, although worn and dusty with travel. In his hand he carried a large satchel.

"Good-evening," he said, courteously.

"Efening to you, sir," replied Peter Groat.

"I'm a peddler," said the man, speaking in German. "I have sold nearly all my goods, and am on my way back to New York. I got left by the train and undertook to walk to the next station. I lost my way and find that I will have to get lodgings for the night. Can you help me?"

"The good book commands us to show hospitality," said Peter. "And although we are not rich, we never yet turned away a benighted traveler. So, come in, and my frau shall get you something to eat."

The table was soon spread with a neat, white cloth, upon which was placed a platter of cold boiled meat, garnished with vegetables, then a plate of white bread, a roll of butter, a dish of shining black raspberries and a plate of spicy ginger cookies.

"I feel too dirty to sit down to a decent table," said the traveler, with a smile. "May I trouble you for a basin of water?"

It was brought. As he took off his coat preparatory to washing his face and hands, Gretchen, who stood beside him with a fresh towel in her hands, uttered a slight scream.

"Blood!" she cried. "There's blood on your sleeves!"

The basin of water fell from the stranger's hands. His face shone white through the glistening drops of water he had dashed upon it. Then with an effort, he said, carelessly:

"Ah, yes; those rocks by the creek made quite a gash in my shoulder. "You see," blandly explaining, "while I was lost I thought I'd try to cross the creek. It was getting dark, and when I reached the other side, I found it so rocky that I could scarcely climb up. I got half way, then a sudden misstep made me fall. A sharp piece of rock pierced my shoulder, and, indeed, it has caused me considerable pain."

"Ach, too bad!" said Frau Groat. "I have a soothing lotion which you may put on it before you go to bed."

"Thanks. And I'll go to bed right after I've had my supper, if you please, for I am very tired. Besides, I will have to rise early to-morrow morning, so that I may take the first train."

The next morning the whole family was up in time to see their guest depart. He partook with good appetite of Frau Groat's breakfast of ham and eggs; he listened quietly and with seeming reverence to his host as he read a chapter from the old, black German Bible and offered up the usual morning prayer; then, just as he was ready to start, he inquired what he should pay for his board and lodging.

"Oh, notings—notings! You're welcome to the bed and the bite!" said Groat, heartily.

"You're very kind," said the stranger. "But I feel that I ought to repay you in some way. See here"—opening his satchel—"if you will not let me give money, pray do me the kindness of accepting these little tokens of gratitude. Here, Frau Groat, are two pairs of stockings that would just fit your busy feet, and here, Gretchen, is a bran new piece of calico, more than enough for a dress. They are the only things I did not sell, and I do not care to lug them home again."

The two women accepted his gifts with much pleasure, and, with mutual expressions of good luck, the traveler and his kind entertainers parted. The former wore a blue checked shirt of Peter Groat's. He left his own behind him, telling Frau Groat that it was too soiled for wearing, but that she might keep it in exchange for the one she had given him. As the stranger's shirt was of excellent material, with linen bosom and cuffs, the worthy dame thought she had made a good bargain.

* * * * * *

William Grayson, a farmer in the vicinity of Heywood, missed one of his cows that Friday night, and early on the following morning set out to search for her. He hunted through the meadow-lands, followed the course of the creek quite a way, and finally entered the pine woods. When about half way through, a brown object lying on the grass, a little distance from him, attracted his attention. He went to it. It was a large piece of wrapping-paper, and a long bit of twine was lying beside it. The paper was damp with dew, and, as Grayson carelessly turned it over in his hand, he observed some red spots on it. He examined them more closely. They were the bloody prints of a thumb and fingers!

He looked around him keenly. He soon noticed that the bank of ferns bordering the path was, in one place, crushed and broken. He followed these marks: they led him to the densest and most unfrequented part of the woods, and there, in a hollow, almost covered with low underbrush, lay the body of a woman. It was Mrs. Curtis, lying stiff and stark, with a bloody gash across her throat!

Two hours later, a party of men was hunting the leafy labyrinths of the pine woods. They were endeavoring to find the trail of the murderer.

An hour passed, and they had met with no success. Some of them had gathered together for the purpose of consultation, when suddenly a cry from one of their companions, who was a little distance from them, attracted their attention.

"See what I have found!" he cried, holding up a spool of thread. It was dirty and dingy, and wet with dew; but Mr. Brown, the merchant, who was with the party, recognized it at once, and he said:

"It's one of the spools poor Mrs. Curtis bought of me yesterday. It's pink, you see. She was real particular about the color. She was piecing a chair cushion, and wanted the right shade. Now, it's evident that the villain who murdered her took this route through the woods. See how the ferns are crushed down this way. Hurry, we've got a clew now!"

The trail led them out of the woods into the meadow, and opened right into the yard of Peter Groat. They were going around to the back-door to knock, and ask if any of the inmates had seen a stranger lurking about the premises, when Mr. Brown chanced to look in the window.

A look of extreme consternation overspread his ruddy face.

"My God!" he cried, "see there!"

All turned and looked in the window.

The room was unoccupied. The clock ticked cheerfully in one corner. A cat was cozily curled upon a chair-cushion, purring contentedly. But on the table in the centre of the room lay two pairs of stockings, and near them, half-unrolled, was a dress pattern of lilac calico.

"That calico!" said Mr. Brown, impressively—"that calico is the identical piece I sold Mrs. Curtis yesterday afternoon. I should know it anywhere. It's peculiar, you see—a bunch of white lilacs on a purple ground. It was all I had. Besides, I should know the piece because on one end there is about half a yard imperfectly printed, which has holes in it, too. I remember I let Mrs. Curtis have it a bit cheaper on that account. Now Peter Groat knows where the murderer is, or"—solemnly and slowly—"he did the deed himself!"

The party of men went silently and soberly to the back-door, and here they were horrified in finding fresh evidence—Frau Groat was engaged in washing a blood-stained shirt!

They sternly asked her to whom it belonged, but the poor woman, who could not speak English, could only look at them in a frightened way.

Her husband now came in from the garden, and him they sternly interrogated, while some of the more impetuous boldly accused him of the murder of the unfortunate Mrs. Curtis.

His frightened face, his confusion, his incoherent utterance, his trembling denials were only so much more against him. Besides, he knew scarcely any more English than did his wife, and later, when calm, his story of the traveler who had stopped at his house was received with disbelief and derision. Poor, friendless and a stranger, things looked very dark against him.

Weeks passed; his trial came. He was sentenced to be hanged!

* * * * * *

Rev. Mr. Marshall, Rector of St. John's Church, Brookdale, a village some two hundred miles distant from Heywood, was in his study one September morning, 1878. He was suffering out an attack of influenza which he had taken the night before while on a visit to a sick parishioner. Consequently, complying with his wife's request that he should do no studying or writing, Mr. Marshall was lazily stretched on the lounge in front of a cheery fire. His eight year old son Tom was in the room, every now and then running up to his father with some request. His last one was: "Papa, it's Saturday, how shall I spend the day? Wish I had a kite! Do you know how to make one, papa?"

"I used to, Tom. I don't know whether I've forgotten how to do it or not. Give me the newspaper on the table, please, and the scissors. Then run out in the woodshed and get me some of those sticks on the shelf, also a hammer and small nails. Stay, don't be in such a hurry; ask Hannah to make a little flour paste."

Tom hurried away, and while waiting for him to return, his father glanced over the columns of the newspaper he was cutting. It was one that his friend, Mr. Brown, of Heywood, had sent him. His eyes chanced to fall on these words:

"The German, Peter Groat, who murdered Mrs. Curtis, has been sentenced to be hung on the second Friday in next month. Groat, although a stranger, was supposed to be a respectable man and one not at all capable of perpetrating such a horrible crime. But the evidences of his guilt are most conclusive. The morning after the murder his wife was found washing a bloody shirt, also a knife stained with blood was found hidden near a wood pile. Besides, goods belonging to the murdered woman were found in Groat's house. The only thing missing is a curious old snuff box of some black wood, quaintly carved in the shape of a toad. Her name, Hepsibah Curtis, is engraved inside. But without this, the evidence against Groat is strong enough to hang him."

"Poor fellow!" murmured Mr. Marshall, as he laid down the paper. "It makes one dread to read the news—one comes across so many horrors."

"Papa! papa! you needn't mind about the kite now!" cried Tom, rushing in with shining eyes. "Uncle George just called me over to his house—he is going fishing, and says he will take me along. May I go?"

"If mamma is willing."

"She is. I asked her. And I've been digging grubs and fish-worms—for bait, you know. But see what a nice bait box I've got."

"An old-fashioned snuff box. Where did you get it?"

"Myron Mason gave it to me."

"Who is Myron Mason?"

"Oh, a new man Uncle George got to work in his garden. He's gathering pears and trenching the celery. Myron was a tramp who came along, but he is real nice. The box is nice, too. See what a funny shape it is!"

"A toad. Quick! Let me see, Tom!"

Mr. Marshall had not closely observed the box until now, and it was with trembling fingers that he opened it.

"Hepsibah Curtis" was the name engraved on the inner cover!

Mr. Marshall's face was white, but his voice was calm, as he said:

"Tom, just run over and ask your Uncle George to come over here a few minutes—I want to talk with him on a little business.

* * * * *

Three days later Myron Mason, alias Jasper Armand, was arrested for the murder of Mrs. Curtis.

He made no resistance: he told no falsehoods: he simply confessed the whole affair, stating that he had murdered the woman out of revenge. Ten years before the two had lived in a distant town. He had always been wild and dissolute, but had been the betrothed of Mrs. Curtis's sister, a gentle and lovely woman. Mrs. Curtis had opposed the match, knowing that it would cause her sister a life of misery. Also, finding that Armand belonged to a gang of counterfeiters, she promptly gave evidence against him.

He was condemned to ten years' imprisonment. This he bore patiently, mentally vowing that, when released, he would at once wreak vengeance on the woman who had foiled his plans and blighted his life.

When the time was expired and the prison doors opened to let him pass out, he found that the woman he loved was dead, and that the woman he hated was living in Heywood. Thither he went. He had seen Mrs. Curtis go to town, and had concealed himself in the woods to await her return. He did not take the articles she carried merely for the sake of robbery, but to have suspicion point its finger at some other party. At the conclusion of his confession, he said that he had no desire of concealing it any longer. His life was made wretched by the horrible crime he had committed, and death and exposure were not unwelcome. The next day after his confinement in the jail he was found dead in his cell. He had ended his life by poison.

As for Peter Groat he was at once released, and all the inhabitants of Heywood strove to express their regret and regard for him, but to these Peter only shook his head, saying:

"He did not care for to live in a place where de folks vas so ready to plieve him a bad man!" So he sold his little home, packed his goods, and, with his wife and children, moved to the Far West, where, it is to be hoped, in spite of sweet charity's sake, he was more careful in entertaining benighted travelers!

THOMAS HUGHES, Q.C.

(Continued from front page)

"The Board have erected a sawmill, which has been at work for some months, and has sawed a large stock of lumber, which is stored on the site, and may, for the erection of houses, be purchased of the company. In the immediate neighborhood of the town site, they have also opened out an abundance of excellent freestone, which may be had on easy terms.

"The Board have built a hotel and a store, from which visitors or settlers can already be supplied with most of the articles in ordinary household use. With a view to avoiding, so far as may be, the evils incident to the unregulated competition of private traders, it is proposed to conduct this store as an association of which every settler may become a member. A banking department will, for the present, also form part of this store.

"They have also established a nursery garden, in which they are rearing, for the supply of settlers, fruit-trees and vegetables best adapted to the climate and soil.

"They will proceed at once with the erection of a church, school house, town-hall, court-house and other public buildings, which they hope to complete for temporary use before the end of the year. The church will not be set apart for any one denomination, but will be open to any body of Christians who desire to use it as a place of worship. A tenth of the Board's lands will be set apart for the support and maintenance of public worship, and for the promotion of education and other public purposes. Suitable lands in and about the town will be reserved and laid out as public parks and for the purposes of recreation.

"In addition to the lands already purchased, there are several other parcels of considerable extent for the purchase of which the Board hold conditional contracts. The titles to them are in process of investigation, and there is little doubt that the greater part of them will, in the end, become the property of the Board. These lots lie principally on the south and east of the town site, but the great bulk of the land which the Board has secured lies to the west and northwest, across Clear Fork stream, and forms a compact territory of some 400,000 acres, of great land value, the soil being for the most part fertile, virgin land, easily cultivated, gently undulating and clothed with an abundance of pine timber, under which good pasturage is uniformly found.

"The Board hopes then to be able to offer a large number of town lots for sale, as well as small farms of 40 or 50 acres for fruit-growing, and larger farms for agricultural purposes of 150 to 250 acres, in the immediate neighborhood of the town."

Mr. Hughes quoted from an official report made in 1867 by Dr. Hooker, then Professor of Geology and Agriculture in the University of Mississippi, and principal geologist to the State, with respect to the character of the district and the openings it offers for various industries, which speaks in the most glowing terms of climate and natural advantages. It says:

"A healthier climate than these table lands possess our planet is certainly unable to produce. The atmosphere is never overheated and sultry; continual mountain breezes always produce a cooling undulation of the air; nor is it ever severely cold, and consequently violent and sudden changes seldom if ever occur. Air and water are constantly crystalline, unpolluted by miasmatic exhalation, and nothing but man's improvidence can produce diseases. Climatic and epidemic diseases are entirely unknown on these table lands. Cholera, bilious, typhoid, even intermitting fevers, find an insurmountable barrier on the mountains which separate these highlands from the surrounding country. No acclimation is here necessary for the foreigner, may he come from the Northern States, from Europe, Asia or Africa; they can all immigrate with impunity and enjoy life satisfactorily to a very old age. The consumptive and dyspeptic regains here his health, and saves the expenses for physicians and medicines. Indeed, all classes of people find here a luxurious life, and thrive; doctors only have to resort to other occupations for their support. Longevity is here at home."

Digitized by Google

"The journey from New York," said Mr. Hughes, "to the town site can be easily made in two days, that from New York to Cincinnati occupying the first, and that from Cincinnati to Robbins (the present plateau station) the second; the journey from Cincinnati occupying from six to eight hours only. By arrangements with the Cincinnati Southern Railway Company, intending settlers on the estate of the Board are carried at half rates. The goods also of such persons will be carried at a reduced rate. By arrangement with other railways, the journey from Boston and New York will also be at reduced rates."

In conclusion, Mr. Hughes laughingly exclaimed: "We actually have a lawn-tennis club started already with seven members, and I have with me a sister of a settler who is one of the best lady players in England. We shall challenge the whole State."

THE SOUTH IN 1880.

THE GREAT DRY DOCK IN BALTIMORE.

AMONG the great improvements lately inaugurated in Baltimore is the great dry dock at Locust Point, adjoining Fort McHenry, constructed by J. E. Simpson & Co. This dry dock is constructed under the Simpson patent, which is acknowledged to be the embodiment of all the true principles of mechanical engineering. Its dimensions are: Length from outer gate groove to head of dock, 470 feet; from inner gate groove to head of dock, 450 feet; width on coping at body of dock, 115 feet; width at bottom, 45 feet; width of entrance between piers, 120 feet; width of caisson gate 80 feet; draft of water at ordinary high tide, over three-feet keel blocks, 22 feet. There is an engine-house for pumps of sufficient capacity to discharge all the water from the dock in fifty minutes, if occupied by a large ship, or in little less than an hour if unoccupied; also two piers of 200 feet each at the entrance of the dock; boiler-shop and blacksmith-shop, 200 by 60 feet; machine-shop, 112 by 90 feet; iron foundry, 200 by 60 feet; brass foundry, 100 by 25 feet; joiners' shop and mold loft, 100 by 60 feet; boat shop, 90 by 90 feet; offices and store-rooms, 113 by 40 feet; warehouse for receiving cargoes from disabled vessels, running parallel with the west side of the dock, 500 by 40 feet; retaining walls about a large tract of land reclaimed by filling, and forming a vast yard for building, launching or repairing vessels. Steps of solid Florida pine descend from opposite sides to the depth of more than thirty feet, the last of them being about eight feet apart. This head, or upper section, is probably seventy-five feet in length, the sides east and west deflecting from a straight line so as to conform somewhat to the bows of a vessel. Steps descend from the end also—each one, of course, meeting those on each side at the same grade, and forming, by their junction, an obtuse angle.

A coffer dam at the entrance of the dock keeps the place perfectly dry. At the bottom and at the upper end of the dock is an iron caisson—a hollow vessel shaped like a short, narrow, deep hull of a ship—which is the door or gate to the entrance. This caisson can be filled with water so as to sink it in position after a ship is floated into the dock. Once there, the water is pumped out of the dock, and the caisson, effectually barring the entrance, keeps the place dry. Here a ship can be brought at any state of the tide; indeed, the tide variation at Baltimore is only eighteen inches, while at ports north and south the variation is from six to fourteen feet. Here a vessel can discharge cargo, if necessary, into a warehouse separated by a pier of 40 feet in width from the dock in which repairs are going on. Within 200 feet are shops and foundries, affording every facility to insure dispatch and economy.

The Dry Dock Company have reserved a portion of the land deeded to them, on which they purpose having erected fifty or sixty dwelling-houses for the accommodation of employés of the works, as it is altogether probable that vessels putting in for repairs will be worked on day and night while in the dock.

The dry dock will confer advantages upon Baltimore and her commerce which it is almost impossible to over-estimate, and which will equal in importance the benefits bestowed by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad when the comparative magnitude of the two great enterprises is considered. It is an appreciative recognition of the city's commercial importance and prosperity that the parties to whom the inception of this work is due, when looking along the coast for a desirable place, selected Baltimore as the port in which to locate the dry dock as preferable to all others. The great increase in the number of ocean steamers and sailing vessels from all parts of the world made the construction of a work of this character an imperative necessity.

In bringing to such successful issue this vast undertaking, involving the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars, the projectors have done a good work, and rendered a real service to the entire country. It is to Baltimore that the South looks for leadership and aid in sustaining its commercial interests, and the West and Southwest are unmistakably identified with the commercial prosperity of that city.

The contractor, Mr. Simpson, has previously constructed no less than nine improved dry docks in the United States, located as follows: Two at Portland, Me., three at Boston, two in New York, one in Philadelphia, one at Wilmington, Del., and all have received the unqualified approval of the Navy Department and the universal indorsement of underwriters and shipowners.

The lessees of the dock are Malster & Keaney. Mr. Malster is well known as connected with important marine enterprises, and his partner, Mr. Keaney, has an enviable record for business tact and remarkable attainments and ability in marine architecture. The Columbian Iron Works and Dry Dock operated by this firm have now in hand a large number of stationary and marine boilers and engines, besides having the new steam yacht of M. Henri Say nearly ready for launching. They also have a new iron ferryboat for the Broadway and Locust Point Ferry Company, and machinery complete for the same. The Messrs. F. Nickerson & Co.'s (of Boston) fine ship United States is also being supplied with new boilers and generally overhauled, along with the Merchant & Miner's Transportation Company's steamship McClellan. The firm also has on hand a vast amount of miscellaneous work, including the mammoth grain elevator for the Pennsylvania Railroad Company at Harsimus Cove, Jersey City, N. J., the largest elevator in the country.

THE SOUTH AMERICAN WAR.

THE population of the Republic of Chili is estimated at 2,800,000 souls, and the people are largely devoted to agriculture and commerce. The Chilians are a medium-sized race, and, having but little Indian blood in their veins, have maintained Spanish characteristics more than any other people in South America. The Chilians are eminently a white race, blue and brown eyes predominating. They are reserved and dignified in social life, but very hospitable. In no Spanish-American republic are foreigners received with such cordiality, intermarriages between foreigners and Chilian women being very popular.

Chili has 1,000,000 acres under cultivation by irrigation, it being estimated that one-third of the value of the entire farming land of the republic is expended in the enterprise. Wherever irrigation has been introduced the land has increased in value threefold.

The country now makes all its own railroad and mining machinery, and built the locomotives used on the principal railroads of Peru. Chilian wheat ranks A 1 in Europe, owing to the careful selection of seed. There are flour mills all over the country which largely supply South America. There can be no general failure in crops owing to the excellent and extensive system of irrigation.

Chili manufactures nearly all its own woolen goods, and refines the sugar of Peru. Its paper mills and type-foundries supply the general trade of South America.

The City of Valparaiso has about 130,000 population, one-fifth of whom are foreigners, the English, German and French taking precedence in majorities, the Americans, Italians and Spaniards coming in as minorities. It is the most important commercial city of the republic, and has regular lines of steamers, English, French, Belgian, and occasionally Spanish. There are two lines of splendid steamers running along the South American coast, one English and the other Chilian. They are opposition lines, so that the fare from Panama to Valparaiso has been reduced. The city has a large and constantly increasing commerce, although the harbor is very defective. Santiago, 120 miles southeast, and connected by rail, is the capital of the republic. It has a population of 160,000, about 5,000 of whom are foreigners. Santiago is the élite city of Chili. It has many splendid public buildings. The Teatro Municipal is the finest theatre on the American continent, its interior decorations and works having cost over $400,000. Its principal public park is a marvel of beauty.

The latest war news is under date of August 2d, coming from Lima, Peru. It is asserted that the Chilian Congress has recently witnessed some stormy scenes. In order to raise the army to the strength required to attack Lima, a general levy is being made. Opposition is made to this plan, and the Government finds itself compelled to listen to some startling accusations with respect to the war and its probable consequences. Many members urge an immediate peace as the only means of preventing the utter ruin of the Republic. It is natural that complaint should be made. Chili has lived till to-day by hard work. Mining and agriculture have been her mainstay. Now the miners and agriculturists are being taken away to swell the army, diminished productions cause an increase in prices which can be ill borne by the greater part of a population proverbial, even in South America, for its limited individual means of subsistence. The Peruvian leaders are aware of this circumstance, and believe the wiser counsels will prevail of the Chilians who desire work as the basis of progress and not conquest. Such, however, is not the idea of the military party, and, in particular, the men who are in the south of Peru with Baquedano.

The Chilians are gradually extending the operations of their blockading fleet, and it is thought they are determined to starve their enemies out if possible. They are now becoming less anxious to destroy neutral property. The Chilian squadron in front of Callao are believed at present to be preparing a nice little surprise for the citizens of Lima. They intend to send in a steamer with some fifty tons of dynamite and gunpowder on board; and with a time-fuse explode it in such a manner as to destroy all the batteries.

The military situation is almost unchanged. General Baquedano remains in Tacna, in which city and Arica he now has about 17,000 men. The balance of the veteran Chilian army, about 8,000 men, are scattered over the province of Tarapaca, principally in Iquique, and on the coast of Bolivia. The allies now have no force in the south which can cope with them, or even attempt to hold them in check, and consequently they must be considered in full possession of the territory they hold.

The message of President Anibal Pinto to the Chilian Congress, delivered on June 1st, contained some very interesting information as to the finances of that republic, which, despite the war, seem to be in a most favorable condition. "With the war," says the President, "a notable improvement of all trade has developed, thanks to the bountiful crops of the past two years, to the improvement in the price of copper and nitrates, and, more than all, to the beneficial effect of that economy which has been practiced by the Government during the preceding years of commercial distress. Money is more abundant than at the outbreak of the war, the rate of interest has declined, a general advance of values is observed, while activity prevails in all business." The exports for the year amounted to $36,620,226, an increase over the preceding year of $6,892,401. Of agricultural products exported the value was $12,831,570, an increase of $4,138,000; the value of the mineral products was $20,280,528, an increase of $2,754,392. The imports amounted to $22,740,000, a falling off of $2,383,014. These statements do not include the business of Antofagasta. The expenditures for 1879 (not including, however, a large part of the expenses made by the Chilian legation in Europe) were $24,777,200.12, and the revenues, ordinary and extraordinary, amounted to $27,693,087.74. As Peru and Bolivia will have to make peace on terms favorable to the interests of Chili, the Chilian Treasury will profit all the more in the future.

A RAINY DAY IN THE COUNTRY.

WHAT can be more dreary than a rainy day in the country? At home one does not feel it passing—in fact, it is a sort of negative luxury, for with the morning downpour comes the happy thought, "As this is going to be a wet day, I'll do so-and-so," taking up a long-deferred sketch, a piece of work, or book. But in the country! What can one do? We are unhinged. We are at angles. Look out of the window?—that tires pretty soon. Recline on a couch and read?—not when one has a dull book and surrounded by chattering people and howling children. Talk to that pink faced, yellow haired idiot, young Mr. Spoon Jones, whom the men won't have, and whom the womenkind are obliged to be civil to? Play at draughts with a fat dowager, or learn crewel work from a soapish elderly maiden? Our illustration represents a wet day in the Catskills. Everybody is miserable except Mr. Spoon Jones, who for this occasion only is the lion of the party. Mark the young lady who gazes through the window in so melancholy a manner at the downpour. Mark that other young lady endeavoring to read while the two children squabble for a picture-book. Mark the prosy couple already half asleep, dreamily awaiting a move at draughts. Mark the weary face of the tall beauty, and the but little interested visage of the shorter lady, as the tiny toddler demands to be hoisted. Mark the grim look of the elderly maiden as she listens to the various nonsense uttered by the simpering Jones! A wet day in the country! When, oh, when will the stage arrive that bears the gentlemen back from their hunting excursion!

The Women of Lima.

LIMA is called the paradise of women. They are called beautiful, so they are, if you admire black eyes and ebony tresses—not the dreamy black eyes of the harems, nor the sparkling black eyes of the Syrians, nor the liquid black eyes of the Egyptians, but the black eyes that easily reveals the different types of character. Peruvian ladies have character, and are not afraid to show it; yet we hear nothing of equal rights and privileges among them. For them to lay claim to a right is but to possess it, for they can easily win over the priesthood, and thus have the most powerful class of Peru on their side. They are generally occupied, but do not work; they look upon labor as degrading. They rise early, take a cup of tea and go to Mass. Their toilet requires but a few moments. Their walking suits are neat and pretty; in this respect they surpass us. The dress is black and never touches the ground; there is no fussing or fumbling with trains. A white skirt is sometimes seen a little below the dress, with a deep hem and two tucks, and always white and clean. Prunella gaiters are generally worn; and hands are bare; the mantilla is thrown over the head, falling gracefully down almost to the bottom of the skirt.

The subject of dress claims most of their time and attention; their ball dresses and opera and soiree suits are magnificent. Their boots, especially, are beautiful. No people have naturally as small feet as the Peruvians. The Peruvian-made boots are too small for foreigners.

Peruvian ladies are not very intelligent; as soon as they pass beyond the school-girl period they care little for books or literature. Many learn to play the piano when young, but do not care to continue when married. They are excessively courteous in their manners, but we are not to be misled by appearances. Their mode of salutation is more of an embrace than anything else, and they always say: "My house and all that I have is entirely at your disposal, and we are to be as one family." They are always wealthy in imagination—at least they never speak of poverty. They love to smoke. Although handsome when young, they scarcely turn twenty when they begin to fade. One thing always lasts with them, and that is their gait. Their movements are gliding and graceful; the same is true of the men.

A Wealthy City.

FRANKFORT ON THE-MAIN, with a population of about 100,000, is reported to be the richest city of its size in the whole world. It is asserted that there are 200 Frankforters worth from $4,000,000 to $8,000,000 each, and 250 who are worth $1,000,000 and upwards. The city is one of the great banking centres of the globe. Its aggregate banking capital is estimated at $200,000,000—more than one fourth of which the Rothschilds, whose original and parent house is there, own and control.

A Great Transportation Corporation.

THE Danube Steamboat Company is probably the greatest corporation in the world conducting transportation on rivers. At the close of 1879 it had 165 side-wheel steamboats, with an aggregate of 15,910 horse power, eighteen propellers, with 830 horse-power, and twelve other steam craft including a floating elevator, and 720 craft that are towed. A large part of the navigation is by a wire laid in the stream. This company operates on the Danube and its tributaries; the vessels of all competing enterprises number but eighty-nine steamers and 358 tows.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

The Italian Ironclad War Steamers "Palestro" and "Venezia."

This fine vessel, the Venezia, is the pride of the Italian navy. Her armament consists of nine Armstrongs, six of eighteen tons, in the central turret, two of eighteen tons aft, and one of twelve tons at the stern. She carries besides six small bronze cannons and four mitrailleuses. Her armor is seventeen centimetres in thickness, and her sailing powers are fine. She carries 450 men, and can land a hundred at any time without interfering with the handling of the ship. Her engines are of Mazeline's type, and were built at Genoa at the Cantiere della Foce. Although the tendency has been almost exclusively to build iron war vessels, Italy here adheres to the old style. The Venezia and her consort are of wood. The Palestro carries three Armstrongs in her forward battery, one of twenty-five and two of eighteen-tons. In the stern battery she carries four eighteen-ton guns, so that she can fire in all directions. Her armor is twenty-two centimetres in thickness, and is increased so as to protect the steering apparatus, the magazine and the engines. These last were made by Ansaldo, of Sampierdarena and the St. Bartolomew Works near Spezia. Our illustrations of these ironclads are from drawings by the Marquis Centurione.

The War in Afghanistan.

Public attention is still fixed upon the military position of the British Indian forces in Afghanistan, since the alarming news of the defeat of General Burrows on the 27th of July, with very severe loss, by the Herat Afghans under Ayoub Khan, at Khushk-i-Nakhud, half way between Candahar and the Helmund River. A dispatch from St. Petersburg says that the Indian Prince Ramchunder, for some time a resident of that capital, and who is related to the notorious Nana Sahib, has again appeared, as the friend and adviser of Abderrahman Khan, to meet whom he is for the second time on his way to Afghanistan. The suspicions which his former movements in Russian and Afghan Turkestan have created in the minds of those who believe in the latest report of Russian intrigues in Afghanistan will probably only be increased by the latest advices about him. Several attacks have been made upon the city wall of Candahar, but Ayoub Khan has not yet begun actual siege operations. His main body occupies a strong position on some high hills west of Candahar. The ground on its front is much cut by canals, which would render the advance of any considerable force very difficult.

Official Review of the French Fleet.

The manœuvres of the French fleet assembled at Cherbourg began on August 8th. The city was decorated with flags, and the fêtes realized all expectations. President Grévy, on his arrival, was welcomed by Admiral Ribourt, the marine prefect, notwithstanding the incident of the quarrel between the Mayor of Cherbourg and the admiral, who neglected to decorate his fleet on the 14th of July, the national fête day, which was thought to indicate a disposition on his part to withhold the courtesies customarily extended to official visitors. The fleet comprises six of the largest and most powerful of the French ironclads, forming a squadron of evolution under the command of Vice-Admiral Garnault. They are the Colbert, Friedland and Gaulois, constituting the first division of the fleet; and the Saffren, Reconnée and Surveillante, forming the second division. A flying squadron, consisting of the Flore, Amérique, Favorite and Rhône, was also assembled under the command of Rear-Admiral Gilbert, and a submarine or torpedo squadron under the orders of Rear-Admiral Baron Grivel. On the 9th, President Grévy and MM. Gambetta and Leon Say witnessed the launch of the new man-of-war Hugon, and afterwards visited the readstead and squadron. Later the three Presidents, of the Republic, of the Senate and of the Chamber of Deputies, visited the arsenal and the ironclad frigate Colbert, where they were received by the officers commanding the united squadron.

French Fete Day at Pera.

On the first celebration of the new French fête day, July 14th, the Greek colony of Constantinople made a significant demonstration at the quarters of the French Ambassador at Pera. The Greek Church was not large enough to contain the number of colonists who desired to participate in the Te Deum, chanted in honor of the nation popularly regarded as the friend and protector of Greece. M. Tissot, the Ambassador, was serenaded by a large company, and addresses were made full of the warmest gratitude and respect for the republic. There was a considerable amount of decoration, and genuine enthusiasm prevailed throughout the day.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

—THE corn harvest is one of the most bountiful ever known in Switzerland.

—COMPLETE census returns show the population of Wisconsin to be 1,315,484, an increase since 1870 of 206,794.

—THE Republicans of Texas have nominated E. J. Davis for Governor; A. Simmering for Lieutenant-Governor, and a full State ticket.

—THE British Government says that it will call a special session of Parliament to legislate for Ireland should grave disorders arise there.

—IT is believed that the Egyptian cotton crop will be 500,000 cantars (32,500,000 pounds) less than that of 1879, and it will be about fifteen days late.

—THE Woman Suffrage State Committee are canvassing in order to inform the women of this State of their right to vote at the school meetings in October.

—MANY Jesuits, expelled from France, have been most cordially welcomed in Rome. Palaces have been opened for their use by the Roman nobility and clergy.

—POSTAGE is cheapest in England and the United States, and costliest in Russia, Germany, Austria, Spain, Italy, Belgium, Holland and Switzerland, in the order named.

—THIRTY Turkish army officers have deserted and asked the Greek Government for commissions. It is said that whole battalions are ready to desert if their pay is guaranteed.

—TWO THOUSAND one hundred superficial feet, belonging to the Ecclesiastical Commission, in Park Lane, a fashionable district of London, sold lately at the rate of $1,250,000 an acre.

—THE Pope has instructed the Belgian bishops and clergy to improve the standard of their schools and to establish new ones to compete with the Government schools, but not to depart from the limits of the law.

—SINCE the establishment of the Chinese Consulate in Cuba the Government has ordered that henceforth all Chinese in the island shall enjoy the same rights as other individuals belonging to a friendly nation.

—IT is reported that the town of Bagdad, in Mexico, was destroyed by the cyclone of the 12th inst. Gonzalez has an absolute majority for President of Mexico, and the friends of all other candidates except General Cadena have manifested acquiescence.

—A ROYAL decree has been issued in Spain abrogating the decree of May 16th, 1830, and declaring the sons of Alfonso direct heirs to the throne, with the title of Prince of Asturias. The King's daughters will receive the title of Princesses of Asturias, if so decreed.

—THE National Convention of representatives of State Grand Councils of the Masonic Order was held in Detroit last week, twenty-one States being represented. It was resolved to organize a general grand council, and a constitution was adopted for submission to the State Grand Councils.

—THE Government of Costa Rica has formally protested against the validity of the contract for the construction of the Nicaragua Canal as an offense against national dignity. It is believed that the Government of Colombia has addressed an ultimatum to Costa Rica on the question of state boundaries.

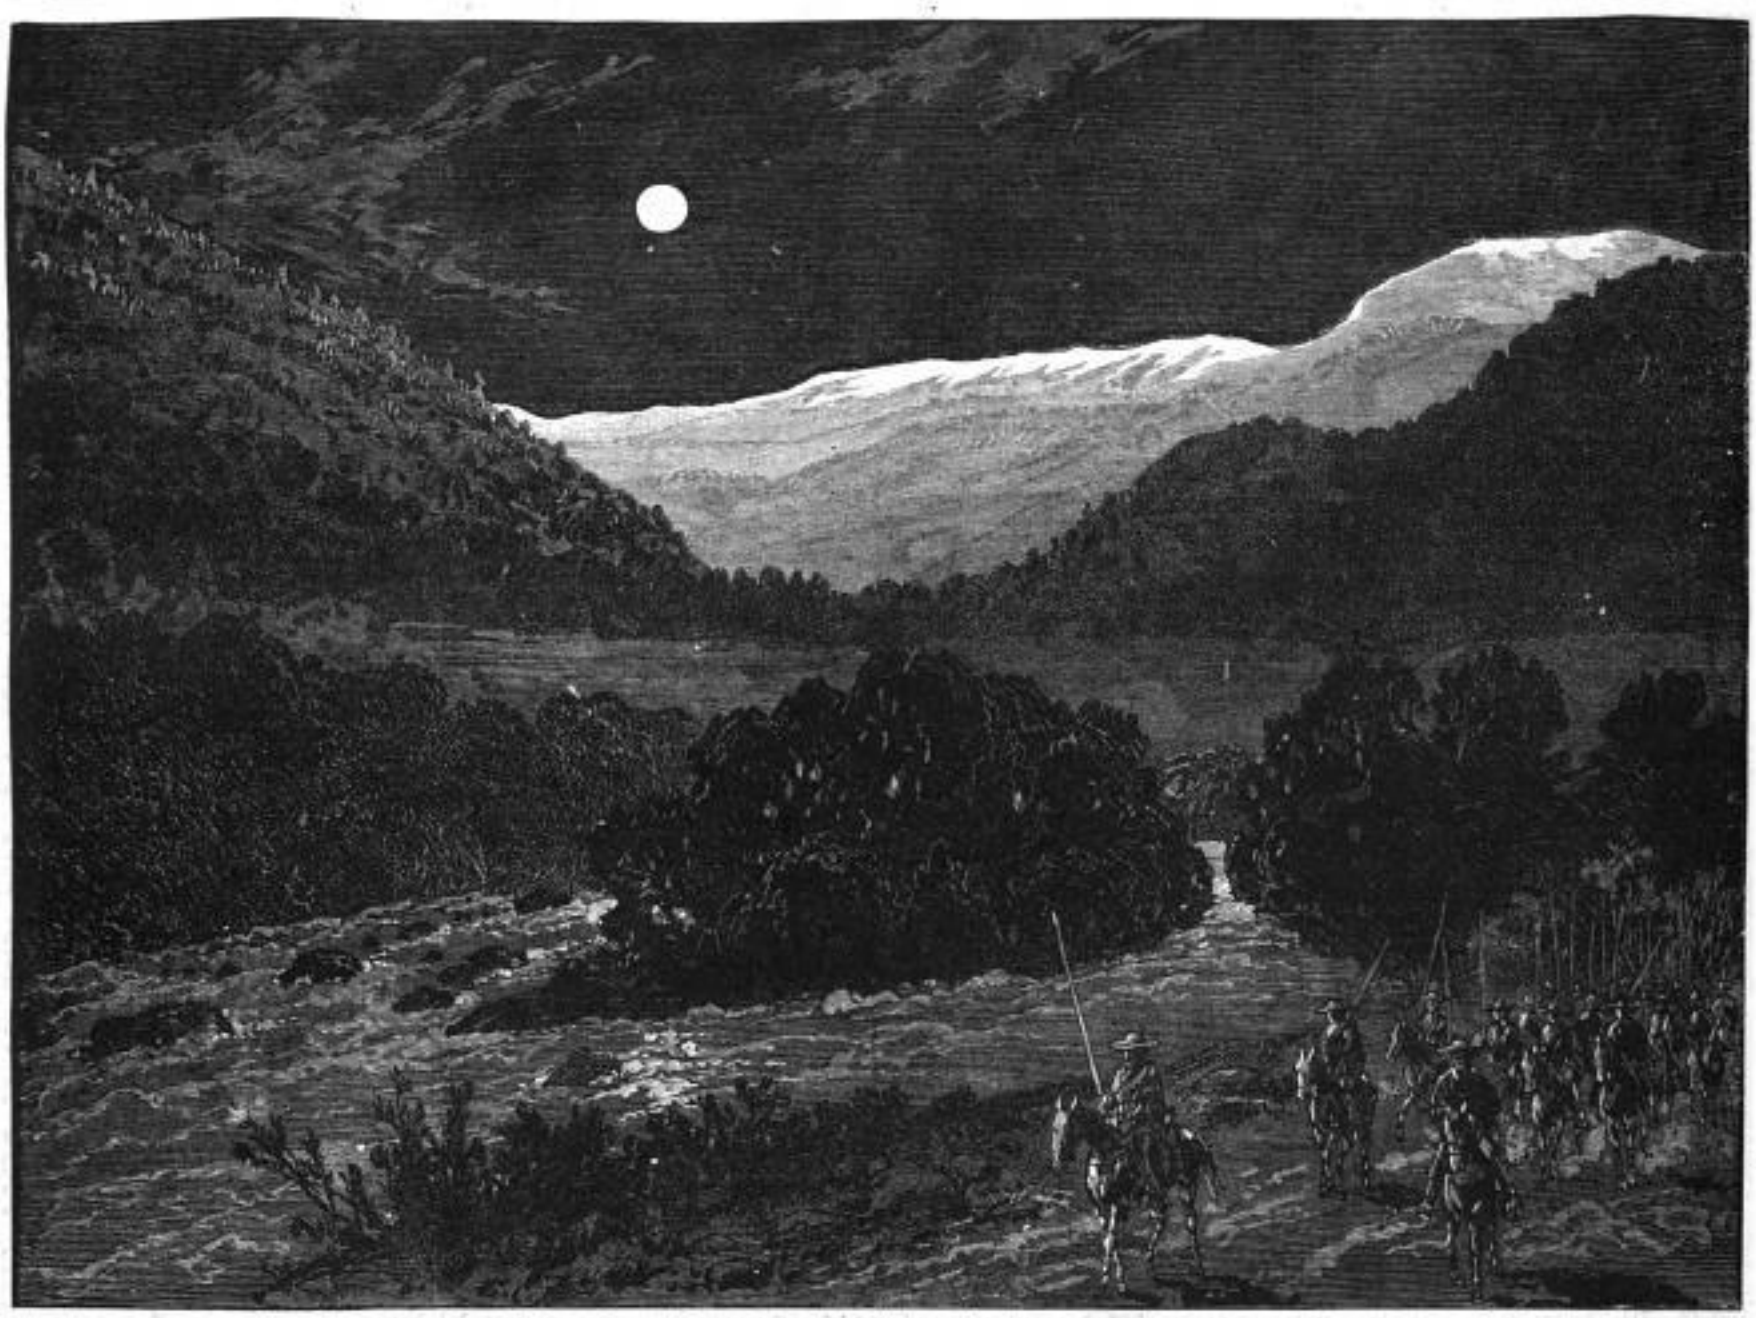
—THE reports in regard to persons under police supervision in Russia have been nearly all handed in to the Government. Pending decision on their cases 115 persons were allowed to return from exile from May to August inclusive, of whom thirty obtained the right to resume their studies in the universities.

—AN arrangement has been entered into which will materially develop direct trade between West Hartlepool, in England, and the United States. It has been decided to run a line of steamers in connection with the Erie and other American railroads, to carry merchandise from Chicago and other Western cities, by way of New York, to all ports in the northeast of England.

—MESSRS. R. M. HUNT, Henry Van Brunt and J. Q. A. Ward, have been appointed a commission to recommend a suitable design for the monument at Yorktown, Va., commemorative of Cornwallis's surrender, and to prepare a sketch of emblems of the alliance between his Most Christian Majesty Louis XVI. and the United States, and also a succinct narrative of the surrender, to be inscribed upon the monument.

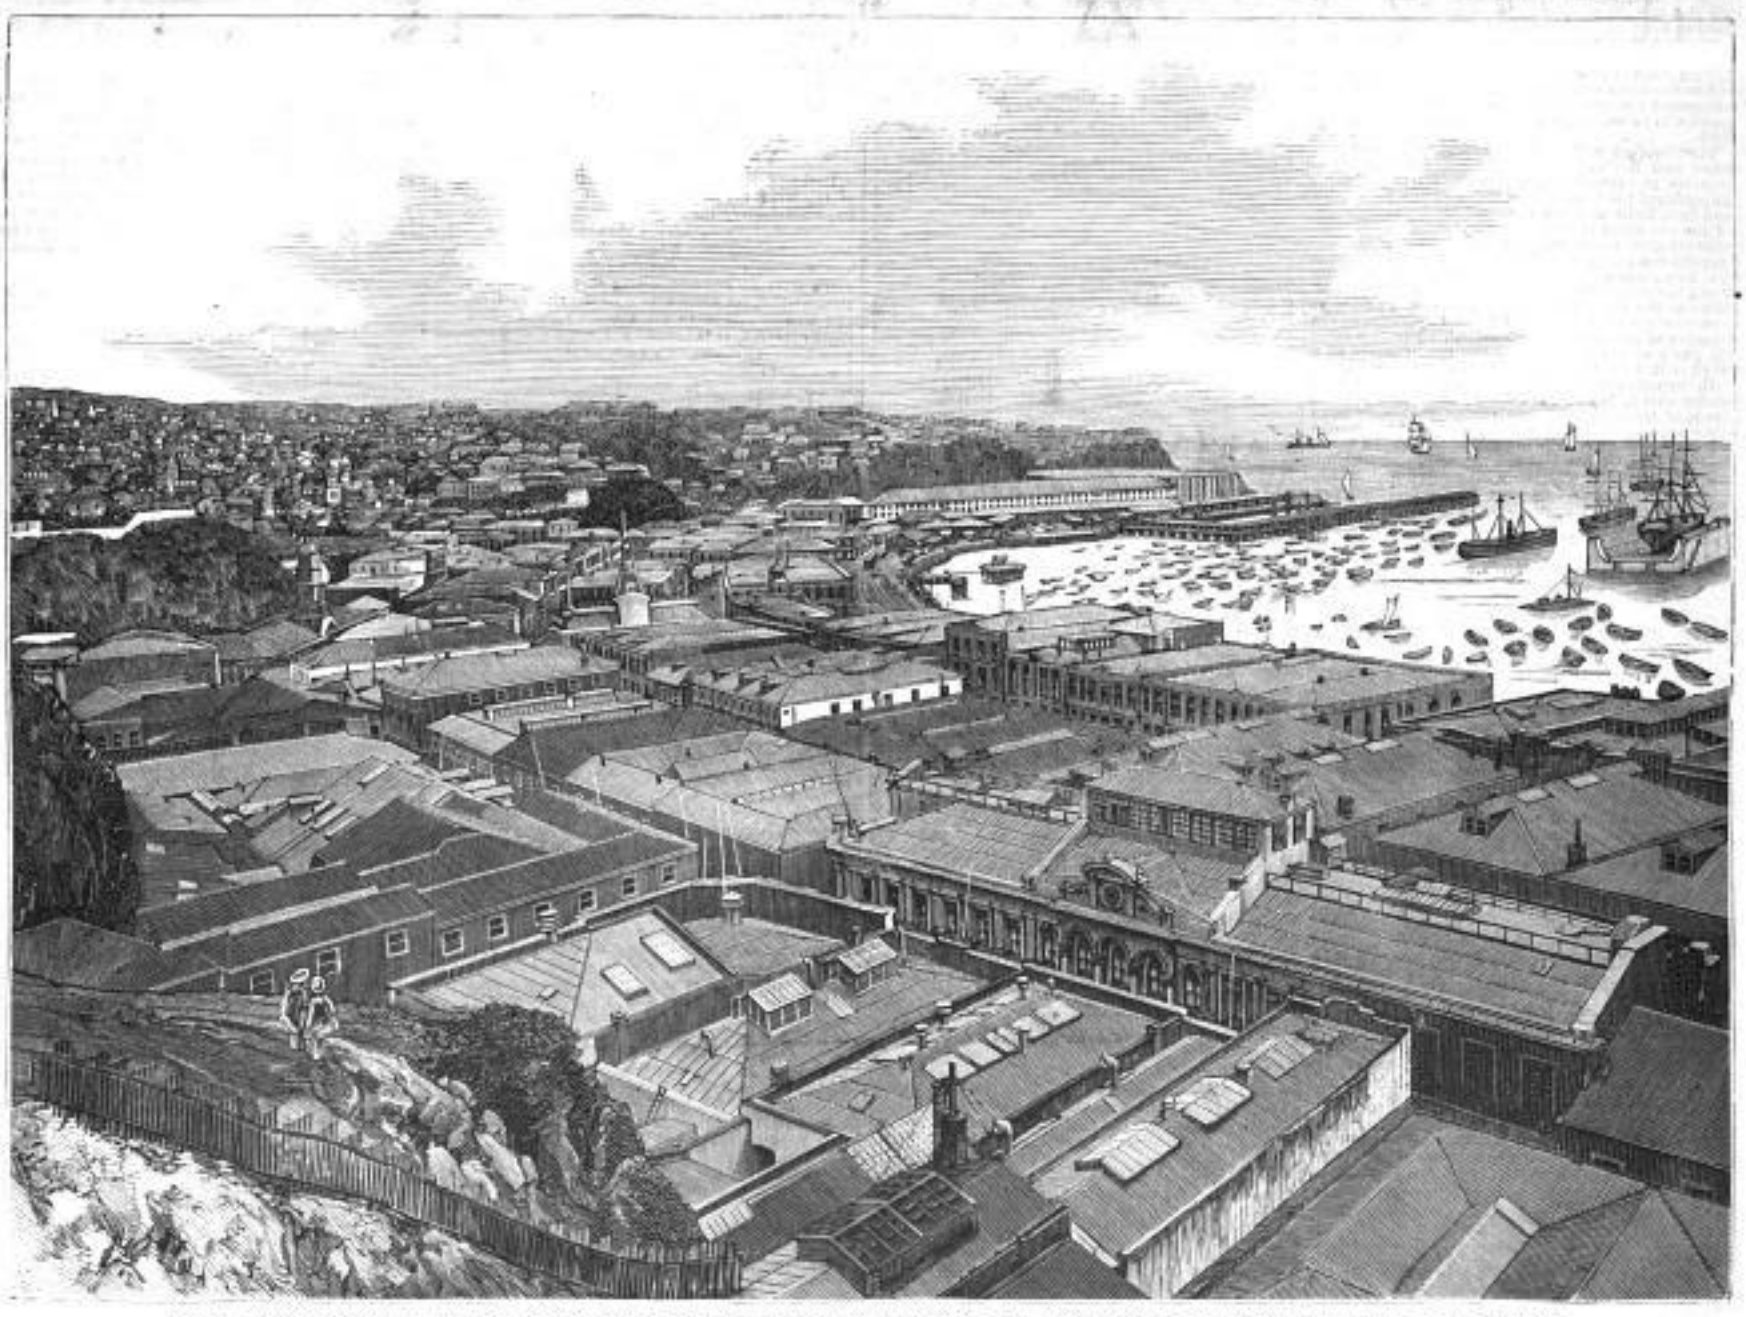
—A LARGE proportion of the sum necessary for defraying the expenses of the André Centennial celebration, which is to take place at Tarrytown, N. Y., on September 23d, has already been raised. A large tent, with a capacity for seating 4,000 persons, has been secured, and arrangements are in progress for feeding the 5,000 persons who are expected to compose the procession and the invited guests on the anniversary occasion.

—A NEW line of railroad to connect with the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad, and to run from Binghamton to Buffalo, is to be constructed. The route has been surveyed, and the road will be completed within nine months from the time of beginning operations. The distance from New York to Buffalo by the new road will be about 350 miles, which is about fifty miles shorter than by the New York Central and thirty miles shorter than by the Erie.



—THERE is much dissatisfaction in Mexico over the suspected interference of the Government in the recent Presidential election, and General Gonzalez, the President elect, has gone west with 15,000 troops. The Government is also organizing guards in the disaffected States. Mr. A. K. Owen, an American engineer, has reported that the Bay of Topolobampo, in the Mexican State of Sinaloa, is available as a harbor. This will be an incalculable advantage to the State.

—NEWS comes from India that the famous car of Juggernaut was not as usual dragged through the streets of Puri on the 9th of July; and it seems that by religious custom or law, if it be not drawn on the 9th day of the car festival, twelve years must elapse before it is again used. The fact of the car not being brought out this time is attributed by a correspondent to what he calls "an act of unpardonable negligence on the part of meddling Government officials," and that is all he has to say about it.



—THE Rev. Dr. William Adams, President of the Union Theological Seminary, is dangerously ill at Orange, N. J. He was taken sick about the middle of June, but the serious nature of his disease did not manifest itself until a month later. During the warm weather he suffered much, but was able to be around his house until about four weeks ago. Since then he has been confined to his house, and on some days he has not been able to leave his bed. All hopes of his recovery have now been abandoned.

—FORCED conscriptions to fill up the armies at Lima and Callao indicate that the war there is entering upon its last stages, and that it cannot be long now before the end is reached. All Peruvians between the ages of sixteen and sixty have to respond. The Chilians will probably meet this with a like measure; and then, after another battle or two, which will send those raw levies to their final account, peace will come from absolute inability to further prosecute it. It has been a miserable war from the commencement, without any adequate justification.

Digitized by Google

THE SOUTH AMERICAN WAR.—CHILIAN CAVALRY CROSSING THE PASS OF USAPALTA, IN THE CORDILLERAS.

CHILI.—THE PORT OF VALPARAISO, SHOWING THE CUSTOM HOUSES, DRY FLOATING DOCK, AND BUSINESS POSITION OF THE CITY.—SEE PAGE 23.

Digitized by Google

AN UNAVOIDABLE FEATURE OF OUR POPULAR SUMMER RESORTS—A RAINY DAY IN THE COUNTRY.—SEE PAGE 23.

Digitized by Google

THE SCHAFFUSKIE LANDS.

BY ANNIE DUFFELL,

AUTHOR OF "IN THE MESHES," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXI.—JACK'S LAST APPEAL.

TO TOBOSKIE, in his state chamber, is shown a visitor. He looks up carelessly, and in the doorway stands Jack. The Russian springs to his feet and, hastening across the room, grasps his friend by the hand. He says no words, for he knows that this man's anguish is too great for words, but he holds his hand in that warm, silent, steady clasp that is more eloquent with sympathy than mere language.

Jack sinks in a chair and for a moment leans his head wearily against the back. Every day, as it drags through in its exhausting torture, leaves its ghastly change in him—Jack, once so ruddily handsome, so gay and good-humored. His hair is now bleached white, his eyes dull and lurid, his face of a dark, purple hue betokening strong drinks; his breath as Toboskie stands beside him is even now heavy with the fumes of liquor. Jack, under this severe trial, is fast degenerating into a wreck, soul and body.

"Have you a glass of wine handy, Toboskie?" he says, finally, and he pants as he speaks, showing how nearly spent is his strength.

"No, Jack, I have not," replies Toboskie, gravely, "and if I had you should not have it; you are drinking altogether too hard!"

Jack raises his trembling hand and tosses the white hair from his forehead.

"Do you wonder that I have turned to drink?" he says, savagely. "I must have it. It is the only thing that keeps me up. I should have been mad before this if it were not for liquor."

Toboskie looks at the wild, bloodshot eyes, the dark crimson face, and thinks that it is a false strength, but says nothing.

Suddenly Jack looks up at his friend.

"Toboskie," he says, and his voice is, oh, so despairing and pain filled, "it is all over; the sentence is to be read to-morrow. We have done everything we can, but there is no doubt that she will be condemned. Toboskie, once again, for the last time, I come to you. You can save her if you will; in the name of friendship and common humanity, in the name of everything a man holds sacred, I beg of you to do it!"

A quiver passes over the cold, strong face of the statesman, and unconsciously his hands clinch. Jack continues:

"Think of the responsibility that rests upon you. You stand between Maize and a fate bitterer than death. Oh, my God! if it were only death, I could be resigned, but to condemn her to the endless torture of a life of exile, to consign her to the shame, the degradation, the weary solitude of the mines! To sink her to the common level of the vilest of the earth—to throw her night and day with thieves and murderers and human brutes—to sacrifice her proud purity, to drag her through the exhausting travail of days and months and years of endless labor—she who has been reared like a sovereign—who has known no touch of want or toil or bitterness, whose every caprice has been granted, whose entire life has been one long, sweet dream of luxuriant idleness! She has scarcely ever lifted a rose-leaf; her hands are like babies'; and yet, oh, my God! to have them seamed and blistered with toil—to fling her out from her kingdom of ease and power to that land of eternal Winter where the unavailing tears of the doomed and helpless for ever flow; oh, have mercy on us!" The great delirious cry breaks from him, and he covers his eyes with his hands.

And where the Russian stands, in his proud manhood, his haughty strength, his indomitable will, he pales to his lips as the fate of the woman of his love is thus portrayed to him.

"I have thought of all that," he says, and his voice is low, and a trifle unnatural.

"Then save her! Have you the heart to doom a girl tenderly nurtured and in the full flush of a glorious womanhood? Have you the courage to doom her to a living death—to an endless torture? Think of the horror, the shame, the travail of such a life, cut off from everything human in existence, sunk lower than the brutes, with nothing but the memories of a vanished past and the dreary prospect of an agonizing future; her beauty at the mercy of the first keeper who should covet its loveliness! Ah, Toboskie! you are not heartless. I see you blanch at that thought. Save my child! For Heaven's sake, save her from such a fate!"

For once the fiery, passionate nature of Toboskie bursts asunder the icy bands that have so long controlled it. It leaps forth all the stronger for its lifelong bondage, and, in a perfect madness of passion and despair, he paces back and forth the chamber, wrought to the verge of madness by Jack's despairing words.

"Do you want to drive me mad?" he cries. "Do you suppose that all this is new to me—that I have not pictured a thousand times her horrible fate? My God! you think you suffer! I tell you you don't, you can't suffer as I do! Night and day, sleeping or waking, her horror and degradation are before me. And I loved her—" he lifts his clinched hands upwards in the madness of his agony. "I loved her—I still love her as never mortal man loved woman before! I would have given her everything—all. I would have lain at her feet; I would do it yet! I would lay aside my wealth, my titles, my power; I would work, toil, dig, slave; I would grovel in the gutter for the rest of my life, but to look in her eyes and know that she was innocent—only to look in her eyes for one minute, for one second, and feel that no guilt stretched a barrier of blood between us. She held my life in the palm of her hand, and she has dashed it to utter ruin! She is not the only one that goes down; I sink with her, for she has killed all life for me!"

Jack is sobered and appalled by this passionate misery of the man whom he has considered ice; for the first time he sees a shadow of that endless woe that has set upon him for all eternity.

"You love her like this," he says, "yet you will not save her!"

"Love her? It is not love; it is worship, madness, intoxication! Yet I know she is a murderess!"

His teeth sink deep in his lips, his hands clinch.

Over Jack's poor face, with its seams and ridges and darkly-purple hue, spreads a grand light; this wild, passionate, Pagan worship, boundless as it is, of the lover, is not equal to that quiet, steady, unwavering love that has surrounded her all her life—that love that never wavers in its allegiance, that clings to her through good and bad repute, that would shield her under the covert of its wing, and which, even in the face of every damning evidence, dares yet hold her innocent.

They stand face to face, these two men—the one in the full glory of a matchless maturity and the noontide of a sovereign power, with a brain as clear and perfect as ever was clothed in mortal form; the other, though only by a few years the senior, stricken and shattered and aged before his time, fast sinking under his blow and his weakness, his brain muddled and disabled with drink, the fears of his wasted and profligate life drawing very near their close. Yet of the two, he, wrecked soul and body as he is, has still that instinct of allegiance, that grand courage, that sublime faith, that carries him unmoved through this trial. It matters not to him that the world holds her guilty, that there is a horrible, appalling evidence of her crime—he believes in her, and that is enough—enough for that humble, spaniel-like love, that grand and perfect faith.

"Then your love is not as mine," he says. "Perfect affection could hold no fear, no doubt, no demon of suspicion. But you have not known Maize as long as I have; her grandeur, her purity, they are all strangers to you; you don't know that it would be impossible for her to commit such a crime. I have never even asked her if she was guilty, and I would take her word beyond all earthly evidence. I know that she is innocent, and it is enough."

Toboskie suddenly stops in his rapid pace and looks at this man; a sudden savage envy of this simple faith, this deathless confidence, seizes upon him, and in his throat breaks a hoarse groan.

"Oh, my God! if I only had this faith, but I have not. I know her guilty, and for all the future I shall bear with me the consciousness that the one woman of my worship is a murderess!"

"Oh, you will not!" There is a strong, brave ring in Jack's voice now, and a light as of prophecy in his eye. "A time will come in the future when Maize shall be purified, when she shall be vindicated before the people in whose sight she is now branded a murderess. She is dragged out a martyr to her fate, but she shall rise yet in triumph and glory before her accusers, for she is innocent. I have had a wild, bad enough life of it, and I've strayed a good ways from the right; I've not always trod in straight paths, be it said to my shame. But there is one thing that has always clung to me—my mother's memory." Across the bitter, savage face of the Russian statesman glances a look of irrepressible reverence at mention of this stately English peeress, long since dead, in whom were combined the tender, Christian requisites of the woman with the stately polish, the proud distinction, the sterling, upright spirit of the last representative of the noblest branch of England's peers. It is from her that Jack has inherited that generous nobility, that proud honor, that still cling to him through all his dissipation. "I have never forgotten her," he says, with that steady, solemn voice, "or the faith she tried to teach me; and that faith held to a God infinite in His power, boundless in His love. I thought nothing of it then, but in the gloom and wretchedness of these miserable days, one verse that she taught me has rung continually in my ears: 'Not a sparrow falls to the ground without the Father's notice.' The Father; that is what comforts me so. In that land of bondage she will be fatherless, friendless; and from my hands, if the worst come to the worst, I yield her up into the hands of my mother's God." As his voice dies away a death like silence pervades the chamber, upon which silence breaks the hard, dry, choking sound of a man's tearless sob, and Toboskie resumes his tramp across the floor. His eyes are dry and haggard, his face appalling in its weary pain, as in this moment he gives vent to his misery without thought of concealment; yet all the same that conviction of Maize's guilt is upon him; he knows that her soul is stained with blood, and that for all the future there is a gulf between them.

"And now, for the last time," resumes Jack, "I ask you if you will interpose your power to save an innocent woman from the direst fate that could come to her? One word from you to the Emperor and royal authority will burst her shackles and set her free—one word; but it will save her life from shipwreck, it will step between her and eternal bondage, it will save her the pangs and agony and degradation of the horrible future. I ask you, in the name of God! will you speak it?"

Toboskie pauses, and over his ashen face comes the evidence of a fierce conflict, the pain of which has never before touched him. At last he speaks:

"I cannot do it. I believe her guilty; therefore I am powerless to save her."

His voice is steady as he deliberately gives over to her living death this woman, but the agony of this hour remains with him through many a weary day of the future.

Jack's lips close tight, but that old English pride rises warm in his breast to sustain him in this moment. He bows low, and, without breaking the silence that has come between them, goes out of the chamber.

CHAPTER XXXII.—A VISIT FROM THE ABBOT.

MAIZE stands at her cell-window, looking dreamily out at the heavens. It is all that she can see—that little bit of azure sky upon which is outlined the square, sacred beams of a cross, where some holy edifice rears its symbol, all that is visible to her of the sanctuary it adorns.

It has a peculiar look, as if emblazoned upon the heavens, and absorbs much of her attention. In the dim, gray light of the early dawn, in the rich glory of the noontide sun, in the cold, clear radiance of the moon, through all hours and all circumstances, she sees this holy emblem—the cross whereby she must suffer and be saved. All through the weary hours of this day, which she knows is being passed by her judges in the decision of her fate, while she knows her destiny hangs balanced by a thread; all those lengthy, maddening hours she has stood here by the window, with her tired eyes fastened upon the sky and the cross. Her lips are closed tightly, her teeth set, her face pallid with long trial; but on it sets a grandeur that it has never known in the days of her triumph—the majesty of suffering, the sublimity of martyrdom—and that still fixed look of a proud pain and a haughty endurance.

And as she stands thus at her window, she hears the key turn in the lock, and the gruff voice of her jailer says:

"A visitor, miladie."

She turns quickly. She expects to see Jack, though he has but left her—as he is the only visitor allowed her, or the only one she desires to see: but, instead, in the doorway she sees a dark, majestic figure, and a strong, calm face, above which a few gray hairs, escaped from the cowl, gleam whitely in the fugitive sun. He stands like Guido's painting of St. Stephen, his black robes falling around his majestic figure and trailing upon the prison floor; in his stern, quiet face all the grandeur, the immolation, the rigid spiritualism that mark his hidden life, while his dark, eloquent eyes are fastened in pity upon the woman before him.

It is the Abbot of St. Michael, tempted, through his boundless sorrow for her fate, to break the solitude of years and to mingle once again in the haunts of men. From his monastery on the mountain-top he has come to the dungeon, if possible, to bring comfort to this comfortless soul.

"Daughter, I hope I do not intrude?"

Ah! she knows him now. Those clear, rich tones bring back to her memories of the past. She stands again by Toboskie's side in the chapel of the monastery, in the soft, sacred gloom, listening to that wondrous singing. Again she hears those rich and splendid sounds—the full, resonant, triumphant shouts of victory. It rings in her ears, it fills the space of her prison-cell, it shuts out everything save that motionless, stately figure in the door. And now the air changes, as when first she heard it—it softens into a wail, a wail of many voices; it tells of that blood-purchased victory; it holds a piteous cry of the wounded soul weary with its struggle and its pain. Somehow, it reminds her strongly of her own crushed and darkened life. And suddenly into her weary eyes, dulled by her long imprisonment, rushes a flood of tears—not those that refresh and strengthen the soul, but bitter, scathing tears that scald the cheek and the heart as they fall—that tell of a hopeless, despairing misery, and a soul wellnigh exhausted by its travail. All the pain of the past; all the long, agonizing torture of shame and suspense; all the weary days spent before the public, while they clamored for her blood and gloated with hot and lurid eyes over her loveliness; and she felt that she must shriek aloud in her torture—all the many sleepless nights when her shame and degradation stood a phantom between her and slumber; all her ruined, slaughtered womanhood, every cross and burden in her wretched life rise up in this moment and confront her as monuments of injustice, and those great, dry, suffocating sobs shake her form.

The abbot turns with a commanding dignity to the jailer, who lingers, curious to see the interview with the priest and the angel-faced murderess.

"Go your way and leave us alone." His voice is so stern that the guard, curious as he is, dares not disobey, but, closing the door, returns to his duties.

And still that flood of bitter tears rolls down the cheek of the persecuted woman, and the abbot stands silent, touched with a pity too great for words.

He recalls the time when last he saw this girl—she had brought her sweeping robes, her divine loveliness in the midst of the monastic abode to dazzle the meek, tired eyes of the monks, and arouse passions of a bygone life. She stood in the height of her sovereignty by the side of a man in whose eyes he could see a love endless as death. By what miserable metamorphosis does he see her here shorn of her proud purple of aristocracy languishing in the dungeon cell, crushed with shame in her haughty womanhood?

"Daughter, if my presence is painful to you I will not remain." His gentle, mellow voice comes to her anguish the bitterness and rouses her old strength.

"You are very welcome, father, and I thank you for your kindness in thinking of me. Very few of my friends upon whom I have a stronger claim than upon you have been so faithful." Her voice is low but steady. "I must beg your indulgence for my foolish weakness, but I have borne a great deal in the past, and the sight of you roused memories of a time that can never return."

"That man must be worse than a brute who would deem apology necessary for a grief like yours." The abbot's voice rings with an indignation scarcely priestly. "I should have visited you sooner, but it was not until yesterday that I heard of your misfortune. Our lay brother was down at the city and brought back the news."

Maize suddenly raises her eyes and flashed upon the pitying face of the monk the full fire of a searching, scrutinizing glance. He returns her gaze calmly, steadily, and at last she draws a long, gasping breath, in itself almost a sob, while her hands clasp; in the dark, gray depths of her companion's eyes she sees no shadow of that baleful suspicion that haunts her life—nothing but a sweet, great faith.

"No," he says, quietly, and divining her thoughts, "I do not believe you guilty. When I heard your story I knew there was some great crime, some wonderful evidence of your guilt; yet, despite all, I know you were innocent. I had summed up your character in our first meeting, and it is seldom that I err in reading human nature."

"Oh, thank God—thank God!" The cry bursts from her almost unconsciously. This infinite faith is so new, so sweet.

"And now, can you give me any enlightenment in this miserable affair?"

Suddenly into the glorious eyes of the girl comes a shrinking, piteous light.

"None, father, whatever," she says, almost in a whisper.

Again the abbot reads aright that appealing light in her glance.

"I believe you," he says, quietly; and somehow his voice strengthens her. "You need have no fear that I will harbor suspicion against you, for that I will never do."

Again that flood of weary tears wells to her eyes; she has borne the suspicion and injury of the past without faltering, but this trust and kindness are so new that they shatter that armor of icy, scornful, bitter pride in which she has incased herself.

"Father," she says, suddenly, "I will tell you the history of that night; it has never before passed my lips, nor will it ever again. But I know it will be safe with you, as I speak to you in your holy calling; therefore, however strongly you may be inclined, you will not have the right to betray a confidence reposed in you in your sacred office as mediator between God and man."

The abbot bows gravely, and, handing her a chair, also seats himself.

"I am ready, daughter, to hear anything you will confide to me."

His voice is that rich, mellow cadence that she never can quite forget.

She commences her history. She goes far back to her first knowledge of Gypsy's weakness; then she tells him of the finding of the note and her journey to Count Lagors's castle. In conclusion she says:

"I had a stormy interview with him, but when I left him he was alive and apparently well. The murder is as great a mystery to me as to you. Father, before God! this is all I know of the horrible affair!"

The abbot is pacing back and forth the narrow cell. He is intensely agitated, and his face is dark and stern in a terrible wrath. Finally he pauses in front of the window, and lifts his convulsed face to that small blotch of sky.

"Oh, my God! for what are women given us? To be a curse and a darkness on our lives for ever!" The bitter, pain-filled cry fills the cell, and shows that in the soul of this man has deeply sunk the iron of suffering. At last he turns to the prisoner. "Why have you not made this known?" he says. "It is madness to suffer this injustice. Why did you not tell your counsel that you had gone to save this accursed woman from her weakness and her sin?"

Over the girl's face flits a weary, mirthless smile.

"Who would have believed me?" she says. "I had no evidence to give them that I spoke the truth. They would have pronounced it a fabrication. Besides that," and the bitterness and weariness drop suddenly away from her face, "I would not do it for Jack's sake; it would kill him to know that Gypsy was so weak and false. Jack is more to me than all the world besides, and I am a great deal to him. There is a bond between us stronger than what is usually between father and daughter. For all my life we have been companions. While Gypsy was off at her balls and opera, Jack and I would be home together, or off to the stables. All our lives we have been together, and I love him too well to deal his death-blow. He is steadfast and true to me; I will be as faithful to him."

The abbot stands silent, watching the proud, white majesty of her wondrous face, the steady lustre of her shining eyes, the golden flash of her tawny hair. For one instant the pulse of this man quickens—this man, once of strong passion and the fire and quickness of youth. On his heart for many years has lain the corpse of a dead love and a broken faith. Yet once again his soul is moved within him at the sight of a woman's divine loveliness—that sweet, deadly, intoxicating curse that has been his betrayal. But only for an instant; he raises his eyes and through the iron bars of the deep set window he sees the Cross, and like Constantine the Imperial of old, when he beheld the sacred symbol over the Byzantine city, his strength is renewed, his courage refreshed.

"By this thou shalt conquer!" He seems to see it emblazoned upon those holy beams, the same as the dejected sovereign beheld it in those far-off years. He knows that for him there is nothing but the Cross, that for him all thoughts of passion and earthly indulgences are for ever gone, and back into his heart flits that grand and settled repose and a contentment, heaven-sent, with his lot.

Digitized by Google

"It is best not to do violence with your feelings," he says, "yet it seems but just to yourself and friends that you should proclaim your innocence."

"You forget, father, it would not be proclaiming my innocence, for every one would believe it a story concocted for the occasion; of all who heard me there is but one soul who would believe my words—Jack would know that I spoke the truth; and it would kill him. He would know it was the truth; therefore, I will never tell it. No, father, there is no help or rescue for me."

"But there must be!" And the abbot's voice holds but little of priestly resignation; far as he is removed from earth and its concerns there is something horrible to him—something insupportable—in the downfall of this innocent woman. "I hear that Count Toboskie's influence with the Czar is boundless; will he not—surely he will—interpose this in your behalf?"

Over the proud Grecian face of the girl there spreads a vail of infinite bitterness, and in her glorious eyes shines a wrath almost Pagan in its fierceness.

"Count Toboskie believes me guilty." Her voice is low and clear like the clashing of steel. "My life is shipwrecked, and it is to him that I owe it. He could have influenced the public in my behalf. Don't think that I am complaining. If he stood here now and offered me my freedom, I would not accept it. I would go out to my living death rather than receive a favor at his hands after his suspicion. To-morrow I will know my fate; if it be death, I will die, but never by the executioner! but," and she lifts her clinched hands to the sky, "if it be exile, if I be condemned to drag my life through the endless torture of such an existence, I swear by that Cross to avenge my slaughtered womanhood! I am innocent, and I will make Count Raoul Toboskie acknowledge it in sackcloth and ashes. I will make him curse the hour he was born. I will ruin all life for him even as he has ruined mine!"

As the wild and passionate words fall upon the hush of the prison-cell a tremor passes over the abbot. This tragedy was forseen by him when first he beheld the girl. And yet he knows that Toboskie loves her—loves her with that boundless and incomputable passion that has brought so much misery to his race. He believes that of the two he suffers the most. The abbot's eyes soften and grow tenderly luminous as he thinks of this cold, polished statesman, under whose icy exterior is a torture more bitter than death, whose life is stricken and laid waste.

Yet he knows that it is worse than madness to plead for him with this girl. Suddenly over him flashes all the holiness and faith of his divine office, and where he stands, by this woman's side, he drops downwards upon his knees, and, in the gloom and shame of the dungeon, there is offered up such a prayer as mortal man scarcely ever uttered. He prays, with his hand touching the hem of her garment and the sunlight falling upon his grand, strong face—prays with all the fiery, passionate eloquence of his soul for these two fated beings. He beseeches God, as though for his own salvation, to direct the paths of this world-weary man, stricken with his intolerable anguish. And as she listens, Maize, standing straight and motionless in her strong, proud bitterness—Maize smiles as he prays for this man, her enemy and destroyer. But when, in his tender, beautiful language, whose pathos bears a memory of the rack and pain and trial of his own hidden life—when in sweet, strong, holy words he beseeches Mary, for the sake of her own pure womanhood, to watch over this stricken, injured woman—this child, motherless and friendless, who goes out to a bondage of woe, her eyes soften, her mouth, set hard and defiant, quivers piteously, and her soul, given over to its evil, yearns vaguely for a purity like this man's. And when he leaves her—not till hours later, and he has striven to administer all the solace of his religion—a darkness falls upon her that she thinks will never again be lifted.

(To be continued.)

THE STEAMSHIP "NEWPORT."

THE latest triumph of American ship-building is the Newport, just completed at the works of John Roach & Son, Chester, Pa., for James E. Ward & Co's. New York and Havana line. In point of naval architecture the Newport is said to be the most complete vessel ever launched at an American shipyard. She is 368 feet in length, 38½ feet beam, and 23½ feet from the spar deck to the keelson, which leaves a height of 8½ feet between the cabin floor and ceiling. The hull is built of the best plate iron (the largest plate being 12 feet by 6½ feet), triple riveted, and the angle irons being unusually heavy. The planing is of five-eighths iron, with the exception of the garboard and deck strakes, which are of seven-eighths iron. She has two iron decks and six water-tight transverse bulkheads. The shaft alley is inclosed by two longitudinal bulkheads, which prevent the entrance of water into the engine or boiler-rooms in case of accident to the after part of the vessel.

Seated at dinner in her saloon, lounging in the smoking-room, or chatting in the social hall, one may easily forget that he is at sea. The clean sweep of the upper or promenade deck, from one end to other, is very fine, and gives a promenade of 320 feet straight ahead. The saloon, which stretches from side to side of the ship, affords ample room for three tables placed longitudinally, and providing comfortable sittings for all the cabin passengers she can carry, as well as the principal officers. The saloon is lighted in daytime by a dome skylight, stained glass windows on both sides and three stained skylights. The finish of the saloon is artistic in the highest degree, being a combination of the Queen Anne and Eastlake styles. Each end of the saloon presents a blaze of mirrors. The joiner-work, by William Rowland & Co., of New York City, is finished mahogany, amaranth, maple, satin-wood, white holly, Hungarian ash and French walnut. The revolving chairs and settees are finished in a similar style, and are richly upholstered in purple velvet, which forms a pleasing contrast to the rich carpets and silk blinds of the side lights. The sky-lights and side-lights diffuse a mellowed light over the whole apartment. Illumination is afforded at night by an array of lamps suspended from the ceiling. The gangway stairs leading to the promenade deck are considered one of the finest pieces of inlaid or marqueterie work ever attempted.

In the grand saloon is one of Steinway's pianos, which will relieve the tedium of even the Newport's short voyages. The decorative upholstery by Wechsler & Abraham, the large drygoods dealers of Brooklyn, who have lately equipped some of the prominent hotels and steamers, has rarely been equaled for its beauty of design and finish. Saloons and staterooms are furnished in silk satin and plush, richly embroidered and in colors blending in strong and harmonious effect. The same firm also supply all the table linen. James M. Shaw & Co., of New York City, have supplied the staterooms and dining hall with the finest kiln-dried crockery, all ornamented with much artistic taste, and so durable that each piece will fracture sooner than show any sign of wear or dimness. William Furier's Sons, also of this city, have completely equipped all parts of the steamer with their lamps, from designs specially made for the Newport, and all in harmony with the general effect of the interiors.

The state-rooms, of which there are thirty-eight—twenty on the saloon deck and eighteen on the promenade deck—with accommodations for eighty-one first-class passengers, surpass anything ever built in any American vessel in light, ventilation and other comfort. They are finished much in the same style as the saloon. The ladies' saloon, the ladies' toilet-room, and the gentlemen's smoking-room are superb specimens of workmanship. The smoking-room is oval in shape, twenty-four feet in length, is lighted from a dome skylight and is furnished with five card-tables.

The steerage, fitted up for the accommodation of thirty passengers of that class, is a little world of luxury and cleanliness to those who have been accustomed to travel in that way.

Among other new appliances in modern steamship building are novel provisions for extinguishing fire. Steam fire-annihilators are connected with every department of the vessel. The life-boats, life-rafts, life-buoys and life-preservers are sufficient for any emergency, and in the extinguishing of fire and lowering of boats every man has his duty and every officer his particular command.

The principal officers of the vessel are: Commodore, J. P. Sundberg, commanding; Chief-engineer, Garret Van Ideratine; Purser, S. V. Bennis; Steward, John B. Perezeni; First Mate, G. B. Ilzon; Second Mate, Edward Larcen; Assistant Engineers, William McCracken and George Luther.

ICE-WATER ON WHEELS.

THE Business Men's Moderation Society's traveling ice-water fountain made its trial trip on August 18th, through some of the lowest quarters on the east side of the city, and, in the opinion of those who accompanied it, the experiment was a complete success. The truck was to have started from Earle's Hotel promptly at one o'clock, but there were unavoidable delays, and the start was not made until about two o'clock. Shortly before that hour the truck bearing the fountain was driven up to the corner of Centre and Canal Streets, and throngs surrounded the strange-looking wagon and tank. An ice wagon soon arrived and was backed up close to the portable fountain, and while several men were getting out large cakes of ice and washing them at the hydrant, others attached a hose and began filling the tank. A large double ladder was then brought, and the ice was carried up and deposited in the fountain. Twelve bright tin cups were attached to the self-acting faucets. Meanwhile those in the throng were indulging in good-natured merriment at the expense of the fountain and its projectors. The fountain is a triangular box measuring six feet each way. The three sides are painted respectively red, white and blue, and bear on their surface a fac-simile of the three pledges in use by the Society. Around the base of the triangle on each side are four nickel taps, making twelve in all. When the fountain stopped at the corner of Park Street, it was surrounded in an instant by an eager crowd of street gamins, mixed with a sprinkling of the adult element. The scene became lively and interesting. A large number of boys and girls thronged to the sides of the triangle and clamored for a drink. The water was served out to them in tin mugs attached to the taps by the two policemen on duty. Little boys with light curly hair and blue eyes were there by the side of olive-skinned lads, whose raven locks and handsome features bespoke their Italian origin. A cool draught out of the mugs contented a few, and it was not very long before tiny hands were upheld with earthen pitchers, pots, cans and other receptacles. The policemen satisfied these demands, and were amply repaid for their pains by the grateful smiles of the receivers. The wagon was driven through Bayard, Mulberry, Mott, Roosevelt, Cherry, New Chambers, Catharine and Varick Streets, the trips occupying about one hour and a half each. During the hot season the trips will be made daily between the hours of one and five o'clock, P. M.

LANDING THE OBELISK.

THE work of extricating the obelisk from the hold of the steamer Dunsey is being carried on at Clifton, Staten Island. The steamer was put upon the ways, and thirty-one iron plates were removed from the side, making an aperture twenty feet by nine, through which the huge stone is to be discharged. It is believed that by the time this paper is in the hands of the reader, the obelisk will be ready to be placed on the barge which is to bring it to this city. The actual removal from the steamer will be done by jacking up the stone, floating the barge beneath the stern of the Dunsey, so that it will lie diagonally with the opening, and then rolling the stone upon it.

Lieutenant-Commander Goeringe has decided to erect the obelisk on its old foundation. Underneath it he will put a strong iron case inclosed in lead containing copies of the Bible in thirty different languages, leaving it in place of a Rosetta stone for future generations. Alongside of this case he has determined to place one of the compressed-air jacks, which he considers had the most to do in moving the obelisk. Small models of the obelisk and the machinery used to take it down, as well as models of a few of the important inventions of the age will be added.

The greater part of the foundation-stones are now at the site in Central Park, and it is believed the huge pedestal will reach its destination in a few days. Considerable difficulty has been met in transporting the pedestal, on account of the ruts encountered in the streets and avenues through which it has to be carted. The entire work is necessarily slow.

The Strategical Position of Greece.

A MILITARY correspondent of the St. Petersburger Zeitung describes the points of attack which would probably be selected by the Greek Army in the event of a war with Turkey. One of these is the coast of Epirus, opposite Corfu, which, says the writer, occupies a position with regard to Epirus similar to that occupied by Alsen with regard to Sleswick. Corfu would be an excellent basis of operations for an invading expedition; and this advantage would be greatly increased if a tête de pont were erected opposite the island, at the place where the towers and ruins of Buthreton are situated. There are several harbors in the immediate vicinity, and this part of Albania is better provided with roads than most other districts of the province. The garrison of Corfu has, accordingly, been greatly strengthened of late, especially with artillery, and it is hoped that the British fleet would assist in protecting the landing of the Greek troops. The narrowest part of the strait between Corfu and Albania is only about 2,500 metres. The invading force would, however, have to overcome some formidable natural obstacles. In order to enter the plains of Thessaly, it would have to cross the wooded mountain range of Othrys, whose highest points are from 1,150 to 1,700 metres above the sea level, while the most frequented pass, the Furca, is 830 metres high. There are four or five roads across the Othrys range from the plain of Heliada, the Sparchetos of the ancients, to the north of Thermopylæ. These roads are not fortified by the Turks, the karaulas or guard-house along the frontier being of no military importance. On the southern frontier of Epirus, on the other hand, near Arta and Prevesa, there are wide plains communicating by two or three roads with western Greece; but Prevesa is fortified and the Gulf of Arta is protected by three forts—Georgios, Panokratenas and Punta, which are sixty kilometres from Janina. It is in the mountains surrounding that town, on the roads which lead to the coast opposite Corfu by Philiates and Delvino, that the Greeks would meet with most opposition, as the intervening country is chiefly inhabited by Albanian tribes. Moreover, the invading force would have to operate in two separate corps, as Mount Pindus, 2,000 metres high, would prevent any combined action. There are only a few mule-tracks over this mountain; the chief are the pass of Portis in the south, which leads to the upper Aspropotamos, and that of Metsovon, over which passes the track from Tricala to Janina.

How American Contributions were Distributed in Ireland.

MR. JAMES REDPATH writes: "America has contributed, I believe, $5,000,000 for the relief of Irish distress within the last twelve months. It is true that the larger part of the sum was contributed by Americans of Irish descent, but still it was contributed—even although munificently and nobly abstracted—from the national wealth of the United States.

"This vast amount was sent through ten different channels—1, to the Castle Fund; 2, to the Mansion House Fund; 3, to the Land League Fund; 4, to the Herald Fund; 5, to the Nun of Kenmare Fund; 6, to the Catholic Hierarchy; 7, to the Protestant Hierarchy; 8, to individual Catholic priests; 9, to prominent citizens in different towns by Irish-Americans, who were born in them; and 10, to thousands of families by their exiled members in America. This last channel probably exceeded every other in the volume of its beneficence. Families who had not heard a word from absent members for many years past have been supported by them this Winter.

"Between 1848 and 1864 the Irish in America remitted to their friends in Ireland about $65,000,000 (£13,000,000). This is the statistical statement sanctioned by John Bright. Our taxation has increased since then, but I cannot here obtain the figures. Many farms in the West of Ireland are rented not only on the local rates of value, but on the regular contributions that are made by exiled Irish girls and boys in the United States. I shall prove this startling statement by-and-by."

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

It is Intended to hold an International Congress of Commerce and Industry at Brussels, from September 8th to 11th. M. Antoine Dansaert is to be the president, and the meeting will take place under the patronage of the King of the Belgians.

A Remarkable Instance of telephony is exciting considerable interest throughout South Australia and among the scientific world in particular. By means of an improved telephone the Adelaide Post Office chimes have been clearly heard at Fort Augusta, a distance of 240 miles.

The Council of Public Hygiene of Paris, on the proposition of M. Pasteur, has decided to erect two establishments, one at each end of Paris, intended for the disinfection by steam of all furniture or clothing contaminated by individuals attacked by any contagious diseases.

The Death is Announced of M. Lissajous, the discoverer of the well known Lissajous figures, and author of a number of elegant and valuable scientific memoirs. M. Lissajous, who was Professor of Physics at Toulouse, was one of the founders of the Société Française de Physique.

The Statue of Bernard Palissy, by M. Barrias, acquired by the City of Paris from the Salon of this year, is to be set up in one of the public places of Boulogne-sur-Seine. Two reproductions of this work by M. Barrias himself are to be set up, one at Agen, the other in the Musée de Sèvres.

The American Association for the Advancement of Science will commence its twenty-ninth meeting at Boston, in the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, on August 25th. One of the morning meetings will be held at Cambridge, and the remainder of the day is to be devoted to the Observatory and to Harvard University.

Professor Lewis Swift, of Rochester, N. Y., has just discovered another comet. He was unable to note the direction of the comet's movement before it passed beyond the line of vision. It was, however, in Ursa Major, right ascension, about 11 hours 28 minutes, declination 68 degrees north. The new observatory, which is approaching completion, will furnish the professor with facilities for his researches equal to any in America.

The Committee of Council of the British Medical Association have awarded the gold medal of the Association to William Farr, C.B., M.D., F.R.S., D.C.L., "as an expression of their high appreciation of his long, unwearied and successful labors in behalf of statistical and sanitary science, as a recognition of the light he has thrown upon many physiological and pathological problems, and on account of the extraordinary services his work has rendered to the advancement of the health of the nation." The presentation was made in the Senate House, Cambridge, on Thursday, August 12th.

A Very Curious telephonic experiment has been made in Switzerland on the occasion of the Federal fête of singers. A telephone had been placed in the Zürich Festhalle and two conductors connected with the Bâle telegraph office, where a large audience had congregated. The distance from Bâle to Zürich is about eighty kilometres. The Bâle audience enjoyed the singing about as well as if they had been placed in the upper circle of an ordinary opera house. At the end of the performance they proved their satisfaction by clapping hands, which the telegraphic wires transmitted with perfect fidelity to the Zürich performers.

An Unusual Number of persons have been killed by lightning of late in Great Britain, and the record of deaths at the Risca Mine exceeds any ever before caused by a single explosion of electricity. There were 119 men and boys in the mine when the accident occurred. Most of them were killed only indirectly by the lightning. The fluid in striking the earth penetrated to inflammable gases that occupied a spot far below the surface, and which constituted one of the galleries of the mine. A terrific explosion followed, and every person in the mine was instantly killed. It was at first supposed that a broken lamp had been the cause of the explosion, but this theory, after a thorough investigation, was abandoned, and the explanation given has been accepted as the true one.

PERSONAL GOSSIP.

REV. DR. CHARLES F. DEEMS's illustrated work on "Jesus" has been published in London under the title of "Who was Jesus?"

THE Rev. CYRUS Hamlin, D.D., LL.D., has been elected temporary president of Middlebury (Vt.) College, and has accepted the position.

THE Queen of Italy has made a gift to a Catholic church in Venice of a bronze statue of Augustus Cæsar, an antique of exquisite workmanship.

THE Rev. Orelio Cone, D.D., late Professor of Languages and Literature at Canton New York, has accepted the presidency of Buchtel College, at Akron, Ohio.

A MEXICAN saddle, with silver stirrups and beautiful ornamentations, was among the costly gifts Miss Ord received when she became the wife of General Treviño.

MISS DORÉ FLETCHER, the author of "Kismet," who went from Italy to London to superintend the publication of her new novel, "The Head of Medusa," is said to be again seriously ill.

THE illness of Cardinal Nina, Papal Secretary of State, has appeared again in an aggravated form and turned to typhoid fever. It is hoped, however, the progress of the fever will be arrested.

THE creditors of Archbishop Purcell have called a meeting to prepare a statement of their grievances to send to Rome, with the hope of interesting the Pope in behalf of the diocesan debt of $3,500,000.

THE Rev. Mr. Murray, formerly known as Adirondack Murray, has returned from Europe to New York on business connected with the formation of a company to engage in the transportation of American produce to Europe.

THE report comes from Georgia that Senator B. H. Hill is suffering from a cancerous tumor on his tongue that threatens to terminate his career as a public speaker, if not his life, as there are doubts of a permanent removal of the tumor.

TWO French noblemen, the Comte des Isnard and the Marquis de Girdis, were recently sentenced to ten days' imprisonment at Avignon for threatening a Government official in the execution of his duty during the expulsion of the Jesuits.

CHIEF JUSTICE HIRAM WARNER, a native Vermonter, who has had thirty-five years of public service in Georgia, and received a share of the anti-Colquitt vote in the recent Democratic State Convention, has resigned his position on the bench of that State.

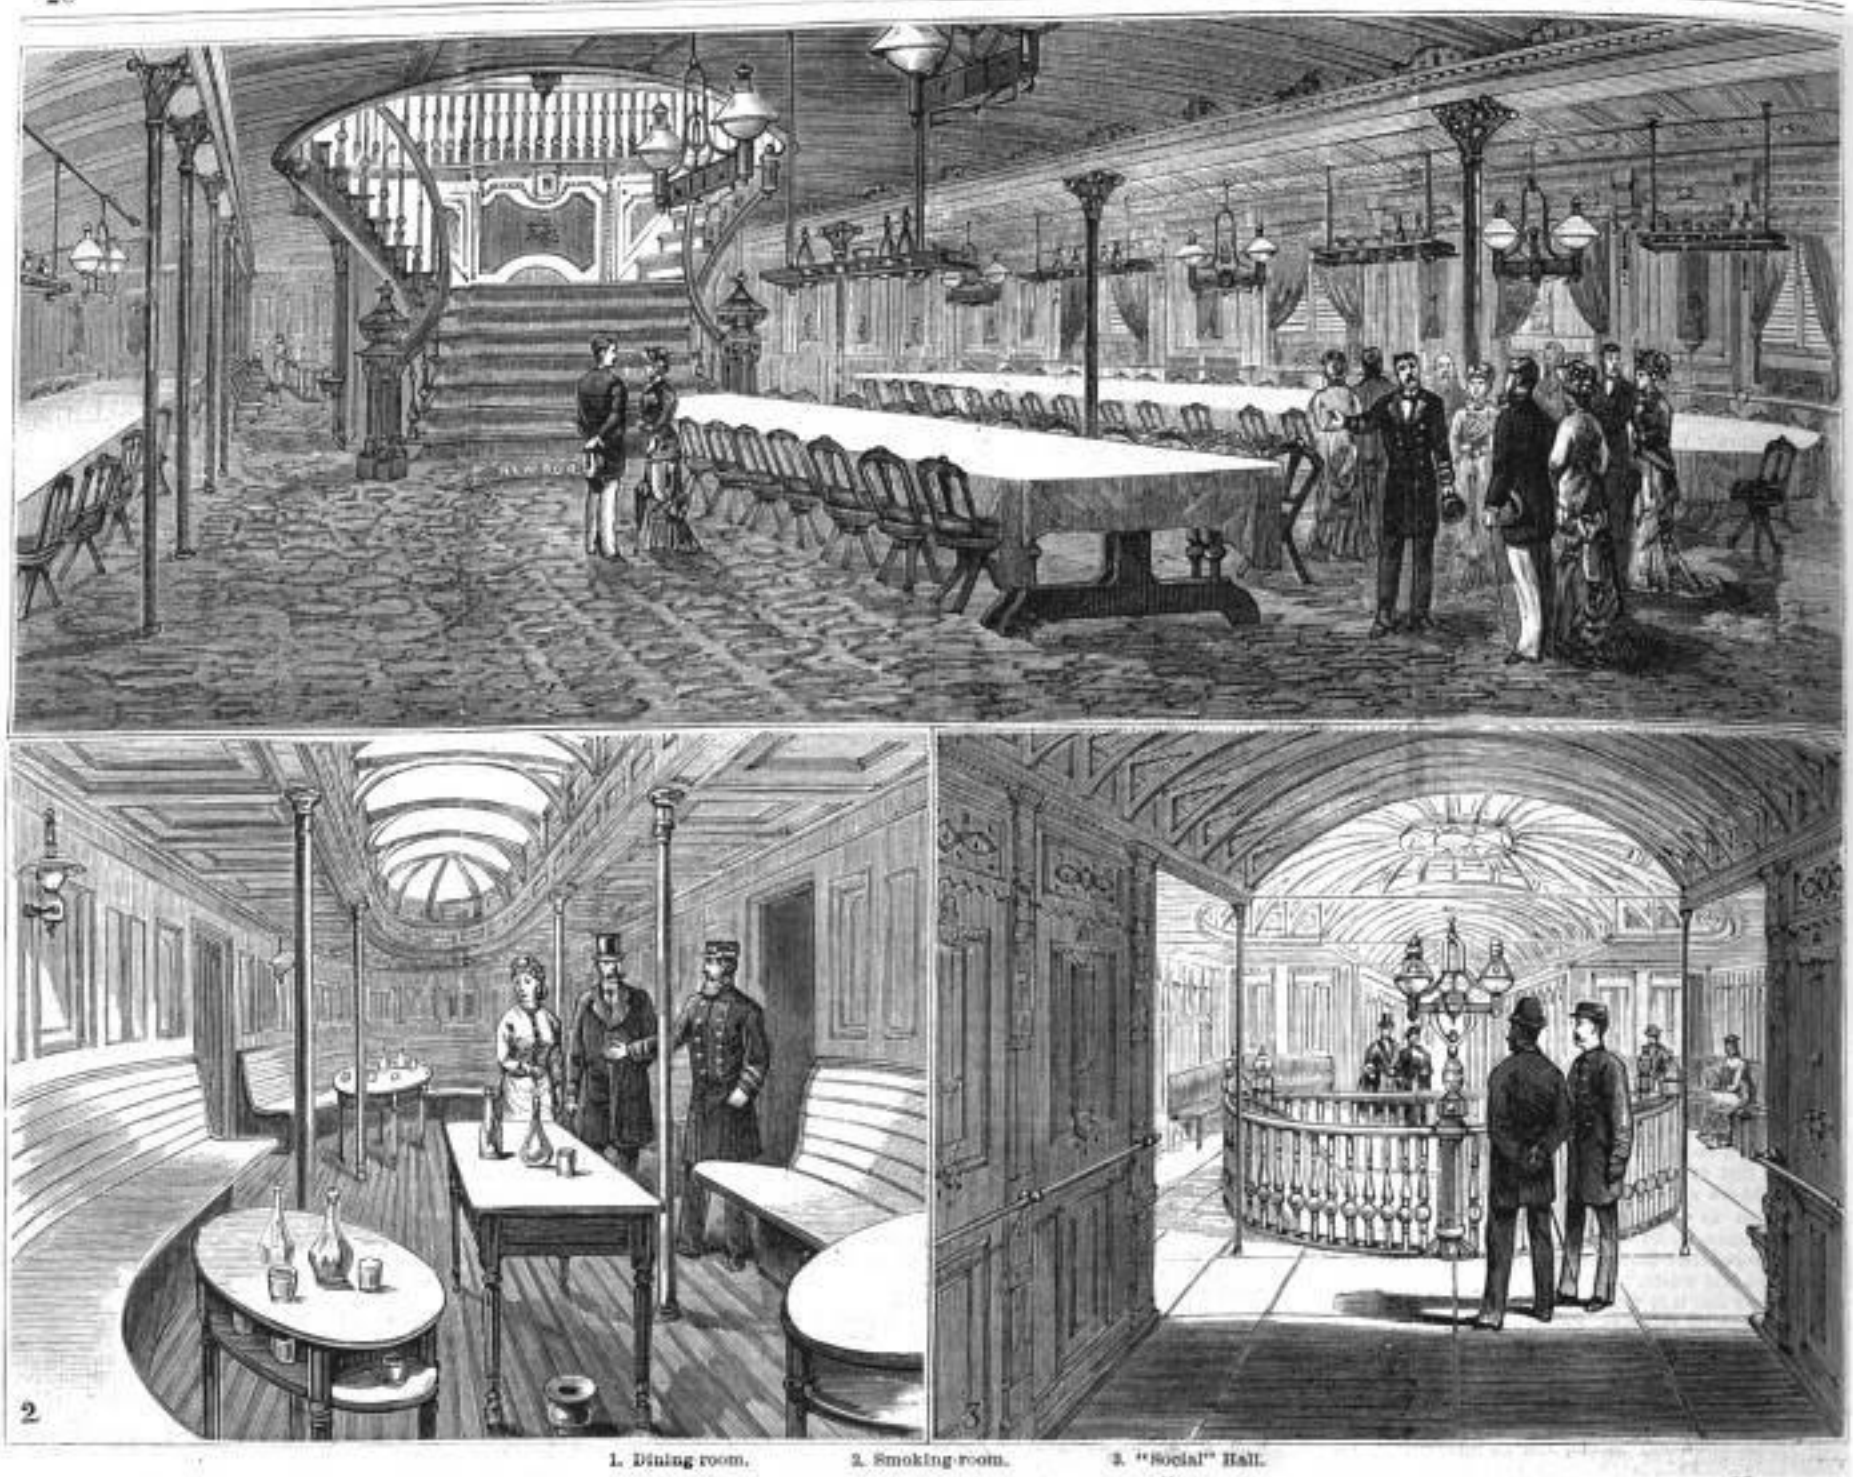
BARON DE MAYR, Austro-Hungarian Minister to this country; MAX OSCEP, French Minister; Carvalho Borges, Brazilian Minister; Aristarchi Bey, Turkish Minister; and Prince Camporeale, Italian Secretary of Legation, are in the Franconia Notch, White Mountains.

MLLE. SARA BERNHARDT has written to the director of the Théatre Français of Paris asking to be allowed to pay, in four annual instalments of 25,000 francs each, the 100,000 francs damages to which she was condemned for violating her engagements with that theatre.

THE aged Lucretia Mott, a woman nobly famous by her service of liberty and philanthropy, is reported in failing health. She is eighty-seven years old, and until recently has been active and well. She is now confined to her room in her son-in-law's house, near Philadelphia, but is still bright and cheerful.

THE Rev. S. F. Smith, who wrote "My Country 'Tis of Thee," is still living in Newton, Mass. He says he wrote the verses on a waste scrap of paper one dismal day in February, 1832, while at Andover Seminary, and "had neither intention nor ambition to create anything that should have a national reputation."

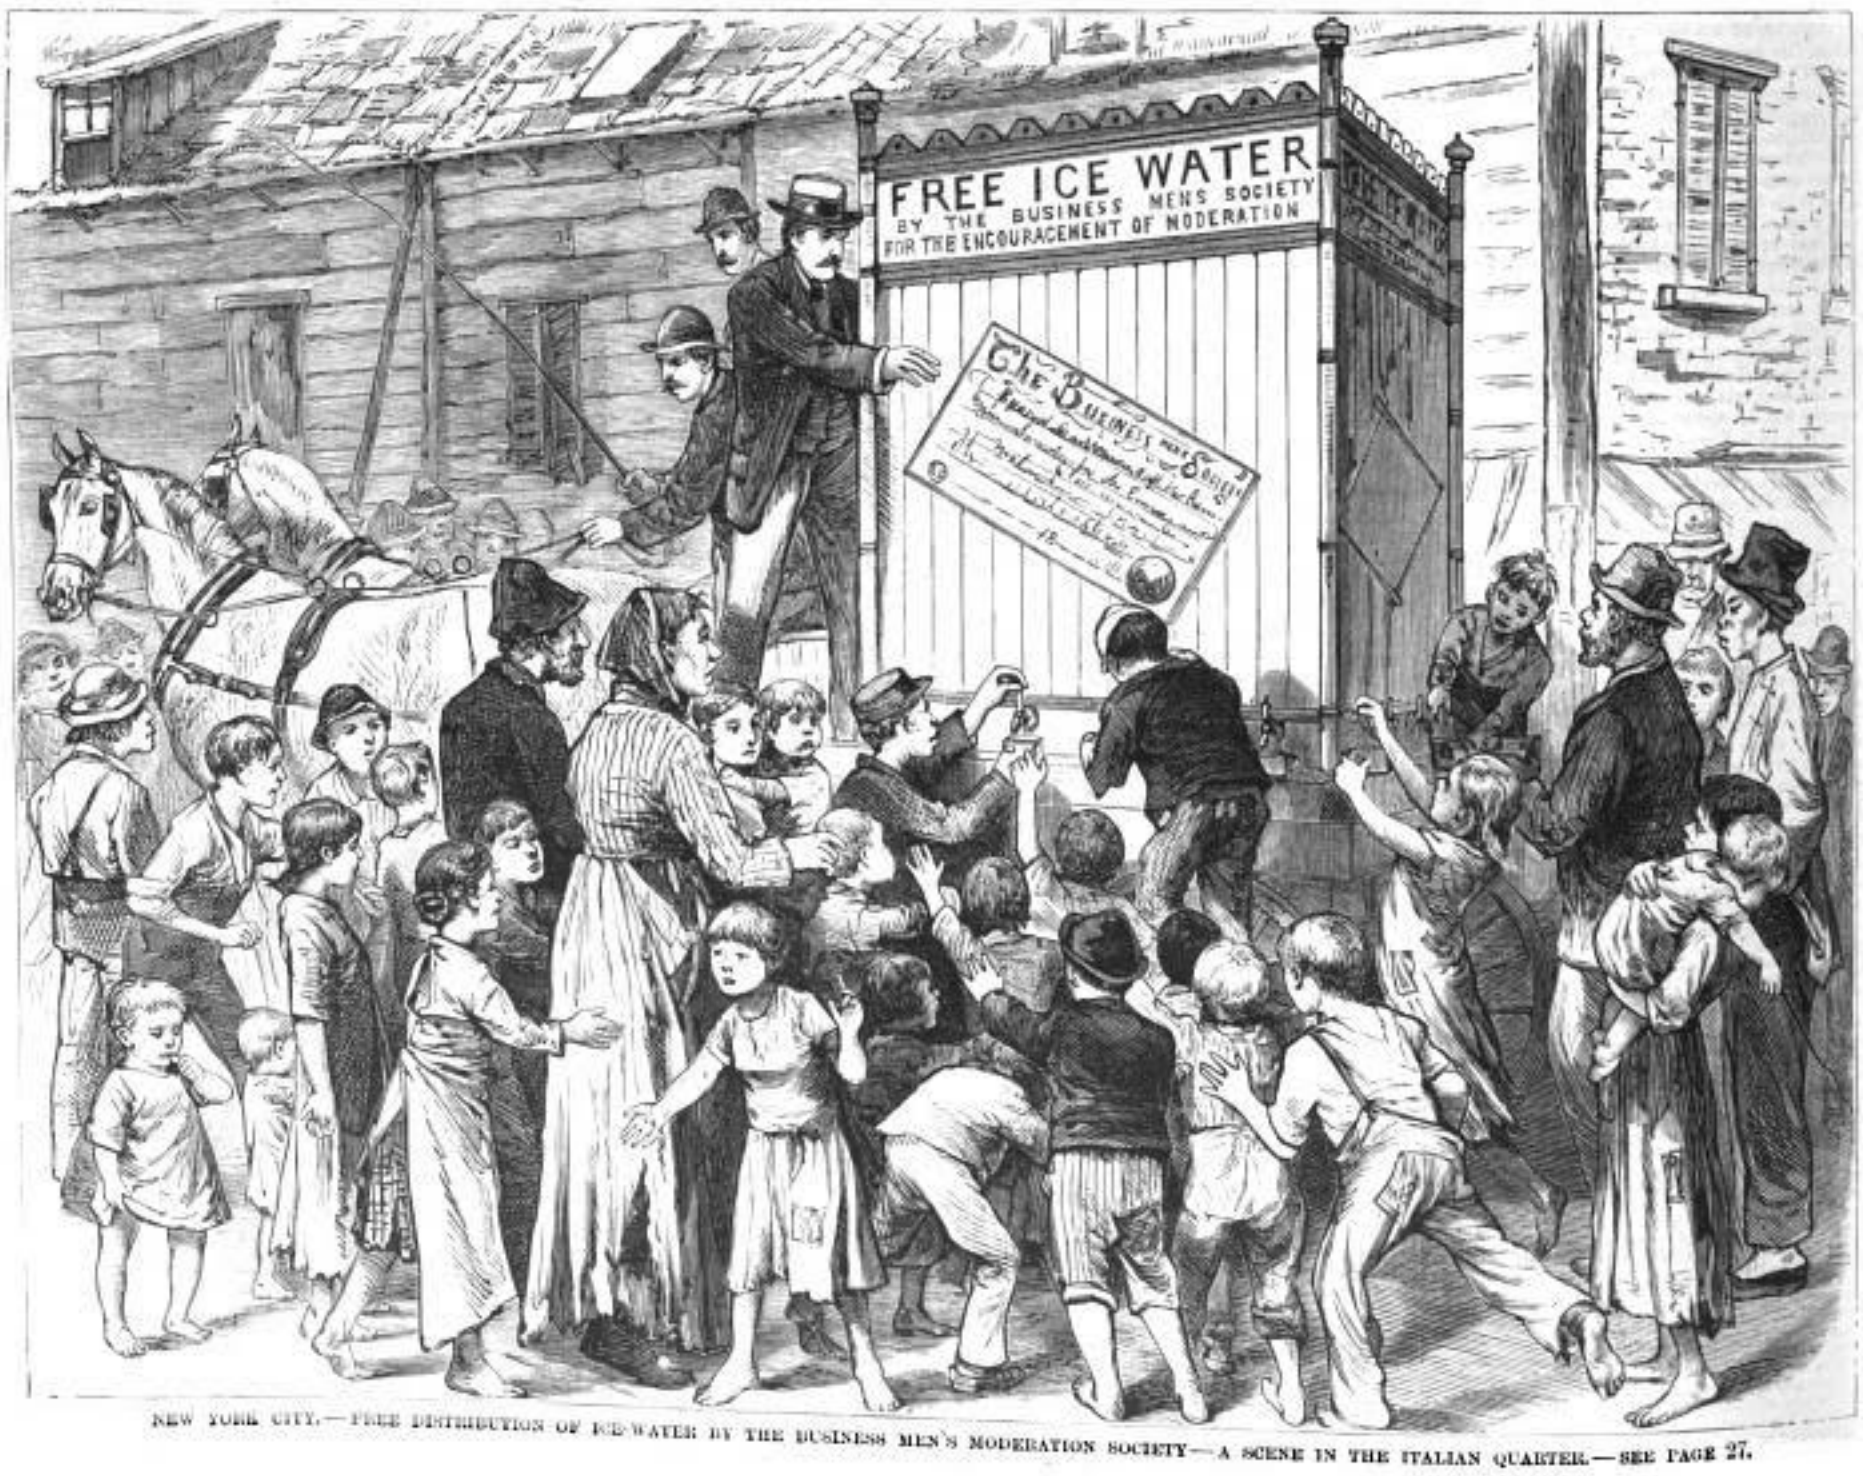
THE yearly incomes of the heads of the Anglican Church are as follows: The Archbishop of Canterbury, $75,000; the Bishop of York, $50,000; the Bishop of London, $50,000; the Bishop of Durham, $40,000; the Bishop of Winchester, $30,000; the Bishop of Ely, $27,500; the Bishop of St. Asaph, $26,000; and the rest not less than $20,000, and not more than $25,000 each. Each bishop has, moreover, a "palace," or official residence.



MRS. J. W. MACKAY, of Consolidated Virginia, recently gave a breakfast to a select number of American friends at her Trouville cottage on the coast of France. The costliness of the table service and decorations reminds one of the Arabian Nights. Not only gold, silver and priceless porcelain were used, but amber, coral and precious stones were pressed into the service. Ices were served on crystal plates inlaid with sweet gems, and wine and liquors sparkled in flasks of amber, or were contained in dagons of gold, cloisonne and enamel.

THE Crown Princess of Prussia (Queen Victoria's eldest daughter) is said to be now the most popular woman in Germany. She would have gained the good will of the Berlin population twenty years ago, had she not held with invincible tenacity to the idea of an English establishment at Potsdam. She wished to retain her servants, and to introduce the English style of household management. But only a few English sailors, with an officer, who form the crew of the miniature man-of-war on the Havel, are left to represent English service.

AMONG recent deaths we note that of Isaac H. Brown, for many years the popular sexton of Grace Church, New York, and manager of fashionable weddings, funerals and receptions, at Beaufort, Conn., August 21st, aged 64; the Hon. Lin Bartholomew, of Schuylkill County, Pa., at Atlantic City, on the 23d; Judge Henry M. Spofford, of Louisiana, the contestant of the seat in the United States Senate occupied by Mr. Kellogg, aged 58; Mrs. Charles Kean, the well-known actress, aged 75; Professor W. B. Hodgson, the eminent Scottish scientist and author, aged 65; W. F. De Haas, the marine artist, of New York, at Fayal, Madeira.



MR. H. HUMPHREY MOORE, the artist upon whose shoulders the glittering mantle of Fortuny has fallen, has achieved signal success in San Francisco, whither, accompanied by his beautiful and accomplished wife, he repaired for a short sojourn at the close of the New York season. His artistic success has been a veritable triumph, while socially, both he and the sefiora—she is a daughter of sunny Spain—has fairly taken society at the Golden Gate by storm. Mr. Moore's atelier has formed a daily rendezvous for those who come unto art for art's sake, "rejecting nothing, selecting nothing and scorning nothing," and the demand for works of his "ans dipped brush" has been such as to detain him in 'Frisco for a longer period than he originally anticipated. At present he is engaged upon a picture for Mrs. George Hearst, entitled "Good News." The subject is of the hour. A lady, in a toilet such as Worth might recognize as one of his chefs-d'œuvre, is waiting for the carriage to be announced that is to bear her to a ball. She reclines in a caressing chair, one arm of dazzling whiteness resting upon a small table. She holds a letter which she reads aloud to her son, who, whilst listening with intense eagerness, nevertheless improves the occasion by buttoning a refractory glove. The apartment is both gorgeous and æsthetic, and filled with those costly knickknacks which tell their own tale of education and refinement. A portrait of Mr. Hearst hangs upon one wall, the likeness being absolutely vivid. This picture will be exhibited. We earnestly trust it may come East.

Digitized by Google

1. Dining-room. 2. Smoking-room. 3. "Social" Hall.

NEW YORK.—THE LATEST ACHIEVEMENT IN AMERICAN STEAMSHIP ARCHITECTURE—THE "NEWPORT," OF THE NEW YORK AND HAVANA LINE.—SEE PAGE 27.

NEW YORK CITY.—FREE DISTRIBUTION OF ICE-WATER BY THE BUSINESS MEN'S MODERATION SOCIETY—A SCENE IN THE ITALIAN QUARTER.—SEE PAGE 27.

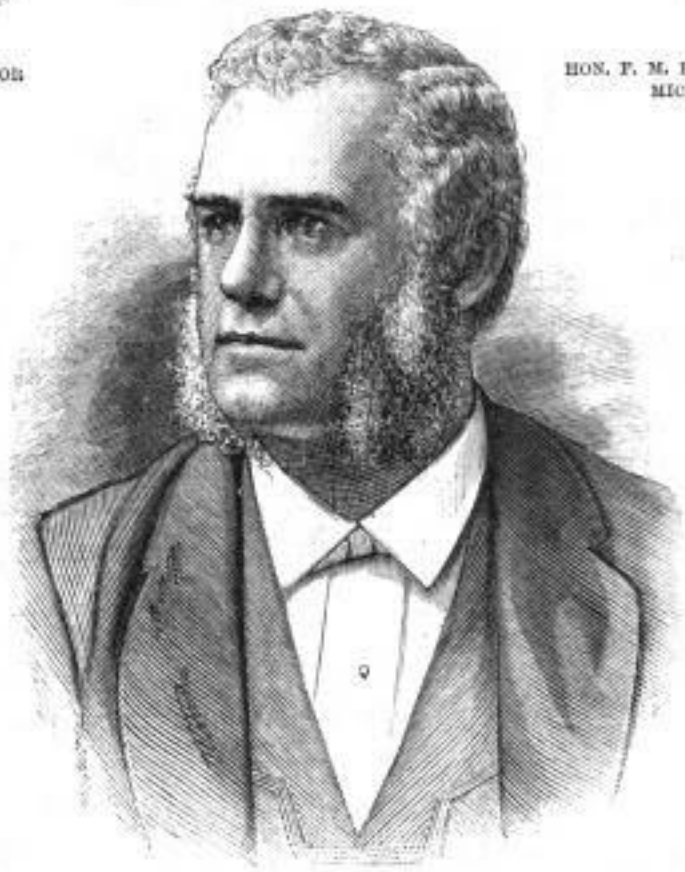
Digitized by Google

HON. JAMES E. ENGLISH, DEMOCRATIC CANDIDATE FOR GOVERNOR OF CONNECTICUT.

HON. JAMES E. ENGLISH,

DEMOCRATIC CANDIDATE FOR GOVERNOR OF CONNECTICUT.

HON. JAMES E. ENGLISH, of New Haven, Conn., was born in that city March 13th, 1812. He comes of a sturdy, long-lived race, and is still in the full vigor of manhood, having at no previous period of his life been more actively and successfully employed in his business operations than during the last two years and a half, or since his retirement from the United States Senate. Governor English's grandfather upon the paternal side was one of twenty-seven prisoners killed by the British troops on the invasion of New Haven by General Tryon in 1779, and all his ancestors were active and earnest patriots during the Revolution. He exhibited marked characteristics from his early boyhood—those of independence, self-reliance and individual energy being altogether remarkable for his years. While at school he evinced a strong natural gift in mechanical and architectural drawing, and drew several plans of buildings for the old master mechanics of the city, to one of whom he apprenticed himself to learn the carpenter and joiner's trade. At the age of twenty-one he started in business for himself, and during the next two or three years erected several handsome buildings, drawing his own plans, purchasing his own materials and personally supervising his own work. But the field was not sufficiently ample, and he engaged in the lumber business. His purchases were so judiciously made and his business so admirably conducted, that he soon commanded an extensive trade, and laid the foundation of the ample fortune he now possesses. His great business sagacity and excellent judgment were speedily recognized by his fellow-townsmen, and for twelve years he was elected a member of the Board of Selectmen, and he also served in the City Board of Common Council, being chosen by the votes of both Whigs and Democrats, his public services being as highly valued by one party as the other. In 1855 he was elected a member of the State Legislature, and during the three years succeeding served as State Senator. In 1859 he was again nominated for State Senator, but declined in consequence of important business which called him to Europe.



In 1861 Mr. English was chosen a Member of Congress, and, being re-elected in 1862, served in that body during the four years of the war. In the Thirty-seventh Congress he served on the Committee on Naval Affairs, rendering valuable help to the Government. Although an earnest Democrat in principle and from conviction, he zealously supported the war measures of the Administration, voting for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and for the National Emancipation Act. He, however, opposed the Legal Tender Bill and the national bank system. He was elected Governor in 1867, and re-elected in 1868. On the death of Senator O. S. Ferry, in 1875, Governor English was appointed to fill the vacancy, and took his seat at the commencement of the second term of the Forty-fourth Congress, filling the position with the same ability that characterized his four years' service in the popular branch of that body.

During the thirty years of Governor English's public services in town, city, State and national councils, he has been largely engaged in promoting the manufacturing interests of the State, there being at one time not less than fifteen manufacturing establishments in which he was interested and to which he was giving more or less time and personal attention. Throughout the war, and ever since, he has been the principal business manager of the New Haven Clock Company, the largest concern of the kind in the world. He is also President of the Goodyear Metallic Rubber Shoe Company, one of the most extensive establishments of the kind in the United States, and is an active director in several other large and flourishing manufacturing companies, all well managed and successfully conducted. His entire wealth has been acquired in prosecuting legitimate business transactions; he never has been a "speculator" in the technical sense of the term. As a man of practical good sense and sound political wisdom, he ranks among the foremost citizens of New England. He is now again the candidate of his party for Governor, and the hope is entertained that his great popularity will carry him once more to the position he has already so creditably filled.

HON. FREDERIC A. POTTS,

REPUBLICAN CANDIDATE FOR GOVERNOR OF NEW JERSEY.

HON. FREDERIC A. POTTS, the Republican nominee for Governor of New Jersey, comes of Revolutionary ancestry, his great grandfather, who was a Quaker, having been a member of the Continental Congress and prominent in patriotic works in the later Colonial period. Later, Mr. Potts's grandfather served in the War of 1812. Mr. Potts was born in April, 1836, at Pottsville, Pa., where his father temporarily resided, and is now, therefore, in the prime of life and the full vigor of his powers. In his early manhood he became identified with the coal and iron house of Audenried & Co., of New York, and finally succeeded to the possession and control of the business, which, under his management, is now the largest individual business of that class in the country. In 1872 Mr. Potts was induced to become the Republican candidate for Congress in the Fourth New Jersey District, the "Gibraltar of the Democracy," and, with one of the most popular leaders of the opposition as his competitor, reduced the ordinary Democratic majority more than one-half. In 1874, at the solicitation of his party in Hunterdon County, where he occupied the ancestral homestead, Mr. Potts consented to run for State Senator, and after a canvass of unexampled excitement was elected by a majority of 298—thus breaking for the first time the long line of Democratic successes. The Democratic majority up to that date had always ranged from 1,400 to 1,900. As a member of the Senate, Mr. Potts was conspicuous for independence, conscientiousness and hostility to cliques and jobbery of every sort. He was Chairman of the Finance Committee, and served on the Committees on Judiciary, Sinking Fund, the Revision of the Constitution, etc., and exercised a large influence on the Legislature of the three years' period during which he served. He was especially earnest in his support of the public school system and of all State institutions designed for the care of the unfortunate and the reclamation and reform of the erring. Among the important measures proposed by him was one looking to the establishment of a State Board for the Equalization of Taxes. In 1878 Mr. Potts again accepted the Republican nomination for Congress in the Fourth District, and so great was his popularity that, whereas Mr. Tilden had two years before received 6,500 majority, Mr. Potts was beaten by only 1,500. For several years past Mr. Potts has acted as Chairman of the Republican State Committee, he was a delegate to the National Republican Convention of 1876, and has in many ways been conspicuous in the party service. In point of practical capacity he ranks among the foremost men of the State, and his exalted and unblemished character, his comprehensive knowledge of affairs and his well-known sympathy with the best forms of public sentiment, commend him with peculiar emphasis to the popular support. He is closely identified with some of the leading mining and other industries of New Jersey, being President of the West End Iron Company, at Musconnetcong, and a director of the Dover Rolling Mill Company; is a director of the First National Bank of Clinton, and also a director of the National Park Bank of New York, and associated with other financial institutions of this city. He has pronounced protective tariff views, favors an honest reform of the civil service, and believes that the financial policy which has brought the country to its present pitch of prosperity should be maintained at every hazard.

HON. FREDERIC A. POTTS, REPUBLICAN CANDIDATE FOR GOVERNOR OF NEW JERSEY.—FROM A PHOTO. BY KUHTZ.

HON. F. M. HOLLOWAY, DEMOCRATIC CANDIDATE FOR GOVERNOR OF MICHIGAN.—FROM A PHOTO. BY CARSON & GRAHAM.

HON. FREDERICK M. HOLLOWAY,

DEMOCRATIC CANDIDATE FOR GOVERNOR OF MICHIGAN.

WE gave last week the portrait of Hon. D. H. Jerome, the Republican candidate for Governor of Michigan. In the present number we give that of Hon. Frederick Madison Holloway, the Democratic candidate for the same office. Mr. Holloway was born in Ontario County, New York, January 18th, 1815, but at the age of nine years removed with his parents to Genesee County, where he acquired a sound common school education, attending the district school in Winter and aiding his father on the farm in the Summer. At the age of nineteen he engaged in teaching, but finding a sedentary employment injurious to his health, he abandoned the occupation in 1833, and removed to Michigan with his father. They settled at first in what was then known as Whiteford, Michigan, but now as Sylvania, Ohio; and Mr. Holloway, soon finding his health restored, commenced work as a carpenter and joiner, which occupation he followed until 1836. In 1838 he removed to Tecumseh, and in 1840 to Jonesville, where he lived for ten years, when he was chosen Register of Deeds of Hillsdale County. In the Spring of 1851 he removed to Hillsdale, and in 1852 purchased the farm which he has ever since worked, though he did not take up his residence on it until some years after the purchase.

As a farmer, Colonel Holloway has a reputation as wide as the State for capacity, judgment, thrift and energy. He has given particular attention to the breeding of fine stock, in which he has been remarkably successful. In 1853 he was chosen Secretary of the Hillsdale Agricultural Society, and has held that position ever since, except for an interval of two years. The Society is confessedly one of the most successful and prosperous in the State, and the excellence of its annual exhibition is admitted to be mainly due to Colonel Holloway's ability as an organizer and his faithful and unwearied attention to all the details upon which the success of such an enterprise depends.

In 1853 Colonel Holloway was appointed Postmaster, and held the position nine years; but he has never held any other public office. He has been a prominent trustee of Hillsdale College since its foundation, and is still an influential member of the board. He is also a member of the Executive Committee of the State Grange, and was one of the originators of the grange movement in Hillsdale County. He was a candidate for Auditor General in 1874 and again in 1876, and received a vote which was a very flattering indication of his popularity. He has, as his present nomination attests, the confidence of the people, being the peculiar representative of a class which has been too much neglected by nominating conventions.

NEW YORK.—PREPARING TO REMOVE THE OBELISK FROM THE HOLD OF THE STEAMER "DESSOUG," AT THE CLIFTON DRY DOCK, STATEN ISLAND.—SEE PAGE 27.

How Railroads Eat Up Forests.

BUT few people comparatively have any idea of the amount of timber used in the construction of a single railroad. We hear that our forests are rapidly disappearing, and we know that material for building and fuel causes the sacrifice of many leafy monarchs of the forest; yet only the initiated knows that it yearly takes 200,000 acres of forests to supply cross-ties for the railroads of the United States. The Cincinnati Commercial lately interviewed a gentleman who has been in the business for thirteen years, and gives the substance of his talk. It takes 15,000,000 ties to supply the demand on our railroads, for which on an average the contractors get 35 cents apiece, making in the aggregate about $5,250,000. In building a new road the contractors figure on 2,700 ties to the mile, while it takes 300 ties to the mile to keep a constructed road in repair. Contractors, of course, buy pieces of timber land as near to the proposed line of road as possible, paying for the timber an average of about $20 per acre, or giving the proprietor of the land 10 cents for every tie got out. The average of a good piece of timber land is 200 ties to the acre and 12 ties to the tree. The size of a cross-tie differs on different roads, but the usual size demanded is eight feet six inches long, and eight inches face. White or burr oak is considered the best timber for the purpose, although cherry, maple, ash and even locust have been used. The last named were first used on the Little Miami Railroad, and after a time thrown aside as unfit for the purpose. Railroad men much prefer ties hewn out with an ax to those sawed in a mill, and many contend that the first named will considerably outlast the sawed ties. This theory is probably a mistaken fallacy, as sawed ties have been placed alongside of hewn ties, and remained sound twice as long. This business gives employment to an army of choppers, who are paid 10 cents apiece for each tie. A continued practice makes the choppers expert in the use of the ax, and a single man has been known to get out 35 ties in a day; yet the average is only 20, while an expert will probably get out 30. During the war, when ties sold at from 50 to 65 cents, choppers were paid 12½ cents apiece. Although the contractor gets 35 cents apiece from the railroads for each tie, still there is a loss of from 5 to 7 per cent on dockage and stealage. An inspector is sent by the company to inspect the ties. This is generally a clerk from some of the offices, who frequently knows but little as regards the strength or durability of timber, and, as a consequence, some of the best ties are docked and only bring 20 cents apiece. The stealage is where the section men put in new ties which have not been inspected and received, and fail to report the use of the same to the road-master. Most all cross-tie men also contract for bridge timbers and trestling, as well as telegraph poles. For the latter chestnut and cedar are mostly used. They bring about $1.75 apiece, and are mostly in the tamarack swamps of Michigan and the forests of Southern Kentucky and Tennessee. Large sums of money have been made by lucky contractors above described, and each only adds to increased demands. Ohio has over 4,000,000 acres of wood-land, yet the ever-increasing demand for railroad purposes alone, if supplied entirely from our forests, would leave us without a single stick to mark the existence of our once dense forests.

Cremation in St. Louis.

A ST. LOUIS paper states that a movement is now on foot to erect a crematory in that city, and it is more than probable that within the next twelve months it will be constructed. The gentlemen interested in the matter are very active and sanguine of success. Cremation can scarcely yet be said to have become popular, but there is no denying the fact that in some portions of the country it is steadily growing in popular favor. The Le Moyne crematory at Washington, Pa., is well-known, and measures have already been taken to erect one in New York City and one in Pittsburgh. Whether the idea of burning the bodies of the dead and reducing their remains to ashes, and thus returning to the custom of antiquity, will ever seize on the popular mind is yet to be determined; but its advantages from a sanitary point can scarcely be imputed. It will also scarcely be denied that extensive and well filled cemeteries, however nicely laid out and decorated, are little calculated to encourage immigration. The first person cremated in the United States was Colonel Henry Laurens, of South Carolina, in the year 1796. He left specific instructions to that effect in his will. Toward the close of the last century Henry Barry, also of South Carolina, was cremated. In 1876 Baron de Palm, of Pennsylvania, received similar mortuary rites at the Le Moyne crematory above mentioned. In 1877 a child of Julius Kirchner, of New York; in 1878, Mrs. Jane Firman, of Ohio; in 1880, Miss Harriman, of Pennsylvania, and a few months since Dr. Winslow, of California, were cremated. This list comprises, we believe, about all the cremations in the United States up to the present time. The gentlemen who are starting the project in St. Louis are enthusiastic and firm believers that cremation is the most sensible and economical mode of disposing of the dead, the entire cost being estimated not to exceed $25.

Genoa.

GENOA is the nearest approach to a human ant hill that it is possible to conceive. From the streets of silent, gloomy palaces, with their moldy, time-stained, damp entrances and carved marble pillars, piteously telling the story of the dead, glorious past, black with hurrying forms, women in delicate lace veils, with silver-clasped prayer-books, some carrying bunches of camellias to present to a favorite saint, others leading children by the hand, soldiers in bright orange handkerchiefs (their favorite color); men walking to their business in mart and counting-house; down the dim cool lanes, bounded by a strip of bright blue sky and seemingly ending in a peak; up crooked steep stairs, looking as if they led straight to heaven; round sharp corners, from which you reach a fresh vista of narrow streets and overhanging balconies and queer odds and ends of houses, stuck in anyhow and brightened with little square basement holes serving for shops—all and everywhere is seething and crowded with life. From every window hang rags and clothes of all colors, sizes and shapes; on every doorstep play and squat children; white patient, bell-hung, red-fezzed mules elbow the passers into narrow angles, and squeeze them flat up against walls. Down near the harbor is the busiest life of all. There, as bales and sacks and casks are flung, rolled and carried on to the wharf, ruddy, sun-tanned, athletic fellows swarm in and out under the vaulted arches, or sit in little, underground, cheaply restaurants, where the smoking frittura and savory omelets are cooked before their eyes, or rapidly devoured by hungry appetites, and the houses are more tumble-down and more crowded together, and the rags more plentiful, and the children more clamorous and dirty, till the noise, and the heat, and the color, and the vivid contrasts of light and shade, and the bright, gaudy hues of color, seem to blend in one great Oriental nightmare of sun-steeped brilliancy. Then penetrate up narrower and steeper and more closed-in lanes, to more quiet out-of-the-way churches, around whose shaded aisles the scent of incense clings, where a ray of golden glory lights on the marbles, and where more Masses are being huskily chanted, and more bending figures are kneeling about, and little wax tapers twinkle feebly in the distance, and you may know something of the charm of Genoa—the charm of a finished coquette whose every movement is a surprise, who is never dull, never insipid, always pricking you into motion, full of warm, passionate blood, whose very beat thrills through you and fills you with a kind of strange and exciting motion.

History of the Beard.

IN the earliest Pagan times the primitive deities were represented with majestic beards. In France they played a great rôle from the reign of Pharamond downwards. Under Clovis, indeed, the beard of the king was an object of peculiar veneration and, indeed, every individual was more or less sensitive regarding his beard. It is related that after the great battle of Tolbiac Clovis sent a deputation to the defeated Alaric requesting him to come and touch the victor's beard as a token of alliance. Far from accepting the invitation in the spirit in which it was offered, the enraged King of the Huns seized the Frankish emissaries by their beards and hauled them out of the room by their revered locks. The unfortunate envoys returned rather crestfallen to Clovis, narrated what had happened, and swore "on their beards" to avenge the affront. In subsequent reigns the beard was the object of numerous enactments, and the fashion of wearing it was changed as frequently. Sometimes it was worn long, sometimes close-clipped, now peaked, now plaited, or even decorated with pearls and gold trinkets.

Even in the sacred atmosphere of Rome itself beards were the object of considerable discussion. Different Popes laid down different rules on the subject. One Pontiff enacted that no beards were to be worn; another as stringently directed that the razor was never to be applied to the chin. Saints Clement of Alexandria, Cyprian, Jerome, and Chrysostom engaged in vehement controversies about the mode of wearing the hair about the face in the fourteenth century. In France the final triumph of beards dates from the Renaissance, when the example set by the great artists, who largely indulged in these appendages, was closely followed by the sovereign and other magnates of the land. Under Henry III. shaven chins were the mode, the mustache being worn long and drooping. During Henry IV.'s reign beards, cut square, came again into fashion, and mustaches were curled; while under Louis XIV. beards were again tabooed, and the mustaches alone worn, and in the two following reigns the razor was in full use. Under the Republican régime, as also under those of the Empire and Restoration, no beards were grown. They came in again, however, with the Revolution of 1830, in company with many other changes of costume, etc., and at the present day no universal rule exists on the matter.

The Sultan's Astrologer.

THE Sultan has sustained a severe loss by the death of his chief astrologer, Tahir Effendi, who died from sunstroke during the late very hot weather. His successor has been chosen, not from among the other three remaining, but selected on account of special fitness from another department. Osman Kiamil Effendi, who now wields the magic wand, was Mustechar, or first Secretary to the Kadi of Stamboul, and is believed to be deeply learned in the occult sciences. In all matters of difficulty, it is said, His Majesty has recourse to his astrologers, and few decisions are come to without consulting the stars. Some of the delays which take place at the palace may be traced to the belief in lucky and unlucky days. A signature given by the Sultan on an unpropitious day, for instance, could not but bring misfortune to him or the State; it should therefore be deferred to a more convenient season. The chief astrologer has the monopoly for the publication of almanacs from which he makes a nice thing, since one should be in the hand of every good Moslem to point out to him the days and hours at which certain prayers should be said. The forecasts of the weather and other predictions are, to say the least, curious. In last year's almanac a certain day was declared to be propitious for the purchase of a beautiful white slave, which had the effect of causing a run on the market and a corresponding rise in the value of the article.

General Grant's Japanese Body-servant.

GENERAL GRANT has a Japanese body-servant. His name is Yisedo, and he dresses like an American and carries a cane. He told a reporter of the Denver Tribune, in very well chosen but queerly pronounced English, that he found Spanish more like his own language than any other, and that he had learned it readily and enjoyed practising it on the Mexicans whom he met in the United States. He is a Buddhist, and thinks that his religion is much like Christianity. In fact, he believes both religions came from a single faith ages ago. He said that Japan regards the United States as a model nation, and is imitating many of the ways and customs of this country. As an American partly, and partly because of his part in helping to settle the difficulties between Japan and China, the Japanese regard General Grant with affection and admiration. Yisedo individually finds the fulfillment of his highest desire in being permitted to accompany General Grant on his travels.

A Voracious Eater.

A REMARKABLE feat of eating and drinking against time is reported by the Hungarian press, and said to have been performed by a youthful Magyar residing in Grosswardein. This surpassing trencherman laid a wager, and is declared to have won it with several minutes and an omelet to spare, that he would, between the hours of 9:30 P. M. and midnight, devour the following comestibles, it being clearly understood that there should be a full portion of each dish in succession, any two of which portions may be estimated as constituting a hearty meal for a full-grown adult blessed by nature with a lively appetite: Roast beef with paprika sauce and potatoes; a Viennese veal cutlet with peas; a filet of beef with dumplings; grilled pork and pumpkins; half a fowl, fried in batter; bubble and squeak; a beefsteak with poached eggs; fried calves' liver; calves' brains and kidneys; pickled veal; stewed beef; a broiled goose liver and a frizzled fowl with carrots. He not only contrived to stow away all the articles enumerated in this comprehensive menu, washing them down with two quarts of beer, four bottles of old wine, and three of aerated water, but, when he had cleared the last of his appetizing dishes the clock dial then marking ten minutes to twelve—he asked for a three-egg omelet, which vanished down his throat before the hour struck.

FISK & HATCH,
Bankers,
AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT BONDS,
And other desirable Investment Securities,
No. 5 Nassau St., New York,

Buy and sell all issues of Government Bonds, in large or small amounts, at current market prices, and will be pleased to furnish information in reference to all matters connected with investments in Government Bonds.

We are prepared to give information in regard to first-class Railway Securities, and to execute orders for the same.

Buy and sell all marketable Stocks and Bonds on commission, at the Stock Exchange and in the open market.

Receive accounts of Banks, Bankers, Merchants and others, and allow interest on daily balances; and for those keeping accounts with us we collect United States coupons and registered interest, and other coupons, dividends, etc., and credit without charge.

☞ We give special attention to orders from Banks, Bankers, Institutions and Investors out of the city, by Mail or Telegraph, to buy or sell Government Bonds, State and Railroad Bonds, Bank Stocks, Railroad Stocks, and other securities.

We have issued the Seventh Edition of "Memoranda Concerning Government Bonds," copies of which can be had on application.

FISK & HATCH.

FUN.

A BOY aged twelve and a girl of thirteen were married the other day. Uncle John says it was a case of children playing with matches.

THE Chinese are learning to chew fine cut tobacco, but they can never spit with an American gentleman while their eyes are so much on the bias.

"DR. TANNER, sir?" said a bluff Norfolk J. P. "If he were here I'd commit him for getting his livelihood without ostensible means of subsistence.

YOU can't always judge by outside appearances. Who, for instance, would believe the plump and sleek exterior of the shad covered such a wilderness of bones?

"It's not the whiskey a man drinks that makes him dizzy," said Flaherty, "but it's lukin' at the bartender's diamond through the bottom of the tumblers, begorra!"

THERE is a great deal of modesty in this world which will game at almost anything, provided it can be seen through a crack. A visit to Long Branch will prove this.

EVERYTHING in nature indulges in amusement. The lightning plays, the wind whistles, the thunder rolls, the snow flies, the waves leap and the fields smile. Even the buds shoot and the rivers run.

A CIGAR contains acetic, formic, butyric, valeric and propionic acids, prussic acid, creosote, carbolic acid, ammonia, sulphuretted hydrogen, pyridine, viridine, picoline and rubidene, to say nothing of cabbagine and burdockic acid. That's why you can't get a good one for less than three cents.

A HUNGARIAN exhibited in a phrenological museum two skulls of different proportions. "Whose is the large skull," asked a spectator. "It belonged to the celebrated Attila, King of the Huns." "And the small one?" "Also to Attila, but when he was a child."

IT is wonderful what fools boys are. A charming widow of Stillwater owns a nice boy, and a man from St. Paul wants to be appointed deputy father to the lad. While the St. Paul man was strolling down street with the boy, he asked. "Bob, does your mother bang her hair?" and that fool boy answered: "Oh, no, but you ought to see her bang dad's head. Guess the minister didn't know everything when he told pap to prepare to die. Prepare! why, he was aching to die."

FORGETFULNESS OF PEOPLE.

WE would not, by enticing headings and other devices, lead you into reading of the virtues possessed by Pierce's Celebrated Medicines, were it not that we are aware of the forgetfulness of people: and that must be our excuse, dear reader, for again telling you that Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery is without an equal as a blood-purifier. It cures all humors, from the common blotch, pimple or eruption, to the worst scrofula, fever-sore or ulcer. Dr. Pierce's Pellets are a pleasant but efficient cathartic. Sold by druggists.

ST. CLOUD HOUSE, Chicago, Ill., Jan. 20th, 1879.
HON. R. V. PIERCE, M.D.:
Dear Doctor—I have been using your Golden Medical Discovery and Pellets for liver complaint and general debility. It is impossible to express the gratitude I feel. It is simply wonderful the effect your medicines have had upon me. I am in every way a thousand per cent. better.
I am yours, gratefully, J. C. DAVIDSON.

IT'S POOR POLICY to wait till the horse is stolen before locking the door. A policy in THE TRAVELERS is better.

FOR restoring color and natural beauty to the Hair, nothing is so certain as MRS. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER. Every Druggist sells it.

ANGOSTURA BITTERS are the best remedy for removing indigestion and all diseases originating from the digestive organs. Beware of counterfeits. Ask your grocer or druggist for the genuine article, manufactured by Dr. J. G. B. Siegert & Sons.

BURNETT'S COCOAINE allays irritation, removes all tendency to dandruff, and invigorates the action of the capillaries in the highest degree. The COCOAINE has earned a deserved reputation for promoting the growth and preserving the beauty of the human hair. Ladies dressing their hair elaborately for the evening will find that it imparts a healthy natural gloss to the hair, and will cause it to retain its shape for hours.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE.
NERVOUS DISEASES.

MY nervous system was overwrought. I tried various remedies, but in all I found none that acted so general and thorough as HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE. I have several emaciated, debilitated nervous cases that are fallying under its use chiefly. H. W. BAGGS, M.D.
JACKSONVILLE, ILL.

THE ST. NICHOLAS, New York, is as fresh and youthful as in its earliest days, and well deserves the reputation it acquired years ago. Exquisite order and neatness and a luxurious table, are attractions that experienced travelers always appreciate; and these are just the requisites which make the ST. NICHOLAS such a perennial favorite.

MR. HANAFORD PHOENIX, proprietor of the Rygeia Hotel, Old Point Comfort, Va., writes to the H. W. Johns Manufacturing Company, 87 Maiden Lane, New York: "I desire to express my entire satisfaction with your paints, which I have been using a number of years. I now have thirteen acres of wood-work covered with your paints, and as they have successfully withstood the usual effects of salt air, and are in every way satisfactory, I shall continue using them."

H.W. JOHNS'
ASBESTOS
LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING, BOILER COVERINGS
Steam Packing, Sheathings, Fireproof Coatings, Cements
Send for Samples, Illustrated Pamphlet and Price List.
H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO., 87 Maiden Lane, N.Y.

Buuquetiere.
The Bouquetiere is the Acme of Perfection for crimping the Bouquet in Cloth, Bronze, Gilt or Satin. Simple and durable; in Gilt or Bronze. Mailed free on receipt of price, 25 cents each. Five for $1; or per dozen, $3.
GEORGE P. COOPER (Sole Agent), No. 27 Union Square, N. Y.

ANY PERSON CAN HAVE A BEAUTIFUL SOFT WHITE HAND BY WEARING THE COSMETIC GLOVE
PRICE $2.00.
COSMETIC GLOVE CO.
231 W. 4TH ST., CINCINNATI, OHIO.
LADY AGENTS WANTED.
SEND STAMP FOR TERMS & CIRCULAR.

Morrow's Colorific
Will change hair to a Brown or Black. One preparation easily applied. Contains no poisonous ingredients. This signature on the wrapper. Sold by all druggists. Depot, 30 Frankfort St., New York.
Jos. F. Morrow

TO THE PUBLIC.
BOKER'S BITTERS.
BEWARE OF COUNTERFEITS AND IMITATIONS
In accordance with the desire frequently expressed, both in the United States and abroad, these Bitters, so long and justly celebrated for their diuretic as a curative, and for their medicinal virtues against all diseases of, or arising from, the digestive organs, will hereafter be put up and sold not only in quart, but
ALSO IN PINT BOTTLES,
for medicinal, family, traveling, and other purposes. To be had at all the principal druggists', grocers', liquor-merchants', etc. L. FUNKE, Jr., Sole Agent, New York, 78 John Street. Post Office Box 1,029.

THE AMERICAN FLUTING MACHINE
Sold by all Hardware and House Furnishing Stores.
THE MOST PRACTICAL AND CONVENIENT MACHINE IN USE.

NO MORE RHEUMATISM
GUNT OR GRAVEL. Schlumberger is the only patentee in France. 1, A. Paris, 102 W. 14th St., N.Y., is only agent for the celebrated French Salicylates, which relieve at once, cure in four days, without dangerous consequences, their purity being controlled according to French laws by the Board of Pharmacy of Paris. Beware—The genuine has red seal and signature of agent on each box. $1, postpaid. Send stamp for pamphlet. Thousands of references.

CANDY
Send one, two, three or five dollars for a retail sample box, etc., by express, of the best Candies in America, put up elegantly, and strictly pure. Refers to all Chicago.
C. F. GUNTHER, Confectioner, 78 Madison St., Chicago.

Newspaper Advertising Bureau.
BY ADDRESSING GEO. P. ROWELL & CO., 10 Spruce St., New York, the exact cost of any proposed line of advertising can be learned. 100-page pamphlet, 10c.

FOR SALE.
Bound Volumes of FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER, published during the Civil War.
Address, T. LITTLE, 343 West 23d St., New York.

SOLDIERS Get the BEST ARTIFICIAL LIMBS on Gov't Order. Apply to Chas. H. Evans, Gov't Ins., 132 W. 6th St. Cincinnati, O.

The OLDEST and BEST of the JUVENILE PUBLICATIONS.

Frank Leslie's
Boys' & Girls' Weekly
is now publishing the following admirable serial stories, all beautifully illustrated:
"'Swoppy'; Or, The Adventures of a Yankee Boy." By NAT USHER.
"Trap-door Tom."
"Jim Jeffs; Or, The Mystery of the House by the River." By NYE RUSH.
"Left to Himself." By COMMODORE AH LOOK.
"The Pearl of the Sahara; Or, The Adventures of Two American Boys." By COMMODORE ROBIN.
"Hal Harkforward and Tom Tallyho's Schooldays." By BLACKBURNE HARTOG (Jack Harkaway).
"Nelly Blake's Schooldays."
Sold by all newsdealers. Price 5 cents a copy; $2.60 a year, postpaid.
Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Digitized by Google

J. H. HAVERLY'S AMUSEMENT ENTERPRISES

HAVERLY'S FIFTH AVENUE THEATRE,
Broadway and Twenty-eighth St., N. Y.
Will open Sept. 1st with
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor and Manager.
HAVERLY'S FOURTEENTH STREET THEATRE, N. Y.
Cor. Sixth Avenue and Fourteenth Street.
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor and Manager.
HAVERLY'S NIBLO'S GARDEN THEATRE, N. Y.
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor and Manager.
HAVERLY'S THEATRE, BROOKLYN.
Johnson and Willoughby Streets.
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor and Manager.
HAVERLY'S THEATRE, CHICAGO.
Cor. Dearborn and Monroe Sts.
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor and Manager.
HAVERLY'S UNITED MASTODON MINSTRELS.
J. H. HAVERLY'S GRAND ATHLETIC AND PEDESTRIAN ENTERPRISES.
FRED. J. ENGELHARDT, Manager.
HAVERLY'S WIDOW BEDOTT COMEDY CO.
HAVERLY'S GENUINE COLORED MINSTRELS.
Also controlling, at all times, a large additional number of Leading Attractions, and always ready to negotiate with Grand Opera, Stars (with or without company), Combinations and Amusement Enterprises generally.

Starin's Glen Island.

NEW ROCHELLE HARBOR, LONG ISLAND SOUND.

THE ELEGANT STEAMERS
Laura M. Starin and St. Nicholas,

Will leave for GLEN ISLAND daily and Sundays from Pier No. 18, N. R., Jewell's Wharf, Brooklyn; Thirty-third Street, E. R. For time tables see daily papers.

Grand Concert in Pavilion Daily.

A RHODE ISLAND CLAM-BAKE served daily from 12 M. to 6 P. M., for 75 cents, in the magnificent Dining-Hall of the Club-House, under the supervision of
HIRAM D. MAXFIELD,
The celebrated caterer.

MAMMOTH DANCING PAVILION, BILLIARDS, BOWLING ALLEYS, RIFLE RANGES, BOATING AND BATHING.

EXCURSION TICKETS (round trip), 40 cents; single, 25 cents. Clam-bake 75 cents.

SHELTER ISLAND.

Steamer J. H. STARIN leaves Pier No. 18, N. R., foot of Cortlandt Street, MONDAYS and FRIDAYS, at 9 P. M., for Shelter Island and New Haven. A sail of five hours by daylight across the Sound, after leaving the City of Elms. Fare, single $1.25; excursion, $2.25.
STARIN'S EXCURSIONS.

MANHATTAN BEACH.

VIA GREENPOINT.

Steamer SYLVAN GROVE, from foot of Twenty-third Street, E. R., at 8.45, 9.45, 10.45, and half hourly to 8.45 P.M. Returning, leave Manhattan Beach at 7.35, 10, 11.05 A.M.; 12.05, 12.30, and every half-hour to 10.35 P.M.

VIA BAY RIDGE.

Steamers THOS. COLLYER and MATTEAWAN from 23d St., N.R., at 9.10, 10.25 A.M., and hourly to 8.25 P.M.

Leaving LEROY STREET (on minute) and PIER No. 6 thirty minutes after leaving 23d St. The boats leaving 23d St. at 7.25 and 8.25 P.M. do not stop at Leroy and Pier 6.

The steamer D. R. MARTIN leaves foot of Whitehall Street at 9.25 A.M. hourly to 8.25 P.M. Trains from Manhattan Beach connecting with D. R. Martin for Whitehall Street, leave hourly from 8.20 A.M. to 12.20 P.M., 1.25 to 6.25 P.M., 7.20 to 9.20 P.M. Trains connecting with steamer for Pier 6, Leroy St. and 23d St. leave every hour from 11 A.M. to 9.35 and 10.40 P.M.

GILMORE'S FULL BAND and LEVY every afternoon and evening.

DAY'S Kidney PAD

A CURE for the most prevalent and fatal diseases that afflict mankind FOUND AT LAST.

Internal medicines never did nor never can cure KIDNEY DISEASE. STOP IT NOW: apply Day's Kidney Pad AT ONCE, and be cured of all affections of the Kidneys, Bladder and Urinary Organs. It is the only treatment that will cure NERVOUS AND PHYSICAL DEBILITY, and that distressing complaint, "BACK ACHE." It will annually save many times its cost in medicines and plasters, which at best give but temporary relief. Sold by Druggists or sent by mail on receipt of price, $5. Our book, "How a Life Was Saved," giving a history of this new discovery and a large record of most remarkable cures, sent free. Write for it.

DAY KIDNEY PAD CO., Toledo, O.

Little Havana Lottery,

OR SUPPLEMENT TO
THE ROYAL HAVANA LOTTERY.

CHASE & CO., New Haven, Conn., Managers.

The Grand Extraordinary Drawing has always taken place
SATURDAY, SEPT. 4.

1 Grand Prize		$7,000
1 " "		1,500
1 " "		600
1 " "		300
10 Prizes, $125 each		1,250
12 " 75 "		900
486 " 12 "		5,832
20 Approximation Prizes		625
532 Prizes, U.S. Currency, amounting to		$18,617

ONLY 18,000 TICKETS.

Whole Tickets, $2; Halves, $1; Quarters, 50 cents.

JACKSON & Co., Bankers, 82 Nassau Street, New York.
CHASE & Co., 200 Broadway, New York.
JOHN W. CLARK, 1108 N. Y. Ave., Washington, D. C.
Responsible Agents Wanted.
CHASE & CO., General Agents, New Haven, Conn.

ON 30 DAYS TRIAL

We send on 30 Days' Trial our ELECTRO-VOLTAIC BELTS, BANDS, Suspensories, Trusses, and other appliances, to those suffering from Nervous Debility, Weaknesses, or Lost Vitality from any cause; or to those afflicted with Rheumatism, Paralysis, Dyspepsia, Liver or Kidney trouble, etc., etc., or Ruptures. Speedy cures guaranteed. Illustrated Pamphlet Free. Address VOLTAIC BELT CO., Marshall, Mich.

TAPE-WORM

INFALLIBLY CURED with two spoons of medicine in 2-3 hours. For particulars, address, with stamp,
H. EICKHOGN, 4 St. Mark's Place, New York.

MOUSTACHE AND WHISKERS.

Dr. [illegible] Magic Moustache and Whisker Dye will force a heavy growth of hair on the face of any man in from 20 to 40 days, or money refunded. Perfectly harmless. Warranted to produce a full set of whiskers or moustache in 20 to 40 days, or money refunded. Sent by mail, sealed, on receipt of $1. Address, [illegible]

18 Elegant New Style Chromo Cards, with name, 13 cts., postpaid. GEO. L. REED & CO., Nassau, N. Y.

DR. BROWNING'S C. & C. CORDIAL

For Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis,
Tickling or Dryness of the Throat,
Sore Throat, Cold in the Head,
Cold in the Bowels, Asthmatic Coughs,
Whooping Cough, Croup, Influenza,
Hoarseness, and Relief of Consumptives.

Dr. BROWNING is a regular graduate of medicine, a skillful pharmacist and a thorough chemist. His "C. & C." (Cough and Cold) CORDIAL is not the result of mere chance, but of long scientific research in chemistry and medicine, as is very plainly seen by the rapidity of its action and its unparalleled efficacy. The expense of its manufacture is at least five times as great as that of any other medicine upon the market, and yet it is sold at the exceedingly low price of 50c. Sample bottles (for a short time only), 25c. For sale by all druggists and by the proprietor,

W. C. BROWNING, M.D.,
1117 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

K.y S.L LOTTERY

A FEW RECEIPTS FOR PRIZES CASHED IN THE JULY DRAWING.

Received from the Kentucky State Lottery FOUR THOUSAND SIX HUNDRED DOLLARS, in full payment of prize tickets in July drawing.
$4,600. J. C. CARPENTER,
33 OLNEY ST., PROVIDENCE, R. I.

NEW YORK, JULY 30, 1880.

Received from Kentucky State Lottery the sum of TWELVE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, for amount of prize tickets sent for collection to Washington, D. C., 4050805. B. K. MEANS,
$1,275. FOR ADAMS EXPRESS CO.

NEW YORK, JULY 28, 1880.

Received from Kentucky State Lottery Company the sum of ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS, in payment of prize ticket (cost $1) drawn in Class G, July 21.
$1,000. GEORGE SIGBERT, 619 E. 11TH ST., N. Y.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, JULY 31, 1880.

Received from the Kentucky State Lottery Company ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS, in payment of prize ticket drawn in Class G. NATHAN INLAU, CINCINNATI, O.
$1,000.

A number of other receipts at our office from parties who do not desire their names to be published.

THE KENTUCKY STATE LOTTERY CO. has regularly drawn, in pursuance of an Act of the General Assembly of the State of Kentucky, on a Wednesday, Sept. 15.

Capitals, $15,000, $5,000, $2,500, $2,000, and 1,872 other prizes amounting to $60,700. Tickets, $1.

For fuller particulars, address

G. UPINGTON, 599 Broadway, New York; or, M. J. RICHMOND, Lexington, Ky.

HOPE FOR THE DEAF

Garmore's Artificial Ear Drums

PERFECTLY RESTORE THE HEARING and perform the work of the Natural Drum. Always in position, but invisible to others. All Conversation and even whispers heard distinctly. We refer to those using them. Send for descriptive circular.
Address JOHN GARMORE & CO.,
S.W. Corner 5th & Race Sts., Cincinnati, O.

JUDGE FOR YOURSELF By sending 35c. money or 40c. postage stamps, with age, you will receive by return mail a correct picture of your future husband or wife, with name and date of marriage. Address,
W. FOX, Box 38, Fultonville, N.Y.

40 New Styles Chromos, with name 15c. 40 Agents Samp on 30c. CHROMO CO., Northford, Ct.

Imitation Gold Watches.
$3, $10, $15, $20 and $25 each; Chains $2 to $12 to match. Jewelry of the same. Sent C.O.D., by Express. Send stamp for Illustrated Circular. COLLINS METAL WATCH FACTORY, 28 Broadway, N. Y. Box, 3696.

MAMMARIAL BALM restores and develops the bust. Warranted sure and safe. Price, $1. NEW ENGLAND MEDICAL INSTITUTE, 24 Tremont Row, Boston, Mass.

WITH

FIVE DOLLARS

YOU CAN BUY A WHOLE
IMPERIAL AUSTRIAN VIENNA CITY
GOVERNMENT BOND

Which bonds are issued and ordered by the Government, and are redeemed in drawings

FOUR TIMES ANNUALLY,

Each and every bond is drawn with a larger or smaller premium. Every bond must draw a Premium. There are NO BLANKS.

THE THREE HIGHEST PRIZES AMOUNT TO
200,000 FLORINS,
30,000 FLORINS,
30,000 FLORINS,

And bonds not drawing one of the above prizes must draw a Premium of not less than 150 Florins.
The next drawing takes place on the 1st of OCTOBER, 1880,
And every bond bought of us on or before the 1st of October is entitled to the whole premium that may be drawn thereon on that date.

Out-of-town orders sent in REGISTERED LETTERS, and containing $5, will secure one of these bonds for the next drawing.

For orders, circulars, or any other information, address

INTERNATIONAL BANKING CO.,
150 Broadway, New York City.
ESTABLISHED IN 1874.

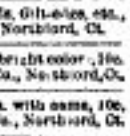
N. B.—In writing to us, please state you saw this in the English FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

☞ The above Government Bonds are not to be compared with any Lottery whatsoever, and do not conflict with any of the laws of the United States.

DEAFNESS CURED

and Hearing Perfectly Restored by using our NEW AND IMPROVED INVISIBLE TYMPANUM. Cheapest and most efficient appliance ever offered for the cure of Deafness. Can be worn at all times. By their use all sounds are distinctly heard. Circulars with testimonials sent upon application.
AMERICAN TYMPANUM CO., 212 Broadway, N. Y.

SCHMITT & KOEHNE.



Central Park Brewery

AND

Bottling Company.

Brewery, Bottling Department and Office, 240—249 East Fifty-ninth Street, Icehouse and Rock-vaults, Fifty-sixth and Fifty-seventh Street, Avenue A and East River, N. Y.

BOHEMIAN and LAGER BEER.

The finest Beer for family use. The best Shipping Beer in bottles, warranted to keep in any climate for months and years.

KNOW THYSELF.

THE untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase the new medical work published by the PEABODY MEDICAL INSTITUTE, Boston, entitled THE SCIENCE OF LIFE; Or, SELF-PRESERVATION. Exhausted vitality, nervous and physical debility, or vitality impaired by the errors of youth or too close application to business, may be restored and manhood regained.

Two hundredth edition, revised and enlarged, just published. It is a standard medical work, the best in the English language, written by a physician of great experience, to whom was awarded a gold and jeweled medal by the National Medical Association. It contains beautiful and very expensive engravings. Three hundred pages, more than 50 valuable prescriptions for all forms of prevailing disease, the result of many years of extensive and successful practice, either one of which is worth ten times the price of the book. Bound in French cloth; price only $1, sent by mail, postpaid.

The London Lancet says: "No person should be without this valuable book. The author is a noble benefactor."

An illustrated sample sent to all on receipt of 6 cents for postage.

The author refers, by permission, to Hon. P. A. BISSELL, M.D., President of the National Medical Assoc'n.

Address, Dr. W. H. PARKER, No. 4 Bulfinch Street, Boston, Mass. The author may be consulted on all diseases requiring skill and experience.

HEAL THYSELF

50 Elegant Cards. New Chromo, Sheils, Gilt-edges, etc., with name, 10c. G. A. SPRING, Northford, Ct.

50 New Style Cards. Lithographed in bright colors, 10c. 60 Agents samples 10c. Conn. Card Co., Northford, Ct.

50 Chromo, Snowflake and Lace Cards, with name, 10c, 40 all chromos, 10c. Star Printing Co., Northford, Ct.

$777 A YEAR and expenses to agents. Outfit free. Address, P. O. VICKERY, Augusta, Maine.

Agents Wanted.

THE BONANZA FOR BOOK-AGENTS
is selling our two splendidly illustrated books, Lives of the first written by his life-long friend, Hon. J. W. FORNEY, an author of national fame, and an ardent admirer of the "superb soldier"; the second written by his comrade-in-arms and personal friend, Gen. JAS. S. BRISBIN, an author of wide celebrity. Both official, low-priced, immensely popular, selling beyond precedent. Agents double profits by selling both. Outfits 50c. each. Act quick and coin money. RICHARD BROS., 723 Chestnut St., Phila.

HANCOCK and GARFIELD

$350 A MONTH—AGENTS WANTED—75 best selling articles in the world; 1 sample free. Address Jay Bronson, Detroit, Mich.

100 COPIES ONLY $5.

THE LIFE OF GEN. HANCOCK.

Retail, 15 cents per copy. Wholesale, 50 copies, $3, or one hundred for $5. Contains SPLENDID CABINET LIKENESS. Outsells all other books. AGENTS WANTED. Send us money order, registered letter, or draft.
BARCLAY & CO.,
21 North 7th St., Philadelphia, Pa.

AGENTS WANTED EVERYWHERE to sell the best Family Knitting Machine ever invented. Will knit a pair of stockings, with HEEL and TOE complete, in 20 minutes. It will also knit a great variety of lace-work for which there is always a ready market. Send for circular and terms to the Twombly Knitting Machine Co., 409 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

THREE NEW NOVELTIES.

Toy Rooster and Beetle, price 25c.; Toy Cat and Mouse, price 25c.; Mouse Scarf Pin, price 25c. Samples mailed to any address on receipt of price, in currency or postage stamps. A. A. DAVIS, Nashua, N. H.

ROYAL

HAVANA LOTTERY

A GRAND
EXTRAORDINARY DRAWING
AT HAVANA, CUBA. Has always drawn
SEPTEMBER 4th.
Only 18,000 Tickets Issued.
CAPITAL PRIZE, 500,000 Spanish Dollars.
532 Prizes, amounting to 1,350,000 Pesos.

Tickets have always been $75; halves, $37.50; quarters, $18.75; fifths, $15; tenths, $7.50; twentieths, $4.

LOUISIANA STATE LOTTERY.—Has always drawn September 14th. Tickets have always been $2; half tickets, $1.

KENTUCKY STATE LOTTERY.—Has always drawn August 21st. Tickets, $1.

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY.—Has always drawn Sept. 30th. Tickets have always been $2; halves, $1. Prizes cashed. Full information sent free. Address, J. DUFF & CO., Bankers, 42 Nassau St., corner Liberty, New York.

ELGIN WATCHES.
All styles, Gent, Silver and Nickel, $10 to $30. Chains, etc., sent C. O. D. to be examined. Write for Catalogue to STANDARD AMERICAN WATCH CO., PITTSBURGH, PA.

GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa.
Send stamp for Catalogue.
Rifles, Shot Guns, Revolvers, sent C. O. D. for examination.

COMPREHENSIVE, INTERESTING AND CHEAP.

Frank Leslie's

POPULAR MONTHLY.

The Largest, Most Attractive, and Cheapest Magazine in the World.

THE SEPTEMBER NUMBER NOW READY

With the following varied and brilliant

CONTENTS:

"THE CAMPAIGN OF 1880"—THE NOMINEES OF THE TWO PARTIES. Two illustrations and portraits.
"SOME GOSSIPING PAPERS." By Mrs. Barrow.
"THE OLD AND THE NEW ACADIA." By Frank Norton. Ten illustrations.
"THE WASHINGTONS OF YORKSHIRE." Five illustrations.
"DO-DOS OF OLD SPAIN—SPANISH WEDDING DANCES." Four illustrations.
"VICTOR HUGO." By the Author of "Romer Vielee," etc. Six illustrations and portrait.
"THEODORE, KING OF ABYSSINIA." By A. H. Guernsey. Fifteen illustrations.
"TURIN." By Lady Blanche Murphy. Eight illustrations.
"LODGERS AND BOARDERS IN LOWER LIFE." By Andrew Wilson, Ph. D. Nine illustrations.
SERIAL AND SHORT STORIES.—"Not Guilty," by Ella W. Pierce; concluded. "The Romance of Captain Beauty's Life"; illustrated. "Bateau's Quits." an Arizona Romance by W. O. Stoddard; illustrated. "The Robbers of the Gorge," by F. K. Hamilton; illustrated. "Miss Prescott's Three Lovers, and How their Wooing Sped," by Amanda M. Douglas; illustrated. "A Queen of Bohemia," by Marguerite F. Aymar; illustrated. "Given Up by his Friends"; illustrated. "The Mistake of my Life"; illustrated—etc., etc.
SKETCHES.—"Wm. Kennon, the Kentucky Ranger"; illustrated. "Only in Fun," by Karl Dreyr; illustrated. "The Three Cocleis"; illustrated. "Outwitting a Highwayman"; illustrated. "A Singular Old Maid," by Prudence Bowen; illustrated. "How Senator Linn's Life was Saved"; illustrated. "Russian State Prisons," Etc., etc.
POEMS.—"A Barmecidal Feast," by Richard Dowling. "Far Away." "My Lady," by Rina. "Remember," by Ethel De Fonblanque. "The Ballad of Cassandra." "The Sheep's Petition." "Southwick," by J. G. Whittier; illustrated—etc., etc.
MISCELLANY.—"Spanish Belles near Tallahassee." "Why Lace is so Costly." "Sunday Afternoon in Germany." "Suspended Animation." "Glass Beads." "A Pretty Climbing Vine—The Ground Nut"; illustrated. "Glass and its History." "Boxwood." "Power of a Growing Tree." "Recent Progress in Science." "Entertaining Column," etc., etc.

128 QUARTO PAGES—OVER 100 ILLUSTRATIONS,

A Beautiful Colored Plate Frontispiece,

"THE BRIDEGROOM STIRRUP-CUP IN ANDALUSIA."

Single copies, 25 cents; annual subscription, $3; six months, $1.50; four months, $1.

SEND 25 CENTS FOR SPECIMEN COPY.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

FOR SALE,

"INTERLAKEN,"

THE COUNTRY HOME OF THE LATE FRANK LESLIE, ESQ.,

Consisting of 62 acres, situated on LAKE SARATOGA, and extending back to Lake Lonely.

The house contains twelve rooms, gas and water.

The stable, finished in fine woods, has six box-stalls.

Finely appointed billiard-room, and three handsomely furnished sleeping-rooms over coach-house.

Gardener's cottage.

Conservatories profusely stocked with rare plants.

The furniture, steam-yacht, sail and row boats, French omnibus, etc., will be sold with the place.

Apply to

HOMER MORGAN, 2 Pine Street; or,
V. K. STEVENSON, 1 Pine St., and 35 E. 17th St.

Digitized by Google

The Greenback Inflation before the Alabama Election.

BEFORE AND AFTER.

The Greenback Contraction after the said Election.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT!

Keep the Blood cool and the Brain clear by the use of

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT

FISHERMEN!
TWINES AND NETTING
MANUFACTURED BY
WM. E. HOOPER & SONS, Baltimore, Md.
☞ Send for Price-List, naming your County and State.

N.Y. Central & Hudson River R.R.

THE BEST ROUTE EAST OR WEST.

Through Cars between New York or Boston and Chicago or St. Louis.

See NIAGARA FALLS, SARATOGA and the HUDSON.

C. H. MEEKER, General Passenger Agent.

Agents wanted in every town for Dr. HARKER'S INHALERS for

Catarrh, Asthma, Hay Fever and Bronchial

Affections. Large profits. Physicians are its best advocates for agents to sell through. Truly a meritorious article. Address, Brent Good & Co., Wholesale Druggists, 38 and 37 Park Place, New York.

INMAN ROYAL MAIL STEAMERS

For QUEENSTOWN and LIVERPOOL.

NOTICE.—The steamers of this line take Lieutenant Maury's lane routes at all seasons of the year.

CITY OF RICHMOND....Saturday, September 4, 3 P.M.
CITY OF CHESTER...Thursday, September 9, 8:30 A.M.
CITY OF BRUSSELS...Thursday, September 16, 3 P.M.
CITY OF BERLIN.....Saturday, September 25, 10 A.M.
CITY OF MONTREAL...Thursday, September 30, 2 P.M.

From Pier 37, North River, foot of Chariton St.

Cabin, $80 and $100. Return tickets on favorable terms. Steerage, $28. Drafts at lowest rates.

Saloons, state-rooms, smoking and bathrooms amidships.

These steamers do not carry cattle, sheep or pigs.

JOHN G. DALE, Agent, 31 and 33 Broadway, New York.
G. A. FAULK, 105 South Fourth Street, Philadelphia.
L. H. PALMER, 3 Old State House, Boston.
F. C. BROWN, 32 South Clark Street, Chicago.

14 STOP ORGANS
SUB BASS & Oct. Coupler, 4 Set Reeds, $68
Pianos $125 and upwards, sent on trial. Catalogue free. Address, DANIEL F. BEATTY, Washington, N.J.

NICOLL THE TAILOR.

SPRING & SUMMER STYLES.
Diagonals, Worsteds, English Tweeds and Cassimeres,
MADE TO ORDER.

ELECTRIC LIGHTS used in BOTH STORES.
620 BROADWAY,
AND
139 to 151 Bowery, New York.

Samples and Rules for Self-Measurement
SENT BY MAIL.

OPIUM Morphine Habit Cured in 10 to 20 days. No pay till Cured. DR. J. STEPHENS, Lebanon, Ohio

Do Your Own Printing $3 PRESS prints Cards, Labels, &c. Larger size for larger work. For Circulars, Books, Newspapers, Type, Cards, Paper, &c., send stamp to the Manufacturers KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

$55.66 Agents Profit per Week. Will prove it or forfeit $500. $4 Outfit free. E. G. RIDEOUT & CO., 10 Barclay St., N.Y.

TRUSS EGGLESTON SENSIBLE TRUSS. Made on new principles. Send for Circulars. Eggleston Truss, Chicago, Ill.

DR. SCOTT'S ELECTRIC HAIR BRUSH.

A REMARKABLE INVENTION,

Which has won its way to royal favor in England, been cordially indorsed by the Prince and Princess of Wales, and written upon by the Rt. Hon. W. E. Gladstone, is now brought to the notice of the American public. It cures by natural means, will always do good, never harm, and is a remedy lasting for many years. It should be used daily in place of the ordinary Hair Brush. The Brush Handle is made of a new odorless composition resembling ebony, a combination of substances PRODUCING A PERMANENT ELECTRIC VOLTAIC CURRENT, WHICH ACTS IMMEDIATELY UPON THE HAIR GLANDS AND FOLLICLES. This power can always be tested by a silver compass which accompanies each Brush.

It is Warranted to
Cure Nervous Headache in 5 minutes!!
Cure Bilious Headache in 5 minutes!!
Positively remove Scurf and Dandruff!!
Prevent Falling Hair and Baldness!!
Cure all Diseases of the Scalp!!
Promptly arrests Premature Grayness!!
Makes the Hair grow Long and Glossy!!
Immediately soothes the weary Brain!!
Money returned if not as represented!!

IT NEVER FAILS TO PRODUCE A RAPID GROWTH OF HAIR ON BALD HEADS, where the Glands and Follicles are not totally destroyed.

Proprietors: The Pall Mall Electric Association of London. New York Branch: 842 Broadway.

[From REV. DR. BRIDGMAN.]
Brooklyn, June 1st, 1880.

"Gents: I have never before given a testimonial, but am willing to encourage the use of an honest remedy. I am so pleased with your Hair Brush that I deem it my duty to write you recommending it most cordially. My hair, about a year since, commenced falling out, and I was rapidly becoming bald; but since using the Brush a thick growth of hair has made its appearance, quite equal to that which I had previous to its falling out. I have tried other remedies, but with no success. After this remarkable result I purchased one for my wife, who has been a great sufferer from headache, and she finds it a prompt and infallible remedy. A. BRIDGMAN, D.D."

London, Jan. 4th, 1879.

"The Hon. Mrs. Locke deems it a pleasure and duty to state that they have never failed in her case, and many other cases have come under her observation. She also finds them most beneficial for the hair, it being greatly improved by their use."

9 Goodwin St., Bradford, England, Dec. 19th, 1878.

"My Aunt writes me they are the greatest blessing to her, as in all cases they relieve her at once. My hair is growing rapidly, the bald place being quite covered. I do think you ought to make these things known, for the benefit of others, as I am convinced it is the best Hair Renewer yet put before the public. Yours truly, J. JEWETT."

"Over 1,500,000 in use. An honest remedy, worthy of all praise."—British Medical Index.

"ROCKS LAKE CAMP MEETING GROUNDS, Saratoga Co., N. Y., June 9th, 1880.

"Your Brush is certainly a remarkable cure. I am highly pleased with it. Its effect is most wonderful, and you may be sure I shall recommend it heartily among my friends. It is also a splendid Hair Brush, well worth the money, and will last me for years.

REV. J. D. ROGERS, Superintendent."

[From ALLEN PEARCE & CO., Wholesale Druggists.] Beaufort, England, Feb., 1879.

"The effect was really astounding, removing the pain after a few minutes. As far as real value, they are worth a guinea each."

Over 2,000 similar Testimonials can be seen at our Office.

Remember that this is not a "Metallic" Wire Brush, but made of PURE BRISTLES.

A BEAUTIFUL BRUSH, Lasting for Years.

Mention this Paper.

We will send it Postpaid on receipt of $3, Or by Express, C.O.D., at your expense.

Or request your Druggist or Fancy Store to obtain it for you, from us.

MONEY RETURNED IF NOT AS REPRESENTED.

As soon as you receive the Brush, if not well satisfied with your bargain, write us, and we will return the money. What can be fairer?

This paper will not knowingly publish any humbug, and before advertising the Brush one was placed in the hands of the Editor, with a request to test its merits. We have also placed one in the hands of Mayor Cooper and Postmaster James of New York, as a guarantee of our good faith.

Remittances should be made payable to GEO. A. SCOTT, 842 Broadway, New York. Agents wanted in every town.

They can be made in Checks, Post-office Orders, Drafts or Currency, in Registered or Non-registered Letter. It costs only 10 cents to register a letter.

KEEP'S SHIRTS,
Gloves, Umbrellas, Underwear, Etc.
SAMPLES AND CIRCULARS MAILED FREE.
KEEP MANUFACTURING COMPANY,
631, 633, 635, 637 Broadway, N.Y.

Summer Excursions at Low Rates.
Newport, Martha's Vineyard, Nantucket, Isle of Shoals, Old Orchard Beach, Mount Desert, Moosehead and Rangeley Lakes, White Mountains, Saratoga, Niagara Falls, Montreal, Quebec, &c. Send for list of FALL RIVER LINE TOURS AND EXCURSIONS,
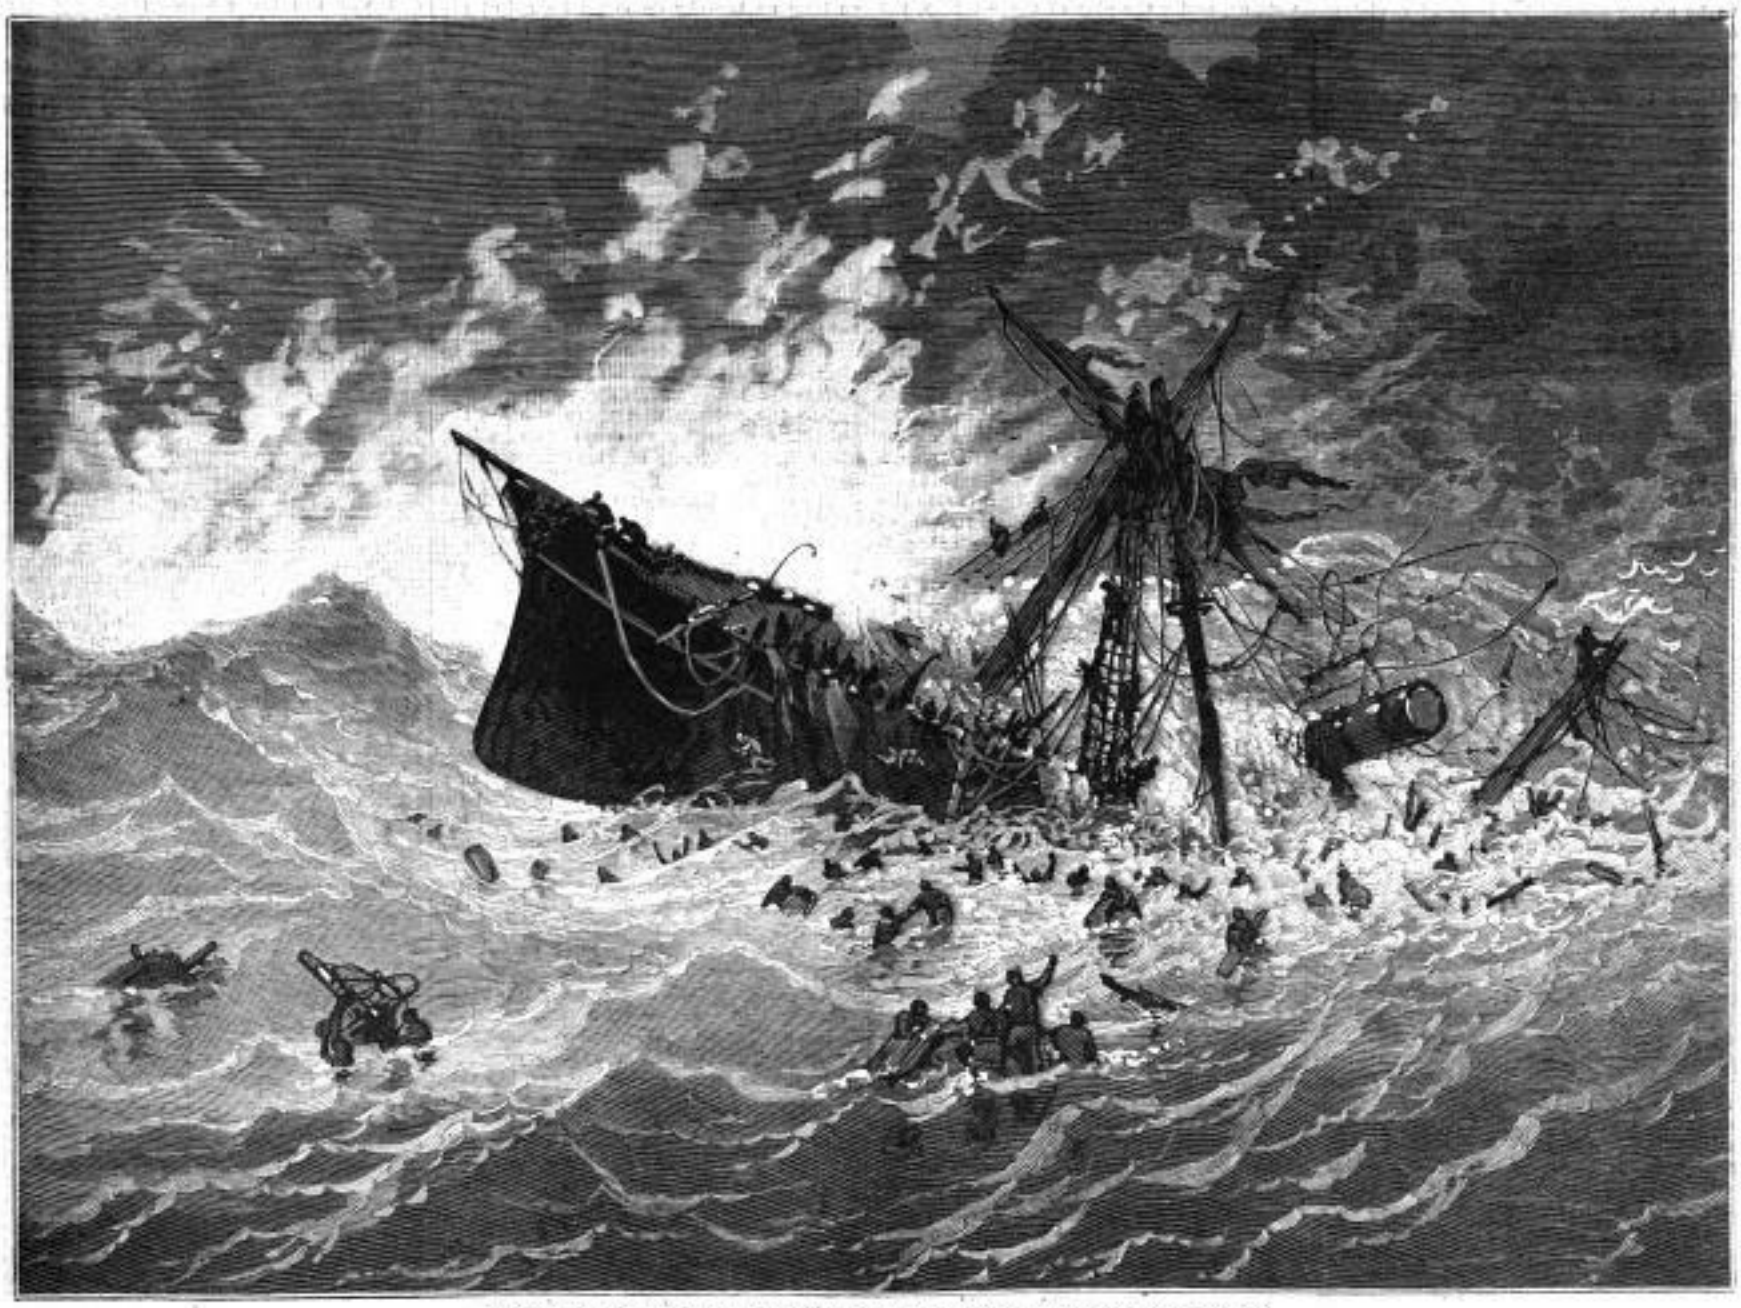
Furnished free.
GEO. L. CONDON, Gen. Pass. Agt., P. O. Box 952, N.Y.

COLUMBIA BICYCLE
The Bicycle has proved itself to be a permanent, practical road-vehicle, and the number in daily use is rapidly increasing. Professional and business men, seekers after health or pleasure, all join in bearing witness to its merits. Send 3c. stamp for catalogue with price list and full information.
THE POPE MFG. CO., 59 Summer St., Boston, Mass.

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1880, by I. W. England, Assignee, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.—Entered at the Post Office, New York, N.Y., as Second-class Matter.



No. 1,303.—Vol. LI. NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 18, 1880. [Price 10 Cents. $4.00 Yearly. 13 Weeks, $1.00.

SCENE ON THE BEACH, NEAR ST. AUGUSTINE, AFTER THE FOUNDERING.

SEAMEN BURYING THE BODIES WASHED ASHORE AT MATANZAS.

FOUNDERING OF THE SHIP AT 5:30 A. M., AFTER BEING SWEPT BY THE CYCLONE.

LOSS OF THE HAVANA STEAMSHIP "CITY OF VERA CRUZ" OFF THE FLORIDA COAST, ON SUNDAY MORNING, AUGUST 29TH.
From Sketches by Ferd. Moreno and J. C. H. Stiles.—See Page 39.

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,
53, 55 & 57 PARK PLACE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 18, 1880.

A NEW STORY BY WILKIE COLLINS.

In No. 1,307 of FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER will be commenced the publication of a powerful serial story, entitled "THE BLACK ROBE," by WILKIE COLLINS. This story, which will be published by us exclusively from advance sheets purchased directly of the author, possesses all the attractions of style, ingenuity of plot and felicitous delineation of character which peculiarly distinguish Mr. Collins's works, and will, we are confident, afford genuine enjoyment to our readers. Persons who desire to have the story complete, as presented in our columns, should send in their subscriptions at once.

POLITICAL "INTIMIDATION."

OUR Independent Republican contemporary, the New York Nation, in recently commenting on the Southern question as involved in the pending Presidential canvass, took occasion to express its belief that "intimidation of colored voters is the rule, and the absence of it the exception, in the Gulf States, that it prevails largely elsewhere; and that it prevails to the greatest extent and is most effective in those places where the colored population is most numerous in proportion to the whole." But while accepting the truth of this representation, our contemporary proceeded to say that it can see no remedy for such a condition of things which does not begin "by infusing courage in the intimidated class." Intimidation finds its ready, if wicked, agents at the South, because it finds its ready-made subjects in the persons of the poor and ignorant blacks, who have been clothed with the elective franchise without knowing how to use it for their own protection or for the welfare of the community. "No person or class liable to be intimidated, bribed or cajoled can be counted," adds the Nation, "as having any political opinions. All such persons are worthless as political factors."

To many minds there will doubtless seem to be a very discernible trace of cynicism, or, at least, of cold political realism, in such frank admissions with regard to the extent of "intimidation" at the South, accompanied as they are with the expressed belief that there is no cure for it except such a cure as shall work a change "in the colored voter's character as well as in his surroundings." But to the reflecting observer it must be obvious that any remedy which is less radical than this must fail to work a cure which shall be permanent as well as thorough.

That the crime of "intimidation" on the part of the whites at the South has its seat in the weakness and ignorance of the colored voters was frankly admitted by the white and colored Republicans of that section who participated in the "conference" held in this city at the opening of the canvass. That experienced political manager, Colonel Sypher, of Louisiana, avowed the opinion that "the black majority at the South is not a safe basis of political power," because it lacks the presence of enough "brave and resolute white men to organize the Republican voters"; and, as a case in point, he instanced Alabama, where, as he said, "the Republican vote had been entirely wiped out because of the lack of a white element resolute enough to sustain it." And ex-Governor Pinchback, speaking for his race in this same "conference," fully indorsed the statements of Colonel Sypher, and explained the decline of the colored Republican Party at the South by the fact that "the colored men have never been taught, from the hour of their enfranchisement to this day, to exercise their manhood."

It will thus be seen that the nature and the inveteracy of the disease are frankly acknowledged even by those who, for political reasons, are not indisposed to assign to it the greatest possible extent. As to the real extent of the evil, we have no means of judging. On the one hand, its existence, to any appreciable degree, is entirely denied by the Democrats, while, on the other, its wide prevalence is assumed by the Republicans in explanation of their overthrow in States like South Carolina, Mississippi and Louisiana, and also in justification of the grounds on which they contend that the whites of the South should not be intrusted with political power at Washington. Perhaps here, as in so many other instances, the truth lies in the middle—that there is more "intimidation" than the Democrats are willing to admit, and not so much as the Republicans are swift to charge.

But whether it exist in a greater or in a less degree, there can be no doubt as to the sources by which the evil is fed. The colored voter is a prey to the terrors of the "intimidator" because he is, by nature and by the force of ancient habit, submissive and timid in the presence of the "old master" race. To expect that it should be otherwise is to expect that Caucasian nature in South Carolina should be something different from Caucasian nature in Massachusetts, if the circumstances of the case were reversed; and it is to expect, besides, that the blood that has crept through slaves for hundreds of years can be converted into the blood of hereditary freemen by an amendment to the Constitution or an Act of Congress.

In so saying we are making no excuse for the crime of "intimidation," as committed by the white race at the South, or as charged by its Republican accusers. We are simply probing the seat of the disease that the nature of the remedy may be apparent to the candid reader. We read in the Holy Book that "there is a needs be that offenses come," but, it is added, "woe to him by whom the offense cometh." The offenses committed against the political rights of the colored voter at the South are sometimes excused in the name of "civilization," said to be placed in jeopardy by the predominance of an ignorant class, totally unfitted for the arts of government. We are pointed to the experiences of South Carolina, in the days of the carpetbag domination, when, as Governor Chamberlain mournfully wrote, "the civilization of the Huguenot and of the Puritan was in peril." But such excuses as these only emphasize the existence of the evil which they are meant to palliate. They plead in extenuation of wrong-doing the maxim that there is a "needs be that offenses come," without affording any shelter against the woe denounced on him by whom the offense cometh. The very suspicion of "intimidation" is a source of constant reproach to the whites of the South, and there will be a suspicion of it as long as there is enough of ignorance and infirmity in the colored race to justify and nurture such a suspicion.

Nothing but the education, the political enlightenment and the material prosperity of the colored voters, as a mass, can serve to make them valuable "political factors" in the State. The blacks of the South will never be "a safe basis of political power" either to their party or to the country until that power rests on intelligence and on property—the two great predominant factors in every civilized society. The forces of free discussion must divide the colored vote as, under the play of these forces, the vote of the whites is divided at the North. The Republicans must renounce their claim to the negro's vote because he is black, and because he "belongs" to their party by natural right. They must establish their claim to his suffrage, as well as the Democrats must establish theirs, by an appeal to his intellect and to his interests. Anything less than this will leave room for "intimidation," or for the suspicion of it.

In so saying we have pronounced an opinion on many political specifics offered periodically for the cure of "intimidation." It is not to be cured by new Acts of Congress, by a new appeal to the power of the bayonet, not even by more rigid Federal election laws or by their more punitive enforcement. Just as little can it be cured, as Mr. Blaine argues, by bringing the coercive power of a "Solid North" to bear on the coercive power of a "Solid South." This is to make the evil organic, and to plant it as a perennial root of bitterness in the very bosom of the republic. The root must be exterminated, and it can be exterminated by nothing less than the same intelligence and manhood which enable the white man to know his rights—and to maintain them. And hence it is as a step in this direction, but only a step, that we should welcome the discussion of pending political issues before the colored voters of the South by the ablest among the Republican speakers of the North. It would not inaugurate a political millennium, but it would be the beginning of a new era for the politics of the North as well as the politics of the South.

SOUTHERN PROSPERITY

THE South is sharing equally with the North the benefits of the business "boom" which has set in within the last year. Not only are old industries active and prosperous, but many new enterprises have been started which give employment to skilled laborers and bring handsome returns to capital. The New Orleans Picayune, speaking of the prosperous condition of affairs in that city, says:

"The season just drawing to a close has been propitious. The commerce of the city has expanded beyond expectations. The imports and exports aggregate $104,000,000, against $71,000,000 last year—an increase of nearly fifty per cent. The clearings of the associated banks, which very closely reflect the volume of business, have reached the splendid aggregate of $450,000,000, overtopping the figures of the preceding season nearly $100,000,000. A million and a quarter tons of shipping have come to our wharves and obtained cargoes. We have dispatched 900,000 tons of shipping to foreign ports, an amount never equaled in the palmy days before the war. We have handled more cotton than ever came here since 1861. The grain trade has expanded until it has furnished whole or partial cargoes to 318 vessels—one for every working-day in the year. The manufacturing interests of the city have had an unequaled prosperity. Northern capital has passed judgment upon our future by coming in to supply the needed transportation facilities. More miles of rails will be laid within the State during the next year than during any twelve months in our history. Western shipyards are busy supplying the large tonnage demanded for the Western trade. The land lines of the Northwest have been brought into cooperation with the water route, and are becoming auxiliaries in building up the commerce seeking an outlet through the mouth of the Mississippi River."

The Mobile Register, summing up the business situation in that city, says:

"There can be no dispute about the fact that Mobile is upon rising ground. Our trade is in a most healthy condition; our financial institutions are as solvent as any in the land; we have no bank failures; real estate is improving in value in virtue of diminished taxation; our first ocean steamer is built, and carries 5,000 bales of cotton from our wharves at each regular trip; our sanitary condition is excellent, and our whole people are hopeful."

From other cities the reports are equally cheerful and encouraging. The new South already eclipses the old in all the elements of real, solid prosperity.

LIBEL BY LAWSUIT.

IN a recent article we had occasion to comment upon the inefficiency of the law as a means of protection against libel or of redress for the grievance. It remains to be observed that the law sometimes goes further, and becomes, as it were, an accessory to the offense, lending its own machinery to aid the purposes of the libeler, offering him complete immunity from punishment, and leaving the injured party without redress or remedy. A case lately decided by our Supreme Court will serve as an apt illustration.

A married woman in this city, living apart from her husband, being desirous of obtaining a dissolution of the nuptial tie, brought her suit for an absolute divorce on the ground of adultery. As one of the grounds for the relief asked she charged her husband with an improper intimacy with an unmarried woman, occupying a position where such a charge, if sustained, would be a special injury to her interests, in addition to the damage naturally resulting from it in the shape of wounded feelings and loss of character. The husband, if guilty, having none of that gallantry which induced a distinguished personage in England under similar circumstances, as it was said, to go upon the witness stand and "perjure himself like a gentleman" in order to defend the character of the lady, or, if innocent, being probably indifferent as to what charges were made against him, so long as thereby he could be rid of his wife, made no defense, and the case was about going in favor of the plaintiff by default. At this point the lady inculpated, having heard of the charge, intervened; and upon papers showing the special grievance of such a charge being allowed to go uncontradicted, moved the Court to allow her to be made a party to the suit, and to defend her reputation by repelling the charges before the court. This application was denied, on the ground, no doubt, that it was unprecedented, and that the Court had no power to grant it. On appeal to the General Term the lady fared a little better, but still did not succeed to her heart's desire. The Court declined to allow her to be made a party defendant, but, as a matter of favor, allowed her to appear by counsel before the referee, and there subject the plaintiff's witnesses to cross-examination, and thus incidentally repel the accusations against her.

The circumstances of this case and the decision thereon strongly suggest the propriety of adopting the course long practiced in England, where a person similarly accused is made what they call a "co-respondent," with all the rights as to defense of an original party, and where also the representative of the Crown is entitled to intervene to prevent collusion and injustice. A bill in harmony with this idea, we learn, was introduced into our Legislature last Winter, but failed to meet the approval of that body.

It would naturally occur to the mind of a layman that in the case above referred to, if it turned out that the charges against the unmarried lady were malicious and unfounded, the law would afford her redress in the shape of damages against the wife for the injury sustained. But such is not the case. It is true there is a maxim in law that there is no wrong without a remedy, and yet it is the unquestioned law that a person may be most grossly injured in name and in business by defamatory language written or spoken in the course of a legal proceeding, however false or malicious it may be, and no action for damages therefor can be sustained. The theory is, to quote from a standard text-book, that what "is spoken or written in a legal proceeding, by a party or counsel, pertinent and material to the controversy, or reasonably deemed necessary to the cause, however defamatory, is privileged, and its truth cannot be drawn in question in an action for slander or libel. No action lies for a statement thus made, whether by affidavit or viva voce, even though it be alleged to have been made "falsely and maliciously, and without any reasonable or probable cause."

It does seem remarkable, while the law affords an ample remedy for a malicious arrest or prosecution of a criminal nature, that equally grave injuries to character by the methods above indicated are utterly remediless. The pretense urged is that there must be the most perfect freedom accorded to parties to a judicial investigation, regardless of the consequences following statements which appear to be necessary or reasonable. But it is certainly difficult to find any difference in principle between the case of a man falsely accused of theft before a magistrate and a virtuous woman falsely accused of adultery in a civil action where she has no means of defense. The true theory should be, as it is in regard to the press, that there should be a perfect freedom of action in making such statements as may be deemed necessary, but at the same time there should be an equal responsibility for the abuse of the privilege. Any other principle virtually offers a premium to malice, and makes the law an accomplice to a wrong.

As the law now stands, every one's character is at the mercy of any evil-minded person who has the ingenuity to put his publication in the shape of a libel or lawsuit.

BALANCING THE BOOKS.

IT can at least be said for President Hayes that he does not demean his exalted office by any actual participation in partisan contentions. In all his public addresses he carefully avoids the discussion of those political topics which several members of his Cabinet are actively debating on the hustings in Ohio, Indiana and elsewhere. Perhaps the most timely and instructive of the addresses which he has made was that delivered at the great reunion of army veterans at Canton, Ohio, last week. Confining himself to the subjects of popular education and the revival of business prosperity, he presented an array of facts which are absolutely conclusive as to both points considered. As to the need of education, he said: "In our country, as everywhere else, it will be found that, in the long run, ignorant voters are powder and ball for the demagogues. The failure to support free schools in any part of our country tends to cheapen and degrade the right of suffrage, and will ultimately destroy its value in every other part of the republic. The unvarying testimony of history is, that the nations which win the most renowned victories in peace and war are those which provide ample means for popular education." As to the wonderful industrial revival and the present business outlook of the country, the President, after stating that the expenditures of the Government growing out of the war of the rebellion amounted to the sum of $6,189,929,908, remarked:

"This great sum has all been paid in the last nineteen years, except the present amount of the national debt. Deducting the debt which still remains from this statement of the cost of the war, and it appears that during the four years of the war, and in the fifteen years which have since elapsed, the United States has paid, in excess of all the ordinary and extraordinary expenses of the Government in time of peace, more than $4,275,000,000 on account of the war. This is an average of about $225,000,000 per year of war expenditures for the last nineteen years. These enormous payments were made chiefly during the war and in the years immediately following the war. That such vast expenditures by the Government should lead to an inflated currency, to extravagant living, and to reckless enterprises, and that these in turn should be followed by that tremendous event, a financial panic, and its attendant ruin and distress, were inevitable, and were a part of the price we paid for a restored Union, for a stable Government, and for human freedom. On the 31st of August, 1865, the total debt resulting from the war was $2,756,431,571.43; the interest-bearing debt was $2,381,530,294.96; and the annual interest charge was $150,977,697.87. Now, after exactly fifteen years have passed, the total debt, less cash in the Treasury, is $1,900,000,000; the interest-bearing debt is $1,723,203,100; and the annual interest charge is $72,633,981. Fifteen years ago the share of the national debt of each inhabitant of the United States was $78.25, and each person's share of the interest charge was $4.29. Thousands were induced to believe that such a debt could never be paid, and that our national debt, like that of England, would be a perpetual burden upon ourselves and our posterity. Now, however, the debt has diminished in less than one-half for each inhabitant of what it was in 1865, and the interest charge, per capita, is scarcely more than one-third of what it was fifteen years ago.

"Such being the favorable state of our debt, let us for a moment examine the condition of our resources. In the twenty-five years next prior to five years ago, the excess of imports over exports—the balance of trade against us—was $1,500,000,000, and the average annual excess of imports was more than $60,000,000. In that period of a quarter of a century there were only three years in which the exports exceeded the imports, and in those three years the average annual excess of exports was only about $9,000,000. Compare this condition of trade with the last five years, during which the excess of exports over imports—the balance of trade in our favor—has been $922,179,828, or a yearly average of about $185,000,000.

"In a period of thirty years prior to 1880, there has been only one year in which we received into the country from abroad more of the precious metals than we sent out of the country. That year was an exceptional year—at the beginning of the war. In 1861 our imports of gold and silver exceeded the exports $16,568,230. In all other years, except the last, our exports of the precious metals have exceeded our imports per year from $4,000,000 to $50,000,000, and have averaged at least $40,000,000 a year. In 1880, the last fiscal year, the imports of gold and silver exceeded the exports $75,821,291—a gain from abroad of the precious metals over the previous year of $80,092,832, and a gain over the average yearly balance of thirty years past of $115,000,000. This gain, in the precious metals alone, of over $75,000,000, in the first year after the resumption of specie payments, in the face of confident predictions that resumption would result in a ruinous contraction of the currency, may well encourage those who wish to take the remaining steps necessary to reach a perfectly sound and healthy condition of the currency. Whatever intrusions into our financial system the elements of steadiness, certainty and unquestioned good faith, have always been found to increase the facility with which legitimate business can procure the capital it needs. Plausible predictions of contraction and distress are always in such cases falsified by the results."

Digitized by Google

The President referred further to the facts that our foreign commerce has increased from $399,686,689 in 1851 to $1,503,679,489 in 1880; that the tonnage of American and foreign vessels entered at United States ports has increased from 5,000,194 tons in 1860, to 15,291,045 tons for this year, owing to the shipment to foreign countries of an unprecedented supply of the products of American farms; that the increase of exports of those products has been about 240 per cent. in seven years, and 27 per cent. since last year—completing his exhibit by the statement: "Never could the man engaged in legitimate industry or business reckon more confidently upon reasonable remuneration for his labor and capital than at the present time."

While eager partisans on one side and another are hotly proclaiming that the country is going headlong to ruin, and that the triumph of this or that party will bring the wolf to every man's door, it is well to be reminded, on the high authority of the Chief Executive, that the elements of our prosperity are real and substantial, and that whatever may be the issue of the political conflict now waging, these elements will remain, securing to us a future of even grander possibilities than those we are now so wisely utilizing.

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

THE raising of the siege of Candahar has been the most important event abroad during the past week. This city is situated on a plain of considerable extent, surrounded on all sides by precipitous mountains through which there are but few passes. Consequently, an army besieging Candahar has no means of retreat should the passes be commanded by a hostile force. It was this fact which compelled Ayoob Khan to retreat into the mountainous region to the west of Candahar. When the news of General Burrows's retreat thither became known there were three simultaneous movements of the British forces. General Stewart retreated from Cabul on Jellalabad in order to keep that road to India open. General Roberts advanced from Cabul upon Candahar, some three hundred and twenty miles distant, by way of Khelat-i-Ghilzai, and General Phayre also advanced upon Cabul from Quetta, some one hundred and forty miles to the southeast. It was generally expected that General Phayre would arrive at Candahar a fortnight before General Roberts, but owing to the difficulties which he encountered he has not yet arrived, while General Roberts marched into Candahar more than a week before he was due. As soon as Ayoob Khan heard that General Roberts was marching upon his rear, and that should he remain before Candahar his retreat would be cut off, he fell back to the westward and took up a strong position at Mazra, in the valley of the Argandab River, which flows four miles from the town in a southwesterly direction and falls into the Helmund at a distance of eighty miles from Candahar. Here he was attacked by General Roberts on September 3d. According to Colonel St. John, Ayoob Khan's force consisted of 4,000 regulars, four regiments of Ghazis, of whom only one-third had firearms, 200 cavalry, and 28 guns. The plans for the attack were carefully made, and based upon reconnoissances which put General Roberts in possession of full information of the location and strength of Ayoob's camp. The attack was made with four brigades, which marched cheerfully over the difficult road, dragging their artillery, and never complaining of the labor. On arriving in front of Ayoob's camp, the assault was begun at once with vigor. His intrenchments and outworks were less formidable than had been anticipated, and the defenders were driven from them by a heavy artillery and infantry fire. The Afghans resisted stoutly for a time, but their lack of discipline made their defeat a foregone conclusion at close quarters. With the loss of his guns, Ayoob's army took to flight by way of the ford across Argandab River. He lost all his camp equipage. The British loss was considerable. General Roberts's column consisted of two regiments of Highlanders and one of rifles, three regiments of Ghoorkhas, three of Sikhs and three of Punjabis, with a Lancer regiment, two regiments of cavalry and eighteen guns.

The Eastern question still remains unsettled. Dulcigno has not been ceded to Montenegro, and the Albanians seem to become every day more strong in their resistance. Albanian volunteers continue to come in in small numbers, and there are about 2,500 now in the town of Dulcigno. The Albanian chiefs declare that if a naval demonstration be made, the forces of the League will at once enter Montenegro and take possession of Padgoritza. At the same time, they allow that the presence of the fleets would render any prolonged resistance impossible. The Porte apparently approves of the resistance of the Albanians, for Riza Pasha, the Turkish commander, has thirteen batteries at his disposal, and yet allows the continued Albanian concentration upon the Montenegrin frontier. The Sultan would probably at once yield if he believed that there would be any movement except a harmless naval demonstration. Many well-informed persons believe that a naval demonstration will prove useless, and that troops will have to be landed and active measures of coercion adopted. It is reported that England and Russia have given orders to their commanders to treat with the Albanian chiefs; but Austria, and probably Germany, object to this course, and the Porte has signally failed in gaining Austria's good will in the Greek frontier question.

The unusually prolonged session of the British Parliament still endures, and the heated discussion of Irish measures adds to its length. The House of Commons passed the Irish Constabulary Bill by an overwhelming majority, and obstructive measures were not again resorted to by the Irish members. The House of Lords somewhat foolishly rejected the Bill for the registration of voters in Ireland, a measure similar to the law prevailing in England. Thereupon Mr. Parnell arose in his wrath and insisted upon talking on the registration clause to the Appropriation Bill. This he was not allowed to do, and he offered a resolution reflecting upon the Lords, and affirming that Ireland had no chance of redress in the Imperial Parliament—a resolution, however, which the Government rejected. Mr. Thomas Power O'Connor, the Home Rule member for Galway, had also a resolution condemning the Lords for opposing all measures for the improvement of the condition of the people of England, Ireland and Scotland, but it only received thirteen votes, and Mr. O'Connor is probably now less sanguine in his hopes of overturning the British Constitution. How necessary the constabulary is in Ireland is shown by the great increase in the Molly Maguires, who are being enrolled in this murderous organization all over the country. The Employers' Liability Bill and the Hares and Rabbits Bill are both making satisfactory progress in the House of Lords, but they will be found somewhat shorn when they get through the Upper House.

The second term for the expulsion of the religious educational establishments in France, in accordance with the March decrees, has now almost expired, and it is uncertain whether the Government will not make some relaxation in their favor. During the late visit to Cherbourg, M. Grévy expressed himself on several occasions as kindly disposed towards the religious party, and it is hoped that some arrangement can be made. The three large Jesuit schools in Paris have been evacuated, and the new civil directors have been installed in the vacant posts. There were altogether twenty-eight educational institutions in France presided over by Jesuits, and containing over eleven thousand pupils. During the last thirty years the Jesuits have educated over sixty thousand Frenchmen, of whom about two thousand five hundred have subsequently entered the Governmental schools, such as the Polytechnique. Whether the Government will supply a better system of education remains to be seen.

THE veteran, Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia, has been renominated for Congress, and will be elected practically without opposition. Mr. Stephens is not liked by some leaders of his party, but he has the confidence of the great body of Democrats at the South, no less because of his independence of clique domination than for his distinguished ability and great purity of life.

THE annual report of Comptroller Kelly states that the debt of this city amounted on the first of January last to $119,811,310. The Comptroller estimates the next tax rate at 2.53, and gives as the reason for the increase the proposed building of water reservoirs, the opening of streets in the annexed district and the issue of $750,000 worth of bonds for the East River Bridge.

THE business of the Postal Department is honestly, if not altogether efficiently, managed. A recent report shows that the total receipts of that service from April, 1877, to June, 1879, amounted to $258,569,869, while the entire losses of the department for that period were only $1,299. No private business of like magnitude has ever been managed at a minimum of loss at all approaching the figures here given.

IT is intimated that the death of Judge Spofford will not, as was supposed, put an end to the contest over Kellogg's seat in the United States Senate. The plan of the Louisiana Democrats is now said to be to regard Spofford's decease as having created a vacancy, which the Governor of the State will undertake to fill, sending on his appointee to take up the fight next Winter. Senator Kellogg's term will expire in January, 1882, and he is not likely to be disturbed in his seat by the present or any other device which his opponents may employ against him.

THE New Jersey Democracy occupy a curious position on the tariff question. In their convention last week they gave their "hearty approval" to the Cincinnati platform which declares "for a tariff for revenue only," and then proceeded to adopt a resolution "that the Democratic Party in this State is in favor of such a tariff as will best protect our home industries!" Such conspicuous inconsistency as this can only disgust honest voters, and it can only be accounted for on the supposition that the New Jersey Democrats believe themselves to be strong enough to do and say anything, however scandalous and incoherent.

THE "barrel" promises to be an influential factor in the present Presidential contest. In Indiana, Mr. English has announced that he will contribute whatever may be needed to achieve success, while in New York and elsewhere, Federal office-holders are being assessed by the Republicans in aid of their campaign funds. There is, of course, a certain amount of legitimate expenditure in every canvass, but when money is expended in the purchase of voters and in "colonizing" and other frauds, positive mischief is done to our whole representative system. The money which is spent annually for illegitimate political purposes would maintain, without charge to the people, common schools enough for the education of all the children of every State in the Union.

THE growth of the English education system in the last ten years has been somewhat remarkable. In 1870 the number of scholars on the register was 1,693,000, and the average attendance 1,152,000. In 1879 the number of scholars registered was 3,710,000, and the average attendance reached 2,595,000. It is estimated that some 400,000 or 500,000 children still remain to be brought in. The total cost of the present educational appliances for elementary schools in England and Wales last year was $23,875,000. About $100,000,000 has been spent in building alone, by voluntary bodies and school boards, since 1870, of which $65,000,000 was spent by the school boards. As illustrating the excellent character of the instruction given in the elementary schools, it is stated that in Manchester, of seventy-two open scholarships to the grammar-school, sixty-two were gained by boys in these schools whose parents belonged to the artisan class.

ALL the indications point to a Democratic defeat in Maine. The attempted fusion has proved a delusion and failure, and the Republicans are likely to carry the State by a fair majority. No man who believes in honesty in politics will regret this result. The Democrats deserve their defeat, both for their betrayal of honest finance and for their infamous attempt last Winter to secure by fraud and violence what they had failed to secure in a fair test of strength at the polls. Were the people of Maine to indorse these twin political enormities, the reputation of the State would receive a blow from which it could not recover in years. If a defeat of the Democracy shall also follow in Indiana, where the same unprincipled alliance has been made between them and the Greenbackers, right-thinking citizens will be apt to regard the result as anything but a disaster. Parties now and then need pretty strong doses of bitter medicine to cure them of their follies and excesses, and in aggravated cases a double dose is often absolutely essential to a complete recovery.

THE Pan-Presbyterian Council, which will convene in Philadelphia on the 23d instant, will be attended by from 350 to 400 delegates, representing all divisions and subdivisions of the Presbyterian Church in this country, England, Scotland, Ireland, Germany, Switzerland, France, Holland, Belgium, Hungary, Italy, Australia, Canada and India. Among the subjects upon which papers are to be read, and which will be discussed by the delegates, are "Future Retribution," "The Inspiration, Authenticity and Interpretation of the Scriptures," "Modern Theological Thought," "Creeds and Confessions," "Bible Revision," and "Presbyterianism and Liberty." It is said, as showing the representative character of this council, that there are now 22,000 parishes belonging to the different organizations of the Presbyterian Church. Of these, 5,023 are in Europe, 5,038 in Great Britain, 1,641 in the British colonies and 10,000 in the United States. The latter include a membership of over a million, and represent nearly one-tenth of the population of the country. To the above totals should be added several hundred churches which are planted on mission fields.

THE season at the watering-places is practically over, and within the past week tens of thousands of city residents have returned to their homes. On the last two days of August over 25,000 persons left Long Branch and other New Jersey coast resorts, twenty-nine trains of ten cars each being run in a single day for the accommodation of the moving crowds. The exodus was, no doubt, hastened by the cold storm which for a day or two swept the coast. The season has been one of unprecedented prosperity at "the Branch" and contiguous resorts, and hotel proprietors are jubilant over their unusual gains. One of the principal hotels reports a profit of $100,000 on the Summer business. Many improvements are contemplated at and around Long Branch during the Fall and Winter, and next year, with five new hotels and other added attractions, the Summer population of that part of the coast will perhaps be very considerably greater than ever before. The entire New Jersey shore, as far south as Barnegat, now promises to be thickly occupied by Summer residents within three or four years.

THE magnitude of the wealth which may be reaped from cotton culture in this country is very inadequately appreciated. Mr. Edward Atkinson, one of our most careful statistical writers, says that the present crop of cotton will exceed 6,000,000 bales, being larger than the largest crop ever raised by slave labor, and that if it reach this aggregate, it will produce 3,000,000 tons of cotton seed, besides seed for planting, which will yield 90,000,000 gallons of oil, 1,350,000 tons of oil-cake, and 1,500,000 tons of hulls suitable for making paper. Each ton of oil-seed meal will keep five sheep six months. Thus the cotton-seed crop will support millions of sheep and return to the land the fertilizer needed to grow more cotton. He further says that the present cotton acreage of the South covers less than two per cent. of the cotton-growing area in the United States. Mr. Atkinson suggests that a cotton exhibition would stimulate development, and it would certainly seem that every attainable agency should be employed to realize the vast possibilities which his figures suggest. The North is concerned equally with the South in the utmost possible utilization of the industrial and commercial opportunities which a kindly Providence has placed within our reach.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.

A COMPANY has been formed in this city to build a ship canal across Cape Cod.

A NATIONAL convention of Free-thinkers was held at Hornellsville, N. Y., last week.

THE Treasury Department is considering the subject of reviving the fractional currency.

THE reduction of the public debt during the month of August amounted to $12,027,168.

THE crews of the 137 life-saving stations on the Atlantic coast, numbering 822 men, went on duty September 1st.

THE Park Commissioners have been notified that the statue of Admiral Farragut is ready to be placed in Central Park.

THE funded debt of Philadelphia is $49,565,192. For the current year the sum of $8,287,761 must be raised by taxation.

PRESIDENT HAYES and party are en route for California. The President has been enthusiastically received at all points.

DURING the month of August 25,300 emigrants arrived at Castle Garden, 4,000 in excess of the number for any August for twenty years past.

GENERAL GRANT will preside and Senator Conkling speaks at the grand opening campaign meeting of the Republicans in this city some time this month.

LATE dispatches state that nearly all the Southern Utes have ratified the new treaty, which is elsewhere referred to in connection with Chief Ouray's death.

GENERAL WEAVER has announced that he does not sanction any union of the Greenbackers with the Democrats in Maine nor with the Republicans in West Virginia.

THERE is considerable excitement in Troy, N. Y., over a report that an epidemic of small pox has broken out there. Fifty cases were reported up to the night of the 3d.

THE New Jersey Prohibitionists have nominated Stephen B. Ransom, a lawyer, for Governor, with a full Electoral ticket. The Republicans of Kansas have nominated Governor St. John for re-election.

THE receipts of cotton at New Orleans during the commercial year ending September 1st, amounted to 1,726,185, and the exports to 1,695,718 bales. The receipts of sugar reached 142,045 hogsheads.

THE New Jersey Democrats have nominated Mr. George C. Ludlow, a former State Senator, for Governor. The Massachusetts Democrats have nominated Hon. Charles P. Thompson for the same office.

AMONG recent nominations for Congress are those of Hon. John H. Reagan in the First Texas District, General E. S. Bragg in the Fifth Wisconsin District, and Hon. John Hill in the Fifth New Jersey District.

AT the Geneva (N. Y.) regatta, on September 3d, the four-oared event was won by the Albany crew, the amateur single-scull race by Murray, the pair-oared by Holmes and Woodbury, and the professional race by Riley.

JUDGE JAMES JACKSON, Associate Judge of the Supreme Court, has been appointed Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Georgia by Governor Colquitt, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Judge Hiram Warner.

THE Irving Hall and Tammany Hall Democrats of this city have effected a union on the basis of an equal division of the Congressional and Assembly district nominations between the two factions. The division was made by drawing lots.

THE American Association for the Advancement of Science closed its twenty-ninth meeting at Boston, September 1st. The meeting was one of the most successful ever held. The number of papers entered was 280; number of persons registered, 979; number of new members elected, 626.

THE death was announced on the 4th inst. of the Rev. Samuel D. Denison, D. D., Honorary Secretary of the Committee for Foreign Missions of the Protestant Episcopal Church, at White Plains, aged 70; and of the well-known missionary pioneer of South Africa, Rev. Daniel Lindley, D.D., at Morristown, N. Y., aged 83.

A MEETING of the National Board of Steam Navigation was held at Norfolk, Va., last week. A resolution was adopted earnestly recommending to Congress the duty of fostering a system of training for the navy and mercantile marine, whereby we shall not be under the necessity of calling upon captains and crews of every nation but our own to command and sail our merchant ships.

Foreign.

SELENIC apoplexy has been discovered in three cargoes of American cattle recently landed in England.

BY the falling of a bridge over the Ebro, in Spain, last week, ninety-six soldiers, including the lieutenant who laid the pontoons, were killed.

A VAST amount of property was destroyed and many ships were wrecked by the great hurricane which broke over Kingston, Jamaica, on August 18th.

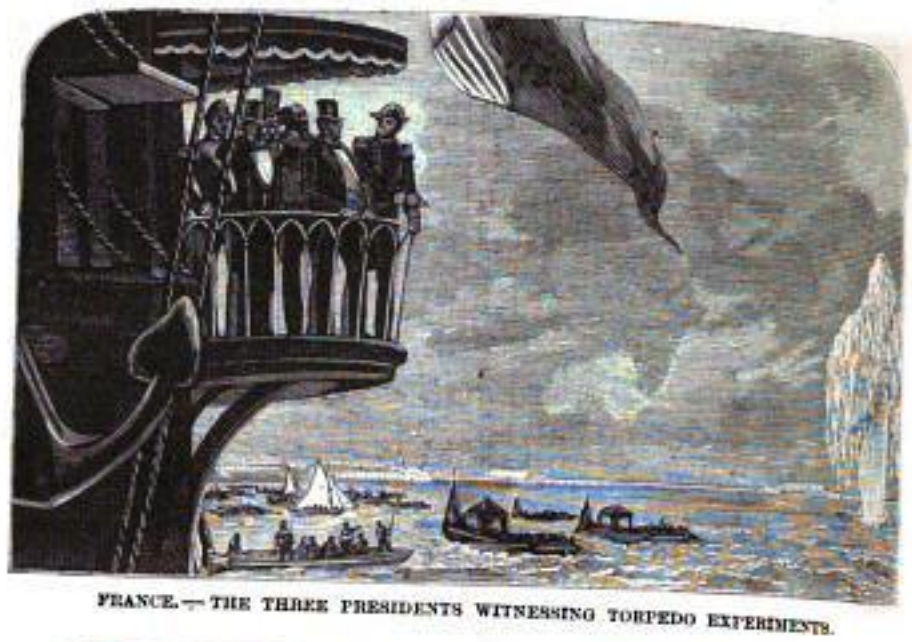
PREMIER DE FREYCINET is said to be losing ground in France, and a Ministerial crisis seems more than ever inevitable at the opening of the session of the Chambers.

THE Albanian leaders have assured the Sultan of their determination to defend the integrity of their country. England and Russia have instructed their commanders to endeavor to treat with them.

THE Supply Bill, on Friday night, September 3d, passed through committee of the House of Commons. Several amendments were rejected, one of them to cut off the appropriation for the House of Lords, and one to tack on to the Bill the Irish Registration Bill.

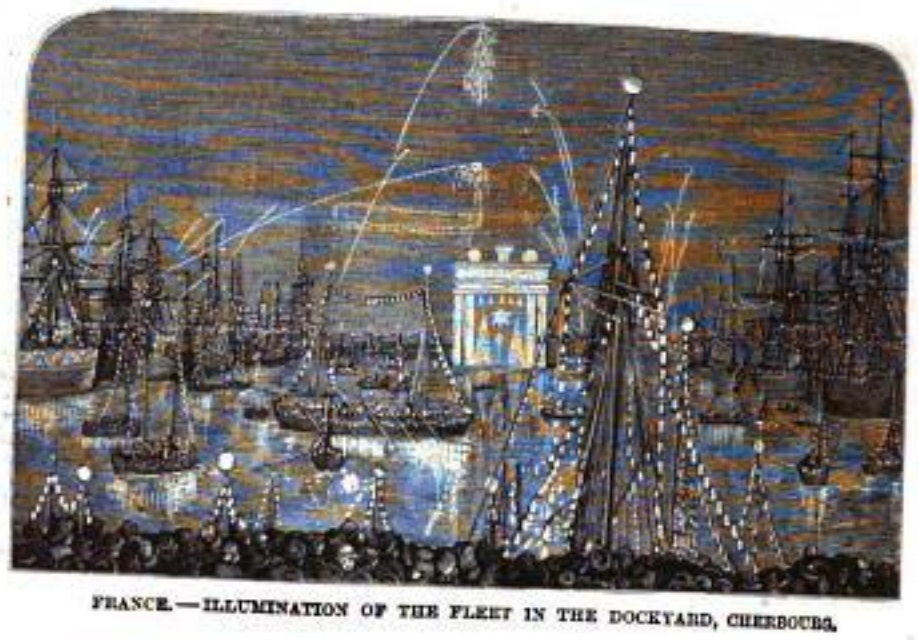
IT is reported in London that a preliminary treaty of peace has been signed at Lima, and the following are its principal articles: Peru surrenders the monitors Manco Capac and Atahualpa, razes the fortifications of Callao, surrenders all the artillery of Callao, engages to not augment the navy for twenty years, and will reimburse to Chili the cost of the war. Chili engages to pay half of the exterior debt of Peru.

THE House of Commons has passed the Bill to permit the burial of Dissenters in all churchyards and cemeteries without the Church of England service. It has also refused to concur in the amendments made by the Lords to the Employers' Liability Bill. An Irish demonstration against the House of Lords was held in Hyde Park, London, on Sunday last. A monster meeting of the Land League agitators is being arranged for the 19th instant.

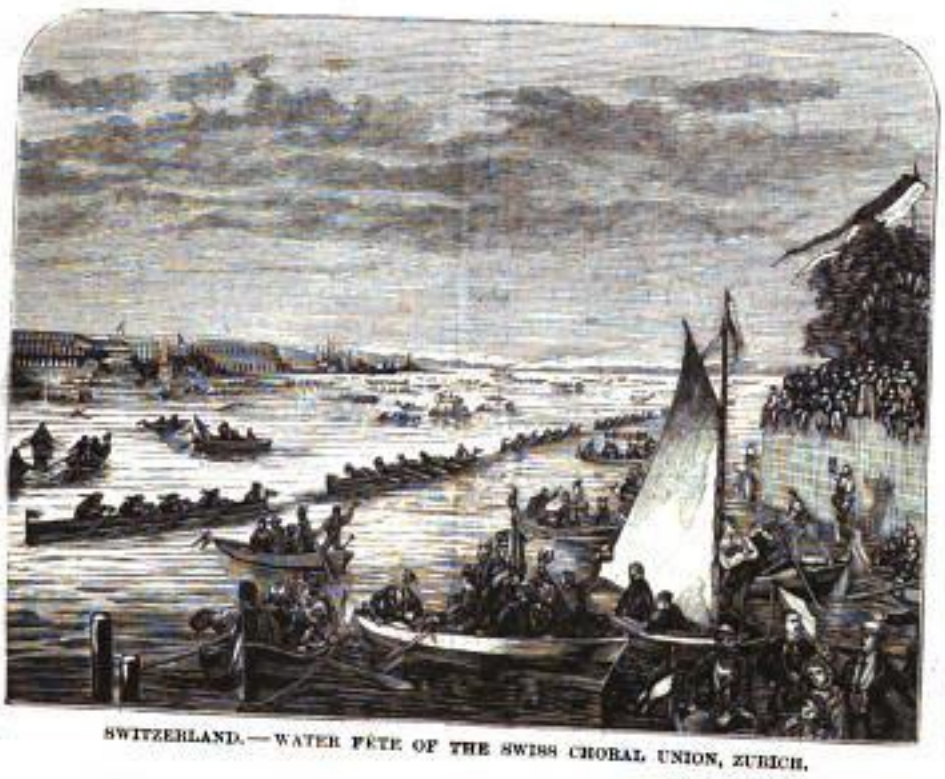


MINISTER LOWELL has sent a circular to a number of English authors asking their views as to the acceptability of a copyright treaty protecting books manufactured in a country granting a copyright by a subject or citizen thereof. Within three months of the publication in the country of the author or owner, the stereotype plates may be exported from one country to the other without forfeiting the right of protection of books printed therefrom.

Digitized by Google

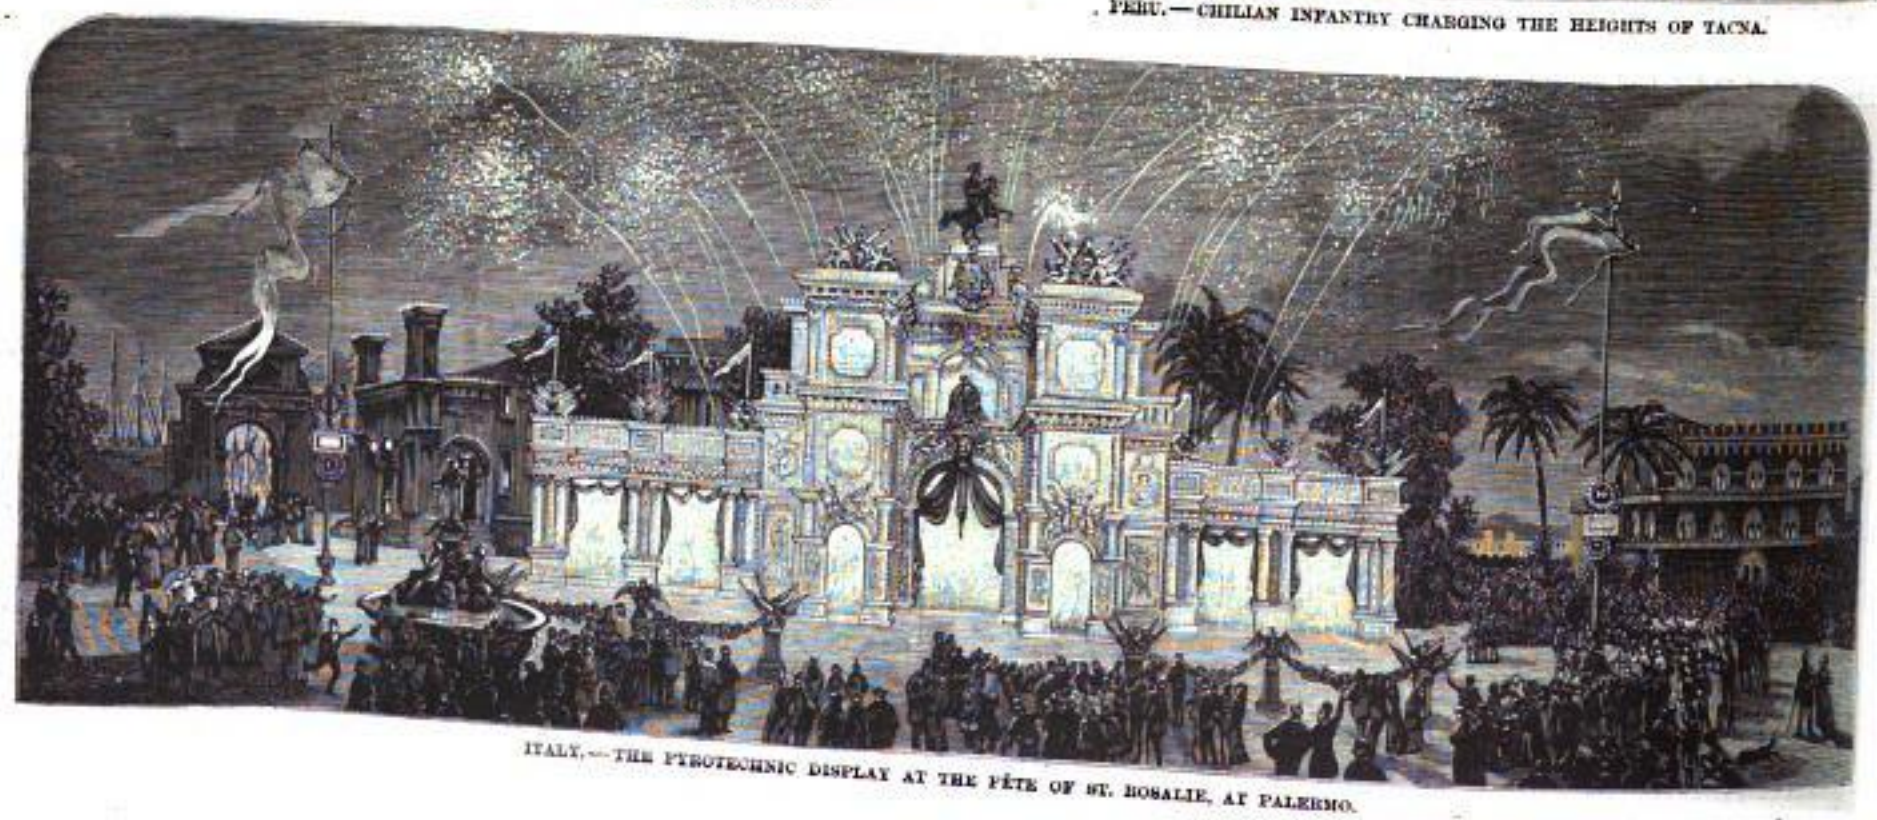


The Pictorial Spirit of the Illustrated Foreign Press.—SEE PAGE 39.



FRANCE.—ARRIVAL OF THE PRESIDENT AT THE ARSENAL, CHERBOURG.

FRANCE.—THE THREE PRESIDENTS WITNESSING TORPEDO EXPERIMENTS.



FRANCE.—ILLUMINATION OF THE FLEET IN THE DOCKYARD, CHERBOURG.

SWITZERLAND.—WATER FÊTE OF THE SWISS CHORAL UNION, ZURICH.

PERU.—CHILIAN INFANTRY CHARGING THE HEIGHTS OF TACNA.

ITALY.—THE PYROTECHNIC DISPLAY AT THE FÊTE OF ST. ROSALIE, AT PALERMO.

Digitized by Google

THE GREAT TROTTING FEAT OF ST. JULIEN.

THE great turf event of the year was the effort of the famous horse St. Julien, at Charter Oak Park, Hartford, on August 27th, to beat his own and the fastest time on record—2:11¼. The weather was excellent, and the track in the best possible condition for the trial. Many predictions were made that the horse would successfully accomplish the feat, but the large majority of the spectators did not expect to see the record lowered. When St. Julien came on the track, appearing in fine condition, and accompanied by his owner and driver, Mr. Hickok, round after round of applause saluted them. After a little preliminary exercise he was speeded a trifle, and finished a mile in 2:24. A few minutes later, getting into a good and speedy stride, Hickok gave the word, and St. Julien went down the stretch and round the first turn at a magnificent gait, appearing like a piece of clockwork, so even was his stride. Hundreds of watches were set, and every eye was strained to catch a glimpse of the animal as he passed the first quarter in 32½, or a 2:11 gait. He moved as gracefully and cleanly as ever down the back stretch, reaching the half-mile pole in 1:05, and at this time the utmost excitement began to manifest itself among the enthusiastic spectators, few of whom now doubted the ability of the gelding to complete his stupendous task. The third quarter was reached in 1:38½, and the crowd held their breath in the intensity of excitement as St. Julien rounded the turn in the same beautiful machine like manner and entered the stretch for home. A thrill of apprehension made itself apparent as the driver of a drag, who was still at work on the track, appeared right in the way of St. Julien, who, it was feared, would be compelled to turn aside and thus break or lose his stride. A dexterous turn, however, removed the obstacle, and on came the flyer without annoyance or hindrance. As he neared the distance many thought they discovered a falling and slackening of the speed, but his driver held him so well together that if such was the case it was too slight to be apparent, and amid thunderous bursts of applause the horse passed the wire. The official time given as 2:11¼ was the signal for renewed cheering, which was prolonged as horse and rider returned to the stand. The latter was met by an official of the association, who presented him with a floral wreath. A floral cushion was placed on the sulky, and St. Julien, being blanketed, was led up and down in front of the admiring spectators. It was announced that, in addition to the purse of $2,500, $500 had been voted by the association, and would be presented to Mr. Hickok. St. Julien was then led away, and the greatest event in the history of the trotting turf was a thing of the past.

The managers of Charter Oak Park are elated that their track, from which St. Julien was purchased by Hickok three years ago, has been the scene of the grandest triumph of trotting. Rarus made the best achievement before he was withdrawn from the turf, and this year Hannis and other noted horses have improved their records.

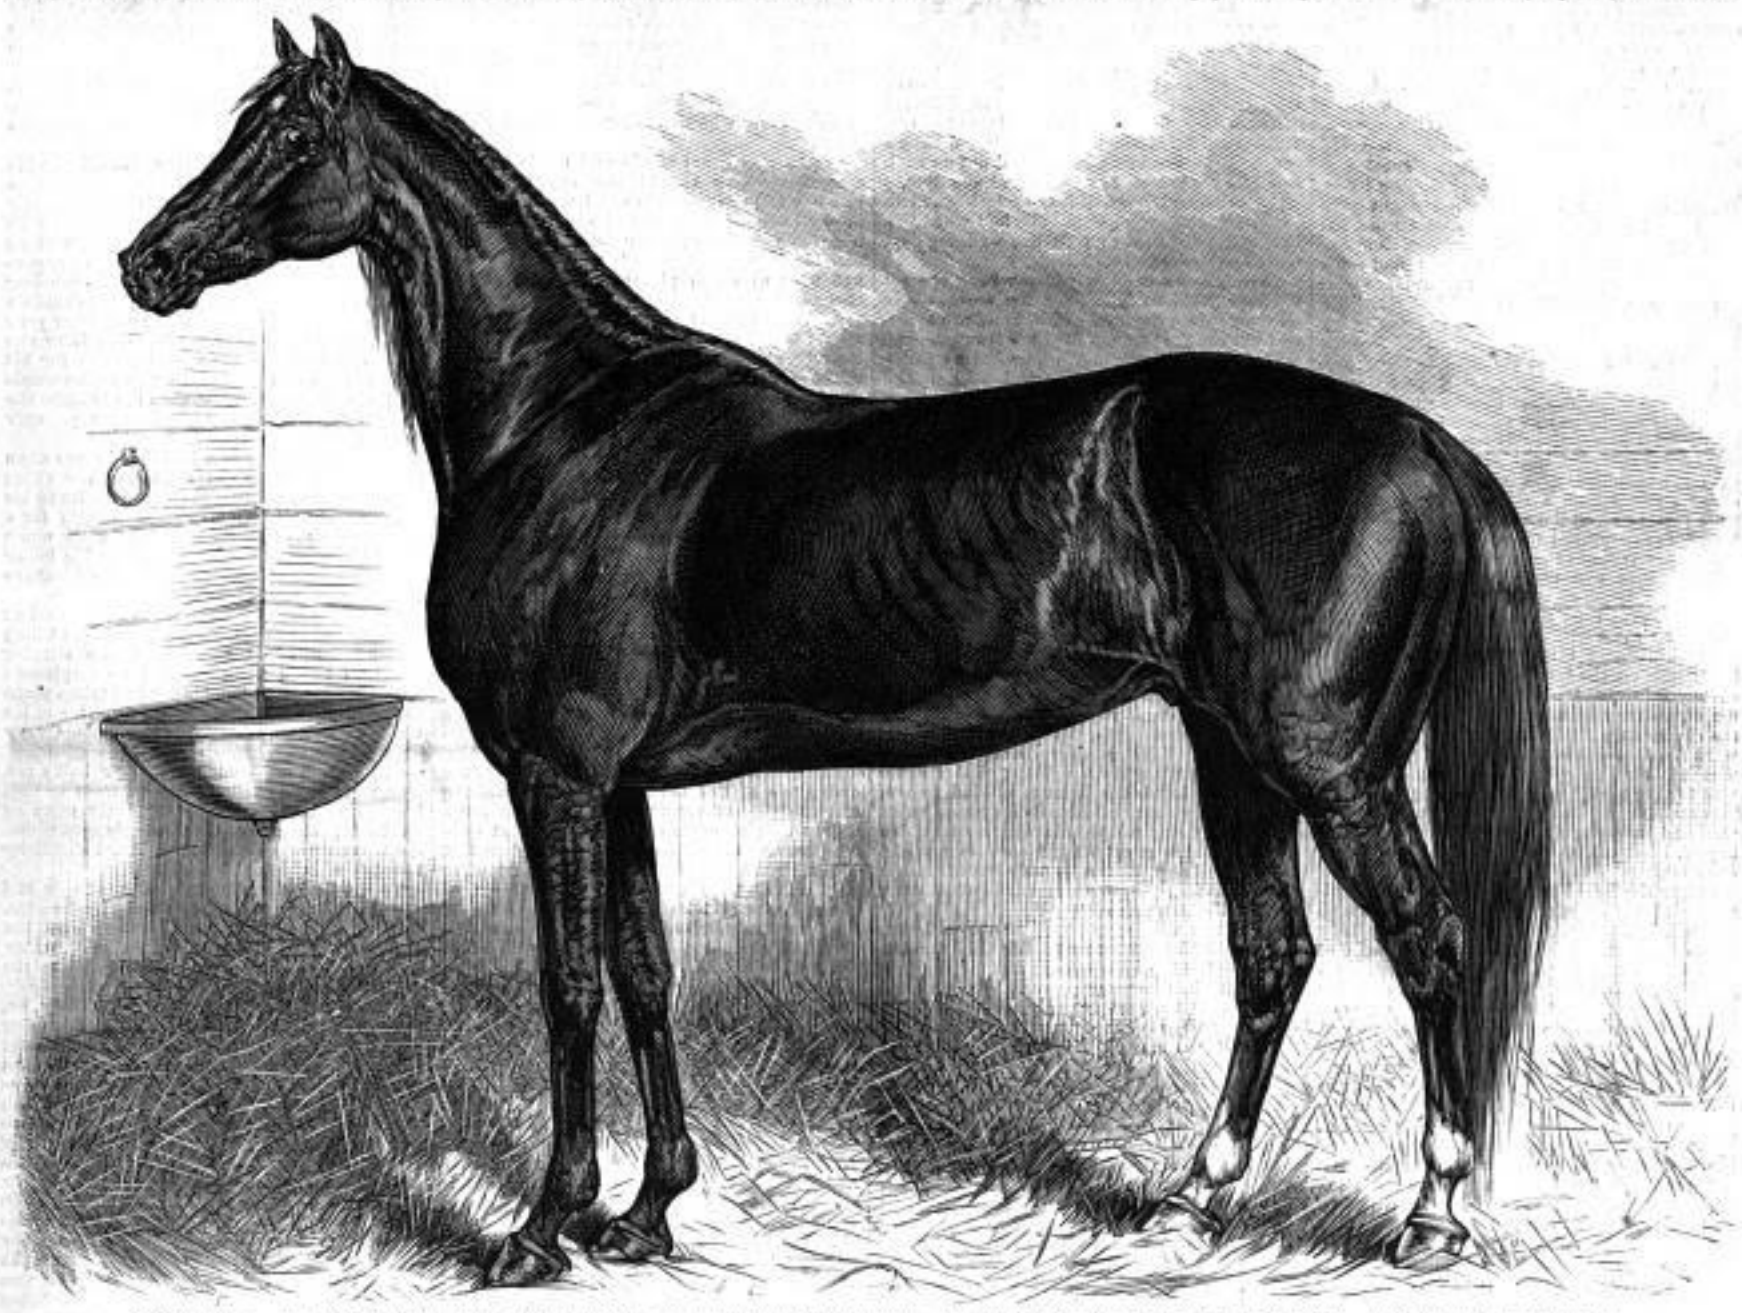
OURAY, THE UTE CHIEF.

His Life, Character and Death.

OURAY, or Arrow, as he was sometimes called, the celebrated Chief of the Ute Indians, whose death occurred August 27th, at the Los Pinos Agency, Colorado, was one of the most remarkable of Indian statesmen since the death of Black Hawk and Red Jacket. He was born probably within the present Territory of Colorado, some fifty-five or sixty years ago, when that region nominally belonged to Mexico, but was utterly unknown to white men. The important tribe of Utes, of which he was the most conspicuous individual, occupied an immense territory, embracing a large part of Utah (which derives its name from the tribe), and nearly all of Colorado west of the Rocky Mountains.

THE LATE UTE INDIAN CHIEF, OURAY.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.

The chief settlements of the Utes were upon the Colorado River and its upper tributaries, the Grand, Green, White, Gunnison and San Juan Rivers. They are divided into several bands, under separate chieftains, the best-known bands being the Uintah Utes, in Utah, the White River Utes, the Southern Utes and the Uncompahgre Utes, the latter being the most numerous and the one to which Ouray belonged.



Ouray became acquainted in early life with some of the Mexicans on the northern confines of New Mexico, traded with them and learned the Spanish language so as to use it in conversation. Since the settlement of Colorado and Utah by Americans, he came into close relations with many settlers, and was known as the white man's friend.

Ouray had been for many years one of the chiefs of the Tabeguache band of Ute Indians, and for several years was the head chief of the Ute Nation. He did not secure this commanding position by virtue of hereditary descent, but in consequence of his force of character. He is said to have been an Indian of remarkable ability. He was a thorough Ute, but he became convinced some time ago that his tribe should abandon savage ways, and should adopt the civilization of the Anglo-Saxon. He made three trips to Washington, during which he became acquainted with the immense power of the whites, and with the folly of contending against it. He returned from these visits resolved to lift his tribe, if possible, out of barbarian into civilized ways, and he did everything he could to accomplish that end. Ouray dressed like a white man, and could read and write. He used to write to President Grant direct when he had any grievance to be redressed. He had built for him at his place, about ten miles from the Los Pinos Agency, on the Uncompahgre River, by the Government, an adobe house, thirty by forty, finished in good style, with American furniture and carpets. He had a farm of 500 acres inclosed and upwards of 60 acres under cultivation in hay, vegetables and grain. The work was done by Indians and Mexican retainers. His wife has an active interest in the farmwork and does her full share of the outdoor labor. He had a herd of 200 horses and mules, some of them being very fine animals; in addition to the horse-stock he had some cattle and several bands of sheep and goats. His buildings were quite extensive, consisting of a large storehouse, four dwellings, stables, corrals, granaries, etc., etc. He had a fine family carriage, one of the best that could be purchased, a present from Governor Edward McCook of Colorado, which, with a stylish team and Mexican driver, made a conspicuous turnout. The farm operations and business enterprises of Ouray were very successful, and proved him to be a shrewd, competent business man.

He prevented war with the whites several times. He seemed, however, not to have been able to control Colorado, or Colorow, the chief of the White River band. Colorado having once been the chief of the nation, and having been deposed by the Government authorities in favor of Ouray, became a reckless, savage man. He was particularly determined that prospectors should not be allowed to operate in the reservation, and drove them out whenever found, sometimes going so far as to drive off those prospecting near the reservation by burning the grass and timber around their camps.

The San Juan mining region, which was the cause of the serious outbreak of the Utes in 1879, was purchased of the tribe in 1873, under the Brunot Treaty. About $750,000 was, it is understood, to have been paid by the Government to the tribe, payments to be made in several annual installments in such articles as the Indians should desire. The Indians moved out of the region, and the whites speedily took possession; nevertheless, the Government did not pay the money, Congress having cut out the appropriation from the estimates. The Indians became exasperated, seeing that they had given up their land and were not to get their money. But though very much dissatisfied and irritable, the tribe was not hostile in any sense. All the Indians at the Los Pinos and White River Agencies were quite friendly. Sapavanaro, the war chief of the Los Pinos Utes, and one of those concerned in the outbreak, was then living quietly at the agency. Douglas, the chief at White River, was highly spoken of at that time even by the frontiersmen. Ouray warned the Government repeatedly that the tribe was getting so irritable at the bad faith observed that he feared there would be trouble at last. His own life at that time was so much in danger from his known friendship for the whites that he never left his house without his pistols. All the troubles at the Agency may be put down to the irritability and sense of wrong which the bad faith of the Government fostered.

When Agent Meeker and his employés were butchered at the White River Agency in September last, Ouray at once showed his friendliness for the whites and his knowledge of the retribution that would be sure to follow, by sending an order addressed "to the chiefs, captains, headmen and CONNECTICUT.—ST. JULIEN, WHO BEAT HIS OWN AND THE BEST ONE-MILE RECORD, AT THE CHARTER OAK COURSE, HARTFORD.—FROM A SKETCH BY STULL.

Digitized by Google

Utes" at the Agency, commanding them to cease hostilities. Thenceforth he exerted himself in every possible way to bring about peace, and when Special Agent Adams, a month later, reached the scene, he was, in his efforts to secure possession of the guilty persons, cooperated with by Ouray, who was appointed, with Generals Hatch and Adams, a commission to investigate the outbreak, and commanded all the Agency Indians to come in and submit to examination. The only lukewarmness shown by Ouray during the exciting conferences which followed was, as he afterwards explained, the result of his fear of assassination.

At the end of the investigation, Ouray agreed to cause the surrender of all the guilty Utes to the whites for punishment, an engagement which he honestly endeavored to fulfill. He then expressed a desire to be permitted to visit Washington. Permission was granted, and in January of this year he arrived at the capital and saw the Great Father and the Secretary of the Interior. He was, while at Washington, subjected, with other chiefs who had accompanied him, to a searching examination by the House Committee on Indian Affairs in reference to the Ute troubles and the murder of Agent Meeker and his employés. The result of the conferences at the capital was a treaty by the terms of which the Utes were to give up their reservation in Colorado and submit to be scattered through less desirable and valuable sections of the frontier country. It was while Ouray was traveling about through the old reservation with a commission, endeavoring to secure the assent of all the Ute chiefs to this treaty, that death overtook him, unhappily before the work was complete.

It was feared for a time that the negotiations would entirely fail, but the latest accounts indicate a different result. At the Grand Council held August 29th, Chief Sapavanaro was elected as the successor of Ouray, there being only two other applicants for the position—Guero and Peah. The former claimed it by right of promotion as second in rank, but his known hostility to the whites prevented his promotion. Sapavanaro is fifty years old, and has much strength of character. His following is large, and he enjoyed Ouray's confidence to such an extent that he was left in charge last Winter during the latter's visit to Washington. Seventy Uncompahgre and White River headmen and chiefs have placed their hands under the direction of the agent; have accepted Sapavanaro as chief; have agreed to preserve Ouray's property intact, and to proceed immediately to complete ratification and enrollment. A dispatch says: "Agent Berry has the confidence of the Utes at Los Pinos and White River. They are anxious for peace."

MY LODGER.

WHY am I, the mistress of the Villa Constance, on such friendly, confidential terms with old Frau Seppi, the goatherd's wife? is a question that has rung in my ears for many a year. The answer is too long to be often given, but to you, Alice, my valued friend, I will tell the whole story, if you care to listen:

You know I was not very happy in my New England home—father's second wife brought an element of discord among us, which only increased with time—and one Autumn I joyfully accepted the situation that fell in my way of companion to an invalid lady who was going to travel in Europe.

We wandered about together for three years, till my benefactress was joined by relations, and my services were no longer needed. I had saved a little money, but only enough to live upon for a few weeks until I found another place. Through my employer's recommendation I was accepted as nursery governess in an English family; but, before entering on my new duties, I had a month to spare. Of this I was very glad, as I had not been well, and I wanted to gain a little strength before beginning a rather trying task.

Mrs. Tolleton, my first employer, left me in Baden-Baden, and from thence I decided to go in search of a quieter nook in the Black Forest, where for a few weeks I might have the benefit of the pure pine-scented air. It was in April, long before the rush of Summer visitors would appear, and I could find some humble abiding place without trouble.

I chose this lovely spot, Klosterle, little dreaming that it would become eventually my home.

Alone and a perfect stranger to the place, I alighted from the antiquated post-wagon, and, carrying my modest luggage in my hand, walked through the tiny village in search of a dwelling. I accosted a tidy-looking old woman in peasant costume, bearing a rake and spade over her shoulder, who informed me that if I chose I could hire a room in her cottage, a little further along the road. One look into her kindly eyes inspired me with trust, and I followed her without hesitation.

Her house was the quintessence of neatness, not unusual among the thrifty folk of the Black Forest; the floors shone with wax, the awkward little windows glistened in the sunlight guiltless of blemish, and the mountain-like duvets on the beds were covered with the snowiest linen. I hired a little room under the eaves for a small sum, and I was to have my dinner at a little inn within five minutes' walk from the cottage. Frau Seppi—for it was into her kindly hands that I had fallen—was to give me fresh goat's milk in the mornings and evenings. Here I surely would grow well and strong again, and, very contented and happy, I fell asleep the first night in my new quarters.

Before daylight I awoke with a raging headache and high fever. I was unable to move without great pain, as every bone in my body seemed to assert itself by an especial ache of its own. I was very much frightened, for I could not afford to be ill, and I was so utterly alone. I could only lie and wait for some one to come; no one heard me call, and there was no such modern contrivance as a bell in that simple dwelling. I watched the dawn creeping over the hills, so slowly and so welcome to me, and the sturdy chanticleer in his kingdom behind the cottage; then the bleating and trampling of the goats became audible, intermingled with some shouting and swearing in a boy's rough voice, which, though in a foreign tongue, sounded very home-like, and at last Frau Seppi opened my door, bringing in a glass of foaming milk.

She was so sympathetic and grieved to find me ill, and all that day hovered over me with the homely remedies that she understood. But my illness was too severe to be cured with decoctions of herbs, and the doctor who attended the Summer visitors who flocked to that region for the mineral baths, said that I needed vigilant care and perfect quiet for weeks to come.

I was in despair; my little fund of money would be very soon exhausted, and I had not a friend in the world to apply to; my father had died much in debt two years before, Mrs. Tolleton had gone to Russia, and I had no address that would reach her even if I had wanted to ask her for help. Then, too, I would lose my place as a governess in Mrs. Wakeham's family, as they were to return soon to England, and I was to have accompanied them. Thinking over all these perplexities was of the greatest injury to me, for I became delirious and for a while my recovery seemed quite impossible.

When weeks afterwards I was told that I had come back from the border-land of the unknown world, my first feeling was bitter regret, for death seemed such an easy ending to my troubles. I shudder now to think what I would have missed here had my wish then been granted.

No mother could have been kinder than was Frau Seppi during my convalescence; I told her the whole truth about my circumstances, that I was unable to repay her kindness, and that the thought of the debt I was incurring for medical attendance and remedies haunted me like an evil dream. She only patted my hand with her toil-worn fingers, and called me a silly child for troubling my head over such fancies.

"Our doctor is a generous man," she would say, "and I hope we all know how to help our neighbors when trouble comes."

It was already May, and before long Frau Seppi would have a house full of lodgers, for the tidy cottage was eagerly sought. I knew that then I could make myself useful to my benefactress and lighten her household cares in many ways if I could only recover fast enough. I would save her the expense of a servant during the Summer, but that would only help to lighten my obligation to her.

Towards evening, when Frau Seppi had finished her work—and her daily task was no trifle, aside from the work within doors, there were hours of toil each day in the fields, and the care of a cow and her milk—she would come and sit with me, and, over her endless knitting, would tell me the experiences of her long, simple life. She was very proud at first about the duties and department befitting her station in life, and would not sit down in my presence, whom she considered of higher rank, but I soon prevailed upon her to think of me only as a poor wanderer whom she had befriended.

I liked to watch her sitting there, with her gray hair ingeniously plaited back with black ribbons, full sleeves of white linen spun by herself, leaving bare the sun-burned arm from the elbow down; a scarlet cloth bodice, and a dark green petticoat, short enough to show strong woolen stockings and low shoes with huge buckles. On Sundays she wore a bonnet that was my special admiration; the foundation was of black velvet, almost hidden with embroidery in silver thread, and studded over with imitated precious stones in different colors, held in place with tiny settings of silver. The bonnet fitted her head close, like a baby's cap, and frills of black lace flared out on each side like the gossamer wings of a huge fly. As a reflection on the mutability of fashion, Frau Seppi told me proudly that she had worn this bonnet for the first time on her wedding-day, forty-one years ago.

Through the open window where she sat my gaze could wonder over the meadows in all their spring freshness, rich in forget-me-nots and buttercups; across the little trout stream, with its many rustic bridges, up the irregular hillsides dotted with an occasional châlet, stained to a mellow brown by the weather, till my eyes lost their way in the thick pine forests so high above us all. This picture of the honest old peasant woman knitting in the window, against a background which seemed like a glimpse of Paradise, is even now always before my mental vision. Good, generous old Frau Seppi, how could I ever repay her kindness! was the thought that never left my brain.

"Frau Seppi," I said, one day, "I envy you; you can call one of the loveliest nooks in all the world your home, and are sure of its comfortable shelter for the days when you can no longer work. Fate has dealt kindly with you, and you ought to be very happy."

To my surprise, she put aside her knitting, and began wiping her eyes, which had brimmed over with tears.

"Fräulein," she answered, "I would be happy if I could undo a mistake that I made once. The Lord has been very kind to me, giving me my share of this world's goods, and it is only my own fault that I am sorely troubled now. I did a great wrong once in my life, which until now I have kept a secret from the world. At last its punishment is overtaking me, and I am very unhappy."

I did not urge my old friend's confidence, but soon, of her own accord, she told me her story to the following effect:

She had two daughters, Kätchen and Bertha—merry, romping girls, as like each other as two ripe cherries on the bough, and so near of an age as to be usually taken for twins by strangers. When Bertha, the younger, was ten years old she went to live in Westphalia with her grandmother, who was growing infirm and very lonely, and Kätchen was the only daughter left at home. Kätchen was a rosy-cheeked, handsome girl, coquettish and saucy as any village belle, and, as she grew older, was much admired. When only sixteen she became engaged to Toni Leiter, son of a blacksmith in a village on the Rhine. He was traveling as servant with a gentleman who came to Klosterle for the baths, and as Toni's family were childhood acquaintances of Frau Seppi, the young man was very welcome in their midst. There was, however, one great drawback to his engagement with Kätchen, in the opinion of Frau Seppi—Toni was to go shortly to America to push his fortunes, and when he had succeeded, Kätchen was to join him there, so Frau Seppi would lose her daughter indeed. But they seemed so fond of each other that she could not in conscience withhold her consent to the betrothal; so rings were exchanged, vows plighted, and Toni set out on his long pilgrimage.

For the first year their letters came and went with all the regularity possible in those days, and Kätchen grew noticeably quiet and sedate, and seemed to care no longer for the frolics of the other young people.

Another year went by, and Toni's letters, though loving as ever, still had no news of a good appointment in America. Toni went further westward towards the mines of Colorado, and, owing to his frequently changing his address, letters reached him irregularly and rarely. Two years more slipped away, and Kätchen, who was now twenty, began to grow tired of the dullness and neglect that fell to her share because of her absent lover. She began to frequent whatever merry-makings were in reach, and six months later, to the dismay of her mother, Kätchen announced that she had grown tired of waiting for Toni; she cared for him no longer, and was going to marry Carl Wernle, son of the miller near Klosterle.

Kätchen was a headstrong, unruly girl, who usually had her own way, as she did in this instance. No word could be sent to Toni of his fiancée's change of feeling, as his last letter had spoken of going deeper into the country where an answer would not reach him; so Kätchen was married without his knowledge. Bertha, the younger sister, came home again to fill the gap in the household which her sister's departure had made, and no one seemed to regret the change the course of events had taken save Frau Seppi, who felt very sorry for what would be Toni's disappointment.

A few months after Kätchen's wedding with the miller's son, a letter came from the discarded lover in America, telling of his great success in the mines, and reminding Frau Seppi of her promise to send his darling Kätchen to him when he could prove his way sure. He would give half his new fortune to be able to come for her himself, but this was impossible. It was a long letter, dwelling on his unhappiness during the many years of waiting, and his scarcely to be realized joy, now that Kätchen was at last to be his, for of her faith he had never had one moment's doubt.

Frau Seppi was in despair. She loved Toni as her own son, and the thought of writing to him of her daughter's fickleness was heart-breaking to her. She could not bear to tell him the unhappy truth.

As she was sobbing over Toni's letter, Bertha, with a merry laugh and saucy rejoinder to some friends outside, bounced into the room, overturning a chair on the way.

As the mother glanced up, a sudden inspiration flashed through her brain—Bertha was her sister over again—voice, eyes, hair, everything about her like enough to Kätchen to deceive any one who had not seen either for five years.

Bertha was heart whole and ready for any escapade. Why should she not personate Kätchen and answer Toni's call, thereby profiting by his good fortune, and saving her sister from the charge of utter faithlessness. She had seen Toni on a visit home long ago, and had been as much pleased with him as her sister had seemed. Henceforth, in the eyes of Toni, Bertha might represent Kätchen, and it would be the younger sister who had espoused the miller's son.

There would be no danger of detection, for none of the villagers in Klosterle ever dreamed of sending a letter away to Colorado, and Toni was settled in the New World for life.

Bertha was nothing loath to this rash plan of her mother's, and as soon as it could be arranged she set out on the route to America recommended by Toni, taking upon herself the name and, as much as possible, the identity of her sister. The people of Klosterle supposed that young Leiter had asked for the hand of the younger sister, failing the elder, and they all congratulated Bertha on her good-luck. Only Frau Seppi and her two daughters knew of the deception that was being carried on.

Toni married his bride unsuspectingly, and, strange to say, the union seemed a perfectly happy one, and gradually the guilty feeling faded out of the hearts of Frau Seppi and Bertha.

But of late Frau Seppi had known no peace owing to a hint of Bertha's that her husband had the idea of returning to Germany for a short time; an uncle of his had died at Coblenz, leaving his affairs in such confusion that his children were in want, having no friend to help them. Toni was likely to have six or eight weeks of leisure during the Summer, and he spoke much of using that time to visit the Fatherland and look after the welfare of his brother's children.

It was this news that haunted Frau Seppi day and night, and made her apprehend all sorts of dangers for her daughter.

"He will come to visit me, of course," she would say, dolefully; "the neighbors innocently enough will betray my deceit, for not a soul here knows that Bertha is playing a part, and my poor Bertha will perhaps be turned out an outcast on the face of the earth, for Toni has a high spirit and would not bear trifling. Oh, why did I ever descend to this miserable lie!"

I consoled the old woman as well as I was able, but I could not disguise from her that I felt that her daughter and herself were in a very awkward position.

"Perhaps he will not come," was the most comforting speech I could make.

One day, when I was well enough to be dressed and move about a little, Frau Seppi came to me with a face as white as the open letter she held in her hand.

"Read that!" she said, breathlessly.

I was a fair German scholar, and without much trouble deciphered the following lines:

"DEAR MOTHER—Three weeks from this date Toni has arranged to sail for Germany—the children and I are to come with him. I cannot express my joy that we are to meet again, and that you can give my little Albert and Marie your blessing, but I am in terror at the thought of Toni going to Klosterle. He will find out all, and I shall be lost! So long as this unlucky secret has been kept, so much more of a wrong it seems to be to him. Can you not leave home so that we will have no reason for going to Klosterle? Something must be done to save me, and I can think of no other plan. Go far away from home, and let a letter telling where you are find us in Ihre Gasse, in Bremen."

More followed, but it was a repetition of the same idea, that the girl was in misery lest her sin should find her out, and her mother, her accomplice, must help her.

"Fräulein," began Frau Seppi, after I had read the letter, "you have often said that you would like to repay the poor favors I have shown you. You now have that chance if you care to take it."

"I will do anything in my power for you, Frau Seppi," I began, enthusiastically.

"What I have to ask is this," she continued. "Will you, with Sophie's help, take care of my house and look after the welfare of my lodgers while I go away to Westphalia, where my mother used to live? In my talks with you I have discovered that you are of a domestic turn, with ways and ideas that make a good housekeeper. In another month you will be yourself again, and to shield my daughter I must go away. The loss of shutting up my house would be more than I could afford, and I would trust no one but you with it. You are rather young for the post of housekeeper."

"Oh, no," I interrupted, "I am twenty-five my next birthday."

"But," she went on, "I know you can be steady and sensible. If you will take this charge I shall consider myself doubly repaid for my care of you."

I was only too glad of the chance to help Frau Seppi, and I seized at her suggestion with alacrity.

Accordingly, Frau Seppi prepared to go to Westphalia for the Summer, on the plea that her health demanded rest, and there the dreaded visit of Toni and his family could take place in safety, as Bertha could easily pass for her elder sister among the people she knew when a child.

Early in June I found myself mistress in the cottage where I had hired a simple room two months before, with the prospect of a house full of lodgers to take care of till the end of September, and only the rustic little hand-maiden Sophie, and the stable-boy to share my labors.

There was no lack of inmates in the cottage, and for Frau Seppi's sake I was very glad; but my lodgers seemed to have an endless variety of whimsical wishes, the answering of which sent Sophie and I to our beds at night with weary limbs and aching heads.

"Here is a letter from Herr von Waldburg, the master of the villa; he comes every Summer," said Sophie, handing me a letter with a crest on the seal.

Near us on the hillside a beautiful villa stood, about which I had spun many a romance; the grounds were very tastefully laid out, with dark shady nooks adorned with statues; beautiful shrubbery and foreign plants grew in all directions; there were conservatories, fountains and walks winding through inviting shade—everything to make a Summer's stay charming, but year after year the place stood vacant. A certain Herr von Waldburg had had the villa restored for his wife, and she had died there. Soon afterwards he, too, died in Italy, and the villa became the property of Arthur von Waldburg, a younger brother.

The present Herr von Waldburg came often to Klosterle, but he never lived at the villa; he was unmarried and preferred to leave his house vacant. It seemed a strange fancy for a man who might be surrounded by so much luxury to choose Frau Seppi's humble house for an abode, but such had been his pleasure for many seasons.

I was curious to see the master of the villa; he was the hero of that little world into which I had fallen, and his coming was a stirring event. I hoped he would not be displeased with the change of hands that had taken place in the cottage, and that I might minister to his wants as well as Frau Seppi had done. Of my ability to please him I was a little doubtful, for he was an old bachelor, and probably not free from the exacting ways of most of that brotherhood. He came one lovely morning and took possession of the shiningly neat room, the bareness of which I had relieved a little by bunches of field flowers.

To my surprise, he was quiet, affable and pleased with everything, especially the flowers, asking who had arranged them. He put me quite at my ease, disarming me of the fear that now my powers would be taxed to the utmost to please a captious lodger.

Herr von Waldburg looked about forty, or, perhaps, more. He had beautiful, sad-looking brown eyes, perfect hands, and a tall, graceful figure and good carriage. He had traveled all over the world, and his conversation was as agreeable as his exterior. I was charmed with my new lodger from the first, and began to think regretfully of the time when his stay would draw to a close. I heard at intervals from Frau Seppi—her daughter and son-in-law had arrived, and no perplexities had arisen on their domestic horizon. The old woman was enraptured with her grandchildren, and her letter was full of their praises, though she found space to thank me for what she was pleased to call my great kindness in keeping her house. I was very glad that the old soul's anxiety was quieted, for she had been sorely troubled.

Digitized by Google

Often when towards evening I stole out to the hillside for a breath of fresh air, Herr von Waldburg would join me, and gradually I grew to enjoy but little the walks in which we missed each other. He showed me every attractive nook and corner of the villa, and seemed to enjoy my delight in all I saw. I could gather all that I pleased of the beautiful plants in the green houses, but I enjoyed most the bouquets of wild flowers that I gathered with the help of Herr von Waldburg, who told me the names and properties of the rarer kinds.

I had a great longing for a certain specimen of fringed gentian, which was said to grow in that region, but our careful search had not yet revealed this lovely flower.

One morning my lodger—I mean only Herr von Waldburg, for, my duty towards them fulfilled, I forgot the existence of the other inmates of the cottage—set out to climb one of the higher mountains, and did not return to the inn for dinner as usual. Towards evening a boy came flying down the hillside with the news that the master of the villa was lying badly hurt in the woods on one side of the Kniebis.

The whole village was in commotion instantly, and men set out with lanterns and a hastily improvised litter to bring the wounded traveler home. He had fallen from the top of a high rock, and had lain insensible among the ferns and moss until the boy had found him.

His injuries were severe enough. Besides a dislocated shoulder, there was an internal hurt, which the doctor said would be slow in healing, so, for the second time that season, Frau Seppi's cottage became a shelter for the sick. In caring for the wounded man, I felt that I was indirectly atoning for the trouble I had given, and I was unwearying in my exertions for his comfort.

"How good you are to me!" he said one day, taking my hand, resting for a moment on the coverlet, in his; "and while I give you so much trouble, I have not even the satisfaction of knowing that I reached what I was striving after when I fell. There was a bit of fringed gentian growing on the top of that rock—the kind you have wished for so long—but——"

I did not listen to the ending of his sentence, but with some hasty excuse turned away from the bed to hide the blush that flamed over my face. It was for a whim of mine, then, that Arthur von Waldburg had risked his life.

* * * * * *

Towards the end of August my lodger was permitted to extend his walk beyond the cottage inclosure, and, with my arm supporting his feeble steps, we went slowly towards the villa, and rested on a seat overlooking the house.

I was chatting of many things, and, among other questions, asked why he gave the villa no distinguished name.

"I should like to call it the 'Villa Constance,'" he answered, after a long pause.

My name was Constance, as I had told him long ago. While a vague happiness filled my heart, I jealously wondered if in the past another Constance had crossed this man's path.

"Do you not understand me, Constance—may not this place become a home indeed to me, adorned with your sweet presence?"

My happiness was too great for any kind of expression.

"Will you be my wife?" he continued, taking my hand, so gently. "I myself have not much to offer—a restless, whimsical wanderer on the face of the earth, who has already wasted two-thirds of his life—but I will try to make you happy if you will let me."

But I will not dwell longer on that interview in the garden; suffice to say that we left the villa betrothed lovers, and I, at least, scarcely able to realize my bliss.

What could this man, who might have made any countess in the land his wife, fancy in me, a poor little governess, with nothing to recommend her but a kind heart? He said that he had been beset and tried more than he could express by the open flattery of women of the world, who admired him for his wealth, and my simplicity and unconsciousness had charmed him from the first. He said, too, some sweet sounding nonsense about the beauty of a fresh face, soulful eyes and shining blonde hair, but even my hero's assertions could not transform myself in my own eyes into a beauty.

I had no one's will or pleasure to consult but my own, and before the Winter Arthur and I were married. One of my most enthusiastic well-wishers on my wedding day was Frau Seppi, and her blessing has indeed proved a benediction, for I have been very happy with my husband.

* * * * * *

Long afterwards Frau Seppi, with a shame-faced smile, showed me a letter from Toni, dated shortly after his return to America. All the time that we were puzzling our brains to keep him in the dark the roguish fellow had known of the trick that had been played upon him. Not long after his marriage with Bertha in Colorado, he had encountered a peddler from a district near Klosterle, who proved beyond a doubt that his real sweetheart had been false to him, and that her sister had become his wife. At first Toni was in a great rage, but on reflection, like a sensible man, he resolved to make the best of the inevitable. The thought of Kitchen's perfidy quenched his love for her, and Bertha proved a very lovable wife. In revenge for the deceit practiced on him, he never told his discovery, but allowed his wife and mother-in-law to receive their just punishment which his visit home caused. Only on his return to Colorado his long-kept secret was made public.

* * * * * *

Now, Alice, that you know my story, can you wonder more that Frau Seppi and I are sworn friends? Her wrinkled old face is one of the fairest on earth to me, and she will be warmly welcomed in my house till she is laid in her last resting-place, for through her I gained my life's happiness.

FOUNDERING OF THE "VERA CRUZ."

SAD intelligence has been received concerning the hurricane that was expected to reach the southern portion of our coast about the 1st of September. On the 18th of August it struck the island of Jamaica, and wrought great havoc to property on land and water at Kingston. By slow degrees it worked its way northward, striking St. Augustine, Fla., on Saturday the 28th, and lasting three days. After it was over, on Tuesday night, some fishermen reported quantities of barrels of lard, boxes of bacon and hams, and since that time the beach has been strewn with a large assortment of all manner of goods. On Wednesday two mail-bags were found containing foreign mail, and other evidence, causing it to be generally believed that a steamship had been lost at sea. At Matanzas, eighteen miles below, the first body came ashore.

Later four bodies were found below Matanzas, one the body of an old, gray-headed gentleman, well dressed, apparently about sixty years of age. Another was the body of a lady, about forty-three or forty-five years old, who wore three or four valuable rings and other jewelry. The bodies were all buried immediately, for they were in a state of decomposition. Pieces of furniture also came ashore covered with red plush, and others with gold lines. One piece has a casting on it marked "M. & H. Chenkheiren, N. Y., Pat. May 23, 1876." A mail-bag marked "Return to New York," was washed ashore, and letters dated "New York, Aug. 25, 1880, per City of Vera Cruz," were found in it; also way bills via steamer Vera Cruz.

The beach, north and south of St. Augustine Light, and as far south as Matanzas Inlet, was quickly strewn with wrecked stuff, drygoods, provisions and merchandise of every description. The first evidence of a wreck was discovered near the lighthouse on Tuesday, and on following the coast to the north and south the story of a terrible disaster was revealed.

From seven men who came ashore—one passenger, one engineer, one oiler and four seamen—it was learned that the Havana steamship City of Vera Cruz had foundered at 5:30 on Sunday morning, August 29th. The saved men reported that the fires went out, the pump failed, and the ship got foul and put out a drag. One sea stove her in fore and aft. The lamps were out and the fires also. The captain, mates, and all were calling for help to get assistance, and all at once all went down. All the deck load—street-cars, horses, cabbages and oil—was thrown out, but it did no good. The men also said that thirteen ladies were aboard.

The City of Vera Cruz sailed from Pier No. 3 North River on the afternoon of Wednesday, August 25th, having on board twenty-eight cabin passengers, including General A. T. A. Torbert, the famous Union cavalry officer and ex-Consul-General of Paris. Her officers and crew numbered forty-nine, under the command of Captain Edward Van Sice, a brave officer, with more than twenty years' experience of Gulf navigation. Her first officer, Harris, was also an experienced seaman, and had navigated the waters of the Gulf and the West Indies for many years. Her officers, engineers and many of her seamen were picked men, who had been in the company's employ for a long period. A Mexican mail agent and one other passenger—not in the cabin—were on board, making in all seventy-nine persons. The vessel was a stanch wooden steamship, only six years old, and the strictest inquiry has failed to discover any weakness, either in her composition or management. Her engines, the company say, had been thoroughly overhauled during the two weeks that she was in port. Her cargo was not a heavy one, the steamer only drawing an average of eighteen feet of water, against twenty-one and twenty-two feet, with which she had made safe passages in much more stormy periods.

The body of General Torbert was recovered and buried by the saved seamen at Daytona, on Wednesday.

The brig Caroline Eddy was wrecked in the same storm at a point some sixty miles from St. Augustine, and fears are entertained for the safety of other steamships that should have been in the track of the storm at the time of its fury. Captain Halsey, of the Cromwell line steamer New Orleans, and Captain Curtis, of the Saratoga, both of whom passed safely through the hurricane, unite in the assertion that the storm was the severest they have ever experienced.

THE OBELISK AND ITS MASONIC EMBLEMS.

A NOTABLE reception was tendered last week to Lieutenant-Commander Henry H. Gorringe, United States Navy, by his brethren of Anglo-Saxon Lodge, No. 127, F. and A. M., of Brooklyn, in recognition of his services to the Masonic fraternity in the safe transmission of the Egyptian obelisk to the United States. The Masonic fraternity at large was anxious to participate in doing honor to its distinguished member, but he would accept of no honor save that extended by his brethren of Anglo-Saxon Lodge. The lodge-room was crowded, and the occasion was one of great interest. The floral decorations by Worshipful Brother Shanahan were very beautiful. The east of the lodge-room was almost hidden in miniature groves of choice shrubs and flowers. At the right of the Master's chair stood a lofty pyramid of flowers, bearing in the centre the square and compass in violets, on a ground-work of white pinks. At either side of the dais were pedestals on which stood clusters of flowers in wax, while the entire space between the east and the altar was converted into a garden of tropical plants and shrubs in full bloom. On the dais at the left of the Master's chair stood a perfect model in wood of the obelisk. This was presented by Lieutenant Gorringe to his mother lodge. This model was taken apart during the evening and its various parts were critically examined. Music was furnished by a choir.

The lodge having been opened by the Master, Right Worshipful William Sherer, Commander Gorringe was introduced by the Right Worshipful D. T. Walden. His appearance was greeted with a storm of applause, amid which he was conducted to a seat of honor in the east. The choir then sang an ode of welcome, and Right Worshipful William Henry White delivered an eloquent address, in which he dwelt at length on the great services rendered the Masonic fraternity by Lieutenant Gorringe, and on behalf of the lodge welcomed thrice heartily the distinguished craftsman to his mother lodge.

Lieutenant Gorringe, in reply, spoke in a pleasant conversational tone, describing the taking down of the obelisk and finding of the Masonic emblems, and saying that no one man could doubt that they were identical with those in use by the Masons of the present day. In the course of the work, he said, many were disgusted because they had failed to find treasures beneath the stones at the base of the shaft; but he had found what was to him a greater treasure than gold or silver—the link which bound the ancient operative Masons of centuries ago with the speculative Masons of the present day. The connection between the two was to his mind indisputable, and the evidences of the identity of the Masonic emblems of to-day with those which existed at the time of the Pharaohs were overwhelming. The obelisk, he thought, would become a great educator to the uneducated, as it would induce them to seek and acquire information as to its history. It had been erected by the Pharaoh who had originated foreign commerce, and it was admirably fitting that it should find a resting-place in this great commercial city. The obelisk, which was 3,400 years old, had been neglected, and was fast going to pieces, but now that it had reached this country in safety, he had no doubt it would remain an object of admiration and curiosity for ages to come—a connecting link between the dim ages of the past and the bustle and excitement of the present.

He thanked the brethren for the very flattering manner in which they had spoken of him, and the enjoyable entertainment they had organized in his honor. Right Worshipful Brother Sherer, Master of the lodge, also welcomed the commander, and hoped that in the years to come it would be his privilege many times again to honor the flag of his country, and reflect lustre on the fraternity of which he had proved so distinguished a member. The guest of the evening then received the hearty congratulations of all present, and an adjournment was had to the banquet-room, where there were speeches, toasts and singing.

Our illustration shows Commander Gorringe in the act of explaining the operations of taking down the obelisk and the finding of the masonic emblems.

Science at Dinner.

"NATURE" describes and illustrates a simple experiment involving the elementary principle of the centre of gravity, which is capable of evoking roars of laughter at a dinner-table. If a dish of snipe has been served up, the head with its long beak may be fixed in a cork; and then two forks being thrust into the sides of the cork and a needle having been fixed into the lower end of it, the cork can be balanced upon a coin laid on the top of a wine bottle, and can be spun slowly around while the snipe's head nods at the various members of the company in turn, and finally stops opposite one of them. By making a slit at the bottom of this cork, putting in a silver quarter, and balancing this upon the point of a needle which rises out of another cork in the neck of the bottle, the apparently impossible feat of spinning a twenty-five cent piece on the point of a needle can be performed with the greatest ease.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

The French Presidential Visit to Cherbourg.

The complete success of the visit of MM. Grévy, Léon Say and Gambetta to Cherbourg, and the enthusiasm with which the three Presidents representing the Republic were received, is an undoubted proof of the universal popularity of the present régime in France. As the army had been so prominently fêted on July 14th, it was generally felt that the navy should have its turn, at least in some small degree, and at last M. Gambetta was asked to pay an official visit to Cherbourg. M. Gambetta suggested, however, that M. Grévy, as supreme head of the State, ought to be asked, and ultimately it was arranged that M. Grévy should go, accompanied by M. Léon Say, the President of the Senate, and M. Gambetta, the President of the Lower Chamber. The three Presidents met with an enthusiastic reception at Cherbourg, and for three days there were continual banquets and festivities, foremost amongst which was the launch of the new ironclad Magon; an official visit to the breakwater and to the Jagship Colbert; a naval sham fight, a grand dinner, a Venetian fête and a municipal banquet. Of course, there was an unlimited amount of speech-making, M. Grévy, however, though speaking frequently, saying but few words, but always to the point, M. Léon Say saying next to nothing at all, the bulk of the oratory being thus left to M. Gambetta. Although, officially speaking, M. Grévy was the guest of the day, the great mass of the populace looked upon M. Gambetta as the principal personage, and his utterances were regarded as of far greater importance than the cut-and-dried phrases of M. Grévy. To do him justice, however, M. Gambetta invariably put M. Grévy before himself, and begged his hearers not to fix their eyes upon any one man, but themselves to study the good of the country.

Grand Choral Festival at Zurich.

In July last Zurich was for the third time the scene of the grand festival of the Swiss Choral Union, and thither proceeded on the 10th the Central Committee and the choirs from all parts of the Confederation. The town was gayly decorated for the occasion, and, despite the spasmodically rainy weather, the population turned out in thousands to welcome the visitors, and to cheer them on their way to the Hall by the Lake, where the official opening took place. The feature of this portion of the fête was a brilliant vocal and instrumental concert, conducted by Herr Hegar, in which 600 singers and 150 orchestral performers took part, and at which selections from Wagner, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, etc., were performed in a way to secure quite an ovation at its conclusion. The next day was entirely devoted to the more serious objects of the meeting. Nearly a hundred societies competed separately in popular and classical music, among those who took part in the proceedings being several foreign choirs, French and German. A large audience liberally applauded these performances, which, for the most part, were excellent. It was on the 12th of July, however, that the culminating point in the celebration was reached, when the eighty-two competing choirs of the previous day, about 4,000 persons in all, took part in a grand choral concert, which comprised some of the most exacting works of the great German composers. In connection with the festival there was a regatta on the lake, and water sports, in which all the local boat clubs participated. It is this portion of the festival which our artist has selected for illustration.

The Battle of Tacna.

The Chilian army gained a victory of great importance on the 27th of May last, in driving the Peruvo-Bolivians from the heights and intrenchments which protect the approaches to the town of Tacna, and in taking the town itself. This battle, which was the most sanguinary of any which has taken place since the commencement of the campaign, ended in the complete route of the allies. The losses of the Chilians in this battle are set down at 400 soldiers killed and 1,284 wounded, 25 officers killed and 89 wounded, making a total of 1,189 men hors de combat. The loss of the allies amounted to 1,000 men killed and 1,300 wounded, 1,500 prisoners, 10 guns, 6 mitrailleuses, 3,300 rifles, and 647 cases of ammunition.

The Feast of St. Rosalie at Palermo.

The City of Palermo under all changes of government and political ideas, in peace and war, in plenty and in distress, has continued for centuries to celebrate for three days the feast of her patroness, St. Rosalie, a holy virgin who retired in the twelfth century to Monte Ereta, and died there, her body remaining entire until found by some brigands, who were on the spot converted from their evil ways. The festivities include displays of fireworks, one of the chief being given at a structure raised for the purpose and adorned with palatial rings commemorative of some event in the history of Sicily. This year the epoch was the reign of William II., the Norman. The pictures showed his mother, Margaret, his meeting Pope Alexander III., his defeat of the King of Morocco, his fleet sent to relieve Tyre, and the building of the Cathedral of Monreal. There are processions, one of them fantastic, and balls and banquets open to all. The city is crowded with strangers and people from country parts who all defer visits so as to reach Palermo and enjoy these days of merriment.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

—THE census supervisors give the population of Kansas as 996,300.

—ALL the coal mines in the Scranton regions have resumed work on full time.

—CONSIDERABLE quantities of ice are being shipped in Norwegian ports for the United States.

—THE customs receipts for the month of August were in round numbers $30,600,000, against $17,000,000 in July.

—THE American Chargé d'Affaires at Rio Janeiro reports the American trade in Brazil as daily growing in extent.

—IN consequence of the mediation of Italy, France and England, the Governments of Chili and Peru have opened negotiations.

—A STATUE of Germania was unveiled at Dresden, September 24. It was erected as a memorial of the share taken by the Saxon Army in the war of 1870.

—IT is understood that the naval demonstration in Turkish waters will begin on the 13th inst. The British squadron to take part in the naval demonstration has sailed from Palermo for Ragusa.

—THE coinage executed at the Philadelphia Mint during the month of August aggregates 3,000,600 pieces, valued at $2,406,800. Of this amount there were 96,400 eagles, 62,200 half eagles, 1,100,000 silver dollars and 2,480,000 cents.

—A GERMAN Cabinet order appoints the 15th of October as the date for the ceremonies of the consecration and opening of the recently completed Cologne Cathedral. The Emperor William and his family, and other royal personages, will be present.

—FIVE Prussian officers of the general staff, with the sanction of the German Government and the War Office, have accepted appointments in the service of the Sultan, and will leave soon for Constantinople. Some civil functionaries are expected to follow.

—AS AN illustration of the great increase in the importance of hop culture in America, it is sufficient to state that the crop, which in 1859 aggregated only 6,193 bales, increased to 110,000 bales in 1879, and will, it is estimated, amount to 125,000 bales this year.

—INTERNAL revenue receipts for August amount to $19,497,691, a gain of $1,069,127 over the corresponding month of 1879. The total gain in receipts for the first two months of the present fiscal year, July and August, over the same months in 1879, is $2,426,937.

—THE French Government, as soon as the Chambers resume, will introduce a Bill for the sale of that portion of the crown jewels not considered of artistic value, but estimated to be worth 7,500,000 francs, the proceeds to be devoted to the purchase of works of art.

—MR. NIMMO, chief of the Bureau of Statistics, has published his report on the proposed interoceanic canal. He thinks the canal would not be extensively used except by steam vessels, and consequently would not affect to any considerable extent the commercial interests of the United States.

—RAIN continues in nearly all parts of Minnesota, and harvest operations are delayed. Threshing machines are standing in the fields ready to start, but the grain is too wet. In Iowa many of the stacks are covered with green sprouts. The heavy rains have not particularly damaged corn as yet.

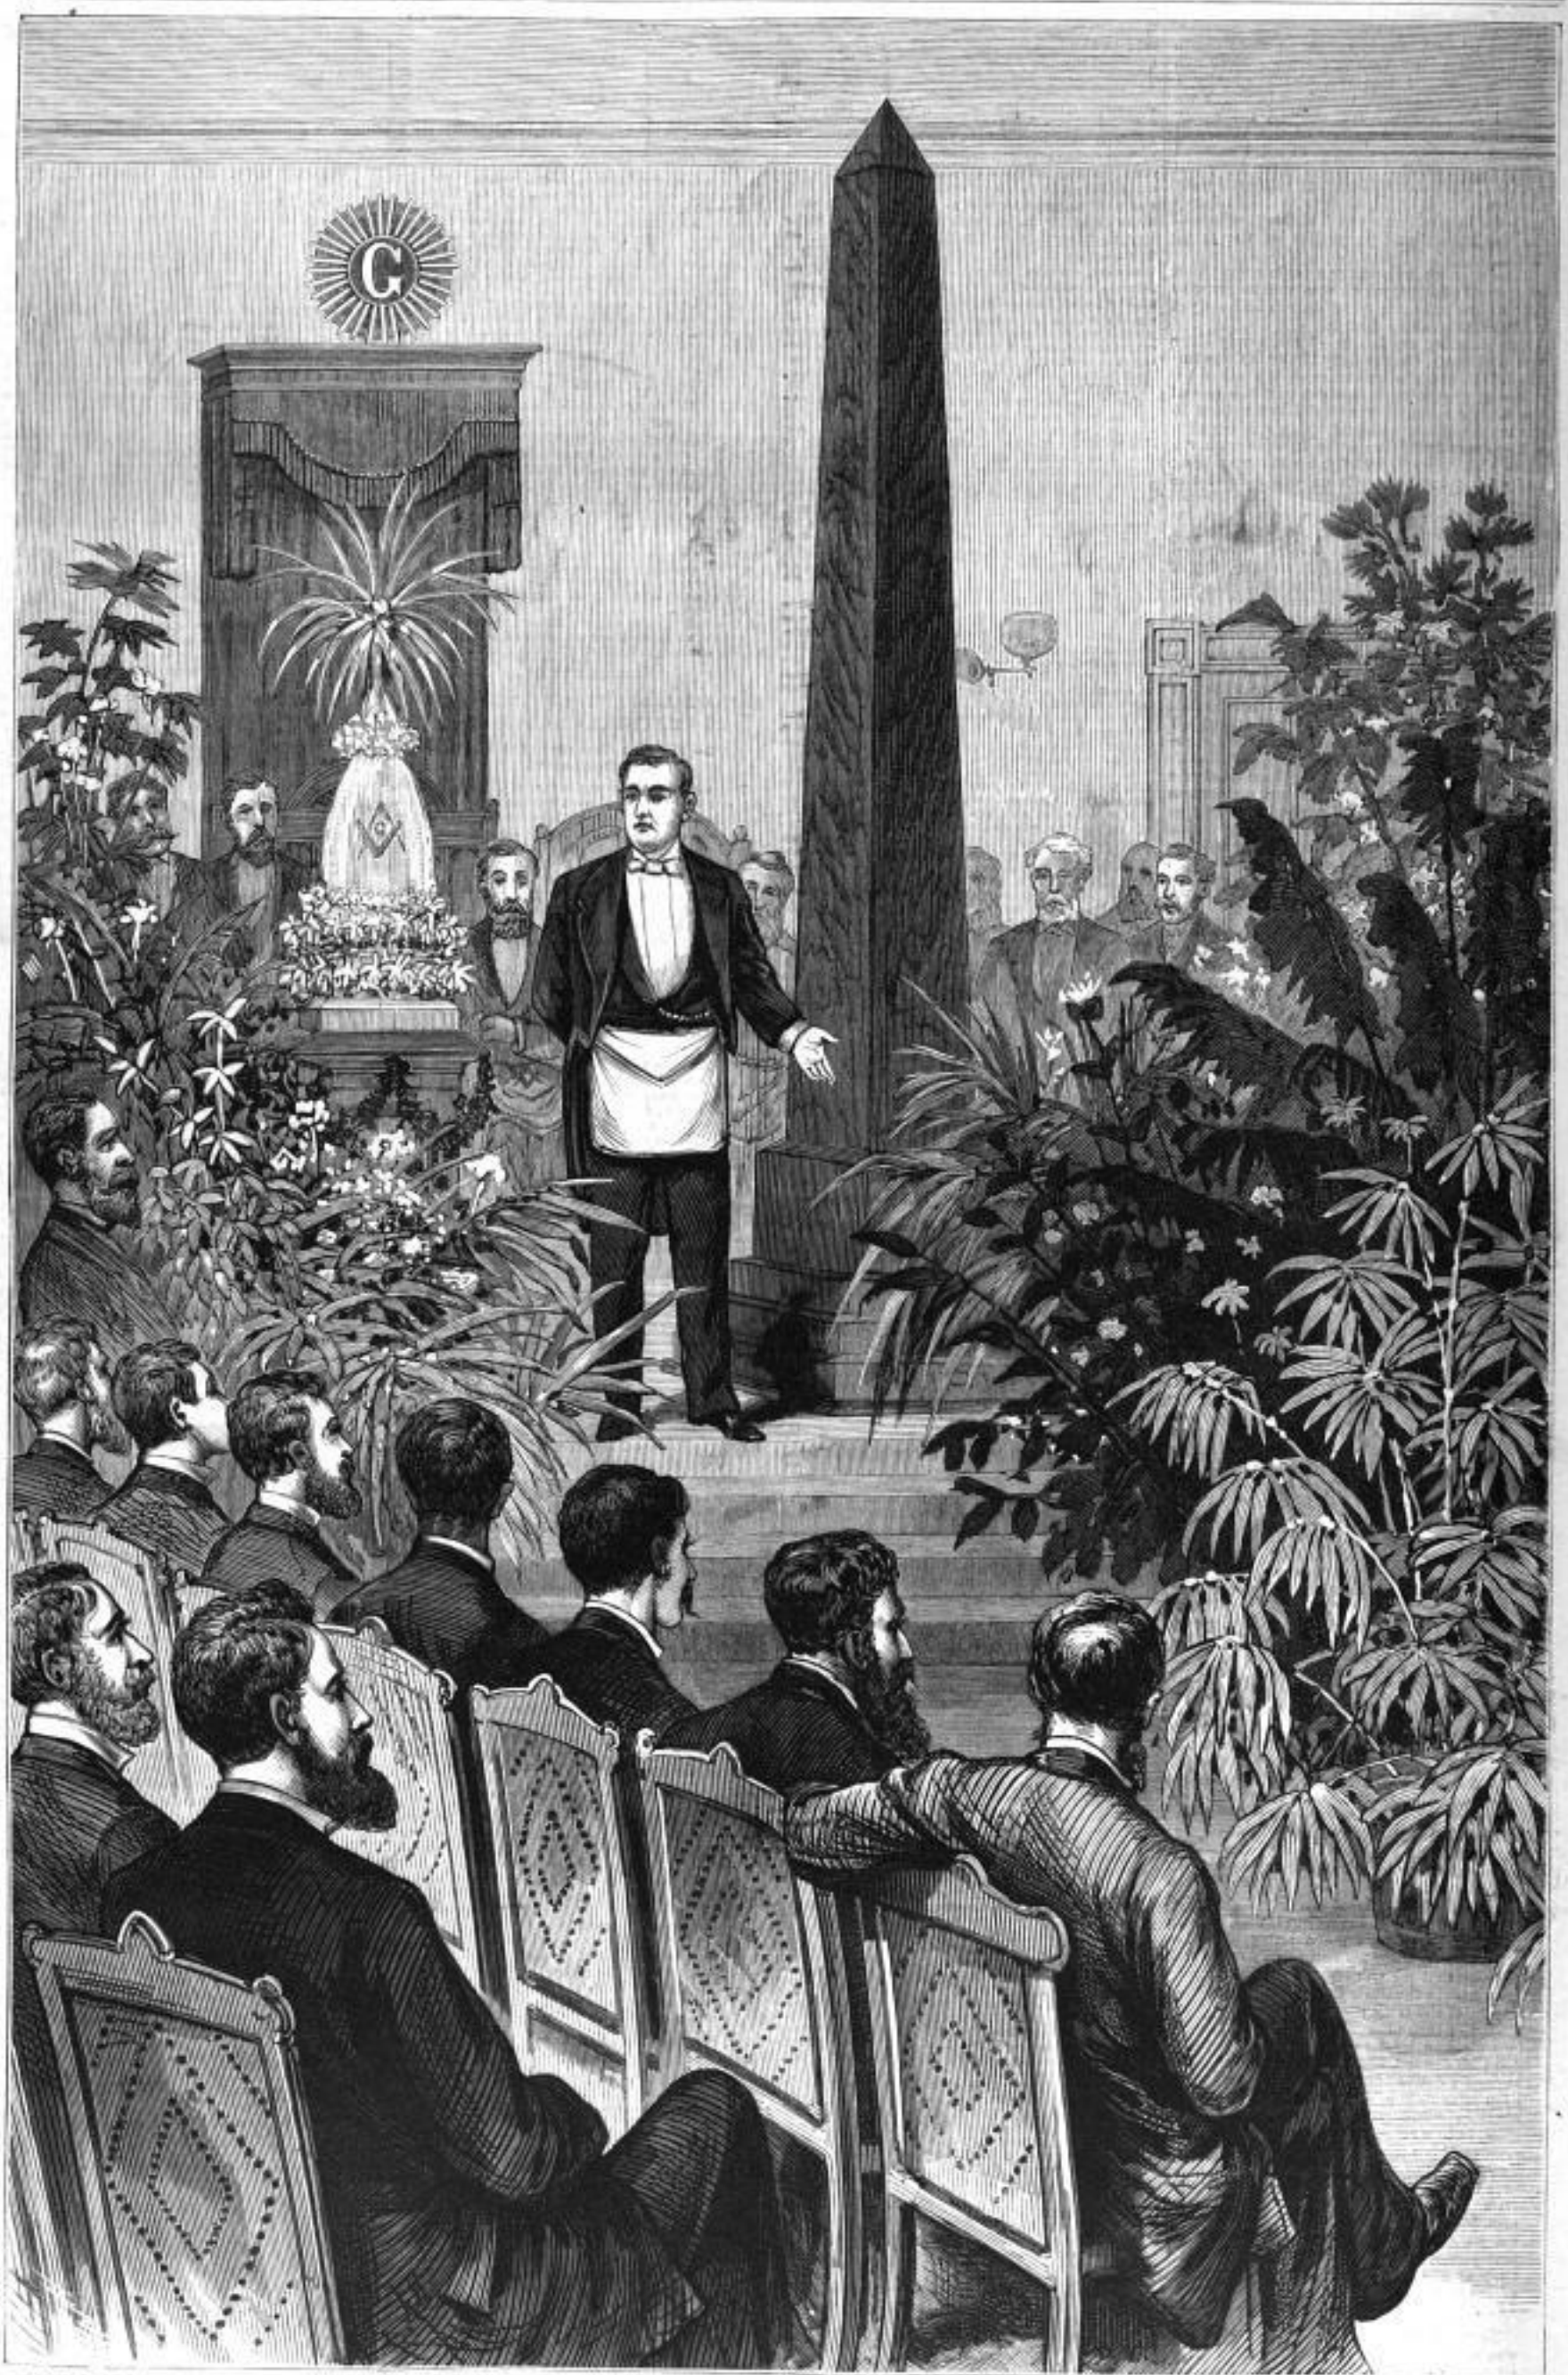
—GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT S. I. KIMBALL, of the United States Life Saving Service, ordered the equipment of the forty-two life-saving stations along the New Jersey coast, to take place September 1st—one month earlier than usual—because of the production of unusually heavy September gales.

—THE American Turners of Milwaukee arrived at this city last week, bringing the highest prizes for wrestling and other athletic sports, which they had won at the Turners' International Feast held at Frankfort-on-the-Main. They were warmly welcomed by the Turner Societies of New York and New Jersey.

—ATTORNEY-GENERAL DEVENS has received a telegram from Marshal Osborne, at Montgomery, informing him of the arrest in Covington County, Ala., of Penton and nine other persons, who are charged with beating and intimidating United States witnesses and destroying processes from the United States Courts.

—AT a recent meeting of German doctors interested in the treatment of insane persons, a paper was read by the Director of the Brunswick State Lunatic Asylum, in which he maintains that much of the increase of insanity in Germany is attributable to the excessive amount of work imposed upon the pupils in the national schools.

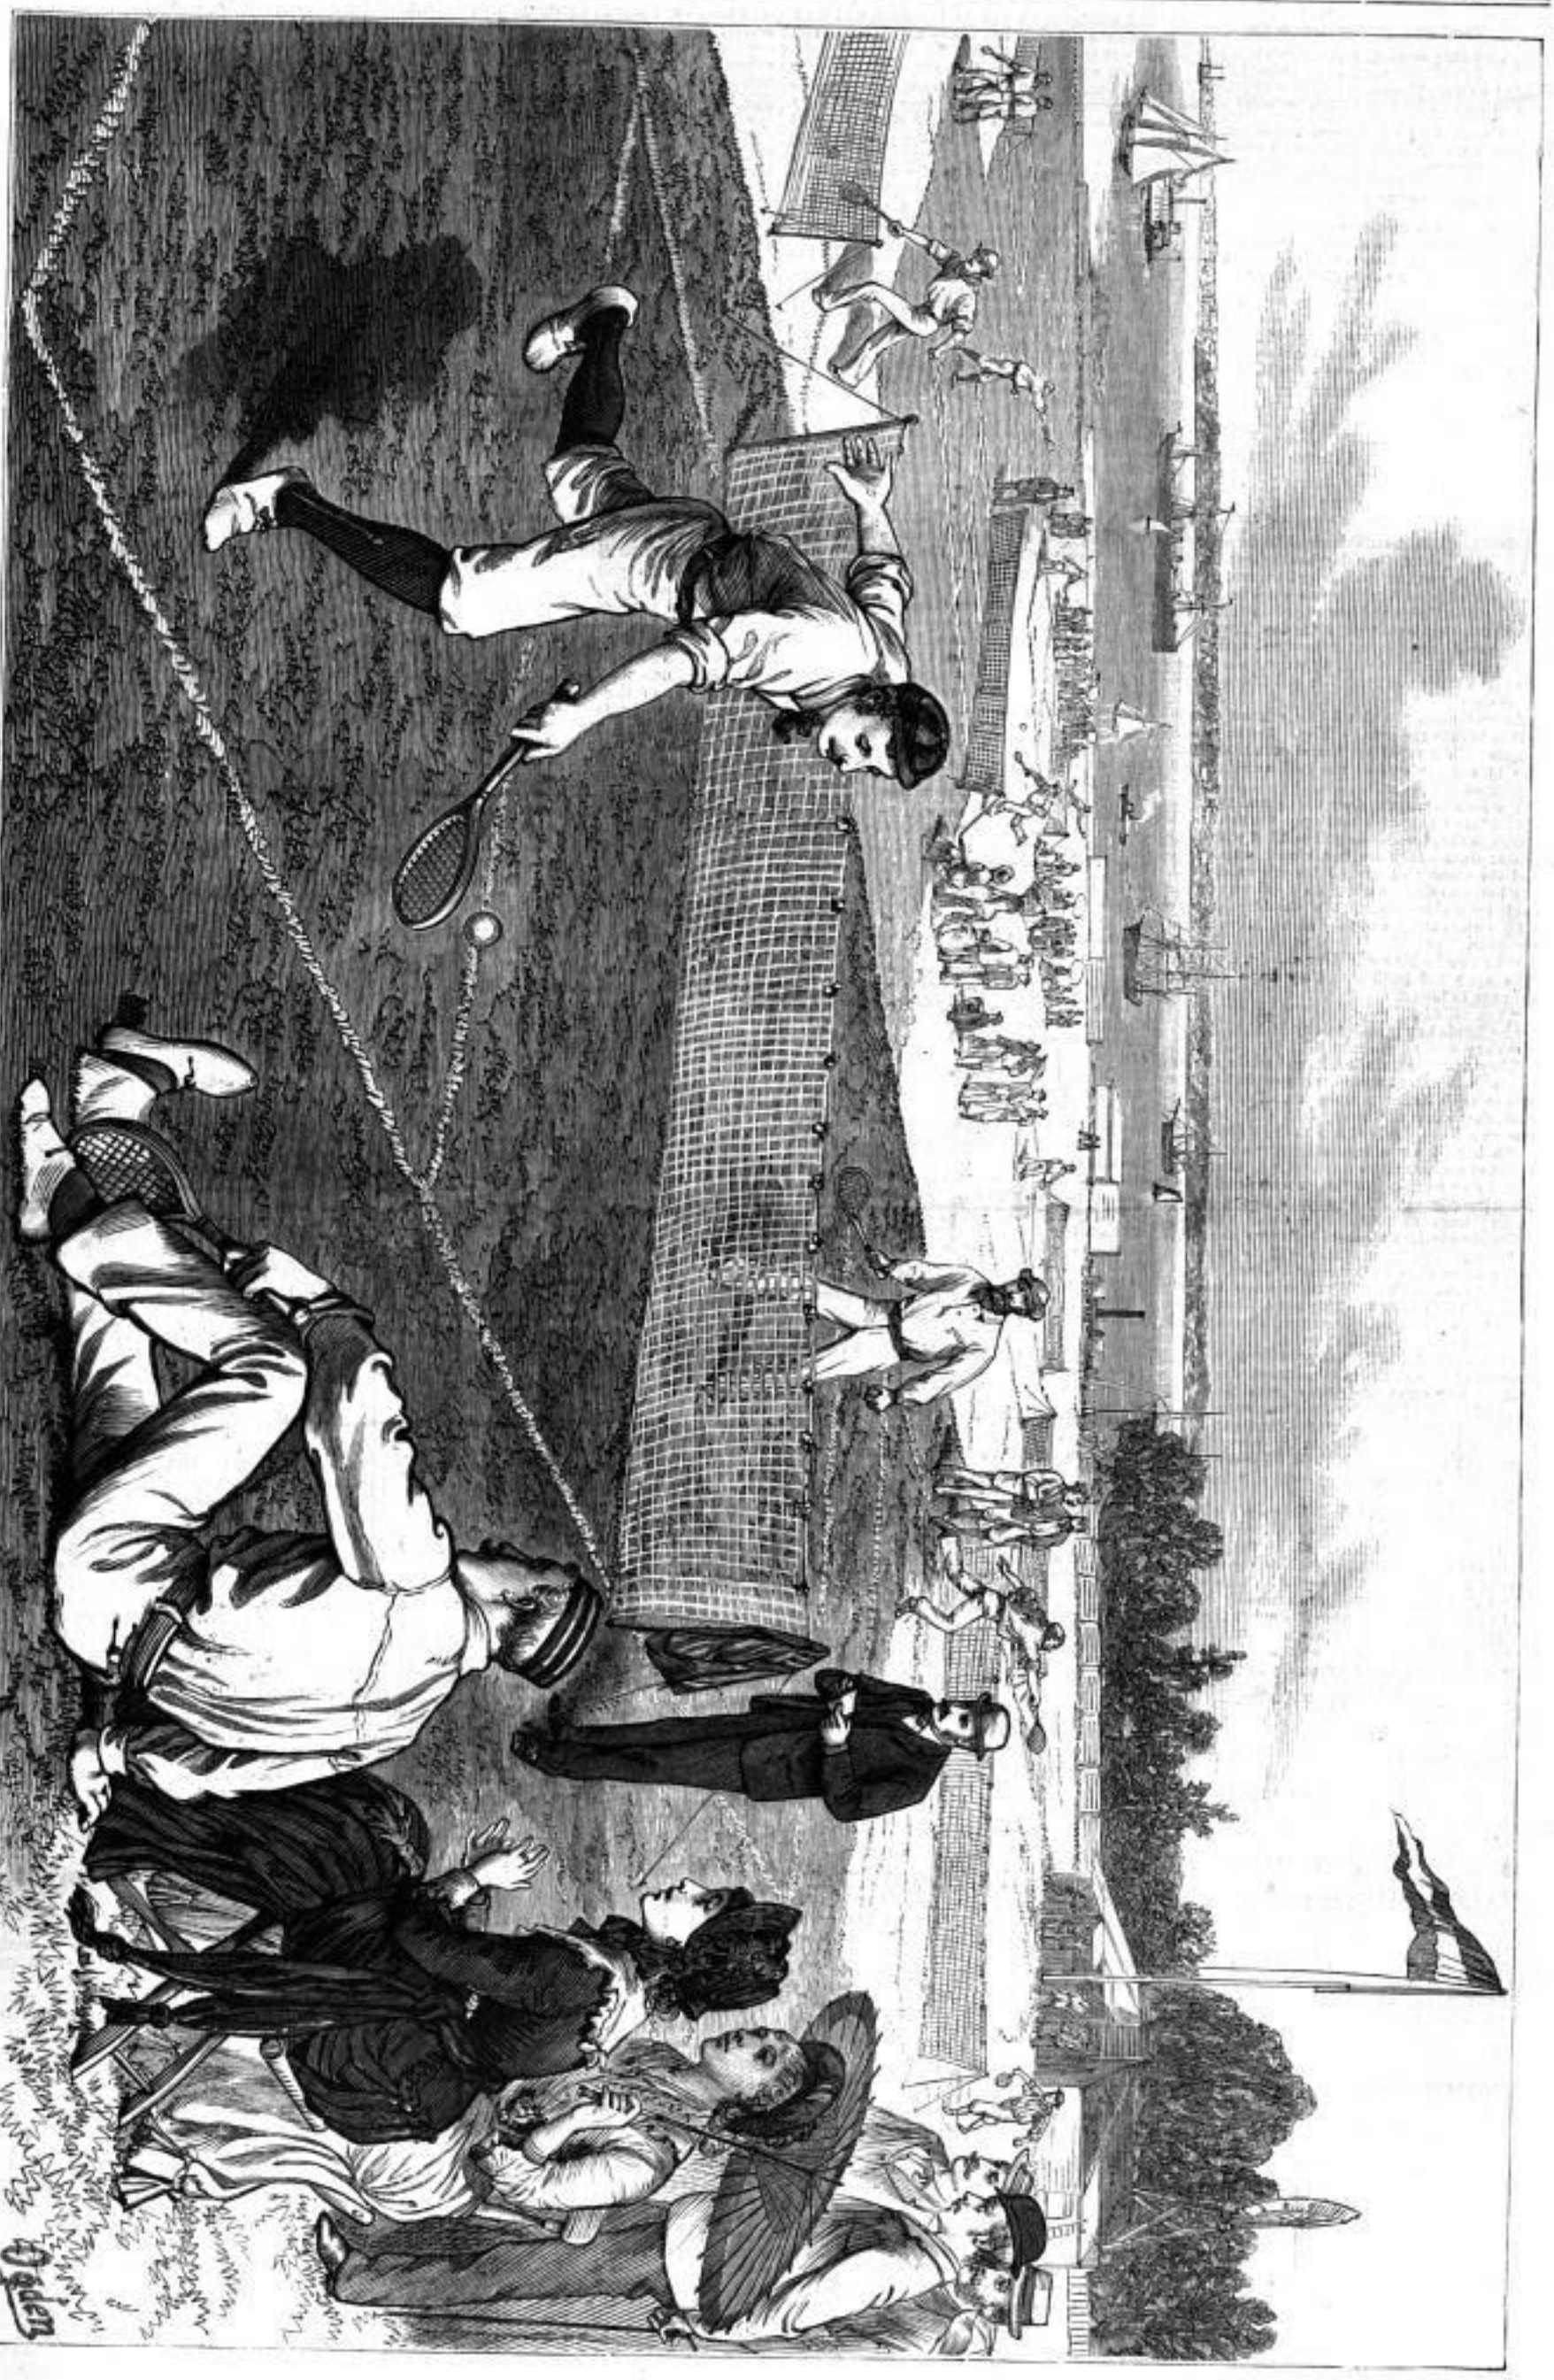
—A NEW company has been formed in Paris with a capital of 10,000,000 francs to establish factories for making sugar from beet root in various parts of the province of Quebec, each factory to cost from $100,000 to $120,000. A scientific expert named Delaloude has been sent from Paris to report upon the capabilities and resources of Canada.



—RETURNS of the Chicago Clearing House for August are stated at $137,000,000, against $96,000,000 for the corresponding month of last year. This shows an increase of 42 per cent. The clearings for the first eight months of the year are reported at $1,053,000,000, against $738,000,000 for the same period in 1879, showing an increase of 43 per cent.

—THE Post Office Department has ordered the transportation of United States mails over the recently completed portion of the Southern Pacific Railway from Asuma, Arizona, to Benson, Arizona, a distance of 390 miles. This completes a continuous route of mail transportation by rail from San Francisco through the entire length of the State of California and nearly across the southern portion of Arizona, a distance of over 1,000 miles.

—RUSSIA has decided to transfer the new Kuldja negotiations to Pekin, whither M. Boutzow, the Russian Minister, will shortly proceed. The Marquis Tseng has informed Russia that China desires to substitute for the Livadia Treaty a convention ceding the whole Tek Territory. Russia, while not refusing to lighten the conditions of the Livadia Treaty, demands a rectification of the frontier, for the purpose of ending disorder, and also requires the possession of a portion of Kuldja to establish a colony of Dzingans, who would otherwise be left to the vengeance of the Chinese.



—THE Pennsylvania Railroad Company is beginning to reap the advantages of its liberal expenditure in placing its road, branches and leased lines in the best possible working condition. Perhaps no road in the country now equals the Pennsylvania in the condition of its tracks and the character of its equipments. The latest report of the business of all lines of the company east of Pittsburgh and Erie, shows an increase in gross earnings for the seven months of 1880, as compared with the same period in 1879, of $4,686,752, and so increase in net earnings of $2,551,443. All lines west of Pittsburgh and Erie, for the seven months of 1880 show a surplus over liabilities of $1,811,905, being a gain over the same period in 1879 of $2,636,721.

Digitized by Google

NEW YORK.—RECEPTION OF LT.-COM. GORRINGE, U. S. N., BY ANGLO-SAXON LODGE, No. 137, F. AND A. M., BROOKLYN, SEPTEMBER 1st. EXPLAINING THE MASONIC EMBLEMS ON THE EGYPTIAN OBELISK.—FROM A SKETCH BY ALBERT BERGHAUS.—SEE PAGE 39.

Digitized by Google

NEW YORK.—FIRST NATIONAL LAWN-TENNIS TOURNAMENT, NEW BRIGHTON, STATEN ISLAND.—FROM A SKETCH BY H. A. OGDEN.—SEE PAGE 43.

Digitized by Google

THE BREAKERS BROKEN.

ONWARD, onward, never higher!
Upward, upward, never higher!
Ah! waves, ah! men, shall brave endeavor
Fall back in froth and foam for ever?

Yet mark those eager crests that hover,
Like birds the moving wave-mass over:
The waves roll back, but they dash on;
The dry sands drink them: one by one
They perish on the beach forlorn.

As they die, a thought emerges
Ghost-like from the shattered surges:
"To strive is still to fail; the strongest
In striving most but suffer longest."

Far sweeter than mad surface motion
The dim green depths of unstirred ocean!
More happy than the windy crest
A lowly life where love and rest
House in the chambers of the breast!

THE SCHAFFUSKIE LANDS.

BY ANNIE DUFFELL,

AUTHOR OF "IN THE MEANS," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXIII.—THE END OF JACK.

A COLD, starless Russian night is settling down. Another day has passed in the dreary solitude of the prison, and as yet no knowledge of her fate has come to Maize. For the first time since her imprisonment Jack has not visited her through the day. A perfect madness of impatience has fastened upon her, and under the torturing, agonizing suspense, she paces back and forth her cell like a caged tigress.

At last upon the death-like silence of the prison breaks the tread of feet. Instantly she pauses in her rapid walk and stands motionless in the far end of the cell, awaiting the coming of her jailer.

The lock turns, the door opens, and two big, brutal-faced keepers stand upon the threshold. Through the gloom—the cell is filled with fast-falling dusk—they see her weird, white face and the shining of her golden-crowned head. She looks so still, so white, so wondrous in her cold, frozen beauty, that a shuddering awe settles upon them, and they stand irresolute in the door.

"You come for me?" Her steady, icy voice falls upon the hush that they have not the courage to break.

"Yes, miladie."

She bends her proud, tawny head.

"Very well; I am ready."

They advance in silence, and while she extends her arms, upon the rounded wrist, whose model adorns many a sculptor's sanctum, they clasp the heavy iron shackles, and, one on either side, lead her to the Public.

An hour later a man staggers out of the court-room—staggers in a blind, uncertain, dazed way, as though stricken with death—and runs heavily against a massive figure that is pacing back and forth the outer corridor. Toboskie mutters a curse, believing the blind personage drunk, and is about to move on when he catches a glimpse of his face.

"My God, Jack!" Then he stops quickly and his hands clinch; one sight of that frozen face, with its blanched horror, is enough. It tells him that the end has come.

Still in that deadly stillness Jack, without looking at him, clutches his arm and drags him out in the night far away from that dull, horrible roar of many voices that comes from the court-chamber. As they stand out in the frosty air, Toboskie looks at his companion.

"What is it? How have they decided?" He makes several attempts before he can utter the words.

But Jack does not hear. He stands with his face gray, like the leaden sky above, his eyes dull and expressionless. Over the city the wind is rising in fitful gusts, and through the gloom of the oncoming night flickers small, fine flakes of snow. It is inestimably dreary, but upon the souls of these two men has settled a drear and darkness infinitely worse.

"Speak! Tell me, for God's sake! I had not the courage to stand by while they read the sentence. What is it?"

Toboskie shakes his companion's arm, but cannot rouse him from that abstraction that strongly, horribly resembles death.

"Will you tell me?" he cries, fiercely. "What was the sentence?"

Jack never withdraws his eyes from that distant, vacant look, as he puts into words this woman's fate whose horror and bitterness no language can portray.

"Exiled for life!" He utters no reproaches—he does not tell him that one word from him would have saved her this.

But Toboskie reels back against the stone column, for one instant overpowered. Yet it is no more than he expected.

"God have mercy on her!"—the delirious mutter breaks from him unconsciously.

Jack is briefly roused.

"Yes, for man had none!" he says, that old, strong, proud spirit awakening in him for the last time. "She has been hunted to her death, yet she is innocent!"

"And she —— ?" Toboskie puts the question shrinkingly, fearfully, as if he had no right to take her name.

"She is unconscious," says Jack, relapsing into that absent, vacant manner. "She fell as if shot to the heart. They carried her out—back to the prison. I am going to her now."

Toboskie looks at him; he sees that old, dark-purple hue has returned to his face, upon which rests also a grayish shadow as of death. Around his eyes, which are glazed and unnatural, are great black circles where the dark blood has settled. Looking at this man—this pitiable wreck of his former self—a nameless dread and fear settles upon the statesman. He sees that he is not in a fit condition to be trusted alone.

"I will go with you to the door, and wait outside until you are ready to return. You are not quite well, I think."

Jack says nothing, does not even seem to hear, but, turning, walks up the steps and into the building again. By an inner passage they reach the prison, and Toboskie steps aside as his companion, admitted by the jailer, enters the cell.

Sitting upon the bed is the woman upon whom the sentence of Russia's severity has so recently been passed. She is very pale, but outwardly composed, save for a wild, desperate gleam that fills her large, sunken eyes. As Jack staggers into the cell she flings out her hands, though a great and sudden weakness holds her powerless, and in her throat breaks a tearless sob; but her eyes are dry and burning with that great light.

Jack sinks on the iron bed beside her. He says not a word, but he folds his arms tightly around her, and she feels the rapid, uneven heaving of his chest—folds her away in his arms as when she was a little child, passing an unsteady hand again and again over the rich gold of her loosened hair, and looking downwards, with that crushed, heartrending look, into the blanched loveliness of her quivering face.

"Maize," he whispers, piteously. "Maize!"

"What, dear?" The girl has to steady herself before she replies. The sight of Jack's stricken, blinding misery is the last drop in her cup.

"Maize, have I always done everything for you I could? Have I always made your life happy? Looking back now, I am afraid there was some little thing more I might have done for you. That I was not always as careful of your happiness as I should have been." The dull, tired eyes look down at her in great tenderness. From the girl breaks a wordless cry of much suffering, while the weary voice continues. "And I hope you believe, dear, that I never doubted you. I know you are innocent. I never doubted you even for a moment. Nothing could ever shake my faith. I know you too well for that." A shadow of the old, fond smile flits athwart the darkly drawn lips. "And I have tried to save you. I think in that I have done everything I could. There is nothing in the world that I would not do for you, but I am so helpless—so powerless! Maize, I wish you had died when you were a little child; I wish, for your sake, dear, you had never grown to womanhood. But I never doubted you, I trusted you always. I trust you now." Jack suddenly drops his arms and staggers to his feet. In the next instant through the silence of the dungeon rings wild and shudderingly the echo of a woman's shriek, and Toboskie in the corridor hurls aside the keeper and unlocking the door rushes into the cell. Upon the floor lies poor Jack, and beside him, propping his head upon her arm, kneels Maize, vainly striving to stanch a stream of dark blood flowing from his lips, and which every moment increases. Toboskie kneels upon the other side and looks down into the purple face of the dying man—Jack with his great, generous soul—Jack with his willing spirit and weak flesh. Even a child could see that this erring, wasted, dissolute life is very near its end—that the once gay, rollicking, irrepressible spirit is going downwards into the valley and the shadow of death. In this moment enmity and hatred are forgotten, and, in a wild, terrified appeal, Maize turns her eyes upon Toboskie.

"Save him—oh, my God! save him!" she cries.

At the voice those closed lids unfasten and the dull eyes suddenly brighten, as with a desperate effort he lays his hand upon her face.

"Ah, it is Maize—poor little Maize," he murmurs, while the old boyish smile lights up his face. "I found her in Athens where she lay in the sun. I never doubted you, dear—never, never!" Even in his death-hour that grand and entire faith clings to him. "Ah, I am so tired—so very tired, mother! and I have borne so much; things have never been as they were before you died, but I guess they won't be rough on me up there; maybe you will say a word for your boy? And don't forget Maize; and you will know me, mother, even though my hair has grown gray. Ah, it has been a long time, a very long time." And thus he wanders on, but never one word does he utter of Gypsy. The spirit drawing so near eternity is shorn of its earthly weaknesses and desires, and across his tired and failing brain there comes no memory of this frail and fickle woman.

In the cell is an intense stillness, while Jack lies dying. He has still strength to clasp tightly the hand of the girl, who sits motionless as marble and stupefied by this last blow. And all the while that great but indefinable change settles over his face, while the shadow of death draws nearer and nearer and fills the cell.

At last the tired eyes unclose for the last time upon scenes of earth. He raises himself high in her arms and looks around the cell, while the present drifts back.

"I have done all I could, Maize," he whispers; "but it will all come right in the end. I am dying, Maize. Good-night, dear!" The beautiful, white head sinks down upon her breast, and she thinks the spirit has fled.

Stricken with agony and remorse, Toboskie grasps one of the fast-chilling hands and bends over his dying friend.

"Have you no word for me?" he cries, in anguish. "Say that you forgive me. If you can find pardon, look up in my face."

There is only an imperceptible pause, and he never knows whether it is occasioned by weakness, or whether, even in death, this soul has to struggle ere it can vouch full forgiveness; but after that instant the great, death-scourged eyes, that have gathered back a look of that long-vanished boyhood, look up in a vast, mute pardon, while his lips move, and they both bend low to catch those last feeble words.

"Not a sparrow falls without the Father's notice." It is all he says, but it is enough. Toboskie knows that his mother's God has in this hour given back to him the comfort of His abiding love. There is a swift shudder throughout the length and breadth of that magnificent form—a look of mortal suffering upon the face, and the head falls back. Jack is dead!

CHAPTER XXXIV.—TOBOSKIE YIELDS.

"I WISH to see the prisoner." The cold voice rouses the sleepy guard as he lounges in front of the cell he watches, and he straightens himself and looks half-fearfully at the speaker. Every one in Russia knows those calm, incisive tones, that dark, cameo face.

"But, my lord——" begins the guard, tremblingly.

"Admit me!"

"My orders have been very strict to admit no one, my lord. Fears are entertained that the aristoc—er——" The guard stops precipitately, as he suddenly remembers that he is addressing one of the Order. "Fears are entertained," he resumes, carefully, "that an attempt to rescue the prisoner may be made. And to-morrow she is sent off to the mines."

"You villain!"—Toboskie can never tolerate resistance—"do you presume to refuse admittance to me? Step aside."

The guard shrinks back in a panic, and the statesman stands motionless for a moment before the door. From the cell he hears the slow, measured tread of feet that are pacing back and forth the dungeon. Standing there in the gloom of the prison-corridor, a mortal cowardice briefly fastens upon him—a cowardice of this woman whom he has refused to save. But as quickly as it comes it vanishes, and he taps upon the panel of the door.

Instantly the steps cease, and, after a brief silence, a voice—the voice—demands the name of the applicant. At a motion from the count the guard steps forward and announces:

"Count Raoul Toboskie."

This time there is a much longer pause ere the response comes in a hard voice, from which all the rich melody has been crushed.

"Admit him."

The lock turns, the door opens, and Toboskie is in the prison-cell, which is imperfectly lighted by a burning taper. Before him, like the angels of Guido, stands the woman accused of her crime. Though outside, the city clocks are chiming for midnight, he sees that no rest or slumber has yet visited her. She stands in the far end of the cell, her hand resting on the ledge of the window, her burnished hair gleaming bright in the shadows, her magnificent form clothed in some rich, sombre stuff, above which he sees the white, imperial majesty of her face, the majestic poise of her head, her throat and her proud shoulders. He gazes at her with a hard, fixed, agonized stare, as she turns upon him her eyes, filled with their lustre and languor.

"To what am I indebted for this unexpected honor?"

While her voice is cold and proud, and herself thoroughly composed, a fever of madness and passion is consuming him. His stately ease, his haughty immovability, are swept away, and at last he has sunk down to the common level of other men—to love and to suffer.

"I came here to see you once again." His voice is filled with a passionate despair. "I know that I have no right to seek you, yet to-night I could bear it no longer, and I am here."

"I am disappointed," she says, coldly, while in her eyes is a grand wrath for this man who dares hold her guilty. "I thought you had come from Gypsy, or perhaps to tell me something of—Jack!"

He sees now that this is why he was admitted, but he has not the courage to say that he will leave her.

"I have nothing to tell you," he says, and seeing her steady, glorious eyes, strives to regain his strength and composure. "You already know that Gypsy has a relapse of the fever, and that Lord Ashhurst's remains were embalmed and sent to England to be entombed in the family vault."

"No, I did not know," she replies, and across her straight lips flits a smile that almost sickens Toboskie, so mad and bitter is it. "You forget, Count Toboskie, that I am a prisoner. I never saw Jack after his corpse was carried out from my cell—never even knew what they had done with him. But I am glad that they sent him back to England, very glad, since we cannot be together."

The count's hands clinch; he sees how entirely she is separated from the world—how heavy and bitter is this blow that has crushed her. He looks at her, still in that fixed, suffering regard, and over him steals the spell of her loveliness that always fired him like unto wine. The Grecian luxuriousness of her beauty holds a certain beguiling sensuousness which, though far removed from mere matter, rouses his fiercest passions. The same as the firm lips shut over the great agony of soul, the slender clasped hands, the grand, brave eyes that scorn pleading for any earthly favor, rouse his noblest attributes, and, in spite of his suspicion of her, wrings from his torn, harassed soul a high tribute of admiration and even of awe. He knows that her spirit, enfranchised from all natural weakness, looks steadily forward to its living death; that when she comes to the fagot and the flames this unflinching, lofty courage will sustain her unfalteringly to the end. And yet he sees that she is still warm and womanly—that while she goes forward to her fate with proud endurance, it is because it is inevitable—that in the hidden depths of her mighty soul there is a secret dread and horror of her doom, though none but God shall read one pang that she suffers.

He sees the soft, beguiling loveliness of her splendor, the lofty, spiritual significance of martyrdom: all this is lost to him—lost through his own madness; for in this hour that spirit of horror and abnegation that has actuated him through the past grows paltry and insignificant. He loves this woman, and he has suddenly grown to know that he cannot give her up. He had prided himself upon his strength and endurance, but he sees that he is no stronger nor braver than his fellows.

A mighty conflict is waging within his breast, and under the smooth, dusky skin of that haughty face the proud blood comes and goes swiftly, and his teeth are set as in physical pain. Scarcely conscious of his actions, he draws his handkerchief from his pocket to wipe his forehead, upon which stands the dank dews of suffering, and as he does so an article besides the linen is drawn from the same receptacle and falls upon the floor between them. It is very small—nothing but a woman's slipper—yet as it lies there upon the floor a pallor as of death sweeps both their faces, and a quiver momentarily disturbs the hard lines of the girl's mouth—it reminds her so forcibly of that time, separated from the present by ages of suffering, when they stood together in the dusky shadows of the old apartment with the future clouds all unseen.

The sudden sight of the slipper completes Toboskie's madness; in his eyes rushes a desperate, delirious purpose. Guilt or innocence, shame or honor, what are they to love? Under the fires of his mighty passion he stands ready to sacrifice his all upon the altar of love. Suddenly upon him falls a great calmness more powerful than passionate outburst, and born of his intense excitement. He takes her hand, and looks down in the soft alluring heaven of her eyes.

"I yield," he says, his voice filled with a thrilling pathos. "I love you better than ever mortal man loved woman before. I have struggled for days and nights to uproot this love from my heart, to tear your image from my soul, but I cannot, and I have tried so hard. I think no man ever struggled more than I have to abide by honor and justice. But I am conquered. I struggled with my weakness, because, mark you, I believe you guilty—I more than all the world have cause to suspect you. But what of it? Standing here branded with your crime, I love you with all my heart and soul; my whole nature has gone out to you. What is honor? Once I held it very dear—even yet I hold it dearer than life; but compared to you it is nothing. I lay my all at your feet, my honor, my manhood, my life, and what I prize dearer—my country." He pauses for some reply, but she stands mute as stone, though a thrill of hot delight passes through her—a delight for which she could kill herself a moment after.

"Everything I have I give to you," he repeats, with something of passion now. "Oh, my God! I cannot live without you. I ask you here before God, will you be my wife? I cannot talk as I would; my lips seem mute. But if I could, I would tell you of the singleness of my love, of its great and immutable strength. It will never falter, Maize, never—never! It will cherish you through all the future, it will hide you away from the guilt and darkness of the present, it will make it impossible for any coldness or doubt to come between us. And do you fear that I would ever reproach you with what is gone? Oh, never, never! I would only remember my love—I would only remember that you were mine! Will you listen to me? If you will, I will break your fetters. I will give you my whole life, I will give you what I prize more than all else—my good name and my country. I will take you away to-night—it can be done?"—with passionate eagerness. "I will brand myself with infamy. I will steal away in the night like a thief, for I would be one. I would even be a traitor, sacrificing to you the trust that is imposed in me. I will even go away, if you go with me, and never set foot upon the dear old soil again, making myself an alien and an exile. But it is nothing—nothing, if it be done for you. Will you, Maize? Will you take me for all the future, even as I give up all for you—living only in you, for you, by you?"

She sees him for the first time in a new phase. His eyes grow passionate, tender, luminous; his voice thrills with a dangerous sweetness. He stands so close to her that she almost feels the rapid beating of his heart. And as she looks at him, suddenly between them rises the spectre of her slaughtered womanhood. She sees the shame, the persecution, the agony, the long torture of doubt and suspense, and last, but more vividly than all, Jack—poor, dead Jack!—as he fell prostrate at her feet, stricken with the same fell blow that has crushed her. Her old desperate wrath and vengeance rise warm in her breast. Between her and this man, upon whom she has sworn to avenge her wrongs, is an enmity bitterer than death, and which she feels that she can never bury.

"Will you listen to me?" urges the passionate, adoring voice. "Will you give yourself to my keeping? Oh, Maize, my darling! I think man never suffered as I have suffered in the past—I think man never loved as I love. Will you let me set you free?"

And as she listens a grand imperial smile overspreads her face with triumphant pride. She has conquered at last.

"It is too late," she says, and in her voice is the death-knell to his hopes. "Between you and me is a gulf that can never be abridged."

A great hoarse cry breaks from him, and, sinking at her feet, he buries his face in her garment.

"Oh, my God!" he mutters. "I have given her all—all! yet she spurns me! In the sight of God I have made myself a traitor—have bartered my soul—and all of no avail! Have you no pity—no mercy?"

"Had you any for me!"—the girl's voice is inflexible as steel. "You have wronged me as no man ever wronged woman before, and I will never forgive it! And some day you will see that I am innocent. You have been proud of your power, your resolution, your wisdom, but the time shall come when you will see how you have erred in your judgment of me. So far in my life you have always misjudged me, but the end shall come, soon or late. Until then I am content."

Digitized by Google

"And you will not let me aid you?"—he lifts his haggard, smitten face, but she is as inexorable as fate.

"No," she says. "To save me from the living death to which you have once consigned me, I will not accept a favor at your hands. To-morrow I commence my bondage—my bondage of shame and want and suffering; but if you were to burst my shackles and throw open my prison-doors, and this moment say, 'Go, you are free!' I would not accept my freedom. The hand that has slaughtered me and mine shall never be taken by me in friendship."

"You are mad!" he says, and, springing to his feet, his eyes, hot and lurid, look savagely down at her. "You throw away your last chance of salvation. You don't know the horror, the misery, the endless woe of a life of exile, or you would not trifle with me. I tell you it would kill you!"

"Oh, no, it would not!"—a dreary, bitter smile flits athwart her colorless face. "I have lived through worse agony than that—lived, while every moment I was praying for death, yet death would not come. I lived though I saw the man I loved better than a father fall dead at my feet, slain by my injuries. No one but God knows how I suffered in those long, miserable days! I would have given my life for one look at him—only one last look! yet it was denied me. I wonder now that I did not go mad. What I had suffered was as nase compared with that trial. I bribed the jailer to tell me the day and the hour when the funeral procession would pass. Then I pleaded and prayed to him, and gave him all of money and valuables I had, to let me see it, just to let me look upon the hearse as it went by. He consented, and took me to another cell fronting the street, and I saw the coffin—Jack's coffin—where they had shut him away from me! And never again would I see him—never again, after all that we had been to one another. If I could only have looked upon him—only have seen his dear face before they took it for ever away! But I never shall—never again see Jack!"

Her words end in a moan, and he shudders as he listens. He sees himself what ghastly phantoms of guilt and suffering stand for ever between them.

"I tell you this," she resumes, after a pause, in which she has regained her self-control, "to show you that nothing in the future can kill me. And now I shall be glad if this interview will terminate. To-morrow, in the sunrise, I go out to the life to which you have doomed me. Surely until then I may be left in peace."

He looks at her, and something in his eyes reminds her of that last heart-broken glance of Jack's, yet she never wavers. In her heart is a bitterness for him that she is not yet ready to suppress. Still he looks at her in that hard agonized stare, as if his very soul were being torn from him. He sees the soft gleaming of her golden hair, the steady lustre of her shining eyes, the lofty fearless majesty of her cloudless face. All this lost to him for evermore! And he has loved her with the force of ripe passion, with all that steadfastness of first love.

Suddenly before his weary, haggard eyes rushes the memory of that far-off day on the English Channel. He sees the clear, Greek-faced child standing facing him upon the sands. He remembers that his first acquaintance with her commenced in strife, and so it seems must it end. All the tenderness, the weakness, of his futile love rises warm in his breast and banishes that brief recent rage. He looks at her, his eyes lustrous and passion-laden, and pleads for the last time for her love.

"Can you not forgive and forget?" he says, tremulously. "Will you not accept my love and give yourself into my keeping?" And surely, according to his light, he has much more to overlook and forget than she. But she is inexorable. That one dark phase of her character—vengeance, as remorseless and never-dying as her pride—has been brought forward and crushes all other and nobler sentiments.

"It is too late!" she says, and he shudders as he hears.

"Then I must leave you! Think, we may be—doubtless are—looking upon one another for the last time. Can you speak the word that separates us for ever? Must I leave you?"

She bends her haughty golden head. It may be that she has not the strength just then to speak, but he sees that his case is hopeless. A passionate yearning sweeps his soul. He takes one step nearer her and looks down in her steady eyes.

"May I kiss you good-by?" he says, slowly.

"No!"

"May I take your hand?"

"You may not even take my hand!"

One long, last look, and he turns and leaves the cell.

(To be continued.)

A LAWN-TENNIS TOURNAMENT.

THE first national lawn-tennis tournament ever played in the United States commenced on Wednesday last, September 1st, on the grounds of the Staten Island Club, Camp Washington, New Brighton. The grounds were in perfect order, and were covered with diagrams. Long nets, looking like seines, were stretched between posts at different points in the field. The boundary fences had received fresh coats of whitewash, and camp-stools for spectators were placed in rows on either side of the several tennis courts. The tournament was open to all comers, and gentlemen from England and Canada, as well as from different parts of the United States, were entered.

During the play the field presented a very interesting scene. Drags, phaetons, dog-carts, and a four-in-hand drew up at the fence near the entrance to the inclosure, and there were several parties of ladies and gentlemen on horseback, while the grounds in the more immediate vicinity were well-covered with spectators. Towards sunset the view over the bay and down the harbor was particularly fine. The bright and varied costumes of the players lent the scene additional life and attractiveness. The games played were all single games, with twenty-three players entered. These games were continued on the two following days, the prize being a handsome silver cup, valued at $100, presented for competition by the Staten Island Club. On one side of the trophy is the inscription—"The Champion Lawn-tennis Player of America." The double games commenced on Monday, the 6th.

LIFE AND SCENES IN CHILI.

WE give on page 44 an illustration of Santa Lucia, a famous pleasure resort in the City of Santiago, the capital of Chili. The Cerro Santa Lucia, a reddish porphyry gray, rises abruptly in the very heart of the city to a height of over 230 feet, and, having been embellished at a heavy expenditure of money, is in every way one of the most attractive resorts in the whole Santiago province. The hill is lit by gas, and is frequented by all classes of citizens. We also give an illustration of the cueca, or national dance of Chili, as seen in a cargana, where all visitors are accustomed to drink from a common glass. The movements in this dance are very pleasing, resembling in some respects those in the Spanish fandango, and the scene at a cargana, or wayside inn, when occupied by a merry company of loungers, is full of life and color. Our artist has given very effectively the spirit of such a scene.

THE JETTIES AT CHARLESTON, S. C.

THE importance of the City of Charleston as one of the chief seaports of the country has recently been acknowledged in a marked manner by the General Government, liberal appropriations having been made for the construction of the grandest and costliest harbor improvements yet undertaken in the United States, except only at New York and at the mouth of the Mississippi River. The great obstacle to the commerce of the city has always been the bar at the entrance to the harbor, which prevents altogether the passage of the largest vessels, and makes it necessary even for large coastwise steamers to await the tide. By the erection of jetties, or huge walls of masonry, from the north and south sides of the harbor, extending seawards, but gradually approaching each other until only an entrance of half a mile wide is left, it is proposed to make the force of the outgoing current so great as to wash away the bar to the desired depth. Our illustration shows the manner in which the mattresses, or rafts of timber and brush, are placed in position to give a foundation on which to lay the stone.

Sarah Bernhardt's Company.

MR. FREDERICK A. SCHWAB, agent for Mr. Henry E. Abbey in the securing of a company of French artists to support Mlle. Sarah Bernhardt during her American engagement, has completed his work. Mr. Schwab's task was a difficult one, inasmuch as the prevailing idea among the actors and actresses was that they should receive from three to five times their real worth in the way of salaries. However, he finally succeeded in making contracts which, while they are fair to the artists, are, on the whole, in favor of Mr. Abbey.

It is agreed that ocean passage is to be paid only one way, and that no expenses are to be paid in the United States, save only and excepting actual rail road fares from one city to another. Moreover, the artists have not only signed to play certain lines of business, but also such other parts as may be assigned them by the management. The salary list is a large one, amounting in total to about 35,000 francs for some eighteen persons.

The highest-priced artists are Mr. Angelo, the "leading man"—his real name is Barthélemy—and Mlle. Jeanne Bernhardt, the youngest sister of the great actress, each of whom receives 5,000 francs per month. All are engaged for five months, but salaries do not begin until the 6th of November.

Besides the two artists just mentioned, the other principal members of the company are, Mme. Mea, Mlle. Sidney, Mlle. Martel, Mme. Gally, and Messrs. Gangloff, Gally, D'Orsay, Boulland, Thiéfer, Delétraz, Joliet, and Chamouin, the last named of whom has been twice to America already. Mr. Defresne of the Théâtre Royal, at The Hague, is the stage manager, and Mme. Joliet is the prompter.

The company begin their rehearsals the middle of September on the stage of the Variétés Theatre. They open at Booth's Theatre in "Adrienne Lecouvreur" November 8th.

Mlle. Bernhardt intends to take the ladies of the new continent by storm, not only in her acting, but in the manner of her dresses. A famous house in the Rue de la Paix is now making for her twelve costumes at a cost of 60,000 francs. She has already bought 300 pairs of gloves, and her stockings and slippers are said to be marvels of richness and beauty.

Mlle. Sarah Bernhardt will be accompanied to America by her son, her valet and his wife, and a maid-servant, all of whose expenses are to be paid by the management. Her sister Jeanne will have three persons in her suite, but their expenses will not be paid by Mr. Abbey.

The French Crown Jewels.

THE scheme for the sale of a portion of the French crown jewels is based upon a report recently made by M. Turquet, an official who was delegated by the Minister of Finance and the Budget Committee to report upon the matter. By M. Turquet's recommendation, the whole treasure will be divided into three parts. The first will comprise the historic jewels and stones, which will be placed in the Louvre; the second part will contain the scarce minerals, and will be placed in the Museum of the Ecole des Mines; while the third portion, composed of royal and imperial jewelry, will be put up to auction and sold to the highest bidder, the proceeds to go to form a State Fine Art fund.

M. Turquet has had an inventory made of this princely treasure. One of the most famous of the diamonds is the one called "Regent". It weighs 136½ carats, and is one of extreme whiteness and brilliancy. This stone has a very curious history attaching to it. It was bought by the Duke of Orleans, then Regent of France, of 1701, the Governor of Fort St. George, in the year 1717, for $625,000. When rough the stone weighed 411 carats, and the cutting cost $10,000. Pitt had purchased this stone in Golconda, of Jamalchund, a Hindoo merchant, as he states in a pamphlet published to clear himself from the reports about his having stolen it. This diamond, however, was actually stolen from the Garde Meuble in 1792, but was restored in a mysterious manner. After this it was recut at a cost of $17,500, an operation which took two years to perform. Napoleon I. was so enamored of this gem that he had it set on the pommel of his sword. Some idea of the size of the Regent may be given when it is stated that it is thirty carats larger than the Koh-i-noor, the latter weighing 106 1-16 carats.

Another remarkable object in the portion to be sold is a round pearl, weighing over twenty-seven carats and valued at $60,000, and still another is a necklace of pearls, styled Cotier de la reine, composed of twenty-five pearls, and worth $120,340. Next comes a long, clear ruby, weighing fifty-six carats and valued at $10,000. There is also an amethyst of more than thirteen carats, valued at the large sum of $120,000, and a sapphire of 132 carats, worth $30,000.

From the year 1476 until 1774 the number of diamonds formally inventoried as "belonging to the Crown" was 7,462. This total, representing a capital of 20,000,000 francs, included the famous "Regent," valued at 2,500,000 francs. During the reign of Louis XV., 1,471 of these diamonds were sold, but others were bought, chiefly for the ornamenting of Court costumes, diamond buttons and sword hilts enriched with brilliants being all the fashion at the Court of the "beloved" monarch; so that when Louis XVI. came to the throne he found himself the fortunate possessor of 9,547 diamonds of different sizes. In 1792 a great many of these—among them the "Regent"—were stolen from the Garde Meuble; but shortly after their disappearance an anonymous letter reached the Government of the Convention, stating that they would be found buried in the Allée Neuve of the Champs Elysées, where, in fact, they were discovered. From 1807 to 1810 Napoleon I. bought up all the scattered crown jewels that his agents at home and abroad could trace; and the inventory taken of his acquisitions in the latter year exhibited a total of 37,230 brilliants and precious stones of various kinds, valued at 18,922,477 francs. During the Reign of Terror, however, France had irrecoverably lost the "Sancy" diamond, purchased by Charles the Bold in 1476—a magnificent opal, known as the "Fire of Troy"—and the renowned "Blue Diamond." Another magnificent brilliant, which Napoleon had carried about him for years during his many campaigns, was mislaid or dropped by him at the battle of Waterloo, and has never since been restored to the French national collection of precious stones.

By selling the jewels of the third class M. Turquet expects to realize ample funds for purchase of works of art wherewith to enrich the National Museum.

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

Parliament in England has increased the grants for scientific experiments from $5,000 to $25,000.

The Swiss are said to be the only nation who have done nothing for geographical explorations beyond their own territory.

Further rich discoveries of gold are reported to have been made in Northern Queensland and Tasmania. It is also stated that gold has been discovered under the basalt in the Brook Mountains, in New South Wales, the first instance of the kind in the colony.

The Aldini Gold Medal (worth 1,000 lire) will be awarded by the Academy of Sciences of the Institute of Bologna to the best memoir on galvanism (animal electricity). Memoirs to be written in Italian, Latin, or French, and sent in before June 30th, 1882.

An Influential Committee has been formed among the members of the Section of Zoology of the Paris Academy of Sciences, and others eminent in that department, to obtain subscriptions for a medal in honor of M. Milne-Edwards, the doyen of French zoologists.

M. Paul Soleillet, the African explorer, was entertained at dinner the other day by members of the Paris press. Replying to the toast of his health, the merry Soleillet remarked that he hoped in ten years to be able to return the hospitality shown to him by the press, and to invite his journalistic friends to repair in sleeping-cars to the buffet at the Timbuctoo station.

The Inauguration of the first agricultural school in Cuba will probably take place early in September. The Board of Planters is pushing the enterprise with zeal. The municipality of Havana has presented for the purpose of the institution various tracts of land on the suburbs of the city between the Cerro and Puentes Grandes, and the deputation of this province will most likely fix a subvention for the maintenance of the school.

The German Association of Naturalists and Physicians meets at Danzig from September 16th to 24th. Contributions from non-German workers in science are earnestly asked for, and any foreigners who desire to be present at the meeting will receive a hearty welcome. Besides the usual excursions, concerts, and other social gatherings which the Germans know how to manage so well, there will be plenty of work in the twenty-three sections.

The Astronomical Observatory established on the Trocadéro, is not the only scientific establishment which has found a home in the palace of the last Universal Exhibition. A number of microscopes have been arranged in a special room for the benefit of public instruction. The instrument lent by M. Joubert has been placed on the top of one of the towers, where a lift has been arranged for helping visitors to find their way to this exalted station.

The German Admiralty are about to consider the expediency of equipping their line-of-battle ships with torpedo boats. It is suggested that, like ordinary boats, they should be fixed at the sides of vessels, whence during action they could be readily removed to the deck to get up steam and be manned. When the moment came for their employment they could be let down without delay, and, sheltering themselves behind their own vessel, watch for opportunities to sally forth.

The French Government, it is said, is seriously occupied with the consideration of a tunnel under Mount Blanc, and has commissioned M. de Lemaye, Inspector of Railways, to draw up a comparative report as to the various passages through the Alps that are either completed or in prospect, stating the advantages and disadvantages of each as to distance, gradients and cost of construction. The Mount Blanc route has an advantage of 40 kilometres over the Simplon route, of 53 over the St. Gothard and of 72 over the Mount Cenis routes.

The Following is the system of disinfection recommended by the Austrian Government for vessels that had cases of smallpox on board: Sulphur, to the extent of twelve grains per cubic metre to be disinfected, is to be burned in an earthenware basin, placed in the centre of some sand to prevent all risk of fire. All the linen, clothes, etc., are to be hung across the cabin, which is to be hermetically closed for three hours, and afterwards exposed to the strongest possible draft of air for twelve hours. Then the walls, floor, ceiling, etc., are to be washed with one kilogramme of lime, or one-half a kilogramme of chloride of zinc to every hundred litres of water.

A Few Months after Leverrier's death a commission was established for determining the best means of protecting collieries from fire-damp. The Commission has written a very long report recording the causes of 420 accidents. Sixty-four projects presented by private individuals have been examined, and some new instruments have been designed and are being constructed, viz., an anemometer by Vicaire, a manometer by Le Chatelier, and a registering apparatus for the quantity of air introduced into the galleries. But the composition of coal explosive dust has not been determined, nor the extent of its influence on catastrophes; the chemical analysis of Grisou has not been completed, and the salvage question has not been exhausted. The only substantial benefit is a compilation of mining regulations and a series of propositions which have been transmitted to the French Ministry, and will be laid before Parliament next session.

PERSONAL GOSSIP.

THE Queen of the Netherlands has been delivered of a daughter.

THE murderers of Rev. Dr. Parsons, the American missionary, are to be sent to Constantinople for trial.

PRESIDENT HAYES expects to arrive at San Francisco on September 8th. He will not return to Washington until November 1st.

THE retirement of the Grand Duke Nicholas from the command of the Russian Imperial Guards is officially confirmed.

THE trustees of the Ohio University at Columbus have appointed W. A. Mason, of Boston, as instructor of the art department, recently created.

THE amount of the Duchess of Marlborough's Irish Relief Fund on hand was $11,955 at latest accounts. The total amount contributed is $615,850.

THE Princess Zorka of Montenegro is seventeen years old, and is a well-educated and beautiful girl. She is to become the wife of the new ruler of Bulgaria.

R. W. CAMERON, of New York, has been appointed Honorary Commissioner for the Dominion of Canada at the approaching international exhibition to be held at Melbourne, Victoria.

LORD RIPON, the new Viceroy of India, has given $10,000 towards the erection of a new Roman Catholic cathedral at Simla, the headquarters of the Government during hot weather.

J. F. LYON, of Montville, a graduate of Norwich Free Academy, and afterwards a teacher in the same institution, has recently graduated from the Heidelberg University in Germany, with the highest honors ever awarded by that celebrated school of learning.

MISS BEATRICE TROLLOPE, daughter of Mr. T. Adolphus Trollope, the novelist, has just been married in Paris to Mr. Charles Stuart Wortley, a member of Parliament. The bride was given away by her father and wore a frock of cream-colored muslin, her bonnet being trimmed with orange-blossoms.

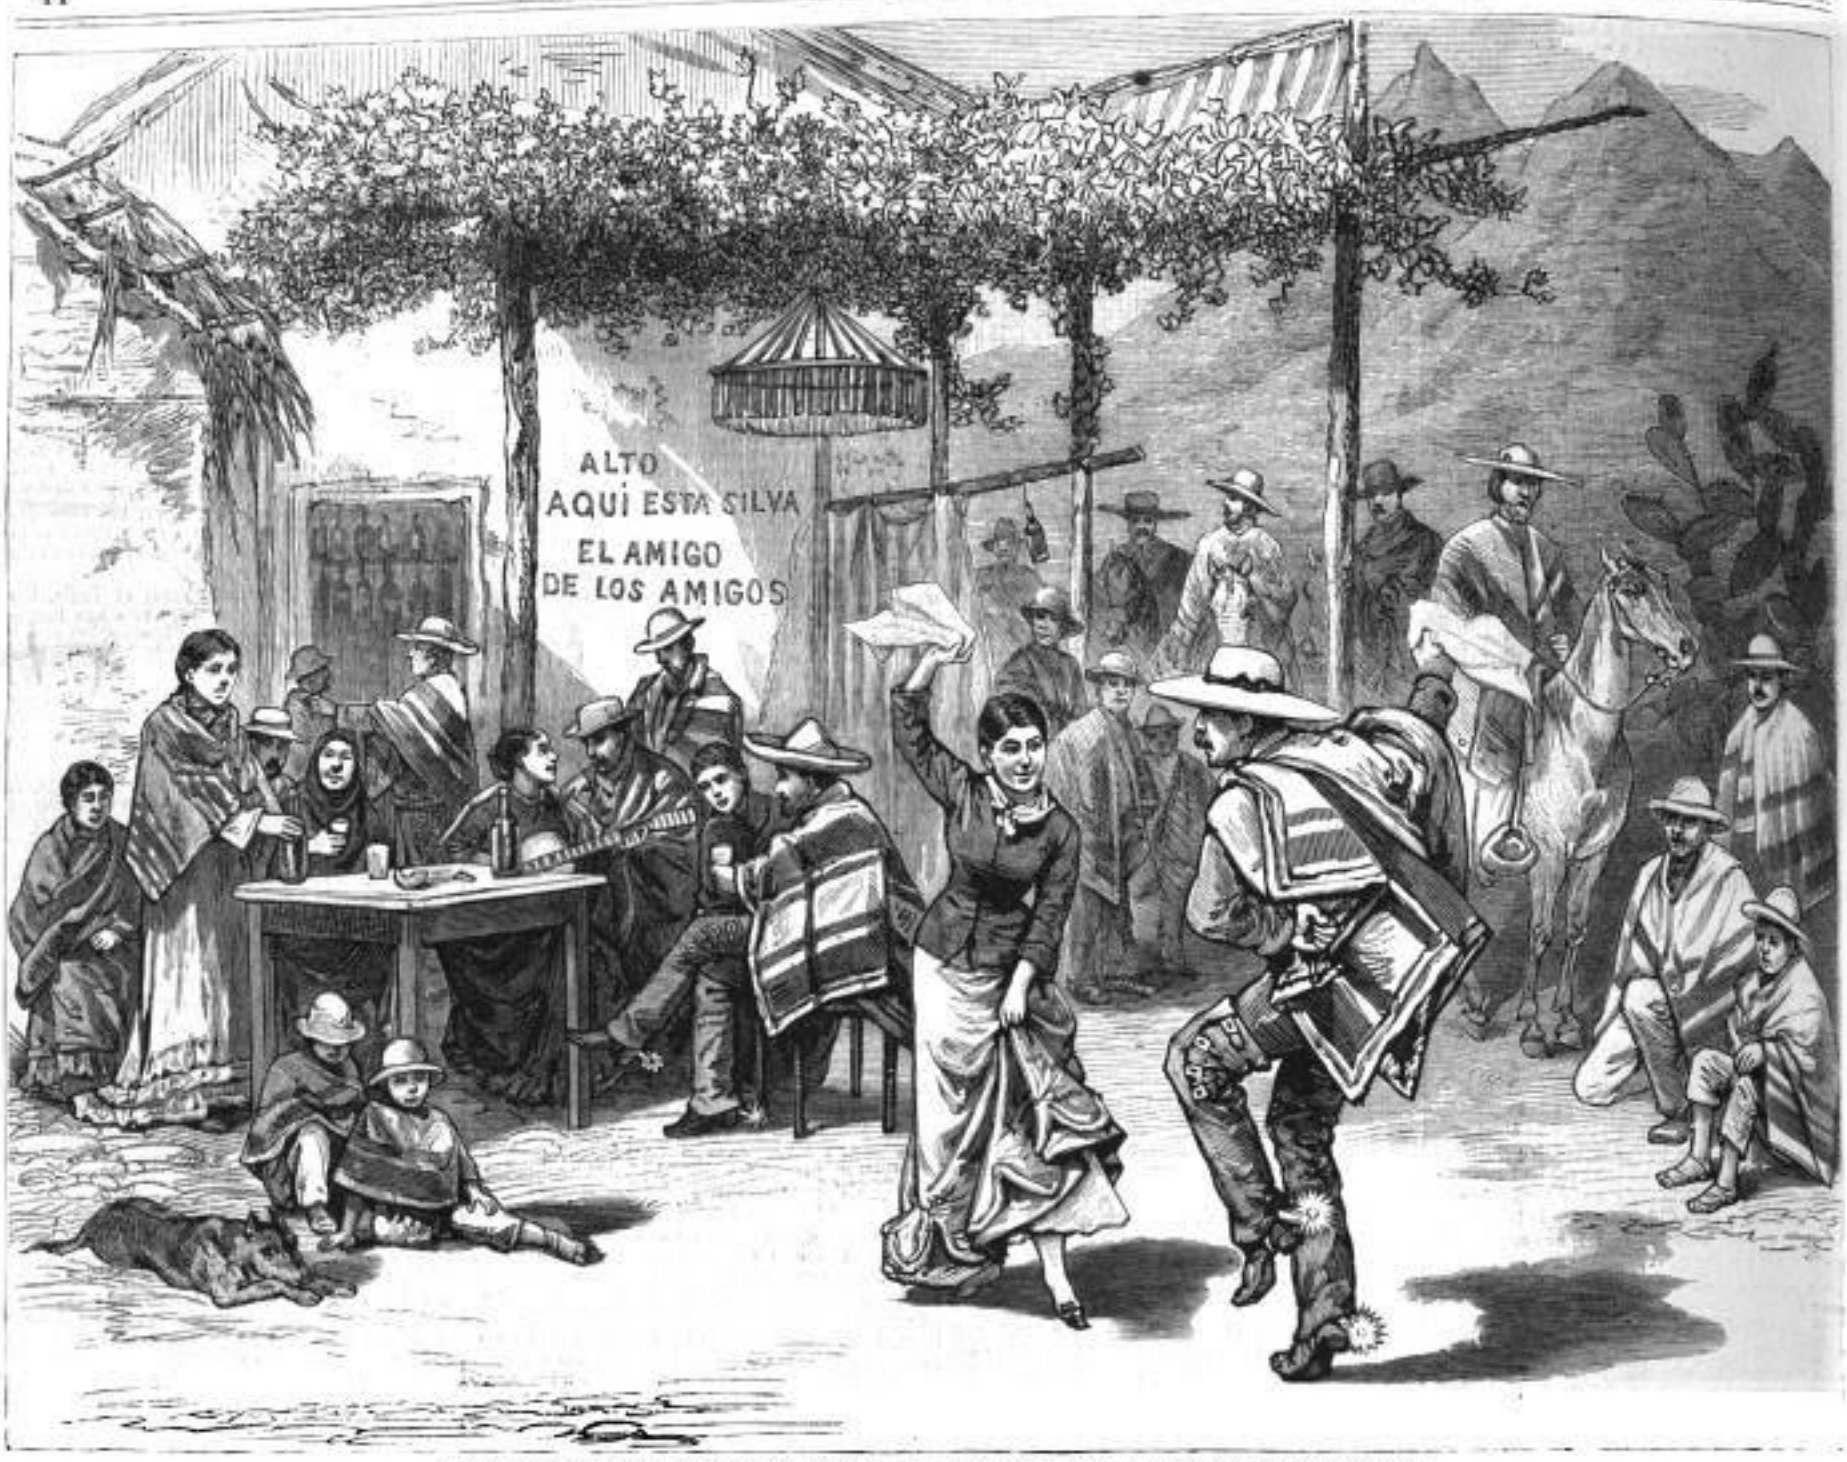
THE Emperor of Germany has returned to Babelsberg, his Summer residence, near Potsdam, very much the better for his visit to Ems and Gastein. The Empress, who has been making a tour on the Italian lakes, has returned to the electoral palace at Coblenz. The increasing delicacy of her health has caused much anxiety to her family.

THE Queen of the Belgians is a fine whip, and wherever she goes her phaeton and four beautiful ponies go with her. Driving with her daughter Stephanie lately at Bruges, she was stopped in Breydel Street by a policeman, as there is not room for two vehicles to pass, and traffic is permitted only in one direction. The Queen smilingly suggested that no vehicle was in sight, so might she go? But the man was inexorable, and the Queen put back.

AN invitation has been extended to the Right Rev. A. N. Littlejohn, D.D., Bishop of Long Island, by the Syndicate of Cambridge University, England, to deliver a series of sermons in the university pulpit. This is the first time, we believe, that an American divine has been invited to fill a place heretofore assigned to one or another of the distinguished theologians of the Church of England. The bishop will sail, it is understood, during the latter part of October, and deliver the course of sermons on the Sundays of November.

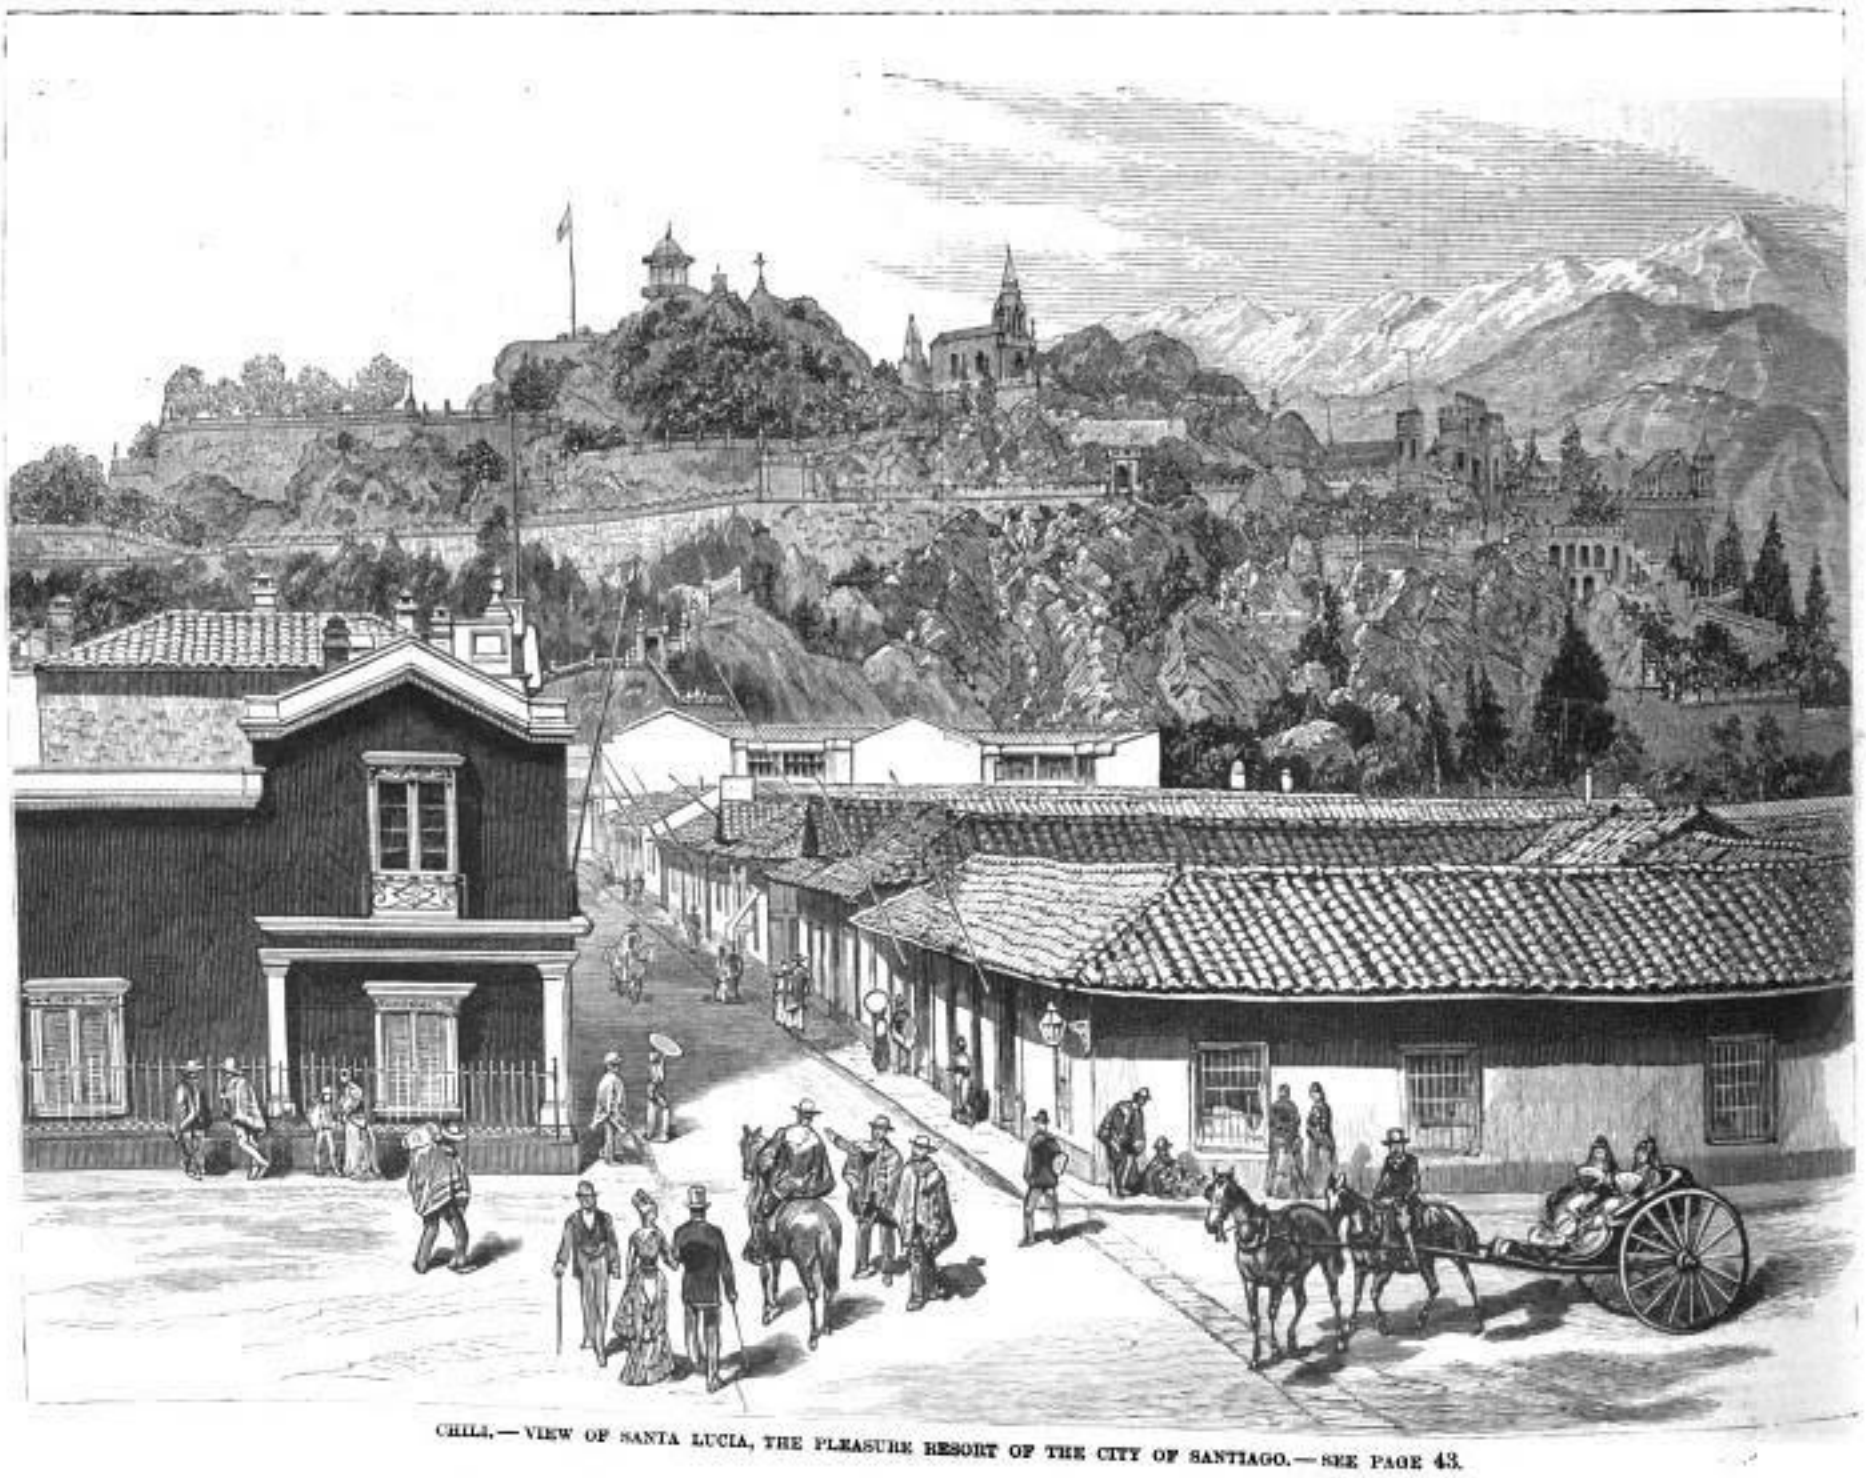
DR. CHARLES T. JACKSON died at Somerville, Mass., August 29th, after an illness that had lasted seven years. In his early life he was engaged in geological surveys over a considerable part of the Northern States. His long controversy with Professor Morse relating to the electric telegraph excited much interest in the early history of telegraphy. The use of anesthesia to destroy pain be regarded as the great discovery of his life, but the claim was disputed, which was a bitter disappointment to him. He was seventy-four years of age.

THE Rt. Rev. P. A. Feehan, now Bishop of Nashville, is promoted to be the first Archbishop of Chicago, Chicago having been raised to the dignity of a Metropolitan See, with Alton and Peoria as its Suffragan Sees. The Rt. Rev. Dr. Duggan, formerly Bishop of Chicago, being in infirm health, is retired on a pension of $3,000 a year. Kansas City, hitherto in the Archdiocese of St. Louis, is made an Episcopal See, and the Rt. Rev. Dr. Hogan, now Bishop of St. Joseph, is named its first Bishop, and remains administrator of the Diocese of St. Joseph.



PAUL O. HEBERT, ex-Governor of Louisiana, died in New Orleans on August 29th, in the sixty-second year of his age. He was a graduate of West Point, and colonel in the Twelfth United States Infantry in the Mexican war. He resigned from the army, became a planter, and afterwards State Engineer of Louisiana. In 1852 he was elected Governor of the State, serving, and during the war was a Confederate brigadier-general. For ninety hours previous to his death he had been unconscious, during part of which time he had been traveling from Allegheny Springs, Alabama, in accordance with his desire to die at home. A year ago he was stricken with paralysis, which was followed by cancer of the tongue.

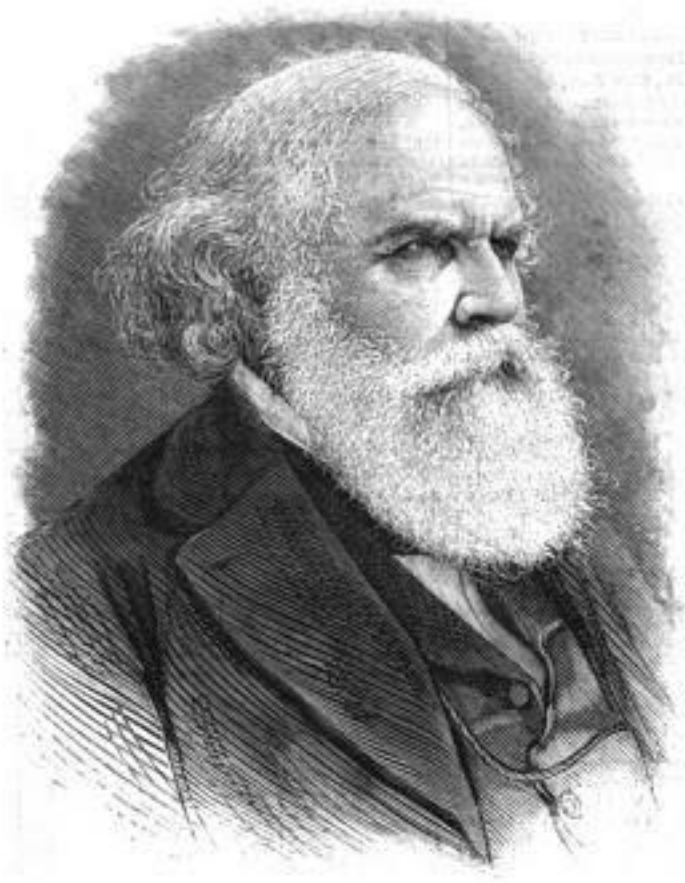
A FRIEND of the Princess Constantine declares that her sister, Mlle. Blanc, will not marry Roland Bonaparte. The co-heiress of the late Monaco "boss" is not satisfied with the prospects of imperialism in France, and shrinks from being incumbered with the poverty-stricken family of her princely suitor, which, according to the civic code, she would be. They would force her to support them according to her wealth. She would be under the obligation to provide for the brave but very beautiful Prince Pierre, his wife, who is an artist's daughter, and her parents. The probability of a set off in the form of imperial honors is very remote. Mlle. Blanc turns her eyes towards Rome, and would be well satisfied to become Duchess de Brachi.



MR. MAURICE GRAU'S new French Opera Company reached here last week. The troupe consists of about fifty regular performers, besides eighteen members of the chorus. The most prominent artists in the troupe are Mlle. Paola Marié, an old favorite of the New York theatre-going public; Mlle. Marié Albert, formerly engaged at the Théâtre des Bouffes Parisiennes, the Théâtre des Variétés and the Folies Dramatiques; Mlle. Pauline Marié, from the Grand Theatres of Nantes and Bordeaux, and Mlle. Josephine Schaeffer; M. Joseph Mogras, a tenor, formerly engaged at the Opéra Comique; M. Taufflenberger, a tenor from the Théâtre de la Renaissance; M. Nigri, from the same theatre, and M. Bernard, baritone, of the Opera Comique, in Paris.

IN addition to the many duties falling upon the Crown-Prince of Germany as heir-apparent, he has now imposed upon himself the task of finding the remains of certain of his ancestors. It was thought that the vaults of the dome and of the old castle at Berlin, with those at Potsdam and Hohenzollern, and one or two other known places, contained all that was left of the German Emperor's forefathers; but recently, when a thorough examination was made, it became apparent that of two Hohenzollerns who ruled in the Middle Ages, not a bone could be shown. The Prince declared, with the knightly look for which his physiognomy is remarkable, that "he would see that the bones of his ancestors found fitting sanctuary." Much digging is now going on about the Schloss, at Berlin, where, it is presumed, the ancestors searched for were buried.

Digitized by Google



CHILI.—THE CUECA, OR NATIONAL DANCE—A SCENE IN A ROADSIDE INN NEAR VALPARAISO.

CHILI.—VIEW OF SANTA LUCIA, THE PLEASURE RESORT OF THE CITY OF SANTIAGO.—SEE PAGE 43.

Digitized by Google

JOHN L. SIBLEY, A. M., LIBRARIAN EMERITUS OF HARVARD COLLEGE. FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY G. W. PACH.

JOHN L. SIBLEY.

MORE than two generations of Harvard students are familiar with the face of John Langdon Sibley, the librarian emeritus. Mr. Sibley was born December 23th, 1804, at Union, Me. He entered Phillips Exeter Academy in the Summer of 1819, and was soon placed on the charity foundation. In 1821 he matriculated at Harvard College, and was appointed "president's freshman" under President Kirkland. His connection with the library began while he was an undergraduate; his vacations being spent in writing for the library, and otherwise assisting the librarian. Graduating in 1825, he entered the divinity school, and began his official connection with the library as assistant librarian, on a salary of $150, the librarian then receiving but $300.

In May, 1829, Mr. Sibley was formally ordained as pastor of the First Church in Stow, where he remained until 1833, when his love for the college induced him to return to Cambridge. During the next eight years he devoted himself principally to literary work, for a part of the time being editor and proprietor of the American Magazine of Useful and Entertaining Knowledge.

In 1841 the library was removed to Gore Hall, and Mr. Sibley was again appointed assistant librarian. The librarian at that time was Dr. Thaddeus Wm. Harris, the well known American entomologist. At his death, in 1856, Mr. Sibley was appointed librarian, which position he held until he became librarian emeritus, in 1877, his retirement from active work in the library being caused by his advanced age and temporary loss of sight. During his administration, and largely as the result of his personal efforts, the library grew from 41,000 volumes to 164,000, besides almost as many pamphlets, and the permanent fund increased from $5,000 to $170,000.

Mr. Sibley lived a celibate life in Divinity Hall from 1826, the date of its first occupancy, to 1866, with the exception of six years and a half. There he prepared his "History of Union, Me.," and his "Index to John Adams's Work." Twenty years were spent in Room No. 15. In 1866 he was married to Charlotte Augusta Langdon Cook, Rev. Dr. A. P. Peabody officiating. For the last thirty-two years he has acted as chorister in the 78th Psalm at the commencement dinner; succeeding in 1849, Rev. Dr. John Pierce (1793), of Brookline, who had performed the same part during the preceding fifty years. In 1856 Mr. Sibley received the honorary degree of A. M. from Bowdoin College, and since 1846 he has been an active member of the Massachusetts Historical Society.

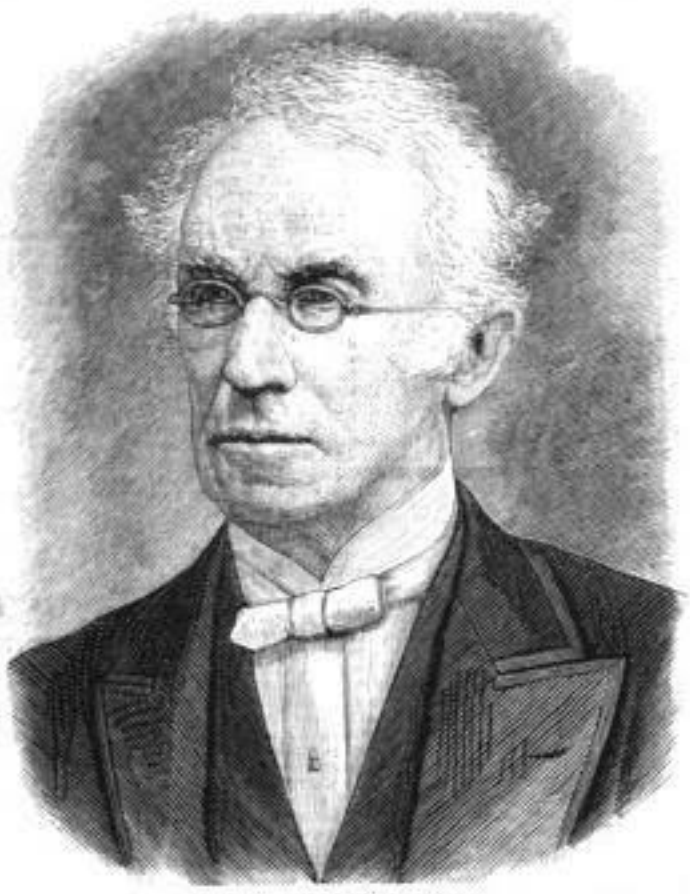
Mr. Sibley's published works are:

"Index to the Writings of George Washington." 1837.

"A History of the Town of Union, in the County of Lincoln, Me., to the Middle of the Nineteenth Century; with a Family Register of the Settlers before the year 1800, and of their Descendants." 1851.

"Index to the Works of John Adams." Boston, 1853.

"Fort Pownall and Brigadier Waldo." New England Historical and Genealogical Register, April, 1859.

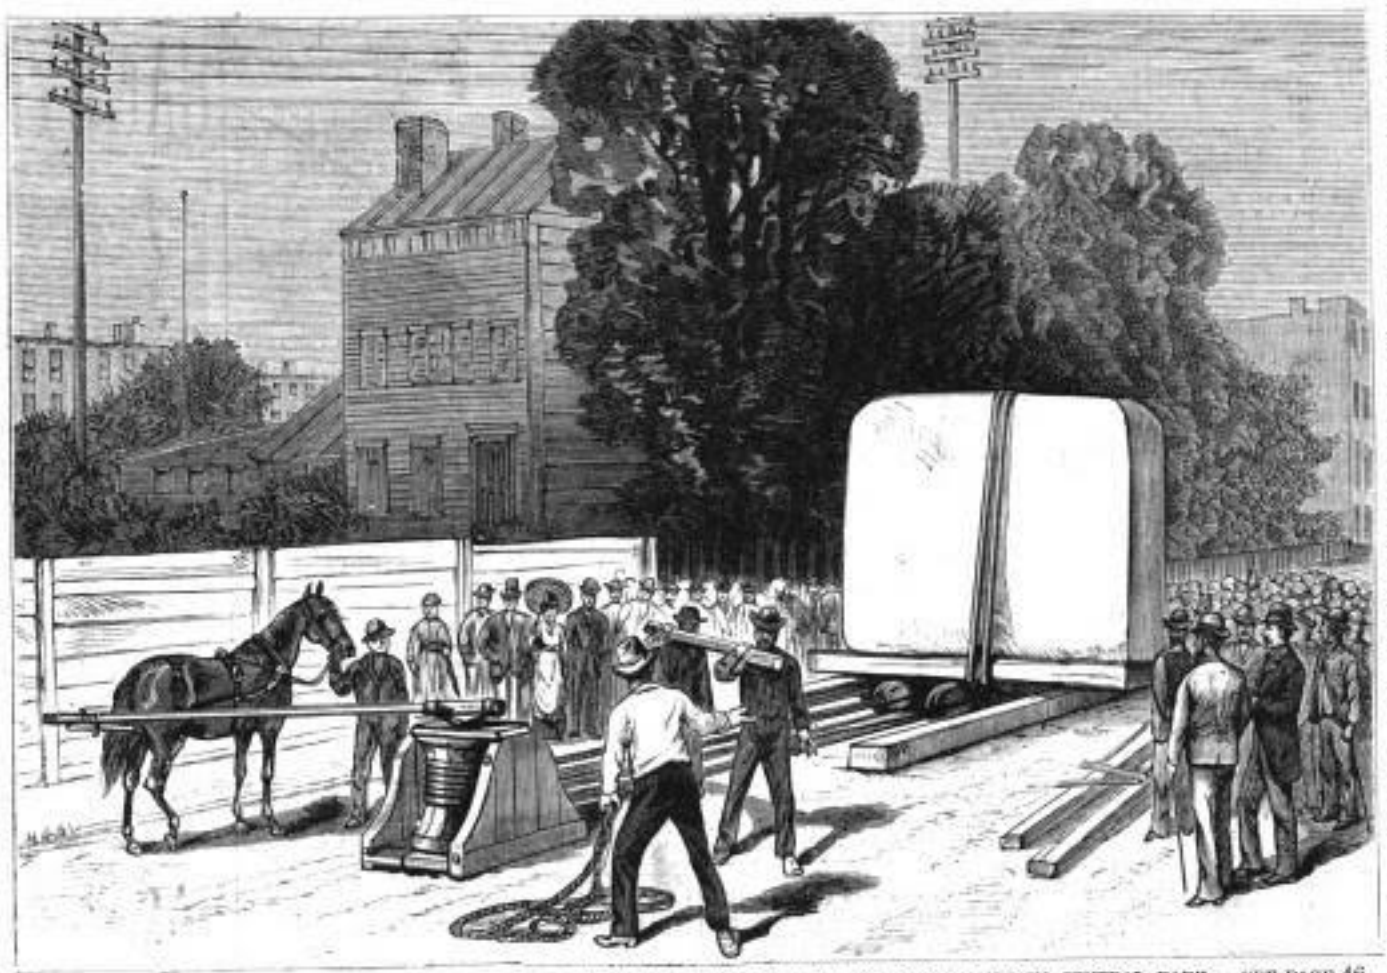


"Notices of Account Books of Treasurers of Harvard College from 1669 to 1782." Printed in the "Proceedings of the Massachusetts Historical Society," November, 1862.

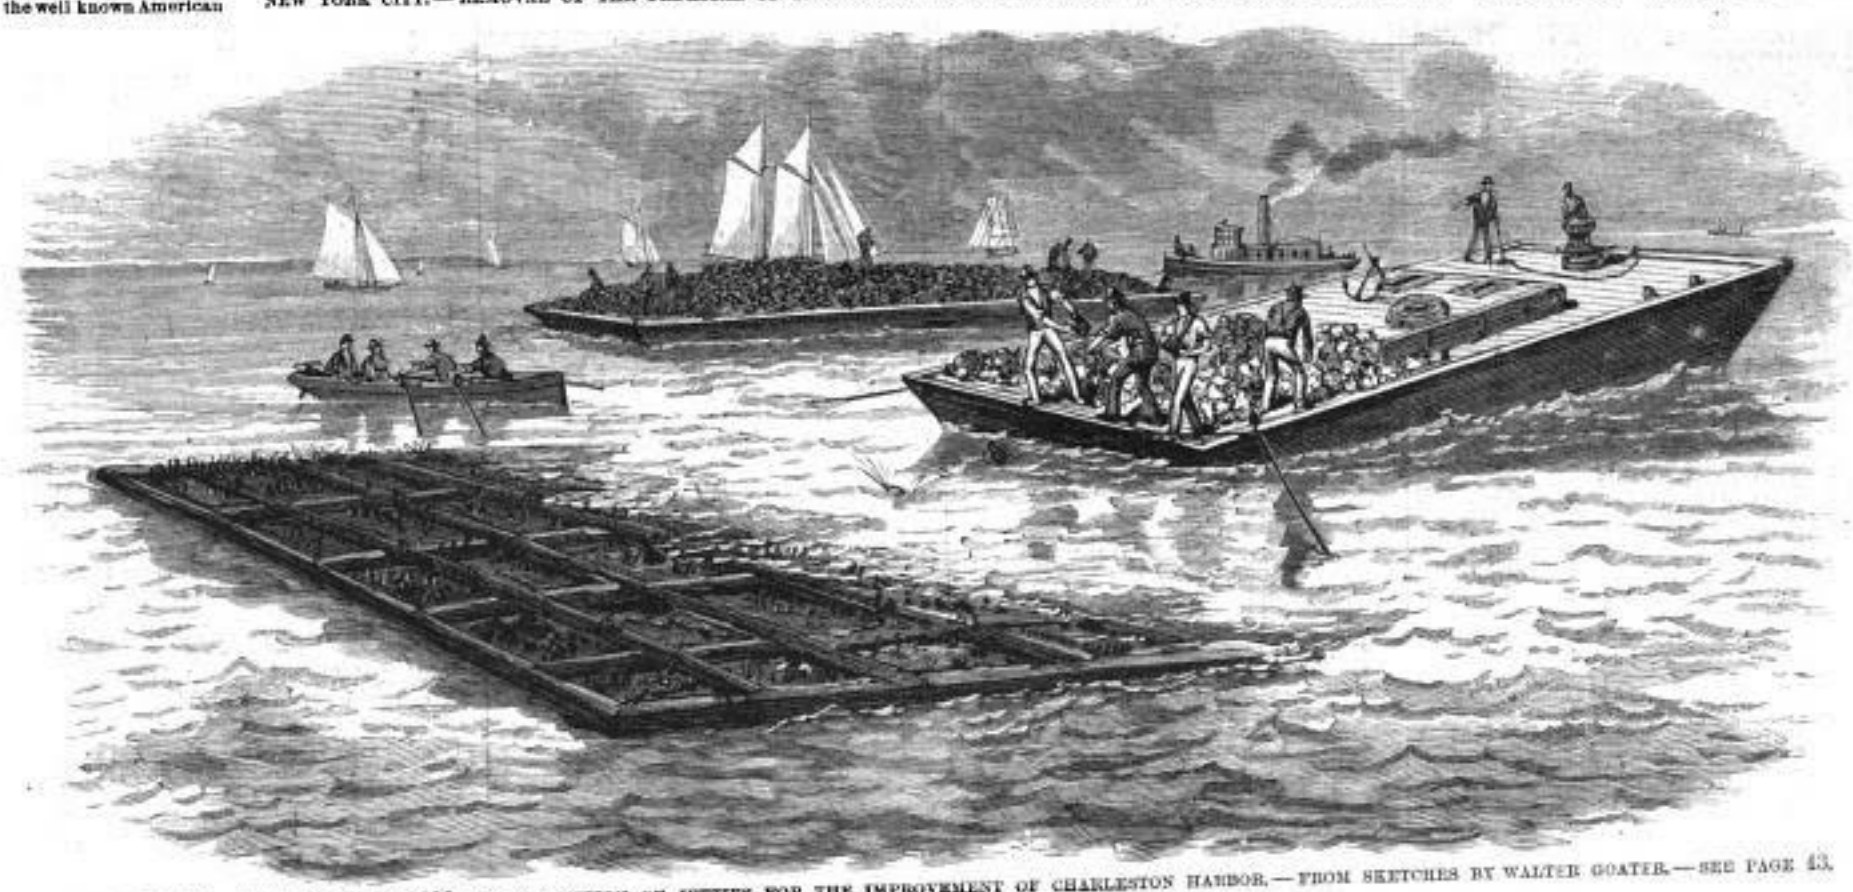
"Notices of the Triennial and Annual Catalogues of Harvard University; with a Reprint of the Catalogues of 1674, 1682 and 1700." 8vo. Boston, 1864.

"Biographical Sketch of Cyrus Eaton," a remarkable self-made man. Printed in "Proceedings of the Massachusetts Historical Society for Feb., 1875."

He also edited the American reprint of George Chalmers's "Introduction to the History of the Colonies," giving, from the State papers, a comprehensive view of their revolt. Two volumes, 8vo., Boston, 1845. The London edition of this work, 1782, was suppressed at the first volume, and the American edition was printed from the author's manuscript. The most important as well as the most laborious of Mr. Sibley's publications is his "Biographical Sketches of Graduates of Harvard University," the first and only work of the kind published in America: "the fruit of an incredible amount of patient and judicious labor, and, while of special value as a record of the college, it is second in importance to no contribution to the early history of New England." The first volume, a royal octavo, was issued in 1873; and Mr. Sibley, now in his seventy-sixth year, with his mental faculties and physical constitution fully competent to the ask, is laboriously at work on the second volume, which, uniform with the first, will probably be issued during the present year.



That he appreciates the assistance shown him in acquiring the foundation of his education sufficiently appears from the fact that he began in 1860, and has since continued, a series of gifts to Phillips Exeter Academy, which now amounts to $30,000, and the income from which is ultimately to be employed in the assistance of needy and meritorious students.



THE LATE REV. WILLIAM ADAMS, D.D., LL.D., PRESIDENT OF UNION THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.—FROM A PHOTO. BY BOGARDUS.

THE LATE DR. WM. ADAMS.

THE Rev. William Adams, D.D., LL.D., who died at Orange, N. J., on the morning of August 31st, was one of the best-known Presbyterian clergymen, not only in this country, but in the world. An unusually successful ministry, extending over forty years, endeared him to thousands in this city, who will mourn his loss with as

NEW YORK CITY.—REMOVAL OF THE PEDESTAL OF THE OBELISK FROM THE WHARF TO THE SITE IN CENTRAL PARK.—SEE PAGE 46.

SOUTH CAROLINA.—THE SOUTH IN 1880.—CONSTRUCTION OF JETTIES FOR THE IMPROVEMENT OF CHARLESTON HARBOR.—FROM SKETCHES BY WALTER GOATER.—SEE PAGE 43.

Digitized by Google

sincere regret as his more intimate friends and relatives.

In the death of Dr. Adams the Union Theological Seminary of this city loses one of the most accomplished and earnest of its Presidents, and the Christian world loses a teacher whom it will be difficult to replace.

Dr. Adams was in his seventy-fourth year, and forty-nine of these years were passed in the service of the Church. He was born in Colchester, Conn., January 25th, 1807. His father, John Adams, LL.D., who died in 1863, at the ripe age of ninety-one, was the Principal of the Academy in Colchester when young William was born. While the future clergyman was still an infant, however, his father removed to Andover, Mass., and took charge of the Academy there.

Young Adams first passed through the Andover Academy, when, having finished his course at the Academy, he was sent to Yale, and then, having determined to embrace the ministry as his profession, he went to the Andover Theological Seminary, where he studied under the Rev. Drs. Stuart, Woods and Porter. He graduated from this institution in 1830, at the age of twenty-three, and in February of the following year he was ordained a Presbyterian minister, and settled over the First Presbyterian Church of Brighton, Mass.

Resigning this charge to visit the South on account of the ill-health of himself and his wife, he was induced to fill the pulpit of the old Pearl Street Presbyterian Church, in New York, for a short time, until arrangements could be made for supplying it permanently, and before this engagement terminated the simple eloquence of the preacher had so impressed those who listened to him that he was called to the pastorate of the Broome Street Presbyterian Church.

For nineteen years Dr. Adams labored zealously in the old Broome Street Church, and the result of his zeal was that the Central Presbyterian Church, as it was known in the Presbytery, prospered and increased to a wonderful degree. During the nineteen years of his Broome Street pastorate he was continually writing for the religious press of this city, and the initials "W. A." soon came to be recognized by the reading public in such a manner that any article to which they were appended was sure to be read and considered. It was decided to abandon the old church and build a new edifice. Madison Avenue and Twenty-fourth Street was selected as the site, and what is now known as the Madison Square Presbyterian Church was opened by Dr. Adams in November, 1854.

Over this magnificent church Dr. Adams presided for twenty years, and the work which he accomplished here was herculean. His fame grew from year to year, and calls to other pulpits flowed in upon him steadily, but he declined them all. In 1871 the Union Theological Seminary of this city elected him Professor of Sacred Rhetoric and Pastoral Theology in the institution, but he declined to accept the chair. In 1873 Dr. Adams, then sixty-seven years of age, was induced to accept a position in the Faculty. He was elected President of the Seminary and assigned to the Chair of Sacred Rhetoric. On October 30, 1873, before resigning his pastorate of the Madison Square Church, Dr. Adams welcomed the members of the Evangelical Alliance to this city. On Sunday, April 19th, 1874, Dr. Adams preached his farewell sermon to the congregation of the Madison Square Presbyterian Church. He had presided over the society then for a term of forty years, and his sermon was devoted to a retrospect of the events of those years. He announced in this sermon that the church had a membership of 3,000 persons. On May 4th, 1874, the Presbytery of New York passed a resolution of regret at his leaving the pulpit, and a week later, May 11th, he was installed as President of the Union Theological Seminary, which position he held to the day of his death.

THE OBELISK PEDESTAL.

IN our last issue we gave a view of the steamer Dessoug on the dry dock at Clifton, Staten Island, and described the method to be adopted for removing the obelisk from the hold of the ship. This week the huge pedestal is shown on the trucks constructed to carry it to the site in Central Park. It lay for several days last week on Fifty-First Street, between Broadway and Seventh Avenue, and was almost constantly surrounded by an eager crowd, searching for the Masonic emblems.

The Cunard Steamship Company.

MR. SAMUEL CUNARD was one of the first to foresee the great results that might be achieved by the establishment of steamer communication between the United States and England; and as far back as the year 1830, in his quiet home in Nova Scotia, his mind was busily engaged in thinking over the best means of carrying out this project. In 1838 Mr. Cunard went to England, eagerly bent upon putting his idea into actual operation, and, introduced by Sir James Melvill, of the India House, he presented himself to Mr. Robert Napier, of Glasgow, the eminent marine engineer, and the result of their deliberations was that Mr. Cunard gave Mr. Napier an order to make four steamships for the Atlantic service. The four vessels were to be of 600 tons each and 300-horse power. Mr. Napier advised the building of larger vessels, and ultimately it was arranged that the four vessels should each be of 1,200 tons burden and 440-horse power. The project now assumed a proportion which was beyond the resources of a single private individual, and Mr. Cunard and Mr. Napier, taking counsel together, hit upon the idea of forming a company. Messrs. Burns, of Glasgow, and Messrs. McIver, of Liverpool, after having run coasting steamers in keen rivalry for several years, had in 1839 amalgamated their undertakings: and this firm of Burns & McIver was, at the time that Mr. Samuel Cunard went to England, one of the most prosperous shipping companies in England. The proposal to form an Atlantic steamship company was mooted to Messrs. Burns & McIver by Mr. Napier, and the outcome of this was the establishment in 1839 of the British and North American Royal Mail Steam Packet Company. About this time the British Government decided, on grounds of public convenience, as well as with the view of promoting the extension of steam navigation, to abandon the curious old brigs which had been used for so many years for the conveyance of the mails across the Atlantic, and to substitute steam mail boats. The Admiralty, accordingly, advertised for tenders for the execution of that service, and the Great Western Steam Shipping Company and the newly-formed company of Messrs Cunard, Burns & McIver were the principal competitors. The tender of the latter firm was accepted, and a seven years' contract was at once entered into between the Lords of the Admiralty on the one part and Samuel Cunard, George Burns and David McIver on the other part, for the conveyance of mails between Liverpool and Halifax, Boston and Quebec, in consideration of the annual sum of $300,000. One of the conditions of the bargain was that the ships engaged in this service should be of sufficient strength and capacity to be used as troop-ships in case of necessity. The first four ships built under Mr. Napier's direction for the Cunard Company were the Britannia, the Acadia, the Caledonia and the Columbia. It was on the 4th of July, 1840, that the Britannia set out from Liverpool to make for the new company the first trip across the Atlantic. Liverpool was in a condition of great excitement on the day of the vessel's departure; thousands of people crowded the quays to watch her out, and it was felt that a new era of oceanic intercourse had been begun by this memorable event. The ship's destination was Boston, New York not being made the port of communication for the Cunard steamers until 1848. Mr. Cunard sailed in the Britannia on its initial voyage, and had the satisfaction of witnessing the vessel's safe arrival at Boston, after having called at Halifax, within 14 days and 8 hours of leaving Liverpool.

FRANK LESLIE'S SUNDAY MAGAZINE

For October contains as its leading article an important and timely contribution from the facile pen of Mr. Alfred H. Guernsey, entitled "The Christians in the Turkish Empire," tracing the history and present condition of the various branches of the Christian Church in the Sultan's dominions. It is profusely illustrated. A biographical sketch, with portrait, of Mrs. Felicia Hemans, affords pleasant reading; and a pretty little poem, "The Bathing Magpie," is accompanied by two beautiful full-page illustrations from the pencil of the celebrated artist, Giacomelli. The story "Circumstance," by Albert Wallwyn, is especially good, and will attract those who read it. Herbert Lee's sketch of "Pontius Pilate" takes a new view of the character of that historic personage. Mr. Godfrey A. Hudson has an extremely interesting paper on a legendary journey in Peru, entitled "From Titicaca to Cuzco," giving an account of the origin of the Incas and their empire, which is well worth reading. It is accompanied by characteristic illustrations. "Gideon" is the subject of the Old Testament portrait and sketch. "Catherine of Siena" is a very valuable contribution to literature, and timely, affording an insight into the inner life of the Church in the Middle Ages. The two serials, "Hester Morgan's Husband" and "Maid Marjory," are continued, and increase in interest. The Magazine is crowded with good things, and there's not a dull page in it from cover to cover. Issued Friday, September 10th.

OBITUARY.

JOHN H. CRAWFORD.

THE declaration of Holy Writ, "In the midst of life we are in death," was never, perhaps, more strikingly exemplified than in the sad and sudden demise of Mr. John H. Crawford, late chief bookkeeper in the house of James McCreery & Co., New York City. He was absent on his vacation tour and making an excursion on board a steamboat on Lake Ontario; he went up to the quarter-deck with a friend for a promenade, and in a few minutes the friend returned below; he took a seat on the taffrail, fearlessly balancing himself, thoughtless of danger; the boat lurched, and he was thrown over backwards into the water. A vigorous struggle with the waves, the arrest of the boat in her course and ineffectual efforts for his rescue, and the hungry waters of the lake closed over him, and he was lost to human sight—doubtless for all time!

Mr. Crawford was born near London, England; he came to America about nine years ago, and was twenty-seven years of age at the time of his death. He had received a fair general education and thorough training for the business in which he engaged. He had begun a career of active and cheerful industry, and gave promise of much usefulness; and in his exactitude and honesty of purpose in his chosen calling, he furnished an example to all with whom he was associated. He was modest in self-appreciation, but confident in his convictions of right and of duty. A companion says of him: "Instinct with all that makes life beautiful, with the brightest hopes and noblest aspirations of manhood, possessed of exalted sentiments, warm affection and tender sympathies, in the Spring-time of life he was called from us, but a host of hallowed recollections clusters around his memory. Who now can heal the anguish of his mother's heart? Who can picture the sorrow of those to whom he was near and dear? Who can comfort those of his associates that, in daily and intimate intercourse with him, were cheered by his friendship or gladdened by his love?" He left behind him a reputation free from blemish or suspicion, and the heartfelt distress in his death experienced by his employers testifies to his integrity. While a shadow mantles the brow of one and another in the house, it is said: "John Crawford was never heard to speak ill of any one," and so

"None names him but to praise."

FUN.

IN France, Mr. Aldrich's story, "The Stillwater Tragedy," is called "La Tragedie de la Pacifique."

TIMES have greatly changed. In early days it was the Christians who bore many stripes, but now it is the Penitentiary birds.

A PAIR were married at Newport, R. I., recently, after an unbroken courtship of thirty-five years. That is what may be called a slow match.

"Is the train behind time?" inquired a gentleman at the station. "No, surr," replied the porter; "it's not behoind toime, surr; but it's jist behoind the bridge beyant there."

THE Prince of Wales's two sons are somewhat lively. While on a sea voyage recently, the younger was heard to exclaim. "Come, hub, tune up your fiddle and give us 'God save your old grandmother.'"

BELIEVERS in metempsychosis have had their faith refreshed by the recent birth of a child, who upon coming into the world, made a searching scrutiny of his surroundings, and, sinking back in his nurse's arms, remarked: "Thank heaven, at last I have got myself born into a family that is comfortably fixed!"

AN Englishman related yesterday that, being at Naples, while taking tea with his wife a thunderbolt entered the chamber and the poor woman was reduced to dust. "Ah, mon Dieu!" cried one of his auditors. "What did you do—what did you say?" The Englishman, coldly, "I rang and told John to sweep up his mistress."

ELDER SISTER (tired): "Do let's turn back, we are so far from home; the thunderstorms are so frequent, too; and you know how frightened I am of lightning." Younger Both (not tired; wants to go further): "Come on, it's fine enough now; you needn't be frightened of lightning, it won't touch you. You're not particularly attractive."

A YOUNG couple in their honeymoon are dallying languidly with the grapes at dessert. She (archly): "And you don't find it tiresome, dear, all alone with me? You are quite, quite sure that you don't wish to go back to your bachelor life again?" He (earnestly): "Quite, my darling; indeed married life is so awfully jolly that, you know, if you were to die to-night, I'd get married again to-morrow."

"MADE NEW AGAIN."

ST. CATHARINES, Ont.

R. V. PIERCE, M.D.:

I have used your Favorite Prescription, Golden Medical Discovery and Pleasant Purgative Pellets for the last three months, and find myself—what shall I say? "Made new again" are the only words that express it. I was reduced to a skeleton, could not walk across the floor without fainting, could keep nothing in the shape of food on my stomach. Myself and friends had given up all hope: my immediate death seemed certain. I can never be too thankful to those who recommended your medicines, for I now live (to the surprise of everybody) and am able to do my own work. I desire to make this statement in order that those suffering may not despair until they have given your remedies a trial. Yours resp'y, MRS. WM. D. BYCKMAN.

FISK & HATCH

Bankers,

AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT BONDS,

And other desirable Investment Securities,

No. 5 Nassau St., New York,

Buy and sell all issues of Government Bonds, in large or small amounts, at current market prices, and will be pleased to furnish information in reference to all matters connected with investments in Government Bonds.

We are prepared to give information in regard to first-class Railway Securities, and to execute orders for the same.

Buy and sell all marketable Stocks and Bonds on commission, at the Stock Exchange and in the open market.

Receive accounts of Banks, Bankers, Merchants and others, and allow interest on daily balances; and for those keeping accounts with us we collect United States coupons and registered interest, and other coupons, dividends, etc., and credit without charge.

☞ We give special attention to orders from Banks, Bankers, Institutions and Investors out of the city, by Mail or Telegraph, to buy or sell Government Bonds, State and Railroad Bonds, Bank Stocks, Railroad Stocks, and other securities.

We have issued the Seventh Edition of "Memoranda Concerning Government Bonds," copies of which can be had on application.

FISK & HATCH.

DR. BROWNING'S TONIC AND ALTERATIVE is the popular Blood Purifier, Tonic, etc., because it is made by a Regular Graduate of Medicine, is the result of scientific research, is accurately and elegantly compounded, wonderfully efficacious, is taken in very small doses, and is pure, clean, and pleasant to the taste. Price 50 cents and $1. For sale by the Proprietor, W. Champion Browning, M.D., 1117 Arch Street, Philadelphia, and all Druggists.

BURNETT'S COCOLINE received the highest award at the Centennial Exhibition. It is filled in elegant bottles—glass and cork stoppered, and basket-covered—and is for sale by all first-class Grocers and Druggists.

THACKERAY, during his memorable visit to America, expressed the most unbounded liking for our hotels, though himself the most conservative of Britons. We can scarcely wonder at this when measuring by the standard of the ST. NICHOLAS HOTEL, of New York. This great establishment is even better than in Thackeray's day, for it has kept in the van of every modern improvement. Its table, apartments, conveniences, etc., are unsurpassed.

ANGOSTURA BITTERS do not only distinguish themselves by their flavor and aromatic odor above all others generally used, but they are also a sure preventive for all diseases originating from the digestive organs. Beware of counterfeits. Ask your grocer or druggist for the genuine article, manufactured by Dr. J. G. B. Siegert & Sons.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE, in the restoration of weakened energy and impaired vitality, is wonderfully successful.

THE VALUE of Accident Insurance is best known when you are drawing indemnity from THE TRAVELERS.

TO GIVE life, growth and beauty to your hair, use MRS. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER. Every Druggist sells it.

Stuttering cured by BATES'S APPLIANCES. Send for description to SMITH & Co., Box 2236, New York.

EPPS'S COCOA.

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast-tables with a delicately flavored beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.

Sold only in soldered tins, ¼ and lb., labeled:

JAMES EPPS & CO., Homœopathic Chemists, LONDON, ENG.

H.W. JOHNS' ASBESTOS

LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING, BOILER COVERINGS

Steam Packing. Sheathings. Fireproof Coatings. Cements

Send for Samples, Illustrated Pamphlet and Price List.

H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO., 87 Maiden Lane, N.Y.

Bouquetiere.

The Bouquetiere is the Acme of Perfection for securing the Bouquet to Coat, Dress, Belt or Hair. Simple and durable, it can be worn. Mailed free on receipt of price, 25 cents each. Per dozen, $2.

GEORGE D. COOPER (Sole Agent), No. 27 Union Square, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Pleasant Hours.

A MONTHLY PICTORIAL JOURNAL of LIGHT, PLEASING LITERATURE,

INTERESTING AND BEAUTIFULLY ILLUSTRATED STORIES, COMPLETE IN EACH NUMBER,

PLEASING TALES, ADVENTURES, ANECDOTE, AND MIRTH-PROVOKING ILLUSTRATIONS.

For sale by all newsdealers, price 10 cents. Annual subscription, $1.50, postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,

53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Newspaper Advertising Bureau.

BY ADDRESSING GEO. P. ROWELL & CO., 10 Spruce St., New York, the exact cost of any proposed line of advertising can be learned. 100-page pamphlet, 10c.

Carpets,

NEW FALL STYLES.

WE ARE NOW OPENING LARGE LINES OF NEW DESIGNS AND STYLES IN CARPETINGS RECEIVED FROM

OUR OWN FACTORIES,

WHICH WILL BE FOUND TO COMBINE TO AN UNUSUAL EXTENT

Elegance in Style and Finish,

Durability in Wear,

and Economy in Prices.

WE ALSO OFFER AN EXTENSIVE ASSORTMENT OF TURKISH, PERSIAN AND EAST INDIAN CARPETS AND RUGS, AND OTHER POPULAR FLOOR COVERINGS, AT EXTREMELY MODERATE RATES.

J. & J. DOBSON,

40 & 42 WEST 14TH STREET, N. Y.,

Near 6th Ave. Elevated R. R. Station.

JOHN VAN GAASBEEK, Manager.

CANDY Send one, two, three or five dollars for a retail sample box, etc., by express, of the best Candies in America, put up elegantly, and strictly pure. Refers to all Chicago.

C. F. GUNTHER, CONFECTIONER, 78 Madison St., Chicago.

ROYAL HAVANA LOTTERY

DRAWINGS EVERY 15 DAYS

FULL INFORMATION &c. FURNISHED BY

J. DUFF & CO. BANKERS

42 NASSAU STREET,

COR. LIBERTY NEW YORK.

Information furnished in KENTUCKY, LOUISIANA and COMMONWEALTH LOTTERIES.

[From Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, March 20th, 1880.]

THE PHILADELPHIA PREMIUM BOOK CO., No. 410 Chestnut St., Phila'a, Pa., is advertising new and standard Books at the lowest retail prices, presenting a gift with each. Its managers are some of the best business gentlemen of Philadelphia, and its list of premiums embraces many handsome and costly articles. The enterprise has thus far met with great success by reason of the prompt and generous manner in which it has fulfilled its promises.

Send for their Catalogue of Choice Reading for 1880.

$1.75 Watches, $1.25 Revolvers, New Novelties. Bankrupt Stocks. Fehon & Co., Agents, N.Y.

Frank Leslie's

LADY'S JOURNAL,

THE

Acknowledged Fashion Periodical of the Country.

"FRANK LESLIE'S LADY'S JOURNAL," says the Philadelphia Ledger, "is, without doubt, the most attractive fashion journal published. It is the acknowledged authority in European and American fashions, the fashion plates being imported monthly. It gives the latest styles of Parisian indoor toilets, promenade and carriage costumes, children's dresses, etc.; also elaborate articles illustrative of what New Yorkers are wearing. Each number contains serial novels and short stories, sketches, etc.; illustrations of home and foreign subjects, poetry, fashionable intelligence, social gossip, useful information on family topics, etc., etc."

This popular periodical has now entered on its Eighteenth Volume; it will be especially notable for the completeness of its fashion reports, always earlier and more reliable than those of any similar publication; the beauty of its art illustrations; the excellence and variety of its serial and short stories, and the comprehensiveness and interest of its miscellaneous articles.

Every effort will be made to surpass, if possible, the high standard of merit which the paper long since attained, and to render the LADY'S JOURNAL not only indispensable in every household, but the recognized arbiter of Fashion throughout the Western World.

Accurate Reports and Illustrations of the Prevailing Fashions at Home and Abroad.

16 PAGES, WITH BEAUTIFUL ILLUSTRATIONS

The literary contents comprise Brilliant Serials, Attractive Short Stories, Sketches of Life, Character and Scenery, Fashion and Society Gossip, etc., etc. Its art and other miscellaneous engravings are selected with a view to variety, interest and beauty.

Published every Friday. Price 10 cents, at all newsdealers'. Annual subscription, $4, postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,

53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Digitized by Google

MANHATTAN BEACH.

VIA GREENPOINT.

Steamer SYLVAN GROVE, from foot of Twenty-third Street, E. R., at 8.45, 9.45, 10.45, and half-hourly to 5.45 P.M. Returning, leave Manhattan Beach at 7.35, 10, 11.05 A.M.; 12.05, 12.30, and every half-hour to 10.35 P.M.

VIA BAY RIDGE.

Steamers THOS. COLLYER and MATTEAWAN from 22d St., N.R., at 9.10, 10.25 A.M., and hourly to 8.25 P.M.

Leaving LEROY STREET ten minutes and PIER No. 6 thirty minutes after leaving 22d St. The boats leaving 22d St. at 7.55 and 8.25 P.M. do not stop at Leroy and Pier 6.

The steamer D. R. MARTIN leaves foot of Whitehall Street at 9.25 A.M. hourly to 8.25 P.M. Trains from Manhattan Beach connecting with D. R. Martin for Whitehall Street, leave hourly from 8.20 A.M. to 12.20 P.M., 1.25 to 6.25 P.M., 7.50 to 9.50 P.M. Trains connecting with steamer for Pier 6, Leroy St. and 22d St. leave every hour from 11 A.M. to 5.35 and 10.40 P.M.

GILMORE'S FULL BAND and LEVY every afternoon and evening.

WITH

FIVE DOLLARS

YOU CAN BUY A WHOLE

IMPERIAL AUSTRIAN VIENNA CITY

GOVERNMENT BOND

Which bonds are issued and secured by the Government, and are redeemed in drawings

FOUR TIMES ANNUALLY,

Until each and every bond is drawn with a larger or smaller premium. Every bond must draw a Prize, as there are no blanks.

THE THREE HIGHEST PRIZES AMOUNT TO

200,000 FLORINS,
50,000 FLORINS,
30,000 FLORINS,

And bonds not drawing one of the above prizes must draw a Premium of not less than 130 Florins.

The next drawing takes place on the

1st of OCTOBER, 1880,

And every bond bought of us on or before the 1st of October is entitled to the whole premium that may be drawn thereon on that date.

Out-of-town orders sent in Registered Letters, and inclosing $5, will secure one of these bonds for the next drawing.

For orders, circulars, or any other information, address

INTERNATIONAL BANKING CO.,
150 Broadway, New York City.
ESTABLISHED IN 1874.

N. B.—In writing to us, please state you saw this in the English FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

☞ The above Government Bonds are not to be compared with any Lottery whatsoever, and do not conflict with any of the laws of the United States.

CHAMPLIN'S

LIQUID PEARL

Is used by Actresses, Opera Singers, and Ladies of Fashion, to create the distinguished appearance so much admired by every one. By its use the roughest skin is made to wear the pure radiant texture of youthful beauty. Use the LIQUID PEARL according to directions, and you need no longer complain of a freckled, tanned or rustic complexion. Sold by all druggists. Price 50 cents a bottle. Beware of imitations. CHAMPLIN & CO., Prop'rs, Buffalo, N. Y.

HONEY BEES

New Principles in Bee-keeping.

Every one who has a farm or garden can now keep Bees with profit. Send for circular. Address,

MRS. LIZZIE P. COTTON, West Gorham, Maine.

Little Havana Lottery.

OR SUPPLEMENT TO

THE ROYAL HAVANA LOTTERY.

HAS ALWAYS TAKEN PLACE SEPTEMBER 21st.

1 Grand Prize			$1,000
1	"	"	1,000
1	"	"	500
2 Prizes, $200 each			400
5	"	100 "	500
100	"	16 "	1,600
641	"	6 "	3,840
250	"	2 "	500
9 Approximations of $20 each to the 9 remaining units of same lot as the one drawing the $1,000 Prize			180
2 Approximations of $10 each of the number preceding and following the one drawing $1,000			20
1011 Prizes, U. S. Currency			$13,540

ONLY 25,000 TICKETS. Whole, $5; Halves, $2 cts.

Prizes paid in full in United States currency immediately on presentation of tickets.

Jackson & Co., Bankers, 82 Nassau Street, New York.
Chase & Co., 200 Broadway, New York.
John W. Clark, 1703 N. Y. Ave., Washington, D. C.

Responsible Agents Wanted, Chase & Co., Gen'l Agts, New Haven, Conn.

FREE TO ALL!

Wishing to introduce our great Literary and Family Journal, The Fireside at Home (a mammoth 8-page, 48-column illustrated paper, size of N. Y. Ledger, devoted to Literature, Useful Knowledge, Amusement, and everything to delight and interest the whole family) into thousands of new homes where it is not already taken, we will send it Free for Three Months to all who send Ten Cents (in silver or postage stamps) to pay postage and help pay the cost of this advertisement. The regular price is $1.00 per year, but we are willing to give the paper away for three months and lose its cost in order to introduce it to new readers. By taking advantage of this offer you will receive all the intervening issues of the paper after you subscribe, including the extra holiday issues, and an amount of valuable and attractive reading matter for the approaching Long Winter Evenings, which could be secured in no other way for four times the amount. Send at once, and if you can conscientiously say, after your subscription has expired, that you have not received double the value of the ten cents—you, and not—we will thank you a present of a $1.00 bill. Address

F. B. LUPTON, Publisher, 23 Park Place, New York.

SCHMITT & KOEHNE.

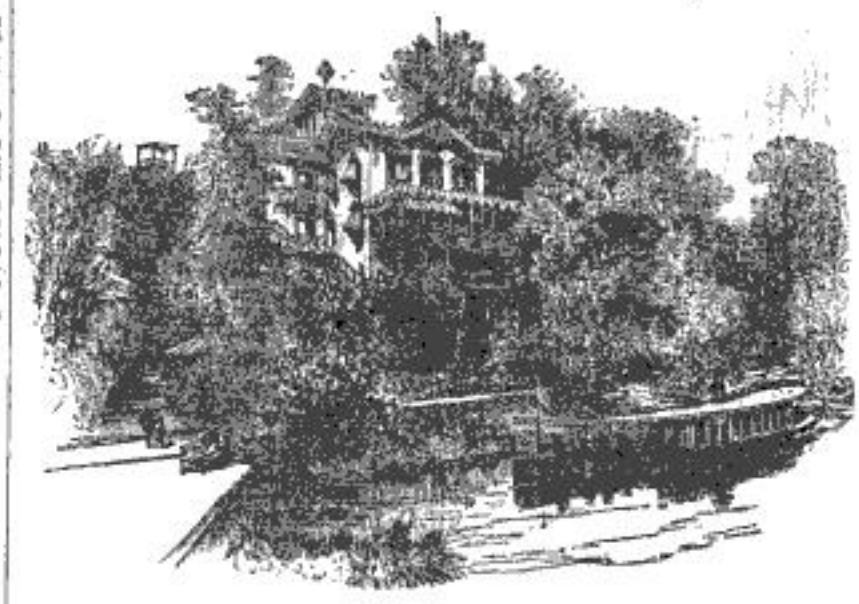
Central Park Brewery

AND

Bottling Company.

Brewery, Bottling Department and Office, 120—126 East Fifty-ninth Street. Ice-house and Rock-vaults, Fifty-sixth and Fifty-seventh Street, Avenue A and East River, N. Y.

BOHEMIAN and LAGER BEER.



The finest Beer for family use. The best Shipping Beer in bottles, warranted to keep in any climate for months and years.

50 Elegant Cards, New Chromo, Shells, Gilt-edge, etc., with name, 10c. G. A. SPRING, Northford, Ct.

50 New Style Cards. Lithographed in bright colors, 10c. 60 Agt's Samples 10c. Comb. Card Co., Northford, Ct.

50 Chromo, Snowflake and Lace Cards, with name, 10c. 40 all chromos, 10c. Star Printing Co., Northford, Ct.

FOR SALE,

"INTERLAKEN,"

THE COUNTRY HOME OF

THE LATE FRANK LESLIE, ESQ.,

Consisting of 62 acres, situated on LAKE SARATOGA, and extending back to Lake Lonely.

The house contains twelve rooms, gas and water.

The stable, finished in fine woods, has six box-stalls.

Finely appointed billiard-room, and three handsomely furnished sleeping-rooms over coach-house.

Gardener's cottage.

Conservatories profusely stocked with rare plants.

The furniture, steam-yacht, sail and row boats, French omnibus, etc., will be sold with the place.

Apply to

HOMER MORGAN, 2 Pine Street; or,
V. K. STEVENSON, 25 Pine St., and 661 Fifth Av.

MINIATURE CAMPAIGN BANNERS on cards, in pretty colors, with handsome pictures of each candidate of the four nominations. Something new, and sells fast. $2 per 100; 5 for 25 cts. Circulars for Watches and Micrographs. A chance for boys and others to make money. Address, GEO. J. SHEPARD, Waterbury, Conn.

SECRETS WORTH MILLIONS

Lovers, Attention! Beauty Unveiled! Book Free. Secret Worth Knowing! Complexion in 6 hours! Glorious Health! Incubian Wealth! Evidence Love! Book FREE. Sold by all Druggists. Parker & Co., Toronto, Ont.

GENUINE RELIABLE

JUDGE FOR YOURSELF

By sending 35c. money or 40c. postage stamps, with age, you will receive by return mail a correct picture of your future husband or wife, with name and date of marriage. Address, W. FOX, Box 38, Fultonville, N. Y.

Imitation Gold Watches.

$6, $10, $15, $20 and $25 each; Chains $2 to $12 to match. Jewelry of the same. Sent C.O.D., by Express. Send stamp for Illustrated Circular. COLLINS METAL WATCH FACTORY, 335 Broadway, N. Y. Box, 3086.

Briggs & Co.'s

With these Papers ladies can stamp their own materials for Braiding Crewel Work, and Embroidery Cheaper and Better than any other way.

Supplied by R. H. MACY & CO., RIDLEY & SONS and the leading Zephyr Wool Stores.

Three books of Patterns sent, post free, on receipt of Ten Cents.

392 BROADWAY, New York City.

MANMARIAL BALM restores and develops the bust. Warranted sure and safe. Price, $1. NEW ENGLAND MEDICAL INSTITUTE, 24 Tremont Row, Boston, Mass.

$777 A YEAR and expenses to agents. Outfit free. Address, P. O. VICKERY, Augusta, Maine.

50 Elegant, All New, Chromo & Scroll Cards, no 2 alike, Name Nicely printed, 10c. Card Mills, Northford, Ct.

EDIFYING, INSTRUCTIVE and ENTERTAINING.

Frank Leslie's

SUNDAY MAGAZINE

The Cheapest Sunday Magazine in the World.

THE OCTOBER NUMBER NOW READY

A Brilliant Table of Contents:

"The Christian in the Turkish Empire." By Alfred H. Guernsey. Eight Illustrations.
"Coptic Community in Egypt."
"Pictures of Swedish Life." Illustrated.
"From Titicaca to Cuzco: A Legendary Journey in Peru." By Godfrey A. Hudson. Five Illustrations.
"The Passion Play in Havana." By P. Peytonbert.
"Catharine of Siena." By Elliot Hopkins. Four Illustrations.

Essays, etc.—"Chinese Social Customs." "Peerless Pilots," by Herbert Lee; Illustrated. "The Profit of Prayer." "Gideon"; Illustrated.

Serial and Short Stories, etc.—"Sister Morgan's Husband," by L. T. Meade (Chapters IX. to XVI.); Illustrated. "Maid Marjory," by the Author of "Little Rifles" (Chapters X. to XV.); Illustrated. "Miss Johnson," by Elizabeth Harvey; Illustrated. "Circumstances," by Albert Walwyn; Illustrated. "Called," by Rhea E. Wrexford; Illustrated. "Fairy Enid," by Rev. Henry W. Cleveland; Illustrated.

Sketches, etc.—"Felicia Dorothea Hemans"; Illustrated. "Pentonville Lane, London—Sunday Morning"; Illustrated. "Daulaki's Adventures in South America"; Illustrated. "The Face of Hendrik Hudson"; Illustrated. "From Peasant Boy to Painter"; Illustrated. "Sir John Rennie, the Great Engineer"; Illustrated. "The Rev. William McKinley"; Illustrated. "A Wonderful Cure."

Poems.—"The Church Month,' by Frances Ridley Havergal. "The Hidden Gem and Unseen Rose," by Rev. N. S. Cobb. "October," "The Landing of the Pilgrim Fathers," by Mrs. Hemans; Illustrated. "The Rushing Magic"; Illustrated. "The Death Knell," by Thomas Powell. "To a Canary Bird," by Alfredia Hervey; Illustrated. "Grandfather's Lessons"; Illustrated. "First Loved," by Anna Lassen Hildebrand. "My Father Worketh Hitherto," by Rev. Richard Wilton, M.A.

Miscellany.—"The Bay of Biscay." "Oaths among the Israelites." "The Plate of a Skull." "The Rise of Jericho." "The Colorado Canon." "The Church and Rock of Gastelluzo." "God will Know my Name." "The Character of the Gospels." "The Dusky Parlor." "Trichinopoly, India." "A Portuguese Convent." "Gutenberg showing his First Proof-sheet." "The Madonna Da Foligno." "The Hel Fall, Norway." "The Duration of Christ's Life." "A Pathetic Story." "A Fourth of July Letter." Etc., etc., etc.

"Editor's Portfolio." "Obituary Notices." "Recreations for Sunday Afternoon." Music—"O Love Divine."

128 Quarto Pages---100 Illustrations.

Single copies, 25 cents. Annual subscription, $3; six months, $1.50; four months, $1—postpaid.

SEND 25 CENTS FOR A SPECIMEN COPY.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House, 53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Agents Wanted.

BIG PAY to sell our Rubber Printing Stamps. Samples free. Taylor Bros. & Co., Cleveland, O.

IT PAYS to sell our Rubber Hand-Printing Stamps. Circulars free. G. A. HARPER & BRO., Cleveland, O.

$250 A MONTH—AGENTS WANTED—To best selling articles in the world; 1 sample free. Address Jay Bronson, Detroit, Mich.

AGENTS WANTED EVERYWHERE to sell the best Family Knitting Machine ever invented. Will knit a pair of stockings, with HEEL and TOE complete, in 20 minutes. It will also knit a great variety of fancy-work for which there is always a ready market. Send for circular and terms to the Twombly Knitting Machine Co., 400 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

COLORED & PLAIN FASHION PLATES

IMPORTED MONTHLY FOR

Frank Leslie's

LADY'S MAGAZINE

—AND—

Gazette of Fashion.

This Publication is Acknowledged to be the Fashion Standard of America.

"FRANK LESLIE'S LADY'S MAGAZINE for September is a superb number. The colored plates present the latest novelties in Paris fashions, and the double sheet of plates gives all the new designs of costumes for country and seaside wear, promenade, evening and carriage toilets, bonnets, hats, etc. In addition to the illustrated designs of new and popular wearing apparel, all of which designs are described and explained in detail, there are many pages of choice and entertaining literature, the whole forming a very valuable and interesting number. Every lady should possess herself of a copy of this elegant magazine. $3.00 a year, postpaid."—Monmouth (N. J.) Democrat.

"FRANK LESLIE'S LADY'S MAGAZINE for September contains very instructive matter for the ladies. Here you have a correct idea of what to wear, and how to have it made, without depending on the dressmakers for suitable styles. Besides all this the magazine gives over 60 pages of choice literary matter. Subscription only $3.00 a year."—The Philadelphia Covenant.

Every Number contains full and accurate descriptions of the prevailing styles of Ladies' and Children's Dresses, Hats, Bonnets, etc., etc.; the latest styles of Fichus, Collarettes and Jabots; the latest style of Hair-dressing, etc., etc.

The readers of the LADY'S MAGAZINE have the earliest information of the constant change in Fashions, as its reports appear simultaneously with those in the journals of Paris.

Each number is embellished with beautiful engravings finished in the highest style of art, and the contents are highly interesting and entertaining, consisting of stories, sketches, poems, anecdotes, amusing cartoons, etc., etc.

Published on the 15th of each month. Annual subscription, $3.50, postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

COMPREHENSIVE, INTERESTING AND CHEAP.

Frank Leslie's

POPULAR MONTHLY.

The Largest, Most Attractive, and Cheapest Magazine in the World.

THE SEPTEMBER NUMBER NOW READY

With the following varied and brilliant

CONTENTS:

"THE CAMPAIGN OF 1880."—THE NOMINEES OF THE TWO PARTIES. Ten Illustrations and portraits.
"SOME GOSSIPING PAPERS." By Mrs. Barrow.
"THE OLD AND THE NEW ACADIA." By Frank Norton. Ten Illustrations.
"THE WASHINGTONS OF YORKSHIRE." Five Illustrations.
"CUSTOMS OF OLD SPAIN—SPANISH WEDDING DANCES." Four Illustrations.
"VICTOR HUGO." By the Author of "Roman Violets," etc. Six Illustrations and portrait.
"THEODORE, KING OF ABYSSINIA." By A. H. Guernsey. Fifteen Illustrations.
"TURIN." By Lady Blanche Murphy. Eight Illustrations.
"LODGERS AND BOARDERS IN LOWER LIFE." By Andrew Wilson, Ph. D. Nine Illustrations.
SERIAL AND SHORT STORIES.—"Not Guilty," by Eliza W. Pierce; concluded. "The Romance of Captain Beauty's Life"; Illustrated. "Holman's Outfit," an Arizona Romance, by W. O. Stoddard; Illustrated. "The Robbers of the Gorge," by F. K. Hamilton; Illustrated. "Miss Prescott's Three Lovers, and How their Wooing Sped," by Amanda M. Douglas; Illustrated. "A Queen of Bohemia," by Marguerite F. Aymar; Illustrated. "Given Up by his Friends"; Illustrated. "The Mistake of my Life"; Illustrated—etc., etc.
SKETCHES.—"Wm. Kennon, the Kentucky Ranger"; Illustrated. "Only in Fun," by Karl Drury; Illustrated. "The Three Ocelots"; Illustrated. "Outwitting a Highwayman"; Illustrated. "A Singular Old Maid," by Prudence Bowen; Illustrated. "How Senator Linn's Life was Saved"; Illustrated. "Russian State Prisons." Etc., etc.
POEMS.—"A Barmecidal Feast," by Richard Dowling. "Far Away." "My Lady," by Eliza. "Remember," by Ethel De Fontlanque. "The Ballad of Cassandra." "The Sheep's Petition." "Southwick," by J. G. Whittier; Illustrated—etc., etc.
MISCELLANY.—"Spanish Relics near Tallahassee." "Why Lace is so Costly." "Sunday Afternoon in Germany." "Suspended Animation." "Glass Beads." "A Pretty Climbing Vine—The Ground Nut"; Illustrated. "Glass and its History." "Boxwood." "Power of a Growing Tree." "Recent Progress in Science." "Entertaining Column," etc., etc.

128 QUARTO PAGES—OVER 100 ILLUSTRATIONS

A Beautiful Colored Plate Frontispiece,

"THE BRIDEGROOM STIRRUP-CUP IN ANDALUSIA."

Single copies, 25 cents; annual subscription, $3; six months, $1.50; four months, $1.

SEND 25 CENTS FOR SPECIMEN COPY.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Digitized by Google

THE RETURN OF THE MASSACHUSETTS PRODIGAL.

NICOLL THE TAILOR.

SPRING & SUMMER STYLES.
Diagonals, Worsteds, English Tweeds and Cassimeres,
MADE TO ORDER.

ELECTRIC LIGHTS used in BOTH STORES.
620 BROADWAY,
AND
129 to 131 Bowery, New York.

Samples and Rules for Self-Measurement
SENT BY MAIL.

FIRM'S Can for Explosive Fluids.
PATENTED JAN. 21st, 1879.
P. O. Box 4272, New York.

Frank Leslie's
BUDGET,
A MONTHLY VARIETY MAGAZINE,

Spicy and Entertaining.

Each Number contains 96 pages quarto, and over 100 beautiful Illustrations.

Published on the 1st of every month, and for sale by all Newsdealers. Annual subscription, $1.00; single copies, 15 cents. Sent postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

The OLDEST and BEST of the JUVENILE PUBLICATIONS.

Frank Leslie's
Boys' & Girls' Weekly

is now publishing the following admirable serial stories, all beautifully illustrated:

"'Sweppy'; Or, The Adventures of a Yankee Boy." By NAT USHER.
"Trap-door Tom."
"Jim Jeffs; Or, The Mystery of the House by the River." By NED HOUSE.
"Left to Himself." By COMMODORE AH LOOK.
"The Pearl of the Sahara; Or, The Adventures of Two American Boys." By COMMODORE ROBIN.
"Hal Harkforward and Tom Tallyho's Schooldays." By BEATRICE HARTE (Jack Harkaway).
"Nelly Blake's Schooldays."

Sold by all newsdealers. Price 5 cents a copy; $2.50 a year, postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

"An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure"—Tom Brown's Singer. Frederick Brown, Philadelphia.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT!

Keep the Blood cool and the Brain clear by the use of
TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT

SAVE MONEY

By Ordering
FASHIONABLE CUSTOM CLOTHING FROM NEW YORK.

ELEGANT SUITS TO ORDER, $18, $20 and $25.

DRESS SUITS, $20 to $35.

TROUSERS, $5 to $8.

WE SEND FREE
Samples of Cloths and Suitings and Fashion Plates, with full directions for ordering Gents' Clothing and Furnishing Goods, by mail, with fit and satisfaction guaranteed. Send for samples. Mention color and price desired, and give trial order to
GEO. W. LOSS & SON,
Fashionable Clothiers,
70 & 72 Fulton St., New York.

INMAN ROYAL MAIL STEAMERS
For QUEENSTOWN and LIVERPOOL.

NOTICE.—The steamers of this line take Lieutenant Maury's lane routes at all seasons of the year.
CITY OF CHESTER...Thursday, September 9, 8:30 A. M.
CITY OF BRUSSELS...Thursday, September 16, 3 P. M.
CITY OF BERLIN.....Saturday, September 25, 10 A. M.
CITY OF MONTREAL...Thursday, September 30, 2 P. M.

From Pier 37, North River, foot of Charlton St.

Cabin, $80 and $100. Return tickets on favorable terms. Steerage, $28. Drafts at lowest rates.
Saloons, state-rooms, smoking and bathrooms amidships.
These steamers do not carry cattle, sheep or pigs.
JOHN G. DALE, Agent, 33 and 35 Broadway, New York.
G. A. FAULK, 105 South Fourth Street, Philadelphia.
L. H. PALMER, 3 Old State House, Boston.
F. C. BROWN, 32 South Clark Street, Chicago.

TRUSS EGGLESTON SENSIBLE TRUSS. Made on new principles. Send for Circulars. Eggleston Truss, Chicago, Ill.

SPECTACLES, Eye, Field and Opera Glasses, Microscopes, Barometers, Thermometers, Compasses, at reduced prices. R. & J. BECK, 1016 Chestnut Street, Phila. Send 3 stamps for illustrated Catalogue of 146 pages. Mention this paper.

14 STOP ORGANS
SUB BASS & Oct. Coupler, 4 Set Reeds, $60
Pianos $125 and upwards, no Circular. Catalogue free. Address, DANIEL F. BEATTY, Washington, N.J.

Do Your Own Printing $3 PRESS prints Cards, Labels, &c. (Self-Inker $4) Larger sizes for larger work. For old or young. Great money saver. A paying business anywhere for all or spare time. Send two stamps for Catalogue of all the Presses, Type, Cards, Paper, &c., to the Manufacturers KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

MABIE, TODD & BARD.

GOLD PENS.
Pencils, Holders, Cases, etc.
180 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
Send for Price-List.
Our Goods are for sale by First-class Dealers in U. S.

OPIUM Morphine Habit Cured in 10 to 20 days. No pay till Cured. DR. J. STEPHENS, Lebanon, Ohio

FISHERMEN!
TWINES AND NETTING
MANUFACTURED BY
WM. E. HOOPER & SONS, Baltimore, Md.
Send for Price-List, naming your County and State.

THE Admiration
OF THE WORLD.
Mrs. S. A. Allen's
WORLD'S Hair Restorer
IS PERFECTION!

FOR its wonderful life-giving properties to faded or falling hair, and QUICKLY CHANGING GRAY OR WHITE HAIR to its natural youthful COLOR and BEAUTY.

IT IS NOT A DYE.

It requires only a few applications to restore gray hair to its youthful color and lustrous beauty, and induce luxuriant growth, and its occasional use is all that is needed to preserve it in its highest perfection and beauty. DANDRUFF is quickly and permanently removed. SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

KIDNEY-WORT
The Only Remedy
That Acts at the Same Time on
The Liver, The Bowels and The Kidneys!
This combined action gives it wonderful power to cure all disease.
Why Are We Sick?
Because we allow these great organs to become clogged or torpid, and poisonous humors are therefore forced into the blood that should be expelled naturally.
KIDNEY-WORT WILL CURE
Biliousness, Piles, Constipation, Kidney Complaints and Diseases, Weaknesses and Nervous Disorders.
By causing free action of these organs and restoring their power to throw off disease.
Why Suffer Bilious pains and aches?
Why tormented with Piles, Constipation?
Why frightened over disordered Kidneys?
Why endure nervous or sick headaches?
Why have sleepless nights?
Use KIDNEY-WORT and rejoice in health. It is a dry, vegetable compound and One package will make six gts. of Medicine. Get it of your Druggist. He will order it for you. Price, $1.00.
WELLS, RICHARDSON & CO., Proprietors,
(Mailed post paid.) Burlington, Vt.

A KEY THAT WILL WIND ANY WATCH AND NOT WEAR OUT
SOLD by Watchmakers. By mail, 50 cents. Circulars free. J. BIRCH & Co., 58 Dey St., N.Y.

"USED BY ALL THE GREAT ARTISTS."
C. J. HEPPE,
Philadelphia, Pa.,
AGENT FOR The World-Renowned
HENRY F. MILLER
PIANOS,
Of Boston.

N.Y. Central & Hudson River R.R.
THE BEST ROUTE EAST OR WEST.
Through Cars between New York or Boston and Chicago or St. Louis.
See NIAGARA FALLS, SARATOGA and the HUDSON.
C. B. MEEKER, General Passenger Agent.

COLUMBIA BICYCLE
The Bicycle has proved itself to be a permanent, practical road vehicle, and the number in daily use is rapidly increasing. Professional and business men, seekers after health or pleasure, all join in bearing witness to its merits. Send 3c. stamp for catalogue with price list and full information.
THE POPE MFG. CO., 59 Summer St., Boston, Mass.

THE GREAT FAMILY JOURNAL.

Frank Leslie's
CHIMNEY CORNER,
THE
Leading Literary Family Journal.

New Literary and Artistic Attractions appear in Rapid Succession.

The CHIMNEY CORNER is the only weekly that publishes healthy and unsensational Fiction; the Novels and Stories are attractive and interesting, and are contributed by the most popular writers. The contents embrace also Biography, Travels, Incidents of all Times and Countries, Foreign Manners and Customs, Essays, Well-chosen Matter for Young Readers, Examples for the Aspiring Youth of Both Sexes, Natural History in a popular form, the Wonders of Nature, Science, Art, and Human Ingenuity, Adventures with Wild Men and Beasts, Narratives of Daring and Peril, Social Hints, etc., etc.

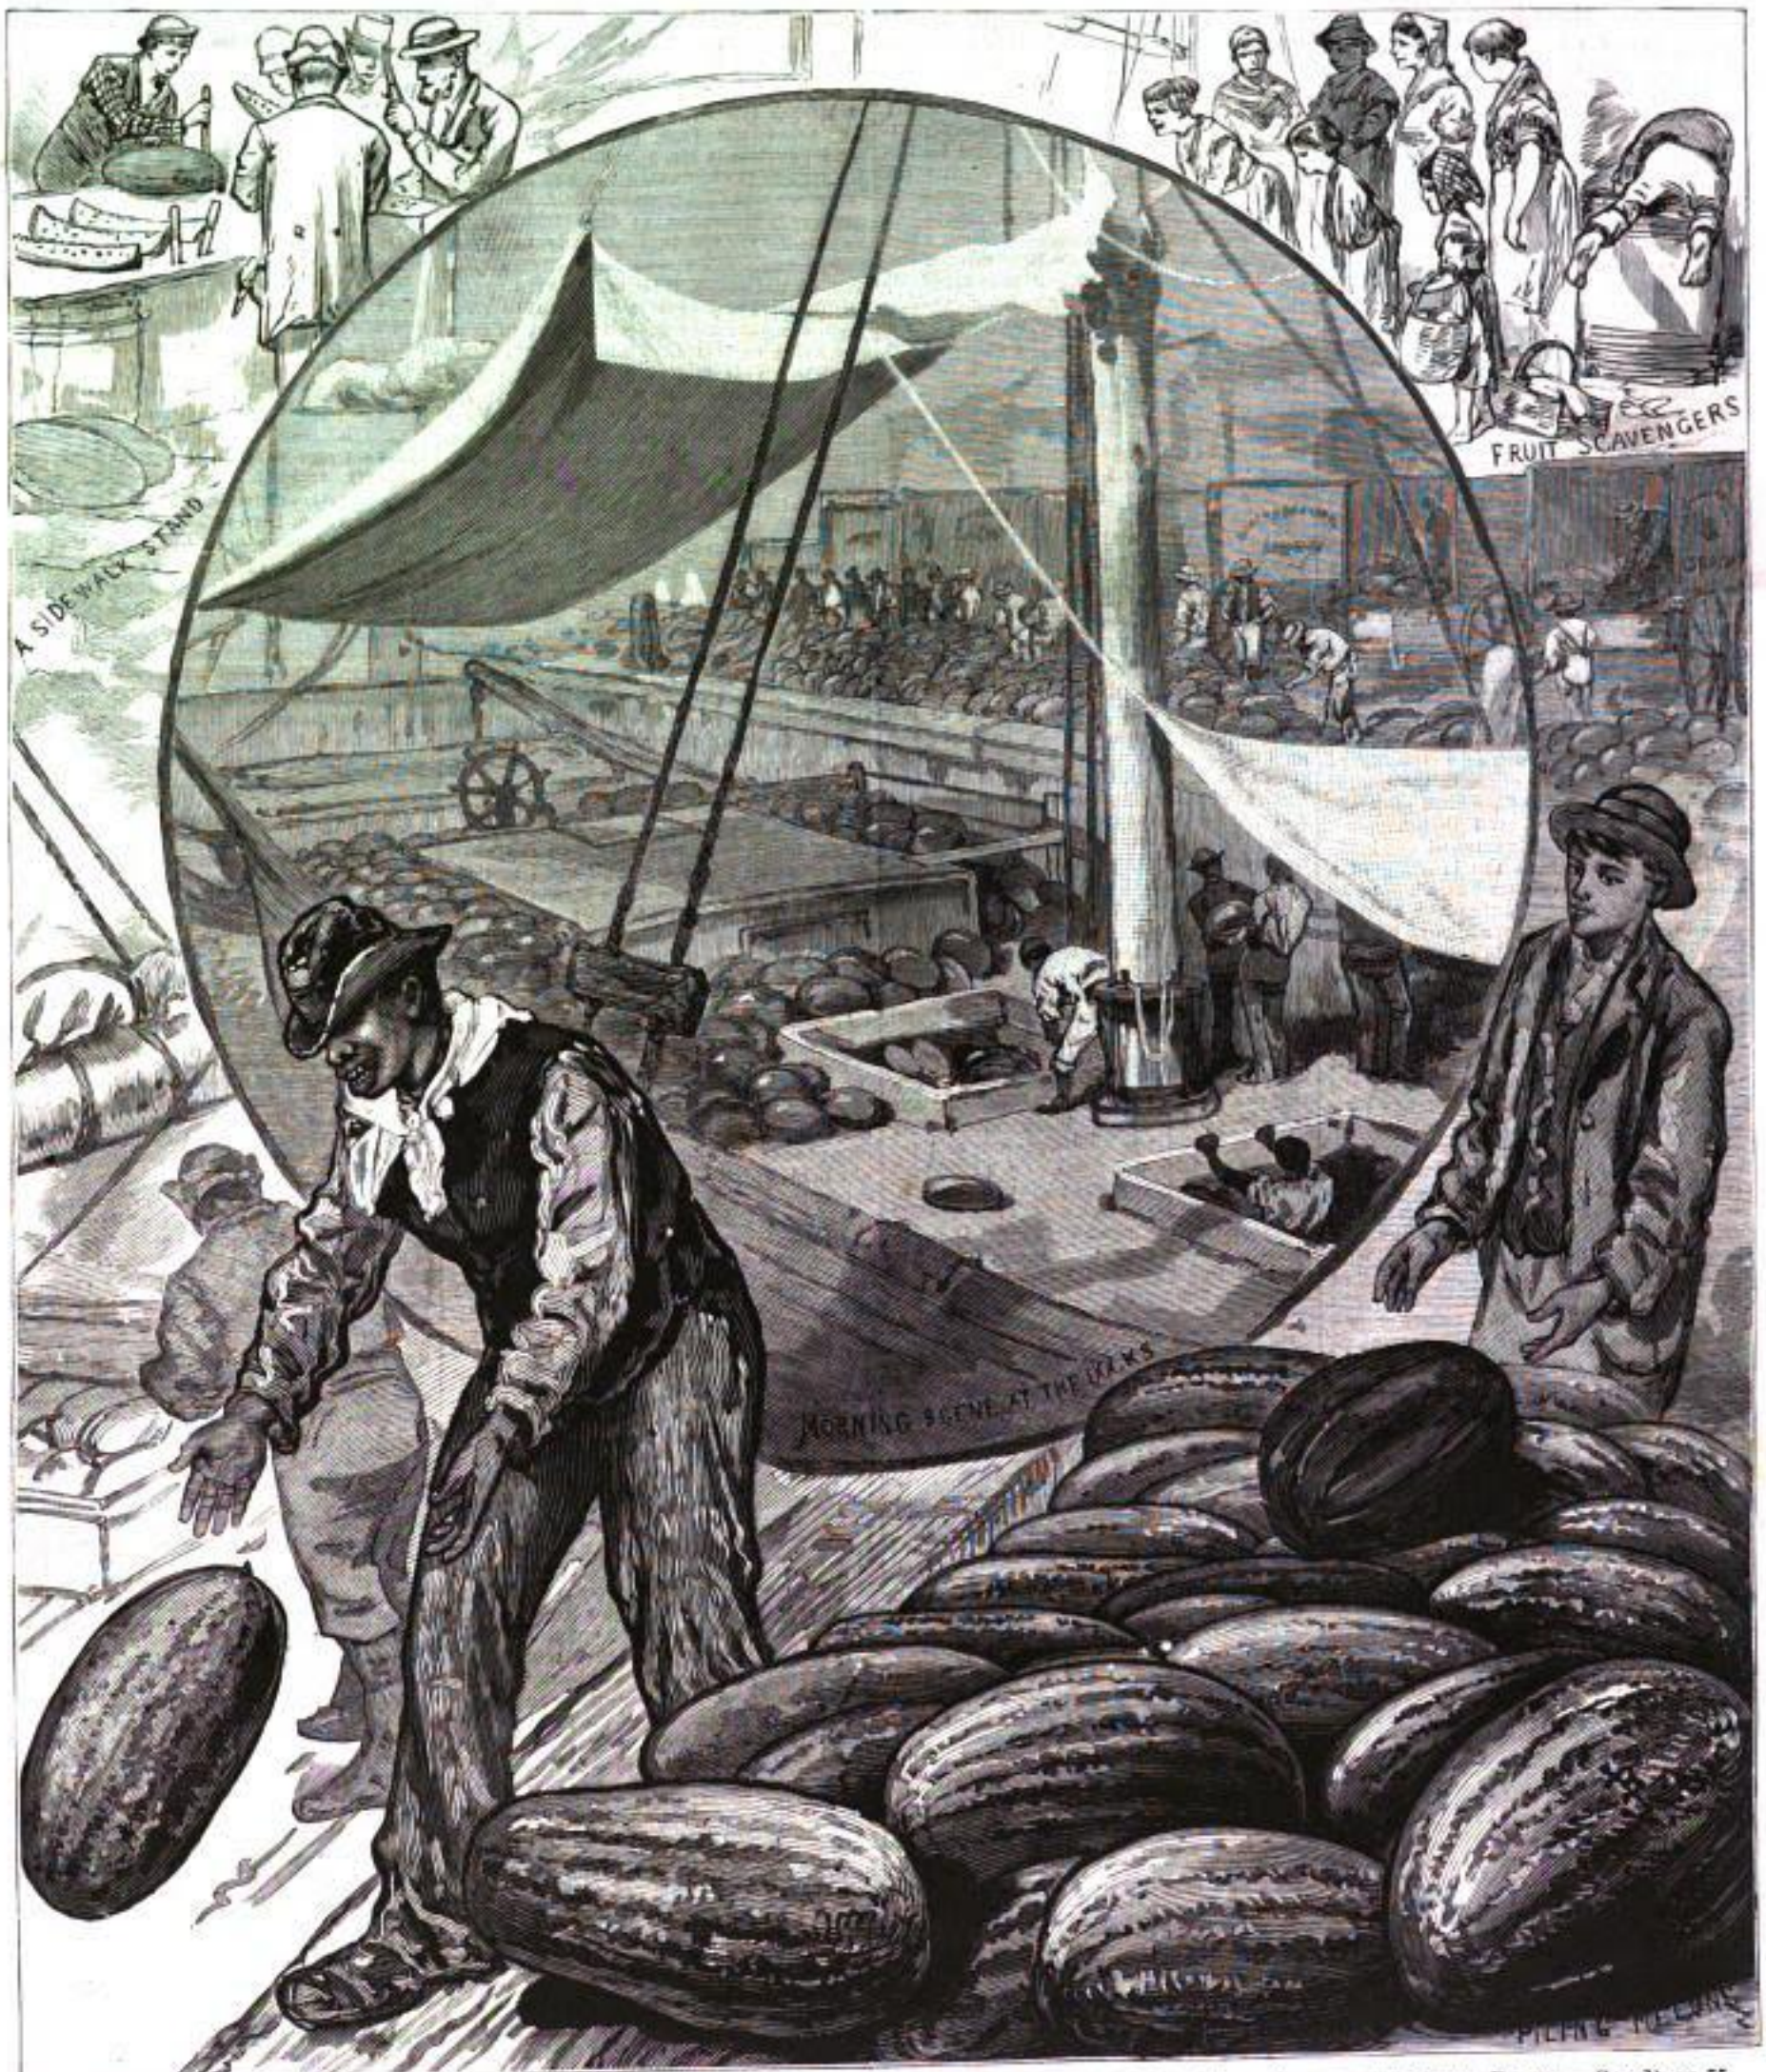
Each Number contains sixteen pages, eight of which are embellished with beautiful engravings.
Published every Monday. For sale by all newsdealers. Price, single copies, 10 cents. Annual subscription, $4; three months, $1—postpaid.



Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1880, by F. W. Ehelano, Assignee, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.—Entered at the Post Office, New York, N.Y., as Second-class Matter.

No. 1,304.—Vol. LI. NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 25, 1880. [Price 10 Cents. $4.00 Yearly, 13 Weeks, $1.00.

NEW YORK CITY.—INCIDENTS OF THE WATER-MELON TRADE IN THE METROPOLIS.—From Sketches by Joseph Becker.—See Page 55.

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,
55, 56 & 57 PARK PLACE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 25, 1880.

A NEW STORY BY WILKIE COLLINS.

In No. 1,307 of FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER will be commenced the publication of a powerful serial story, entitled "THE BLACK ROBE," by WILKIE COLLINS. This story, which will be published by us exclusively from advance sheets purchased directly of the author, possesses all the attractions of style, ingenuity of plot and felicitous delineation of character which peculiarly distinguish Mr. Collins's works, and will, we are confident, afford genuine enjoyment to our readers. Persons who desire to have the story complete, as presented in our columns, should send in their subscriptions at once.

THE "CIVIL SERVICE" ISSUE.

WE are glad to observe that, among thoughtful men in the ranks of both parties, there is a growing disposition to bring the issue of civil service reform into its rightful prominence among the important problems pending for solution in the proximate future. It is a problem which has nothing attractive to the "strikers" and "workers" in the ranks of either organization. On the contrary, no subject is more repulsive to that considerable class of persons in the country who have come to engage in "politics" as a trade, and who look for a new deal of political benefices at each Presidential election. This species of "low and pimping politics," to use the descriptive phrase of Burke, is nurtured in large degree by the number and multiplicity of offices peculiar to our complex system of government, with its Municipal, State and Federal subdivisions, each of them having an official hierarchy of its own, and each of them offering under existing usages, the emoluments of place as so many prizes of a mercenary ambition. And so it happens that the "office-holding class" forms in the United States a larger proportion of the people than in any other country under the sun, for it is precisely in proportion as the institutions of a Government are subdivided and articulated in the interest of popular freedom that the incumbents of public place must needs be various in grade and large in number. The simplicity of despotic Governments exempts the people from this multiplicity of political stations, but it is at the price of civil liberty.

Since, then, the very genius of our institutions lends itself to the creation of a large "office-holding class" as a necessity of their being, it follows that the relation which this class of persons should hold to the residue of the people is more important in the United States than in any other country. And yet we risk nothing in saying that the greater relative importance of this question to the people of the United States has thus far failed to produce its proper effect on the popular mind, for the simple reason that the control of our politics has, of late years, been largely remitted to the manipulation and management of office holders and office seekers. To expect that office holders should take the lead in a reform of the civil service and its tenure, would be to expect, as the late Thomas Corwin used to say, that the wild ass should bray "when he hath grass," or that the ox should low "over his fodder"; while to expect that office-seekers should moan over the decline of public virtue on this score would be as idle a thing as to construct the Ptolemaic system without its primum mobile, seeing as we do that the spoils of office are the primum mobile of the office-seeker's political activity.

For the ingraftment of this pernicious usage in American politics we are mainly indebted to the Democratic Party under the administration of President Jackson; but it is only just to say that since the advent of "Jacksonism" in our history all parties have, in a greater or less degree, acted upon the despicable principle which General Jackson was the first to establish; and where, as at present constituted, all parties are "tarred with the same stick," it is natural that there should be among the leaders of each an equal antipathy to the movement in favor of civil service reform.

Hence the attempt that was made in the Republican Convention at Chicago to strangle the mere mention of such a thing in the Republican Platform; hence the outspoken utterance of Mr. Flanigan, of Texas: "What are we here for except to get office"; and hence, as if in very irony of civil service reform, the nomination of Mr. Arthur on the heels of his expulsion from office—by a Republican Administration—because of political abuses connected with his administration of the New York Custom House.

And the political outlook from the Democratic Platform is not a whit more encouraging, for that platform limits itself to the simple "promise of such a change in the administration of the Government as shall insure a genuine and lasting reform in every department of the public service." It is obvious that "such a change" as is here foreshadowed contemplates nothing more than a mere change in the personnel of the Federal office-holders; and, as if to emphasize this view of the matter, Mr. English, the nominee of the Democrats for the Vice-Presidency, has distinctly formulated the doctrine that twenty years is long enough for any party to hold office in the United States, while, in order to show that it is the public offices which he is aiming at, this declaration of his is prefaced by the historical remark that "the perpetuation of property or place in one family or set of men has never been encouraged in this country."

Now, such a "reform" as the Democratic Platform promises, instead of being an alluring one to all sensible people and to the business public of the country, is really a stone of stumbling and a rock of offense in the path of the Democratic candidates. A "clean sweep" in the incumbents of subordinate place in the departments at Washington would throw the public business into inextricable confusion, and this confusion would react in a thousand ways on the private business of the country. Indeed it is safe to say, when the intricacy and complexity of the mere routine business of these departments are considered, that it would be impossible to carry on the Government without the aid of the training and experience acquired by long and faithful service in the details of the public administration. But as if to shock the business sentiment of the country, and to drive it from the support of the Democratic candidates, we hear it intimated on all hands, as the palmary argument of the Democrats in the present canvass, that there must a change in the personnel of the Federal administration in all parts of the land, and in all departments of the public service, that alleged abuses may be brought to light and corrected. Yet what "abuse" could be so demoralizing as such a wholesale redistribution of the "public plunder."

At present it is only a small class of doctrinaires who are deeply interested in a reform of the public service. Democratic and Republican managers are equally averse to it, for even as we write the Republican managers are addressing their "circulars" to office-holders of every class and grade calling upon them for "voluntary contributions" to the support of the Republican campaign, when there is not only no more reason why they should be called on than other citizens, but when there are obvious reasons of public morality and public decency why they, of all men, should stand furthest aloof from such a huckstering of the public patronage. The paid officials of the Government are not paid to perpetuate the power of the party by which they thrive, and they are not paid with the public money that, by throwing a part of it in the political scales, they may make it more difficult for the unofficial public to change the political policy and control of the Government. In a word, the subordinate offices of the Government are mere posts of public service, and neither private nor political perquisites. As such, it is equally an abuse for the Democrats to covet them as the spoils of war, and for Republicans to use them as a permanent base of supplies from which to draw commissary and quartermaster's stores in carrying on their campaign. Yet it is between such abuses that the people are doomed to make their dubious choice in the present aspects of the case.

THE VERMONT ELECTION.

THE result of the Vermont election is significant as indicating the drift of the tide in politics. The Republican majorities given at the September State elections in Presidential years since 1860 have been: 20,230 in 1860, 18,977 in 1864, 27,326 in 1868, 25,333 in 1872, and 23,672 in 1876. The majority in the election of last week was 25,200, and the plurality about 26,300. Thus the majorities of recent years are not only maintained but actually increased, and the fact must be accepted as conclusive that there is no such popular dissatisfaction as has been alleged with the policy and methods of the now dominant party. It is, indeed, every day becoming more and more apparent that, while the struggle now in progress has in the main adjusted itself to the old political issues and involves a square trial of strength between the two great parties, there is a large class of sober, independent voters whose support, otherwise assured, has been alienated from the Democracy by the party record on the financial and cognate questions. Capitalists and business men are unwilling to put in hazard everything that has been gained by the policy of resumption, and workingmen, in the enjoyment of good wages, are reluctant to promote a change of administration which may involve positively calamitous results to all their interests. It is this consideration which, more than anything else, has determined the result in Vermont, and will largely influence the result in other States. Whether it will be sufficiently powerful to overcome the obvious advantage which the Democracy possess in a practically solid Southern vote in the Electoral College we do not pretend to foresee or predict. But it is plain that the confident expectations of an easy victory which that party for a time entertained are not likely to be realized; its triumph, if won at all, must be won by the sturdiest of fighting and the closest possible attention to essential details every moment of the time from this hour forward to the close of the polls in November.

The total vote in Vermont reached 70,000, the largest ever cast, and of this the Republican percentage is 68, as against 64 two years ago. The Greenback element appears to have practically disappeared, less than 1,400 votes having been given to the party candidate for Governor. The complexion of the next Legislature will be more strongly Republican than for a long time, being composed of 192 Republicans, 15 Democrats and 1 Greenbacker.

A QUESTION OF MANNERS AND MORALS.

AMONG the belligerents who have entered the lists against our public school system is Mr. Richard Grant White. He attacks it vigorously, too, and says that those who have obtained their quota of dangerous learning at that fountain of knowledge are ignorant, slovenly, heedless, headstrong, self-conceited, disrespectful, and, on the whole, inferior in principle, in faithfulness and even in manners, to children who have been merely taught to read and write, to fear God and to honor their parents. This is a very bad character to give to our American youth.

To those who remember Mr. White's recent attack on grammar, it will not seem strange that he should seek to follow up his assault by a supplementary battle with grammar schools. Who sooner than he would be looked upon as their natural enemy? It grieves him, in walking through the streets, to see inscribed over the doors of so many humble temples of learning the familiar device, "Grammar School, No. 599," or upwards, and he would like to see those inscriptions removed. Are not the public schools the principal depositories of the offending parts of speech? Abolish those institutions and every child could be taught to speak in the vernacular of the dock-rats, and we should have no more clothing of our mother English in corsets and long trains. Vigorous liberty would soon take the place of effeminate slavery to the fashions of language, and the most euphonious slang could be turned as trippingly on the tongue as a Sunday-school lesson. The burden of proof against the existence of substantives, pronouns and conjunctions would then no longer rest on the ingenuity of the distinguished littérateur, and he would be at liberty to introduce his vernacular genius into the well-furnished parlors of English or American syntax.

But, while it is reasonable to suspect that the opposition of Mr. White to our public schools is due, privately, to his instinctive aversion to grammar, he places his public objections upon different grounds. They are not, in his opinion, good training-schools for servants. They fail to develop properly the functions necessary for chambermaids, coachmen, coal-heavers and others of the riffraff, who are expected to doff their hats and "stand at attention" while literary people, in the fine frenzy of their æsthetic meditations, are passing by with stately tread. These schools are the enemies of caste. They are absolutely unfitting the youth of America for subordinate positions; they are filling them with absurd and romantic notions about respectability, independence and self-reliance, and giving them habits of thought which threaten the ruin of destructible but time-honored theories. Grave, indeed, are such charges as these, and sad would be the outcome if they could only be sustained.

But these aspersions are not new. They have been heard before now from various sources, and next to the supposed criminal tendencies of public school education, they form the staple of the objections of all those who are opposed to our popular system. They come from the complacent housewife, herself too ignorant sometimes to be respected for her accomplishments, and they have been echoed, in other terms, from the pulpit and the rostrum. Even the tax-payers—unhappy mortals!—have been known to button up their pockets and deplore the injury that education is working the rising generation of America. Unhappy youth! Distracted country! The decline of American manners is, indeed, one of the marvels of the nineteenth century.

But Mr. White does not rest his objections to the public schools solely on the point of etiquette and servile training. He, too, touches lightly upon the criminal phase of the question; but he does it with that contempt for figures which might be expected in a gentleman of his æsthetic culture. He thinks that a very large proportion of our native criminals have been educated in the public schools. He thinks so; and he thinks, further, that it would cause a painful surprise if we only knew the exact proportion. But, before giving expression to his thoughts on the subject, would it not have been better to have learned just what the exact proportion is? That is always the proper way to form opinions founded on figures. No dealer in statistics who confesses in advance that his knowledge does not entitle him to any opinion can expect much consideration from thoughtful people. But even if the suspicions of Mr. White were true, what then? Every man knows that almost nine-tenths of native citizens in the United States have passed at least some portion of their lives in the public schools, and it would be hard to tell where we are to secure our stock of criminals if we did not occasionally send a public school graduate to the penitentiary. Those who have been taught nothing but to fear God and honor their parents would scarcely be equal to the demand.

Have those who are continually harping on the immoralities of our public school system no recollection of the events of a quarter of a century? Can they not recall the time when our mob-ruled cities were at the mercy of gangs of shoulder-hitters, who, acting under the prerogatives of the revolver, the bludgeon, and the brickbat, ruled in many localities as absolutely as the Czar of Russia? Those were the halcyon days when our public school system was in its infancy and before it had begun to exert its influence over the rising generation. We have surely made some progress since then. A nation that can govern without an army, and over a portion of its territory which contains three-fourths of its population almost without a police, is scarcely the nation to be charged with immoral methods in training its youth. But what is the use of national progress and reform if you cannot have properly trained servants? The public school system which does not teach docility in the kitchen is to be condemned.

We shall have occasion to be thankful for the labors of all those elegant and immaculate people whose heads are full of theories, and who never take the trouble of looking for facts. Their opposition to our public schools can scarcely fail to produce a reaction which will tend to increase their efficiency. Let the curriculum of the schools be amended if necessary, but it is quite time to abandon the discussion of morals and manners.

A CHANGE FOR THE BETTER.

AMONG the many encouraging signs of the times must be reckoned the vast change displayed by our politicians in their conduct of the Presidential campaign. It can no longer be said, as it was only ten years ago by the London Times, that, judging from the American Press, "whenever the model Republic of the world wanted a President, they chose the greatest criminal of their time."

Dickens has burlesqued this common practice of abusing political opponents in one of his raciest sketches, in which a candidate, who appeals to the sympathies of the public by announcing that he has a wife and six small children, is driven out of the field by his rival, who declares that he has two wives and twelve smaller children.

Our older readers will remember how Zach. Taylor, the rough-and-ready of our military history, since his enemies could find no flaw in his moral character, was attacked for his want of scholarship and polite accomplishments, and recommended to attend a course of primary education before he wrote his Inaugural. It was at this time that some facetious wag invented the story of "Nuff sed" and "O. K." for "all correct," fictions, which are now received by many as genuine facts. Nor will they forget how Franklin Pierce, who led his regiment bravely in Mexico, was accused of hiding in a ditch. Even that gallant old hero of two generations, Winfield Scott, was satirized for his "hasty plate of soup," and for his "Fuss and Feathers." Even his inadvertent compliment to "the rich Irish brogue and the sweet German accent" was mercilessly ridiculed.

Those whose recollections carry them back to the gubernatorial contest when William L. Marcy was a candidate must remember the attacks made upon that able statesman for the "fifty-cent patch," which he innocently charged in his military account. This, however, had its consolation, since a whole village of Irishmen in Cayuga County voted for him on that very account, conceiving, with true Hibernian logic, that the "patch" so ingloriously regarded by the American Press was a real potato patch, and consequently that the partisan comment upon it was a deliberate insult to "ould Ireland." Our readers will doubtless remember, too, the gentle and considerate remarks made by some members of the American Press on James Buchanan, whose peculiarity of neck, which was really occasioned by a neuralgic contraction of the muscles, was said by his libelers to be the result of an abortive attempt to cut his throat in a fit of despondency caused by an unsuccessful love affair.

We pass over the anti-Grant vituperations, and also the slanders heaped upon that martyr to his country, Abraham Lincoln. We merely allude to the subject in order to show the great improvement in partisan manners, and to express the hope that there may never be a return of the scandalous and defamatory practices of former days.

Digitized by Google

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

THE English Parliament has at last been prorogued, and one of the stormiest sessions ever known has come to an end. It cannot be said that its results have been adequate to the promises of the Liberal Party. This is due to two principal causes. The obstructive policy of the Irish members in the House of Commons has on several occasions delayed public business, and the action of the House of Lords in rejecting certain Bills passed by the Commons has rendered much of the work of the Lower Chamber fruitless. It was supposed, when the Liberals came into power, that immediate steps would be taken to counteract, as far as possible, the effects of Lord Beaconsfield's foreign policy. Except in a few instances, this has not been the case. In South Africa, where the recall of Sir Bartle Frere was loudly clamored for by the Liberals while the Conservatives were in power, no change was made for many months, and it was not until he had entirely completed the policy which was so severely condemned by the Liberals that Mr. Gladstone consented to recall Sir Bartle. In Afghanistan Lord Beaconsfield's scientific frontier was abandoned, and the weakness of the policy of the Government in vacating Northern Afghanistan brought on a state of affairs which came to a climax in the defeat of General Burrows. His utter rout has since been amply avenged by the magnificent victory of General Roberts over Ayoob Khan in the hills surrounding Candahar, but the stigma which attaches to the cowardly flight of the troops under General Burrows can never be removed. The rulings of the Berlin Congress had been neglected when Mr. Gladstone came into power, and Turkey had been especially behind-hand in carrying out the decisions of the Congress in regard to Montenegro, Albania and the Greek frontier. The efforts of the new Administration to compel the performance of these decisions and those of the Supplementary Conference have so far been without success, and now, by way of menace, a grand naval parade has been arranged along the coast of Albania. In this demonstration the ships of England, France, Germany, Austria and Russia are to take part; but as it is resolved that no men are to be landed and that the bombardment of Dulcigno is to be the only active demonstration, it is most unlikely that anything practical will be done.

In their home policy the Liberal Government have been even more unfortunate. Their Irish Secretary, Mr. Foster, introduced a Bill which gave a tenant compensation in case he was evicted by his landlord, and thus so seriously interfered with the rights of property that many Liberal members of Parliament voted against the Bill. Another Bill which related to the registration of voters in Ireland was foolishly thrown out by the House of Lords, and its rejection has caused a shout of indignation against the "hereditary legislators." Mr. Parnell, the Irish agitator, attempted to abolish the constabulary in Ireland, but signally failed in his attempt, and the disgraceful scenes which occurred in reference to Mr. Bradlaugh and Mr. O'Donnell form by no means a pleasing innovation in the old practice of the House. The only Bills of any importance which the Government succeeded in getting enacted were the Burials, the Hares and Rabbits and the Employers' Liability Acts. As, however, these Bills were all more or less mangled in the House of Lords, the results of the session have been very meagre.

The Autumn manœuvres of the German troops have attracted a good deal of attention this year on account of the recent hostile tone of the German Press, referring to Gambetta's speech at Cherbourg. There is a large number of foreign generals and princes present, and the principal nations have sent their official representatives. Concerts, reviews and other military spectacles are the order of the day, and the Emperor takes an active part in the display. The neighborhood of Berlin presents a very military aspect, as the soldiers are billeted upon the surrounding villages. Sir Garnet Wolseley of South African fame represents England and France; Russia and Austria have generals of equal note present to observe the efficiency of the German soldiery and the manner in which they are handled by their officers.

Roumania, Bulgaria and Armenia are once more attracting attention. Baron Haymerle, the Austrian Premier, has been visiting Prince Bismarck, and a report has gained some credence that an alliance between Roumania, Austria and Germany is likely to be made. Roumania, according to this story, is to be raised to the rank of a kingdom, the integrity of which is to be guaranteed by Germany and Austria. By this means Russia will be shut off from the Balkan peninsula by land. At the same time it is rumored that Bulgaria will declare her independence in October. Russia, however, is said to be opposed to such an immediate reopening of the Eastern question as must follow upon an agitation for a free Bulgaria. The leaders of the Pan-Bulgarian and Pan-Servian movements have elaborated a treaty of offense and defense between Bulgaria and Servia, and they propose demanding the assent of the two reigning princes to the draft. Montenegro is to be invited to join the alliance, and Macedonia and Bosnia are to be swallowed up after a time. Meantime the disturbances in Armenia threaten to produce a rebellion, and the Moslems ill treat the Christians more and more every day. The Kurds have attacked several villages, murdering the Christians, and in many instances the survivors are emigrating. The Russians are actively supporting the Armenians, and the Russian Consul at Van has given ten great rural banquets, to which more than two thousand Armenians have been invited.

There has been nothing new in the position of the French Government towards the Church. The latter, however, has not been inactive, and, from several places throughout France, come reports of wonderful miracles. Lourdes is the principal haunt of pilgrims at present, and every train arriving there brings its quota of sick and apparently dying persons to the grotto where the cures are effected. There is a great deal of jealousy between the supporters of the different holy places, and the praises of each are loudly sung by the priests and other interested persons.

THE general revival of business prosperity is clearly attested by the increase of internal revenue receipts. Thus the receipts for July last were $373,906 greater than during July of last year. Of this increase, almost the entire amount was upon luxuries, the use of which has been augmented by the return of "good times."

IT is announced that if the Mormon immigrants who are now on their way to this country shall attempt to practice polygamy in Utah, they will be prosecuted by the Government, having received warning by the circular sent abroad by Secretary Evarts that such practice is unlawful. This is all very well; but why not proceed also against the Mormons in Utah who already, and have for years, defied the law?

PRESIDENT HAYES's veto of the Bill to put a stop to Chinese immigration does not seem to have diminished the warmth of his reception by the people of San Francisco. The citizens of the Pacific metropolis are distinguished for their graces of hospitality, and, being of a very positive way of thinking themselves, they seldom fail to recognize the same independence of opinion in others. The President will spend a fortnight on the Pacific coast.

MR. MAPLESON is actively preparing for his next opera campaign in this city. He recently signed a contract with Christine Nilsson, but her husband being ill, she will not be able to carry out her engagement. Mr. Mapleson will now go to Italy to engage Mariani, the great dramatic prima donna, and to buy the opera of "Gioconda." He has engaged Novara, one of the best European bassi, and will produce three novelties, "Mefistofele," "Gioconda" and "Rienzi."

GREAT efforts are making by the Democratic National Committee to bring about a coalition of the two wings of the party in Virginia on a single electoral ticket. It is understood that a conference of the leaders of the contending factions will shortly be held, and it is believed that an agreement will be arrived at which will save the State to Hancock and English. This agreement, however, from present appearances, will involve an unconditional surrender of the wing opposed to General Mahone and the Readjusters.

JOURNALISTIC enterprise in Cuba appears to be prosecuted under difficulties. None of the Havana papers were permitted to mention the report of the loss of the City of Vera Cruz, and one paper which defied the prohibition to the extent of barely announcing the event was fined $500. A telegram sent from Havana to this city indicating the loss of the vessel was held by the authorities for two days, on the pretense that it would be better to wait for fuller particulars. This sort of thing would very soon come to an end in this more northern latitude.

IT is gratifying to learn that the conflicting interests in connection with the World's Fair to be held in this city in 1883 have been harmonized. Until this result was reached, all efforts to make the enterprise what it should be were necessarily doomed to partial failure. It is reported that a private understanding has been arrived at that the site will be fixed at Morningside Park, between One Hundred and Tenth and One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Streets, on the west side, and that a number of capitalists have promised to provide all necessary funds to start the scheme. The books of subscription for the required $1,000,000 to begin with will be opened this week.

THERE is a good deal of genuine practical sympathy with æsthetic culture among the citizens of Cincinnati. They have already their musical college and other institutions for the elevation of the popular taste, and now Mr. C. W. West, a wealthy resident, has offered $150,000 for the establishment of an art museum, on condition that other citizens shall subscribe a like amount in addition. A canvass among a few of the leading business men shows that no difficulty will be experienced in speedily raising the amount necessary, and the question of a site for the institution is already being discussed. A fair nucleus for an art collection has been formed by the labors of the Art Museum Association, composed of leading ladies. The contribution of Mr. West makes over $1,000,000 given in a few years by citizens of Cincinnati for public purposes, mainly in the direction of the development of art.

THE enormous exportation of gold to the United States continues to engross attention in European money circles. In Germany, notwithstanding the effort made to arrest its outflow from that country by raising the rate of discount, the limited payment of gold to certain centres of disbursement and the slowness with which it is counted out in single pieces, the exportation is assuming alarming proportions. During last week over $3,000,000 in gold was shipped from Germany, France and England. The sum of $1,248,500 was brought by the steamer Main which arrived here September 10th, and all the indications favor a continuance of this influx of gold coin.

THE new code of Mississippi, which goes into effect on the 1st of November next, makes some radical changes as to the rights of married women. One section totally abrogates the common law as to the disabilities of married women, and its effect on the rights of property of the wife. "Marriage shall not be held to impose any disability or incapacity on a woman as to the ownership, acquisition, or disposition of property of any sort, or as to her capacity to make contracts, and do all acts in reference to property which she could lawfully do if she was not married." Husband and wife may sue each other, and dower and courtesy, as heretofore known, are abolished. Husband and wife inherit from each other all their respective property if there be no children, and each a child's part if there be children or the descendants of children. They may dissent from each other's wills, and take each other's estate according to law. The most advanced advocates of women's rights could scarcely demand more than is here conferred.

SEVERAL of the influential organs of Democratic opinion at the South are speaking out against the two-thirds rule as an egregious folly. The Louisville Journal says of it that, "born to serve an infamous purpose, it has cost the Democratic Party two and perhaps three Presidential elections, and to it directly may be traced the immediate cause of the sectional war." The Mobile Register says the rule should be abandoned, and adds: "If there is a clear majority for a candidate of good moral character and of acknowledged ability and of unquestioned fealty to the Democratic Party, a factious minority should not be permitted to destroy him in the interest of some unknown and untried man who may prove to be unworthy of the trust." These protests would have been more timely before the Cincinnati Convention, but their justice and force, whenever made, are too apparent to admit of argument.

A TERRIBLE colliery explosion occurred at Seaham, County of Durham, England, on the 8th instant, by which 150 men lost their lives. The shock of the explosion was so great that two shafts which were half a mile a part were closed, cutting off communication with the men in the lower pit. Some statistics on this subject of casualties in coal mining, presented in a paper read by Mr. Joseph D. Weeks before the Social Science Association at Saratoga last week, have a peculiar interest in connection with this disaster. From 1850 to 1879 the total casualties in Great Britain were 20,457. In Pennsylvania one man was lost for each 84,000 tons of coal raised in the anthracite region in 1869, and in 1879 one for 105,700, a much greater mortality than in England, notwithstanding the greater danger of explosions and inundations in the latter country. In Ohio the figures, confessedly imperfect, give one death to 142,253 tons of coal raised in 1874, and in 1878 one death to 255,000 tons raised. While some accidents are unavoidable, there is no doubt that a great majority of explosions come from the carelessness of miners, who do not hesitate to open a safety-lamp surrounded by fire-damp to light a pipe. The peril from the falling of roofing and slate is greater, however, than any other, being about 40 per cent. of the total; and of these the public hears the least because they are so common. These are too often the result of forgetfulness, rashness or neglect. Experience seems to show that employés are more at fault than employers. In fact, carelessness and neglect are common among miners to a degree which seems scarcely possible.

THE underground railway project has been revived, a company has been formed, and it is said that work will soon be commenced on a tunnel which is to extend from the Battery to Central Park. The plans contemplate single-track tunnels, each 15 feet high and 12 feet 6 inches wide, with a brick wall between them, running side by side. They will be directly under Broadway, except at the Post-office, where an eastern curve will be made to avoid the Beach tunnel excavated some years ago; but beyond that again taking the middle of the street. The roads will be a little under the water-pipes, and will reach nearly to the curbs on both sides. The tunnels will be partly arched and partly supported by beams; at the stations beam-tunnels will be built. It is proposed to begin the work at the up-town end of Madison Avenue this Fall, and not to enter Broadway until next Spring. The stations will be reached through buildings at street corners. At the Battery, City Hall, Union Square, Madison Square and other points, handsome surface buildings will be erected. The platform under ground will be 450 feet long by 14 feet wide. Trains of ten cars can be run, it is claimed, at a speed of twenty-five miles, with accommodation for 1,000 passengers. Trains will be started every three minutes. The uniform fare will be five cents. It is among the prospects of the future with this company to extend its road to Harlem either by tunneling or connecting with the tracks of the Harlem road in Fourth Avenue. It is said that all the money needed for the work can be secured without difficulty. It is estimated that the cost will be about $2,000,000 per mile. In this estimated cost is included all damages to private property and to the city.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.

MOUNT BAKER, in Washington Territory, is reported in a state of eruption.

MR. MARSHALL O. ROBERTS died at Saratoga last week from a stroke of apoplexy.

MAYOR COOPER has vetoed the ordinance for the capture of cats found running at large in this city.

THE Massachusetts Prohibitionists have nominated Charles Almy for Governor, with a full State ticket.

THE Democratic officers of election in this city have been equally and amicably divided between Irving Hall and Tammany Hall.

PRESIDENT FRANCIS WAYLAND, of Yale College, was elected President by the Social Science Association, in session at Saratoga last week.

A SCHOOL meeting at the city of Manistee, Mich., has by 60 majority ordered the discontinuance of the reading of the Bible in the schools.

THE Passion Play, a theatrical representation of the last days of Jesus Christ on earth, will be produced at Booth's Theatre on December 6th.

VICTORIA'S band of Indians are causing great trouble on the Rio Grande. They recently attacked and robbed a mail-coach and killed three men.

EX-SENATOR WILLIAM H. BARNUM, of Lime Rock, Conn., has been nominated for Congress by the Democrats of his district, but declines to accept.

THE New Hampshire Republicans have nominated Mr. Charles H. Bell for Governor. The Georgia Republicans have decided not to nominate a State ticket.

SIX survivors of the wreck of the City of Vera Cruz arrived in this city last week, and there are rumors of the escape of fourteen more of the passengers on that steamer.

THE Egyptian obelisk was removed from the hull of the steamer Dessoug, at Staten Island, last week, and will be floated on pontoons to Ninety-sixth Street, in this city.

A WONDERFUL discovery of native gold is reported to have been made in Cachetopa Creek, Col.; 4,000 people rushed to the locality within forty-eight hours after the first announcement.

"DR." BUCHANAN, the notorious Philadelphia "bogus diploma" peddler, who pretended to commit suicide a short time ago in order to escape the law, was arrested at St. Clair, Mich., September 10th.

PRESIDENT HAYES held a Cabinet meeting last week on the train which carried him to San Francisco, at which General Miles at Fort Keogh, Dakota, was ordered to send the peaceful Sioux further south to a reservation.

IT is announced that the revision of the army regulations, which has just been completed by a board of Army officers, neither enlarges the powers of the General of the Army nor curtails the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War.

THE Anchor Line steamship Anglia, which sailed from Boston on September 2d, was run into by an iron bark on the 6th, off Newfoundland. There were no passengers on board. The crew escaped, but the steamer and cargo were lost.

MR. DESIRE CHARNAY, in charge of the Lorillard expedition in Mexico, writes that he has unearthed a grand Toltec mansion of twenty-five rooms, with numerous corridors, grand colonnes and stairways. He describes it as "a veritable marvel of its kind."

THE Board of State Assessors has added $125,000,000 to the assessed valuation of real estate in New York County, making the total equalized value of real estate in the county $1,043,413,350, and the total value of real and personal property $1,219,349,285.

TWO HUNDRED more Sioux Indians have surrendered at Fort Keogh. The general opinion at headquarters is that the remainder of the Indians, being tired of roaming about and fighting, will soon surrender, and that Sitting Bull will find himself without any following.

THE Republicans carried the city of Wilmington, Delaware, at the municipal election last week, gaining four wards. The Arkansas election last week resulted in the success of the Democratic ticket by a majority of over 50,000. The repudiating amendment to the State Constitution was adopted.

THE Winter wheat crop of Illinois for 1880 is reported at 53,365,000 bushels, the whole value of the crop being estimated at $44,457,002. This crop is unequaled in the State's history. There will be over 46,000,000 bushels to be shipped, after taking out all necessary for consumption and seed. The total yield in the States of Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota, Nebraska, Kansas, Wisconsin and Dakota Territory, as reckoned on the basis of the returns received, is 147,731,000 bushels of Spring wheat against 126,466,000 last year.

Foreign.

THE Greek Army is being recruited at the rate of 600 a day.

THE destruction of property by the recent earthquakes at Manila is estimated at $6,000,000.

THE disturbances throughout Armenia are threatening to assume the proportions of an insurrection.

THE French Government will at once execute the Jesuit decrees, ignoring any proceedings in the courts.

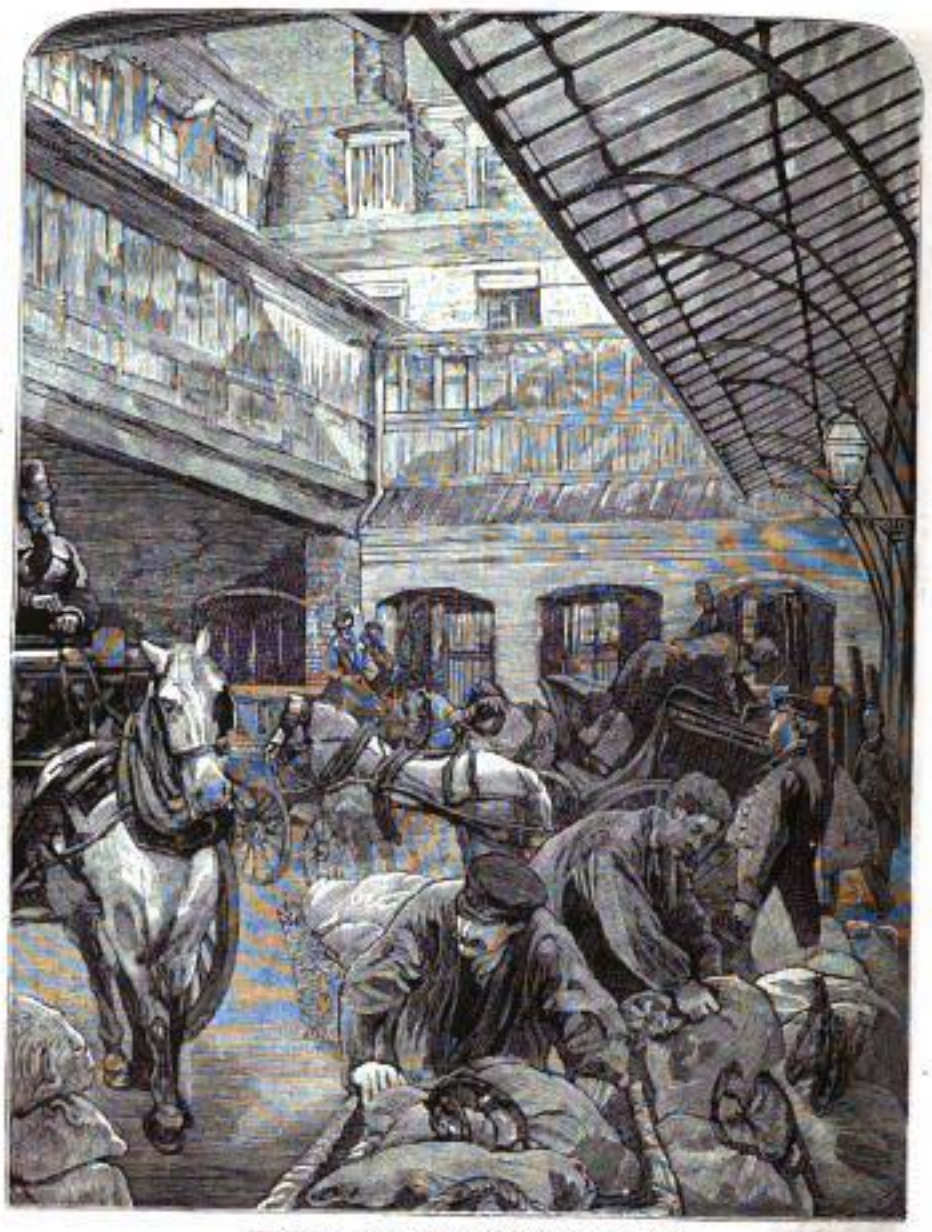
THE British Parliament was prorogued September 7th by royal commission, with the usual speech from the throne.

BY a violent lightning-storm in Paris on Wednesday last, a few stones were dislodged from the Cathedral of Notre Dame and the ruins of the Palais des Thermes.

THE latest reports from South America say that the war between Chili and Peru is beginning to drag. Chili is discussing means for raising money to support her army.

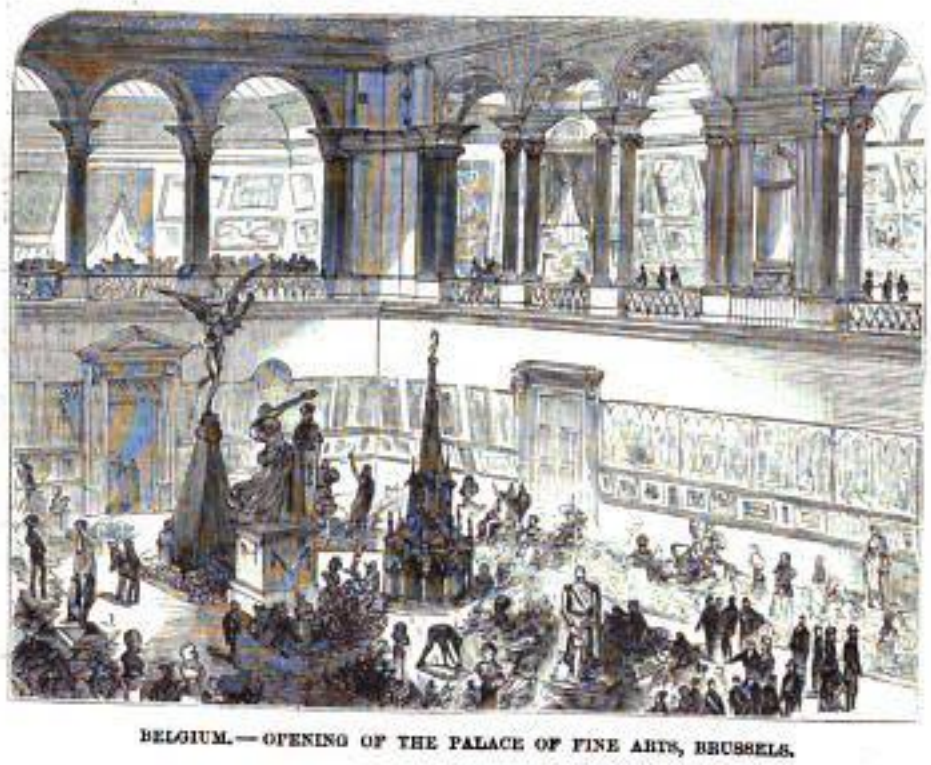
THE death is announced of M. Jules Nicolet, the eminent French lawyer, at the age of sixty one. He had been retained as the leading counsel for the Jesuits in their actions against the Government in the courts.

THE story is denied that Russia sought an alliance with France against Germany, and it is said to be mere idle gossip that, because he had discovered a plot of a like kind, Gambetta composed the downfall of Waddington.



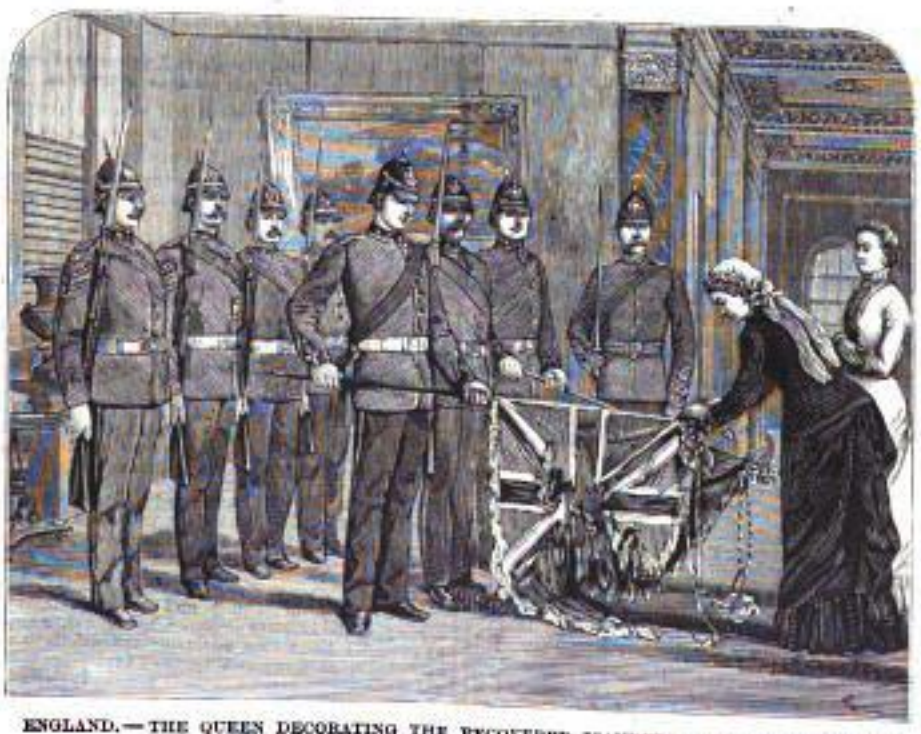
THE village of Upton and the surrounding country, in the Province of Quebec, has been devastated by extensive forest fires, destroying the standing and harvested crops in an area of thirty by twenty-five miles and burning some of the farmers to death. The damage is about $300,000, and 100 families are left homeless.

Digitized by Google

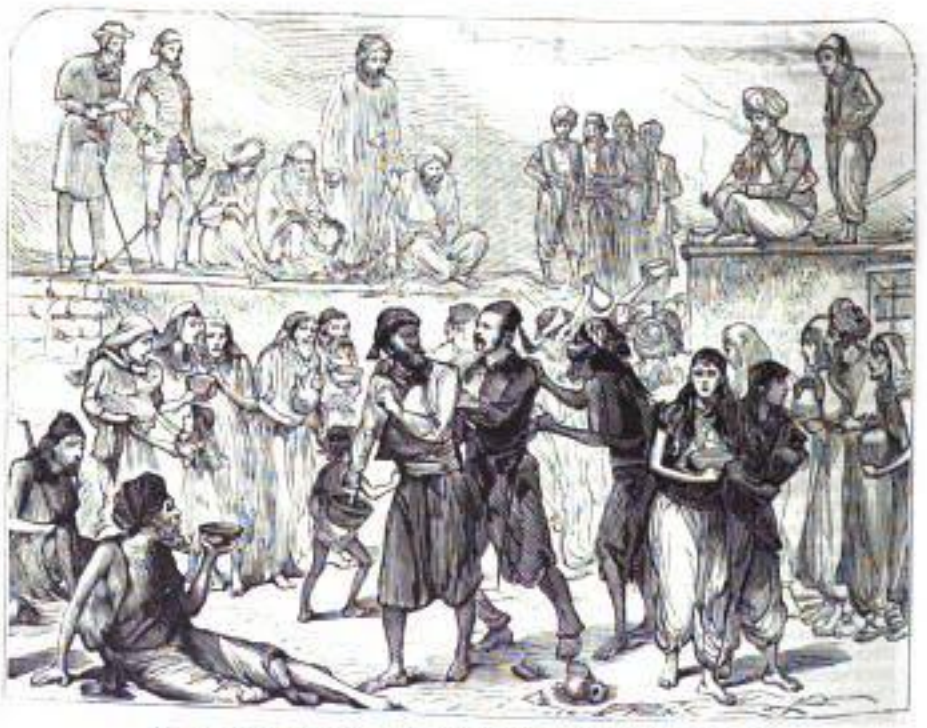


The Pictorial Spirit of the Illustrated Foreign Press.—SEE PAGE 55.

BELGIUM.—THE MEMORIAL ARCH OF TRIUMPH AT BRUSSELS.

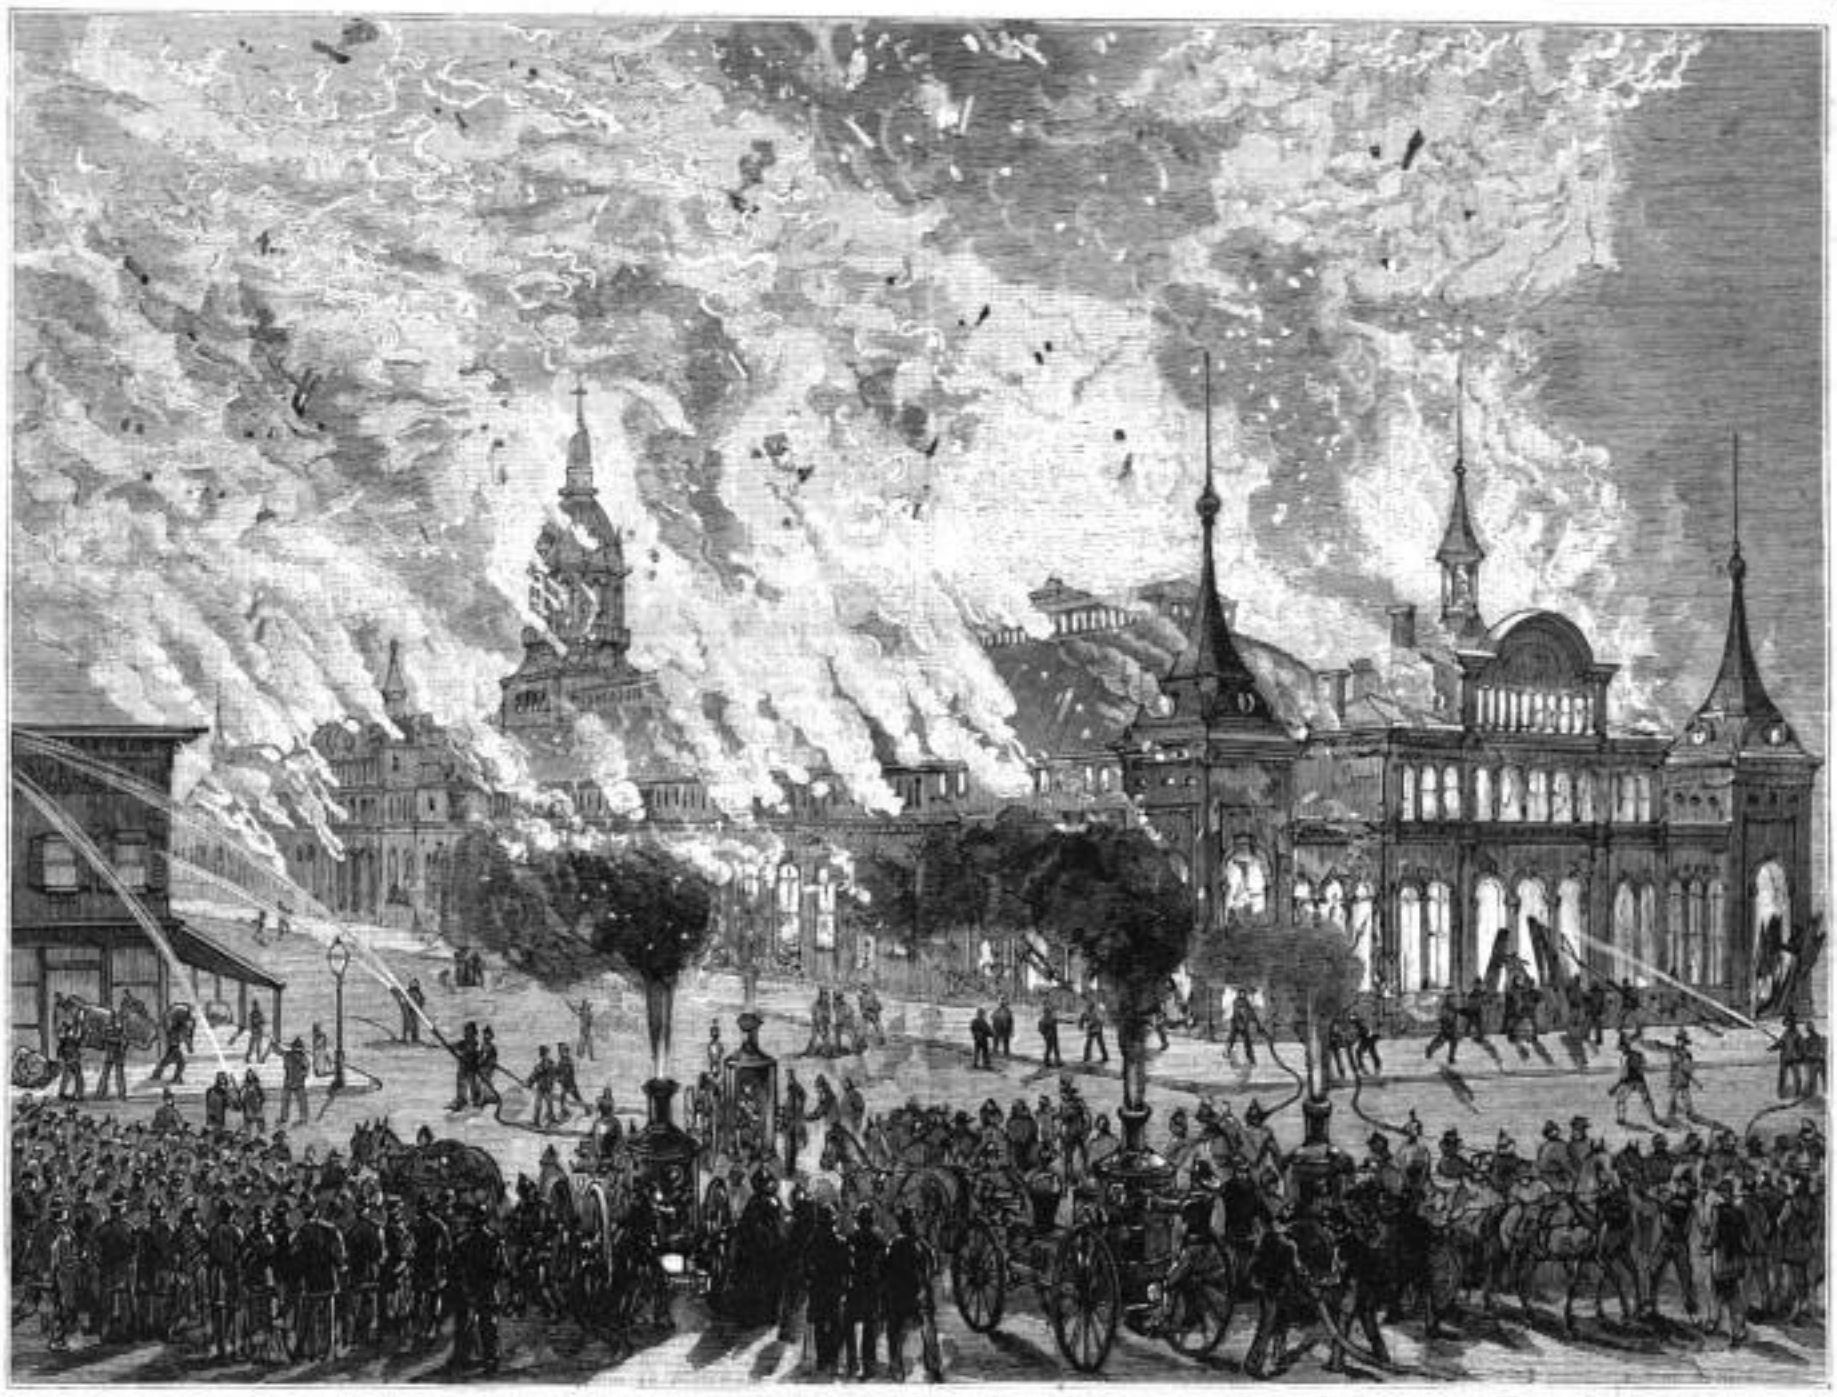


FRANCE.—THE NEW POST OFFICE, PARIS.



BELGIUM.—OPENING OF THE PALACE OF FINE ARTS, BRUSSELS.

SWEDEN.—EXHIBITION OF THE "VEGA'S" COLLECTION AT STOCKHOLM.



ENGLAND.—THE QUEEN DECORATING THE RECOVERED ISANDULA COLORS AT OSBORNE.

ASIA.—THE FAMINE-RELIEF KITCHEN AT BITLIS, KURDISTAN.

Digitized by Google

NEW YORK CITY.—DESTRUCTION BY FIRE OF THE MANHATTAN MARKET BUILDING, ON SEPTEMBER 8TH.—SEE PAGE 55.

JAMAICA.—THE CYCLONE OF JULY 18TH.—APPEARANCE OF THE WHARVES AT KINGSTON THE DAY AFTER THE STORM.—FROM A PHOTO. BY J. S. THOMPSON.—SEE PAGE 55.

Digitized by Google

BERRY'S DELUSION.

IT was dreary enough out-of-doors, to be sure! Berry sat listlessly at the window and watched the slow fog creep up the valley like a living thing. The mountains were blotted out for the time. "I will look unto the hills from whence cometh my help." As these words echoed vaguely through her tired brain, Berry lifted the eyes heavy with weeping towards the long range of mountains and saw nothing but clouds—nothing but clouds! Would there ever be any sunshine or gladness, or light or bloom, in her world any more? The one who had cared for her, who had rescued her, a little stray waif of humanity floating about unloved, uncherished, untaught, and had taken her to his heart and home as if she were his own child, lay in the state-room down-stairs, dead.

She could scarcely believe it even yet, although for three days she had seen over and over again a horrible vision of the old man, white and rigid, borne in by strangers as he had been brought to her on that dreadful night. For three days the house had been hushed with that awful stillness that death brings. Only to-day there was a little bustle, and Berry sat there in her black dress waiting for the funeral. Berry hated to hear the steps hurrying up and down the stairs. It seemed as if the machinery of the house should stop, now its master was gone! She was glad the day was sombre and full of clouds. How could she bear the gairish sunshine again or a bright, happy-looking world?

The door opened suddenly and a servant looked in.

"If you please, miss, it's Mrs. Lonsdale and Miss Lonsdale as is wantin' to see you at wunst."

Berry hesitated. It was very hard for her just then to go down to these people, although they were the sister and niece of her benefactor, old Mr. Compton. But, indeed, he had never got along with them very peaceably himself, and their jealousy of Berry had cropped out so evidently that it had been some time since the young girl had seen them at all. But she knew their feelings towards her, and it seemed as if they had come to triumph over her forlorn state.

She cast a glance in the mirror as she passed and smoothed her hair a little, but the dusky rings curled low upon her forehead, and the waving mass was simply tied back with a black ribbon. It was a very young, pathetic, tired face that met her glance, with large, soft brown eyes where golden lights were sleeping, and the mouth had lines of pain about it now; but it was a very pretty face for all that, full of changing color and dimples in happier times. She slipped down-stairs now like a shadow, past the room with quickening pulses where if lay—once her guardian, her friend—and stood in a few moments facing a tall grenadier of a woman in rustling black silk, who bowed only as they met.

Mrs. Lonsdale was a stiff, angular woman, with iron gray curls, very sharp gray eyes, and thin, compressed lips. She prided herself on having no nonsense about her and telling plain truths. Her plain truths were, of course, the most disagreeable things she could find to say.

Her daughter, Medora, was diametrically opposite to her mother in every respect. She was petite, she was blonde, with a simpering smile and curls like a wax doll's. She was full of child-like simplicity and kittenish playfulness generally, but as that did not suit the present occasion and she did not understand any other style of deportment, she sat now with an inane expression on her face, and raised her handkerchief now and then to her eyes.

"I sent for you," exclaimed Mrs. Lonsdale, in the tone of a judge addressing a prisoner at the bar, "because I do not choose to trust servants' tales, and I want to know something about my poor, dear brother's last moments."

"There is very little to tell," Berry said, with a dry sob. "He went away in the morning well, as I thought; he was brought back at night—dead."

"Of course you had help at once—doctors to see him?"

"Yes, yes; but it was too late, too late!" answered the young girl. "They said it was disease of the heart."

"Very strange—very strange!" said the lady, staring into Berry's face, as if she saw through any little subterfuge and couldn't be bluffed off by it in any way. "None of our family have been troubled in any way with the heart; they have never been conscious of having such an organ as a heart. But I know my brother has been suffering lately from the unnatural estrangement between us. Whose fault that is I leave to you to imagine! I dare say it has preyed upon his mind. I've no doubt, Medora darling, he has been pining for us, and did not dare——"

Berry opened her eyes and drew herself up with a proud gesture.

"There was no reason why he should not have had you here if he had liked. My dear guardian! Who was there to control him?"

"Oh, we all know how you had twined yourself into his affections. Excuse me, Berenice, I always speak plain truths. If people don't like them, so much the worse. Truth is a healthy diet. I might come here with sugared lies, and you'd like me better for it; but I thank heaven I have a conscience!"

"I don't suppose you are alone in that particular. I'm sure I prefer your showing your real colors," exclaimed Berry, indignantly; "though I think I should see through sugared lies all the same, if you told them."

Medora here gave a warning sniff, and said: "Oh, poor, dear uncle! How dreadful to die alone in the street! Mamma, I feel quite faint; I should like a glass of wine!"

"Oh, my darling, lie down at once and—I suppose you might as well give me the keys, Berenice, and I can go and help myself. Of course, everything comes to us, naturally, and we might as well assume the responsibility at once."

Berry moved away without further response than, "I will get the wine!" and Mrs. Lonsdale turned to her daughter, indignantly:

"The cheek of that creature is amazing! I won't demean myself to ask about the will, but, of course, poor, dear brother Richard did not forget us. He has left her a legacy, I dare say, but we will have the rest, and a nice, substantial home, my dear, after knocking about the world as we've done."

"I've always wanted to give a party in this room, it is such a good shape," exclaimed Medora, springing up with a sudden forgetfulness of her faintness. "See, mamma! With a wine-colored, raw silk portière here, and curtains to match, a pale passion-flower vine running over them. I saw just the thing the other—— Oh, thank you, I am better!"—this to Berry, who stood near her with the wine.

"Then I may leave you," said the young girl, proudly. "You will find the rooms ready!"

"Certainly," answered Mrs. Lonsdale, stiffly. "I shall not be at a loss to make myself at home in my brother's house."

Berry had believed herself utterly miserable before, but it seemed to her now, as she walked languidly up-stairs, that a new shadow had been added to her grief—another weight to the burden she carried. It was so hard to be misunderstood, suspected, insulted. She looked out into the gloomy day with a shudder. When would it be over? There was only one human being whom she cared to see, and he could not come. He was too far away and too poor to make the journey; but the thought of him came to her now, and the longing to hear his voice, to see his frank, handsome face again. Poor Larry! he would be sorry indeed when he heard of the death, for he was the son of an old friend of Mr. Compton's and had spent all his college vacations in the house. There had been no love passages between the young people, but they had found each other bright and companionable, and Berry thought of her friend now with an aching heart.

The hour tolled very soon.

"The funeral train, like a Gulf stream bound
Through the ocean of life that was surging around;
Slowly it moved, as the wreck it bore,
Where the gravestones pebble the churchyard shore," and there they left the precious burden to wait the summons of the resurrection morn.

A few friends came back to the house. There were Mr. Graham and his assistant, young Mr. Webster, whom Berry knew very well, as they had transacted her guardian's law business; there were the clergyman and one or two very distant relatives of the deceased. Mrs. Lonsdale took it upon herself to do the honors, while Berry sank into a chair by a distant window.

"We have assembled here for the reading of the will," said Mr. Graham; "but we have yet to prove the existence of any will." I have never drawn up such a paper, but, then, the deceased has only transacted law business with me for a year or so. Miss Pollard informed me that a will was certainly made over two years ago, and that it was kept in the safe in her guardian's library, but we have searched and find nothing there. She also states that he had there two thousand dollars in Government bonds, of which he spoke to her about a week ago. The mystery is, Where have the will and bonds gone? No one has had the key of that safe except Miss Pollard and the deceased."

Berry looked agitated. She had not heard before that the will was missing. Mrs. Lonsdale gave her a sinister glance as though she expected to see her convicted on the spot.

"Berenice," she said, sternly, in her judicial character again, "what have you got to say for yourself?"

"I do not see that I am called upon to say anything," the young girl answered, with a bright flush. "Even malice cannot attribute the loss of the will to me when I state that it was made in my favor and left everything to me. It is evidently to my interest that it should be found."

Mrs. Lonsdale winced a little, but returned gallantly to the charge.

"Ah, that is your statement. Now you know we cannot take that entirely unsupported. I cannot believe that my poor, dear brother, infatuated as he was, could have——"

"Pardon me," interrupted Mr. Graham, "any recrimination is eminently out of place here. There is nothing at present to act upon until further developments. Until the will is found the next of kin are in possession, so Mrs. Lonsdale I have to congratulate you, and to recommend to your kindly consideration our young friend here, for whom we may be sure our deceased friend would have provided had he not been suddenly struck down. I know this much, that I had inferred from some casual remark that he had made provision for her, or I would have urged it upon him."

The lines about Mrs. Lonsdale's mouth tightened, but she merely bowed. It was no one's business what she intended doing, and she did not propose making it known just then. Berry's eyes kindled with a mutinous light, and she looked so charming that young Mr. Webster, who had lost his heart long ago, sat with his round pale blue orbs fixed upon her with an adoring glance.

Mr. Graham was bowing his adieus before his assistant came out of his reverie, and, crossing the room with an awkwardness that he always felt in managing his very long legs, he contrived to say, "Very sorry, 'pon my word, Miss Berry, and mother's quite cut up; couldn't get to the funeral, poor old lady, but she sends you this with her love, and she hopes, and I hope, you'll think it over and be agreeable to it."

Berry shook hands with the young man in a friendly manner when he had fished his mother's note out of his pocket. She had a very kindly feeling for old Mrs. Webster, who was a plain, illiterate woman, with a tender heart and a motherly manner that had quite won poor motherless little Berry. She had a certain respect for the lank, awkward son who had made his own way in the world, and was as rough and unfinished as self-made men are apt to be who have had no time to polish themselves. The tears came into her eyes now as she read the ill-written lines:

"MY POOR, DEAR GIRL.—Only for the skyatliker a-grindin' my old bones I would be at the funeral to-day, and give you my support in this tryin' hour as must come to all, an' the mortial lot in this pilgrim's progress of a vale. But, my lovey, come and stay a little with your old friend, for I know the first sight of all the familiar things is very painful to a feelin' heart—for he loved you tender and was a father to you; so till the blow is softened make up your mind to stay with me and a little pettin' will do you good—and I'm dying for something to pet—cats is well enough, but a treacherous animal, as you never know where to take 'em. Now, my deary, I won't take No for an answer, and John Henry hopes the same, and 'twill be a regular cure to the skyatliker to see your pretty face. Your loving friend, HANNAH WEBSTER."

Berry sat in the room her dear guardian had taken so much pleasure in making pretty for her sake as she read this letter over, and a warmer throb filled her heart, into which a deathly chill seemed to have settled. It was something to have the affection of even this poor old woman, and a shelter offered her at this time, for she knew that she must leave the dear old home very soon. She had not misinterpreted the hard lines about Mrs. Lonsdale's mouth or the wintry gleam of her eye. Even at that moment she heard Medora say as they passed through the hall:

"You ought to see that minx's room, mamma, fitted up like a princess's boudoir in the loveliest pale blue and silver and Japanese knickknacks."

"Well, my love, then the color will just suit your golden hair! But what a singular delusion that girl has about the will—to call it by no harder name!" and then the voices died away.

A delusion! Berry passed her hand over her forehead that she might think clearly. How different it would all be if that will could be found! Had she dreamed of the morning when her guardian, in taking a note from the safe, said to her, "My dear, there is a paper that secures everything to you. I am mindful of the changes and chances of this mortal life." And she had felt a sudden pang, and put her hand over the dear old man's lips. She could not bear to hear him talk of change and death. He had seen the quick tears spring to her eyes, and so he had never mentioned the subject again. Now she was houseless and friendless, save for poor Mrs. Webster's kindly love. Even Larry had not written to her. It was well that Berry dispatched her acceptance of Mrs. Webster's invitation at once, for Mrs. Lonsdale did not give her a long breathing spell.

"Of course, Miss Pollard," that lady said, in her hardest tone, the next morning, "you will not expect to be my guest for any length of time. I was always opposed to my brother's course in regard to you; at the same time I am willing to assist you in getting a position as companion or nursery governess. Indeed, I have a friend with six children who has been looking out, but I hesitated about your quick temper. You have a very quick temper, you know, Miss Pollard. I tell you plain truths for your own good!"

"Thank you," exclaimed Berry. "I shall manage for myself, and relieve you of my presence at once."

"I do not object to your taking the gifts of my poor, deluded brother, though in your position jewelry is in bad taste, and he never gave my sweet Medora even a ring. Still I am magnanimous. You may take all that may be termed your belongings. And I hope you will lay this sudden downfall to heart as a lesson. 'Pride goeth before destruction and a haughty spirit before a fall,' and I must say you showed a very haughty spirit to me at my last visit!"

Berry could not trust herself to speak—there was a mist before her eyes.

"And one word more I must say for your own good," added Mrs. Lonsdale. "As you are going among strangers, it would best to say as little as possible on that singular delusion of yours about a will. Mr. Graham has been making inquiries, and he assures me there is no evidence to be found, not the slightest, except your word, and you know in some cases the wish is father to the thought, and you must naturally have wished——"

"Mrs. Lonsdale!" exclaimed Berry, her eyes flashing through her tears; "if you have sufficiently insulted me, I will go."

The elder lady bit her lips, then bowed coldly, and Berry hurried away, too indignant to feel all the sorrow of leaving the pleasant places that might know her no more. She only gave one quick glance at the pretty blue boudoir, and, with a mute farewell and a terrible heartache, went down the stairs, "for the last time," as she said softly to herself.

But some one stepped out of the parlor as she was passing, and she glanced up into John Webster's freckled face.

"I have come for you," he stammered, "with a—a carriage. You know, mother told me the hour, and I—I took the liberty."

"It is very, very kind!" exclaimed Berry, and she felt quite touched. She had always taken the man's attentions rather impatiently, but now, in her forlorn state, she grew friendly. She could not afford to alight him now or to criticise his manner.

"Mother has been fussing about all day; she has quite forgotten her pains in getting ready for you. She's as proud as if the Queen was coming."

"I'm a poor dethroned queen," said Berry, mournfully.

"No, no! you mustn't say that. You don't look it," said the young man, beaming on her quite refulgently. "You will be queen yet—in—some hearts, I am sure."

He finished the sentence rather awkwardly. He had not intended to make the "hearts" plural, but had suddenly found his courage fail. After all, this was not the time for love-making. He was obtuse, but he could see that; and, besides, the girl was going to stay in his own house.

"Plenty of chances!" he chuckled. How fortune had played into his hands, to be sure.

Old Mrs. Webster stood at the little garden-gate to receive them. She was a sweet, placid-looking old woman, with a plain, white cap upon her silver hair, and beaming eyes, in which age had not extinguished the kindly light. She was stout and comfortable and cheery. The frost had not got into her heart or temper, and all her sympathy went out to the young thing in such deep mourning, who stepped so languidly forward to meet her.

John Henry went reluctantly back to his law office, and saw for the rest of the afternoon, as a spontaneous embellishment to his dry law papers, nothing but a sweet face—pale as a snowdrop at times, then flushing like a sweet, wild rose—and a pair of eloquent brown eyes lifted to his face with a charming look of gratitude.

Strange to say, this face—lovely as the sight was, and delightful to his memory—brought with it pain as well as pleasure—a pain that made him wretched, that stung like a serpent, that rankled like a poisoned arrow.

While John Henry was writhing in mingled bliss and pain, his mother was showing Berry her room, and clasping the poor girl in her motherly arms and showering loving words upon her till the bruised heart seemed once again to find a balm.

"'Tain't much to look at, and a wishin' it was better for your sake, my lovey. John 'Ennery is but a risin' young man, as you know, and we can't do everything in a day, as Rome wasn't built, you know; but as good a son as ever lived and a model of his sect, which I must say it as shouldn't perhaps; but who should, then, as no one could know so well?—not drinkin' and rantin' and wastin' his money, but keepin' it all for the poor old mother and his home. An' he'll rise, John 'Ennery will, for he's got intelleck into him. They tell me he's a genus, but I know he's a good son and that's better—now isn't it, dearie?"

Berry glanced at the pretty room, with its snow-white curtains and quaint blue punch-bowl on the centre-table, full of creamy, sweet roses, and the home-like feeling of the place and the old lady's tenderness went right to her heart.

After a little cry on Mrs. Webster's shoulder, she took courage, bathed her face, showed an interest in all the household belongings, and even in the voluminous accounts of John 'Ennery's perfections, from the cutting of his first tooth, till the old lady vowed she felt to her as if she were her daughter—"a daughter of the house."

And Berry seemed so entirely cut off from her old life that she might almost have imagined the past a dream—a delusion, as Mrs. Lonsdale had been so fond of styling her belief in the will. She did not hear from Larry—she seemed to belong to no one but this old woman who petted her and this awkward man who adored her.

Yes, she could not be blind to the adoration very long, and she could not doubt its genuineness. For she was again a poor waif with a claim on no one. She had not been systematic in her lessons enough to make a governess, she was not quick enough with her needle to make a seamstress, and so what had the future to give her? Why not take this good man and make him happy? Well, there was something in her inmost being that revolted against him for all his disinterested love. Berry always felt a cold shiver when she met the adoring glance of his pale eye, and when his cold, damp hand—his hand always was cold and damp—touched her own, it was exactly as if something slimy like a leech had crawled over it.

"But—but you will think of it," he urged, after he had summoned courage for a formal declaration one day, "and I will wait, oh, so patiently. I am to have a holiday to-morrow, wouldn't it be pleasant to make a little excursion, say to the seashore for a breath of the salt air; you are very, very pale, Miss Berry."

Berry agreed to the excursion. She felt glad of a respite, and that she need not be left entirely to herself to brood over this strange proposal which she had tried to ward off for days. She had seen it threatening; it had darkened her skies for some time, and now it had come—the storm had burst!

Mrs. Webster was quite rejoiced over the trip. Holidays were rare with John 'Ennery, and so they were very precious. She gave Berry an account of how he had spent the few holidays of his life (in a minute manner), "and always a generous boy, a-givin' his last piece of gingerbread to blind men and sich, generally bogus, my dear, and winkin' wickedly at havin' come it over the innocent young fellow."

So they started off in the bright morning in very good spirits. Even to Berry the change was exhilarating when they left the cars and took the gallant little steamer, and the crisp waves curled about them, the wheel sending flashes of white foam that fell back on the sparkling water in creamy fragments, the sun kindling a light in the deepest waves and making a shining path over them; the clear blue sky with its white clouds like "argosies of magic sails," the distant green shore—all filled Berry's heart with a strange delight, and she felt more and more grateful to the originator of the pleasure plan.

The young girl tried to dismiss from her mind the fact that she must soon give an answer to the weightiest question of her life, although John Henry hovered over her like some huge bird. It seemed as if she could never get out of his shadow; and now and then, when he got a chance, he would murmur, "You are turning it over in your mind, ain't you?" till it was exactly as if a thorn was continually pricking her.

Digitized by Google

"Great inwention them steam bilers," began old Mrs. Webster, philosophically. "However people did without 'em I don't know. Seems like a miracle when we read in the Scriptures about folks a-walkin' on the water, but that's what we're a-doin' now."

At that moment a thunderous burst of sound filled the air, and then, with the shuddering echoes of the sound, a burst of fire. The flames ran up the ornamented woodwork like nimble fiends, devouring as they sped, and then throwing out red banners of triumph on the air. From a gala scene of holiday mirth, all was suddenly changed. Cries, shrieks, prayers and curses were mingled.

"God help me! I cannot swim—I can do nothing to save you!" moaned John Henry, looking at Berry with frightened eyes.

"Oh, I am a good swimmer. I can help myself, but get life-preservers for yourself and mother," exclaimed Berry. "See! the captain will run the boat ashore!"

The captain was indeed making for the nearest shore, standing at the wheel with the flames blowing in his face. Some were plunging into the water, others lowering a lifeboat, others clinging to one another and refusing to move.

In the confusion Berry lost her companions. She looked about for them, but they were not to be seen. She was a good swimmer, but five minutes after she dropped into the water some floating object struck her forehead, and in a moment all grew dark; the rushing of mighty waters filled her ears, and she knew no more.

But it was not meant that Berry's history should be cut short by such an untimely fate. She opened her eyes about three hours after, and found herself lying on a rude settee very comfortable and well, save for a little confusion about the head. An old woman was tending her.

"Where's——" she began.

"Oh, they're saved, honey," said the old woman, bent on comforting her, and, of course, not knowing in the least whom she meant. "There's a lot more in the next room; they're a bringin' 'em to—here's some of their clothes."

Berry jumped up and examined the pile of garments that lay about. She was quite relieved when she saw John Henry's pepper-and-salt coat. He would be such a loss to his mother.

Still, there might be a mistake. She put her hand in the pockets, one after another, to see if there was a card or letter to make the matter sure. Ah! what was this? A thick folded paper that fell from its oil-silk wrapper. "Last Will and Testament of Abram Compton!"

She stood holding the paper when John Henry staggered forward.

"My God!" he said, as he looked at her and it, and then he dropped like a log.

So Berry never needed to answer the suit of the wretched man who groveled at her feet while he told the story of his sudden temptation and crime. How Mr. Compton had come in with the will—which had been drawn up by Mr. Grantly, who had died a couple of years ago—to see Mr. Graham about some alteration; had left it, purposing to call the next morning. How he had not dreamed of treachery till he heard of the sudden death. How his love for Berry had prompted the deception. If she were poor and friendless he might have a chance, and then it would be easy to discover the will afterwards, and, oh, would she have mercy and not ruin his life and break his mother's heart."

Berry could not choose but have mercy when she saw Mrs. Webster's kind cheery face again. Rather would she lose the fortune than wring that gentle trusting heart. So the good old lady went on to the end believing that John 'Ennery was one of the elect; but Mrs. Lonsdale was awakened from her short dream of bliss, and found, alas! that Berry's delusion had proved a veritable fact.

And, of course, the true prince came back from wandering over cattle ranches where the mails had not reached him, and all went merry as a marriage-bell

THE CYCLONE IN JAMAICA.

THE cyclone which swept over the island of Jamaica on the 15th of August was one of the most destructive ever experienced in Southern latitudes. Reports from points all over the island tell the same sad story—coffee plantations utterly destroyed and in cocoanut groves thousands of nuts fell like so many corn-stalks. At Morant Bay houses were torn from their foundations and broken like matches by the wind; canes everywhere were flattened on the ground. At Lawrence Tavern all the churches, chapels and houses were blown down. At St. Ann's Bay nearly every building sustained some damage. The Post-office narrowly escaped falling cocoanut-trees. Roads were blocked upon all sides by huge trees and rubbish. All telegraph lines were interrupted. In six hours there the barometer fell from 29.80 to 29.36. Reports from St. James are that nearly all the houses have been laid to the ground and covered up with trees and earth. At St. Johns more than forty settlers lost their lives, and in St. Johns district there was general devastation. In the August Hill district, tamana cultivation is ruined, and there are no mangoes, no yams, no pears to be seen. Cane fields and coffee plantations suffered also, and it is feared that the people have little or no food. At New Castle, out of eighty houses some twenty were leveled to the ground, and the wreckage was swept clean from the mountain side.

At Kingston the force of the cyclone was terrific. Of forty-five vessels lying in the harbor only two escaped damage or destruction. Every wharf was more or less injured. The Government wharf, as shown in our illustration, was totally destroyed. Small houses along the shore were utterly demolished by the storm, the sea covering gardens and depositing floating timbers, ships' masts and logs of wood in the heart of the city, while larger buildings were either thrown down altogether, or roofs blown off, windows blown in, or verandas torn away. Everywhere huge trees were uprooted and the streets covered with débris.

All along the coast from Kingston to Holland Bay the destruction was awful and the loss beyond computation. The papers state that thieves everywhere, availing themselves of the defenseless state of the people, are stealing at leisure. It is estimated that the island has been put back in development about two years, and it is feared that the poorer classes have an era of suffering before them. The planters are left with shattered and destroyed crops, and the fishermen have had their houses blown away and their smacks sunk. At the markets in the towns persons come with empty hands, and traffic is limited to an interchange of stories which are sobbingly told. There is literally no business going on anywhere except the work of restoring to some sort of shape the distorted and shattered dwellings and wrecked edifices. In many of the towns the government offices and buildings suffered much, and the clerks are unable to transact business. In short, the wail which has come from Jamaica through the newspapers is one of genuine and profound distress.

THE WATER-MELON TRADE IN NEW YORK.

THE water-melon season may be said to be at its height, and never did the red-fleshed melons "boom" as they have during the past two months. Within a comparatively recent date New York has become the market for Southern fruits. In the Winter season the boats are taken up with oysters, followed by Southern Irish potatoes in the early Summer, and then come the water-melons, to be relieved by sweet potatoes. The water-melon season begins on the 1st of July and lasts until the frost. The number of water-melons brought into New York is something enormous. The sales of the leading firms in the trade average $1,000 a week each, at prices varying from ten to thirty cents for prime melons, according to size and condition. Florida sends the first melons, which bring about a dollar a piece. Georgia follows, then comes Charleston, S. C., and as the season advances they are sent in from Moorhead City, N. C., by way of Cape Lookout, from Powell's Point, N. C., through the canal and sound, making the sea by Cape Hatteras. The Norfolk fruit is carried by the Old Dominion line of steamships, and from other places by schooners. Maryland sends us magnificent melons, Nanticoke carrying off the palm. As many as thirty schooners a day arrive, and our illustration represents the boat at the dock, the handling of the melons, the retail dealer who sells them in slices, and the tramps and others who await the tossing aside of melons that have spoiled en route.

BURNING OF MANHATTAN MARKET.

THE Manhattan Market, which occupies the entire block bounded by Eleventh and Twelfth Avenues, Thirty-fourth and Thirty-fifth Streets, in this city, was destroyed by fire on the night of September 8th. The building, erected in 1872, was mainly of iron and glass, and was 800x200 feet and cost $1,500,000. In design it was picturesque, and it has been often styled as the finest and largest market in the world. Its dome-shaped roof, with a clock tower 200 feet high, covered an area of 160,000 square feet. There were twenty main entrances, five on each side, and the interior was divided into three sections. The west end was used for an abattoir, the middle section as a wholesale department and the front end for the general market. Space was allotted for 800 stands admirably arranged in lines running parallel with the length of the building. The avenues thus formed were grouped with a view to classify the branch of trade of which they are a part. Butter, cheese and eggs were sold on Dairy Avenue. Produce Avenue was devoted to the sale of garden truck. Butchers sold meat on Washington Avenue, while fish could only be purchased on Fulton Avenue, and groceries and tea on Grocers' and Oriental Avenues. The abattoir had facilities for slaughtering 1,000 head of cattle a day.

The fire was discovered about midnight. An immediate alarm was given, but the flames had already made great headway, and extended through the cooperage along the beams of the building. Before the engines arrived the roof was all ablaze. The flames mounted up the many pinnacles that adorned the roof, and made a scene of grandeur such as has not been witnessed in the city for many years. The western side of the city was made as light as day by the glare. Multitudes of persons flocked to the scene of the fire, and were kept out of danger with great difficulty by the police.

The roof and part of the sides of the market were made of material which burned like tinder, and as the cinders fell into the interior all the stands on the broad floor were set ablaze. The firemen made their way into the building at one time, but they were driven out again by the intense heat which prevailed there. As the roof and sides of the building were consumed, the iron framework was laid bare. The wind drove showers of sparks across Thirty-fourth Street, and set on fire a long row of buildings known as the "Haymarket." These the firemen struggled in vain to save. Several contiguous stores were at one time threatened, but escaped destruction through the efforts of the fire department.

The total loss is stated at about $1,000,000. About the only property saved in the Market and adjacent buildings were the books and papers of the firms having Herring's safes, several of which have been taken out of the ruins intact. The fire is believed to have been of incendiary origin.

Superstitions about Thunder.

ALMOST all the tribes in the United States believed the thunder to be produced by the wings of a great bird, and that the lightning was the serpents that were invariably connected with the thunder-bird. Among the ancient tribes of the Mississippi Valley the thunder, therefore, soon became a thunder-god, who could be propitiated with sacrifices. The Illinois Indians offered up a small dog when a child happened to be sick upon a day when there was much thunder, supposing the latter to be a cause of the malady. Many accidents, like conflagrations, were attributed to this angry god, and some tribes did bloody penances of propitiation, often burning to death their own children. Statements that the Indians adored the thunder, however, seem to be erroneous. It was the cause of the thunder that they worshiped, and before which they burned tobacco and buffalo meat, or cut off the joints of their fingers, or threw their children into the fire when they were overcome with fear. The Peruvians had as an ideal a stone that had been split by the lightning. They offered it gold and silver. The natives of Honduras burned cotton seed when it thundered. Other southern tribes made no sacrifices on the approach of a storm, but abased themselves in the most abject fear. The wild rice, being aquatic and looking like an arrow or spear, it is also attributed to the thunder-spirit as its origin. In Mexico great temples were built upon the sacred spots where lightning had struck. A curious notion among Peruvians was that the preserved bodies of twin Peruvians who died in infancy should be worshiped, children who died in infancy should be worshiped, supposing that one of them was the son of the thunder, the origin of the idea being the fact that the thunder-god of that people was one of the celestial twins of Apocatequin and Piquerad. This tradition was utilized by Pizarro's missionaries to teach the Indians the doctrine of the Trinity.

The Cost in Men in the Afghan War.

A RETURN has been made to the House of Commons of the numbers killed or dead of disease or invalided in each of the three armies operating beyond the Indus in the late campaign in Afghanistan (1878-79), from the date of the advance beyond the British frontier into the Khyber Pass up to the return across the Indus of the regiments ordered back at the close of the operations in the field. The abstract shows that eight Europeans and two native officers were killed in action and two European officers died of their wounds; 14 European and 21 native officers died of disease; 62 European and 43 native officers were invalided. Total casualities among officers—Europeans, 86; natives, 66. Among the British troops 17 men were killed in action, 3 died of their wounds, 315 of disease, and 1,176 were invalided—total, 1,511. Among the native troops 75 were killed in action, 23 died of their wounds, 1,129 of disease, and 1,586 were invalided—total, 2,813. The grand total of casualties among men was thus 4,324: including officers too, 4,476.

Subsidies in Brazil.

THE Legislature of Brazil is taking up the question of subsidies to railways and steamships with great animation. It is asserted that the subsidies granted by the Imperial Government and by the various provincial governments amount to not less than $15,000,000 a year, a large part of which sum is paid out, according to a leading Brazilian deputy, for opening up "not a service of transportation but a service of interest on the public debt." The subsidy of the American steamship company has been suspended, though it is urged that this is a breach of faith on the part of the Brazilian Government, and a Bill granting exemption from duties on the building materials to be used in a proposed edifice for the exhibition of American products was thrown out at the third reading on the 10th of August.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

Opening of the Palace of Fine Arts, Brussels.

The Palace of Fine Arts in Brussels was opened with considerable pomp and ceremony upon the 1st of August last. The building is exactly as to the purposes of art, the light being carefully and judiciously let down through tempered glass. The open halls, with their superb galleries, afford charming opportunities for inspecting the varied art creations; while the lower floor, with its shrubs, flowers and statuary, is a veritable "thing of beauty." Here high art can revel, and while the best works of the fine old Flemish masters now occupy the walls, the easel of young Belgium is rapidly turning out "crait bits" which win respect from the connoisseur.

Memorial Arch at Brussels.

Brussels is a miniature Paris. She is bright and glittering, but petite. She has her old town—so old!—with its wondrous Hotel de Ville, and the quaintest of all fountains, the Mannikin; and she has her new town, all wide streets and boulevards and parks, and plate glass and gilding. She needs must have an Exposition and a Memorial Arch of Triumph, the latter being admirable both in design and execution.

The New Post Office, Paris.

The ramshackle old building in the Rue Jean-Jacques Rousseau, which every traveling American knows to be disconsolate, is about to yield up its ghost, and the new post-office to rise Phœnix-like from its ashes. The history of the old hotel would fill a volume, and could its walls but speak there would be excellent food for the historian, the scandal monger and the gossip. The new building will be constructed on the most approved plan, and finished with all the newest improvements as regards the machinery for the distribution of the thoughts of the whole world. As a matter of necessity the Parisians take a wrinkle or two from us, to which they are thoroughly welcome.

Exhibition of the "Vega's" Collection at Stockholm.

Sweden is coming out strong. Though so very far north, she is making wondrous strides in refined civilization, and her latest effort—the Vega's collection at Stockholm—redounds immensely to her credit. From the skeleton of a mammoth antediluvian, to the warm attire of a modern Laplander, from the sword worn by Gustavus Adolphus, when he "fighting fell," to the shoes of Thorwaldsen, the exhibition is unique, special, and replete with interest. Stockholm is proud, as well she may be.

The Isandula Colors of the Twenty-fourth Regiment at Osborne.

The gallant exploit of Lieutenants Melville and Coghill, who died while endeavoring to save the colors of the Twenty-fourth Regiment after the disaster of Isandula, on January 22d, 1879, is too well known to need a detailed repetition here. Suffice it to say that, after crossing the River Tugela with the Queen's colors, the young officers were shot down, and died bravely, revolver in hand, their pursuers being unable to gain possession of their precious charge. Their memories have been honored alike by their comrades, their country and their sovereign, who bestowed on them after death the highest distinction (or valor in her power—the Victoria Cross. Their bodies, it may be remembered, were found a week afterwards, close to each other, and a few days subsequently the colors were discovered lying in the River Tugela. On the arrival of the colors in England the Queen naturally expressed a wish to see them, and on the 28th ult. they were taken to Osborne by Lieutenants Weallens and Phipps, with color guard. Her Majesty and the Princess Beatrice received the officers in the corridor, and the Queen tied a small wreath of immortelles to the head of the recovered colors as a mark of her deep sense of the heroism of the two young officers who gave their lives to save them. Her Majesty also spoke a few kind words to the officers in charge of the bravery of the regiment and the circumstances attending the terrible disaster of Isandula.

Famine in Western Asia.

The terrible distress prevailing in the Turkish provinces of Armenia and Kurdistan and in the adjacent parts of Persia towards the Caspian, during the past six months, has been reported by many consular and other agents of the British Government. The heavy rains of harvest time last year, which destroyed both the grain and the grapes, followed by the drought of last Summer and the death of large numbers of cattle and sheep, were the combined causes of the famine in Mesopotamia and in the highlands north of that country. The illustration of the poor people assembled outside a relief-kitchen is from a sketch taken at Bitlis, in Kurdistan—an ancient town situated in the mountains near Lake Van. Here the famine is severely felt, and the soup kitchen was established in the city by the Rev. S. K. Knapp, an American missionary with funds given him for that purpose by the English Consul.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

—NEGROES, either free or foreign subjects, have been forbidden to land in Cuba.

—IT is said that the storm which recently swept over Florida almost entirely destroyed the orange crop of the State.

—NEGRO jurors were chosen on the grand and petit juries at Louisville, Ky., for the first time on September 6th.

—THE strike of Lancashire weavers has not influenced the Manchester market. It is thought the masters will organize a lockout.

—RUSSIA looks coldly upon the idea of a greater Bulgaria, and it is thought she does not desire to have the Eastern question reopened just now.

—A CIRCULAR of the National Cotton Exchange of America, issued at New Orleans, shows a total crop for the commercial year ended August 31st, 1880, of 5,760,161 bales.

—THE Eighth Cincinnati Industrial Exposition opened on the 8th instant. The bells of the city were rung, and there were other manifestations of popular sympathy with the enterprise.

—THE first stone of the Temple Bar memorial has been laid in London. It will be thirty-seven feet high, and in the niches will be life-size marble figures of the Queen and Prince of Wales.

—CERTAIN districts in India are again threatened with famine. The situation causes great anxiety, though it is too soon to give way to a panic, as a good rain during September would avert the possibility of an actual dearth.

—THE British trade returns for the month of August show that the value of imports was $155,000,000, against $141,500,000 for the same month last year, and the value of exports $93,500,000, against $86,500,000 for the same month last year.

—THE New England Fair, held at Worcester last week, was a great success. On the third day 30,000 people were present, including Vice-President Wheeler and other distinguished guests. A banquet was given by the city government in honor of the Vice-President.

—INFORMATION received from several counties in Virginia says that the recent heavy damage to the tobacco crop was caused by tobacco worms early in the season and the great damage resulting from the heavy rains. It is feared the cotton crop is somewhat injured by the heavy rains.

—THE Spanish Minister of Foreign Affairs has sent a memorandum to the Spanish Minister at Washington, setting forth a basis for a future treaty of commerce or simple convention with the United States, applicable to the most important articles of commerce between Cuba and the United States.

—GREAT preparations are making for the reception of the Emperor and the whole Court at Cologne on the 15th of October for the official opening of the Cathedral. The festivities promise to be very grand, and will last for three days. The occasion is regarded throughout Germany as an important national fête.

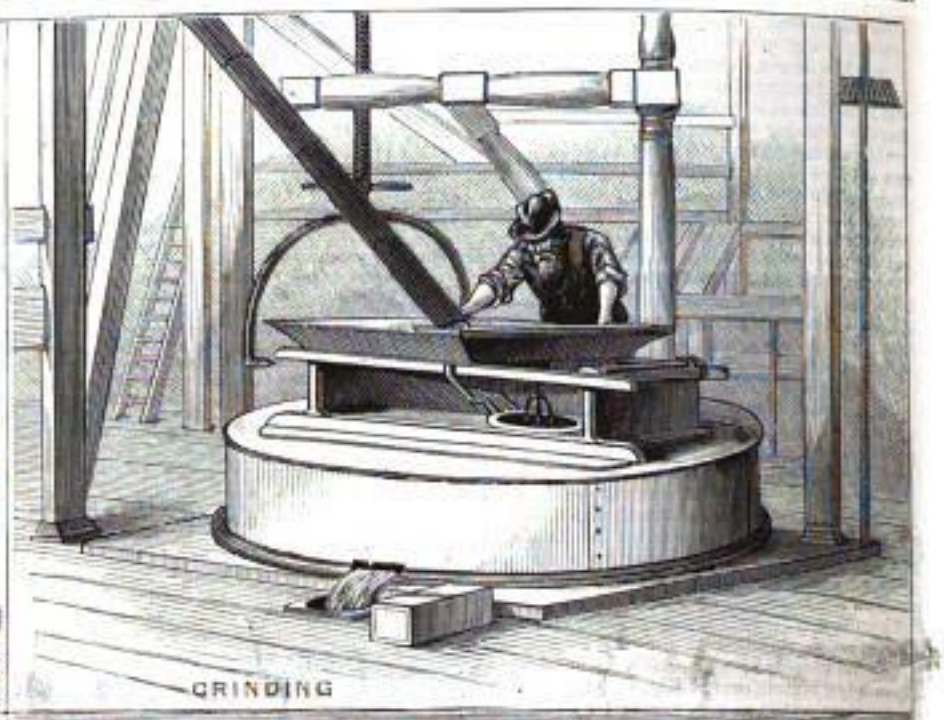
—THE Herald publishes a table of census returns, partly official and partly estimated, which makes the total population of the country about 50,000,000, an increase of 11,700,000, or a trifle more than thirty per cent. since the census of 1870. This is a satisfactory showing, which the official figures will not essentially change.

—THE town of Kempen, near Crefeld, in the Rhineland, purposes celebrating next October the five hundredth anniversary of one of its sons, whose name is known in every part of the world. At Kempen, in the year 1380, was born Thomas Hamerken, the author of a book which, after the Bible, has seen more editions than any other book, viz., "The Following of Christ."

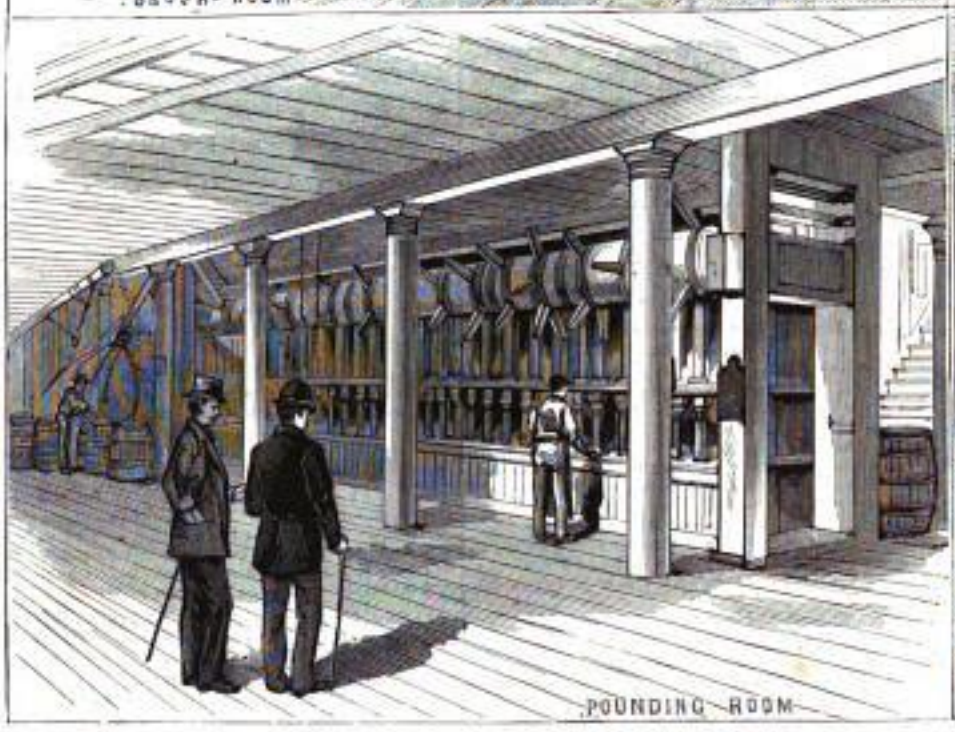
—THE Fall session of Princeton College began September 8th. In an address to the students, President McCosh said that the committee appointed to examine into the sanitary state of the college have reported that the buildings are now in a thoroughly satisfactory condition. There have been 181 applicants for admission into all departments of the college. This is fully up to the average number. Edwards Hall, the new dormitory, has been finished during vacation, and is being occupied.

—IT appears that in manufactures England at present stands pre-eminent. Its operatives number 2,930,000, against 2,781,000 of Germany, and 1,936,000 of France, and 1,150,000 of Russia. The production per operative is given as—United Kingdom, $1,120; France, $1,100, Germany, $515. In the principal textile manufactures, cotton and wool, the United Kingdom produces a total of the value of $775,000,000; the United States, $420,000,000; France, $340,000,000, and Germany, $240,000,000.

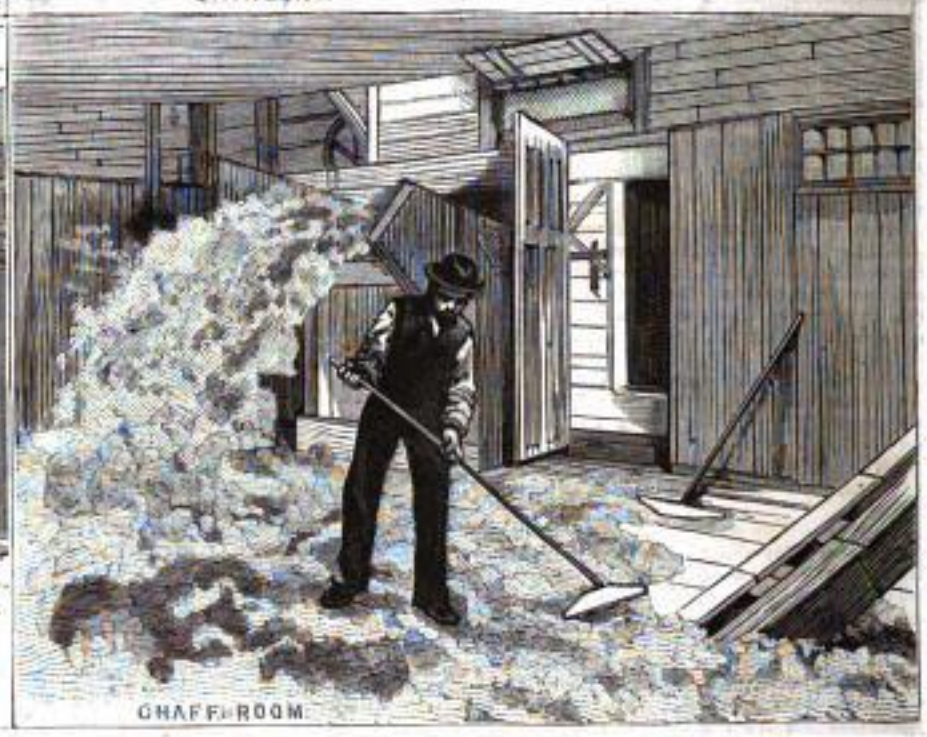
—THE review of the year's business at the port of Savannah, prepared by the News of that city, shows a state of prosperity which calls for hearty congratulations. The general range of prices of cotton was much better than during the preceding year and decided progress was made in receipts and shipments. Naval stores and lumber are also in a flourishing condition, and great hopes of Savannah becoming a great grain outport are cherished by means of railway combinations and the prospective building of a great elevator.



—ACCORDING to a recent report, there are in Russia, besides the cathedrals, about 85,000 churches, of which 30,000 are parish churches. The services are carried on by 37,718 priests and 11,837 deacons; there are 65,951 lay church servants, such as sextons, etc. The State contributes to the support of 17,687 churches (a little more than half of the whole number) the annual sum of 4,384,312 rubles (about $3,285,800). The total amount contributed by the State for maintaining churches in Russia is about 5,109,020 rubles (about $3,900,000).

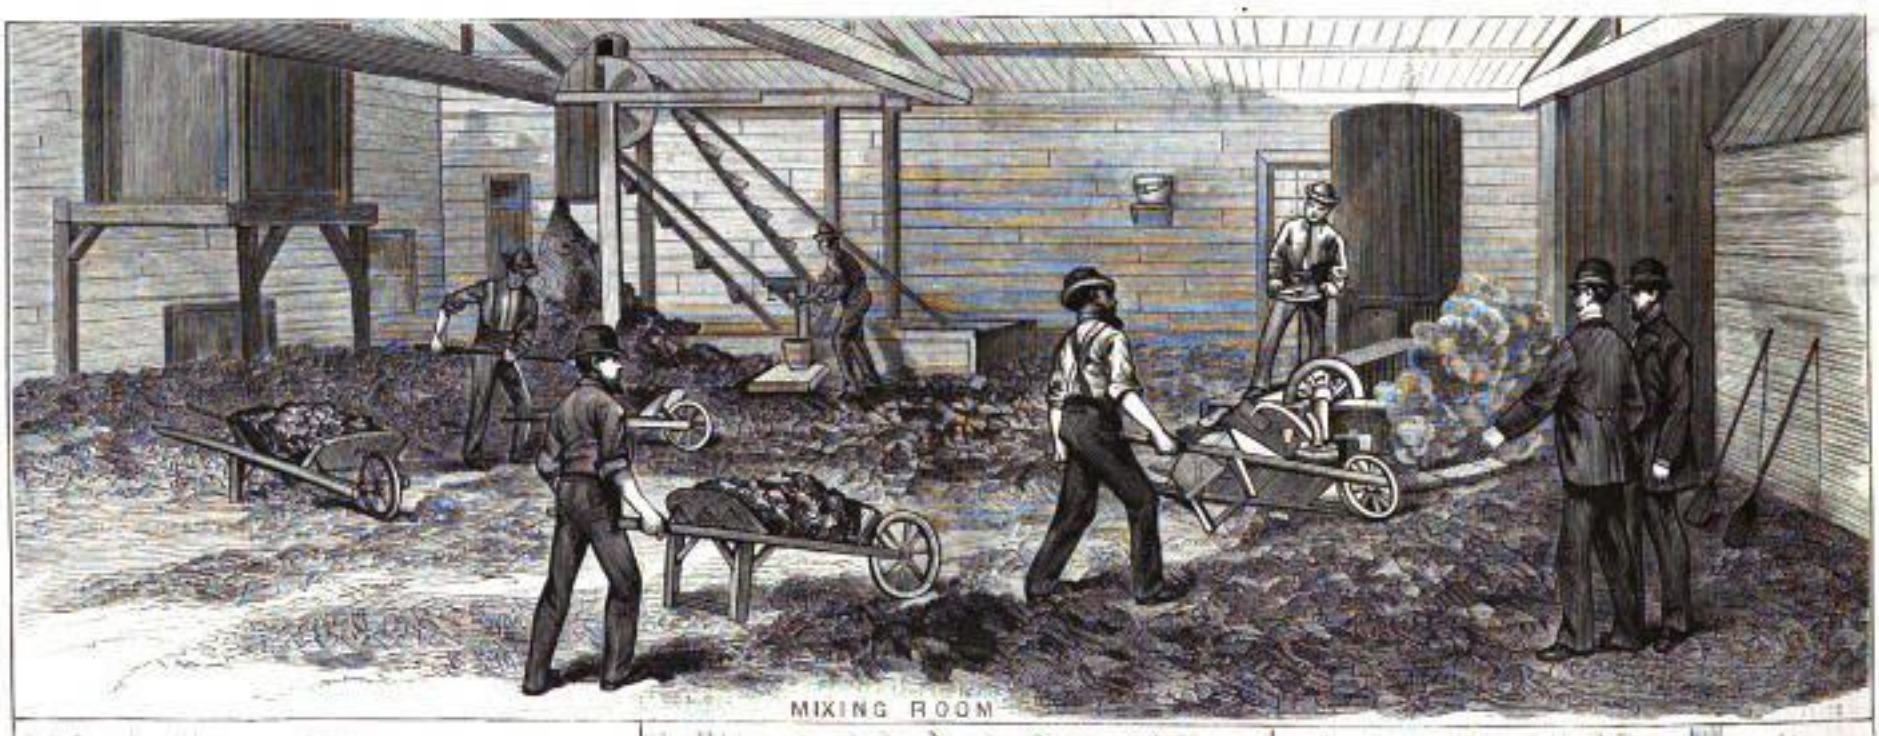


—THE boring for the Arlberg Tunnel is actively in progress on the Austrian side of the mountain, and will soon begin on the Swiss side. This tunnel project ranks only after the Mount Cenis and Mount St. Gothard Tunnels, among great modern engineering works of its class in Europe. The object of the proposed line is to shorten the distance between Western Austria and Eastern Switzerland, create a direct traffic between the two countries, and render them independent of the South German railways, over which it is now conducted. A further advantage will be to enable the Austrian and Hungarian breadstuffs to compete in Switzerland and Eastern France with corn coming from Russia by way of Genoa and the Gothard Railway.

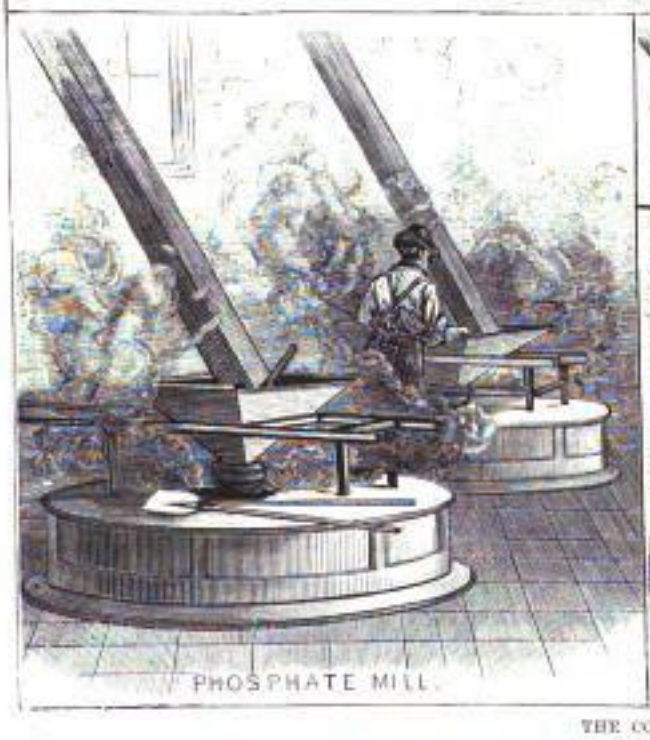


—THE Ohio tramp law seems to have been remarkably successful. Three years ago farmhouses that for a quarter of a century had never seen a lock or key had to be bolted at every door, and their windows securely fastened at night. Tramps were everywhere, and no farmer's wife was safe alone for moment. The Cleveland Herald says all this has been changed in the rural regions, and one used to city ways and city evils can scarcely persuade him all to go to sleep with the doors unbolted and windows on the ground floor wide open. Of course a portion of this change is due to the increase of prosperity, but the larger portion flows from the tramp law; for these same genius of the road are heard from in States where no such law is in existence.

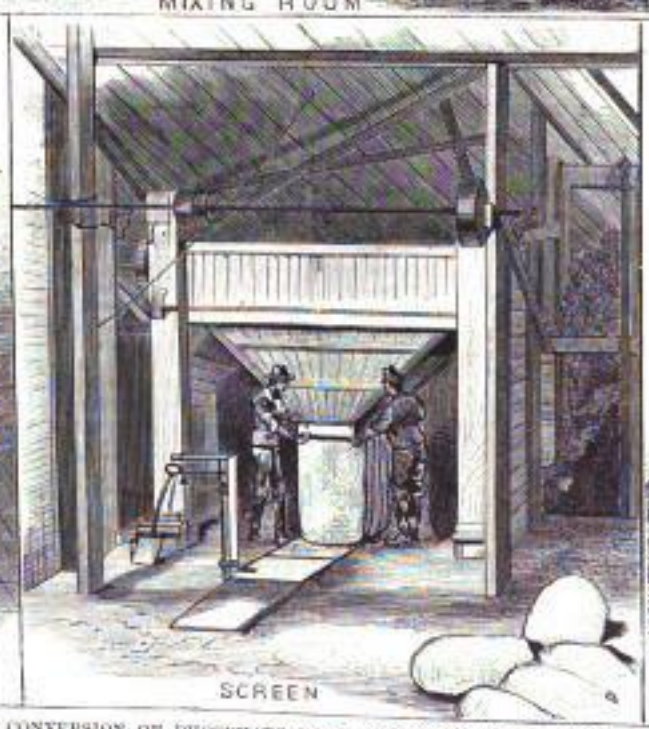
Digitized by Google



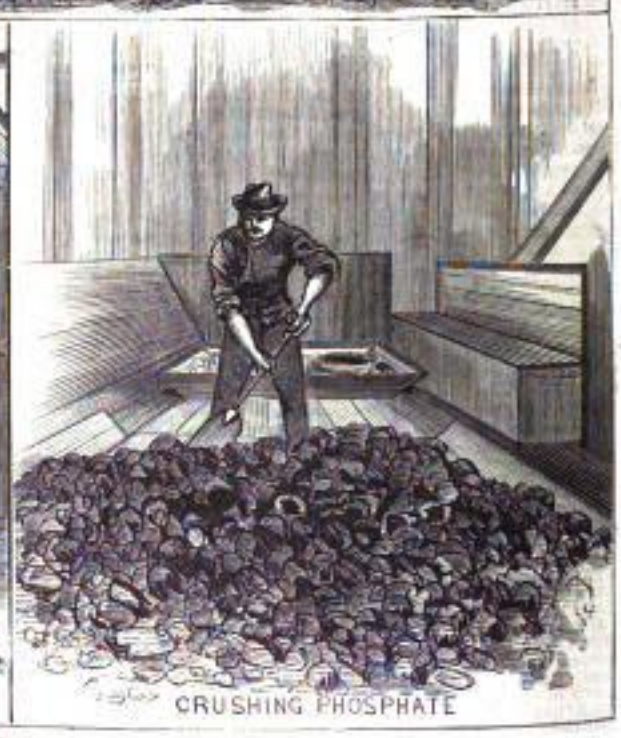
BRUSH-ROOM



GRINDING



POUNDING-ROOM



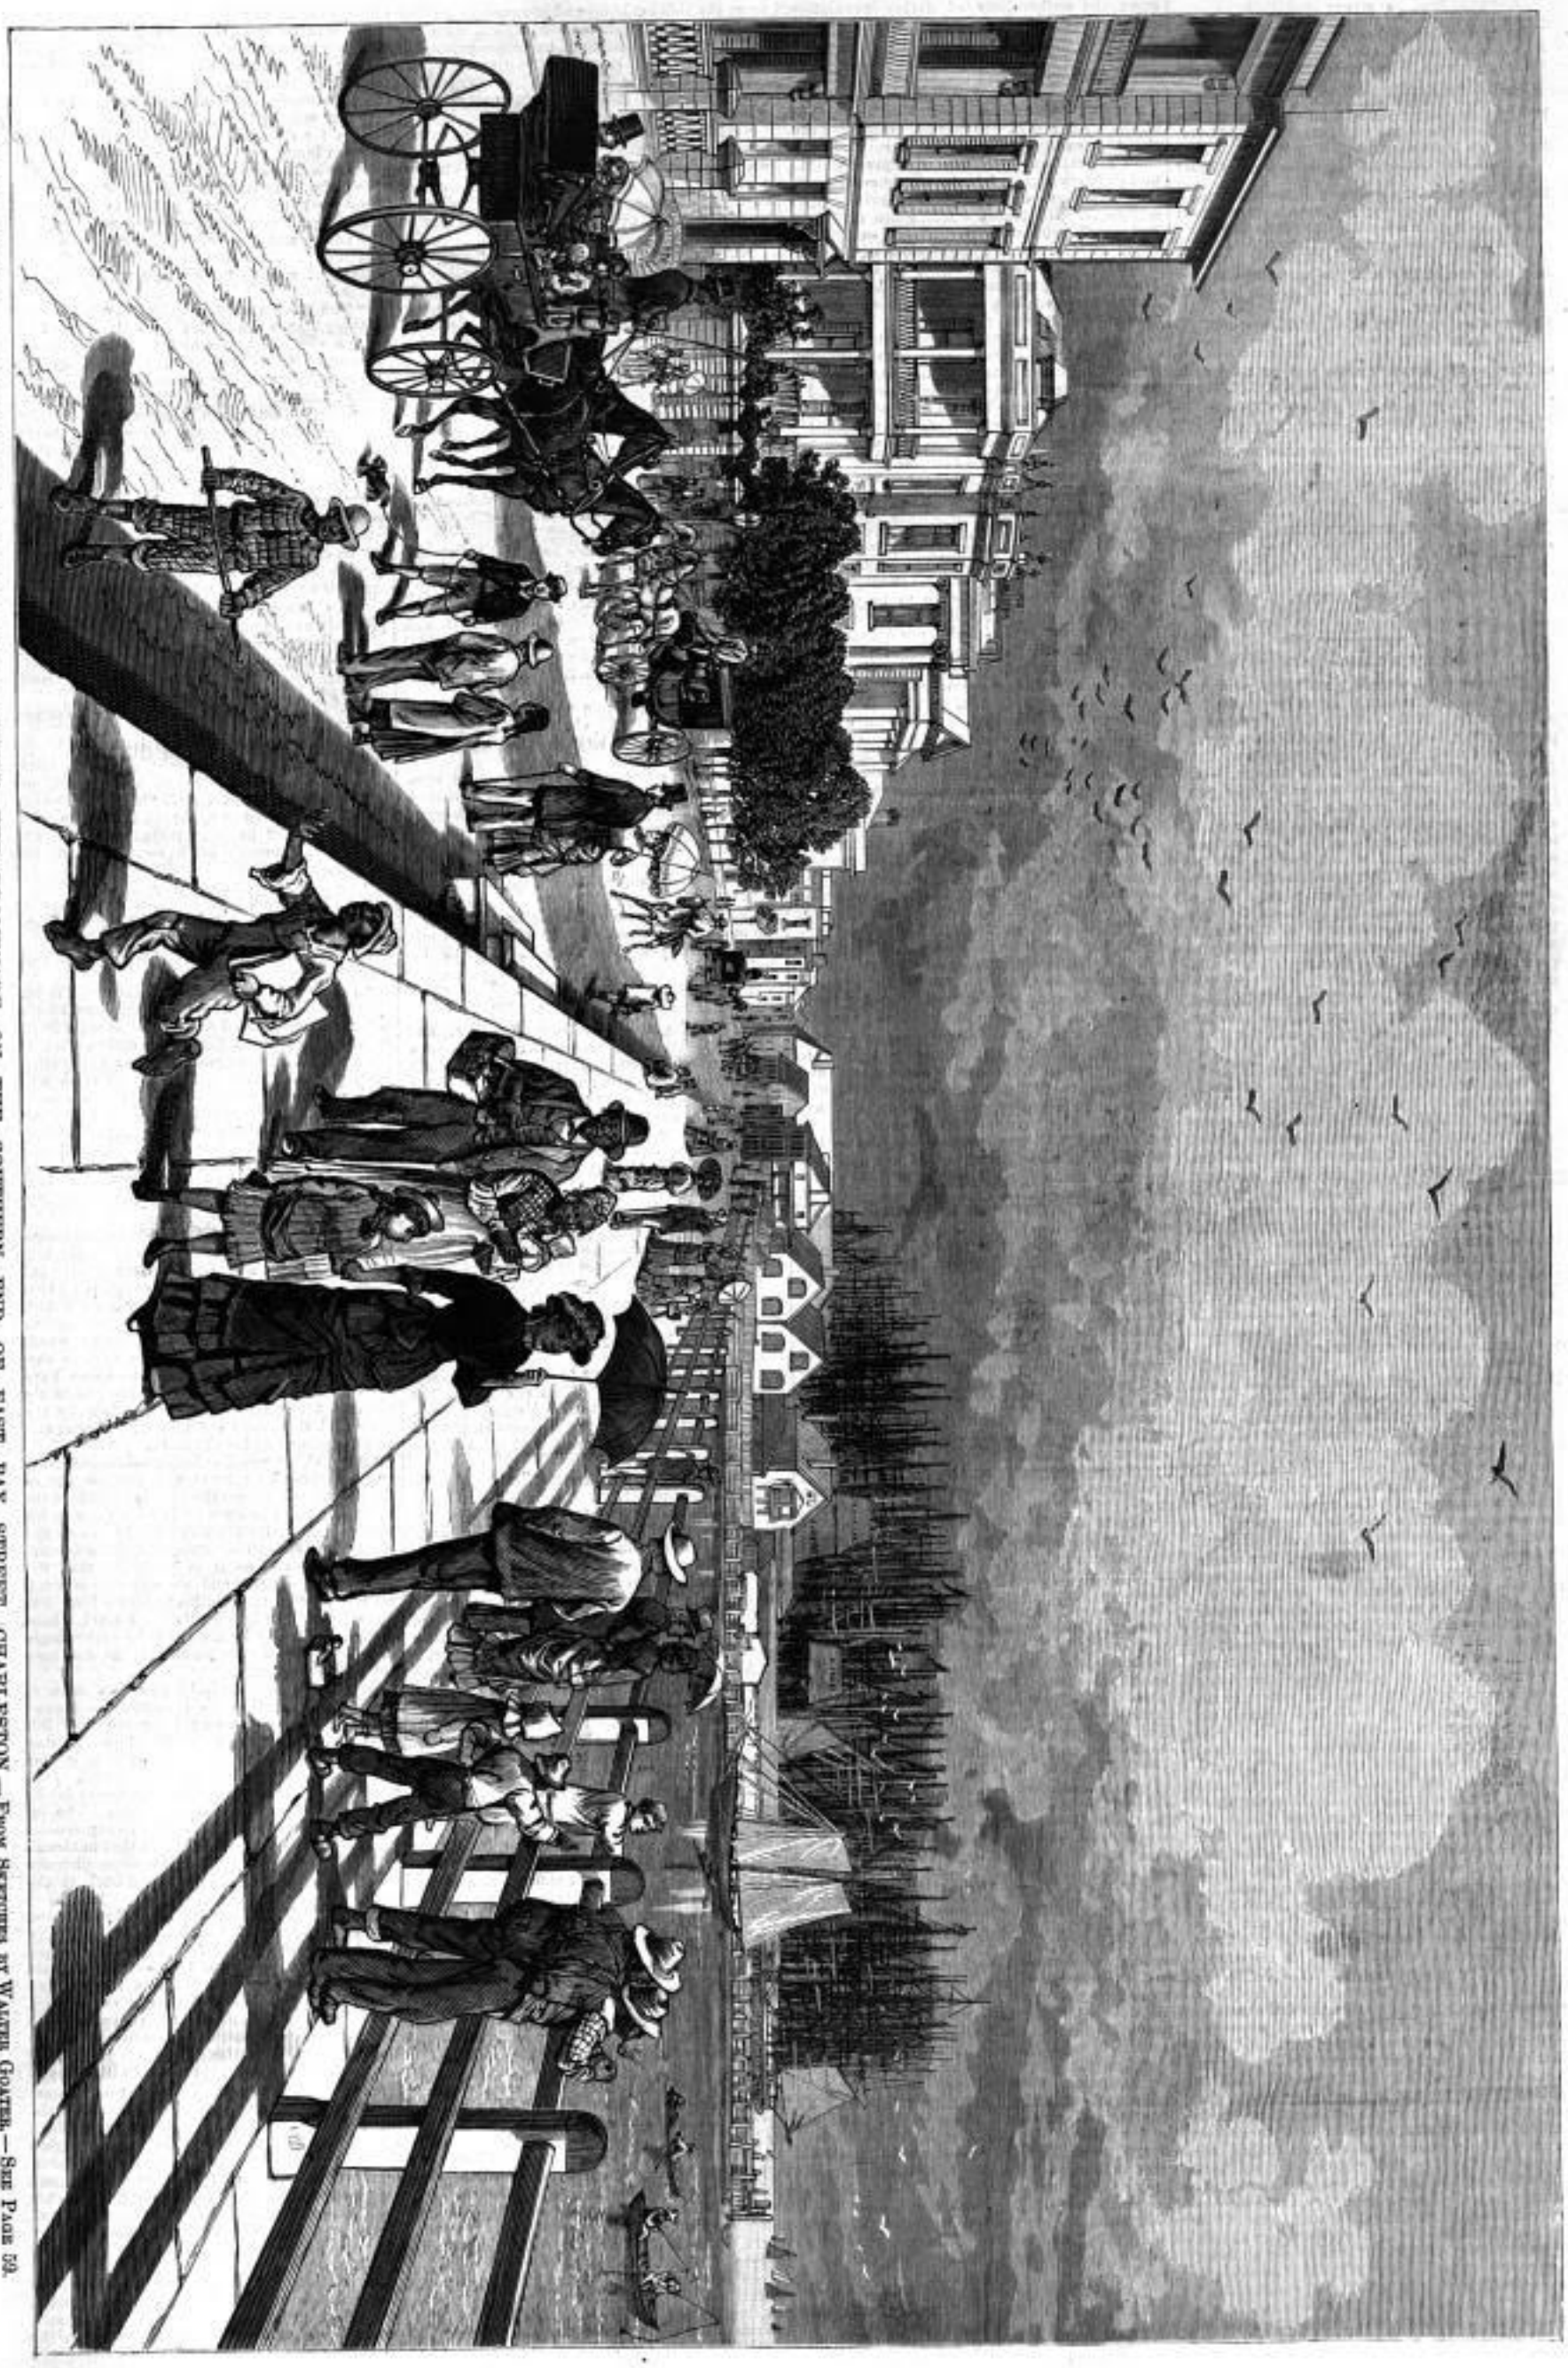
CHAFF-ROOM

METHODS OF TREATING RICE FOR THE MARKET.

MIXING ROOM

PHOSPHATE MILL

SCREEN



CRUSHING PHOSPHATE

THE CONVERSION OF PHOSPHATE ROCK INTO COMMERCIAL FERTILIZERS.

SOUTH CAROLINA.—THE SOUTH IN 1880—A GLIMPSE OF THE INDUSTRIAL INTERESTS OF CHARLESTON.

FROM SKETCHES BY WALTER GOATER.—SEE PAGE 59.

Digitized by Google

SOUTH CAROLINA—THE SOUTH IN 1880—EAST BATTERY, THE PROMENADE ON THE SOUTHERN END OF EAST BAY STREET, CHARLESTON.—FROM SKETCHES BY WALTER GOATER.—SEE PAGE 59.

Digitized by Google

A DIEU.

If never any more these arms should fold you
Close to the heart that beats for you alone,
Will you yet hear in dreams the voice that told you
Of passionate devotion all your own?

Will you remember how one man once made you
His country and his faith, supreme, complete;
And all his loyal worship gladly paid you,
And all his manhood flung down at your feet?

There was but one thing made his life worth living—
You and your beauty; you, both body and soul;
Love cares not for a weak, half-hearted giving,
As hunger wants no meagre, trivial dole.

And, dear one, if, in death, you bent above me,
And touched with warm, red mouth my cold, pale brow,
My very ghost would cry aloud, "Oh, love me!"
Even as, in living flesh, I cry so now.

Oh, face so like a sweet, white rose, pink-hearted
And downily-soft, look back on me, look back!
Should any stress of chance have ever parted
Lives that were made to run in one same track?

Yet, as the years bring problems more perplexing,
And life's fulfillment seems to fade from view,
I can but leave the issues, sorely vexing,
As I leave you, beloved, all à Dieu.

JOHN MORAN.

THE SCHAFFUSKIE LANDS.

BY ANNIE DUFFELL,

AUTHOR OF "IN THE MESHES," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXV.—NICK.

AND now, with permission of the reader, we will call attention to fresh scenes which, perhaps, have been too long neglected in pursuing the history of the other characters.

In one of the long suite of apartments we find Lady Jet. She is sitting "tailor fashion"—no other word exactly expresses Lady Jet's present unconventional attitude—in the centre of a luxurious divan piled high with amber cushions, and the dark head rests wearily upon one small, white hand, which denotes that its owner is deep in meditation. Suddenly there is a quick opening of doors, a rush and a whirl, and a revolving figure darts through the air and drops by the side of the couch, while a pair of heels rear upwards in a perpendicular attitude, and in very close proximity to her ladyship's nose.

Lady Jet views them with languid interest, but never raises her pretty head at this unceremonious advent, which shows that she is pretty well accustomed to it.

"What is it now, Nick?" she says, listlessly. The heels become agitated and wave excitedly to and fro, at which Lady Jet recoils a little.

"Nick," she cries, sharply, "get on your feet at once." Which reasonable request Nick proceeds to obey and forthwith reverses himself. He stands before the lady, a queer, diminutive figure, scarcely larger than a child of four years, though more than twice that many years have rolled by and found this mite of humanity adorning the earth.

Nick is a most startling and wonderful creature, whose special mission, so far it seems, has been to produce shocks. He comes in with a shock, he goes out with a shock, and in every one who sees him produces a shock of wonder, amazement and curiosity.

He was born in the mines, his mother who had been recently exiled died at his birth, and when he was two days old he received an injury in the spine, and that it did not kill him is a miracle. Lady Jet, then nothing but a child, begged her father to give the baby to her and Phedora, which was accordingly done, and the poor forlorn child, born in shame and bondage, was accordingly sent to the "great house" for the amusement of its desolate daughter.

Lady Jet became attached to him, and by all the household he was considered her undisputed property. All his life he has been near her, her plaything, a sort of "king's jester." Reared in such a manner, Nick's moral condition at the period of his introduction can easily be imagined. To be as charitable as possible, we will say that his ideas of right and wrong are extremely vague. In his composition reverence is entirely lacking, and he is next to nothing in obedience. He is wicked—undeniably and exaggeratedly wicked—but so cute and smart with it all that his sin is seldom corrected. He is at once a pet and a curse throughout the house. Restriction or punishment he has never known. If in moments of irresistible temptation or a laudable desire to elevate his moral standard, the housekeeper or steward have been quick enough to catch him at his mischief, and endeavor to administer corporal punishment, he has invariably roused such a din with his howls and prayers that the dispensator of justice was glad to relinquish his office and eject him from that immediate vicinity. Then would follow loud complaints to his friend and ally, and the maltreater would speedily be summoned before the tribunal of those dainty chambers, and in the presence of the triumphant Nick, Lady Jet would read a severe reprimand, and end with the command that this summary punishment was never to be repeated, during which Nick, from his position behind his defender, but in full view of the enemy, would indulge in surreptitious nods and grins and winks, not calculated to inspire tranquillity in the soul of his vanquished adversary. Cronies and playfellows as they have been, this small demon refuses to see any change in Lady Jet's estate, now that she has verged into womanhood, and insists upon maintaining his individual right to her as sole friend and companion. If, under her increasing years and wisdom, Lady Jet has, of late, conscientiously attempted to commence a course of moral training for him, such advances of a higher order are always hailed with amazement and ridicule. He slanders the saints, scoffs at the martyrs and speculates upon the authenticity of divine revelation, until, shocked and horrified, Phedora, who, despite her troubles, is a good Christian, implores Lady Jet to desist, which, truth to tell, she is not sorry to do; the years between the dignity of womanhood and her wild frolics with Nick being too few not to make her still shy of his derision. In point of religious practice and training, Nick is, therefore, little less than a heathen, frightfully unimpressionable, and strongly inclined to turn into contemptuous mockery everything bordering upon solemnity. He taunts, scoffs, gibes at everybody with whom he is thrown, except the count, certain distinct impressions of a period when he was thrashed within an inch of his life for some personal offense to his lordship having taught him ever after to maintain a respectful distance.

In point of outward appearance, I have already stated that Nick is extremely diminutive. There is a curve in his back, but not large enough to make him repulsive, and his limbs are well shaped. His hair is dark, and, at his special request, is always kept closely shaved, a prudent precaution against the retaliation of his wretched victims. His face is usually drawn up in a labyrinth of droll wrinkles and puckers, but upon rare occasions, when it has been known to relapse into its natural condition, it has been discovered to be really handsome. His complexion is clear and good, with a deep color, and, unlike persons of spinal affection, his health is invariably sound; in fact, he was never known to be sick but once in his life, and that was when he villainously obtained the housekeeper's keys, and, breaking into the larder, devoured the entire stock of imported preserves, upon which memorable occasion he was lain up for a week. His eyes—black, twinkling, mouse-like—can assume at will any known expression, and disarm suspicion, even though every circumstance is against him. He is agile as a monkey, climbs like a squirrel, burrows like a ground hog, and, if any great motive arouses his energy, can force himself through a space almost the size of a rat-hole.

The one redeeming trait in his character is his love for Lady Jet; it is boundless, intense, adoring, though always hidden unless occasion demands it. He has but one faith, one God, one religion—Lady Jet. She is his all in all. For her he would go through fire and water—would brave any peril, and is faithful to her with a dog-like fidelity that only awaits opportunity to be displayed. After which description, and begging Nick's pardon for his tardy introduction, we return to our starting point.

"It seems to me," says Lady Jet, regarding him severely, "that it is time you took to knocking before entering my apartments; and I wish you to distinctly understand, Nick, that hereafter you are to walk on your heels, in a proper manner, and not come tumbling in on your head." This assertion of dignity on her ladyship's part is the result of her daily endeavor to make herself worthy of that stern, wrecked man—a daily laborer in the mines—and who has entered into her heart and taken entire possession.

Nick looks quisical, aggrieved, aggressive.

"Maybe you think," he says, in his Russian dialect, whose quaintness is untranslatable—"maybe you think you are getting very fine," gazing at her critically, "but I can't see it. I think, to tell the truth, Jet"—no amount of drilling has ever been able to induce Nick to prefix her title—"you are growing homelier. And you surely are the liffiest girl I ever saw." This is a dirty fling of Nick's, as he is well aware that the one aspiration of Lady Jet's soul is to be of stately stature. Upon the present occasion Lady Jet deigns no reply, but her glance is threatening and belligerent.

"Where is 'Dorie?" he inquires after a pause.

"She is sick."

Nick regards his companion curiously. Her tone is mournful, her appearance dejected. Altogether she seems in a very forlorn condition.

"Come out," he says, after a moment's silent contemplation. "You're blue. It does no good trying to be a fine lady—you'll never be one in the world, and you'll have lots more fun than if you were. I say, there's a splendid tree down the mountain, and, oh, my! the nuts there are at the top of it! I've been saving them until you would go along. Come, Jet. What's the use of moping away in this dungeon? It's an awful jolly tree to climb!"

Despite this glowing inducement, Lady Jet will not stir, much to Nick's disgust. Truth to tell, the little lady in the past few weeks has grown silent, morose and even irritable. Her whole soul has merged into that strange passion for the exiled noble, and she is discontented and even miserable when a day passes without her visiting the mines. Phedora being sick for the past week, she has been unable to visit her daily haunts, and a fever of fear and anxiety is consuming her; he may be sick, he may even be dead; such swift and terrible fates are not unusual in the mines.

Suddenly looking at her companion, an idea comes to her which finally deepens into a resolution. She knows it is a desperate purpose, and that she runs a great risk. It is an offense against the royal law for any one except an officer to hold communication with a convict, and punished accordingly. And if the daughter of Count Zickwoff should be discovered in such an attempt, it would be a disgrace to her proud name that it would take many years to outlive. Still, despite all the perils, her anxiety and impatience have reached that climax where inactivity is maddening and unendurable. This sudden resolution is no other than to utilize Nick the irrepressible.

"Nick," she says, regarding him sharply, "would you like to be of some use in the world?"

"No," comes the prompt response, as that individual, who is inordinately lazy, sinks down upon the sofa-cushions and commences pulling the ears of a small terrier, which, with the selfishness of small dogs, has appropriated to herself the softest corner of the divan.

Indignation rouses Lady Jet from her lachrymose state, and she glares furiously at her companion.

"Nick," she says, "I declare you are growing more worthless every day. You never want do anything that you should do. You are a bad, lazy, good-for-nothing boy." The object of this tirade, supremely indifferent to all such tender epithets, proceeds to annoy the terrier with every evidence of enjoyment.

Lady Jet regards him, irresolute, then policy shows her the necessity of pocketing her indignation.

"Nick," she resumes, in a wheedling voice, "wouldn't you like to do something for me?"

A quick light comes in the boy's eyes at this appeal, but is as swiftly banished by that incorrigible spirit of mischief that possesses him. Determining to be non-committal, he remains silent.

"Something very, very bad!" proceeds the young lady, utilizing her knowledge of her companion's taste.

Instantly Nick's attention is riveted; he can no more withstand that insinuation than a war-horse the sound of battle.

"If it is awful, fearful bad," he observes, "I might do it. I do hate this half-way business."

"It is very, very wicked!" assures Lady Jet to this sin-craving individual.

"Something that would 'debar me from the precincts of the blest'?" he urges, with disgraceful eagerness, and wickedly quoting from Lady Jet's last lesson upon morality, which struck him at the time as being particularly ridiculous.

"Something that you would be hung for if you were found out," she says, impressively, scandalized as she is by his heathenish distaste for a celestial abode.

Nick springs to his feet, turns several somersaults, and, finally, for once comes up in a proper position upon his feet, and stands grinning in a transport of delight.

"I'll do it!" he cries, enthusiastically, and, wringing Lady Jet's small hand until it aches. "Tell me, and I am off, fair lady, to do your will."

He bends before her, kissing her hand with the mock grace of a knight of chivalry, while his bright eyes gleam wickedly with his delight.

CHAPTER XXXVI.—NICK'S "COUP D'ETAT."

LADY JET gets down from the divan and goes to her escritoire, where she takes out a dainty sheet of crested paper, and, after a moment's hesitation, commences penning a few lines to the exiled count. It is the first time that she has ever actually addressed him, and she wonders at her own courage. Several sheets are wasted before the communication suits her, and, when it is finished, upon the smooth surface of the paper are these few lines:

"TO COUNT SMOLOFF—My lord must not think that he is deserted; he has one true friend who mourns for his fate, and who will, in time, discover some means of rescuing him from his living death. Be patient and watchful!"

She folds the paper and gives it to Nick, who stands by, curious and impatient.

"And now?" he says, after concealing the note.

"First of all, you are to go to the mines," commences Lady Jet. Then she stops, for Nick's grinning face has suddenly grown blank and serious; but only for a moment, then it relapses into its chronic wickedness and amusement.

"Now, what is the matter?" inquires his companion, impatiently.

"I would rather go anywheres than to the mines, just now," he affirms, with a broad grin.

"I thought you were a favorite down there?"

"Oh, I am—a very great favorite. I think the guards are very anxious to catch me. I think they would rather see me than anybody in the world"—this with a still broader grin, as he recalls a certain episode in which he figured in anything but a creditable manner.

"Ah-ha!" exclaims Lady Jet, with keen enjoyment, "so you have got yourself in trouble down at the mines. How did you do it?"

"Oh, it wasn't much," with unusual modesty—"not near so much as I often have done, but they seemed to take it hard."

"Take what hard?"

"Well, the other day I was sitting on the ground by the lamp-shelves. You know the lamps in the mines won't burn more than half a day at a time, and they always have a fresh lot waiting to push right in the cases when the oil is out of the others. Parson Karl is chaplain on Sundays and lamp-keeper the rest of the week. He is always preaching about patience, so I wanted to see how much he and the rest of them had. It was just a little before the time to change the lamps, and I poured all the oil out of them but a few drops. Directly along comes Father Karl, singing a psalm. He picks up the lamps with a flourish, and in a trice goes from one to the other and puts them in their places. Then he comes back to me and sits down.

"'Nick,' says he, 'didn't I hear you swearing the other day?'

"'No, sir,' says I. 'I never took an oath in my life.'

"Says he: 'Nick, it is very sinful to tell stories and also to swear. The dear Mother likes good children, for once she had a good Child of her own—a Child that never took an oath or said a bad word in his life—that went about preaching to—the devil! what's the matter with the lamps!'

"He jumped to his feet and upset me. He rushed from one lamp to the other, as if those ten thousand swine-devils were after him. He raved, he cursed, he swore! and all the while the lamps went slowly out. Then up to him come rushing the guards, shouting like madmen, brandishing their fists and swearing that they will be the death of him. And the last lamp goes out, and we are all in darkness. Have you read of Pandemonium? Jet, that was Pandemonium—the shouting, the swearing, the darkness! Oh, Lord, but it was jolly! It was one half hour before they could get lights, for they had to go up to the office for a lighted lamp.

"'It is that imp of Satan! He has done it—Nick, the little devil!' some one groaned, and they took up the cry, and every one was shouting for me. But I crawled along close to the rocks, and then climbed up the shaft and got away. And that is all; but I thought maybe it was best not to go there too soon again."

"You were a very, very bad boy to do such a thing," says Lady Jet, in a dejected tone. "Now you see you won't be able to do my errand. Oh, what a wicked, sinful boy you are!" with increasing energy.

Nick snaps his fingers contemptuously.

"I care that much," he says, scornfully, "for all the guards and officers in Siberia. You tell me what you want and I'll do it, in spite of the——"

"There—there, dear," hastily interrupts Lady Jet. "Oh, what a darling you are! Do you mean to say," with increasing ecstasy, "that you will go down in the mines?"

"Of course; but what's up?" queries Nick, condescending to be caressed.

Suddenly Lady Jet's face grows grave.

"You remember, Nick, the gentleman I pointed out to you once as saving my life?"

Nick jerks his head in assent.

"Well, I want you to get to him this note without rousing any one's suspicions, and, above all, without being seen."

The boy gives vent to a loud, prolonged whistle.

"Can it be done?"

The pleading, eager eyes, the piteous voice—well, if mortal being can do it, Nick instantly resolves that it shall be accomplished. Besides, the perilous undertaking, the spice of treachery, the flagrant trangression of the laws of the country, all have their charm for his peculiar nature.

"Yes," he says, laconically.

"And, oh, Nick"—a convulsive clasping of two small hands—"I am lost if you are discovered with the note!"

Nick gives a whoop like a wild Indian and starts for the door.

"I can do it," he says. "Trust me—I'm off. Good-by till next time." He is gone like a whirl of wind. And Lady Jet does trust him; trusts to his natural shrewdness and cunning, to his almost supernatural ability for extricating himself from scrapes, and, last of all, to his love for herself and his dog-like fidelity. She knows that forty horses could not draw that note from him, that there is in his gay, reckless, versatile nature a latent vein of strength and endurance that would sustain him to keep her secret though stretched upon a rack. Nevertheless, she feels restless and anxious at her imprudence.

In the meantime Nick speeds down the stairs, colliding with several servants and upsetting the house on his way, and is about to rush out of the hall, when, glancing through the great door, he sees approaching the house the tall, sombre form of Count Zickwoff. Not feeling sure of the state of the count's mind towards himself, and being victim to a certain suspicion that his episode of the lamps may have been related to official ears, he prudently secretes himself behind a huge chair by the door, and the count entering in the next moment passes on to his chamber.

After making sure that he is unobserved, Nick emerges from his retreat, and, rushing out of the hall, speeds across the barren hillside to the mines. And as he goes he is busy forming his plan of action. He knows that if he can escape the argus eyes of the outraged Karl he is comparatively safe, as it is probable that the officers and superintendents will be too much engrossed with their duties to notice him. But feeling sure that he cannot escape Karl, whose station is directly by the shaft, he accordingly falls back upon his stratagem as his only reliable dependence.

Arriving at the shaft, he pauses a moment for deliberation, then his resolution is taken; he will not give the signal for the trap, but lower himself by the aid of the ropes. Seizing the nearest cord, he lets himself lightly over the passageway, dark and full of peril. It is a dangerous undertaking, but he descends like a monkey, and is soon in the mines. The instant he lands, his twinkling eyes sweep around his surroundings, and discovers that not a soul is visible save Karl, who stands some distance off with his oil-can, and his broad back to the shaft.

Filled with exultation, Nick drops upon "all-fours," and is about to crawl stealthily along the wall, protected by its shadow, when Karl turns. He sees the boy, and, with flashing eyes, makes for him. It is a critical moment, but Nick is equal to the emergency. Instantly rolling over upon the rocky floor, he commences a series of shrieks and groans, interspersed with exclamations of pain, until the whole mines reverberate with his cries.

Karl stops aghast, and gazes at him in uncertainty, at the same time involuntarily raising his huge, black hands to his ears. In a moment a half-dozen officers appear from different quarters, and, rushing up to the prostrate Nick, contemplate him in wonder and amazement. He shrieks, he moans, he twists and turns and grovels; he wrings his hands, he makes spasmodic clutches at his legs, and his manner is altogether indicative of intense anguish.

The officers ply him with questions, and he seems at first incapable of speech; but finally, through many wails and groans, he manages to inform them that he has fallen down the shaft. At this announcement, into every eye regarding him leaps a sudden suspicion, and they view him skeptically. But the purple face, the streaming eyes—Nick is supplied with as wonderful a capacity for tears as a crocodile—the loud cries, and, above all, the fact that the trap had not been raised to lower him, though here he is, at last disarm suspicion, and it dawns upon them that he really has, in his proverbial carelessness, tumbled down the shaft.

Digitized by Google

"It's a God's mercy that it didn't kill him outright," mutters Karl, who, in the face of this appalling disaster, has not the courage to avenge the affair with the lamps.

"Look at him," says the head subordinate officer, to one of the guards who prides himself upon his knowledge of surgery. "See if he is dangerously injured."

The guard, nothing loath, obeys; and, having his reputation to sustain, soon announces that one leg is broken.

"Broken!" cries Nick, with wild sobs of pain. "I'm crushed, shattered all through!"

The officer regards the writhing boy in perplexity, then gives orders for a litter to be made.

"He must be carried to the house," he says. "He belongs to Lady Jet."

Nick, secretly appalled at this proposition, beseeches them not to move him for the present, which reasonable request being granted, the officers move off, leaving Karl to watch this victim of the terrible disaster, while preparations are made to commence the litter, so that at the proper time he may be borne to the house.

Nick lies very silent, his brain busy with revolving projects that will gain him an interview with, or, at least, throw him in the presence of the object of his mission. But, despite the employment of his mind, he does not forget at proper intervals to give vent to deep groans, for the benefit of Karl, who still lingers near busy with his lamps. At last, after going up to the boy, who apparently is in a deep slumber or stupor, he goes to another portion of the mines. Intently watching him from under his partially-close lids, when he entirely disappears Nick springs to his feet and glances hastily around. Not a human being is visible, save some distance off where a gang of convicts are busy at their labor. To these he turns his attention, and, even while he looks, they shoulder their axes and shovels, and, to the boy's boundless delight, start towards the shaft. Being familiar with their plans of action, he instantly divines that they are going to a fresh mine, and must necessarily stop exactly beside him. It is a streak of good luck entirely unlooked for, and it is with difficulty that he restrains the exuberance of his feelings.

On come the convicts, like so many mules heavily laden, and pause at the shaft. So weary, so dragged and worn are they, that even natural instinct is crushed out, and scarcely one of them glances at the boy crouching by the shaft. But he is not so listless. His sharp, rat-like eyes sweep the group, and finally fasten upon the worn, stern, set face of the exiled noble. It is the work of a minute to crawl to his side and thrust the note in his hand and then speed back to his former position. But, looking keenly at the count, he sees, by that startled, half-dazed expression, that the communication is safe into his keeping.

(To be continued.)

THE "MEMORIAL HALL" OF THE GATE CITY GUARD OF ATLANTA, GA.

WE give in this issue an illustration of a "Memorial Hall" to be erected in Atlanta, Ga., by the Gate City Guard of that place. During the exciting period just preceding the war the members of this company were about equally divided as to the policy of secession, and discussion at one time became so earnest as to threaten the destruction of the company. But when Georgia seceded, they cast their fortunes with their State and were the first command to leave Atlanta for the seat of war, taking into service one hundred and twelve members, representing the best families in the city. The war over and its issues settled, the company determined to extend as eagerly the hand of friendship to those who were once arrayed against them as they were to buckle on the armor of strife, and began a tour of the principal cities in the Northern States last October, carrying with them the Stars and Stripes. They were everywhere received with the most flattering demonstrations of welcome by the citizens and soldiery; and to commemorate the reunion of the States and the return of peace and national sentiment as evidenced by their reception through the North, they determined to erect a "Memorial Hall." The design of the building was drawn by Mr. T. H. Morgan, a promising young architect in the ranks of the company, and is treated after the Gothic style, with large memorial windows in stained glass, inscribed with the names of organizations that entertained the Gate City Guard or that will attend the laying of the corner-stone in October next. The main hall will be twenty-eight feet high, with a paneled ceiling made of wood from every State in the Union. On the first floor will be the parlors, officers' rooms, armorer's and quartermaster's rooms, etc. In the tower will be placed two memorial tablets surmounted by a large statue of a soldier in the uniform of the company. The Hall, when completed, will be about ninety feet square, and the only monument of the kind south of Mason and Dixon's line. A grand fair will soon be held in Atlanta for the memorial fund, and it is expected that fifty thousand dollars will be realized. Many of the best military organizations in the Northern and Southern States have accepted invitations to attend, and the military reunion on that occasion will be the first that has taken place in the Southern States since the war.

THE SOUTH IN 1880.

THE CITY OF CHARLESTON, S. C.

CHARLESTON, S. C., is a city of ancient renown, so far as the term ancient can be applied to anything American. The course of its streets can be traced by the cities of historical events, and one cannot look upon its harbor without seeming to hear the echo of the guns of Sir Peter Parker's fleet mingling with the more recent and more powerful explosions of Armstrongs, columbiads and torpedoes that for four years, more or less incessantly, made terrible music in that land-locked bay. But it is not of the fame of Charleston's past that we tell to-day, but of its present usefulness. We propose to illustrate some of the chief features of the metropolis of South Carolina as a commercial emporium, manufacturing centre and delightful place of residence, giving this week three sketches by our special artist.

Phosphate Factory.—This is a mill where the crude phosphate rock, dug from the land or raked from the bottom of the rivers on the Carolina coast, is ground to an impalpable powder, and by treatment with sulphuric acid and mixture with animal matter, such as bones, fish scrap, etc., is converted into commercial fertilizers. This whole business has been originated and built up since 1867, when the rock, the existence of which had long been known, was first analyzed by a competent chemist and its value as a fertilizer discovered. There are now a large number of such mills in and near Charleston, giving occupation to hundreds of laborers and employing capital to the amount of several million dollars, and the use of the fertilizers in this country and in Europe continues to increase. During the past season—i.e., from June 1st, 1879, to April 1st, 1880—the amount of fertilizers sold was 68,288 tons, and the amount of crude rock exported, coastwise and foreign, 101,492 tons. The fertilizers average in value about $40 per ton, and the rock $6, making a total commercial value of about $3,500,000.

Rice Mill.—Charleston is the largest rice market in the United States, more rice being raised on the rivers of South Carolina and the adjoining State of Georgia than all the rest of the country together. Rice very much resembles wheat, and the grain is separated from the straw by threshing machines on the plantations, it is then mostly carried in sail vessels in bulk to market, and in the mills, the chief parts of which are sets of mortars and pestles, fans and bolting sieves. The chaff, or outer husk, is first beaten off, and afterwards the inner covering of the seed which makes a fine flour useful as food for stock. The rice in being cleaned has more or less of the grains broken, and by means of sieves of different fineness it is separated into three classes, whole rice, middling rice, and small rice, the first consisting of the unbroken grains, the second of the larger particles and the last of the smaller particles of the broken grains.

East Battery.—This is the southern end of East Bay Street, with handsome residences on the west side and a high sea wall on the east, making a splendid promenade, both houses and sea wall commanding a magnificent view of the harbor with its picturesque islands and forts.

PENNSYLVANIA STATE FAIR.

THE annual fair of the Pennsylvania State Agricultural Society was formally opened in the Permanent Exhibition Buildings at Philadelphia, on September 7th, when Governor Hoyt and President W. S. Bissell made appropriate addresses. The exhibition is in many respects inferior to those of former years, the display of cattle being especially fine. The fruit exhibition is also large and varied, and elicits the warm admiration of visitors. The same may be said of the floral display, which includes a collection of rare officinal and medicinal plants. The plants of this collection are small, and comprise the vanilla, tea, fig, croton oil, lime, lemon, tobacco, black pepper, sugar, guava, india-rubber, cinnamon, Liberian and Arabian coffee, pineapple, banana, camphor, ginger, date, orange, clove, bitter aloe, pomegranate and patchouli plants, and the palm from which Panama hats are made. In the fruit collection are pears from the tree from which all the seckel pears have sprung. The tree, now nearly 200 years old, is on the farm of John Bastian, near Girard Point. The fair will continue during the present week.

GENERAL A. T. A. TORBERT.

GENERAL ALFRED T. A. TORBERT, who was among the victims of the Pere Crue disaster, was a native of Delaware, where he was born in July, 1838. He was graduated at West Point in 1855, when he was appointed brevet second lieutenant, and assigned to duty with the Fifth Infantry. His regiment was ordered to the southwest frontier, and was first engaged in conducting recruits to Fort McIntosh, Texas; then in scouting against the Lipan Indians in the hostilities against the Florida Seminoles; again on frontier duty in the Utah Expedition, and in 1860 in the march to New Mexico. When the civil war broke out Lieutenant Torbert was sent to New Jersey, where he was busy from April until September, 1861, in mustering volunteers into the service. He received the appointment of Colonel of the First New Jersey Volunteers in the latter month, and, with his regiment, participated in the Virginia Peninsular campaign, being engaged in the siege of Yorktown and the actions at West Point, Gaines's Mills and Charles City Cross-roads. On August 28th, 1862, he was given command of a brigade in the Sixth Corps, and fought at the second battle of Bull Run, at South Mountain, where he received a wound, and in the fight at Antietam. His gallantry won him promotion to the rank of brigadier-general of volunteers, his commission dating November 29th, 1862. On his return from sick leave, the following June, he was assigned to duty with the Sixth Corps, and participated in its operations during the Winter of 1863-4. It was in the Richmond campaign of 1864 that General Torbert distinguished himself by his dashing and discreet conduct as a cavalry officer. He had command of the cavalry, remaining with General Grant during General Sheridan's raid on Richmond. On the return of the latter, General Torbert assumed command of the First Division, and was in many actions in the Summer of 1864, Hawes Shop and Cold Harbor being among them. He was an active participant in all the operations in the Shenandoah Valley, being Chief of Cavalry of the Middle Military Division. Afterwards he was in command of the Army of the Shenandoah and of various districts in Virginia, until he was mustered out of the volunteer service, January 15th, 1866. He was successively breveted major, lieutenant-colonel, colonel, and brigadier-general, for his gallantry at Gettysburg, Hawes Shop, Winchester and Cedar Creek. The rank of brevet major-general was subsequently conferred upon him for gallant and meritorious services in the field during the rebellion. General Torbert was only thirty-three years of age when he closed his successful and honorable military career by resigning, October 31st, 1866, and retiring to his home in Milford, Del. He had been scarcely three years in retirement when he was called into civil life by receiving the appointment from General Grant of United States Minister to the Central American States. Two years later he was sent to Havana as Consul-General, and thence to Paris in the same capacity. He entered upon his duties in Paris in the latter part of 1873, and held his position until May, 1878. General Torbert was a man of splendid physique and of commanding presence, and was reputed to possess a very handsome property in Milford, where he leaves a widow. The body of General Torbert was washed ashore and buried by the saved seamen, but was subsequently disinterred and will be brought North with a military escort.

How the Greenback is Prepared for Circulation.

THE following appears in the St. Louis Chronicle: "All paper money," said a Treasury official, in conversation with a reporter a few days since, "both legal tenders and national securities, are now engraved, printed and finished in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing at Washington. Some years ago, one-half the note was finished in New York by the Columbia Bank-note Company, but that has been done away with for some time. Under an Act of Congress, a building has just been completed for the sole use of the bureau. Before moving into this they occupied a portion of the Treasury Department."

"What about the process of making a greenback?"

"The process of making the greenback and other Government securities is this: The paper is first taken to the wetting division. There it is counted and dampened. It is then delivered to the plate-printers, each sheet being charged to them. They again count it in the presence of their assistant, who is a lady, and give a receipt therefor, the assistant certifying that she witnessed the count. The receipts are taken to the wetting division, where they are compared with the books before work is begun, and must agree. The paper is then given the first impression, which is on the back. This is done with a hand-press. Attached to all of these presses are registers, which keep count of each sheet of paper as it passes through, so it is impossible for the printer to secrete any without being detected. The note then passes into the examining division, where it is counted while wet and then placed in a drying-box. When perfectly dry it is taken out and again counted, and the work examined by experts, all of whom are ladies. The sheets found defective in any way are canceled, and the perfect ones placed in a hydraulic press, where an immense pressure is given them. When taken out they are perfectly smooth. They are then sent back to the wetting division, where they are again dampened."

"What is the next step in their manufacture?"

"Well, they are taken to the printing division, where they receive the second impression, which is the black part of the face, after which they are taken to the examining division, the dry box, the hydraulic press, and back again to the wetting division, the same as at first. They are taken from here the third time to the State printing division, where the third impression is received, which is the large red seal on the face. After this they are taken to the examining room, dried, pressed, counted and examined, the same as on both previous occasions. From here they are sent to the numbering division, where they receive the numbers that are seen on the upper right corner and left centre. Both legal tender and national bank notes are printed on sheets, and there are always four notes on each. After being numbered, the legal-tender notes are taken to another room, where the margin is trimmed from the paper and the notes separated. This is all done by machinery. After being separated they are again counted and placed in packages of 1,000 notes each. This is also done by ladies, who are experts. One lady, a Mrs. Silver, will count 1,000 notes in five minutes. This is the final count. They are then ready for delivery to the parties authorized to receive them. The national bank notes are not separated, but are sent to the banks that issue them in sheets of four each, so that they may be the more readily signed. The rules governing the Bureau of Engraving and Printing are very strict. In fact, during working hours the employés are treated more like prisoners than they are like ladies or gentlemen. From 1,000 to 1,500 persons are employed there, the ladies outnumbering the gentlemen considerably.

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

Activity Prevails at the Meudon aëronautical school where the French Government has established extensive works for the construction of a large number of war balloons. Each of these, 39 feet in diameter, will be made of silk, varnished by a process invented in 1784. The valve is to be made of metal, and the shape will be quite spherical. Not less than forty of them will be sent to the several French armies for the purpose of making capture or free ascents when required.

An Improved Method of stopping engines (says the Electrician), has recently been devised. The main object of the device is to enable any child or unskilled person in any part of a mill to stop the engine in case of accident. The action is exceedingly simple. By touching a spring similar to the spring of an electric bell, an electric ball is set in motion. The ball drops and shuts one of the valves, which prevents the steam from escaping, and the engine is brought to a standstill.

It Seems that the introduction of magnets into the great grain mills of the West has fulfilled the highest expectations of those who complained of wire in wheat. Not only have the magnets captured all the stray pieces of iron bands, and thus removed the last and only objection urged against wire banding harvesters, but they have revealed the singular fact that, of the scraps of iron and steel which find their way to the mills mixed with the wheat, fully one-half are something besides pieces of wire, and a large proportion of those are of such a nature as to be even more dangerous to mill machinery. The magnets gather everything of this kind with unerring certainty.

M. Ramstedt, late of the Russian Navy, has devised a system of night-signaling on board ship, with which some very interesting experiments have recently been made. The apparatus consists of a dished chamber, in which sirrocium is burned, or other substances, so as to produce a variety of colors if desired. At the back of the chamber is a reflector, by means of which the light is thrown on the steam, either steadily or in flashes, at will. The steam thus becomes a luminous mass, varying in color with the substances used in combustion. It is stated that the result of the experiments which have thus far been made shows that the apparatus in question is very effective for the purpose intended.

A Telemeter, which will for many purposes far surpass any range finder yet suggested, has been invented by a professor of mechanics at the high school at Belgrade. The instrument, it is stated, will show with unerring precision the exact distance of an enemy. The rapidity with which sound travels is the basis of the measurement of distances, the distance required to be known being shown upon the face of the instrument in less than a minute. The telemeter itself is only about the size of a watch, and can therefore be easily carried in the pocket, while the error in the measurement of any range from 300 up to 20,000 yards does not exceed one and a half yards, and does not increase with the distance. The cost is only about $10.

According to Les Mondes, a new application of the Ruhmkorff coil has been made in the neighborhood of Marseilles. Instead of using bird-lime on trees which are frequented by birds of passage, a copper wire is wound around the trunk, and a decoy attached to a neighboring stall. When a numerous flock has been attracted by the decoy, a shock is sent by the commutator, and they are more surely stunned than by a rifle. Experiments of a similar kind have also been made by M. Dalmas upon the vines at his country seat, and powerful shocks are said to have destroyed the parasites together with their eggs. If this statement is confirmed, the ingenious inventor may reasonably expect the prize of 100,000 francs ($20,000) which has been offered for the destruction of the phylloxera.

The Third International Congress of Geography meets at Venice from the 18th to the 22d of September, 1881, under the patronage of King Humbert. The accompanying exhibition will be opened on September 1st, and will not be closed before October 1st. The Congress will be divided into seven groups: 1. Mathematical, Geodetic and Topographical Geography. 2. Hydrography and Maritime Geography. 3. Physical, Meteorological, Geological, Botanical and Zoological Geography. 4. Historical, Ethnographical and Philological Geography. 5. Economical, Commercial and Statistical Geography. 6. Methodology; Geographical Education. 7. Exploration. Further information may be obtained by addressing "Al Comitato ordinatore del 3° Congresso Geografico Internazionale, 26 Via del Collegio Romano, Roma."

PERSONAL GOSSIP.

THE health of the Empress of Germany causes renewed anxiety to her family.

THE murderers of Dr. Parsons have been brought to Constantinople and will be tried immediately.

GENERAL JOSEPH R. HAWLEY has declined a renomination for Congress from the Hartford (Conn.) District.

GENERAL GEORGE B. MCCLELLAN has been chosen President of the New York Underground Railroad Company.

VICTOR EMMANUEL'S monument, which the Italian Government is about to erect, will cost over a million and a quarter of dollars.

THE Pope has appropriated $60,000 for a complete and splendid edition of the works of St. Thomas Aquinas, his favorite philosopher.

GENERAL GRANT will spend the coming Winter in New York City and Washington. During his sojourn at the capital he will be the guest of General Beal.

ANDREW D. WHITE, Minister to Berlin, writes that he is not about to resign the Presidency of Cornell University, but will return there during the coming year.

EDITOR THORN of Notes and Queries has retired from the office of assistant librarian of the House of Lords, at the age of seventy-seven, on a pension of $3,750 a year.

THE sword of General Anthony Wayne and that of Judge Edward King have just been presented to the City of Philadelphia, in accordance with the will of the late Dr. William King.

MISS ANNIE R. IRISH, the daughter of Colonel O. H. Irish, Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, has been elected lecturer on modern literature in the University of Wooster, Ohio.

MR. ARCHIBALD FORBES will come in for the new South African medal and clasp, or can at any rate claim it, on account of his having conveyed the news of the victory at Ulundi to Sir Garnet Wolseley and Sir Bartle Frere.

MISS FLORA SHARON, daughter of Senator Sharon, is betrothed to Sir Thomas Hesketh, a wealthy Englishman, who, in the course of a tour round the world in his steam yacht, has been making a stop at San Francisco.

GENERAL LONGSTREET has been in Washington receiving instructions as United States Minister to Turkey. Secretary Evarts has informed him that he will be compelled to pay his own expenses, as the Government has discontinued furnishing outfits.

OLIVE LOGAN declares that Adelaide Neilson was to have been married to Admiral Glyn. The actress said so herself, and explained that the delay was because she desired to wait until the Admiral's daughter was wedded. The Prince of Wales had reminded Glyn that Neilson could never be presented at court.

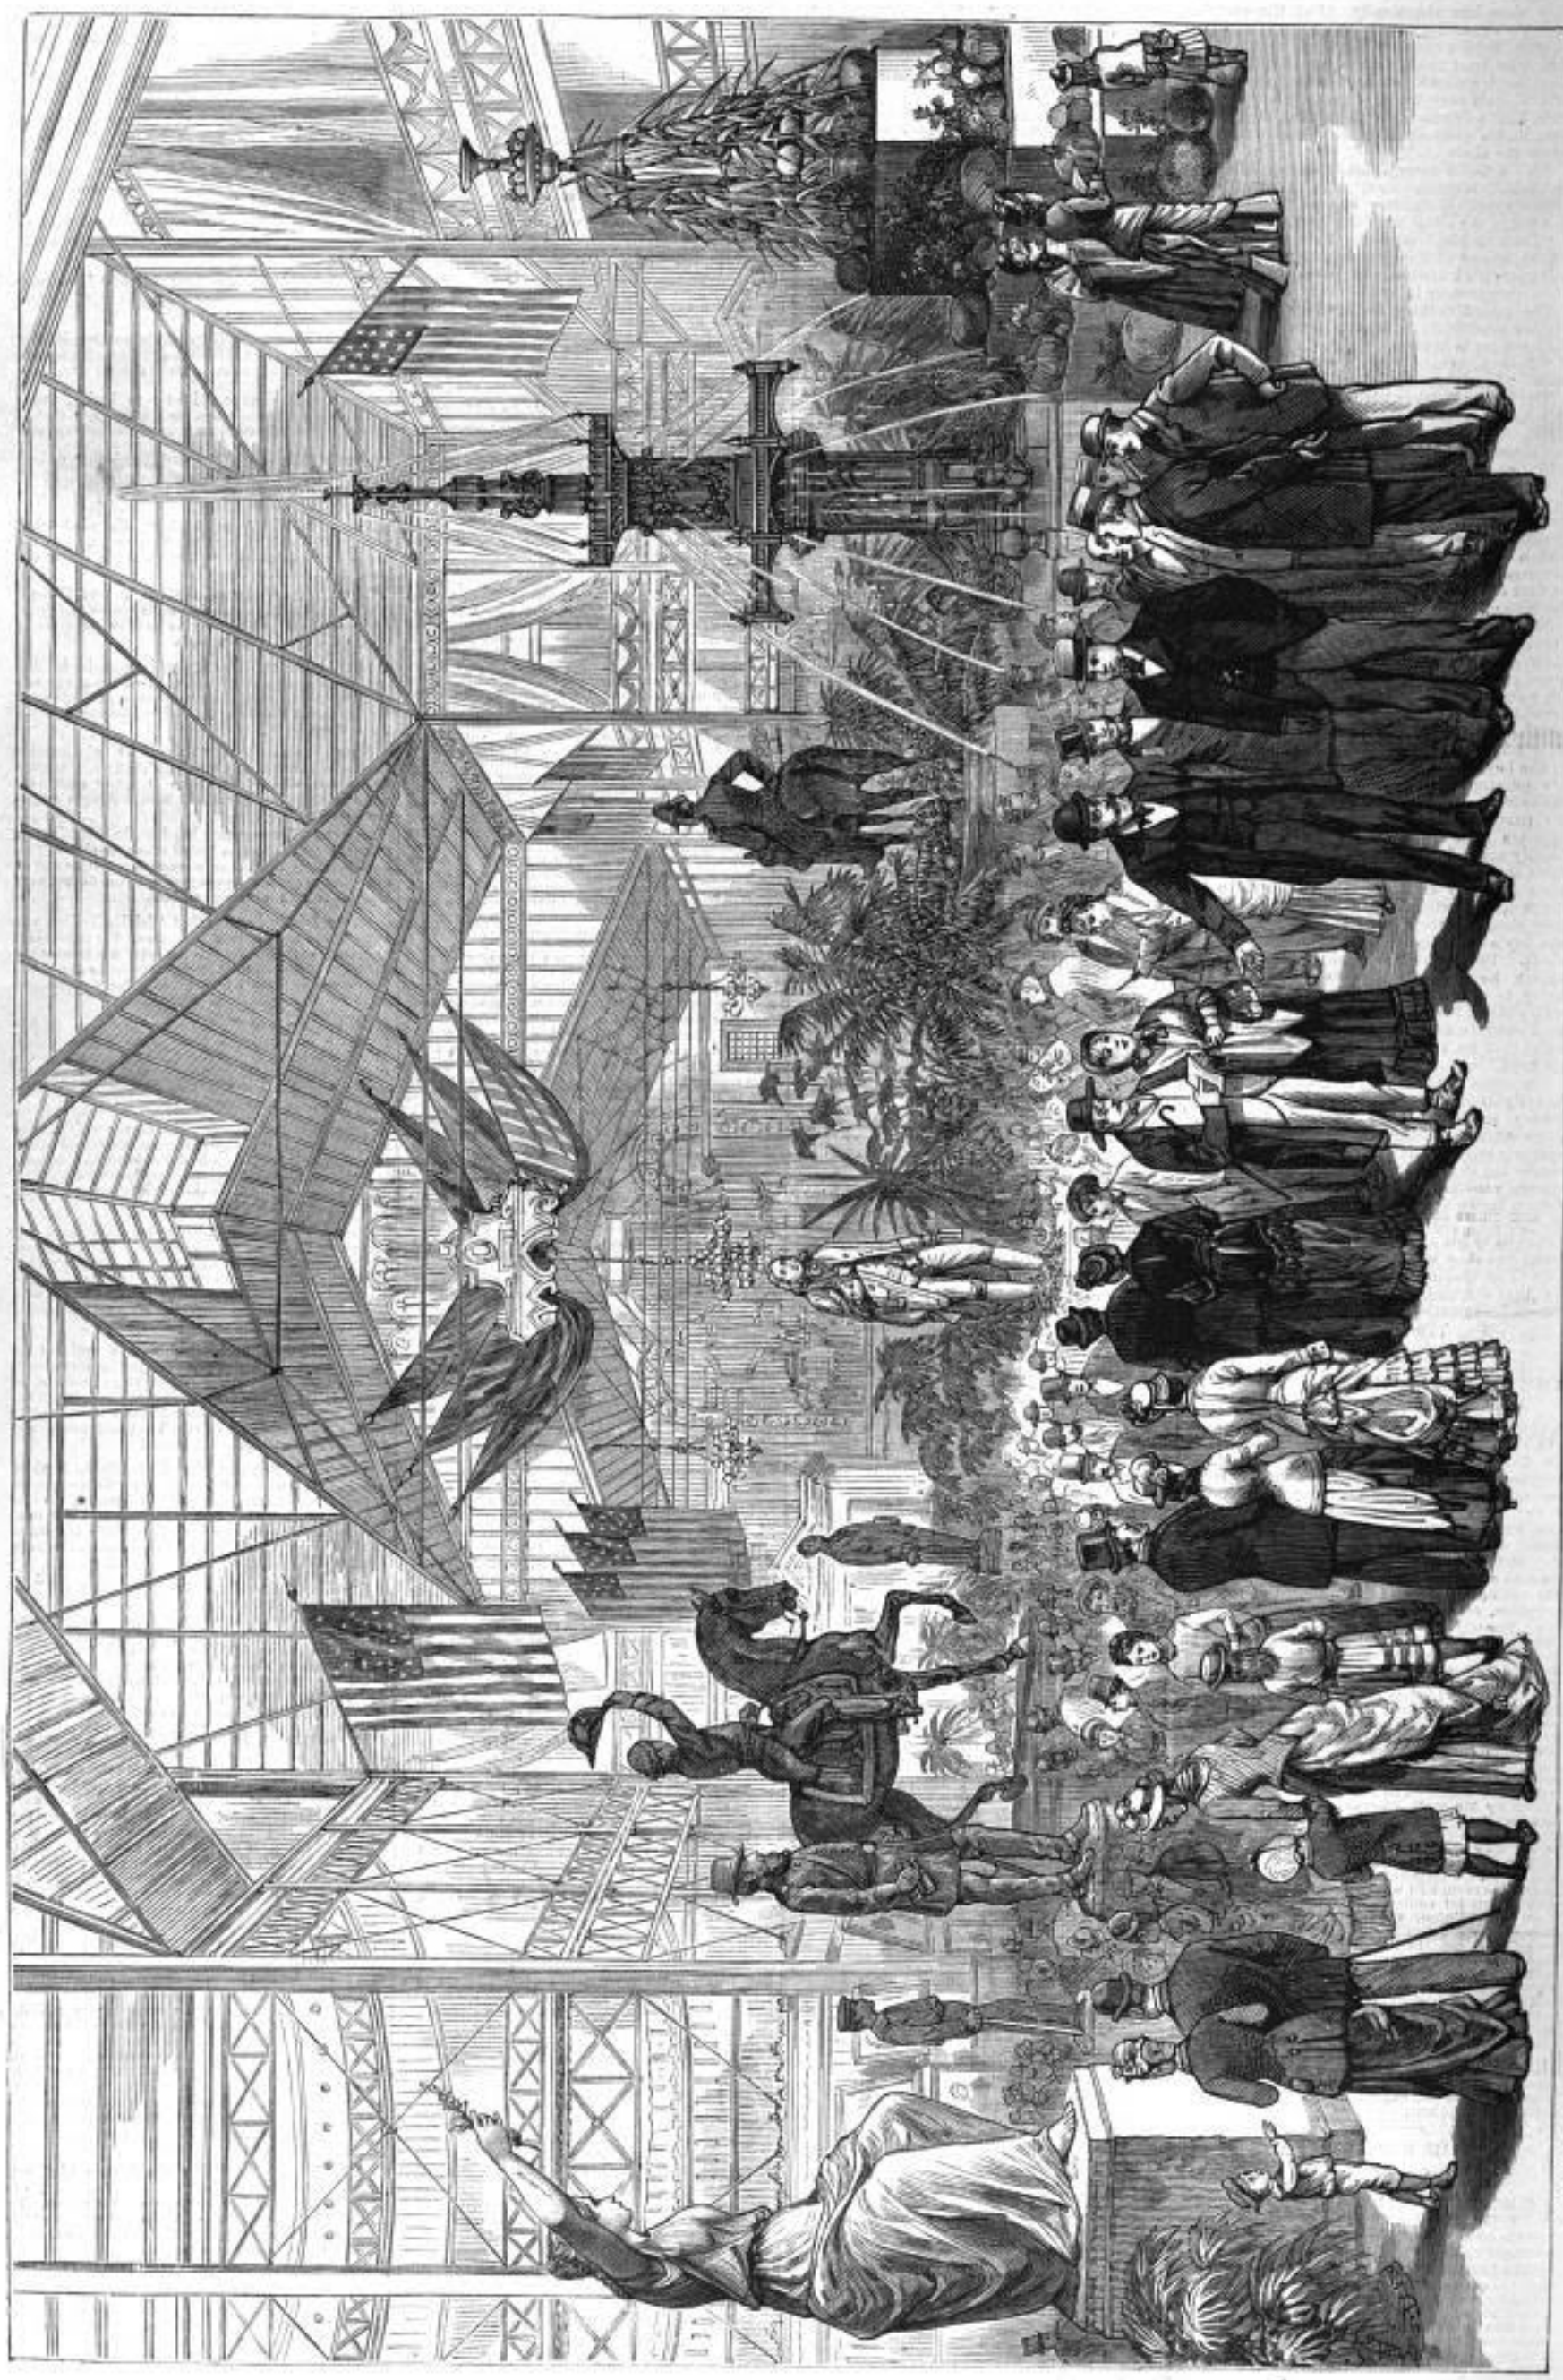
MME. BOTTA, of New York, has given 20,000 francs to the Académie Française, the accumulated revenues of which sum during five years are to be given the best work on the condition of women which shall have appeared within that period. The prize will be awarded for the first time next year.

THE Rev. Dr. Wenger, one of the oldest missionaries in Calcutta, who had given his special attention to Biblical translation in the Sanscrit and Bengali languages, is dead. He was an accomplished Sanscrit scholar, and his version of the Bible is used by all denominations of Christians in Bengal.

CANON FARRAR looks little over forty years old, though in reality he is nearer fifty. He is a grave, thoughtful, studious-looking man, with a shy, reserved manner, who is led by, rather than leads, the conversation. In warm Summer days he is to be found, with books of reference beside him, studying in the ancient cloister gardens of Westminster Abbey.

THE Hon. John A. Cuthbert, a resident of Mobile, Ala., is the oldest living ex-member of Congress. He was born at Savannah, Ga., in 1788; graduated at Princeton College in 1805, served in the war of 1812-15, and was a Representative from Alabama from 1819 to 1821, sixty years ago. He is still hale and hearty, and practices law in the courts of Mobile.

WHARTON BARKER, the Philadelphia banker, who went to Russia several months ago for the purpose of examining into the feasibility of developing the coal fields of the Black Sea, has returned from his expedition. He says that he found the Donetz coal basin and deposits of iron ores in the neighborhood of Krivoi Rog fully equal to the expectations formed of them.



SIR HERCULES ROBINSON, Governor of New Zealand, who has been appointed to succeed Sir Bartle Frere at the Cape, is one of the numerous sons of an Irish clergyman by the daughter of Sir Hercules Langrish. He has an Irishman's love of horseflesh, and never missed an Australian race of any importance. Of conciliatory disposition, he has always got along very well when Governor, and is deemed a safe man by the Colonial Office. He now goes to a different post.

EX-GOVERNOR LELAND STANFORD'S new residence at Menlo Park, Cal., will stand almost in the centre of a plot of ground about 650 acres in extent. The approach to the house will be through a grand, straight drive, bounded by stately elms, and by sinuous pathways decorated by the choicest shrubs. Surrounding the house on all sides will be an arboretum that promises to be one of the most unique of its class in the world. Governor Stanford's intention is to procure from all parts of the world shoots, cuttings, plants and seeds, if need be, of every tree that is likely to succeed in California. He has already received many thousand cuttings and young trees.

THE Czar, being relieved by General Melikoff of the cares of state, devotes his leisure to match-making. It is announced that the Prince Royal of Portugal will, in all probability, marry a princess of the house of Romanoff. The ex-president of the council, who recently started from Lisbon on a series of visits to the capitals of Europe, was charged to open the necessary negotiation preliminary to an engagement on his arrival at St. Petersburg. The eldest daughter of the Prince of Montenegro is stated to have been affianced to Prince Alexander of Bulgaria. The arrangement is said to have been brought about by the special request of the Czar. The princess bears the name of Zorka, and has just reached the age of sixteen.

DR. TANNER has taken the lecture platform, having talked about starvation to an audience of 200 at Booth's Theatre, in this city, one night last week. He claimed that it would be of use in convincing people that they could go without food safely twelve or fourteen days where it is prescribed as medical treatment. He claimed also that it would be of use in showing that such abstinence would not be injurious to the mental powers. Another thing proved by it is that the stomach is not made by fasting incapable of performing its functions. If he had done nothing but prove these things, he thought he had proved enough. He thought it was a great achievement to prove that the animal part of us is subjected to the higher powers of the mind.

Digitized by Google

PENNSYLVANIA.—ANNUAL FAIR OF THE STATE AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY IN THE PERMANENT EXHIBITION BUILDING, PHILADELPHIA.—FROM SKETCHES BY WALTER GOATES.—SEE PAGE 59.

Digitized by Google

EUROPE AND THE ALBANIANS.

THE attitude of the Albanians in resisting the collective will of Europe is attracting more and more attention. Albania, as will be seen by a reference to the map, forms the southwest district of European Turkey, and occupies the west of the Balkan Peninsula, from Bosnia and Montenegro to the Greek frontiers. Upper or Northern Albania corresponds to the Illyria of the Romans; Lower or Southern Albania corresponds to the ancient Epirus. The country is mountainous and irregular throughout, numerous spurs of the loftier range, with intervening elevated plains, projecting themselves to the coast. To the south of Pindus the country becomes more elevated and even more irregular. The valley in which stands the town of Janina, by the shores of a lake of the same name, is 1,900 feet above the sea. The mountains rise to a great height all around. The country is well wooded. The rivers and lakes are numerous.

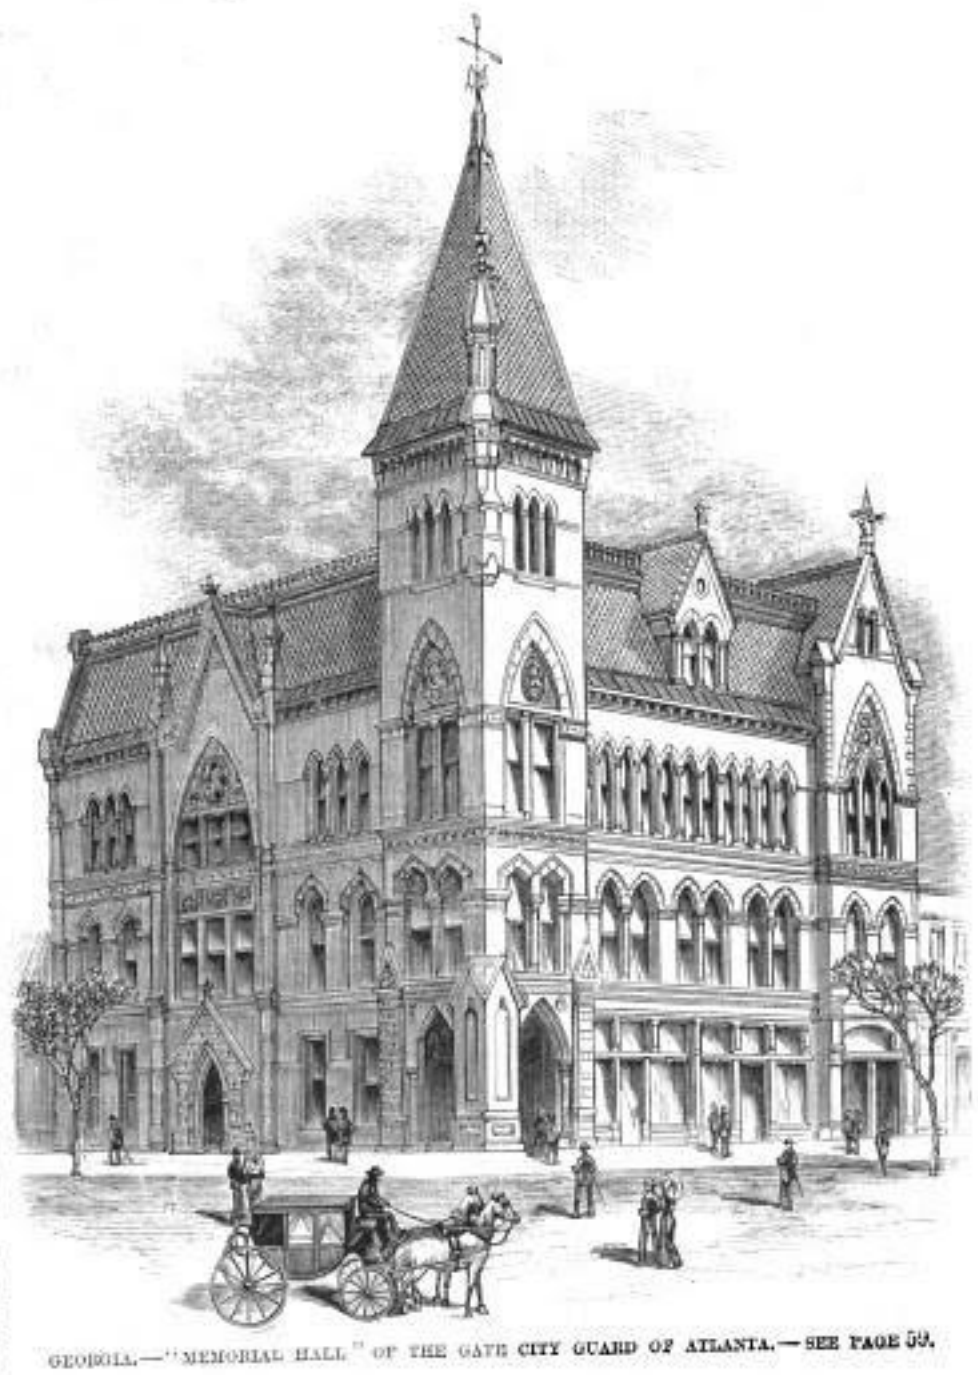
With the exception of a few tribes, the Miriditæ and others in the northern part of the country, who belong to the Roman communion, the inhabitants of Albania are either Moslems or members of the Greek communion, or, as it is called, the Orthodox Church. At one time Albania was wholly Christian; and in Bosnia and Herzegovina it was rather the power of the sword than the power of persuasion that induced the population to prefer the Crescent to the Cross. As it is, a large proportion of the people still profess Christianity, and, thanks to the tolerant spirit which prevails among these mountaineers, the spire of the Christian Church is not unfrequently quite as conspicuous an object of the landscape as the Moslem minaret. As a rule, the Albanians are fine fellows. They are very intelligent, and seem to be fairly industrious, considering the great insecurity of acquired property. They may be seen working in the fields, with musket or rifle slung to their backs, ready for a fight at a moment's notice. They number in all 720,000 souls.

ALBANIAN SOLDIER OF THE DIBRA CLAN.

THE MIRIDITE PRINCE PRINKDODER, PRESIDENT OF THE PROVISIONAL ALBANIAN NATIONAL GOVERNMENT.

ALBANIAN SOLDIER OF THE CLEMENTI CLAN.

negro, and Greece is not likely, even with her regular trained army of some forty thousand, to try to cope single-handed with the Albanians. The Albanians are favored in their purposes by nature. Scarcely any stronger ground of vantage could be wished by men determined to defend their country to the last than that which they possess in Skodra (Scutari), literally the "City of the Hill," now the centre of the Albanian League. It is a rocky stronghold that could be easily rendered impregnable, rising from the centre of a plain that drinks from the rivers Drim and Bojana and from a beautiful lake, and is in turn belted by mountains whose circle seems to yield only to the impetuous influx of these rivers. In its strategic capacities it is all that could be desired.



When the supplementary conference met at Berlin, the Albanians sent Abdul Bey and Mehemet Ali to plead their cause, and the League sent a telegram as follows: "The Albanians will never consent to the dismemberment of their country (by the cession of Dulcigno to Montenegro), nor to any exchange which makes them subject to foreign domination. They protest against the prescriptions of the treaty of Berlin. They renew to the plenipotentiaries their prayer that their request for the maintenance of the inviolability of their ancient rights may be taken into serious consideration. They claim the recognition of having prevented needless bloodshed and of having contributed to the advancement of civilization."

Even if the Powers should unanimously insist upon the execution of their decisions regarding Turkey, it is probable that much blood will be shed before their will is fulfilled. A late report says the Porte had handed a note to the ambassadors stating that the Albanians had agreed to the cession of Dulcigno, but subsequently, with genuine Turkish vacillation, this note was withdrawn, leaving the situation practically unchanged.

A late writer says: "Left to themselves, the Albanians would undoubtedly have the upper hand in a contest with Greece, and they would also resist the Porte if it attempted to force them into submission. The whole of Albania and Epirus is so mountainous and is of such a nature that, as in the case of Bosnia, it would require a very strong force to subdue it. Some of the best-informed Albanians declare that they could put upwards of 200,000 armed men in the field, and I believe their estimate is not exaggerated. Although these troops would not be organized as an army, they are, perhaps, the finest material for soldiers in the world, and would prove a most dangerous enemy in mountain warfare. A very large number of the Geghe tribes are already armed with Martini-Henry rifles. The situation is sufficiently grave, and the Porte could scarcely be expected to enter with much zeal into charging itself with the expense and the danger of amputating one of its own limbs. Who, then, is to provide the army necessary to bring the Albanians to submission? If it is to be done by the armies of the European Powers, it will at once produce the very complications which it sought to avoid, by forcing upon Turkey the cession of territory to Greece. It must be owned that the Albanians are masters of the situation if they choose to assert their independence."

THE LATE GENERAL A. T. A. TORBERT.
FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BROADBENT & TAYLOR.—SEE PAGE 59.

GEORGIA.—"MEMORIAL HALL" OF THE GATE CITY GUARD OF ATLANTA.—SEE PAGE 59.

Digitized by Google

Crystallized Eggs.

THE egg traffic of this country has risen to an importance which few comprehend. The aggregate transactions of New York City alone must amount fully to $5,000,000 per annum, and in the United States to $18,000,000. A single firm in that line of business East handled $1,000,000 worth of eggs during the year. In Cincinnati, too, the traffic must be proportionately large. In truth, the great gallinaceous tribe of our country barnyards contributes in no small degree to human subsistence, eggs being rich in nutritive properties—equal to one-half their entire weight. Goose, duck, and hen eggs are the principal kinds produced in America. We have nothing, however, like what we are told used to be found in Madagascar, or have been found there—the gigantic roc egg, measuring thirteen and a half inches in extreme length, and holding eight and a half quarts. One of these birds, with a single effort, might supply a modern boarding-house with omelets for a day.

The perishable nature of eggs has naturally detracted from their value as a standard article of diet. The peculiar excellence of eggs depends upon their freshness. But lately the process of crystallizing has been resorted to, and by this process the natural egg is converted into a delicate amber tint, in which form it is reduced seven-eighths in bulk compared with barreled eggs, and retains its properties for years unimpaired by any climate. This is indeed an achievement of science and mechanical ingenuity, and has a most important bearing on the question of cheaper food, by preventing waste, equalizing prices throughout the year, and regulating consumption. In this form eggs may be transported without injury, either to the equator or to the poles, and at any time can be restored to their original condition simply by adding the water which has been artificially taken away. The chief egg-desiccating companies are in St. Louis and New York. No sugar or other extraneous matters are introduced in the process of crystallizing; the product is simply a consolidated mixture of the yelk and albumen. Immense quantities of eggs are preserved in the Spring of the year by liming. Thus treated they are good for every purpose except boiling. It is a common trick for some dealers to palm off eggs so treated for fresh, so that imposition is easily practiced. In the desiccating process, however, the difference becomes apparent, as from four to five more limed eggs are required to make a pound of egg crystallized than when fresh are used, and eggs in the least tainted will not crystallize at all.

Some of the most experienced egg-dealers declare that there is no profit in raising poultry to compare with producing eggs. A single hen will lay from twelve to fifteen dozen eggs per annum, selling at an average of 13 cents per dozen, and the birds thus occupied can be housed and fed for less than 50 cents for the whole period. In the East the price per dozen is much higher. Here we buy them by the dozen. Step into an Eastern produce establishment, and they will sell so much for a quarter of a dollar. There is no reason why the crystallizing process should not become quite general, egg production stimulated as never before, and the food supply receive large accession from this source. The already great and increasing consumption of eggs in England and France shows growing appreciation for this kind of food compared with any other. In Lima and Peru eggs sell at $1 per dozen—equal to $4 per pound crystallized. It is thought that this new process for preserving for utilization the industry of our hens and pullets may be very acceptable, as well as beneficial in a business and domestic point of view.

What Melikoff has Done for Russia.

GENERAL MELIKOFF'S common-sense method of restoring public confidence in the Imperial Government is illustrated by the official return that from the date of the military dictatorship in February to May last, about 1,400 students and other young men were liberated, and 4,300 persons freed from police surveillance. Besides these, 2,000 youths who have been expelled from various educational establishments have been allowed readmission. It is also officially announced that from May to August 115 persons were either altogether freed from police surveillance and restored to their homes from exile, or received some mitigation of their sentences. Of this number thirty re-entered the universities, and remain there at present; 1,696 persons continue under surveillance. The recent ukase abolishing the Third Section and the Supreme Executive Commissioner is received by the St. Petersburg press with a chorus of rejoicing. The Golos says that "Russia has entered upon a period of government by established law. The abolition of the Third Section shows that arbitrary administration has been radically condemned, and the personal security of every honest subject is rendered inviolable; whilst the nomination of Count Melikoff proves that the necessity of confiding the ministry of the interior, now more than ever a post of the highest importance, to a statesman who can rise to the height of the occasion is fully recognized." Another journal exclaims, "The ukase rings out an appeal to each and every one to work henceforth with fearless confidence for the good of his native land, under the protecting shade of legality and justice. God grant that Russia may never again see such dark and troublous times as she has lived through these two years."

Patti's Country Home

PATTI has fixed her country home in Breconshire, South Wales, where she some time since bought a property called Craig-y nos Castle, and it is a curious coincidence that Craigy is said to mean, in the patois of the district, nightingale. The castle, an Elizabethan structure, is finely placed on the slope of a hill, and on its improvement and that of its grounds the great prima donna has already expended many thousand pounds. In this State, she could not have purchased the property without naturalization, or a special Act of the Legislature, but England is more liberal, and though she has but little land, it is free to all who wish to purchase it. The castle is two hours' drive from the Swansea Station, but a victoria, with four beautiful pet ponies, soon carries visitors over the ground, and there is talk of a railroad which will give a station near the castle. A visitor describes Ia mistress as singing all over the house and gardens. The house is crammed with beautiful things—offerings to its mistress. Such are the splendid plate and exquisite china and glass used in the table service. At this retreat the diva sumptuously entertains her friends, and lately surprised them with a splendid display of fireworks by a London pyrotechnist, lighting up vividly the woods and rocks of her lovely domain. When the display ended, and the moon emerged from the clouds, there was a call for a song, and, stepping out on the terrace, whither a piano was wheeled, she sang, amid a silence broken only by the low purling of a brook over the pebbles, "Home, Sweet Home."

The Population of Maine.

SUBSTANTIALLY complete census returns show that the population of Maine is about 639,000—a gain of about 12,000 since 1870. As there was a considerable loss in the population during the previous decade, it would look as though the tide has turned in their favor, and that Maine has ceased to be so much of a State to emigrate from as it has been. It is noticeable that the increase in the population has been mainly in Androscoggin and Aroostook—the former a manufacturing and the latter a farming county. Aroostook has gained nearly 12,000 and Androscoggin over 9,000, while Hancock has lost over 6,000 and Penobscot over 4,500. Generally speaking, the farming towns outside of the new county of Aroostook have lost somewhat. At the same time the quantity of farm products has increased, indicating that the use of machinery in farm operations has reduced the number of farm laborers and at the same time increased the product. The tendency of population to leave the country and remove to the villages and cities is not as great as ten years ago. Maine has been subjected to a great draft in consequence of the great temptation held out by the virgin soil of the West. She has suffered more than some other States because it was not until within a quarter of a century that manufactures obtained any considerable foothold in the State. As it is they have only made a beginning. With the extensive water-power, the cheap building materials, and the young population seeking for employment, they present unsurpassed opportunities for manufacturing enterprises.

Quarries One Thousand Years Old.

AN interesting paper on ancient quarries of calcareous or Oriental alabaster and flint was read by Rev. H. G. Hovey, before the American Science Association at its recent meeting in Boston. The paper was profusely illustrated by maps, diagrams and specimens, and the discoveries described were of a remarkable nature. The quarries are in the Wyandotte Cave, Indiana, and have long been regarded as evidence of the vandalism of saltpetre miners who labored here in 1812; but experiments as to the rate of stalagmitic growth prove this to be an error, and that these works are at least 1,000 years old. In further proof of their being due to the Indians, Mr. Hovey exhibited stone pounders, which were found in the dirt, and which would not have been used by those having better tools. When the newer portion of the cave was first opened, the speaker, who was one of the early explorers, saw many Indian footprints and torches and other relics. Two years ago he found a flint mine and workshop about a mile under ground, amid cinders of old fires, fragments of torches and similar proofs of Indian occupancy. A stone lamp was also found, with an abundance of flint chips and oblong blocks of a size convenient to be carried away to be made into arrow-heads, hoes, etc., in the open air. Search at the mouth of the cave had unearthed quantities of such articles. Alabaster ornaments are less plentiful. The material undergoes decay on exposure to the elements, yet a few specimens were found and deposited with the Smithsonian Institution. The fact of the decay of this kind of alabaster, and also of the fading of flint, was established by a series of experiments.

FUN.

WHY is a room full of married people empty?—Because there is not a single person in it.

MAMMA: "You are very naughty children, and I am extremely dissatisfied with you all!" Tommy: "That is a pity, mamma! We're all so thoroughly satisfied with you, you know!"

BUTCHER (rushing out): "Hey—ess that your dog, man?" Donald (whose dog is running away with a piece of meat): "Aweel—he wass mine once, but he's aye doein' for hossel ye noo?"

A STRANGER, passing a churchyard and seeing a hearse standing hard by, inquired who was dead. The sexton informed him. "What complaint?" asked the inquisitive one. Said the old man: "There is no complaint; everybody is satisfied."

A FRIEND of ours was once on board of a schooner wind-bound in the Bay of Fundy. Speaking of it afterwards to an old lady friend, she exclaimed: "Wood-bound, were you? Why didn't you take some saffron tea?—it's the best thing in the world for wind."

FASHIONABLE Galveston young lady at a social gathering remarks jestingly to Gilbooly: "I wonder how much I would bring if I was put up at auction and sold to the highest bidder?" "Just about $1,000." "Why, my jewelry alone is worth that." "Yes; that's what I put it down at in my estimate."

A BACKWOODS preacher once elucidated as follows in connection with the parable of the virgins: "In ancient times, my beloved hearers, it was the custom, after a couple had been married, for ten virgins to go out with lighted lamps and meet 'em on the way home, five of those virgins being males and five females."

HE had not seen his friend for some years. The other day he met him coming up Galveston Avenue, with his wife on his arm, accompanied by a little boy, and said: "I would have known you anywhere by that boy. He has got your mouth and chin, but his nose, eyes and forehead are precisely like his mother's. I never saw such a perfect resemblance." The boy was an adopted one. Tableau.

A TORONTO patent medicine man recently ruined the sale of his "Pulmonic Balsam" by publishing a testimonial from a man who asserted that "his wife, who had not been able to speak above a whisper for five years, had her voice completely restored by the use of one bottle." When the Toronto man realized the effect of the publication, he wrung his hands and said, "An enemy hath done this thing."

IT was on a Sound boat, and the mate was evidently annoyed about something. "Carry it forward," he roared. "Carry it forward, you lunk-headed son of a sculpin, or I hope to be gee whizzled gaul dusted to jude if I don't maul the dad slammed head off'n ye with a capstan bar, you log-backed mollygrubber, ye!" And the deck hand looked up in profound admiration and said: "By George, cap., if I had your cubcher, I wouldn't be a runnin' as mate for no man in these waters; I'd be a commandin' a boat of my own."

GREAT DISTRESS

is often suddenly experienced from an attack of cramp in the stomach, colic or other painful affections for the relief of which nothing is superior to Dr. Pierce's Compound Extract of Smart-Weed, or Water-Pepper, compounded from the best French brandy, Jamaica ginger, smart-weed, water-pepper, and anodyne gums. For diarrhœa, dysentery, bloody flux, cholera-morbus, its warming, soothing, astringent and healing properties render it a perfect specific, unsurpassed as an anodyne and stimulating embrocation or liniment. Should be kept in every family. Sold by druggists at fifty cents.

It is a substantial fact that the six leading and favorite seaside resorts, i. e., Oriental Hotel at Manhattan Beach, Palisade Mountain House, Pequot House at New London, Nantasket Beach Hotel, Old Orchard Beach and Hygeia Hotel at Old Point Comfort, have made use of H. W. Johns' LIQUID ASBESTOS PAINTS in the decoration of their buildings, on the principle that "the best is the cheapest," and we advise our readers, in order to procure the genuine article, to send for sample sheets of colors to H. W. JOHNS' M'F'G Co., 87 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

ALL housekeepers will be pleased to learn that the well-known firm of George T. Hecker & Co. are offering a Baking Powder which will be welcomed by their numerous customers and the public. Although there are many other Baking Powders in the market, yet the want of a pure and perfectly reliable article has been long felt. HECKERS' BAKING POWDER will soon, doubtless, be as extensively used as their celebrated FARINA and SELF-RAISING FLOUR.

FISK & HATCH,
Bankers,
AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT BONDS,
And other desirable Investment Securities,
No. 5 Nassau St., New York.

Buy and sell all issues of Government Bonds, in large or small amounts, at current market prices, and will be pleased to furnish information in reference to all matters connected with investments in Government Bonds.

We are prepared to give information in regard to first-class Railway Securities, and to execute orders for the same.

Buy and sell all marketable Stocks and Bonds on commission, at the Stock Exchange and in the open market.

Receive accounts of Banks, Bankers, Merchants and others, and allow interest on daily balances; and for those keeping accounts with us we collect United States coupons, and registered interest, and other coupons, dividends, etc., and credit without charge.

☞ We give special attention to orders from Banks, Bankers, Institutions and investors out of the city, by Mail or Telegraph, to buy or sell Government Bonds, State and Railroad Bonds, Bank Stocks, Railroad Stocks, and other securities.

We have issued the Seventh Edition of "Memoranda Concerning Government Bonds," copies of which can be had on application.

FISK & HATCH.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE
IN NERVOUS PROSTRATION.

AM using Horsford's Acid Phosphate in a case of nervous prostration and getting a good result already. C. W. PRINDLE, M. D.
GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.

ANGOSTURA BITTERS were prepared by Dr. J. G. B. Siegert for his private use. Their reputation is such to-day that they have become generally known as the best appetizing tonic. Beware of counterfeits. Ask your grocer and druggist for the genuine article, manufactured by Dr. J. G. B. Siegert & Sons.

MANY thousands of claims for injuries and death by accidents have been paid in cash by THE TRAVELERS.

THE ST. NICHOLAS HOTEL, Broadway, New York, so long the leading Hotel of the great city, fully maintains its high standard of excellence, and in comfort and luxury has no superior in this country or in Europe. Its location, for healthfulness and the convenience of travelers, is the very best. On account of its thorough good order, safety and superior rooms, it is especially adapted for families and ladies traveling without escort, who are treated with every respect and consideration. The proprietor, with his family, resides in the Hotel, giving to it his constant personal supervision; the result is that the ST. NICHOLAS is, in every respect, the Model Hotel.

IMPURE BLOOD, General Debility, Scrofula, Erysipelas, Pimples, Carbuncles, Unhealing Sores and other diseases demanding a treatment essentially Tonic, Absorbent, Alterative, Blood Cleansing, Blood Making and Health Restoring, yield readily to the most perfect and elegant of medicinal preparations, DR. BROWNING'S TONIC AND ALTERATIVE. Prices 50 cents and $1. For sale by the Proprietor, W. Champion Browning, M.D., 1117 Arch Street, Philadelphia, and all Druggists and Dealers in Medicines.

EPPS'S CHOCOLATE ESSENCE.
Product of a special refining process. It is Chocolate divested of its over-richness and substantiality. Sugarless, and, when made, of the consistence of coffee. An afternoon Chocolate. Each packet is labeled JAMES EPPS & Co., Homœopathic Chemists, London.

ROYAL HAVANA LOTTERY
DRAWINGS EVERY 15 DAYS
FULL INFORMATION &c. FURNISHED BY
J. DUFF & CO., BANKERS
42 NASSAU STREET,
COR. LIBERTY NEW YORK.
Information furnished in KENTUCKY, LOUISIANA and COMMONWEALTH LOTTERIES.

TO THE PUBLIC.
BOKER'S BITTERS.
BEWARE OF COUNTERFEITS AND IMITATIONS
In accordance with the desire frequently expressed, both in the United States and abroad, these Bitters, so long and justly celebrated for their diseases as a cordial, and for their medicinal virtues against all diseases of, or arising from, the digestive organs, will henceforth be put up and sold not only in quart, but
ALSO IN PINT BOTTLES,
for medicinal, family, traveling, and other purposes. To be had at all the principal druggists', grocers', liquor-merchants', etc. L. FUNKE, Jr., Sole Agent, New York, 78 John Street. Post Office Box 1,026.

NO MORE RHEUMATISM
GOUT or GRAVEL. Schlumberger is the only patentee in France. L. A. Paris, 102 W. 14th St., N.Y., his only agent for the celebrated French Salicylates, which relieve at once, cure in four days, without dangerous consequences, their purity being controlled according to French laws by the Board of Pharmacy of Paris. Beware—The genuine has red seal and signature of agent on each box. $1, postpaid. Send stamp for pamphlet. Thousands of references.

Morrow's Colorific
Will change hair to a Brown or Black. One preparation, easily applied. Contains no poisonous ingredients. This signature on the wrapper. Sold by all druggists. Depot, 10 Frankfort St., New York

CANDY
Send one, two, three or five dollars for a retail sample box, etc., by express, of the best Candies in America, put up elegantly, and strictly pure. Refers to all Chicago.
C. F. GUNTHER, Confectioner, 78 Madison St., Chicago.

Newspaper Advertising Bureau.
BY ADDRESSING GEO. P. ROWELL & CO., 10 Spruce St., New York, the exact cost of any proposed line of advertising can be learned. 100-page pamphlet, 10c.

$1.75 Watches. $1.20 Revolvers. New Novelties. Bankrupt Stocks. Felton & Co., Agents, N.Y.

H.W. JOHNS' ASBESTOS
LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING, BOILER COVERINGS
Steam Packing, Sheathings, Fireproof Coatings, Cements
Send for Samples, Illustrated Pamphlet and Price List.
H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO., 87 Maiden Lane, N.Y.

Buquetiere.
The Buquetiere is the Acme of Perfection for wearing the Bouquet in Coat, Dress, Belt or Hair. Simple and durable; in Silk or Bronze. Mailed free on receipt of price, 25 cents each 3 for 60; or per dozen, $2.
GEORGE B. COOPER (Sole Agent), No. 27 Union Square, N. Y.

N.Y. Central & Hudson River R.R.
THE BEST ROUTE EAST OR WEST.
Through Cars between New York or Boston and Chicago or St. Louis.
See NIAGARA FALLS, SARATOGA and the HUDSON.
C. B. MEEKER, General Passenger Agent.

20 NEW CHROMO Cards, No 2 Alike 10c. or 80 Fancy Cards 10c. With Name, J. B. Husted, Nassau, N. Y.

30 Gilt Edge, Chromo, Snowflake, Glass, Lace &c Cards Name On 10c. Franklin Pr'g Co., Fair Haven, Ct.

COLORED & PLAIN FASHION PLATES
IMPORTED MONTHLY FOR
Frank Leslie's
LADY'S MAGAZINE
—AND—
Gazette of Fashion.

This Publication is Acknowledged to be the Fashion Standard of America.

"FRANK LESLIE'S LADY'S MAGAZINE for September is a superb number. The colored plates present the latest novelties in Paris fashions, and the double sheet of plates gives all the new designs of costumes for country and seaside wear, promenade, evening and carriage toilets, bonnets, hats, etc. In addition to the illustrated designs of new and popular wearing apparel, all of which designs are described and explained in detail, there are many pages of choice and entertaining literature, the whole forming a very valuable and interesting number. Every lady should possess herself of a copy of this elegant magazine. $3.00 a year, postpaid."—Monmouth (N. J.) Democrat.

"FRANK LESLIE'S LADY'S MAGAZINE for September contains very instructive matter for the ladies. Here you have a correct idea of what to wear, and how to have it made, without depending on the dressmakers for suitable styles. Besides all this the magazine gives over 80 pages of choice literary matter. Subscription only $3.00 a year."—The Philadelphia Covenant.

Every Number contains full and accurate descriptions of the prevailing styles of Ladies' and Children's Dresses, Hats, Bonnets, etc., etc.; the latest styles of Fichus, Collarettes and Jabots; the latest style of Hairdressing, etc., etc.

The readers of the LADY'S MAGAZINE have the earliest information of the constant change in Fashions, as its reports appear simultaneously with those in the journals of Paris.

Each number is embellished with beautiful engravings finished in the highest style of art, and the contents are highly interesting and entertaining, consisting of stories, sketches, poems, anecdotes, amusing sarcasms, etc., etc.

Published on the 15th of each month. Annual subscription, $3.00, postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

K.y S.L OTTERY
THE KENTUCKY STATE LOTTERY CO.
Has regularly drawn, in pursuance of an Act of the General Assembly of the State of Kentucky, on THURSDAY,
SEPT. 30,
In which there was always a chance of getting $15,000 for $1
LIST OF PRIZES:

1 Prize of	$15,000 is	$15,000
1 Prize of	5,000 is	5,000
1 Prize of	2,500 is	2,500
1 Prize of	2,000 is	2,000
5 Prizes of	1,000 are	5,000
10 Prizes of	500 are	5,000
20 Prizes of	250 are	5,000
20 Prizes of	100 are	2,000
100 Prizes of	50 are	5,000
200 Prizes of	20 are	4,000
500 Prizes of	10 are	5,000
1,000 Prizes of	5 are	5,000
27 Approximation Prizes amounting to		2,700
2,576 Prizes amounting to		$60,700

TICKETS, $1.
For full particulars and orders address
G. UPINGTON, 599 Broadway, New York,
or
M. J. RICHMOND, Covington, Ky.
P. S.—Drawings always take place every 15 days.

Digitized by Google

MANHATTAN BEACH.

VIA GREENPOINT.

Steamer SYLVAN GROVE, from foot of Twenty-third Street, E. R., at 8.45, 9.45, 10.45, and half hourly to 5.45 P.M. Returning, leave Manhattan Beach at 7.35, 10, 11.00 A.M.; 12.00, 12.30, and every half-hour to 10.30 P.M.

VIA BAY RIDGE.

Steamers THOS. COLLYER and MATTEAWAN from 22d St., N.R., at 9.10, 10.25 A.M., and hourly to 6.25 P.M.

Leaving LEROY STREET ten minutes and PIER No. 6 thirty minutes after leaving 22d St. The boats leaving 22d St. at 7.25 and 8.25 P.M. do not stop at Leroy and Pier 6.

The steamer D. R. MARTIN leaves foot of Whitehall Street at 9.35 A.M. hourly to 5.35 P.M. Trains from Manhattan Beach connecting with D. R. Martin for Whitehall Street, leave hourly from 8.35 A.M. to 12.30 P.M., 1.25 to 6.25 P.M., 7.30 to 9.30 P.M. Trains connecting with steamer for Pier 6, Leroy St. and 22d St. leave every hour from 11 A.M. to 9.55 and 10.30 P.M.

GILMORE'S FULL BAND and LEVY every afternoon and evening.

KNOW THYSELF.

THE untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase the new medical work published by the PEABODY MEDICAL INSTITUTE, Boston, entitled THE SCIENCE OF LIFE; Or, SELF-PRESERVATION. Exhausted vitality, nervous and physical debility, or vitality impaired by the errors of youth or too close application to business, may be restored and manhood regained.

Two hundredth edition, revised and enlarged, just published. It is a standard medical work, the best in the English language, written by a physician of great experience, to whom was awarded a gold and jeweled medal by the National Medical Association. It contains beautiful and very expensive engravings. Three hundred pages, more than 50 valuable prescriptions for all forms of prevailing disease, the result of many years of extensive and successful practice, either one of which is worth ten times the price of the book. Bound in French cloth; price only $1, sent by mail, postpaid.

The London Lancet says: "No person should be without this valuable book. The author is a noble benefactor."

An illustrated sample sent to all on receipt of 6 cents for postage.

The author refers, by permission, to Hon. P. A. HISKELL, M.D., President of the National Medical Assoc'n.

Address, Dr. W. H. PARKER, No. 4 Bulfinch Street, Boston, Mass. The author may be consulted on all diseases requiring skill and experience.

HEAL THYSELF

ASK YOUR MERCHANT FOR

LANDRETH'S GARDEN SEEDS

They are NOT sent out all over the country to be sold on commission. They are NOT put up in Fancy Picture Papers, Bio-graving impossible vegetables. They are NOT to be found for sale in groceshops. They ARE grown by the subscribers on their own farms in Pennsylvania, Virginia, New Jersey, and Wisconsin. They ARE put up in plain paper, at the lowest cost. The purchaser, therefore, pays for seed, and not for fancy paper and printing. They ARE sold by respectable Merchants, Druggists, Grocers, etc., who buy them outright, because they know they will prove satisfactory to their customers. They ARE to be had in any quantity in papers—in silk packages, in tins of Peas, Beans, and Corn, or in Bulk. If your Merchant does not keep them, send for Landreth's Rural Register and Almanac, containing catalogue and prices, and order them direct from headquarters. In writing, please mention FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

DAVID LANDRETH & SONS,
21 and 23 South 6th St., Philadelphia, Pa.

ESPECIAL NOTICE

The Commonwealth Distribution Co.

Is authorized by charter from the Legislature of Kentucky for educational purposes, AND IS THE ONLY LOTTERY CO. EVER DECLARED LEGAL BY THE UNITED STATES COURT.

The United States Circuit Court on March 31st rendered the following decisions:

1. THAT THE COMMONWEALTH DISTRIBUTION COMPANY IS LEGAL.
2. ITS DRAWINGS ARE FAIR.

The P. M. General at Washington, after careful investigation, has also declared the Company to be legal and its drawings fair, and entitled to the free use of the mails.

24th

Regular Drawing COMMONWEALTH DISTRIBUTION COMPANY has always taken place in public at Macauley's Theatre, Louisville, Ky., on

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 30TH

1,960 prizes, $112,400, distributed; capitals, $30,000, $10,000, $5,000; 10 of $1,000; 1,947 others, from $400 down to $10. Tickets, $2; halves, $1.

Authorized by the Legislature and sustained by the courts of Kentucky.

Address R. M. BOARDMAN, Courier-Journal Building, Louisville, Ky.; or R. M. BOARDMAN, 309 Broadway, N. Y.; or W. PORTER, 1,227 Broadway, N. Y.; or T. J. COMMERFORD, 212 Broadway, New York.

ELGIN WATCHES,
All styles, Gold, Silver and Nickel, $5 to $40. Watches sent C. O. D. to be examined. Write for Catalogue to STANDARD AMERICAN WATCH CO., PITTSBURGH, PA.

GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Send stamp for Catalogue.
Rifles, Shot Guns, Revolvers, sent c. o. d. for examination.

TAPE-WORM

INFALLIBLY CURED with two spoons of medicine in 2-3 hours. For particulars, address, with stamp, H. ECKHORN, 4 St. Mark's Place, New York.

MUSTACHE AND WHISKERS.

MANMARIAL BALM restores and develops the beard. Warranted sure and safe. Price, $1. NEW ENGLAND MEDICAL INSTITUTE, 24 Tremont Row, Boston, Mass.

50 Chromo, Snowflake and Lace Cards, with name, 10c. 40 all chromos, 10c. Star Printing Co., Northford, Ct.

Carpets,

NEW FALL STYLES.

WE ARE NOW OPENING LARGE LINES OF NEW DESIGNS AND STYLES IN CARPETINGS RECEIVED FROM

OUR OWN FACTORIES,

WHICH WILL BE FOUND TO COMBINE TO AN UNUSUAL EXTENT

Elegance in Style and Finish,
Durability in Wear,
and Economy in Prices.

WE ALSO OFFER AN EXTENSIVE ASSORTMENT OF TURKISH, PERSIAN AND EAST INDIAN CARPETS AND RUGS, AND OTHER POPULAR FLOOR COVERINGS, AT EXTREMELY MODERATE RATES.

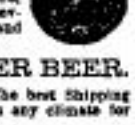
J. & J. DOBSON,

40 & 42 WEST 14TH STREET, N. Y.,
Near 6th Ave. Elevated R. R. Station.

JOHN VAN GAASBEEK, Manager.

DAY'S Kidney PAD

A CURE for the most prevalent and fatal diseases that afflict mankind FOUND AT LAST.



Internal medicines never did nor never can cure KIDNEY DISEASE. STOP IT NOW: apply Day's Kidney Pad AT ONCE, and be cured of all affections of the Kidneys, Bladder and Urinary Organs. It is the only treatment that will cure NERVOUS AND PHYSICAL DEBILITY, and that distressing complaint, "BACK ACHE." It will annually save many times its cost in medicines and plasters, which at best give but temporary relief. Sold by Druggists or sent by mail on receipt of price, $2. Our book, "How a Life Was Saved," giving a history of this new discovery and a large record of most remarkable cures, sent free. Write for it.

DAY KIDNEY PAD CO., Toledo, O.

SCHMITT & KOEHNE.
Central Park Brewery
AND
Bottling Company.

Brewery, Bottling Department and Office, 199—156 East Fifty-ninth Street, Ice-house and Rock-vaults, Fifty-sixth and Fifty-seventh Streets, Avenues A and East River, N. Y.

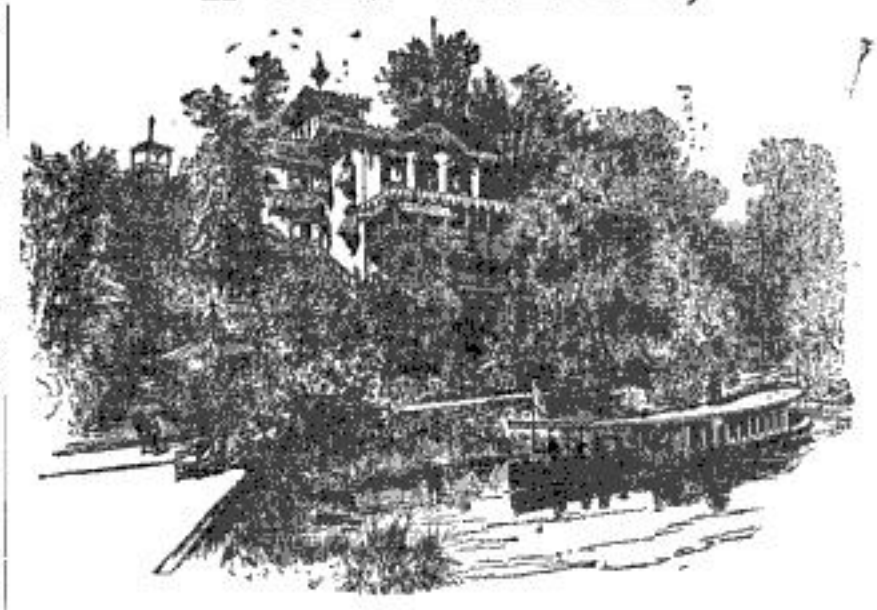
BOHEMIAN and LAGER BEER.

The finest Beer for family use. The best Shipping Beer in bottles, warranted to keep in any climate for months and years.

HONEY BEES

New Principles in Bee-keeping.

Every one who has a farm or garden can now keep Bees with profit. Send for circular. Address,



MRS. LIZZIE K. COTTON, West Gorham, Maine.

18 Elegant New Style Chromo Cards, with name, 10 cts, postpaid. GEO. I. REED & CO., Nassau, N. Y.

40 New Styles Chromos, with name 10c. 40 Agents, Sample 25c. Canaan Co., Northford, Ct.

50 Elegant Cards, New Chromo, Shells, Gilt-edge, etc., with name, 10c. G. A. SPRING, Northford, Ct.

FOR SALE,

"INTERLAKEN,"

THE COUNTRY HOME OF THE LATE FRANK LESLIE, ESQ.,

Consisting of 62 acres, situated on LAKE SARATOGA, and extending back to Lake Lonely.

The house contains twelve rooms, gas and water.

The stable, finished in fine woods, has six box-stalls.

Finely appointed billiard-room, and three handsomely furnished sleeping-rooms over coach-house.

Gardener's cottage.

Conservatories profusely stocked with rare plants.

The furniture, steam-yacht, sail and row boats, French omnibus, etc., will be sold with the place.

Apply to

HOMER MORGAN, 2 Pine Street; or,
V. K. STEVENSON, 25 Pine St., and 661 Fifth Av.

HOPE FOR THE DEAF

Garmore's Artificial Ear Drums

PERFECTLY RESTORE THE HEARING and perform the work of the Natural Drum. Always in position, but invisible to others. All Conversation and even whispers heard distinctly. We refer to those using them. Send for descriptive circular. Address JOHN GARMORE & CO., 8,487, Corner 5th & Race Sts., Cincinnati, O.

JUDGE FOR YOURSELF

By sending 35c money or 40c. postage stamps, with age, you will receive by return mail a correct picture of your future husband or wife, with name and date of marriage. Address, W. FOX, Box 38, Fultonville, N.Y.

SOLDIERS Get the BEST ARTIFICIAL LIMBS on Gov't Order. Apply to Chas. E. Evans, Gov't Mfr. 136 W. 4th St., Cincinnati, O.

50 New Style Cards, Lithographed in bright colors, 15c. 60 Agt's Samples 10c. Comn. Card Co., Northford, Ct.

Agents Wanted.

$350 A MONTH—AGENTS WANTED—75 best selling articles in the World; 1 sample free. Address Jay Bronson, Detroit, Mich.

SALESMEN WANTED $105 A Month and Expenses to sell our Staples. Permanent position. Goods staple. STAMP. E. FOSTER & CO., Cincinnati, O.

AGENTS WANTED EVERYWHERE to sell the best Family Knitting Machine ever invented. Will knit a pair of stockings, with HEEL and TOE complete, in 20 minutes. It will also knit a great variety of fancy-work for which there is always a ready market. Send for circular and terms to the Twombly Knitting Machine Co., 409 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

My New Illustrated Price List describing over 100 Gold and Silver Waltham Watches sent for a 3c stamp. It tells how I send watches to all parts of U.S. to be examined before paying any money. Unincorporated concern. N. H. White, Jeweler, Newark, N. Y.

Little Havana Lottery.

OR SUPPLEMENT TO
THE ROYAL HAVANA LOTTERY.
HAS ALWAYS TAKEN PLACE SEPTEMBER 21st.

1 Grand Prize			$5,000
1 "	"		1,000
1 "	"		500
2 Prizes, $200 each			400
5 "	100	"	500
100 "	18	"	1,800
643 "	6	"	3,858
250 "	2	"	500
9 Approximations of $20 each to the 9 remaining units of same lot as the one drawing the $5,000 Prize			180
2 Approximations of $20 each of the number preceding and following the one drawing $1,000			40
1031 Prizes, U. S. Currency			$13,560

ONLY 25,000 TICKETS. Wholes, $1; Halves, 50 cts.

Prizes paid in full in United States currency immediately on presentation of tickets.

Jackson & Co., Bankers, 52 Nassau Street, New York.
Clute & Co., 200 Broadway, New York.
John W. Clark, 1702 N. Y. Ave., Washington, D. C.
Responsible Agents Wanted. Clark & Co., Gen'l Agts, New Haven, Conn.

Imitation Gold Watches. $5, $10, $15, $20 and $25 each; Chains $1 to $12 to match. Jewelry of the same. Sent C.O.D., by Express, to examine. Send stamp for Illustrated Circular. Orchard Metal Watch Factory, 335 Broadway, N. Y. Box 3698.

$777 A YEAR and expenses to agents. Outfit free. Address, P. O. VICKERY, Augusta, Maine.

SCARCE GOODS.—Books, Photos, &c. Sample Catalogue 3c. Paris Book Co., Chicago, Ill.

Frank Leslie's Pleasant Hours.

A MONTHLY PICTORIAL JOURNAL of LIGHT, PLEASING LITERATURE, INTERESTING AND BEAUTIFULLY ILLUSTRATED STORIES, COMPLETE IN EACH NUMBER.

PLEASING TALES, ADVENTURES, ANECDOTE, AND MIRTH-PROVOKING ILLUSTRATIONS.

For sale by all newsdealers, price 15 cents. Annual subscription, $1.50, postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

COMPREHENSIVE, ATTRACTIVE AND CHEAP!

Frank Leslie's POPULAR MONTHLY.

THE OCTOBER NUMBER NOW READY

WITH THE FOLLOWING ATTRACTIVE TABLE OF

CONTENTS:

"The Theatres of New York." By J. Brander Matthews. Twelve Illustrations.
"My Four Breakfasts in the Palais Royal." By N. Robinson. Four Illustrations.
"Cleopatra's Needle." Four Illustrations.
"The Empire of Annam, and the French Colony of Cochin China." Thirteen Illustrations.
"The Escape of Casanova De Seingalt from the Piombi, Venice." Illustrated.
"Sir Peter Paul Rubens." By Mrs. R. Rees. Nine Illustrations.
"Some Gossiping Papers." No. 2. By Mrs. Barrow.
"An Old Sea-Dog." Four Illustrations.
"The Hand." By F. Jeffrey Bell, B.A. Fourteen Illustrations.
Serial and Short Stories.—"The Amber Witch" (Chapters I.-V.), by the Author of "The House with an L," etc.; Illustrated. "Minnie's Triumph"; Illustrated. "The Tailor's Story"; Illustrated. "Loving and Being Loved"; Illustrated. "Doubles," by Charles Reade; Illustrated. "Fiorentio"; Illustrated. "Derby's Wash-tub"; Illustrated. "Under the Culvert," by C. Shackelford; Illustrated—etc., etc.
Sketches, etc.—"A Few Friends and a Little Music." "My Narrow Escape"; Illustrated. "Joseph Bonaparte—His Life in this Country—Curiosities of Bonaparte Park." "Chinese Whims and Ways." "A Superstition of the Sea"; Illustrated. "Bahama Ben Jamin, Pirate of the Peruvian Gulf"; Illustrated. "Greenlander Harpooning a Narwhal"; Illustrated, etc., etc.
Poems.—"Robin and I," a Rustic Song, by Fanny Forrester. "Insatiability." "The Painted Tyrus"; Illustrated. "The Garden of Cymodoce," by A. C. Swinburne. "Hymn to the Sea," by Dean Alford; Illustrated. "The Lily," by W. C. Bennett. "True Blue"; Illustrated—etc., etc.
Miscellany.—"Gloves." "The Cedar-Bird"; Illustrated. "On Shaking Hands." "The Raccoon"; Illustrated. "Women at an Arabic Fountain, Jerusalem"; Illustrated. "The Gorge of the Tunkis, Peru"; Illustrated. "Antiquity of the Spanish Merino." "An Interesting Relic." "How screws are Made." "The Marble Rocks of Central India." "King and Conjurer." "How Spools are Made." "The Boy and the Snail." "Giuseppina, the Heroine of Sicily"—etc., etc. "Recent Progress in Science," "Entertaining Column," etc., etc.

128 PAGES QUARTO---100 ILLUSTRATIONS.

Colored Plate Frontispiece, "THE COQUETTE," from the Original Painting by Palmarole.

Single copies, 25 cents. Annual subscription, $3; six months, $1.50; four months, $1—postpaid.

Send 25 Cents for a Specimen Copy.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House, 53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Digitized by Google

THE COUNTRY IS SAFE.

"If the Democratic Party wins the Presidency, the country is lost."—Republican Orators.

"The country will go to ruin headlong if the Republicans carry the election."—Democratic Orators.

HECKER'S PERFECT BAKING POWDER

PURITY AND STRENGTH GUARANTEED.

An experience of over thirty years in the manufacture of Self-Raising Flour warrants us in offering this as a Perfect Baking Powder.

GEORGE V. HECKER & CO.,

CROTON FLOUR MILLS, 203 CHERRY ST., N. Y.

HERRING'S SAFES

"Tried and Proven Trustworthy."

Saved Books, Papers, etc., of the following parties in the Manhattan Market Fire.

METROPOLITAN MARKET CO.,
HORACE INGERSOLL,
W. & A. HOLMES & CO.,
JOHN E. CONNOLLY,
JOHN W. BACON,
J. STALL, and FRAZEE & CO.

HERRING & CO.,

251 & 252 Broadway, New York.

NICOLL THE TAILOR.

Fall and Winter Styles
NOW READY.

ELECTRIC LIGHTS used in BOTH STORES.

620 BROADWAY,
AND
139 to 151 Bowery, New York.

Samples and Rules for Self-Measurement
SENT BY MAIL.

TRUSS EGGLESTON SENSIBLE TRUSS. Made on new principles. Send for Circulars. Eggleston Truss, Chicago, Ill.

DR. SCOTT'S ELECTRIC HAIR BRUSH.

A REMARKABLE INVENTION,

Which has won its way to royal favor in England, been cordially indorsed by the Prince and Princess of Wales, and written upon by the Rt. Hon. W. E. Gladstone, is now brought to the notice of the American public. It cures by natural means, will always do good, never harm, and is a remedy lasting for many years. It should be used daily in place of the ordinary Hair Brush. The Brush Handle is made of a new odorless composition resembling ebony; a combination of substances PRODUCING A PERMANENT ELECTRIC VOLTAIC CURRENT, WHICH ACTS IMMEDIATELY UPON THE HAIR GLANDS AND FOLLICLES. This power can always be tested by a silver compass which accompanies each Brush.

It is Warranted to

Cure Nervous Headache in 5 minutes!!
Cure Bilious Headache in 5 minutes!!
Positively remove Scurf and Dandruff!!
Prevent Falling Hair and Baldness!!
Cure all Diseases of the Scalp!!
Promptly arrests Premature Grayness!!
Makes the Hair grow Long and Glossy!!
Immediately soothes the weary Brain!!
Money returned if not as represented!!

IT NEVER FAILS TO PRODUCE A RAPID GROWTH OF HAIR ON BALD HEADS, where the Glands and Follicles are not totally destroyed.

Proprietors: The Pall Mall Electric Association of London. New York Branch: 842d Broadway.

[From REV. DR. BRIDGMAN.]

Brooklyn, June 1st, 1880.

"Gents: I have never before given a testimonial, but am willing to encourage the use of an honest remedy. I am so pleased with your Hair Brush that I deem it my duty to write you recommending it most cordially. My hair, about a year since, commenced falling out, and I was rapidly becoming bald; but since using the Brush a thick growth of hair has made its appearance, quite equal to that which I had previous to its falling out. I have tried other remedies, but with no success. After this remarkable result I purchased one for my wife, who has been a great sufferer from headache, and she finds it a prompt and infallible remedy. A. BRIDGMAN, D.D."

London, Jan. 4th, 1879.

"The Hon. Mrs. Locke deems it a pleasure and duty to state that they have never failed in her case, and many other cures have come under her observation. She also finds them most beneficial for the hair, it being greatly improved by their use."

9 Goodwin St., Bradford, England, Dec. 19th, 1878.

"My Aunt writes me they are the greatest blessing to her, as in all cases they relieve her at once. My hair is growing rapidly, the bald place being quite covered. I do think you ought to make these things known, for the benefit of others, as I am convinced it is the best Hair Renewer yet put before the public. Yours truly, J. JEWETT."

"Over 1,300,000 in use. An honest remedy, worthy of all praise."—British Medical Index.

"Round Lake Camp-Meeting Grounds, Saratoga Co., N. Y., June 8th, 1880.

"Your Brush is certainly a remarkable cure. I am highly pleased with it. Its effect is most wonderful, and you may be sure I shall recommend it heartily among my friends. It is also a splendid Hair Brush, well worth the money, and will last me for years. REV. J. D. ROGERS, Superintendent."

[From ALLEN PEARCE & CO., Wholesale Druggists.] Bristol, England, Feb., 1879.

"The effect was really astounding, removing the pain after a few minutes. As far as real value, they are worth a guinea each."

Over 7,000 similar Testimonials can be seen at our Office.

Remember that this is not a "Metallic" Wire Brush, but made of PURE BRISTLES.

A BEAUTIFUL BRUSH, Lasting for Years.

Mention this Paper. We will send it Postpaid on receipt of $3. Or by Express, C.O.D., at your expense. By Post at our risk.

Or request your Druggist or Fancy Store to obtain it for you, from us.

MONEY RETURNED IF NOT AS REPRESENTED.

As soon as you receive the Brush, if not well satisfied with your bargain, write us, and we will return the money. What can be fairer? This paper will not knowingly publish any humbug, and before advertising the Brush one was placed in the hands of the Editor, with a request to test its merits. We have also placed one in the hands of Mayor Cooper and Postmaster James of New York, as a guarantee of our good faith.

Remittances should be made payable to GEO. A. SCOTT, 842d Broadway, New York. Agents wanted in every town.

They can be made in Checks, Post-office Orders, Drafts or Currency, in Registered or Non-registered Letter. It costs only 10 cents to register a letter.

Do Your Own Printing $3 PRESS prints cards, labels, &c. (Self-inker $5) Larger sizes for larger work. For old or young. Great money savers. A paying business anywhere for all or spare time. Send two stamps for a catalogue of all sizes Presses, Type, Cards, Paper, &c., to the Manufacturers KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

14 STOP ORGANS SUB BASS & Oct. Coupler, 4 Set Reeds, $65. Pianos $125 and upwards, sent on trial. Catalogue free. Address, DANIEL F. BEATTY, Washington, N.J.

$55.66 Agents Profit per Week. Will prove it or forfeit $500. $4 Outfit free. E. G. RIDEOUT & CO., 10 Barclay St., N.Y.

OPIUM Morphine Habit Cured in 10 to 20 days. No pay till Cured. DR. J. STEPHENS, Lebanon, Ohio

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1880, by F. W. Leslie, Assignee, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.—Entered at the Post Office, New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

No. 1,305.—Vol. LI. NEW YORK, OCTOBER 2, 1880. [Price 10 Cents. $4 10 Years; $1 Weeks, $1.00.

AN ALLIANCE MADE ELIGIBLE BY THE MAINE ELECTION—WHO WILL WIN HER?

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,
53, 55 & 57 PARK PLACE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 2, 1880.

A NEW STORY BY WILKIE COLLINS.

In No. 1,307 of FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER will be commenced the publication of a powerful serial story, entitled "THE BLACK ROBE," by WILKIE COLLINS. This story, which will be published by us exclusively from advance sheets purchased directly of the author, possesses all the attractions of style, ingenuity of plot and felicitous delineation of character which peculiarly distinguish Mr. Collins's works, and will, we are confident, afford genuine enjoyment to our readers. Persons who desire to have the story complete, as presented in our columns, should send in their subscriptions at once.

THE DRIFT OF THE CANVASS.

A GREAT deal of importance is attached by political managers and calculators to the first State elections which are held before a Presidential contest—"the first guns of the campaign," as they are technically called. Such preliminary trials of strength are in the nature of so many reconnoissances in force, as made by the general of an army for the purpose of "feeling" the temper and power of the enemy, while the importance attached to them results from two considerations: they show the apparent drift of public opinion, and, when this drift is made clear, it helps to swell itself by drawing within its current what is called the "floating vote."

The first of these considerations is a legitimate object of curiosity to others than those who make a trade of politics. The patriot as well as the politician must watch the signs of the times, must have "understanding of his epoch," if he would act wisely in any given conjuncture. But he does not swim with the current or run with the multitude, unless to him the current shall seem to set in the right direction, and unless the voice of the multitude shall seem to be lifted in defense of the true and the right.

As we do not profess to hold our political opinions at the beck of any party, but profess, on the contrary, to hold them irrespectively of mere party interests and prepossessions, we are not set to interpret "the drift of the canvass" with any view of adding to the volume of the drift. We are more concerned for the success of measures and policies which seem to us wise and timely, than for the success of any particular organization; and as we do not find ourselves in entire accord with the "management" of either of the two great historical parties of the country, while we are entirely opposed to the ends and aims of the Greenback Party, which offers itself as a tertium quid between the Democrats and the Republicans, we hope that we shall be able to ascertain the direction, and measure the momentum, of present political tendencies, revealed by the recent elections in Vermont and Maine, without being lifted from our feet by the current, and without aiding to lift any voter from that independent position which he should hold in the presence of competing and conflicting parties.

And it should not be very difficult either for us or for anybody else to maintain this attitude of a prudent self-reserve, seeing as we do that the recent elections in these States have not established much of a "drift" in any given direction, or impressed it with a volume which makes it irresistible.

In Vermont, after a vigorous and enthusiastic canvass, the Republicans did little more than hold their own. All this vigor and all this enthusiasm were put in the Vermont campaign mainly for "political effect." Vermont is proudly called by the Republicans "the star that never sets." It has never voted for a Democrat during the entire history of the Whig and Republican parties. The drift of its political opinions, like the "compulsive course" of the Pontick Sea in Shakespeare, "Ne'er feels retiring ebb, but keeps due on." It was not, therefore, with any fear of Democratic ascendency in the State that a "red hot" canvass was recently waged in the Green Mountains from month to month. But the position was seen to be a good one for the purpose of winning a "rousing victory," which would tell on the fortunes of the wider political battle outside of the State.

The result in Vermont has neither justified nor confounded these expectations of the Republican managers. Twenty-five thousand majority on the vote for Governor, twenty-one thousand on the vote for members of the House of Representatives, is not an unusual Republican majority in Vermont. But it is a majority quite large enough to show that the honorable name of General Hancock is not a tower of strength into which the Democrats may run and hope to be safe. After a "magnificent dress-parade," as Mr. Blaine so graphically called the Vermont canvass, it appeared from the muster rolls at election day that each party could count on the constancy of its train-band adherents, and not much more.

In Maine the results of the recent election present a somewhat different aspect, but the difference is not so great as it appears to be at first sight. The conflict in this State took on the shape of "a triangular duel" between the Republicans on one side and a coalition between the Greenbackers and the Democrats on the other. There is always an element of weakness in such coalitions, and the inherent weakness of the Maine "fusion" was aggravated by many exceptional causes—by the bad conduct of the "Fusionists" at the last "count" of votes in the State, when in artful ways they sought to snatch a victory from defeat; by jealousies and heart-burnings among the coparceners to the political compact; by defections in the very bosom of the alliance, and by the public dissuasive of General Weaver, the Greenback Presidential candidate, against the policy of any and all confederations with the Democratic Party. And yet, in spite of all these obstacles, the "Fusionists" came very near carrying the State. At any rate, the Republican majority of 15,000 at the gubernatorial election of 1876, immediately preceding the Presidential election of that year, has dwindled to a minimum so slender as scarcely to be appreciable.

That these facts imply a serious defeat of the Republicans it would be idle to deny. And when we consider the spirit which has presided over the Republican canvass in Maine, it cannot be said that the defeat was undeserved. More of sound logic and less of personal bitterness; more of solid argument and less of idle vaporing at the "Solid South," would have better served the ends of the Republicans, if they have any ends which commend them to the reason as well as to the passions of the people. Republican politicians can scarcely afford to throw stones at the "Garcelon thieves," when they remember the glass houses in which they have lived ever since the last Presidential election. The people do not forget that only two Republican Members of Congress could be found in 1877 who were brave enough, or clear enough in their minds, to vote against ratifying the "count" of the Louisiana Returning Board; and while all honest men must abhor trickery wherever it is found, there are some honest people who do not bear with patience the denunciations of men who seem to abhor Democratic trickery in Maine, but look with complacency on Republican trickery in Florida and Louisiana.

The election in Maine is a Republican check, at least a check on the present methods of the Republican canvass; but it does not appear so plain to our minds that it is a Democratic triumph, or an augury of Democratic success in the coming Presidential election. The honors of the victory in the Pine Tree State are mainly due to the Greenbackers, and for their share in these dubious honors the Democrats in other States may have a heavy penalty to pay. The sober sense of the country, the "solid men" of the country, will have nothing to do with the Greenbackers; and Democrats who hunt with them in Maine for the small game of State dignities, or the higher game of a seat in Congress, are putting in peril the Presidential sweepstakes on the national course in November. Each party has some heavy weights to throw off if it would make sure of the prize.

CURIOSITIES OF SPECULATION.

IT is of not a little interest to note how strongly the speculative instinct is developed in our people. There is certainly more or less truth in the assertion of foreigners that Americans care nothing for enterprises that lack the element of danger. Much has been said of the speculations in Wall Street, and that resort of brokers is famous all over the world, but the ventures made there appear as only a drop in the bucket when the speculative manœuvres in the country at large are considered. The present rage for buying mining stocks is one of the most striking illustrations of the adventurous spirit of our people. And yet there are something like forty-four mining stocks now under assessment, and much of what has not inappropriately been dubbed as "wall paper" will prove delinquent either through the inability of the holder to pay the assessment, or else complete disgust at being frequently assessed and never reimbursed with the smallest dividend.

Stock speculation, however, is something with which most persons are more or less familiar. We propose to briefly call attention now to the speculations in other directions. Take wheat, for instance. The operations in this cereal within a year have been large enough to coat three of the most powerful speculators something like a million dollars apiece in losses. The operations of the syndicate of three who, until recently were "bulling" wheat, showed wonderful resources both in wealth and shrewdness; and yet, some years ago, one broker alone cornered the Chicago market, and in spite of all the clamor of badly crippled shorts, and even of remonstrance from the officers of the Exchange, compelled everybody on the wrong side of the market to settle their contracts at his own terms. Usually it is not till towards the end of the month that the short interest shows itself, though shrewd operators will provide for their outstanding contracts whenever there is a reasonable profit. The selling prices—the terms at which transactions must be adjusted—are determined by the position of the market on the day of settlement; and it not infrequently happens that some of the bull operators will arrange fictitious transactions with each other in order to so advance prices that the shorts will be obliged to settle at a high figure; but severe penalties are attached to this trick of making "wash sales," as they are called. Chicago is the great centre of wheat speculation, and the Western operator, no matter what he takes up for a momentary venture, makes perhaps the boldest speculator in the world. It is here that all the speculative campaigns in wheat, involving many millions of dollars, of late years have been planned; and it is here that the "scalper," or smaller speculator, dabbles in wheat, as the petty operator in Wall Street dabbles in stocks, though always in a much bolder fashion. Here on our Produce Exchange there is nearly always a brisk speculation in wheat among speculators—among whom are clerks and cartmen—who care no more for the grain itself than they do for the sand of Sahara, the settlements being made here, as in the West, at the difference between the market price at the time of making the transaction and that current at the time of settlement. There are regular "calls" at the Produce Exchange, just as there are at the Stock Exchange, and they are conducted in much the same fashion.

Then there is the speculation in pork. Immense sums of money are made and lost annually both here and in Chicago in this rather curious object of speculation. Indeed, there is even now one of the most gigantic speculations in pork going on at Chicago that has been seen for a number of years; and it is estimated by those who claim to be familiar with the details that the leading spirit of this speculation has netted fully $1,800,000 since last May as a profit on 600,000 barrels. The same operator at one time recently held no less than 40,000,000 pounds of meats, and the profit on these has likewise been enormous. This gentleman has, it is stated, an active capital of from $8,000,000 to $10,000,000 at his disposal, and it is useless, therefore, for the smaller operators to resist. It is curious sometimes how these speculations are brought about. About a year and a half ago Mr. James R. Keene—who has become so famous that we are privileged to mention his name—in one of his speculations in hog products, badly cornered many of the leading packers of meats at the West, and compelled them to come to him to settle at almost ruinous prices. And not only that, but he had the wires so well in hand that he compelled them to settle a month before the contracts became due, because they had to buy hogs at very high and steadily advancing prices, to fulfill their engagements with him, and the longer they delayed a settlement the worse it was for them. The losses of some of the packers were very heavy, and constituted a bitter lesson not to "go short" of the market when an intrepid operator like Mr. Keene was a heavy holder. This circumstance and the necessity of "getting square," it is now believed, gave rise to the present speculation, and from appearances the account has been more than balanced. Mr. Keene has speculated largely in lard of late years, and fortunes are made and lost in the same way by other speculators both here and in Chicago. The margin required is not great, and the temptation to invest is thus increased.

Then there is cotton. Speculation in "futures"—or cotton for future delivery—has elevated many a poor person to wealth and dragged down many a merchant with unlimited credit. The scenes around the brass ring at the Cotton Exchange here on active days is enough to make the Stock Exchange tremble for its laurels. The cotton speculator generally buys, or sells short, in lots of one hundred bales each; and a profit of a half-cent per pound—especially as the operator may be interested to the extent of thousands of bales—is considered a handsome "turn." There is much legitimate trade done in "futures" with planters who wish to be sure of a market for their cotton at a certain price; but by far the larger part of these transactions are in "paper" cotton, where the operator only requires a settlement on the basis of the market price. To show how far this speculation in "futures" is carried, it may be stated that for the cotton year ending September 1st, the sales in this way were no less than 33,989,000 bales, or more than five times the crop really harvested in the same period. At New Orleans, Mobile, Charleston, Savannah, Galveston, and at many other points thoughout the South, speculation in "futures" goes as steadily as the wind and the tide.

Petroleum is another thing that attracts the speculator. At Oil City, in Pennsylvania, both men and women speculate in Pipe Line certificates, good for 500, 1,000, or 2,000 barrels of oil, as the case may be; and as in San Francisco, where servant-girls are regular speculators in mining stocks, domestics not unfrequently try their luck. The production of petroleum now approximates 80,000 barrels per day, but the sales of Pipe Line certificates average certainly 200,000 barrels per day at Oil City alone, and in active times have reached 400,000 barrels; while in New York we are not very far behind Oil City. The speculation in petroleum in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Pittsburg, while not so brisk as at Oil City and New York, is nevertheless important. There is a petroleum corner in the Produce Exchange, and there is, besides, a regular Petroleum Board in William Street.

Passing on to smaller speculations, it is curious to note what men will do to make money. Some months ago there was quite a brisk speculation in hops, there being as usual two parties—the bulls and the bears—composed in this case of the farmers, who naturally wished prices to go up, and of the brewers, who just as naturally wished prices to decline. The contest raged furiously in this city and elsewhere for many weeks, as there was really a large amount of money involved. A well-known circular, publishing the quotations of hops here, gave great dissatisfaction to the bulls, because its prices were not up to their ideas; and, as the commercial reporters had been in the habit of publishing this circular, it was resolved, at a mass meeting of the farmers, not to subscribe for any paper that published the obnoxious quotations, and a printed notice to this effect was actually sent to all the great dailies of this city. With the right or the wrong of this controversy it is not our purpose here to speak. Suffice it to say that hops can stir up a tempest in more than one way.

Then again, some years ago, when it was proposed to put duties on tea and coffee, there arose a mighty speculation in these articles. One speculator was credited with holding about 60,000 bags of coffee; and the speculation in tea was equally important. At the time of the famine in Bengal, Hindoostan, some years since, there was great speculative activity here in rice, and some heavy losses as well as handsome gains were scored. It was trading on the distressedness of others, for the inhabitants of Bengal depend almost entirely on rice to sustain life, and it was assumed that, when the crop failed in that region and famine ensued, there would be a great demand for our rice; but this was no worse than speculating in breadstuffs, whereby the poor are often the chief sufferers.

Again, at the time of the Russo-Turkish war, when Turkey was invaded, it was the signal for immense transactions in opium, which now comes mainly from that country. And even now there is a large speculation in this drug in progress, based on an anticipated falling-off in the next crop. A number of large drug houses here and in Smyrna, Turkey, control the bulk of the stock, and have already realized large profits on their venture. Turkish prunes, at the time of the war alluded to, were also bought up largely by speculators, and for a while proved profitable; but ultimately this article of speculation, which few would think of in such a connection, proved the ruin of more than one strong house. Fortunes have been made and lost in indigo speculations; and, for that matter, this article has far more commercial importance than might at first be imagined. Then a few years ago, when we had the potato-bug invasion, there was a large speculation in paris-green, and the market advanced materially, partly owing to the large demand and partly through the exertions of speculators. Another curious speculation was that in canary-seed, two or three years since, when it was supposed that the crop would prove a failure. A speculator, with a genius for statistics, actually prepared an estimate of the number of canary-birds in the United States, and the quantity of seed consumed per day, and considerable money was really made in this strange venture. And yet the cases cited here are but a few among many that might be named where what would be called curious sorts of speculation really pay better than half the railroad or mining stocks that are foisted on a credulous public.

THE INTELLIGENT VOTE.

WHENEVER an important election approaches frequent mention is made by the Press of a class designated as "the intelligent vote." Precisely who this mythical class may be it is somewhat difficult to ascertain. It is certainly not intended to designate thereby those who have made political science a study, for their number is few, they differ widely in opinion, and are to be found indiscrimi-nately in each of the great political parties. For the same reason, in the sense in which the term is usually applied, it cannot have for its basis either wealth, general intelligence or social position. To attempt as precise a definition as the case will admit, "the intelligent vote," as used by a partisan Press, is a complimentary term, somewhat undeserved, referring to that large class in the community who have no definite political principles, who take no active part in party warfare, regarding it as a disreputable business, and who, considering themselves a little better than their neighbors in point of education and means, are likely to be cajoled into joining that party which appears to contain the greatest amount of intelligence. In this sense, however, "the intelligent vote" is a misnomer.

Digitized by Google

It is a subject of deep regret to those who have the interests of our country at heart that there should be such prevalent ignorance not only as to the principles underlying our form of government, our political and constitutional history, but even as to the live issues of the day, the questions which produce the divisions of party. And such ignorance is not confined to our foreign-born population and persons in humble circumstances, but reaches largely our native citizens, and is to be found in almost every rank and walk of life. As an illustration: Not long since a group of young men, evidently of American birth and whose appearance indicated the possession of means and education, were seriously discussing the probability of the President of the United States interfering by a pardon or commutation of sentence in the case of a well-known murderer condemned to death under our State law, and it did not seem to occur to the mthat the National Executive in such a case was as powerless as the Emperor of China.

In matters of local or municipal contests, where the question really is as to the selection of the best men, the so-called "intelligent vote" is still less deserving of that title. The "intelligence" may be there, but it is latent, and its usual manifestation is a blind following in the track of party, without an effort to secure the election of the best candidates, and without a voice in placing them in nomination. Its highest ambition is to be on the side of the respectability.

This tendency sometimes makes strange bedfellows in politics. The late John Morrissey was a remarkable man, one sui generis, and no doubt fully deserved the political preferment which he received as a popular representative. In his last contest, his opponent, Mr. Schell, was one of the old Knickerbockers, of the bluest kind of New York blood, a man of wealth, character and position, and yet "the intelligent vote" of the district—the élite of Murray Hill and Fifth Avenue—declined to vote for him and supported and elected a professional gambler and prize-fighter, not because of his political principles, but chiefly because it was fashionable to do so. A few of the respectability gave the signal and the rest followed blindly.

The same authorities which laud the "intelligent vote" are equally strong in denouncing "pot-house politicians" and "low groggeries" as factors in politics. But the ward statesman and the corner gin-seller, from taking an active part in the contest from the beginning, are often far better acquainted with the personnel of the candidates, and are better informed upon the local questions of the day, than the best specimen of the so-called "intelligent vote."

Until those to whom such high qualities of intellect are attributed make some exhibition of them in a practical way by taking part in the formative meetings of the party of their choice, informing themselves of the merits and demerits of those proposed for office, and making their intelligence felt by compelling the selection of good men, they cannot complain that this business is managed for them by men inferior to them in many respects, but superior in activity and in experience as to the practical working of politics.

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

THE temporizing speech which M. de Freycinet, the French Premier, delivered some weeks ago at Montauban is still the cause of strife among the more violent Republicans. His peaceful utterances upon that occasion as regarded foreign politics were considered as an offset to the bold harangue of Gambetta at Cherbourg, but the weakness which he showed in reference to the religious decrees raised a noisy indignation against him. The members of the extreme Left have been loud in denouncing his temporizing policy, and it has been openly stated that he would have to make way for some more thoroughgoing Republican. There is, apparently, a coolness between M. de Freycinet and M. Gambetta, and the various groups of the Left who have attacked the Premie recount upon the acquiescence of the President of the Chamber of Deputies. The cry is now for the immediate execution of the decrees against all the religious communities. Meanwhile Gambetta has absented himself from Paris, and, apparently desirous of showing his sympathies, is visiting the son of M. Victor Guichard, the Vice-President of the Republican Left, the very man who convoked the party and asked them to insist upon the execution of the March decrees. Under these circumstances, the Premier, on Sunday last, tendered his resignation. Two other members of the Cabinet are spoken of as his successors. One is Jules Ferry, the present Minister of Education, who originated the decrees last March, and the other is M. Constans, the Minister of the Interior, who carried them into effect against the Jesuits. Jules Ferry has already been intrusted with the formation of a new Cabinet, which is expected to more nearly reflect the public temper on the subject of the decrees.

The position of affairs in Turkey, although still unsettled, looks more like an immediate decision than it has for some time past. The naval vessels of the six Powers have come together at Ragusa, amid great firing of cannon. The fleet is practically under the command of Vice-Admiral Seymour, and his orders are believed to be explicit. He is to advance along the coast to Dulcigno, and there deliver an ultimatum calling upon the Governor of the town to vacate it and allow the Montenegrins to take possession. The Montenegrin troops are to be in readiness to seize the town, and should the Governor refuse to give up Dulcigno, the Montenegrin army will then take forcible possession under cover of the guns of the fleet. But the British admiral's orders are explicit in stating that he must not land any men. However, as the Albanians are collected in considerable force in the neighborhood—the latest report puts their force at 6,000—it is more than likely that they will resist the Montenegrin advance, and it is reported that they have already assassinated Riza Pasha, the Turkish commander, who was to enforce the cession of Dulcigno. The Montenegrin forces, also stated at 6,000, are said to be in fine condition and eager for the fray. As the equinoctial gales are imminent, the procrastination of the Porte may prove effective, and any approach to the rock-bound coast on which Dulcigno is situated may be found impossible. To add to the difficulties of the position, the intrigues of Said Pasha caused the dismissal of Kadri Pasha, the Prime Minister, who was in favor of yielding to the demands of the Powers. Said Pasha, whose wife has great influence in the harem, succeeded in frightening the Sultan and in having himself appointed premier. The new Prime Minister is totally ignorant upon the subject of European politics, and began his administration by attempting to play a double game. Since then it is said that he has seen the impossibility of such an attempt, and is now urging the cession of Dulcigno at all costs. A policy of reaction will probably follow this appointment in Constantinople, where fanaticism is rapidly increasing. Even in the mosque and in the presence of the Sultan, the Imaun upbraided him with being an unworthy successor of the Khalifs, and with being too ready to place the Christians upon an equality with the Musselmans.

In Russia the principal event has been the imperial assent which has been given to the proposals of General Louis Melikoff and the Minister of Justice for reforming all the branches of the administration in the different provinces. It is well known that there has been enormous corruption in Government circles, and that all attempts to put an end to it up to the present time have proved useless. Curiously enough, just at the same moment that the Czar gave his assent to the proposals for reform, General Milintin, the Minister of War, who was the reformer of the Russian military system, resigned. His reason for giving up this post, which he has held so ably for eighteen years, is said to be a dispute with the Czarowitz. Among the more notable changes that he introduced were the shortening of the term of service from twenty-five to eight years, the abolition of the old system of commissariat and of corporal punishment, and a pure management of the various military stores and accounts. The general finances of the Empire have been found in such a disordered condition by M. Bunge, the new Finance Minister, that a committee will be appointed to investigate the defalcations.

In Southern Russia the fearful Siberian plague, commonly known as the "black death," has broken out in a village near Odessa. The only means by which the officials can fight against its progress is by taking sanitary precautions, and the ignorant peasantry oppose the measures with might and main. The houses are disinfected by burning sulphur in the rooms after they have been hermetically sealed. The use of disinfectants was said to be a profanation of their dwellings, and even the nuns told the people that all persons would be excommunicated who allowed sulphur to be burnt in their houses. In one village the peasants went so far as to prepare a funeral pile on which they proposed to burn a Sister of Charity who was engaged in some sanitary work. The Sister was only saved by the prompt interference of the police.

A VERY important addition to our stock of educational works is the official report of Professor James R. Soley, United States Navy, on "Foreign Systems of Naval Education," just issued from the Government Printing Office. The report deals particularly with the curriculum maintained by Great Britain, France, Germany, and Italy and in its details gives the entire course of instruction of a naval officer from the date of his nomination as a cadet until he attains the highest rank in the service.

THE birth of the Infanta of Spain seems to have inspired King Alfonso with a feeling of clemency towards political and common law offenders, and amnesties have been the order of the day for a week past. The authorities of the island of Puerto Rico have been directed to apply a large sum to aqueducts, ports, schools and other public enterprises, and it may be said, generally, that the Government has lost no opportunity to indicate its profound satisfaction over the event which, at least, adds to the stability of the monarchy.

THE enemies of Spanish domination in Cuba are again becoming restive. It is said that a new conspiracy is on foot which aims at inciting the negroes to demand their full liberty at once, and, in case of a denial of their demand, it is intimated that a general uprising may follow. Such a movement, while it would no doubt command widespread sympathy, would be at this time conspicuously unwise, and it is to be hoped that the cause of Cuban independence may not be jeopardized by any such attempt.

THE reasons assigned by the Republicans for the failure of their expectations in Maine are as numerous as they are ludicrous. One is that the Fusionists purchased a great many voters at the last moment when it was too late to counteract their "perversion." But did the Republicans spend no money in the same direction? Would they not have bought every purchasable voter in the State if the opportunity had offered? The truth is that, for once, the Republicans of Maine have been beaten at their own game—a bad enough game it is, and always has been—and they only make themselves contemptible by setting up a pretense that they have been outraged and wronged by their opponents.

THE renomination of Mayor Kalloch by the workingmen of San Francisco, if an election shall finally be ordered, will afford the people of that metropolis an opportunity to pass directly upon the pretenses of that notorious official. It can scarcely be possible that the verdict will be otherwise than unfavorable. No community which has any regard whatever for its own reputation can afford to applaud a career so utterly abhorrent to decency and good morals as Kalloch's has undoubtedly become. To re-elect him to the Mayoralty would amount to a declaration that San Francisco prefers violence to order, corruption to purity, and the rule of brutality to the supremacy of virtue and intelligence.

THE movement looking to the organization and development of co-operative societies in New York and elsewhere is gaining strength. It includes among its supporters some of our most prominent citizens, whose names afford an assurance that it will be given a practical direction on a sound basis. It is proposed to establish a large retail co-operative society at the earliest possible day, and meanwhile to organize several smaller retail societies upon a uniform plan, with a view to promoting the co-operative system of trading which has proved so successful in England. The development of the plans now maturing will be watched with a good deal of interest by those classes in the community for whose benefit co-operation is especially designed.

THE trade in live cattle between this country and Europe has so increased as to supersede in extent that in dressed meats. Five years ago the business was regarded simply as an experiment. In 1879 the shipments reached 105,324, of which amount 33,295 were live cattle and 72,029 dressed carcasses. For 1880, from January up to the first two weeks of August, the shipments were 64,843 live cattle and 53,533 carcasses of beef—a total of 118,376. The trade amounts in money value to from $32,000,000 to $35,000,000 a year. With the removal of the unjust restrictions on American cattle now imposed in Great Britain, the trade will no doubt attain still larger proportions, there being practically no limit to the supply of cattle available for exportation.

THE total domestic exports from the United States during the last fiscal year amounted in value to $823,946,353. Of this aggregate $680,000,000 consists of the products of agriculture alone, or 82½ per cent. of the whole—our exportation of breadstuffs exclusively amounting to $288,056,835. The total shipments of wheat were 153,252,795 bushels; adding 6,011,419 barrels of flour, equal to 30,057,095 bushels of wheat, the total export of wheat and flour becomes equivalent to 183,309,890 bushels, with a money value of $225,879,502. For the preceding year, the figures were 122,353,933 bushels of wheat and 5,629,714 barrels of flour, equal together to 150,502,506 bushels, valued at $160,268,798. The wheat exports of last year, therefore, exceeded those of the year preceding by 32,807,384 bushels.

AN effort is to be made by a census shortly to be taken to ascertain the exact Indian population of the United States. The country has been divided into four sub-divisions, each superintended by a special supervisor, with whom the Indian agents at the sixty different agencies will co-operate. The work will necessarily be slow, since nearly two-fifths of the Indians report at the agencies only periodically, making an immediate enumeration altogether impossible. In the case of the few Indians who do not report to the agencies, men will be selected to visit them in their camps and obtain the desired information. No difficulty is anticipated in taking the census of the Indians on reservations where they are engaged in industrial pursuits. The census will include, in addition to the enumeration, valuable vital statistics collected by United States surgeons located on the different reservations; educational statistics collected by Government teachers; and industrial statistics gathered by the special agents.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.

A BATCH of 328 Mormon converts from foreign lands arrived at this port last week en route for Utah.

THE Police Commissioners of this city are making a vigorous effort to suppress the sale of policy and lottery tickets.

PRESIDENT HAYES last week visited Monterey and other points in California, being everywhere enthusiastically received.

SENATOR CONKLING made his first speech in the present campaign before an immense audience in this city, on Friday night last.

THE rival Democratic factions in Virginia have been negotiating in regard to a united Electoral ticket, but have not reached an agreement.

HON. LAFAYETTE S. FOSTER, ex-United States Senator, died at his residence at Norwich, Conn., September 19th, aged seventy-four years.

THE repudiation amendment to the Arkansas Constitution was rejected, and not adopted as formerly announced, at the recent State election.

THERE were 6,495 more pupils in attendance at the opening of the public schools in this city, September 6th, than at their opening one year ago.

VIRGIL and Houston Gully have been acquitted of the charge of killing Gilmer, in Kemper County, Miss., during the Chisholm disturbances of 1877.

THE forty-ninth annual exhibition of the American Institute Fair was opened September 15th. The exhibition possesses greater attractions than any recently held.

THE Egyptian obelisk was last week successfully removed from Clifton, Staten Island, to the foot of West Ninety-sixth Street, in this city, whence it will be taken to Central Park.

THOMAS HUGHES and his party of English friends are in Tennessee. The founding of Rugby, the English colony on the Cumberland plateau, has been postponed until October 5th.

FOURTEEN women missionaries from the Female Board of Missions have gone to the Mormon settlements in Utah, Idaho and Western Wyoming, where they will labor for the arrest of the evils of polygamy.

Two hundred Italian laborers left New York last week for Sandwich, Mass., to work on the Cape Cod Canal. Altogether the force of 1,000 men already engaged will be increased to 2,500 by the first of October.

THE total vote at the recent election in Vermont was 70,686. Farnham, Republican, received 47,505; Phelps, Democrat, 21,237; scattering, 1,943. Farnham's majority over Phelps, 26,621; majority over all, 25,092.

THERE has been serious trouble between white and colored miners at Corning, O. In an encounter between the militia and the malcontents ten persons were wounded. Two companies of militia were sent to the scene.

NINE men were killed September 16th by the breaking of a cable in the Consolidated Imperial Mine at Virginia City, Nev. On September 17th five men were blown to pieces by the explosion of a cartridge factory at East Bridgeport, Conn.

THE report of the Inspectors charged with the investigation of the loss of the steamship Narragansett, some weeks since, recommends that the licenses of the captains of both the Narragansett and Stonington be revoked, and that fines to the amount of $3,000 be levied on the Narragansett.

THE latest returns of the Maine election indicate the re-election of Governor Davis by a small plurality. Three Republican Congressmen and two Greenbackers are elected. Both Houses of the Legislature contain strong Republican majorities. The amendments to the Constitution are adopted, one of which provides that a plurality of votes shall elect.

THE annual convention of the National Association of Fire Engineers of the United States was held in Boston last week. The following officers were elected: President, Chief William A. Green, Boston; Secretary, Henry A. Hills, Dallas, Texas; Treasurer, A. C. Hendricks, New Haven, Conn.; Vice-Presidents, Chiefs D. J. Swaen, Illinois, O. W. Crane, New York, and others.

IN the Fire Engineers' Convention at Boston, last week, the committee on the question of the expediency of passing State laws requiring the erection of fireproof buildings in the business sections of cities, reported that in their opinion such legislation would be advisable and of great practical benefit. The committee on tenement-houses reported in favor of more stringent laws regulating the construction of tenement houses, requiring better arrangements and the application of fire-escapes.

THE Republicans of Massachusetts have nominated Governor Long and Lieutenant-Governor Weston for re-election. The Missouri Republicans have nominated Colonel D. P. Dyer for Governor, with a full State ticket. The Democrats of New Hampshire have nominated Hon. Frank Jones for Governor. The New Hampshire Prohibitionists have nominated a full State ticket, headed by George E. Hodge for Governor. A convention of Republican clubs, eighteen States being represented, was held in Indianapolis last week.

Foreign.

THE expulsion of French Jesuits from Alsace-Lorraine has been ordered.

THE Greek army numbers 30,000 men, rapidly preparing for service.

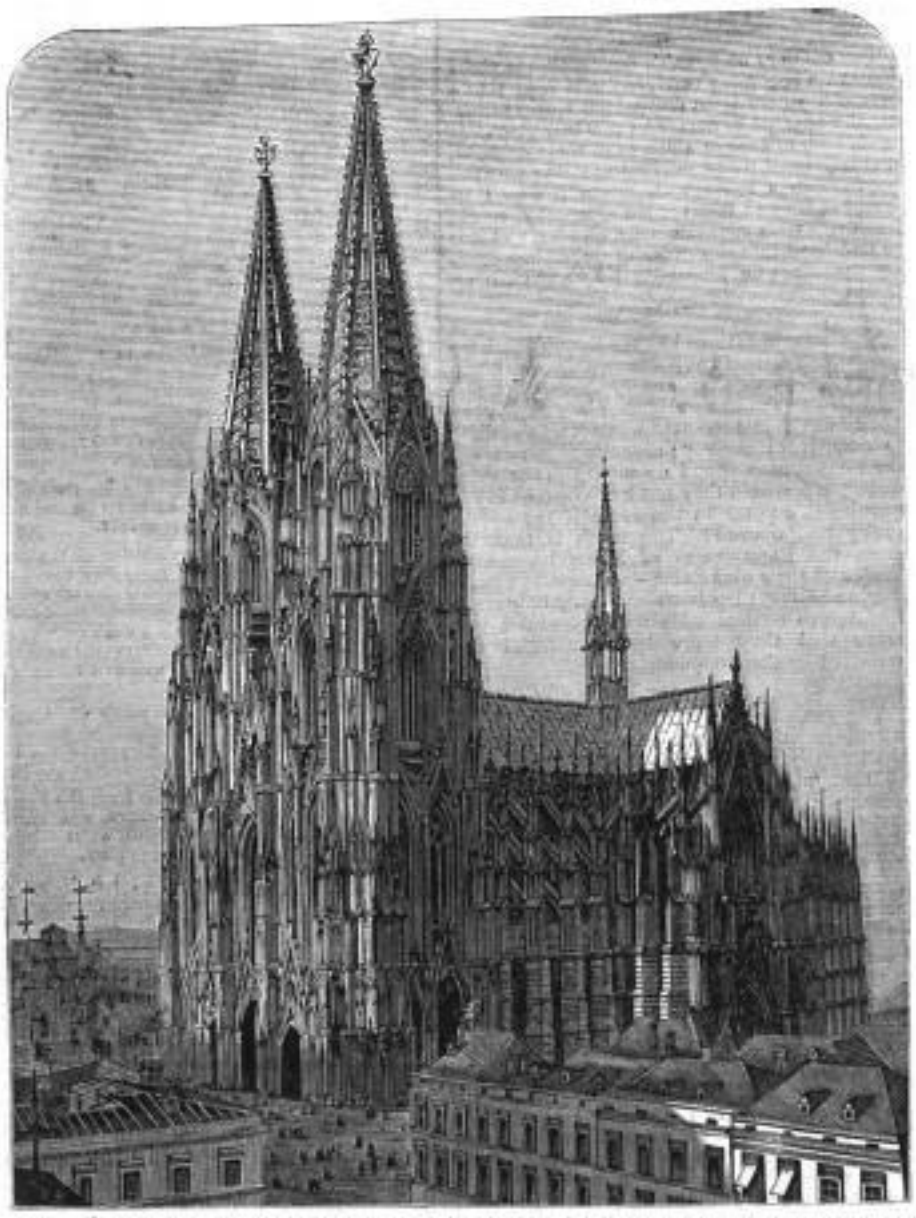
THE complete revision of the Swiss Constitution is to be submitted to the popular vote.

THE German Government have determined to subsidize a line of steamers to Australia and the South seas.

THE sergeant accused of false marking at the Wimbledon Rifle meeting has been tried by court-martial and acquitted.

IT is rumored that Sir Charles Dilke, Under Foreign Secretary, intends to resign his official position because of ill health.

THE Lancashire Weavers' Association desires to submit pending troubles to arbitration, but the employers will not meet them and have determined to work only three days a week.



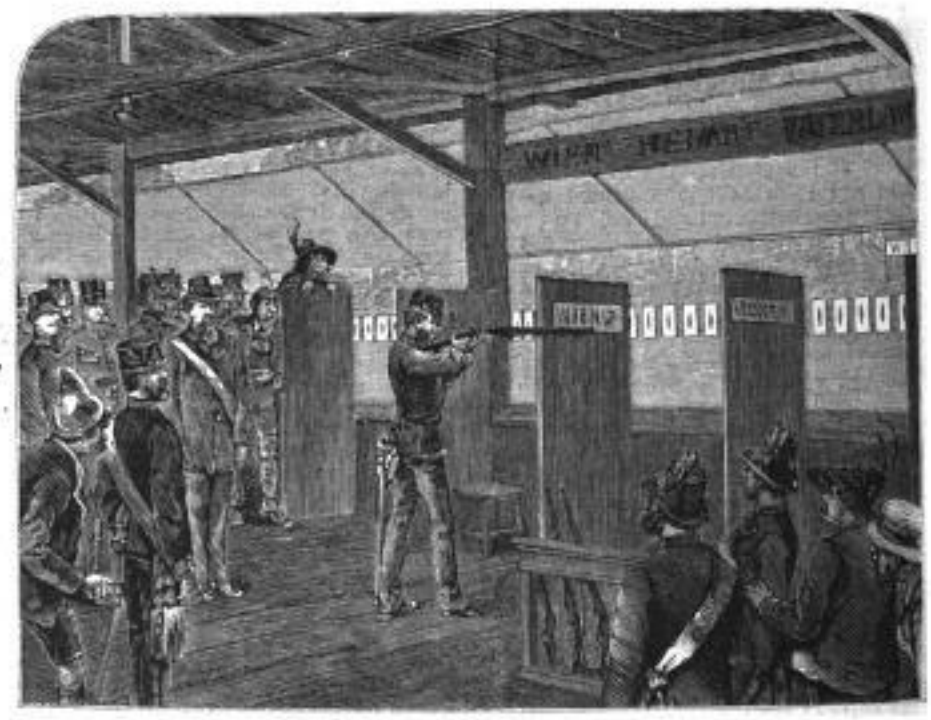
THE naval demonstration of the Powers has been postponed until the Christians can leave Dulcigno, as a massacre is feared. The Autumn storms will begin in a fortnight, and then the vessels cannot keep their station.

THE very latest reports from the Adriatic frontier state that a conflict between the Albanians and Montenegrins seems to be inevitable. The Turkish regulars sent to overawe Albania are largely deserting to the Albanians.

THE imports into France during the eight months ending August show an increase over the same period last year of 250,000,000 francs, and the exports of 198,000,000, the increase of imports being in food products, and of exports, in manufactures.

Digitized by Google

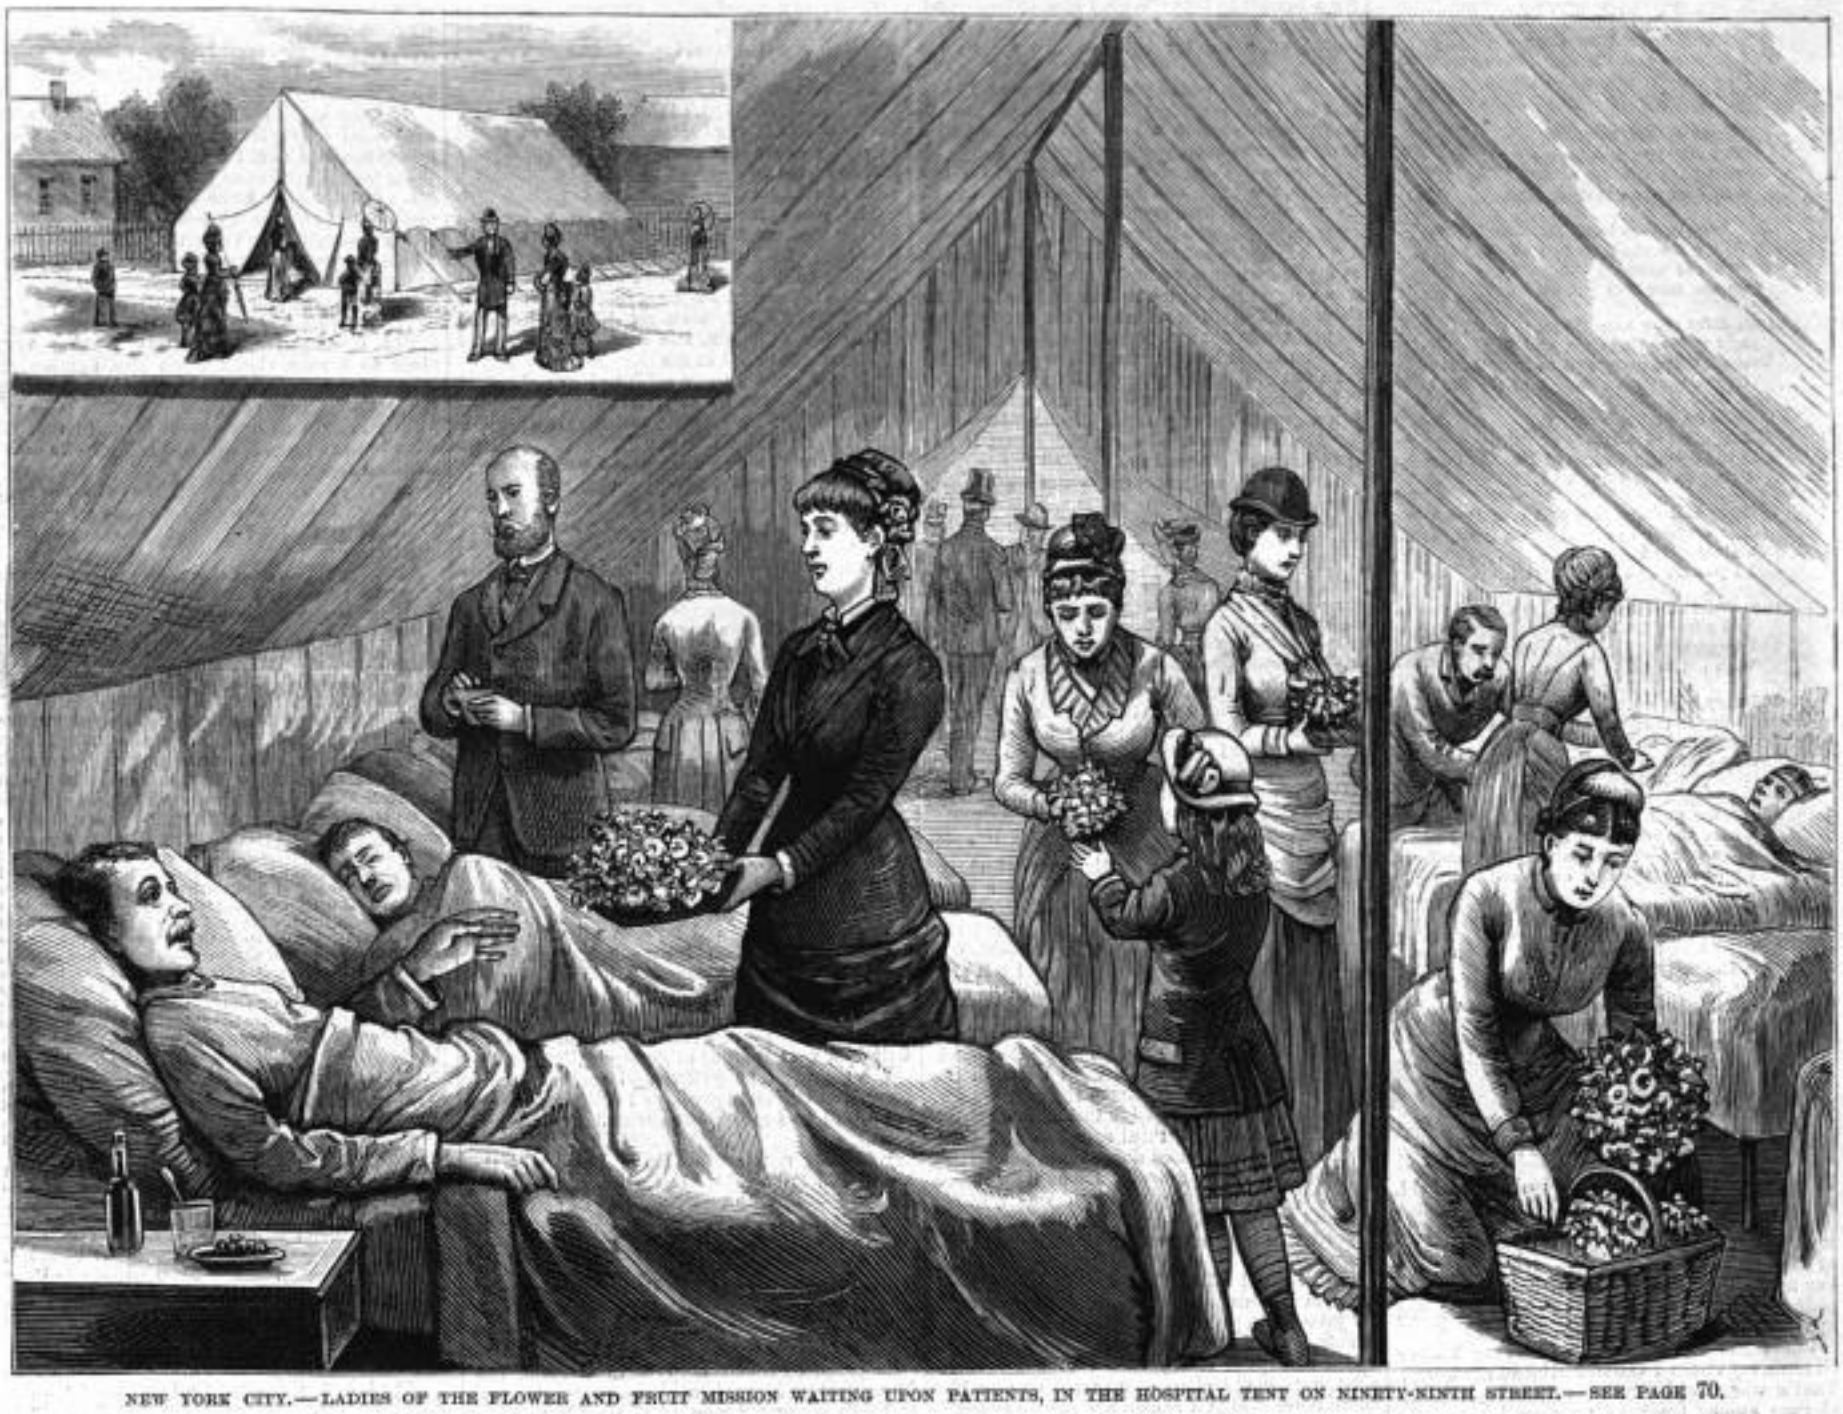
The Pictorial Spirit of the Illustrated Foreign Press.—SEE PAGE 71.



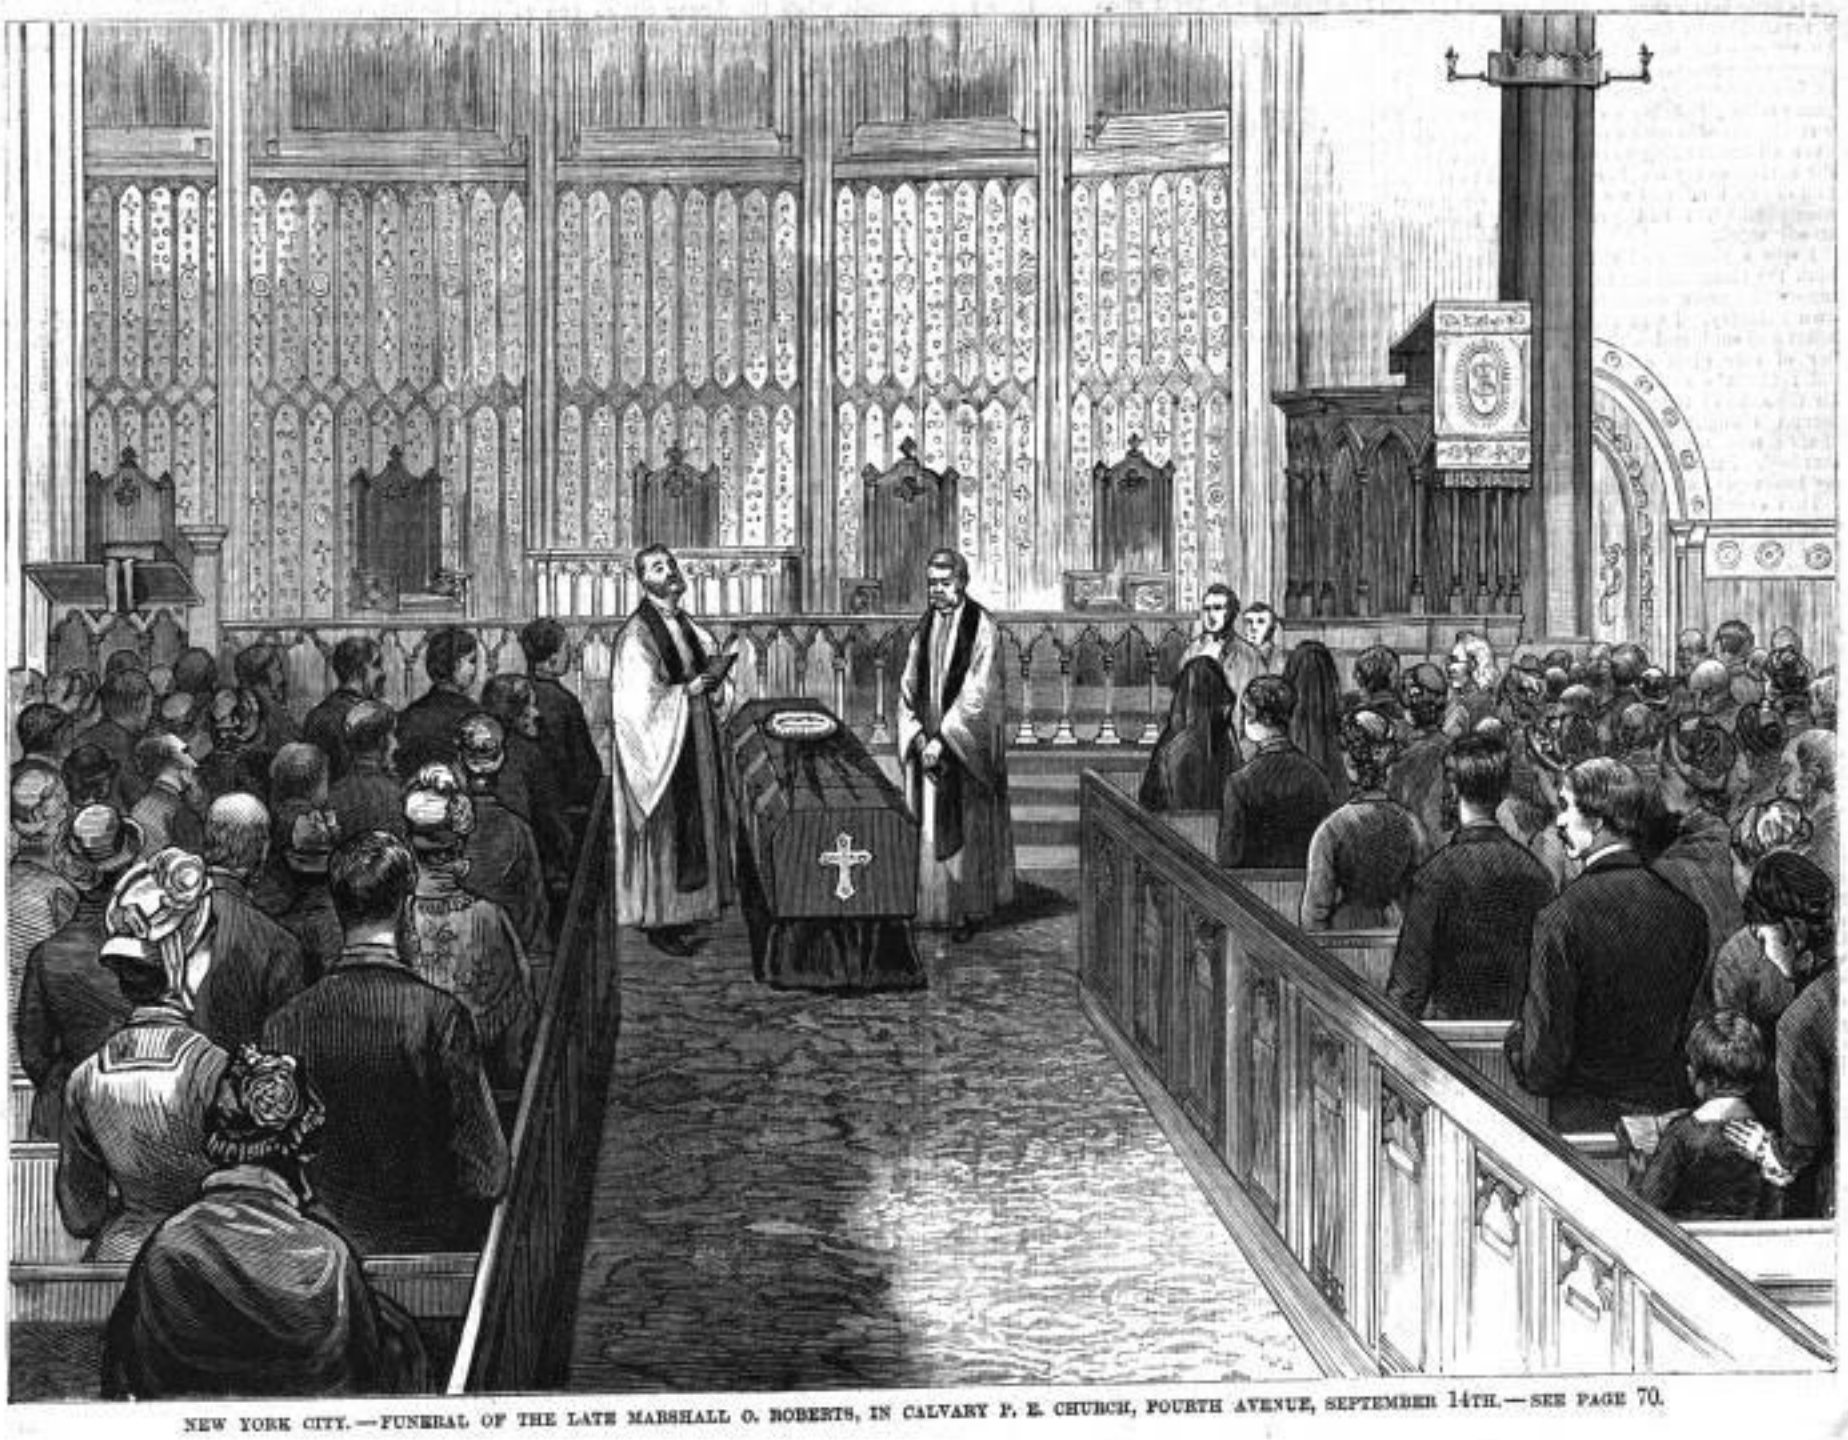
GERMANY.—THE COLOGNE CATHEDRAL, BEGUN AUG. 14, 1248; COMPLETED AUG. 14, 1880.

GERMANY.—A SCENE IN THE MARKET-PLACE AT LUBECK.

DENMARK.—SARAH BERNHARDT TOASTING "FRANCE ENTIRE" AT THE COPENHAGEN BANQUET.



AUSTRIA.—THE EMPEROR SHOOTING WITH THE NATIONAL RIFLE ASSOCIATION, VIENNA.



BELGIUM.—THE JUBILEE OF INDEPENDENCE.—KING LEOPOLD RESPONDING TO ADDRESSES AND REVIEWING THE HISTORICAL CAVALCADE, BRUSSELS.

Digitized by Google

NEW YORK CITY.—LADIES OF THE FLOWER AND FRUIT MISSION WAITING UPON PATIENTS, IN THE HOSPITAL TENT ON NINETY-NINTH STREET.—SEE PAGE 70.

NEW YORK CITY.—FUNERAL OF THE LATE MARSHALL O. ROBERTS, IN CALVARY P. E. CHURCH, FOURTH AVENUE, SEPTEMBER 14TH.—SEE PAGE 70.

Digitized by Google

BY THE RIVER.

O EVER-CHANGING river
That seekest the changeless sea,
Where are the forms and the faces
The years have shown to thee?

Glitter of golden hauberk,
And silver of swinging sword,
Down by the shallow scurry,
And over the darkling ford.

And here in this ferny corner,
Where the shadows fall on the spray,
A vision of weeping woman's eyes,
As her true love gallops away.

Say, didst thou note them, O river,
And gather them up, and flee
To waft them away and to hide them
In the soundless depths of the sea?

Sheen of a prince's armor,
And glint of a trusty sword,
And blood-stained faces of fearless men
Dying to save their lord.

Soldiers and statesmen and courtiers
And cold-eyed priests, and a group
Of dainty delicate maidens
In powder and patch and hoop.

Say, didst thou note them, O river,
And garner their smiles and tears?
Did their hearts beat high and falter
With old-world hopes and fears?

Did they look on thy deep, dark water
Where it mirrors the diamond spray,
And love and struggle and suffer
As we of this latter day?

* * * *

Across the gulf of the ages,
Where the secrets of silence sleep,
Comes a voice—"Ye are sisters and brothers,
Who love and suffer and weep."

For the day goes by, and the morrow
Comes back as it did of yore,
And the love is the same, and the sorrow
Is the sorrow our fathers bore.

As the burden has been, so it shall be
Till the kind God bears us free
Down the stormy waves of the river
To the calm of the infinite sea.

NINA WALLINGFORD.

"WHO is that little girl, Walter?" I said, carelessly, little thinking the important rôle that little girl was to play in my life drama. She came from Zimmer No. 9, of the Conservatorium for Music at S——, and her face was flushed with an indignant, half-pitiful look in her proud eyes which attracted my attention.

Room No. 9, I thought, as leaving Walter Griffith, my chum, I sauntered off to my lesson. That's where old Professor Z., a high cock-alorum among teachers, tortures his pupils; he is little better than a ruffian, if he has such a reputation in his profession; and they say he thumps the ugly girls with his fists and kisses the pretty ones in what he calls musical enthusiasm. Why was it that the thought of that pretty girl being kissed by the untidy old wretch caused in me a strong inclination to kick over an unoffending music-stand? However, the arrival of my teacher put an end to reflection of any kind, and we were soon deep in a sonata which I had prepared by hours of steady work.

I was a young and enthusiastic student of both the piano and organ, and my future fortune and career depended entirely upon my own industry. I was struggling with all my heart and soul, and, although I met any number of nice girls and gifted women at the different clubs and soirées which I frequented for the sake of the good music, I had given a second thought to none of them. Now a chance meeting with Professor Z. brought that look of the little girl back to my mind, and my heart gave a most unaccountable throb.

That evening I drummed like an automaton over the fugue that had been the centre of all my highest hopes and aspirations for weeks. Scales and exercises refused to be played, and I strayed off into tender little German love songs, until, disgusted with myself, I tumbled into bed. There I took myself sternly to task, and reflected that a poor art student, with only just enough money to live without begging until time should bring the success he must work hard for—that, in fact, just such a man as I was the biggest fool in Christendom to look at, or think twice of, anybody or anything but a long-haired professor or a music score. With these wise reflections I finally fell asleep; but for two or three days after a pair of eyes peeped from behind the key-board, and those eyes were not adorned with spectacles; or the thought of a flushed cheek lured me for a moment from that deep consideration of the harmony-book that should have been my most edifying mental food, and that flushed cheek was not graced by an unshorn beard. Still I worked on with only a scant word of encouragement from my taciturn professor for some months, till the Spring sun on a certain saint's day tempted me to take a much-needed holiday, and I strayed at random out into the woods, climbed a ruined tower and lazily took in the landscape about me. I wondered if the little stone cell on an island in the lake that lay below had sheltered the immortal hermit whose memory had blessed us pupils with a day's rest. I wondered if he was hollow-eyed, dirty-fingered and toothless; if, in his youth, he too had loved and been loved—and seeing at that moment a little boat at the foot of the Schlossberg, I ran down, and, taking possession of it, brought myself shortly to the island, and forthwith entered the hermit's deserted cell.

On a rock near the entrance lay a dainty, lace-trimmed parasol, a pair of gloves, some wild flowers and a sketch-book—queer things for a hermit to leave behind him, indeed; and, as I stood smiling at the odd contrasting ideas called up, a cry for help reached me on the breeze.

"Please, sir, could you come to me? I have lost my oar," repeated the voice, as I emerged, and at a distance in a boat sat a little girl I recognized at once.

She was drifting slowly further and further off into the lake, and her situation, although by no means dangerous, was embarrassing enough.

"I am quite ashamed of myself," she said, as my last strokes brought me near her. "It was very stupid of me to lose my oar, and the thought of drifting about in this lonely place all night was not a cheerful one."

"You might have drifted for weeks, as this is an out-of-the-way place, and I am very glad to have been the fortunate person who spared you a great deal of possible discomfort."

"And I am glad," she replied, "that it has been you who rescued me."

That slight and graceful accent on the you was indescribably pleasing to me. Our chat that day was but the beginning of a friendship that quickly ripened; circumstances favored it. We were both Americans in a foreign land, both interested in the same studies, and our pursuits threw us constantly together. It was not long before I acknowledged myself to be deeply in love with Nina Wallingford. How much brighter the world looked to me at that time! My every-day occupations seemed one round of delight, and study was play; even my reticent teacher complimented me often on my progress. I made great strides in a concerto I was composing, and when it was finished and played before the arbiters of the conservatory, a prize was unanimously awarded me.

* * * * * *

A glare of shimmering lights, perfume of flowers, the gleam of statues from their leafy bowers. In honor of the birthday of her Majesty, the Queen, a special musical performance was being conducted, and my concerto was the original feature of the evening. I felt pale from suspense, while each familiar note sounded through the hall, and at last it was over. Royalty itself condescended to applaud warmly, connoisseurs shook me by the hand, and, giddy from triumph, I went out into the night to take deep draughts of the calming air. Everything seemed possible to me in this the first flush of my youthful success—and Nina Wallingford had looked down from her box at me and smiled! To-morrow I would go to her and tell her that my triumph was nothing without her love.

Walter Griffith's friendly voice almost jarred upon me.

"Hallo! old fellow!" he called out, linking his arm in mine. "You are ahead of us all! By jove, I am proud of you! How I used to deride all our dreams of ambition when you and I and poor Harry talked of the future; all the poor old chap prophesied of you has come true. Do you remember he always said you would be a great success? How thoroughly the dear boy believed in you!"

"Yes," I replied, "I would give a fair share of to-night's triumph to bring Archer back again." And we talked of him as we sauntered homewards. He had been almost a brother to me, and the thought of his generous, trusting nature, and the loss he had been to us, brought tears to my eyes. He had had genius, but an erratic and unstable will; he worked only by fits and starts, and seemed at the last to have some deep trouble that took all ambition from him. Busy myself, I have often reproached myself since that I did not urge him to speak openly to me about it. Then one day I found him in an allée of the royal park with the cruel sun glaring down on his dead face. He had shot himself, and I never knew the secret of his terrible death. I had been his sole mourner, and he lay in the little English cemetery among strangers.

He had had great faith in me, and had cheered many a lagging moment in my musical career. "Yes," I said, "Archer would have rejoiced at all to-night."

"As usual," said Walter, lightly, "a woman was at the bottom of his destruction."

"A woman?" I said. "Curse her! But, Walter how did you know of this?"

"Why, Archer wrote it to me when I was in Leipzig—wrote me of his despair when the girl he had loved so long jilted him. To tell the truth, old friend, I have often wondered at your intimacy with that girl. Can it be possible you are trying to avenge Archer?"

"Walter Griffith, what in heaven's name do you mean?" my agitation mastering me—"of whom are you speaking?"

"Nina Wallingford," was the fatal answer.

"Good-night," I said, abruptly, and, turning up a dark side street, stumbled on and on. I never knew where or how long. I only remember to have reached the country, and to have felt the cold dawn creeping over a hazy earth, and the smell of grass and trees and the sounds of morning. I fell asleep from sheer weariness of the flesh, and awoke late in the day stiff and wretched. When I had dragged myself back to my rooms, the familiar sights brought all my grief more keenly to my mind; there lay Nina Wallingford's photograph, and on the wall above it hung Harry Archer's dainty, embroidered student's cap; a pair of Nina's gloves, the very pair I had seen in the hermit's cell, and had stolen as a souvenir of our first meeting, the pistol Harry's trembling hand had raised to the true, loving heart, lay side by side in my cabinet.

There must be some terrible mistake, some explanation that Nina could give; I determined to ask, and as soon as I could collect my thoughts, I went to her.

She met me with frank congratulations on the success my concerto had met with. "I heard every note and chord," she said; and what would have made me happy to intoxication before, fell now upon my ear like blows on a naked nerve.

"You are quite pale," she said, looking at me wistfully, and the tone for a moment tempted me to forget all I had heard, but Harry's face, as it lay that day in the sunlight, came up to check my hot words.

"Miss Wallingford," I said, "I have come—" but how to ask her! It seemed such an insult to speak of dishonor while that calm, steady glance rested on me. "Did you"—I stammered, "did you know poor Harry Archer?"

The girl's face blanched with a look of horror that went, alas! far to convince me of the truth of Walter's story. "I was his dearest friend, and I loved him," I added, with what must have seemed wanton cruelty; but Nina's face flushed, and, seeming like a flash to divine my thoughts, she said, with a proud glance of contempt at me:

"May I ask why you wish to learn the fact of my having known your friend?" she said.

"Oh, Nina!" I cried, "tell me it is all a horrible, torturing mistake!"

"I am at a loss to understand you," she replied, rising. "I knew your friend Harry Archer, and having now answered your only lucid remark, you will, no doubt, excuse me if I retire."

With a stately bow and steady step she left me, while I reeled drunk with despair to my rooms.

For several days I was ill; a low, obstinate sort of fever kept me, after the reaction of so much excitement weak and depressed. Then, after hasty preparations, I sailed for home.

That time I had so often looked forward to, that day that was to bring me back with a record of work done and reputation established, brought me no happiness. More work I sighed for, and it alone gave me rest. I slaved and spared no nerve or muscle. A penalty must be paid sooner or later for such over taxing of brain and body. I fell ill, and all was blank.

* * * * * *

A placid, kindly old face, in a Quaker cap, looked at me when I awoke from a long feverish dream; of course I tried to speak, but my voice failed me, and the lady laid her plump hands on my head and said, "Wait a little, you will grow stronger, and then we will do a vast amount of gossiping."

I let myself be petted and soothed like a baby, and before many days I could ask how I happened to be in what seemed to be a hospital.

"This is not quite like a hospital," the kindly old lady said, "but a house to which Doctor S——, who was called in to you when you fell so very ill, sends his patients. An Order of Protestant Sisters has the charge of it."

"But you are not a hired nurse, I am sure."

"No," answered the lady, smiling. "I am Mrs. Penthwick, an idle old body who amuses herself by looking in now and then on the sick people. I can help them a little, too, occasionally; I have brought you these flowers, and can write for you, if you wish, to your friends, when the doctor allows you to dictate."

"There is no one who would care particularly to hear of my welfare," I said, sadly, "although, since fortune has favored me a little, there are many who call themselves by that much abused title of friend."

Good Mrs. Penthwick seemed to set herself from this time on to the task of cheering me. "When you are able," she said, "I will take you for a little jaunt to my quiet old house in the country. I have taken a fancy to you, so don't protest; I am able, thank God, to do a good turn now and then to my fellow-creatures. I have inquired about you—you will neither steal my spoons nor run away with the pretty girl who is now my one guest. Here is your beef-tea; drink every drop of it, and get strong as soon as you can."

I began to take pleasure in seeing the wrinkled face which so often bent over me, looking pleased at my improvement; and, when we went by slow stages to Penthwick Cottage, I found myself beginning to hope and long for the battle of life again.

The second day, after a siesta in a cozy, chints-hung room, I went, leaning on Mrs. Penthwick's arm, to be presented to the guest whom she spoke of as "my daughter," but was really only a much-loved friend.

"My daughter" arose from a dim corner, came into the light, and Nina Wallingford was before me!

I was still so weak that the surprise overcame me, and I sank back in a chair, for a moment unable to speak, and I dare say looking half dead. Nina thought so, and the mistake was for me the happiest one in the world. She sprang to my side with tears rolling down her cheeks, and I miraculously recovered myself sufficiently to catch her hands and cover them with kisses.

"Oh, Nina!" I cried, "I have often been convinced that you could explain away my despicable doubts of you."

"Yes," she answered. "My still more despicable pride prevented my telling you of the one sad mistake I have made in my life; but my punishment has been surely out of all proportion to my fault. Your lack of trust in me that day wounded me all the more that I had brooded over the affair and grown morbidly sensitive; but I will tell you all about it now. Harry Archer loved me when I was quite young—too young to know if the feeling that prompted me to accept him was love or gratified vanity. He was, you know, of so peculiar a temperament that by degrees I found myself utterly disenchanted; at times unreasonably jealous of me, and—but I will not say more of this, for he is dead. He would not listen to my doubts of the wisdom of our engagement, and gave me no peace because I postponed from time to time the wedding-day. I know I was weak, but I was young and all alone; my one friend, Mrs. Penthwick, was ill. When she was sufficiently recovered to allow of it, I wrote to her, confiding all of my great wretchedness, of the certainty that, if I ever had, I no longer loved Harry Archer."

"Poor child! What a dilemma it was for you!"

"At the same time I wrote in reply to a reproachful letter from Archie a friendly but non committal one, I so foolishly hoped something would intervene to induce him to forget me. Fate would have it that I misdirected each letter, and Harry learned the true state of my feelings. You know the rest. Of course I was misjudged, and my weakness brought, God knows, a bitter fruit. That you, too, believed the current opinion hurt me deeply. Can you ever forgive me?"

But my head was already leaning very close to a rosy cheek when Mrs. Penthwick, who had gone in search of a physician, entered the room. The good dame's face was so utterly ridiculous in its bewilderment, that we were both feign to laugh and relieve our over-strained feelings.

Later, as we all sat on the vine-covered veranda, a happy family picture, for Mrs. Penthwick adopted me at once, she said, laughingly:

"I have been mistaken in you. You are going to run away with my daughter; you shall have the spoons as well for a wedding present."

FUNERAL OF MARSHALL O. ROBERTS.

THE funeral service over the remains of the late Mr. Marshall O. Roberts took place on Sept. 14th at Calvary Church, Fourth Avenue, corner of Twenty-first Street, New York, in the presence of a large concourse, including women from the highest social circles, retired merchants, many of this city's most venerable and respected citizens, the foremost business and professional men, and a number of well-known citizens of other cities. The funeral procession reached the church shortly after ten o'clock. The casket containing the remains was carried from the hearse and placed in the vestibule until the funeral procession was formed. The casket was most unique in design. It was of oak, and of unusual depth. Its sides were flat, beveled off at the top. At either end there was a large ornamental cross made of steel. Completely encircling the casket were three ornamental steel bands. The large plate of solid silver on the lid bore the following inscription: "Marshall O. Roberts, born March 22d, 1813; died September 11th, 1880."

The remains were met at the church door by the Rev. Dr. E. A. Washburne, rector of the parish, and the Rev. Dr. Walker, who began the service with the memorable words, "I am the Resurrection and the Life."

The procession then moved up the aisle, headed by the two clergymen, in the following order: The remains, pall bearers, and the members of the Roberts family. The following gentlemen acted as pall-bearers: William M. Evarts, Hamilton Fish, Peter Cooper, Edwards Pierrepont, Henry G. Stebbins, Percy R. Pyne, Samuel Sloan and Edward N. Dickerson.

Mr. Walker read the first lesson, and then the ninety-third hymn of the hymnal, "I Would Not Live Alway," was sung. Dr. Washburne and Dr. Walker then continued the regular Protestant Episcopal burial service. The funeral, in accordance with the wishes of Mrs. Roberts, was thoroughly simple. The only floral design observable was a wreath of white roses and a spray of palm, which rested on the lid of the casket. During the services the choir, under the direction of Mr. C. H. Halley, and consisting of the following persons, Miss Sarah Wood, soprano; Mrs. A. P. Sears, contralto; Carl Elvers, tenor, and J. A. Jones, basso, sang the following music: Chant, "Lord, Let Me Know Mine End," "I Would Not Live Alway"; anthem, "I Heard a Voice from Heaven," and "Jesus, Lover of My Soul."

At the conclusion of the service the remains were conveyed to the Grand Central Depot, where they were placed on a special train and taken to Woodlawn at 11:40 o'clock. The remains were temporarily placed in the receiving-vault until the completion of the vault in the family plot.

A HOSPITAL TENT.

IT is a strange and awful sensation when, after having enjoyed to the full the powers and energies of manhood, we find ourselves suddenly reduced by the unnerving hand of sickness to the feebleness of infancy—when giant strength lies prostrate, and busy activity is chained to the weary bed. If one is wealthy, the sick bed is a regal solitude. How the patient lords it then! What caprices he acts without control! How king-like he sways his pillow! But when one is poor—when the bed is hard and comfortless, when every hour spent there is an agony of mind as well as body—the condition of the needy invalid is something too ghastly to contemplate. The Samaritans of the nineteenth century never appear in better light than in our hospitals. Our illustration represents the tent erected in West Ninety-ninth Street in order to accommodate patients, the house itself having proved inadequate to the demands upon it. Here the patients are waited upon by large-hearted ladies, members of the Flower and Fruit Mission, who, in addition to words of comfort, to the touch of delicate hands, bring gifts of flowers and fruits, messengers from the beautiful world of nature, to the helpless sufferers.

BOSTON'S BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARY.

BOSTON was in gala attire on Friday, September 17th. The celebration of the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the settlement of the city was as brilliant an occasion as has ever been observed in this country. The early part of the morning was in all respects a perfect Fall day, and the effect was to bring thousands of visitors by the early trains. The streets through which the procession was to pass and the adjacent thoroughfares were so crowded, that it was difficult to get through them. The visiting military from New York, Brooklyn and other points arrived in the morning. The Fifth Regiment M. V. M., Colonel E. J. Trull, received the Thirteenth Regiment, N. G. S. N. Y., at the Huntington Street Station of the Boston and Albany Railroad, and escorted it to its quarters, and subsequently to its position on Commonwealth Avenue. The Sixty-ninth New York was escorted by the Massachusetts Ninth, and the Twenty-third New York by the First Regiment M. V. M.

The literary portion of the celebration was held in the Old South Church and began at 9 o'clock. At that time there were gathered in the ancient edifice governors, statesmen, and mayors of cities, invited guests of the city, who occupied a platform extending the whole length of the church. The exercises were opened with prayer by the Rev. George E. Ellis, D. D., after which His Honor Mayor Prince delivered an oration. The delivery occupied two hours, and the address was a condensation of the history of Massachusetts during the two centuries and a half that have elapsed since the settlement of Boston, interspersed with sketches of some of the prominent characters of its early colonial days. At the conclusion of the oration the Mayor and the guests were escorted into the line of the procession.

Digitized by Google

All along the route of the procession the decorations were lavish, and the public buildings, the buildings of historic fame, the stores and residences were covered with bunting, flags, mottoes and emblems commemorative of the day. At the old "Cradle of Liberty" the decorations were tasteful but simple, the bunting having been used mostly inside; while outside, the main entrance was made into an arch, with the Goddess of Liberty surmounting it, and a ground-piece representing the first settlement of Boston, September 17th, 1630. At the historic Old South Church the effect of the bunting was fine, and consisted of an elegant canopy on stages and festoons draped around the galleries, while all the various portraits were finely draped. The outside arrangements were not extensive.

Among the more substantial of the trades' displays was the immense van of the Boston Belting Company. This was the original concern to utilize the Goodyear patents, and has since 1845 brought the manufacture of vulcanized rubber to such perfection, that on their wagon was a belt four feet in width weighing four thousand pounds. Coils of rubber hose, from a fraction of an inch to nearly a foot in diameter, were exhibited.

The carefulness of Old and New Boston capitalists in placing their securities in safe places, was shown by the exhibit of George L. Damon, manufacturer of the American Steam Safes. By the side of an immense safe of recent make was placed one of the old "knob" safes of 1830. Six horses were required to draw this load, and if external appearance is a safe guide, it would require a large gang of hard-working burglars to penetrate so solid and substantial a combination of locks and metal made in modern days by this manufacturer.

The large new building of John H. Pray Sons & Co., on Washington Street, attracted much attention by its beautiful display of new Wilton, tapestries and Axminsters, by the tasteful arrangement of Turkish and Persian rugs of unique design and antique manufacture. Since 1817 this firm has been studying the esthetic tastes of New England, and on this occasion their wares were made more attractive by the bevy of beautiful ladies peering from among the bright colors which filled the windows of the entire establishment.

One of Boston's prominent pianoforte manufacturers, Henry F. Miller, made a very interesting display of materials used in constructing these instruments, and a completed parlor grand piano. The materials were exhibited on a series of platforms in pyramidal form, surmounted by a gilded dome and pole. On the platforms were exhibited the various raw materials used, including a pair of elephant's tusks, eight feet long, and gums from the interior of Africa; felts, buckskins, wire and oil from Europe; lumber, iron, leather, wool and turpentine from North America; rosewood from South America, gum from Asia, and ebony from the East Indies.

The City Hall presented a beautiful sight; streamers, the national colors, and the flags of all nations meeting the eye. The centre windows were covered with a large city seal, with a background of American, British, French and German colors. On the front balcony was inscribed, "1630, September 17th, 1880."

Chief Marshal General A. P. Martin and staff formed on the parade ground, and, under the escort of the Second Corps of Cadets, marched to the head of the procession, and at precisely 12 o'clock the column moved. First were the Cadet Corps, then Governor John D. Long and staff, and the First Brigade of Massachusetts Volunteer Militia, Brigadier-General Hobart Moore. Following was the first division, Brigadier-General Alanson M. Handel, U. S. A., in which were the Sixty-ninth New York Regiment, Colonel James Cavanagh; Thirteenth New York Regiment, Colonel David E. Austin; Twenty-third New York Regiment, Colonel J. N. Partridge; Company H, Ninth Regiment, N.G.S.N.Y., Captain George W. Homans; Langston Guard, Norfolk, Va., Captain W. H. Palmer; Lincoln Guards, New York, Captain W. H. Jones. Then came an imposing array of invited guests, headed by Mayor Prince.

The Third Division consisted of posts of the Grand Army of the Republic, the Boston School Regiment escorting the school boys of 1830, and detachments of the Boston Fire Department with a hand-engine 100 years old. This division, which was a long one, was ended by the Passaic Steamer Company of Paterson, N. J.

The Fourth Division was made up of the various charitable associations and temperance societies.

The Fifth Division was also composed of charitable associations and the Grand Lodge of the Knights of Pythias.

The Sixth Division was composed entirely of Irish benevolent societies of Massachusetts.

The Seventh Division was made up of the representatives of the various trades of Boston, and it was one of the most attractive features of the procession. The old Ramage printing-press used by Franklin was shown in operation.

The procession was fifteen minutes over three hours in passing a given point. The fine marching of the New York regiments received the applause of the vast throngs on the line of the march. The reception given the Sixty-ninth, Thirteenth and Twenty-third Regiments of New York all along the route was a perfect ovation. When those regiments came in sight they were greeted with the waving of handkerchiefs, clapping of hands and loud hurrahs, and as they passed the cheer was taken up by the thousands stationed along the line. While the full regiments of New York troops were most conspicuous, Company H of the Ninth Regiment and the Langston and Lincoln Guards were not overlooked.

In the evening the multitude visited the parade ground on the Common to hear the concert by Gilmore's Band. The entire ground was illuminated by three electric lights, whose combined power was equal to over 80,000 candles, and they furnished without doubt the most brilliant illumination ever witnessed in this country. The band gave an excellent concert, and before it was ended the crowd had swelled to enormous proportions, and probably included over 100,000 people. Yet there seemed to be no decrease in the crowds on the various streets near the Common and through the route of the grand evening demonstration, which was a most fitting close of the varied exercises commemorative of Boston's birthday.

The tableaux shown in the evening procession were:

No. 1. "History, Tradition, Allegory and Time." This tableau was finely mounted on a huge dragon of gold, covering the entire surface of a platform car. In the centre was seated History, with Allegory and Tradition on either side, while over them stood Father Time, hour-glass in hand, illuminating the page which History is inditing by the glare of a torch.

No. 2. The second tableau was similarly mounted, and represented the landing of the Normans. In a large ship, carefully modeled to conform with the style of craft of those days, stood Ericson at the prow, anxiously looking out and conversing with a venerable bard at his feet. Manning the oars, spears and targets, conveniently near, sat the lusty members of that adventurous crew.

No. 3. "The Landing of the Pilgrims" formed the subject of the third tableau, and was a vivid portrayal of the disembarking of the Puritans on the inhospitable shores of Massachusetts Bay. A fine representation of Plymouth Rock, standing out in bold relief, was a striking feature of this number.

No. 4. "Miles Standish's Fight with the Indians," the latter in full feathers and war paint, at the feet of the doughty pioneer.

No. 5. "Chickatabut Presenting Corn to Governor Winthrop," both parties attended by their chief warriors, was the next historical tableau. Striking costumes and warlike weapons added to the realistic nature of this representation.

No. 6. "Sam Adams Demanding the Removal of the British Troops," an interior scene, admirably gotten up and costumed.

No. 7 was a splendid representation of the destruction of the tea in Boston harbor.

No. 8. "The Boston Boys and General Gage," was so costumed as to be a faithful representation of that, to every Boston boy, memorable event.

No. 9. "The Embarkation of Lord Howe," introducing a rowboat and sailors.

No. 10. "General Washington's Arrival in Boston," introduced a group of twelve persons in soldiers' and civilians' dress. The gentleman assigned to portray General Washington was selected on account of his striking resemblance to existing portraits of the "Father of his Country."

No. 11. The next, and one of the finest displays in the procession, was a personal of "Commerce." Upwards of a dozen characters appeared and the central figure, Commerce, held extended in her right hand a blazing wand.

No. 12. "Europe," a magnificent group of historic fame, introducing the five female figures and the huge ox upon which the goddess was seated, wand in hand.

No. 13. "Asia," another splendid group, with a mammoth elephant crouching upon the ground.

No. 14. "Africa," with camel, sphinx and national figures.

No. 15. "America," with its central figure, a rampant bull, and portraying the different aboriginal inhabitants of this country.

No. 16. The concluding tableau was a grand representation emblematic of the City of Boston.

In addition to our illustration of the Twenty-third Regiment marching past the Maverick National Bank building, and the Ancient and Honorable Artillery passing in review before Mayor Prince and the city's guests, we give a view of the city as it appeared in 1737, drawn from a sketch made by His Excellency Governor Pownal, and of other historical objects. In the middle distance of the view of Cotton Mather's tomb is a willow brought from Napoleon's tomb at St. Helena, while in the background is shown a building perforated with British bullets. The first church in Boston, erected in 1632, Rev. John Wilson, pastor, stood on the spot where Frazer's building now stands, near the old State House, State Street. The old Beacon, erected 1634, stood where the State House now stands. It consisted of a tall mast standing on cross-pieces, with an iron pot on top suspended by a crane. It was used to warn the people of approaching danger.

Among the many improvements on Hanover Street, between Union and Blackstone, may be seen a neatly-cut and well-preserved "coat-of-arms," the material pitch-pine, and brought from England in the early settlement of Boston. In the rear of the same building may be seen the celebrated "Beacon Stone" imbedded in the wall, long an object of interest to the curious and to the antiquary.

Several of the regiments in the parade, as the procession passed, saluted the Adams House as one of the institutions of Old Boston. When it was built by the sons of John Quincy Adams, it was, though then "up-town," one of the points of historical and social interest. To-day it is in a central location, near the theatres, and the leading business houses. Its many guests greeted Chaplain Beecher of the Brooklyn Thirteenth Regiment with the heartiest cheers.

The corridors of the United States Hotel, opposite the Boston and Albany Station, on Beach Street, were thronged by many of the notable guests who for years have made this ancient hostelry their temporary home. They were greeted with old-time fervor by the present proprietor, Mr. Tilly Haynes, who seemed modestly proud of his renovated hotel, of his guests, and of the centennial day.

Enlargement of New York's Water Supply.

THE works soon to be undertaken for the enlargement of the system of water supply for New York City includes the construction of a fifteen-foot dam at the outlet of Little Rye Pond, connecting both Big and Little Rye Ponds, and forming a lake of 280 acres in extent, capable of storing 1,000,000,000 gallons. It is also proposed to build a dam on the Bronx, near Kensico, forty-five feet high, making a reservoir of 250 acres, having a capacity of 1,620,000,000 gallons. A dam will be built across the Byram River fifteen feet high, creating a lake with a capacity of 180,000,000 gallons. The Byram and Bronx rivers it is proposed to unite at this point. From the Kensico dam the water will be conducted through a four-foot iron pipe along the valley of the Bronx to a reservoir near William's Bridge in the upper part of the Twenty-fourth Ward, the elevation of which is 180 feet above tide-water and sixty-five feet above the Croton Aqueduct, and the capacity 100,000,000 gallons. The length of this conduit is fifteen miles. The Kensico reservoir will give the City of New York from 18,000,000 to 20,000,000 gallons more water daily. The contracts were let August 4th. It is estimated that the work will be finished in about two years, and cost about $2,700,000. By tapping the Bronx at Kensico there will be obtained not only pure water but a remarkably good head. The country drained—over thirteen square miles—is similar in geological character to the Croton Valley.

Corruption in Russia.

THE resignation by the Grand Duke Nicholas of the command of the Imperial Guards displays how the Russian administration is honeycombed with corruption. Nicholas and other Grand Dukes embezzled the regimental funds systematically. General Loris Melikoff, on meeting with opposition from the Grand Duke, disclosed his peculations. The Czarewitch was indignant, and compelled the Grand Duke Nicholas to resign. The builders of the Czar's new yacht charged $100,000 extra, giving secretly a check to another Grand Duke for that amount. The practice is common in Russia.

The Granary of the World.

MINNESOTA, although now claiming to be the greatest wheat-producing State in the country, surpassing with the 40,000,000 bushels of this year's crops the highest mark of California, heretofore the heaviest wheat-producing State, is prepared to see the banner pass further westward and northward, into Dakota. A well-informed writer on this subject, in a letter from St. Paul, declares that the comparatively small farms of Minnesota, which are themselves monstrous in size, according to the standards of past generations of agriculturists, cannot begin to hold their own in rivalry with the great wheat tracts planted and reaped by wholesale in the James River Valley and about the headwaters of the Red River of the North. These Red River farms are operated by corporations, employing regiments of men, worked and fed with the discipline of an army, and transported from tract to tract by the carload from the elevators of the owners. The land is not only cheap, but is four times as fertile as the most fertile lands in Minnesota, and rewards at that rate the most careless cultivation. Five hundred thousand acres of wheat land have been brought into cultivation within two or three years. Under such corporate competition on the frontiers of the Northwest, the individual farmer on older lands is being overshadowed and discouraged. Although for years he may have been forced to accept only what the railroads transporting his grain calculated to be enough to keep him at his hard life, they "gobbling" the rest in charges, his chance was not so slender as it has become since the corporations themselves took to farming these wonderful lands. The same unequaled wheat soil and climate extends far north into British possessions, so that there are English capitalists who fancy they see the great wheat supply of the world in the future pouring out from Hudson Bay. Five new railroad lines have been built up into the Dakota wheat region and British territory within a year or two, and the Northern Pacific is pushing a branch line due north to compete in the race for the fabulous wealth in the wheat lands still unopened beyond the British line.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

The Cathedral at Cologne.

This magnificent structure, commenced in the thirteenth century when Cologne—the Colonia Agrippina of the Romans—was at the height of its prosperity, has at last been finished, despite the fatal effects of tradition and the many changes which time has wrought. On the 14th of August, exactly 632 years after the foundation-stone was laid, the last stones were placed on the lofty towers which guard the grand entrance, and on this occasion the Prussian flag was unfurled from the top of the northern tower, and the imperial standard from the southern pinnacle. The foundation-stone of the cathedral was laid on the 14th of August, 1248, when Cologne was one of the most powerful and wealthy cities of the Hanseatic league, and could muster an armed force of 30,000 men. The building was commenced by Archbishop Conrad of Hochstaden. The foundations of the four central piers were laid 46 feet below the surface of the ground. These columns are 39 feet in circumference, the roofs rest on 108 columns, of which these form the centre; the form of the whole edifice is that of a cross, 500 feet long and 200 feet wide. The two towers which have just been completed, are 500 feet high, the central tower being 350 feet high. The west front consists of four immense buttresses deeply grooved, inclosing at the basement a three-doored portal and two large windows. The façade of the south transept, which is 120 feet wide and 240 feet high, is adorned with a great number of statues in niches, and with other figures sculptured in bold relief in the arches of the three doorways, above which is an open balustrade with a large and beautiful window. The only part of this magnificent structure which was finished before the present century was the splendid choir which is 180 feet high. From 1801 to 1814 Cologne was the capital of the department of the Rhur, and no longer a free town, but at the peace of Cologne and its dependencies fell to Prussia, and shortly after strenuous exertions were made all over Germany to collect subscriptions for the completion of this edifice, and in 1823 the work was commenced. On the 15th of August, 1848, the body of the cathedral was solemnly opened in the presence of the Archduke John of Austria and the King of Prussia, that being the 600th anniversary of the foundation of that building, and now the work has been at last completed in a manner satisfactory to antiquarians and architectural taste, at a cost, since 1823, of something like $5,750,000.

The Market-place at Lubeck.

Lübeck, one of the four remaining free towns of Germany, and once a member of the ancient Hanse, is well worth a visit from any tourist whose way lies in the direction of the German shores of the Baltic. The bailiwick of Bergedorf, which Lübeck formerly held in common with Hamburg, was, by a treaty of August 5th, 1867, left to the sole possession of the latter. The city has a cathedral rich in wood-carvings and paintings. The most conspicuous of the public buildings is the town hall, with the famous ancient hall in which the deputies from the great commercial cities which composed the Hanseatic League used to meet, and in the lower story of which the Senate still assembles. The quaint architecture and rich decorations of many of the buildings bear witness to the former importance and prosperity of the city, which it retains to some degree. The Market Place is the best spot in the city to study the features of ancient and modern life.

Sara Bernhardt's Toast to France.

During her recent professional visit to Copenhagen Mlle. Sara Bernhardt was honored with a banquet. When the hour arrived for the toasts, some one, out of compliment to the versatile lady, proposed "France," and as the company rose to their feet to toss off the drink, the fair guest interrupted the proceeding by insisting that the toast should be to "France entire," which, of course, included the provinces annexed to Germany after the war. This toast was drunk with much enthusiasm. But little was thought of the incident until announcement was made that the German Ambassador to Denmark, who was present at the banquet, had been virtually recalled for "permitting the grave affront upon Germany to pass without a proper protest." The apparent over-sensitiveness of Bismarck has given this banquet a significance it would not otherwise have received.

The Austrian Rifle Association.

The gathering of this association at Vienna in August last was the occasion of much festivity and display. The Archduke Charles (the patron) was prominent in the proceedings, and the Emperor and Empress returned from Ischl to take part in them. The blessing of a flag (a ceremony in which the Empress took part), a grand symbolical procession and a monster banquet were among the details of the fête. We give an illustration of the visit of the Emperor to the butts. He fired three times: made two hits and missed once. "I am no target-shooter!" cried the Emperor, with some disgust. He has, however, done some good work in the chase, which must be his excuse. It may be said that the Viennese came next after the Swiss in the shooting competition, and that a manufacturer in the capital took the Emperor's prize. Some ladies also took part in the rifle contests and won cups.

The Belgian Jubilee.

The grand patriotic fête took place at Brussels on August 16th. At noon the surviving members of the Provisional Government and Congress of 1830 were solemnly received at the Parliament House by the Senate and Chamber of Representatives. They then marched to the Exhibition Building, the galleries of which were thronged with spectators. The surviving veterans of the Revolution, with the flags of the period, many riddled with shot, were received with deafening cheers. At one o'clock the King and Queen, the Count and Countess of Flanders, the Princess Stéphanie and the other Royal children arrived. Addresses were then read by various public functionaries, and especially by the Mayor of Brussels, in the name of the Municipalities of the kingdom. To these the King made a suitable reply, and the representatives of the guilds and corporations marched past with their banners. But the crowning attraction of the Jubilee was the historical Cavalcade on the 18th of August. Our illustration represents the moment when the car of Leopold I., supplied by the Province of Brabant, stopped before the Royal palace. The musicians and the persons who sang the national hymn, "La Brabançonne," were all accurately dressed in the costume of 1830. The car itself was very beautiful. There were four chafing dishes with incense burning on them, a patrol upholding a banner, a number of gilt statues, while the wheels were hidden by silken draperies. Then came the car of Agriculture, of Beer (the Belgian national beverage), of Industry, of the manufacture of arms (representing the City of Liège), and lastly, the car representative of Belgium, the most beautiful next to that of Leopold I.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

—A BERLIN dispatch says Prince Bismarck has abandoned the project of a bi-metallic system.

—THE Workingmen of San Francisco have recommended the present Mayor, Kalloch, for re-election.

—THE French Minister of Justice reports an increase of thirty-eight per cent. in crimes of violence since 1878.

—THE French Minister of Public Instruction has appropriated 100,000 francs to the establishment of a Normal School for young women.

—THE German authorities are purchasing largely in England for cavalry mounts. At the great horse fair of Horncastle over 1,200 were bought.

—JAPAN has trades unions. Owing to the recent rise in the price of rice, all the laborers in Gifu successfully combined to force up wages twenty-five per cent.

—THE Parliament of Jersey, where some of the French Jesuits have settled, is to be moved to expel them from the Island, under an unrepealed statute of George III.

—THE number of different languages and dialects spoken in the known world is 2,623, of which 587 belong to Europe, 390 to Asia, 376 to Africa, and 1,264 to America.

—TURKISH officers, long unable to get a cent of pay from the Sultan, are offering their services to Greece. Whole regiments are ready to desert on the smallest encouragement.

—M. CAZOT, the French Minister of Justice, has abolished the barbarous decree which for more than half a century has forbidden presidents, judges, attorneys and substitutes to wear mustaches.

—THE Paris authorities are intent just now on measures to prevent deleterious articles finding a sale, and have seized American hams wrapped in a yellow cloth, rendered impermeable by chromate of lead.

—THE Roman Forum has now been completely excavated, with the exception of a small portion at the entrance near the Capitol. The shape proves irregular, being broad on the Capitol side and narrow towards the palace of the Cæsars.

—THE last religious census in France shows that there are 35,387,703 Roman Catholics, 467,531 Calvinists, 80,117 Lutherans, and 33,113 of other Protestant denominations. The Jews number about 50,000, and 92,000 are attached to no church.

—ANOTHER relic of the Spanish Armada has been secured at Sluna, in Scotland. It is a large gun raised up out of the place where one of the ships belonging to the Armada was wrecked, and, though it has been in that place 290 years, it is as good as ever.

—THERE is a considerable flow of Italians from Piedmont to Sicily into the southern ports of Galveston, New Orleans, Pensacola, Mobile and Savannah. These people already control the fruit trade and the local fisheries in their new homes, besides many another small trade, and are notably thrifty and industrious.

—THE hurricane which destroyed the steamship City of Vera Cruz wrought immense damage to the Florida orange crop. The fruit was hanging full grown, and the ground in the orange groves is now covered with it. The force of the storm was so great that the largest trees whipped the ground with their branches.

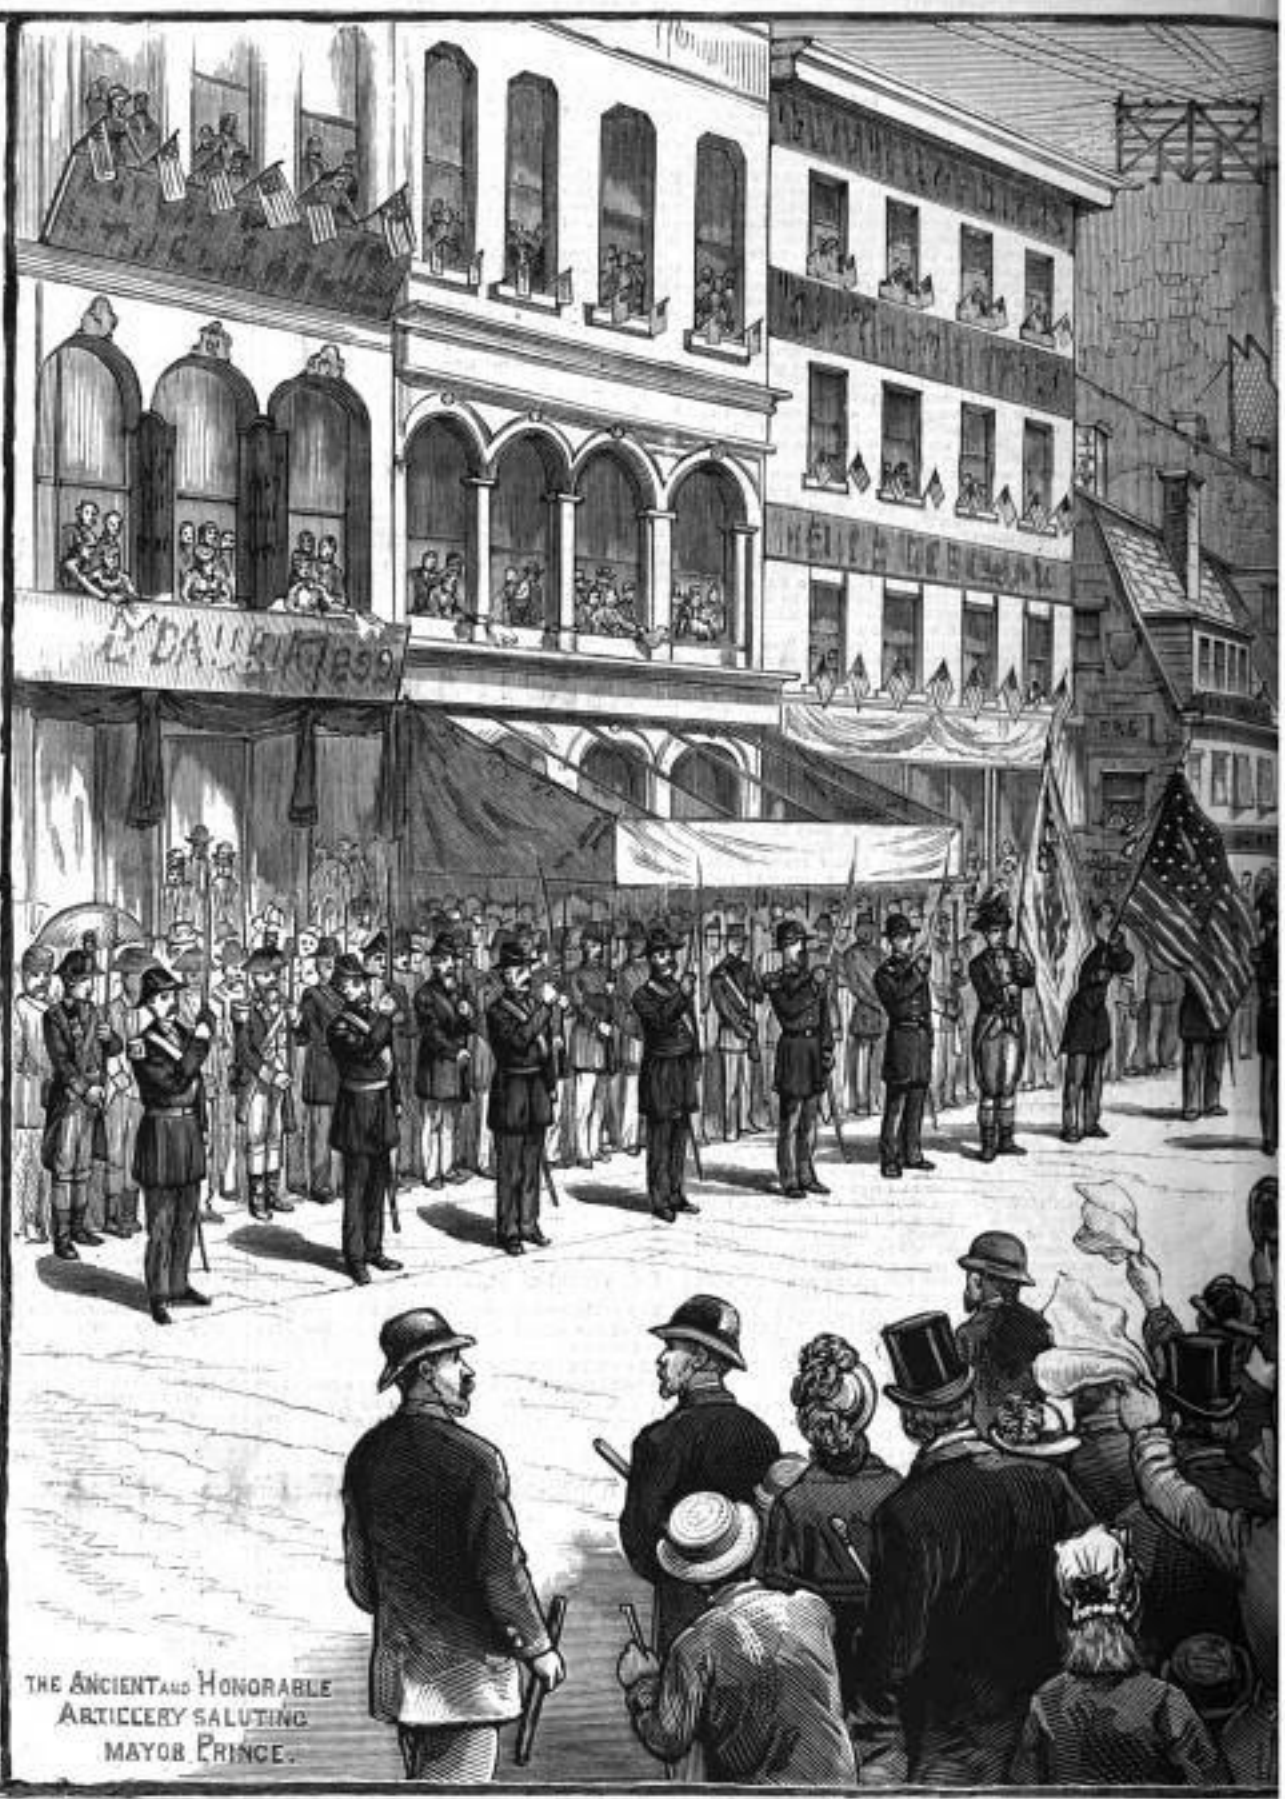
—WYOMING TERRITORY has been gaining in population at a great rate since 1870. When the last census was taken it had only a little more than 9,000 inhabitants, while now it has nearly 22,000. The gain has been at the rate of 138 per cent. How new it was in 1870 is shown by the fact that out of the 9,000 inhabitants only 300 were natives of the Territory.

—CALIFORNIA has hopes of ranking among the cotton States, and talks of building factories at once to work up the crop. The Merced cotton fields have shown what square miles of similar soil could do, and Kern County, further south, is now irrigating 100 acres of cotton to prove that she has 100,000 acres more only waiting to be watered to make good cotton fields.

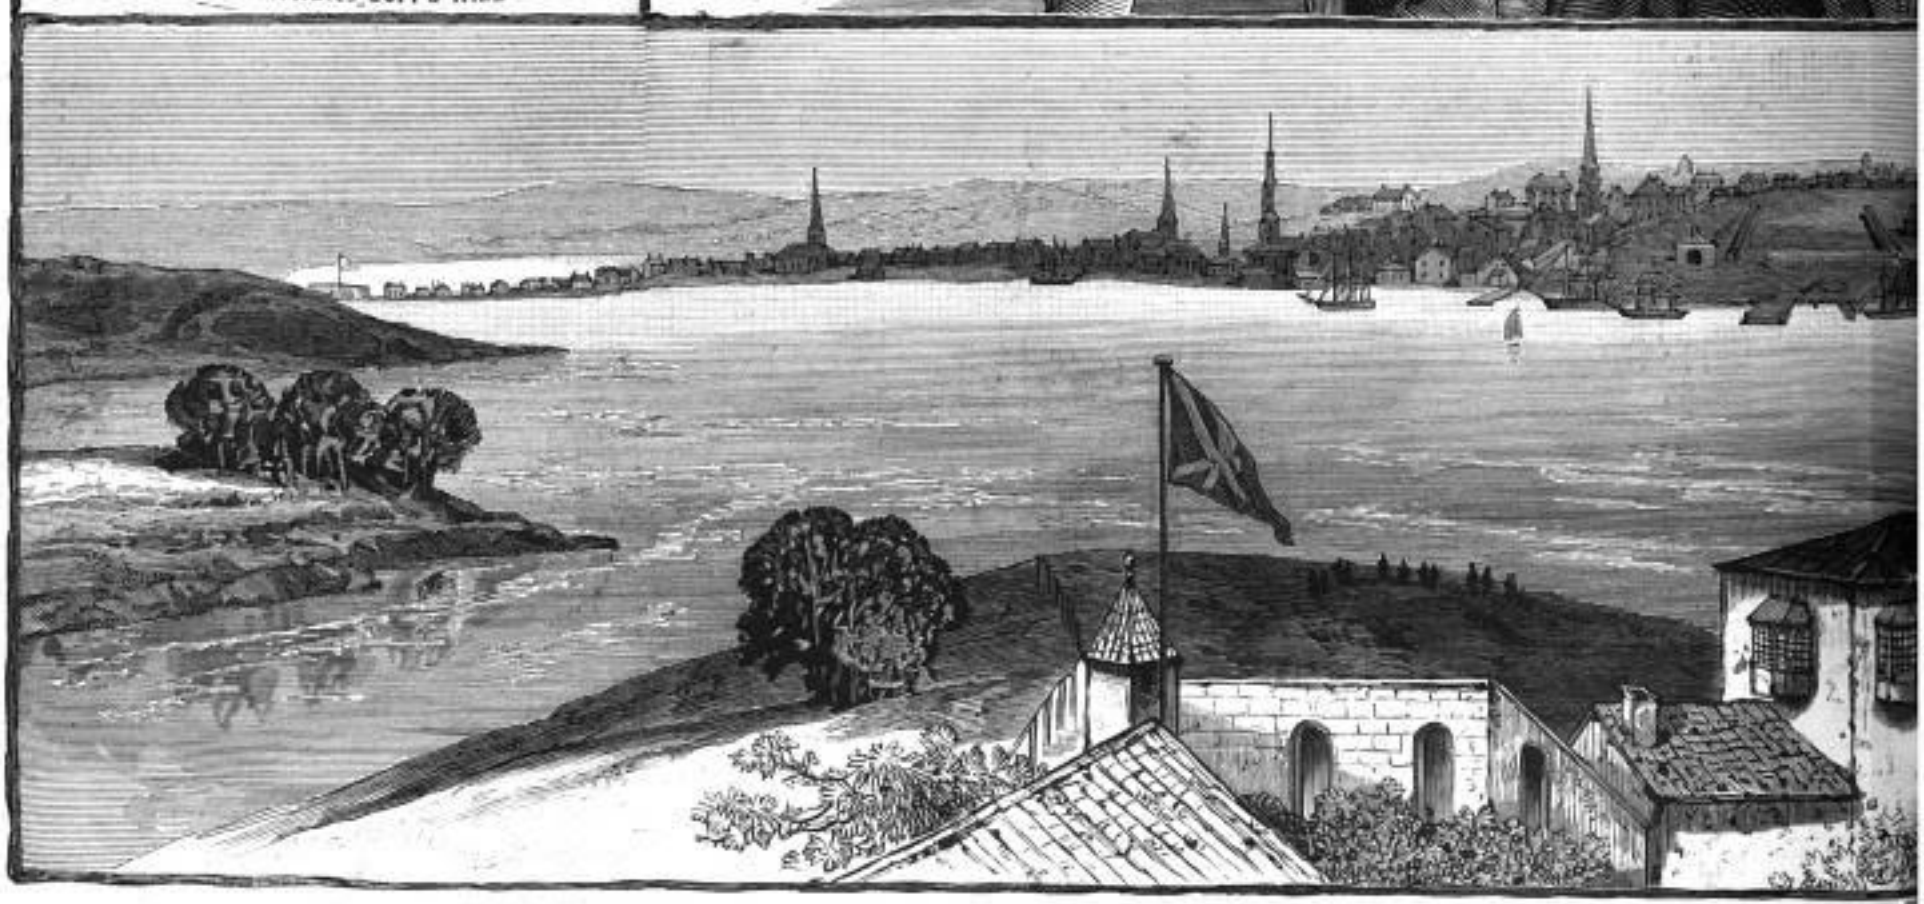
—THE new Finance Minister of Russia, M. Bunge, has found the finances so disorganized and incrusted with defalcations that General Melikoff has advised the Czar to appoint a commission to investigate the departments. It is believed the recommendation will be adopted, but the result will not be made public. The commission will probably act privately and submit the result to the Czar, who will dismiss the worst offenders.

—MILWAUKEE received last season 15,000,000 bushels of wheat and 2,147,746 barrels of flour. Receipts of coarse grain for 1879-80 were 1,501,367 bushels of corn, 15,933,338 of oats, 3,578,887 of barley, 793,345 of rye. The receipts of live stock were 110,482; cattle, 58,948; sheep, 536,289 live, and 47,929 dressed hogs. Dairy products show an increase, the movement being 6,186,473 pounds of butter; 13,229,083 pounds of cheese, and 84,620 packages of eggs. Wool receipts were 4,385,931 pounds, an increase of nearly 1,000,000.

—THREE enormous steamers intended for the Atlantic trade are now building on the River Clyde—one each for the Cunard, the Inman and the Guion lines. The Cunard liner will have a tonnage of 7,500, and an indicated horse-power of 10,000. The Guion liner 6,500 tons and 10,800 horse-power. The Inman liner, the City of Rome, will be the largest and most powerful steamer afloat, excepting the Great Eastern, her tonnage being 8,500, with engines of 12,000 horse power. It is expected that these three steamers will be capable of attaining a speed of seventeen knots an hour under favorable circumstances, thus rendering the voyage between Liverpool and New York, or vice versa, under seven days.



—THE State of Bolivia is apparently certain of the proposed union with Peru, as she sent to this Government a Commissioner who is now on his way here. It is surmised that he comes to solicit the good offices of the United States in favor of Chili and Peru. About a year ago our Ministers to Peru, Chili and Bolivia were notified to hold themselves ready to mediate between the Governments whenever they should be requested to do so. It is thought that Bolivia is ready to make an arrangement for peace through the intervention of the United States. Our Government, however, is unwilling to do anything that may look like interference, except at the request of all three States. We will not mediate, probably, until requested by Chili as well as Bolivia and Peru, all of which, it is said, have accepted the mediation.



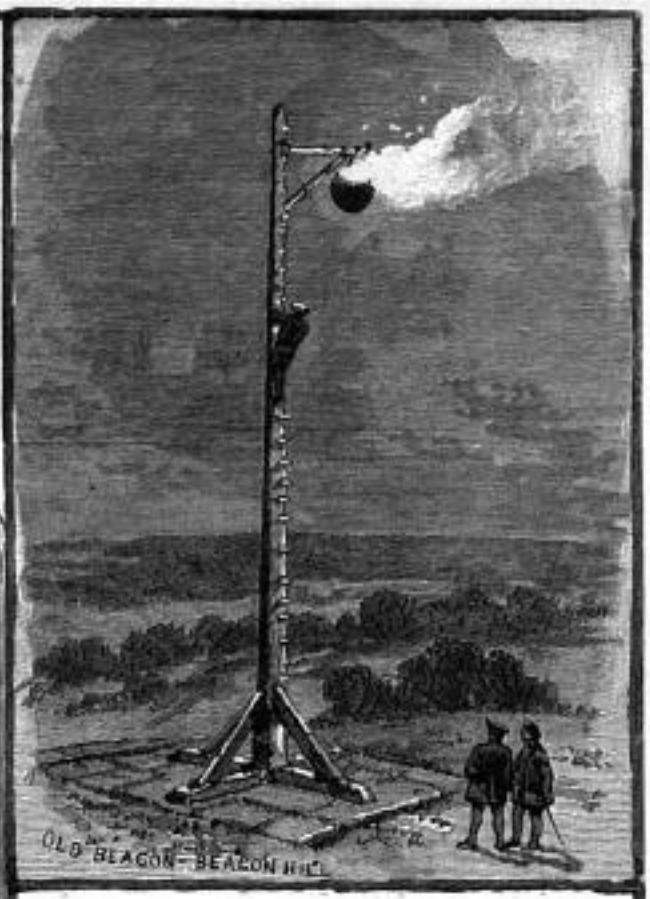
—IN the factories and magazines of Paris more than 10,000 workwomen and close upon 2,000 workmen people the workshops, and receive for their labor in the same an annual sum of not less than 12,000,000 francs, which represents the amount paid for hand labor, giving a daily wage of three francs per head. To state it in other words, the average earnings of the male sex is about four francs, while that of the female portion is about two francs fifty centimes. In regard to the latter, when it is stated that many of these are wives and mothers of families, and devote but their spare time taken from their home cares and duties, it may be readily imagined that the earnings of the Frenchwomen engaged are of the most remunerative amongst those industries which are open to the females, who form at an early age an object of the employers' engagement.

Digitized by Google

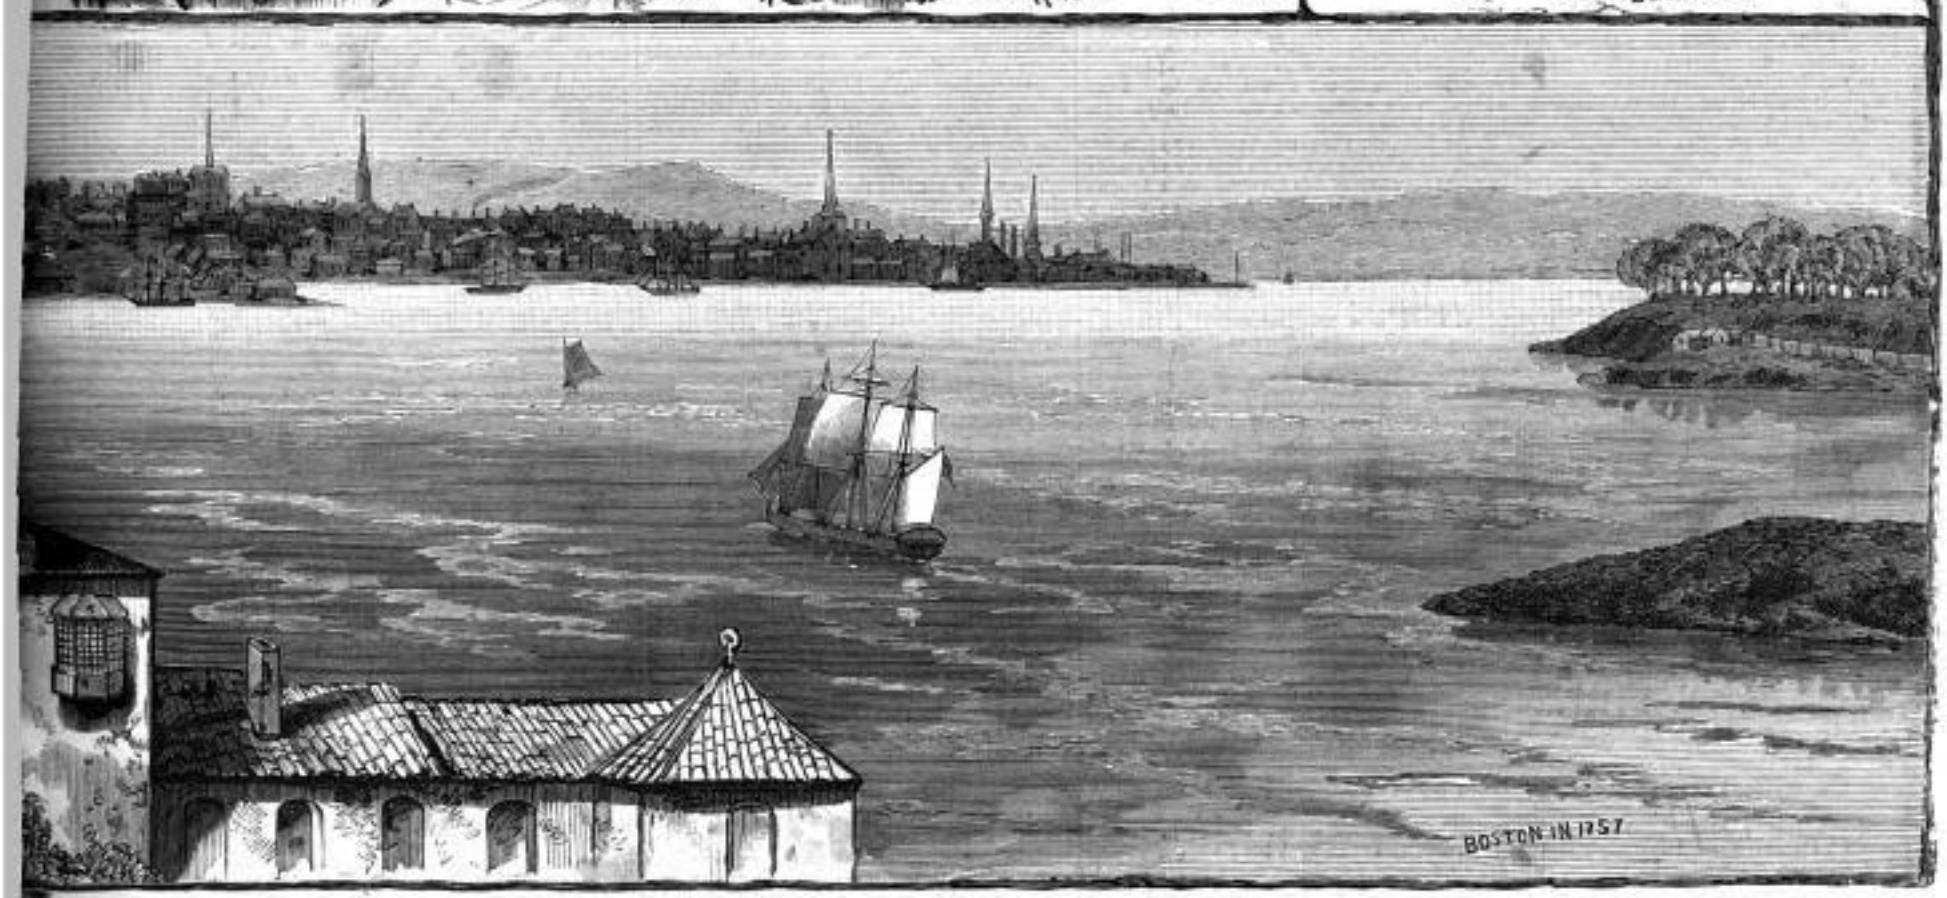
FIRST CHURCH IN BOSTON

TOMB OF COTTON MATHER, COPP'S HILL

THE ANCIENT AND HONORABLE ARTICCERY SALUTING MAYOR PRINCE.



MASSACHUSETTS.—THE TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE SETTLEMENT



From Sketches by Joseph Becker

Digitized by Google

F BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 17TH—ILLUSTRATIONS OF OLD BOSTON AND OF THE CELEBRATION.

CHARLES UPHAM.—SEE PAGE 70.

Digitized by Google

THE SCHAFFUSKIE LANDS.

BY ANNIE DUFFELL,

AUTHOR OF "IN THE MESHES," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXVII.—THE GREEK EXILE.

LADY JET, weary and anxious, stands gazing expectantly out of the window in her apartments that command a view of the road to the mines; when suddenly, coming around a sharp angle in the path, appears a strange procession: it consists of four guards carrying between them a litter, and followed by several vagabonds of the surrounding country, who have augmented the procession as it advanced.

A horrible fear sweeps over Lady Jet, and she grows numb and faint; and all the while the procession advances steadily towards the house, the expression of the men's grave countenances being suggestive of the direst calamity. At last they are within sufficient distance for her to discriminate that small, motionless form upon the litter, and her hands lock, while a low cry breaks from her—her worst fears are confirmed.

"Oh, my God!" she moans. "I sent him to his death. It is he—poor, darling little Nick! They have killed him—or—or something!"

She springs from the window and hastens down the stairs just as the servants, appalled at the procession, flock into the hall, congregating at the door, in which stand the four guards with the litter. Nick lies motionless and rigid as death, eyes closed and scarcely breathing.

"He fell down the mines," is the trite explanation. "Every one of his bones must be crushed to powder. He fainted dead away when we lifted him to the litter."

Herself almost fainting with horror, Lady Jet glances at the motionless boy. She starts convulsively, looks again, then turns abruptly away. From his comfortable position upon the litter, carefully sustained by the four guards, Nick winks twice at Lady Jet, but fortunately unperceived by the guards—actually winked twice, and at the culminating point of his disastrous history, as related by one of his sustainers.

The droll, elfish expression of his face, which an instant after relapses into its former forlorn and agonized lines, has an indescribable effect upon the young lady, and, conscious that she will soon give way to an hysterical desire to shriek in the sudden transformation of grief to joy and nervous amusement, she steps beside one of the huge pillars of the hall, while four stout men-servants step forward and relieve the guards of the litter, who bow and commence their retiring journey.

The hall-door is closed, and with solemn, awe-struck faces the servants gather around the litter and gaze in supreme silence at that small figure. Then, suddenly, through the great hall reverberates a loud and well-known whoop, as Nick springs up erect in their midst, a fiendish grin upon his face. The sudden resurrection of a corpse could not be hailed with direr terror and confusion. The four men drop the litter with loud yells, and in a panic all retreat like frightened sheep to the far end of the hall.

Turning a hand-spring, Nick beats a prudent retreat and scrambles up the stairs, on to "my lady's chamber," outside of which safety cannot be insured him from the wrath and mortification of the victimized servants. A few minutes after Lady Jet finds him convulsed, as he mentally reviews his recent exploits—turning, twisting, rolling upon the amber cushions, though to the extravagant soul of their owner, ignorant of money's value, the divans are as free to Nick and the dogs as to herself—and entirely collapsed into a state of agonized hilarity.

"Nick, how could you?" she says, in expressive rebuke.

Suddenly Nick sits erect in the midst of the tumbled cushions; his eyes, the size of saucers, staring in wrathful amazement at her.

"Well?" It is all he says, but the exclamation is replete with a fiery, indignant eloquence that she cannot mistake. She is at a loss how to act.

"Of course," he finally says, with scornful irony, "I don't deserve any credit for thrusting my head into the lion's den to serve you. Of course, it was very wrong for me to get the note to the—the—one at the risk of my neck. Ah, yes; I might have expected it! 'Nick, how could you?' Ah, yes, to be sure!" flaming wildest wrath upon his companion.

"Of course, I am grateful to you, Nick," says Lady Jet, not exactly clear as to what would be the proper thing under the peculiar circumstances. "And you deserve a great deal of credit—that is," bethinking herself that, to say the least, it is somewhat out of order for her to commend Nick for transgressing the rules of his country—"that is, I mean to say—you deserve credit for your courage, and I am very much obliged to you—but—but," hopelessly at sea, "I thought—that is—it was not quite the thing, you know—and that."

"Oh, yes; 'and that,'" retorts Nick, at this brilliant conclusion of an eloquent rebuke. "You 'thought' you would like to dance and not pay the fiddler. I've no patience with people who play the dev—who cut up the deuce, and then try to shirk out of it. It's cowardly, and I hate cowards. When I get down below I'm going straight up to the devil and say, 'Mr. Devil, I hope you have seen how wicked I have been, and that I didn't do more is because I had no more to do.'"

Lady Jet makes no reply to this flight of imagination, but prudently waives the subject, and a gloomy silence ensues. At last Nick springs to his feet, his anger swallowed up in sudden excitement. Hostilities for the present are abandoned.

"Oh, I forgot," he cries, breathlessly, "Jet, there is a fresh lot of convicts in. I saw them going to the office as they carried me by. Get your bonnet! Hurry!"

Lady Jet stands irresolute. Ever since Nick has been gifted with the power of locomotion it has been their custom, running wild as they have, to visit the office upon the arrival of fresh convicts; so inestimably dreary and monotonous being their lives that even this circumstance, morbid and wretched as it is, is an event too great to be missed. Still Lady Jet has the vague impression that an excursion to the office for the purpose of viewing the wretched exiles will not be in accordance with the dignity of her eighteen years. But it is an overpowering temptation, so dreary and forlorn is she.

"But it would not be right for you to show yourself so soon after—after that," she says, probably referring to Nick's recent exploits.

Nick snaps his fingers.

"I'm not afraid!" he says. "Out of the mines they couldn't catch me to save their souls. Besides, none of the guards from "Funnel Mine'"—this being the title of the place where he has so recently distinguished himself—"will be there. It's safe enough; hurry or it will be too late!"

Thus admonished, Lady Jet speedily gets into her soft, rich furs, and they start off together. In a few minutes they arrive at the office, which is crowded with the convicts.

Entering, they make their way around to the desks occupied by the count and the secretary, who are both present, Polleskie busy taking down an inventory of each convict, while close beside the two superior officers are the guards and under officials.

Even before she has glanced at the convicts she is attracted by Polleskie. To her naturally keen instincts there is come an indefinable change in the secretary—something in his manner, quiet and business like as it is, that bespeaks suppressed excitement. She regards him keenly. There is no palpable alteration, nothing in reality unusual, save a swarthy flush that stains his dark, handsome face and an occasional twitching of those deep lines around his mouth that, to a perceptive reader of human nature, betoken sensuality in the possessor.

At this point there is a detention, one of the guards having some difficulty with a prisoner, and, while waiting, Polleskie rests his arm upon the desk and gazes across the office. He gazes intently, and something comes in his eyes—a certain fire and passion, try as he will to suppress it—that compel her to follow his glance. As she does so she half-springs to her feet, and, in her impulsiveness and excitement, grasps the secretary's arm. Across the sea of heads, and from her elevated position, she sees the tall and majestic figure of a woman stationed in the furthest corner of the room, and as far off from her wretched companions as is possible.

Lady Jet forgets Polleskie—forgets everything save this woman, in the convict's garb. She stands like a dethroned queen, her hands locked tightly in front of her, small and white like sculptured marble; her face, hard and set and colorless, wondrous and even dazzling in its frozen loveliness—a loveliness that bespeaks all those straight, perfect outlines of Grecian statues, and yet is replete with a sensuous, slumbering grace that breathes of the South.

Lady Jet's breath breaks from her sharply. There is around this figure an indescribable association and connection with that distant and high-bred world for which her soul has been pining. Standing as she does in her prison garb, and surrounded by criminals of the deepest dye, there is yet that in her that bespeaks a haughty and noble existence. The polish and distinction of a court life makes itself apparent even under these circumstances.

Sharper and sharper comes the breath from Lady Jet. Emotional as she is by nature, her whole soul is agitated and taken by storm. While she stands in her silent and bewildered contemplation, there is a furious tugging at her elbow, and Nick, who has perched himself upon a corner of the secretary's desk, leans over with an awe-struck face, and says, in a shrill whisper:

"Jet, who, for the saints' sake—who is it?"

But her ladyship makes no reply, and stands in silent scrutiny of this lovely woman, around whom is that indefinable connection with a dainty, high-bred world that it has been her lot never to know. Even as she stands now, apart from the convict throng, her hands locked, herself leaning heavily against the wall, as though exhausted with pain and fatigue, there is a haughty grace, a majestic dignity in her manner that bewilders the Russian peeress.

The first distinct sensation of which she is conscious is a sharp, wild pain that she has for ever been removed from the sensuous, wondrous grace of that woman's world of rank and distinction that have set their signet upon her.

Then, above every other emotion, rises, vast and unchangeable, a great and boundless pity for this wrecked life. She looks at the white, set face; it is beautiful with a strange and appalling beauty; white, hard, fixed as it is, there is something in it almost divine, yet out of the magnificent eyes shines the spirit of a Nemesis, and a hatred, vast and concentrated, that seems to take in all the world.

Lady Jet shudders at that frozen, tragic face. She reads in it the appalling grandeur of strong womanhood being led to death by relentless fates; it speaks of the rack, the fagot and the flames. She thinks of Joan of Arc, of Marie Antoinette, of Mary, Queen of Scots—of all the noble and unfortunate women that have suffered and died. There is something in the appearance of this woman to arouse such memories. Suddenly it flashes upon Lady Jet that there are worse fates in the world, infinitely worse, than being debarred from mingling with a world that could send forth one of its own to such a doom as this.

She hears a long-drawn, deep breath, almost a gasp, and is roused. She turns quickly to Polleskie, who has given that swift, choking sound, and in his eyes that great fire has deepened, shining along with which is a passionate admiration and a vast wonder. She thinks of Madame Polleskie, a silent, dignified, cultured woman of good birth, and who brought to her husband a richer dower than is usual, which, perhaps, accounted for his marrying a woman several years his senior. It is to Madame Polleskie that she owes that little of knowledge and the few accomplishments she possesses—that good lady, pitying the destitute condition of the young peeress, and listening to the petitions of her father, having, since she has been of sufficient age, taken her as a pupil and directed her intellectual advancement.

Somehow, as I have said, Lady Jet thinks of madame, as she sees that passionate, intense look in the eyes of her husband, and looking first at the exiled lady and then at the secretary, and seeing the firmly closed lips with their indications of sensuality and powerful will, the flashing eyes that can grow chill and even brutal with a fixed purpose and a deadly resolve, a shudder convulses her—a shudder of fear for the future of this delicate, helpless woman who is thus cast to such a fate, her proud womanhood at the mercy of men unscrupulous as to how they achieve their aim so that their purpose be but gained. And she feels that she must cry aloud with shame and horror at the tyranny and injustice of her country.

She knows not how long a time passes, she is so engrossed with this wondrous woman; then she is conscious that there is a dead silence which seems of expectation, then follows some confusion, and Count Zickwoff calls in a still louder voice the number of the convict who is next to approach for examination. All eyes turn to the woman standing apart; every one else has been up; the number must necessarily belong to her. The glances directed to her arouse her from her gloomy abstraction, and looking hastily up, she sees that something is expected of her. Divining that she must follow the course of her predecessors, she starts towards the upper end of the apartment, where sit the officers. Even among that stricken, debased mass of humanity, gathered up from the vilest of Russia, not a soul present but feels the superiority of this woman, and slowly and of their own accord the ranks part and, pressing back, leave a long aisle through their midst, down which approaches that stately figure, that wondrous face with its inimitable grandeur.

With intense and dilated eyes Lady Jet regards her, and sees much of which the exile herself is unconscious. In her face, grand and powerful as it is, there are marks of a weary and exhausted pain, and occasionally a shiver passes through her delicate limbs. As she stands motionless before the officers, the proud, white majesty of her face gleaming in the sunlight, her golden hair, dishevelled by long travel, falling in a tawny flood below her knees, Count Zickwoff, who, despite his moroseness and peculiar life, is the Russian courtier at heart, involuntarily removes his hat and rises to his feet. Polleskie follows his example, and both stand regarding the woman; but where, as in the eyes of the former is only a boundless amazement and a great pity and irresolution, Polleskie's expression is indicative of a deep but suppressed admiration, which, if it deepen into any stronger emotion, may lead to trouble.

And straight and still and proud stands the woman like a statue, her countenance as emotionless as stone, her great, dark eyes turned absently out of the window, an apathy almost death-like upon her. Count Zickwoff is embarrassed and at a loss how to proceed. He has often had noble exiles before, but never one with whom he found it as difficult to deal as this present one. There is something so majestic in her presence—so thoroughly dissimilar to her surroundings—that he stands silent and motionless.

At last, bethinking himself that his official dignity will be impaired by this irresolution, he lays his hat upon the desk, and, still standing, commences the usual questions.

"Your name?"

The white set lips move twice ere she can give over to the shame of this place the name given her by poor Jack in those far-off years.

"Maize Ashhurst," she says, finally.

"Your parents?"

"Lord and Lady Ashhurst, of Lancastershire, England." She thinks it best to enter into no minute explanation about her history.

An expression of surprise fastens upon the count's face.

"If you are English, how is it that Russian law has the casting of your fate?" he inquires.

"I was made a citizen of Russia one year ago."

"And what was your offense?"

The great eyes turn now full upon him; in their depths a challenging, defiant gleam, while her words are cold and startlingly distinct:

"I was accused of murder!"

Lady Jet shrinks back with a low cry of horror, and even the count recoils slightly; he had prepared himself for political offenses—treason, disloyalty, etc. It is not infrequent that women—and noble ones—have come under his knowledge and jurisdiction for offering their beauty and their favor as a guerdon for rebellion, or indulging in some special course under the ban of royal displeasure; and yet he could scarcely believe this of the woman who stands with cold, proud face confronting him. But murder! she a murderess, with that divine loveliness, that ravishing, entrancing womanhood! Impossible!

But Polleskie is outwardly unaffected by this circumstance, and herein is the secret key to his character. To the soul of this man, with its latent passion, honor and purity are subservient to love, passion, or whatever title you may give the one weakness of his nature. It is nothing to him that this woman is branded a murderess, that her soul may be stained with crimes that even the blood of Christ could scarcely wash clean. In his vast admiration he has not even thought of it. It is the woman herself that concerns him.

For a while Count Zickwoff is silent; then, turning to another portion of the room, he nods his head, and at this signal a huge, brawny giantess advances. This is one of the women-guards who have special control of female convicts, and who are generally, and in the present instance, exiles themselves, promoted to this office through physical adaptability and long years served in the mines.

"Guard," says the count, in his coldest, sternest tones, "this lady"—he emphasizes the word purposely, for, owing to that bond of aristocracy that unites them, it is exceedingly revolting to him to give over this woman, delicate and highbred, into the hands of the human beast before him—"this lady comes under your care. See that she is given the slightest labor possible. Failing to do this will be at your own disadvantage."

The guard bows sullenly, and then commences the bustle and excitement of the journey to the mines. And all this time the Greek exile stands motionless, apparently dead to all emotion, and Polleskie's hand, as he busily writes in the ledgers, trembles occasionally, and that dark flush deepens upon his face.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.—A CONCURRENCE.

THREE weeks have passed since the arrival of the last exiles in Siberia—at least, in that portion with which we have to deal. Among a gang of female exiles washing and assorting the metal is the tall figure of the Greek convict—that figure so lately resplendent in lace and satins and jewels fit for an empress. Owing to the interposition of the superior officer, her labor, compared with the delving toil of the others, has as yet been light. And it is well for her that this leniency has been shown her, otherwise her delicate constitution, accustomed to the luxury of wealth and every earthly indulgence must have sunk at once under this new and terrible life into which she has been thrust.

But as she stands now among the women over whom she has been placed as a sort of directress, at a glance one can see that the heavy pain of physical exhaustion is upon her. This shock has been very great to her system. Her constitution by nature is unadapted to either cold or exertion. A born Greek, she has the warm, idle, luxurious predisposition of her nation, and which has been fastened in her by the love, the prodigal indulgence and extravagance of poor Jack. For the past three weeks a mortal chill has been upon her. The course clothing of the convict, while perhaps sufficient for the strong, rugged natures of the Russians, is as nothing to her delicate limbs, accustomed to the soft floss, the dainty lace, the priceless furs of the aristocrat. The rough diet of the mines, the stifling atmosphere, the horrible surroundings—slowly but surely all this horror is eating its insidious way in the girl's once strong and perfect womanhood.

Yet truthfully may it be said that of her outward misery the girl thinks nothing—ay, is scarcely conscious of it. Ruined as her life is, there is greater destruction in her soul. It is crushed, wrecked, slain! She has entered into her living death, from which she believes there is no succor. All the hopes of her girlhood; all the sweet, free faith of her youth; all the grand spotless womanhood, with its haughty supremacy, its royal triumphs—everything has been swept down before that devastating flame that has laid her life waste. And all through the weary hours that count her exile, so full of an endless torture to her, there has come but one thought, the bitter, pain-fraught memory of Jack—one aim, the desperate, Pagan thirst for vengeance upon Toboskie, whom she looks upon in the light of her destroyer.

And as she stands now unconscious of her physical torture, living the bitterness and agony of the past with the equally wretched present, upon her is fastened the yearning, piteous gaze of a man, who, toiling but a short distance from her, from time to time raises to her face his tired, sunken eyes, in which is the long history of his ruined and bitter life. It is Count Smoloff, the exiled noble. For years he has moved a mechanical figure in this drama of wretched life. He is a wreck, literally dead in soul and purpose. All the great capacities of that once powerful intellect are slowly rusting away with inaction. Under the tedious, monotonous horror of his existence all those higher attributes of soul and mind, for which once he was so highly distinguished, have shrunk away into nothingness, leaving an utter vacancy. It is ruin in its worst form—ruin of a fair and lordly structure, once matchless in its perfection, but now stricken prostrate with its own debris.

Yet at this critical period, when it seemed as though the vail of insanity or imbecility must prostrate the brain beyond all possibility of recovery, that interest was forthcoming that was requisite to arouse its natural functions and call it back from its night of darkness into which it was fast relapsing. The sudden sight of the Greek exile came as a great shock to him, yet stirred the still waters of the wrecked soul. The calm, stern, elevated face rouses memories of the past from which he is for ever separated. Recovering the power of thought and memory, he sees that to her has come a fate equal to his own in its travail. Into his soul rushes a flood of recollections and emotions strange to him in the mechanical existence he has been leading. His brain, so long disused and neglected, aches under the whirl of new emotions, and for days is chaos and pain; but gradually strength and composure are restored. The mind recovers from its torpor, and its pristine power and grandeur are fully restored.

Digitized by Google

He sees in that white, set, stern face his own history, and shudders as he looks ahead at the long line of wretched years which he fears will reduce her to that state of mental oblivion into which he so nearly relapsed. He knows not of what she is accused, but he feels that she is innocent. The lofty countenance, the divine loveliness, the hard, bitter, dauntless courage that sustains her, rouse emotions once and long years ago crushed beneath his shattered manhood. All the strong and mighty fires of his stricken youth rise bright in his breast, along with that natural instinct of true manhood—protection of woman. He is resigned to his own fate, but he yearns to save this girl from the blight and darkness that have smitten his life; he craves to rescue her from the horror of this dead existence. In these long, new days, when his soul, resurrected from its death, has entered into a strange and new life, which also holds all the bitterness and torture of the old—in these days, as they pass one by one, and he watches this woman struggling in her pride and wretchedness, is developed in his soul the germ of a mighty love.

(To be continued.)

DEDICATION OF A THEATRICAL MONUMENT IN PHILADELPHIA.

THE monument erected in Mount Moriah Cemetery, Philadelphia, by the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, was dedicated on Sunday, September 12th, in the presence of a large concourse of people. The lot, which is called "Elks' Rest," is situated on the Delaware County side of the cemetery. It is irregular in shape, of an area of forty-five by seventy feet, and is surrounded by a vulcanized iron railing, resting upon granite posts, bearing the coat-of-arms and motto of the Order and appropriate designs. The monument is erected near the centre of the plot and beside the graves of the only two deceased members of the Order buried in "Elks' Rest."

The exercises in the cemetery were announced to begin at half-past two o'clock, but it was half an hour later before the opening services took place. The Philadelphia Lodge, accompanied by a band of music, and escorting the visiting lodges from other cities, left its headquarters, at Tenth and Chestnut Streets, and proceeded thence to the Baltimore depot, where cars were taken for Mount Moriah. Great crowds were congregated at the depot, and long trains, crowded with people, were dispatched in sections at brief intervals after two o'clock. The large cemetery was already thickly crowded when the Elks arrived. The destination was easily discernible, for on one side of the plot a temporary platform was erected, which was tastefully draped in black, with appropriate designs festooned about the borders. Surmounting the centre of the platform, and from which were pendent the draperies, was a large head of an elk. Showing conspicuously in the middle of the plot was the high monument, veiled in the American flag. Growing flowers were planted at the base.

The Exalted Ruler, addressing the Esteemed Leading, the Esteemed Loyal and the Esteemed Lecturing Knights, asked each in turn the expression of his wishes concerning the dedication. Responding, the respective Knights presented to the Marshal who was detailed to receive their instructions, each a wreath, one inscribed "Charity," one "Justice" and one "Brotherly Love," expressing, at the same time, the hope that these would be emblems of the spirit that should govern the Order. The Marshal placed these wreaths, which were composed of immortelles, upon different corners of the lot. Then the Exalted Ruler, taking a similar wreath, inscribed "Fidelity," expressed a like hope, and handed it also to the Marshal, who placed it upon the remaining corner. Frank Moran, as District Deputy of the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, then proclaimed the lot formally dedicated, and pronounced upon it the title of "The Elks' Rest." Charles F. Jones, Marshal, read an extract from a series of resolutions, to the effect that the Philadelphia Lodge, as a mark of appreciation of Mr. Moran's unselfish devotion to the Order, had requested him to unveil the monument.

In a few remarks Mr. Moran returned his thanks for what he expressed as the unexpected honor conferred by the Philadelphia Lodge. Then, by loosening the ropes, which ran from the stand to the top of the monument, the veil was instantly removed, revealing a large bronze figure of an Elk, with broad, high-stretching antlers, head erect, standing upon a hill-top. The figure was placed upon a massive granite pedestal, nearly eight feet in height, the sides of which were carved in rustic blocks. A polished granite panel on the front bore the inscription: "Presented to the Philadelphia Lodge, No. 2, B. P. O. Elks, by Brother Charles E. Ellis." The initial letters of the Order, formed of flowers, were placed upon the four corners of the pedestal.

The Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks was organized in New York City in 1868. It was the result of an effort to establish in this country a social and benevolent organization among actors and all members of the dramatic profession, somewhat after the model of the "Buffaloes," an English theatrical order. Originally, only persons connected with the profession were admitted to membership, but subsequently the constitutional article excluding non-professionals was rescinded, and the roll of members still further increased.

THE ANTIETAM MONUMENT.

THE statue and monument erected in the National Cemetery at Antietam in commemoration of the Union dead who fell on that battle-field during the civil war were formally unveiled on Friday, September 17th, by the Grand Army of the Republic for the Department of Maryland. The monument, which was designed and executed by James G. Batterson, is composed of Rhode Island granite, and has cost $30,000. The statue is that of a private soldier at "parade rest," is 11 feet 6 inches high, and 5 feet 6 inches broad across the breast, and weighs 30 tons. The stone, in the "die course," has the accoutrements of the different branches of the service in relief, and the following motto cut in: "Not for themselves, but for their country, September 17th, 1862." The entire monument is 41 feet 6 inches high.

Baptizing a Royal Infant.

DISPATCHES from Madrid give an interesting account of the pomp and ceremony with which the little Infanta Mercedes Teresa was christened, September 14th, in the chapel of the royal palace. The galleries of the palace leading from the apartments of the Princess to the chapel were lined with halberdiers, in full gala costume, and a splendid carpet was laid down along their entire length. All the persons invited, including the Diplomatic Corps, Ministers of the civil and military authorities and the grandees with their ladies, occupied seats, and the chapel presented a brilliant aspect, with its variety of uniforms and elegant toilets. In the gallery at the bottom of the chapel were the King, the Archduchess Isabella, the Infantas Paz and Eulalia, and their households. Guns of the artillery fired a salute as the procession started for the chapel by the galleries of the palace. First went the Lord in Waiting, then the Chamberlain and the grandees in double file, all in grand court costume of the last century, with gold-braided and lace-adorned coats, knee breeches and silk stockings. In the midst of the mace-bearers and heralds there walked seven noblemen, bearing the ensign of baptism—namely, the salicellar, a taper, a napkin, wool lacer, a short mantle and a cake made of almonds—and the Duchess Medina de las Torres, bearing on a white satin cushion, richly trimmed with lace and gold, the little Infanta, who wore a beautiful white satin robe, the gift of Queen Isabella. The procession was closed by Queen Isabella and the Papal Nuncio.

On arriving in the chapel, the insignias were placed on two tables covered with rich tapestries. At the altar stood many priests and choristers, the Cardinal Archbishop of Toledo and the Patriarch of the Indies, with other prelates, who immediately began the service with all the pomp and splendor of the Church of Rome. In the act of baptism Queen Isabella held the Infanta over an ancient font, expressly brought from the Convent of Santo Domingo, and in which the Saint had been baptized in the Middle ages. After the ceremony the Infanta Maria Isabella was taken back to her apartments in the same state. Other festivities will take place in October, when Queen Christina is churched in the Atocha Cathedral. Then bull-fights and popular entertainments will be given by the Town Council. The King and the members of the royal family and the Archduchess Elizabeth of Austria have given large sums for the poor and the hospitals. The royal household has been thrown into a ferment of jealousy by the marked preference shown to foreigners. The Austrian doctor who attended the Queen, and an Englishwoman who officiates as head nurse, are special objects of aversion. The Princess of Asturias loses her title by the birth of the Infanta, and is styled Infanta Isabella in the Gazette.

Last Year's Cotton Crop.

THE size of last year's cotton crop is a matter for national congratulation. The total number of bales, according to the estimate of the Financial Chronicle, was 5,757,397. This large number is in itself striking, but its true significance appears only by comparison. The largest year's production of cotton in the palmiest days of slavery was the crop of 1859-60, which reached 4,823,770 bales. During the war the industry was paralyzed and no record was kept. After the war the annual yield increased, with some fluctuations, from 2,228,987 bales in 1865-66 to 4,811,265 in 1877-78, 5,073,531 in 1878-79, and 5,757,397 in 1879-80. Thus, while the increase in the crop of 1878-79 was 262,266 bales, the increase in the crop of 1879-80 runs up to 684,332 bales. But this is not all. The average gross weight of each bale, which varies from year to year, was greater last year than any preceding year, being more than eight pounds greater than the average weight of 1878-79, though only 1.4 pounds greater than that of 1877-78. Estimated in gross weight the crop of 1879-80 was 372,242,955 pounds more than that of the preceding year, and 462,539,573 pounds more than the production of 1877-78. The indications now are that the crop of the coming year will be larger than any of its predecessors. These facts are full of significance and promise of prosperity.

The cotton factories of the country have been unusually busy during the past year. The Chronicle estimates that more than half a million spindles were added in Northern mills alone, and that the increase in the home consumption of cotton was about nine per cent. The amount of cotton manufactured in the United States has been steadily increasing year by year. Estimated at 1,325,000 bales in 1875, it reached 1,530,060 bales in 1878, and 1,760,000 in 1880. The amount that goes to Southern mills is yet small, but it is becoming larger every year. Thus in 1880 these mills took from the crop about 179,000 bales, which was 31,000 bales more than they required in 1878 and 22,000 more than in 1879. While American spindles have been running to their full capacity during the year, the exports of cotton manufactures have fallen in value from $11,423,660 in 1878 to $10,853,950 in 1879, and $9,981,418 in 1880, for the year ending June 30th in each case. This decrease is due chiefly to a good home market for cotton goods. Such a market, however, will stimulate production until a surplus is reached which must seek a foreign demand. Hence the decrease in exports of cotton goods may be regarded as but temporary. The American cotton industry, both in the field and in the factory, but particularly in the latter, must continue to grow, and with this growth must come in time an increase in the export trade of cotton goods.

A French Heroine.

ONE of the celebrities of the Paris markets is a woman who keeps a vegetable stall, and who wears the red ribbon of the Legion of Honor. This woman, Annette Drevon, by name, was formerly cantinière to the Thirty-second Regiment of Infantry, and to the Second Regiment of Zouaves, which she accompanied through the campaigns of Africa and Italy, and during the war with Germany. Of seven or eight female members of the Legion of Honor, she is the only one who received the distinction for an act of valor upon the field of battle; and she was decorated after the battle of Magenta for rescuing the regimental colors from two Austrian soldiers who had captured them.

During the war with Germany she was with the Thirty-second Regiment in Metz, and upon the surrender of that fortress she was sent off to Germany with the survivors. Just outside of Metz a Bavarian soldier insulted her, and she pulled out her revolver and shot him through the heart. For this she was condemned to death, and would have been shot but for the intervention of Prince Frederick Charles, who, hearing that a woman was to be executed, made inquiries into the case, the result being that Annette Drevon was set at liberty. She lived in great poverty for some time; but Marshal MacMahon happening to hear about her, gave her a sum of money sufficient to enable her to set up a stall, at which she now sells carrots, turnips, and other aids to digestion.

The Morocco of To-day.

MOROCCO is so nearly barbarous, at least so nearly semi-civilized, that it seldom has any relation to European politics. But the present Morocco conference, with the announcement of the determination of the Sultan to punish all who may be guilty of wronging non-Mohammedan subjects, has drawn attention to a country which few foreigners visit, and with which Americans have very little acquaintance. Morocco, or Marocco, is called by the natives Maghrib-el-Akss, meaning the extreme west; it includes the three former kingdoms of Maghrib, Fez and Tafilet; contains from 260,000 to 270,000 (English) square miles, and a population variously estimated at from 3,000,000 to 8,000,000. The country is generally mountainous—the Atlas Mountains traverse it in several parallel ranges from southwest to northeast—but it has many level tracts. Between the central range of Atlas and the sea the climate is temperate, but in the southeast extremes of heat and cold prevail, and rain never falls. The inhabitants consist, like those of Barbary in general, of Moors, Berbers, Arabs, negroes and Jews, with a diversified offspring of promiscuous miscegenation. More than two-thirds of them are Moors—these are a mixture of the Mauri, of Arabs, Romans, Numidians and Phœnicians—the other third consisting of Berbers, Jews (350,000) and negroes. There are very few Europeans there, and there is very little inducement for them to go thither, since the civilization is very low, many of the Berbers being little less than savages. The theology of the land is Mohammedan. The native negroes are increased by slaves introduced from Soudan. For convenient administration the country is subdivided into thirty-three governments or districts, each under the supervision of a caid, whose principal business is to collect the imposts. The semi-independent tribes are ruled by their own chiefs, and scarcely acknowledge the Sultan's authority. The Government is absolutely despotic, and in the absence of written laws the will of the Sultan (called by Europeans and Americans the Emperor of Morocco) and of his subordinates is equivalent to law. Public officials chiefly support themselves by practicing extortion on their inferiors, and are in turn robbed by their superiors. The Sultan is styled by his subjects Prince of Believers and Vicegerent of God on Earth, the title being hereditary in the male line, though not necessarily descending to the eldest son. Learning to read and write and to recite portions of the Koran is considered education, which to this extent is pretty generally acquired. Printing is unknown, and the arts and sciences are well-nigh null. The sole industries of any consequence are the manufacture of caps, fine silks and leather, in which last the people excel. The army numbers between 20,000 and 30,000 men, half of them negroes, and there is besides a body of militia, 90,000 to 100,000 strong, which is occasionally called out. The navy is insignificant, but in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries it was piratical and very formidable.

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

Mr. H. Bullen Newton, assistant naturalist under Professor Huxley in the Museum of Practical Geology, Jermyn Street, London, has received an appointment in the geological department of the British Museum.

The Sixth Annual Conference of the Cryptogamic Society of Scotland will be held in Glasgow, on September 27th to 30th, and October 1st and 2d, when all persons interested in cryptogamic botany are invited to attend.

The Proposed Tunnel through Mont Blanc is being seriously talked about in France, and the French Government have commissioned M. de Lepinaye to draw up a report on the scheme. The estimated cost is $180,000,000, and the extreme length would be about eight miles.

The Balloon Society of Great Britain has been formed. Its principal object being to bring together members of the learned professions, scientific bodies, and practical aeronauts, with a view to having observations made in different parts of the world wherever ascents take place, whether by means of captive or free balloons.

Numbers of false turquoises are being sent from Vienna to England. Their detection is somewhat difficult, the backs of every specimen having been pecked out and the holes filled with a black cement, to imitate the matrix of la Vieille Roche. They are, however, a little lighter than the real turquoise, the specific gravity being 2·4, while that of the genuine stone is 2·6 to 2·8. The easier method of distinguishing them is to use a penknife to the false matrix, which can be easily removed, revealing the artificial perforations.

From a Report drawn up by Don Mariano Barcena, Director of the Central Meteorological Observatory of Mexico, we learn that it is proposed to establish a large number of stations throughout Mexico for the uniform record of observations on the temperature, pressure, rainfall, vegetation, etc. Should this project be properly inaugurated and continued, it will be of the greatest service to science. The observers will likewise report on the state of the crops, prices of grain and other commodities, etc., as affected by the weather.

The Latest Discoverer of the Lost Tribes is a Russian traveler and journalist, W. J. Remirowitch-Dantschenko, who has found them in the Caucasus, and, of course, has written a book about them. They were found in the mountains of Daghestan, where travelers never went before. They are warlike, and resemble the Cossacks in appearance, but they follow the old Mosaic law as it existed before the time of Ezra and the second building of the Temple, without any knowledge of Talmudic traditions and forms, and they claim to have lived where they now are ever since the time of Psalmonasser.

The Ease with which the Esquimaux of St. Lawrence Island can see to a great distance and the marvelous way in which news is transmitted from the most distant points is really wonderful. A native will describe the dress and appearance of a man who is approaching at a great distance. A white man, even a sharp-eyed sailor, can just make out that it is a human figure. So, if anything occurs on the coast—if a piece of wreck comes ashore—the full particulars will be known in a short time 1,000 miles from the place where it occurred. It is a wonderful system of telegraphy—one native rushing off to pass the news to another, and thus speeding intelligence over hundreds of miles of territory in a single day.

The Recent Travels of the Chevalier Ernst von Hesse Wartegg would seem to throw cold water on the sanguine scheme of Captain Roudaire for letting the waters of the Mediterranean into the great low-lying basin of the schotts, and turning the North African desert into an inland sea. According to the surveyor of the chevalier, the basin comes no nearer to the Mediterranean than seventy miles, so that it would take a canal rivaling that of Suez to attain the end in view. Moreover, if a water-way between the two basins were established, some of the most flourishing cities of the schott region—for example, Tozeur and Nephta—would be submerged by the deluge, and most probably all the large date-forests of the Djerid would be destroyed by the change of climate produced.

The London "Times" Geneva correspondent telegraphs as follows: "An interesting geological discovery has been made in the neighborhood of Solothurn. On removing a mass of superincumbent sand and gravel to prepare for some quarrying operations, the rock beneath was found to be quite smooth and intersected with old watercourses. The excavation being continued, a number of enormous holes filled with great stones were laid bare. These holes, like those in the famous Gletscher Garten, at Lucerne, are due to the action of water, which, flowing through rifts in the glacier that once past covered the rock, set in movement the stones beneath, whereby the 'Giant's Kettles,' as they are called, were hollowed out; but while the rock at Lucerne is sandstone, the formation at Solothurn is hard limestone and quartz."

Sir Robert Christison, the great Scotch chemist, has made some curious observations on the effects of a cold, wet season in diminishing the normal growth of trees. He makes out, on careful measurements, that, comparing 1879 with 1878, eleven deciduous trees—not oaks—made on an average forty-one per cent. less growth in last year than in the year before. Of seventeen pine-trees, the average deficiency was twenty per cent., and of seven oaks, the deficiency was ten per cent.; so that heat appears to have more to do with the making even of wood than moisture has. It is strange that the growth of the oak, which drops its leaves, seems less dependent on heat than that of the pine, which we usually associate with very cold regions; but, perhaps, it need not be the tree which is most stunted by cold which is most easily killed by it. The arrest of growth may sometimes be a safeguard against vital injury.

PERSONAL GOSSIP.

M. GAMBETTA has just been "decorated" by King George of Greece in appreciation of his work in behalf of that ancient land.

CHOW-PHYA-BHAMM-WONGSE, the Siamese Ambassador in Paris, is to receive a civilized decoration as Commander of the Legion of Honor.

HERR GERHARD ROHLFS, the explorer, is going to Abyssinia as a diplomat. He is charged by the Emperor William with a mission to King John.

AMONG the successful candidates in this year's class of the Cambridge University Higher Examinations is Miss Helen Gladstone, daughter of the Premier.

DR. SAMUEL ELLIOTT, Superintendent of the Boston Public Schools, who is now in Europe because of ill-health, has resigned his position as superintendent.

EX-GOVERNOR ENGLISH, of Connecticut, has never been sick a day in his life, has never called a physician, and has never taken any medicine, though he was sixty-eight years old last March.

LADY STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE and her unmarried daughters have received a pension of £500 from the Crown in consideration of the late Lord de Redcliffe's long and highly distinguished public service.

REV. DR. WILLIAM ADAMS, of New York, was the third minister to die within the year, after having been chosen to preach the sermon before the second Pan-Presbyterian Council, which soon meets at Philadelphia.

DR. LEWIS SWIFT, the astronomer, is now the owner of three handsome gold medals bestowed upon him in recognition of his planetary discoveries. The third he has just received from the Imperial Academy at Vienna.

IT is understood Dean Stanley will pay a final visit to the United States in 1881, in company with Mr. Thomas Hughes. The visit will be of special character, for the purpose of investigating the church question in the United States.

WILHELMINA HELENA PAULINA MARIA is the very long name of the very little daughter of the King and Queen of the Netherlands. She is to be called Princess Wilhelmina, as it, as a girl, can have no pretensions to the throne of Holland.

MISS CLARA LOUISE KELLOGG has been making a rather extended continental tour for her health. She arrived on the 17th inst. at Vienna, and at once signed an engagement with the Imperial Opera House, where she appeared two or three days after.

A WOMAN has been elected Lecturer of Modern Literature in the University of Wooster, Ohio. She is Miss Irish, the translator of several volumes of German literature. She has had entire charge of the foreign correspondence of Secretary Carl Schurz during President Hayes's administration.

THE daughter of the brilliant and unfortunate Russian poet, Pushkin, is married to Prince Nicolas of Nassau, who belongs to what was before German unity a reigning family. She has been in Russia attending the festival in honor of her father, and there received from the Emperor the promise of a pension.

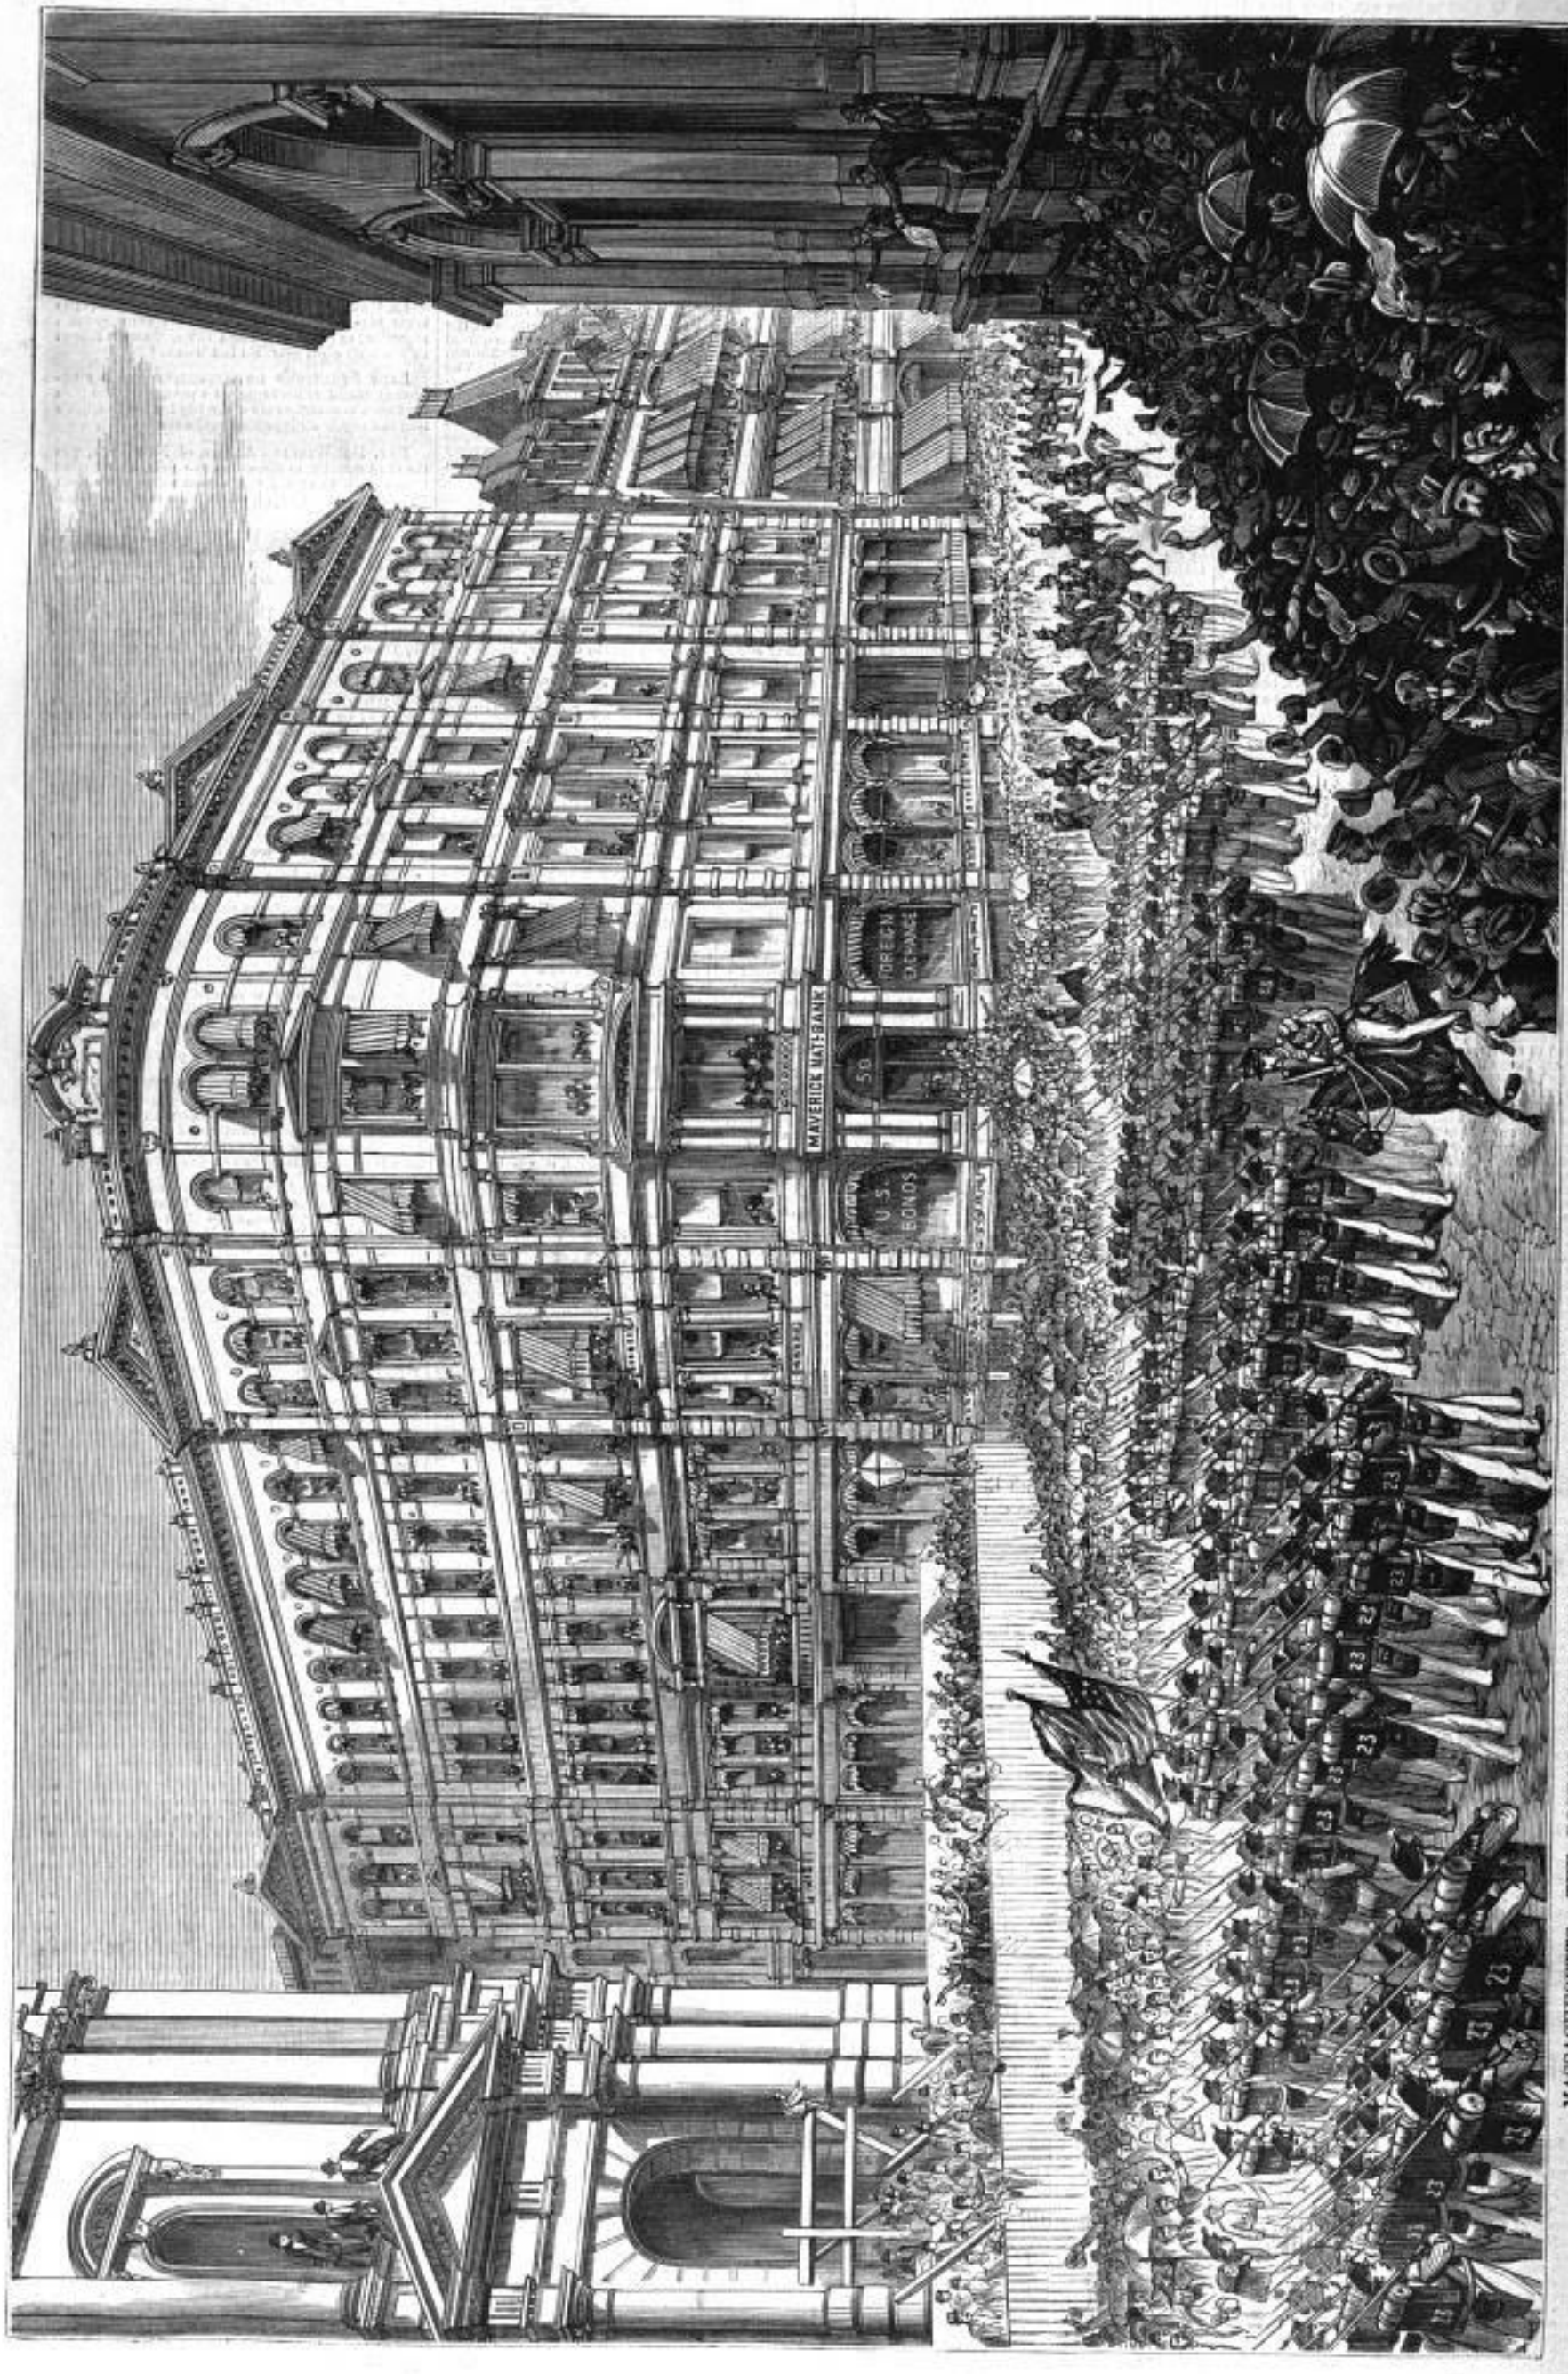
THE commission that was appointed to choose nurses for the royal infant at Madrid selected five young women of the Province of Santander, all of very dark complexion. The one who attracted the most attention, Leocadia Fernandez, is said to be of the highest type of Arab beauty, with large soft eyes and glossy hair.

MANY subscriptions are announced to make good the gift of $150,000 by C. W. West for an art museum in Cincinnati. Joseph Longworth gives $10,000; Julius Dexter $10,000; the estate of James A. Fraser, $5,100; G. K. Shoenberger, $1,000; P. N. Nefl, $1,000, and other smaller sums, making an aggregate of $30,000.

GREAT preparations are making for the reception of the German Emperor and the whole court at Cologne on the 15th of October for the official opening of the Cathedral. The festivities promise to be very grand, and will last three days. The occasion is regarded throughout Germany as an important national fête.

THE Crown Prince Rudolph and his Belgian bride will pass the first years of their married life in one of the most ancient and imposing castles in Europe, the castle on the Hradschin, that rises abruptly from the Moldau and towers above the city of Prague. A part of the castle is being remodeled and handsomely refurnished for their reception.

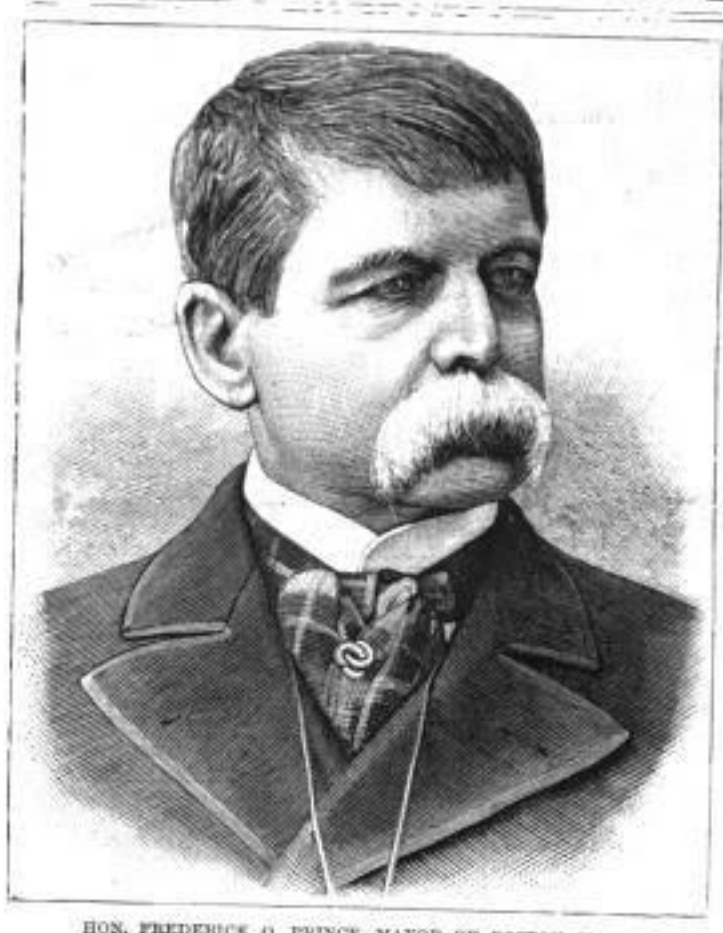
MRS. KATE P. NOBLE died recently at Hempstead, Long Island, where she has been spending the Summer. She was the wife of the Rev. Dr. Noble, of Washington, and mother of the Rev. Mason Noble, Jr., of Sheffield, Mass.; the Rev. George Noble, of Cornwall, N. Y.; the Rev. Charles Noble, of Washington, and the Rev. Franklin Noble, of the Presbyterian Church, in Hempstead, in whose house she died.



KING CHRISTIAN of Denmark has just bestowed upon Mme. Bernhardt a gold medal surmounted by the royal crown in diamonds, and suspended to the red-bordered white ribbon of the Order of the Dannebrog. This exceptional Danish distinction is very rarely accorded. The only two ladies who have been honored with it before Mme. Bernhardt happen also to be theatrical artistes—Mesdames Trebelli and Nilsson.

KING LOUIS of Bavaria lately celebrated his birthday and the seven hundredth anniversary of his dynasty. He did not appear in his capital, but sent a letter thanking his subjects for their congratulations, and asking them, with good-natured practicality, not to go to any great expense on his account. When he was a younger man the King had a fashion of dressing himself in the general hunting costume of the country, and spending a day or two in rural villages incognito, dancing like the rustics on the village green.

THE Duke of Bedford, who gets the blue ribbon now placed at Mr. Gladstone's disposal by the death of Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe, is entitled to it, on the old theory, as the head of the great Whig house of Russell, though he has made no special mark of his own in politics. He was born in 1819, and is the eldest son of Major-General Lord George William Russell, a son of the sixth duke. He married in 1844 Elizabeth, eldest daughter of the fifth Earl de la Warr, served in the Scots Fusilier Guards for six years before his marriage, and sat for Bedfordshire from 1847 to 1872, when he succeeded his cousin, the eighth duke, in the title and estates.



THE magnetism of New York has happily attracted to Niblo's that most graceful and fascinating of dancers, Adele Cornalba, whose interpretation of the poetry of motion in the realization of an ecstatic dream, by birth a Milanese, she received the high distinction of being appointed première danseuse at the Royal Theatre, Turin, from whence she migrated to Paris to "take the town by storm," and, having fulfilled a brilliant engagement in "Lolotte the Glittering," she has now crossed the Atlantic to call additional laurels. As a dancer she is without a rival; as a beautiful woman she holds her own against all comers. Those who would see dancing at its best should witness a performance by Adele Cornalba.

Digitized by Google

MASSACHUSETTS.—THE BOSTON CELEBRATION—THE TWENTY-THIRD REGIMENT, N. G. S. N. Y., PASSING THE MAVERICK NATIONAL BANK, POST OFFICE SQUARE.
FROM SKETCHES BY JOSEPH BECKER AND CHARLES UPHAM.—SEE PAGE 70.

Digitized by Google

HON. FREDERICK O. PRINCE, MAYOR OF BOSTON, MASS.
FROM A PHOTO. BY NOTTMAN.

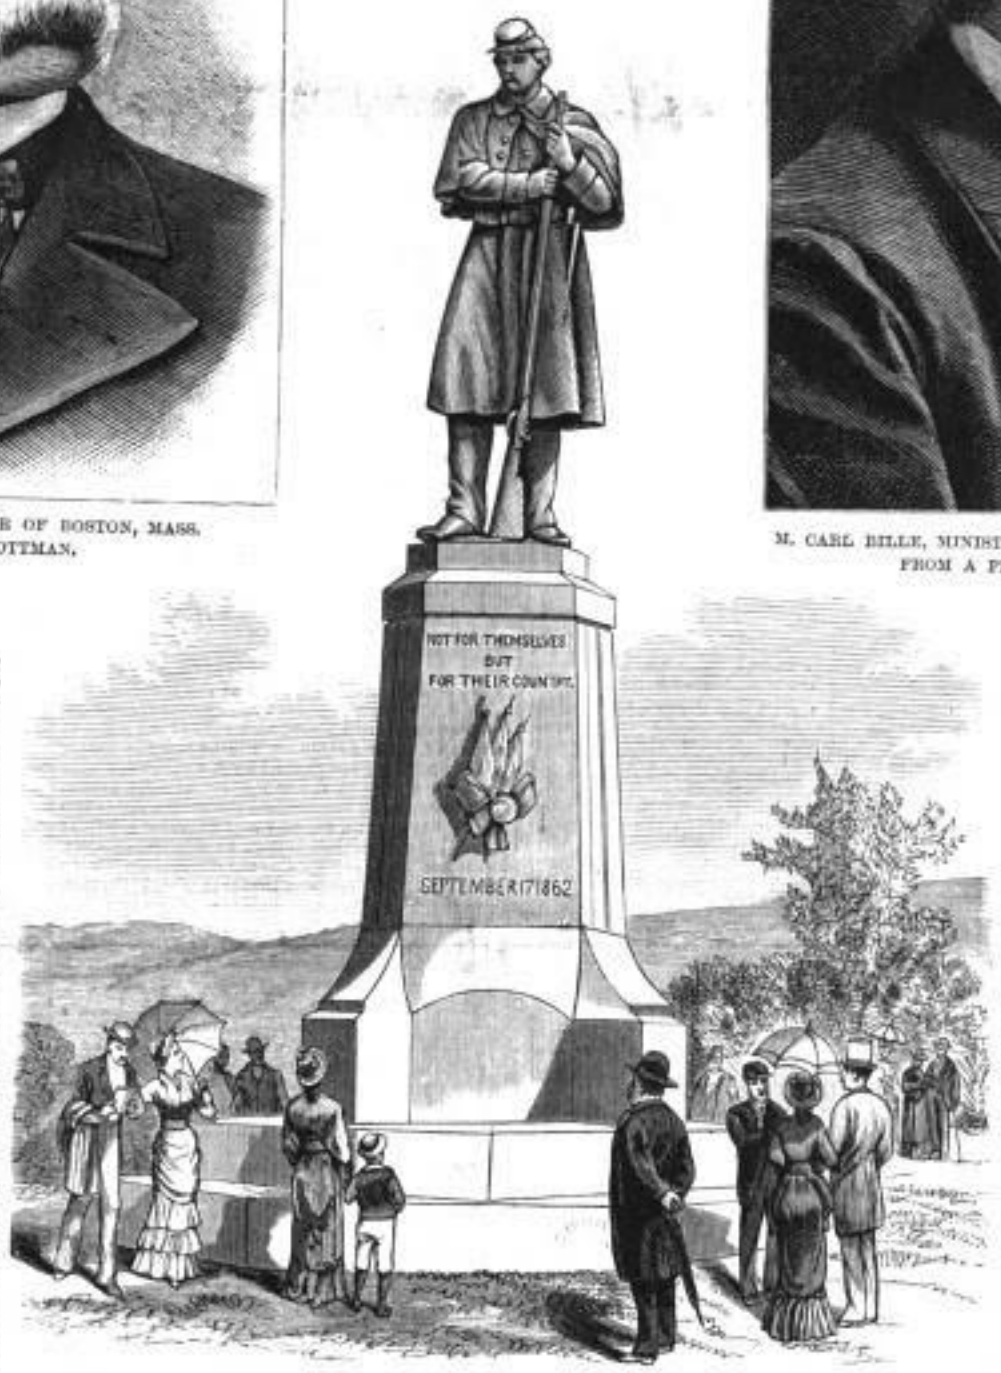
HON. FREDERICK O. PRINCE,
Mayor of Boston.

THE first authentic record of that branch of the Prince family to which Mayor Prince belongs is found in the year 1584, when John Prince, residing on his estate, "Abbey Forgate," in Berkshire County, England, married Elizabeth, daughter of the Rev. John Toldesbury. The family was characterized by strong Puritanic principles, a characteristic preserved in its later representatives of to-day. In the year 1633 Elder John Prince, of Hull, came over to this country and settled, following the same dictates which prompted the exodus of his brother pilgrims thirteen years before. Tracing the family history in direct descent, we find chronicled on January 18th, 1818, the birth of Frederick O. Prince, the present chief executive of the Boston City Government.

The early life of Mr. Prince was a marked series of successes, both in school and college. In 1827 he entered the Boston Latin School, graduating in 1832 with high honors, carrying off three prize Medals, including the Franklin Medal. He entered Harvard College the same year, graduating in 1836. The following year he commenced the study of law, and was duly admitted to the Suffolk Bar in 1840. About this time he entered actively upon political life, allying himself with the Whigs, and taking a prominent place in that organization. In 1843 he changed his residence to Winchester, retaining his law business in Boston. Three years later he was elected to the Lower House of the State Legislature, where he represented the Winchester District, acquiring great popularity by his stirring appeals in favor of reform. He was twice re-elected to the same office. In the year 1854 he was a member of the famous Constitutional Convention, and in addition was elected to a seat in the State Senate.

When the dismemberment of the Whig Party occurred in 1860, Mr. Prince transferred his allegiance to the Democrats, and has since acted with that party. At the Baltimore Convention in 1860 he was chosen Secretary of the Democratic National Committee, a position which he has filled ever since. He has organized every Democratic National Convention from the date of his joining the party to the present day, including the Chicago Convention which nominated McClellan in 1864; the New York Convention which nominated Seymour in 1868; the Baltimore Convention which nominated Greeley in 1872; the St. Louis Convention which nominated Tilden in 1876; and, more recently still, the Cincinnati Convention which nominated General Hancock.

In the Fall of 1876, he was unanimously nominated for the Mayoralty, and was elected by a large majority. He received the nomination again the succeeding year, but was defeated by a coalition between the Republicans and the "Citizen's Party," so-called, after one of the most exciting and bolly-contested municipal elections ever held in Boston. He was re-elected, however, the next year, 1878, by a handsome majority, among the votes voting in his favor being a large number of his former opponents. During his administration, Mr. Prince has been unwearied in his efforts to reform the municipal expenses, and has effected large savings, the cost of the government having been reduced more than half a million dollars in the first year of his Mayoralty. The system of sewers and that of public parks, the most important public works ever undertaken by the city, were inaugurated under his administration.



Mr. Prince possesses great personal magnetism, both in his capacity as party leader and in his private life, and has the faculty of securing the confidence and esteem not only of his political associates and friends, but also of many of his strongest opponents in the opposition party. As a scholar, he stands pre-eminent in intellectual attainments; in his profession, he ranks among the leading members of the Bar; in his official capacity, he stands to-day in the strong light of public favor without stain or blemish, steadfast to his duties as chief executive of a city renowned for her upright administrations, a gentleman, a gifted scholar, and a man whom the people delight to honor.

M. CARL BILLE, MINISTER OF DENMARK TO THE UNITED STATES.
FROM A PHOTO. BY HANSEN & WELLER.

M. CARL BILLE.

CARL STEEN-ANDERSEN BILLE, the new Danish Minister to the United States, is about fifty years of age, and descends from one of the oldest and most distinguished noble families of Denmark, once possessed of great wealth and influence. Mr. Bille began life at Copenhagen as a law student without other capital than his own energy and honest ambition. Danish journalism of that day was a thing little thought of, and that it should find in the young student what journalism in this country found in Horace Greeley was least of all suspected by Mr. Bille himself. The exciting years of the Schleswig-Holstein insurrection, incited by Prussia in 1848, had developed a demand for early and full news from the scene of war, which Sally B. Salomon, an enterprising printer at the capital, endeavored to satisfy by the publication of a penny fly-sheet, issued at all hours of the day, as occasion demanded. The success of the enterprise was so

MARYLAND.—THE MONUMENT AT THE NATIONAL CEMETERY, ANTIETAM, UNVAILED SEPT. 17TH.
FROM A SKETCH BY D. EMMERT.—SEE PAGE 75.

PENNSYLVANIA.—DEDICATION OF THE ELKS' MONUMENT IN MOUNT MORIAH CEMETERY, PHILADELPHIA, SEPTEMBER 12TH.—FROM A SKETCH BY J. E. HOWELL.—SEE PAGE 75.

Digitized by Google

great that the printer was encouraged to continue the issue of his paper in more permanent form when the war was over. The moment was peculiarly favorable for journalistic venture. The old order of things had been buried with the dead king; his successor had given to the country a free Constitution, and now thoughts and ideas were moving in the people in sympathy with the wave of popular uprising which had swept over Europe. They found an interpreter in Mr. Bille. Through the recommendation of his fellow-students he had been offered the position of editor of the new paper, Dagbladet, and had accepted it. The genius of the man was recognized at once, and his journal became a power which, during the exciting political battles of the next score of years that witnessed the awakening and awakening of the people to consciousness of its new-born freedom, frequently overshadowed that of the throne itself. His success as an editor did not, however, lure him from his studies, and in due time he was admitted to the Bar at Copenhagen. Thenceforward his name appeared in his paper as its responsible editor, and there it remained for twenty years. As a member of the Folksching, the lower branch of the Danish Parliament, he has consistently maintained his position, in which, fighting of late years against a decided majority, he has developed great ability as a debater. Mr. Bille was early honored by his fellow-citizens by being chosen a member of the Board of Aldermen of Copenhagen, to which, contrary to usage in this country, the highest honor and distinction are attached.

The unhappy result of the war with Germany in 1864, and the defeat of his party, deprived in a measure Mr. Bille's journal of the influence it had achieved. Certain bold opinions concerning the succession to the Danish throne expressed in its columns brought on complications with the Government, and in 1872 Mr. Bille, deeming his work in the Legislature of greater value to his country than his editorial labors, retired from the management of the Dagbladet, pointing out as his successor a young journalist of the school he himself had created, and under whose management the paper has since recovered its ancient prestige.

In his appointment the Danish Government has departed from its strict rule of civil service promotion, and its choice of the clever journalist for this diplomatic mission has excited a great deal of interest. Denmark supplies the markets of the world chiefly with farm and dairy products, and the commanding position achieved by American products of this class has aroused in that country a new and strong interest in the United States, which finds expression in the appointment as its diplomatic representative at Washington of one of its most able and clear-headed citizens, thoroughly conversant, by long familiarity with its law-giving machinery, with the industrial needs of his native State.

Lightning Photographs.

MR. R. CROWE, of Liverpool, communicates to the British Journal of Photography an account of some attempts to photograph a landscape by the aid of lightning flashes. A gelatine plate, requiring by day an exposure of two seconds, was exposed from 10:15 P.M. to 10:40 P.M., during which time there were 130 brilliant flashes and about half as many minor ones. Most of these were in a horizontal direction, and five or six of them were imprinted on the negative. A perpendicular flash which struck a church-tower half a mile away was rendered with extraordinary sharpness and brilliancy. The surrounding objects, in spite of the long exposure, were but feebly impressed; whence Mr. Crowe argues that though the light of a flash of lightning is of a very actinic character, there still is not sufficient volume of light to illuminate a landscape or building to allow a successful photograph to be taken. Mr. Crowe further suggests that an attempt should be made to photograph, for scientific purposes of reference, the varied forms assumed by lightning at different times and in different countries.

Influences of Afghan Chiefs.

MANY curious stories are told of the influence exercised by the Afghan chiefs over their followers, among the most striking of which is the following: A young English subaltern attached to the Kabul expedition of 1841-2, rescued an Afghan pilgrim from some British soldiers who were handling him roughly. The pilgrim warmly thanked his deliverer, saying with emphasis that "an Afghan never forgets a good turn or a bad one." Some months later, during the fatal battle of the Kurd Kabul Pass, our hero saw one of the enemy point to him repeatedly, and concluded himself singled out for destruction. But, to his amazement, he remained unhurt amid the hottest fire, while his men were dropping around him like leaves, those who had molested the pilgrim being the first to fall. At length several of the enemy disarmed and dragged him down by main force, shrieking those who wished to kill him by declaring him to be under the protection of their chief. The chief in question proved to be identical with the rescued pilgrim—a disguise assumed to aid his designs against the English—and the officer, having been hospitably entertained, was dismissed without ransom.

The New Anæsthetic Process.

A LATE number of the Medical Record contains a notice of a new and curious method of deadening pain, which is of striking simplicity. It was discovered by Dr. Bonwill, a dentist of Philadelphia, in 1875. In 1876 Dr. A. Hewson made a favorable report of his experience with it to the International Medical Congress, and at a recent meeting of the Philadelphia County Medical Society several papers were read on the subject, and much discussion followed. In using the method, the operator merely requests the patient to breathe rapidly, making about 100 respirations per minute, ending in rapid puffing expirations. At the end of from two to five minutes an entire or partial absence of pain results for half a minute or more, and during that time teeth may be drawn or incisions made. The patient may be in any position, but that recommended is lying on the side, and it is generally best to throw a handkerchief over the face to prevent distraction of the patient's attention. When the rapid breathing is first begun the patient may feel some exhilaration; following this comes a sensation of fullness in the head or dizziness. The face is at first flushed, and afterwards pale or even bluish, the heart beats rather feebly and fast, but the sense of touch is not affected, nor is consciousness lost. The effect is produced in females more readily than in males, and the middle-aged more easily than in the old; children can scarcely be made to breathe properly. It is denied that there is any possible danger. Several minor operations, other than frequent dental ones, have been successfully made by this method, and it is claimed that in dentistry, minor surgery and obstetrics, it may supplant the common anæsthetics. Dr. Hewson's explanation is that rapid breathing diminishes the oxygenation of the blood, and that the resultant excess of carbonic acid temporarily poisons the nerve centres. Dr. Bonwill gives several explanations, one being the specific effect of carbonic acid, another the diversion of will force produced by rapid voluntary muscular action, and the third, the damming up of the blood in the brain, due to the excessive amount of air passing into the lungs. The Record is not satisfied with the theories, but considers it well proved that pain may be deadened by the method, which it commends to the profession for exact experimental determination of its precise value.

THE WORK OF ONE SCALE.

THE Lehigh Valley Railroad Company use FAIRBANKS' SCALES at all points for weighing the immense tonnage which passes over their line. The scale now in use at Packerton, Pa., was placed in position July, 1873, and has been in constant use ever since. The gross tonnage passing over it during this time, as shown upon the books, is over 39,000,000 tons. The scale is 133 feet long, and has a capacity of over 100 tons. Some idea of the immense amount of work done on this single scale may be learned from this: That the coal tonnage comes from the Wyoming, Mahanoy, Hazleton and Beaver Meadow Divisions. Recently, in one day, forty-two coal trains bound East, were received and weighed. The number of loaded cars was 5,340, and if coupled together, they would reach over thirteen miles. The gross weight of these cars which passed over this one Fairbanks' Scale during the day was nearly 30,000 tons. More work is done upon this track scale than upon any other in the world.

FUN.

AN exchange has an article on "Smoking Ministers." Most of them are dry enough to smoke.

RIDER for a very lean horse: "Some very good points, eh?" Friend: "Some! Seems made of 'em!"

WHEN a landlady discovered that her boarders were dropping off, the burden of her song became: "Nothing but leaves."

HORSEMEN believe that Maud S. will soon attain so terrific a speed that a straight track will be necessary to prevent her running into the rear of her own sulky.

A NEBRASKA Indian contrived to swallow a lot of dynamite, and now he can stand around the corners and call a white man anything he chooses without being kicked for his insolence. They're shy of jarring him even.

LITTLE JOHNNY: "Pa, did you read in the paper how a parrot was fined $25 because his little boy hung on a street car?" Parent: "What of it?" Johnny: "Nothing, except I thought you wanted to give me some car tickets. There is money in it."

A CIVILIAN army is virtually a school not only of arms but of manners.—Daily Paper, Suspend of the Chowderkids in Ohio (who are standing at ease): "I am afraid gentlemen, I must request you to come to attention, as our friend the cajdain is about to trespass on your courtesy so far as to ask you to do him the honor of forming fours!"

"HENRY is so practical!" said Mrs. Youngwife. "When mother went into the country last year Henry sent all her things after her the very next day: he said she might want some of them, you know. And it's kind o' funny," she went on, "mother did want them, for she has never come back to live with us since. Wasn't it queer?"

"BUT you can't get home if the wind is dead against us, can you?" inquired the nearest passenger. "Oh! yes," replied the Nantucket skipper. "Oh! yes: I had the boat made with two sides, on purpose, so that when she couldn't sail on one tack, she could on the other. It is the only boat in these waters that is built that way." And the passenger was reassured, and the Clara got in on time.

NOTHING is so admirable as logic. A German traveler hurried out of the car, tired and dusty, and, seating himself at a restaurant-table, cried out, "Waiter, bring me a beefsteak." The waiter replied that he would be charmed to do so, but that it took twenty minutes to cook a steak, while the train only waited ten minutes. The kindly and sweet-tempered traveler retorted: "Well, then, bring me half a beefsteak."

A LIVERPOOL swain broke a wishbone with his "heart's queen," up in New Hampshire, last week. "Now, what d'you wish, Sally?" demanded Jonathan, with a tender grin of expectation. "I wish I was hansum," replied the fair damsel—"hansum as can be." "Gewhittaker! what a wish," replied Jonathan, "when you're hansum 'nuff now! But I'll tell you what I wished, Sally. I wished you was locked up in my arms and the key lost!"

GRANDFATHER LICKSHINGLE came in the office yesterday, looking as if he had been struck by a waterspout. "Raining?" we asked. "Rainin' nothin'!" exclaimed the old gentleman with extreme disgust, and he mopped the water from his dripping face. "Ajax had the same experience, however," and he attempted to absorb the moisture from his shirt front with a cotton handkerchief. "What about Ajax?" "About the last words Ajax uttered was that he had defied the lightnin' all his miserable life, but that he never defied a small boy with a garden hose but one solitary once."

"NOW WELL AND STRONG."

SHIPMAN, Illinois.

DR. R. V. PIERCE, Buffalo, N. Y.:

Dear Sir—I wish to state that my daughter, aged 18, was pronounced incurable and was fast failing, as the doctors thought, with consumption. I obtained a half dozen bottles of your Discovery for her and she commenced improving at once, and is now well and strong. She took the Discovery last Fall.

Very truly yours, REV. ISAAC N. AUGUSTIN.

DON'T say when you are hurt that you were never reminded to insure in THE TRAVELERS.

THAT the time-honored ST. NICHOLAS, of New York, retains its hold on the affections of Bostonians, is shown by the Eastern patronage it receives. Built at a time when space was not economized as it is at present, the rooms are unusually large; the table is of marked excellence and the service is unequaled. It should be borne in mind by all visitors to York that while the great hotels up town are so largely given up to "permanent boarders" that the best rooms can only be obtained by telegraphing in advance, the ST. NICHOLAS reserves all its "best rooms" for transient guests, so that persons there for the day only are as delightfully situated as though their stay was to be more prolonged.

THE Importers and Traders and American Exchange, two of the largest national banks of this city, have lately supplied themselves with new burglar-proof HERRING'S SAFES, that for the former weighing nearly fourteen tons. A sheet of the Franklinite, like that used in them, resisted, in an actual test, twenty-six hours constant drilling under pressure ranging from two to six tons, after which the attempt to enter the safe was abandoned.

THOUSANDS are now feeling the effects of this depressing weather, and experience a loss of appetite, loss of red blood, have become pale, and are very languid. We advise them to resort immediately to the great Blood Purifier, Blood Enricher and Perfect Health Giver, DR. BROWNING'S TONIC AND ALTERATIVE. Price 50 cents and $1. For sale by its author and sole Proprietor, W. Champion Browning, M.D., 1117 Arch Street, Philadelphia, and all Druggists.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE relieves mental and physical exhaustion, and gives vigor and renewed strength to the human system when weakened by overwork.

IF your complaint is want of appetite, try half a wine-glass of ANGOSTURA BITTERS half an hour before dinner. Beware of counterfeits. Ask your grocer or druggist for the genuine article, manufactured by Dr. J. G. B. Siegert & Sons.

BOSTON CELEBRATES ITS HUB PUNCH AS A TODDY, HOT OR COLD.

A NOTABLE feature in the great procession celebrating the 250th anniversary of the settlement of Boston was a double dray loaded with HUB PUNCH, and surmounted with a mammoth bottle representing the labeled appearance of this famous beverage as it is sold by the trade. Messrs Acker, Merrall & Condit and Park & Tilford, the well-known family grocers and wine merchants of New York, write as follows concerning it:

NEW YORK, Sept. 1st, 1880.

Messrs. C. H. Groves & Sons, Boston, Mass.

DEAR SIRS: The increased sales of Hub Punch among our always most critical consumers is evidence of its superior merit. Yours truly,

ACKER, MERRALL & CONDIT.

Hub Punch is growing in favor among our customers, and we hear many complimentary opinions on its merits. The increasing popularity of the article is pleasant testimony to your success in using exclusively the best and purest components.

PARK & TILFORD.

Wine-cellars are not complete without Hub Punch. Cooled with water or ice (the latter preferred), it makes a delicious drink. With hot water it makes a delightful toddy, and is preferred by many to "Hot Scotch." It is very beneficial in breaking up chills and colds. Sold by all leading wine merchants, druggists, and grocers everywhere at $1.25 a bottle.

BOSTON BELTING COMPANY.

A MARKED feature of the Trades' Display on the 17th instant was the exhibit of the india-rubber manufactures of this company. They excelled in variety and quality, and reflected credit on the officers and workmen alike of the establishment. The leading article in the show was the stupendous belt made expressly to order by them for one of the large grain elevators in the West. It was about 4 feet wide, 292 feet long, and weighed two tons, and was one of 20 belts of different sizes, aggregating over 25,000 feet, ordered of this company during the last month for grain elevators now building in Chicago and other places. We learn that the entire load was made in the ordinary course of business, to fill special orders from their customers, and not made up for the occasion, and have ere this been shipped to their several places of destination. The load was drawn by four fine-looking horses, that moved it as though familiar with the business. The works and warerooms of the company are all located in Boston, and that city may well be proud of such an exhibition of thrift and enterprise as the company displayed. The Boston Belting Company, the oldest company in the United States, with works the largest in the world, devoted exclusively to the manufacture of rubber goods for mechanical uses, was incorporated in 1845. Gold and silver medals (highest prizes) were awarded by the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association, for new and superior goods, at their Thirteenth Exhibition, in Boston, October, 1878. Diplomas and medals of "superiority" were awarded by the American Institute, New York, 1879.

Stuttering cured by BATES'S APPLIANCES. Send for description to SIEBERT & CO., Box 2236, New York.

EPPS'S COCOA.
GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately flavored beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.

Sold only in soldered tins, ¼ and lb., labeled:

JAMES EPPS & CO., Homœopathic Chemists, LONDON, ENG.

W. H. BUTLER,
Formerly VALENTINE & BUTLER,
Fire and Burglar-Proof SAFES and LOCKS
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.
GENERAL AGENT FOR
DIEBOLD SAFE & LOCK CO.,
291 Broadway.

H.W.JOHNS' ASBESTOS
LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING, BOILER COVERINGS
Steam Packing. Sheathings. Fireproof Coatings. Cements
Send for Samples, Illustrated Pamphlet and Price List.
H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO. 87 Maiden Lane N.Y.

CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL
Is used by Actresses, Opera Singers, and Ladies of Fashion, to create the distingué appearance so much admired by every one. By its use the roughest skin is made to rival the pure radiant texture of youthful beauty. Use the LIQUID PEARL according to directions, and you need no longer complain of a freckled, tanned or rustic complexion. Sold by all druggists. Price 50 cents a bottle. Beware of imitations. CHAMPLIN & CO., Prop'rs, Buffalo, N. Y.

Bouquetiere.
The Bouquetiere is the Acme of Perfection for securing the Bouquet to Coat, Dress, Hat or Hair. Simple and durable; in Gilt or Bronze. Mailed free on receipt of price, 25 cents each. Five for $1; or per dozen, $2.
GEORGE D. COOPER (Sole Agent), No. 37 Union Square, N. Y.

FULTON WIRE WORKS.
WALTER W. WOOLEY,
Manufacturer of
WIRE DESK OFFICE & BANK RAILING
Store and Window Guards,
GILT LETTERED WIRE WINDOW SCREENS.
No. 61 Fulton Street, New York.

TRADE MARK.
RICORD'S VITAL RESTORATIVE
Has been scrutinized and indorsed by the Academy of Medicine of Paris, and stood the test of over half a century as a specific for nervous and physical debility. There is a well-known principle in animal physiology that no vital action can take place except through the agency of the nervous system. Dr. Ricord's Vital Restorative is purely a vegetable pill. Can be had of Lesseure, 10 bis Rue Richelieu, Paris; or of S. S. RICHMOND, proprietors, Room 40, World Building, New York. None genuine without the signature, S. S. Sigesmund, on side of every box. $3 per box of 100 pills, and four times the quantity for $10. Sent by mail upon receipt of price. Sold by wholesale and retail druggists. C. N. CRITTENTON, wholesale agent, 115 Fulton Street.

Brain and Nerve Food.
VITALIZED PHOS-PHITES.
Composed of the Nerve-giving Principles of the Ox-Brain and Wheat-Germ.

PHYSICIANS HAVE PRESCRIBED 300,000 PACKAGES WITH THE BEST RESULTS IN ALL FORMS OF IMPAIRED VITALITY, MENTAL EXHAUSTION, OR WEAKENED DIGESTION. IT IS THE BEST PREVENTIVE OF CONSUMPTION AND ALL DISEASES OF DEBILITY. IT GIVES REST AND SLEEP TO INFANTS, CHILDREN AND ADULTS, BY STRENGTHENING THE BRAIN AND NERVES WITH THE FOOD THEY ACTUALLY REQUIRE.

For sale by Druggists or mail, $1. F. CROSBY, 664 & 666 Sixth Avenue, New York.

Inman Royal Mail Steamers
FOR QUEENSTOWN and LIVERPOOL.

NOTICE—The Steamers of this Line take Lieut. Maury's Lane Routes at all Seasons of the Year.

CITY OF BERLIN.....Saturday, September 25, 10 A.M.
CITY OF MONTREAL...Thursday, September 30, 2 P.M.
CITY OF RICHMOND.....Saturday, October 9, 9 A.M.
CITY OF CHESTER.....Saturday, October 16, 3 P.M.

From Pier 37, North River, foot of Charlton St.

Cabin, $80 and $100. Return tickets on favorable terms. Steerage, $28. Drafts at lowest rates.

Saloons, state-rooms, smoking and bathrooms amidships.

These steamers do not carry cattle, sheep or pigs.

JOHN G. DALE, Agent, 21 and 33 Broadway, New York.
G. A. FAULK, 105 South Fourth Street, Philadelphia.
L. H. PALMER, 3 Old State House, Boston.
F. C. BROWN, 32 South Clark Street, Chicago.

Newspaper Advertising Bureau.

BY ADDRESSING GEO. P. ROWELL & CO., 10 Spruce St., New York, the exact cost of any proposed line of advertising can be learned. 100-page pamphlet, 25c.

TO Bankers, Insurance Companies, etc., send for catalogue of Canceling Stamps, Check Protectors, Rubber and Dating Stamps, Badges, etc.
W. H. STAFFORD, 63 FULTON STREET, N. Y.

ROYAL
HAVANA LOTTERY
DRAWINGS EVERY 15 DAYS
FULL INFORMATION FURNISHED BY
J. DUFF & CO., BANKERS
42 NASSAU STREET,
COR. LIBERTY NEW YORK.

Information furnished in KENTUCKY, LOUISIANA and COMMONWEALTH LOTTERIES

CANDY
Send one, two, three or five dollars for a retail sample box, etc., by express, of the best Candies in America, put up elegantly, and strictly pure. Refers to all Chicago.
C. F. GUNTHER, Confectioner, 78 Madison St., Chicago.

HONEY BEES
New Principles in Bee-keeping.
Every one who has a farm or garden can now keep Bees with profit. Send for circular. Address,
MRS. LIZZIE F. COTTON, West Gorham, Maine.

WILKIE COLLINS'S NEW SERIAL STORY,
"The Black Robe,"
"The Black Robe."
The opening chapters will appear in
No. 1307 of
Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper,
ISSUED ON
Wednesday, October 6th,
FOR SALE BY ALL NEWSDEALERS, PRICE 10 CENTS A COPY.

Digitized by Google

THE BEST LOCATION IN BOSTON

ADAMS HOUSE,

555 Washington St.,
BOSTON.

Near all the Great Stores and Five Theatres.

POPULAR PRICES

Good Table and Service.

Fine Elevators. Fire Escapes on every Floor.

SPECIAL CONTRACTS MADE,
ACCORDING TO
Rooms and Time.
ALSO,
Rooms on the European Plan.

ALL LINES STREET-CARS AND BUSSES
PASS THE DOOR.

T. A. BARKER,
Manager.

Carpets,

NEW FALL STYLES.

WE ARE NOW OPENING LARGE LINES OF NEW DESIGNS AND STYLES IN CARPETINGS RECEIVED FROM

OUR OWN FACTORIES,

WHICH WILL BE FOUND TO COMBINE TO AN UNUSUAL EXTENT

Elegance in Style and Finish,
Durability in Wear,
and Economy in Prices.

WE ALSO OFFER AN EXTENSIVE ASSORTMENT OF TURKISH, PERSIAN AND EAST INDIAN CARPETS AND RUGS, AND OTHER POPULAR FLOOR COVERINGS, AT EXTREMELY MODERATE RATES.

J. & J. DOBSON,

40 & 42 WEST 14TH STREET, N. Y.,
Near 6th Ave. Elevated R. R. Station.

JOHN VAN GAASBEEK, Manager.

EARS FOR THE MILLION.

FOO CHOO'S BALSAM OF SHARK'S OIL,

Positively restores the hearing, and is the only absolute cure for deafness known.

This Oil is extracted from a peculiar species of small White Shark, caught in the Yellow Sea, known as Carcharadon Rondoletii. Every Chinese Fisherman knows it. Its virtues as a restorative of hearing were discovered by a Buddhist Priest about the year 1410. Its cures were so numerous, and many so seemingly miraculous, that the remedy was proclaimed by the priesthood over the entire Empire. Its use became so universal that for over 300 years no deafness has existed among the Chinese People. Sent (charges prepaid) to any address at $3 per bottle.

Only Imported by HAYDOCK & CO.,
SOLE AG'TS FOR AMERICA. 7 Dey St., New York.

JUDGE FOR YOURSELF By sending 50c. money or 60c. postage stamps, with age, you will receive by return mail a correct picture of your future husband or wife, with name and date of marriage. Address, W. FOX, Box 38, Fultonville, N.Y.

Little Havana Lottery.

OR SUPPLEMENT TO
THE ROYAL HAVANA LOTTERY,
HAS ALWAYS TAKEN PLACE OCTOBER 5th.

1 Grand Prize			$5,000
1 " "			1,000
1 " "			500
2 Prizes, $200 each			400
5 " 100 "			500
100 " 10 "			1,000
540 " 5 "			2,540
250 " 2 "			500
9 Approximations of $20 each to the 9 remaining units of same be on the one drawing the $5,000 Prize			180
2 Approximations of $20 each of the number preceding and following the one drawing $1,000			40
1011 Prizes, U. S. Currency			$12,560

ONLY 25,000 TICKETS. Wholes, $1; Halves, 50 cts.
Prizes paid in full in United States currency immediately on presentation of ticket.
Jackson & Co., Bankers, 72 Nassau Street, New York.
Clerk & Co., 300 Broadway, New York.
John W. Clark, 1703 N. Y. Ave., Washington, D. C.
Responsible Agents Wanted. Chase & Co., Gen'l Agts, New Haven, Conn.

Imitation Gold Watches.
$5, $10, $15, $20 and $25 each; Chains $2 to $12 to match. Jewelry of the same. Sent C.O.D. by Express. Send Stamp for Illustrated Circular. COLLINS METAL WATCH FACTORY, 338 Broadway, N. Y. Box, 3086.

UNITED STATES HOTEL, BOSTON.

UNDER AN ENTIRE NEW MANAGEMENT.

REPAINTED, REFURNISHED, & GREATLY IMPROVED

By an expenditure during the past six months of over $50,000!

New Passenger Elevator, Electric Bells, a perfect system of Sewerage and Ventilation, and every convenience that health and comfort can suggest. Located

DIRECTLY OPPOSITE THE BOSTON AND ALBANY, AND ONLY ONE BLOCK FROM THE OLD COLONY AND FALL RIVER LINES. Only Hotels only from the NEW YORK AND NEW ENGLAND, and PROVIDENCE AND STONINGTON STATIONS, and connecting directly by HORSE CARS, EVERY 5 MINUTES, with all the Northern and Eastern Railroads and Steamboats, giving Guests every possible facility and convenience of rapid and economical transfer from all points.

☞ UNEQUALLED BY ANY HOTEL IN BOSTON.

Passengers to or from all Southern or Western Points, by either Boat or Rail, MAY SAVE ALL CARRIAGE FARES.

ITS CENTRAL LOCATION,

BEING IN THE BUSY TRADE CENTRE OF ALL THE

Great Mercantile Establishments, Elegant Shopping, Theatres, Post-Office, Custom House, and all Places of Amusement, AND EVERY OBJECT OF INTEREST,

MAKES IT ALTOGETHER THE MOST ACCESSIBLE AND CONVENIENT HOTEL IN THE CITY.

EVERYTHING NEW, FRESH, CLEAN, and COMFORTABLE.

The notable character of its Guests, its Unexceptionable Table, its Broad Halls, and Grand Old Parlors, all encourage the UNITED STATES to possessing more substantial comforts than any Hotel in Boston, and offers to Guests, either permanent or transient, the Largest Variety of Spacious Rooms, and the most Liberal Scale of Prices.

PLEASURE PARTIES, LADIES AND FAMILIES

visiting or passing through the City, may secure Rooms with or without Meals, and will find every attention at the UNITED STATES. The nearest first-class Hotel to all the Great Retail Stores; having Waiting and Toilet Rooms, Ladies' Parlors, Rooms, and every convenience.

☞ Comfort, Courtesy, and Moderate Charges are the Virtues of Hotel Life.

The UNITED STATES fills these requirements in a most marked and successful degree.

Regular Transient Rates, for full Day's Board, Single Rooms,	$3.50
Rooms alone,	1.00
Single Meals,	.75
Parlors, Suitable or Double Rooms and Baths,	$3 to $4 per day

Rooms may be engaged with or without Meals.
Special Rates will be made for Large Parties or Permanent Guests.
☞ Orders for Rooms by Mail or Telegraph promptly attended to.

ISAAC N. ANDREWS, Manager. TILLY HAYNES, Proprietor.

MUSIC For The Million. Nearly $3.00 worth each month in the Folio. The Champion Musical Magazine. Songs, Sacred Pieces, Instrumental, New Copyright Music, Musical News, Gossip, Instruction, Bon Mots, Fashions, Portraits. Only $1.50 per year. Single numbers, 15 cents, post free. Circulars free. Agents wanted.
WHITE, SMITH & CO., Boston, Mass.

A New Serial by Wilkie Collins!

A NEW POWERFUL SERIAL STORY,
ENTITLED
"The Black Robe,"
BY
WILKIE COLLINS,
Will be commenced in No.
1307, 1307, 1307, 1307, 1307
OF
Frank Leslie's
ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

The story is one of absorbing interest, possessing all the attractions of style, ingenuity of plot and felicitous delineation of character which peculiarly distinguish Mr. Collins's works, and will, we are confident, afford the reader genuine enjoyment.

"THE BLACK ROBE" will be published exclusively in FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER, from advance sheets purchased directly of the author.

No. 1307, No. 1307, No. 1307, No. 1307,
ISSUED
WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 6th.

Persons who desire to have the story complete, as presented in our columns, should send in their subscriptions at once.

For sale by all newsdealers. Single copies, 10 cents each. Annual subscription, $4, postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

SCHMITT & KOEHNE.
Central Park Brewery
AND
Bottling Company.

Brewery, Bottling Department and Office, 153—155 East Fifty-ninth Street. Ice-house and Rock-vaults, Fifty-sixth and Fifty-seventh Street, Avenue A and East River, N. Y.

BOHEMIAN and LAGER BEER.

The finest Beer for family use. The best Shipping Beer in bottles, warranted to keep in any climate for months and years.

MAMMARIAL BALM restores and develops the bust. Warranted sure and safe. Price, $1. NEW ENGLAND MEDICAL INSTITUTE, 24 TREMONT ROW, BOSTON, MASS.

Agents Wanted.

BIG PAY to sell our Rubber Printing Stamps. Samples free. Taylor Bros. & Co., Cleveland, O.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. Address, H. HALLETT & Co., Portland, Maine.

IT PAYS to sell our Rubber Hand-Printing Stamps. Circulars free. G. A. HARPER & BRO., Cleveland, O.

$350 A MONTH—AGENTS WANTED—75 best selling articles in the world; 1 sample free. Address Jay Bronson, Detroit, Mich.

AGENTS WANTED, $5 PER DAY made selling our PLATFORM FAMILY SCALE Weighs up to 25 lbs. Retail price, $5. A BOOM FOR AGENTS. Exclusive territory free. Thousand sold where supplies Agents. DOMESTIC SCALE CO., Cincinnati, O.

AGENTS WANTED EVERYWHERE to sell the best Family Knitting Machine ever invented. Will knit a pair of stockings, with HEEL and TOE complete, in 20 minutes. It will also knit a great variety of fancy-work for which there is always a ready market. Send for circular and terms to the Twombly Knitting Machine Co., 409 Washington St., Boston, Mass

L.S.L.

LOUISIANA STATE LOTTERY CO.

Chartered for twenty-five years, 1868. Confirmed by popular vote and imbedded in the State Constitution Dec. 2d, 1879.

It never scales or postpones.

Monthly Grand Distribution has always taken place, New Orleans, October 12th. 1857 prizes, total $110,400; capitals, $30,000, $10,000, $5,000, etc. 100,000 tickets, two ($2) dollars; halves, one ($1) dollar. Apply to M. A. DAUPHIN, New Orleans, La., or same person at 319 Broadway, New York.

$72 A WEEK. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly Outfit free. Address, TRUE & Co., Augusta, Maine.

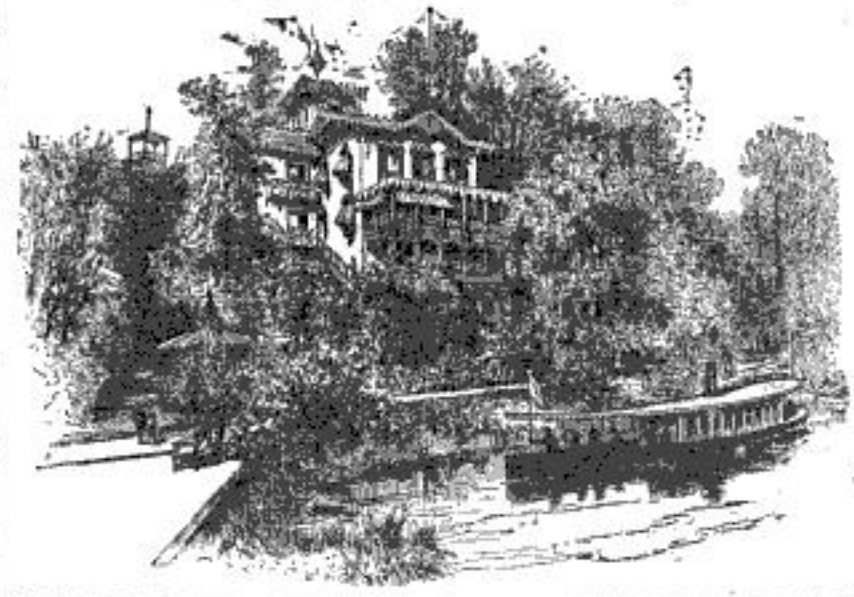
50 Chromo, Snowflake and Lace Cards, with name, 10c; 40 all chromos, 10c. Star Printing Co., Northford, Ct.

SCARCE GOODS.—Books, Photos, &c. Sample Catalogue 3c. Paris Book Co., Chicago, Ill.

50 New Style Cards, Lithographed in bright colors, 10c. 60 Agt's Samples 10c. Comic Card Co., Northford, Ct.

$777 A YEAR and expenses to agents. Outfit free. Address, P. O. VICKERY, Augusta, Maine.

50 Elegant Cards, New Chromo, Shells, Gilt-edge, etc., with name, 10c. G. A. SPRING, Northford, Ct.



30 Gilt Edge, Chromo, Snowflake, Glass Lace & Cards. Name On 10c. Franklin Pr'g Co., Fair Haven, Ct.

$1.75 Watches, $1.20 Revolvers. New Novelties. Bankrupt Stocks. Faleon & Co., Agents, N. Y.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address, STINSON & Co., Portland, Maine.

50 Elegant, All New, Chromo & Scroll Cards, no 2 alike, Name Nicely printed, 10c. Card Mills, Northford, Ct.

FOR SALE,

"INTERLAKEN,"

THE COUNTRY HOME OF THE LATE FRANK LESLIE, ESQ.,

Consisting of 62 acres, situated on LAKE SARATOGA, and extending back to Lake Lonely.

The house contains twelve rooms, gas and water.

The stable, finished in fine woods, has six box-stalls.

Finely appointed billiard-room, and three handsomely furnished sleeping-rooms over coach-house.

Gardener's cottage.

Conservatories profusely stocked with rare plants.

The furniture, steam-yacht, sail and row boats, French omnibus, etc., will be sold with the place.

Apply to

HOMER MORGAN, 2 Pine Street; or,
V. K. STEVENSON, 25 Pine St., and 661 Fifth Av.

Digitized by Google

HECKER'S PERFECT BAKING POWDER

PURITY AND STRENGTH GUARANTEED.

An experience of over thirty years in the manufacture of Self Rising Flour warrants us in offering this as a Perfect Baking Powder.

GEORGE V. HECKER & CO.,
CROTON FLOUR MILLS, 203 CHERRY ST., N. Y.,
and 209 & 211 STATE ST., BOSTON, MASS.

Columbia Bicycle

The Bicycle has proved itself to be a permanent, practical road vehicle, and the number in daily use is rapidly increasing. Professional and business men, seekers after health or pleasure, all join in bearing witness to its merits. Send 2ct. stamp for catalogue with price-list and full information

The Pope Mfg. Co.
59 SUMNER STREET
Boston, Mass.

ESTABLISHED 1817.

John H. Pray, Sons & Co.,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL

CARPETINGS.

558-560 Washington Street,

BOSTON.

KIDNEY-WORT

Cures LIVER COMPLAINTS, KIDNEY DISEASES, Constipation and Piles.
Because it acts on the Liver, the Bowels and the Kidneys at the same time.
Because it cleanses the whole system of the poisonous humors that otherwise develope in Biliousness, Jaundice, Constipation, Kidney and Urinary diseases, or Rheumatism, and which in women, disorder every function and bring on weakness and disease. If you want to be well use KIDNEY-WORT.

14 STOP ORGANS
SUB BASS & Oct. Coupler, 4 Set Reeds, $65
Pianos $125 and upwards, sent on trial. Catalogue free. Address, DANIEL F. BEATTY, Washington, N.J.

TRUSS EGGLESTON SENSIBLE TRUSS. Made on new principles. Send for Circulars. Eggleston Truss, Chicago, Ill.

FISK & HATCH,
BANKERS,

AND DEALERS IN Government Bonds and other Desirable Investment Securities.

No. 5 Nassau St., New York.

Buy and sell all issues of Government Bonds, in large or small amounts, at current market prices, and will be pleased to furnish information in reference to all matters connected with investments in Government Bonds.

We are prepared to give information in regard to first-class Railway Securities, and to execute orders for the same.

Buy and sell all marketable Stocks and Bonds on commission, at the Stock Exchange and in the open market.

Receive accounts of Banks, Bankers, Merchants and others, and allow interest on daily balances; and for those keeping accounts with us we collect United States coupons, and registered interest, and other coupons, dividends, etc., and credit without charge.

☞ We give special attention to orders from Banks, Bankers, Institutions and Investors out of the city, by Mail or Telegraph, to buy or sell Government Bonds, State and Railroad Bonds, Bank Stocks, Railroad Stocks, and other securities.

We have issued the Seventh Edition of "Memoranda Concerning Government Bonds," copies of which can be had on application.

FISK & HATCH.

FAIRCHILD'S
Gold Pens and, Pencil Cases.

NO. 1 JOHN STREET, N. Y.

A GREAT OFFER!! New ORGANS, $30, up; New PIANOS, $150, up, cash; WARRANTED 6 years. Second Hand Instruments at BARGAINS. Monthly Payments Received, and for Rent. HORACE WATERS & CO., 826 Broadway, New York.

$10 a day made by smart men and boys by selling above Medals. Silver and gold plated. 2 samples 25 cents. Price-list free. A. M. SMITH, 513 Chestnut St., Depot of Garfield and Hancock Medals, Philadelphia, Pa.

NICOLL THE TAILOR.

Fall and Winter Styles
NOW READY.

ELECTRIC LIGHTS used in BOTH STORES.

620 BROADWAY,
AND
139 to 151 Bowery, New York.

Samples and Rules for Self-Measurement
SENT BY MAIL.

A. T. Stewart & Co.

NOW OFFER A FULL AND COMPLETE ASSORTMENT OF

Dress Goods, Silks, Velvets, Shawls, Cloaks, Furs, Millinery, Hosiery, Underwear, etc.,

INCLUDING

SPECIAL NOVELTIES
For Early Fall Wear,

CAREFULLY SELECTED FROM THE LEADING MANUFACTURERS OF THE WORLD,

At Prices Below

ANYTHING HERETOFORE FOR GOODS OF EQUAL QUALITY AND RICHNESS.

Broadway, 4th Ave., 9th & 10th Sts.

FISHERMEN!
TWINES AND NETTING

MANUFACTURED BY

WM. E. HOOPER & SONS, Baltimore, Md.

☞ Send for Price-List, naming your County and State.

PATENT

ARMOR HEEL PLATES

For Ladies', Misses' and Children's Boots.

They project over the edge of the heel, leaving a smooth edge.

They will not tear the clothes as the common kind with sharp corners do.

They will not rattle or pull off.

They add greatly to the value of a boot in both wear and looks.

For sale by Shoe Dealers, etc.

ROYAL DRESSING

For Ladies', Misses' and Children's Boots.

Will not crack or injure the leather. Gives a beautiful black lustre.

Ladies who purchase this dressing once invariably decline to purchase any other. For sale by shoe Dealers, etc.

☞ Any one unable to purchase either of the above articles where such goods are usually sold, will confer a favor by reporting the fact to the undersigned, who will have forwarded immediately the address of some more enterprising dealer in the place.

EDWARD HENSHAW, Wholesale Agent,
48 HIGH STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

Do Your Own Printing $3 PRESS prints cards, labels, &c. (Self-inker $4.) Larger sizes for larger work. For old or young. Great money saver. A paying business anywhere for all or spare time. Send two stamps for a catalogue of all sizes Presses, Type, Cards, Paper, &c., to the Manufacturers KELSEY & Co., Meriden, Conn.

A KEY THAT WILL WIND ANY WATCH AND NOT WEAR OUT
SOLD by Watchmakers. By mail, 30 cents. Circulars free. J. Bacon & Co., 38 Dey St., N.Y.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT!

Keep the Blood cool and the Brain clear by the use of

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT

HERRING'S SAFES

"Tried and Proven Trustworthy."

Awarded Premium Medals at INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITIONS
1851, 1853, 1867, 1876, 1878 and 1880.

Seven Herring's Safes were subjected to the
MANHATTAN MARKET FIRE
and saved everything contained in them.

BANKERS' SAFES.

Our late improvements are important in constructing safes to protect against the ingenious and powerful tools now used by burglars. Send for circulars.

HERRING & CO.,
251 and 253 Broadway, New York.

WANTED!
Services of Business Men, Young Ladies and Others,

To prepare and send me by mail a full list of their neighbors and other acquaintances who will soon want to buy either a Piano or an Organ. In payment for this service I will send by best mail an order for a

NEW ROSEWOOD PIANO,

85 keys, and celebrated makers. This is paid for, except a moderate balance, which can wait till the instrument is wanted. If not needing a Piano, the same can be sold and turned into money. Correspondence will be confidential. Send list, plainly written, to

W. S. CURTIS, 127 West Thirty-fourth St., New York.

N.Y. Central & Hudson River R.R.
THE BEST ROUTE EAST OR WEST.

Through Cars between New York or Boston and Chicago or St. Louis.

See NIAGARA FALLS, SARATOGA and the HUDSON.

C. B. MEEKER, General Passenger Agent.

OPIUM Morphine Habit Cured in 10 to 20 days. No pay till Cured. DR. J. STEPHENS, Lebanon, Ohio

DELICIOUS. 1780 One Hundred Years Old. 1880 REFRESHING.

WALTER BAKER & CO.

DORCHESTER, MASS.

Chocolate and Cocoa

PREPARATIONS.

Their standard for excellence and purity has won for them a world-wide reputation, and these preparations have been awarded the highest premium, at the Paris, Vienna, and Philadelphia Expositions.

BAKER'S CHOCOLATE.
The very best preparation of plain Chocolate in the market, for home consumption or confectioners' use.

VANILLA CHOCOLATE.
Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe writes: "No one need to look abroad for an article of Chocolate in any of its forms superior to Baker's."

CRACKED COCOA.
It is the most economical drink. Dr. Lankaster says Cocoa contains as much flesh-forming matter as beef.

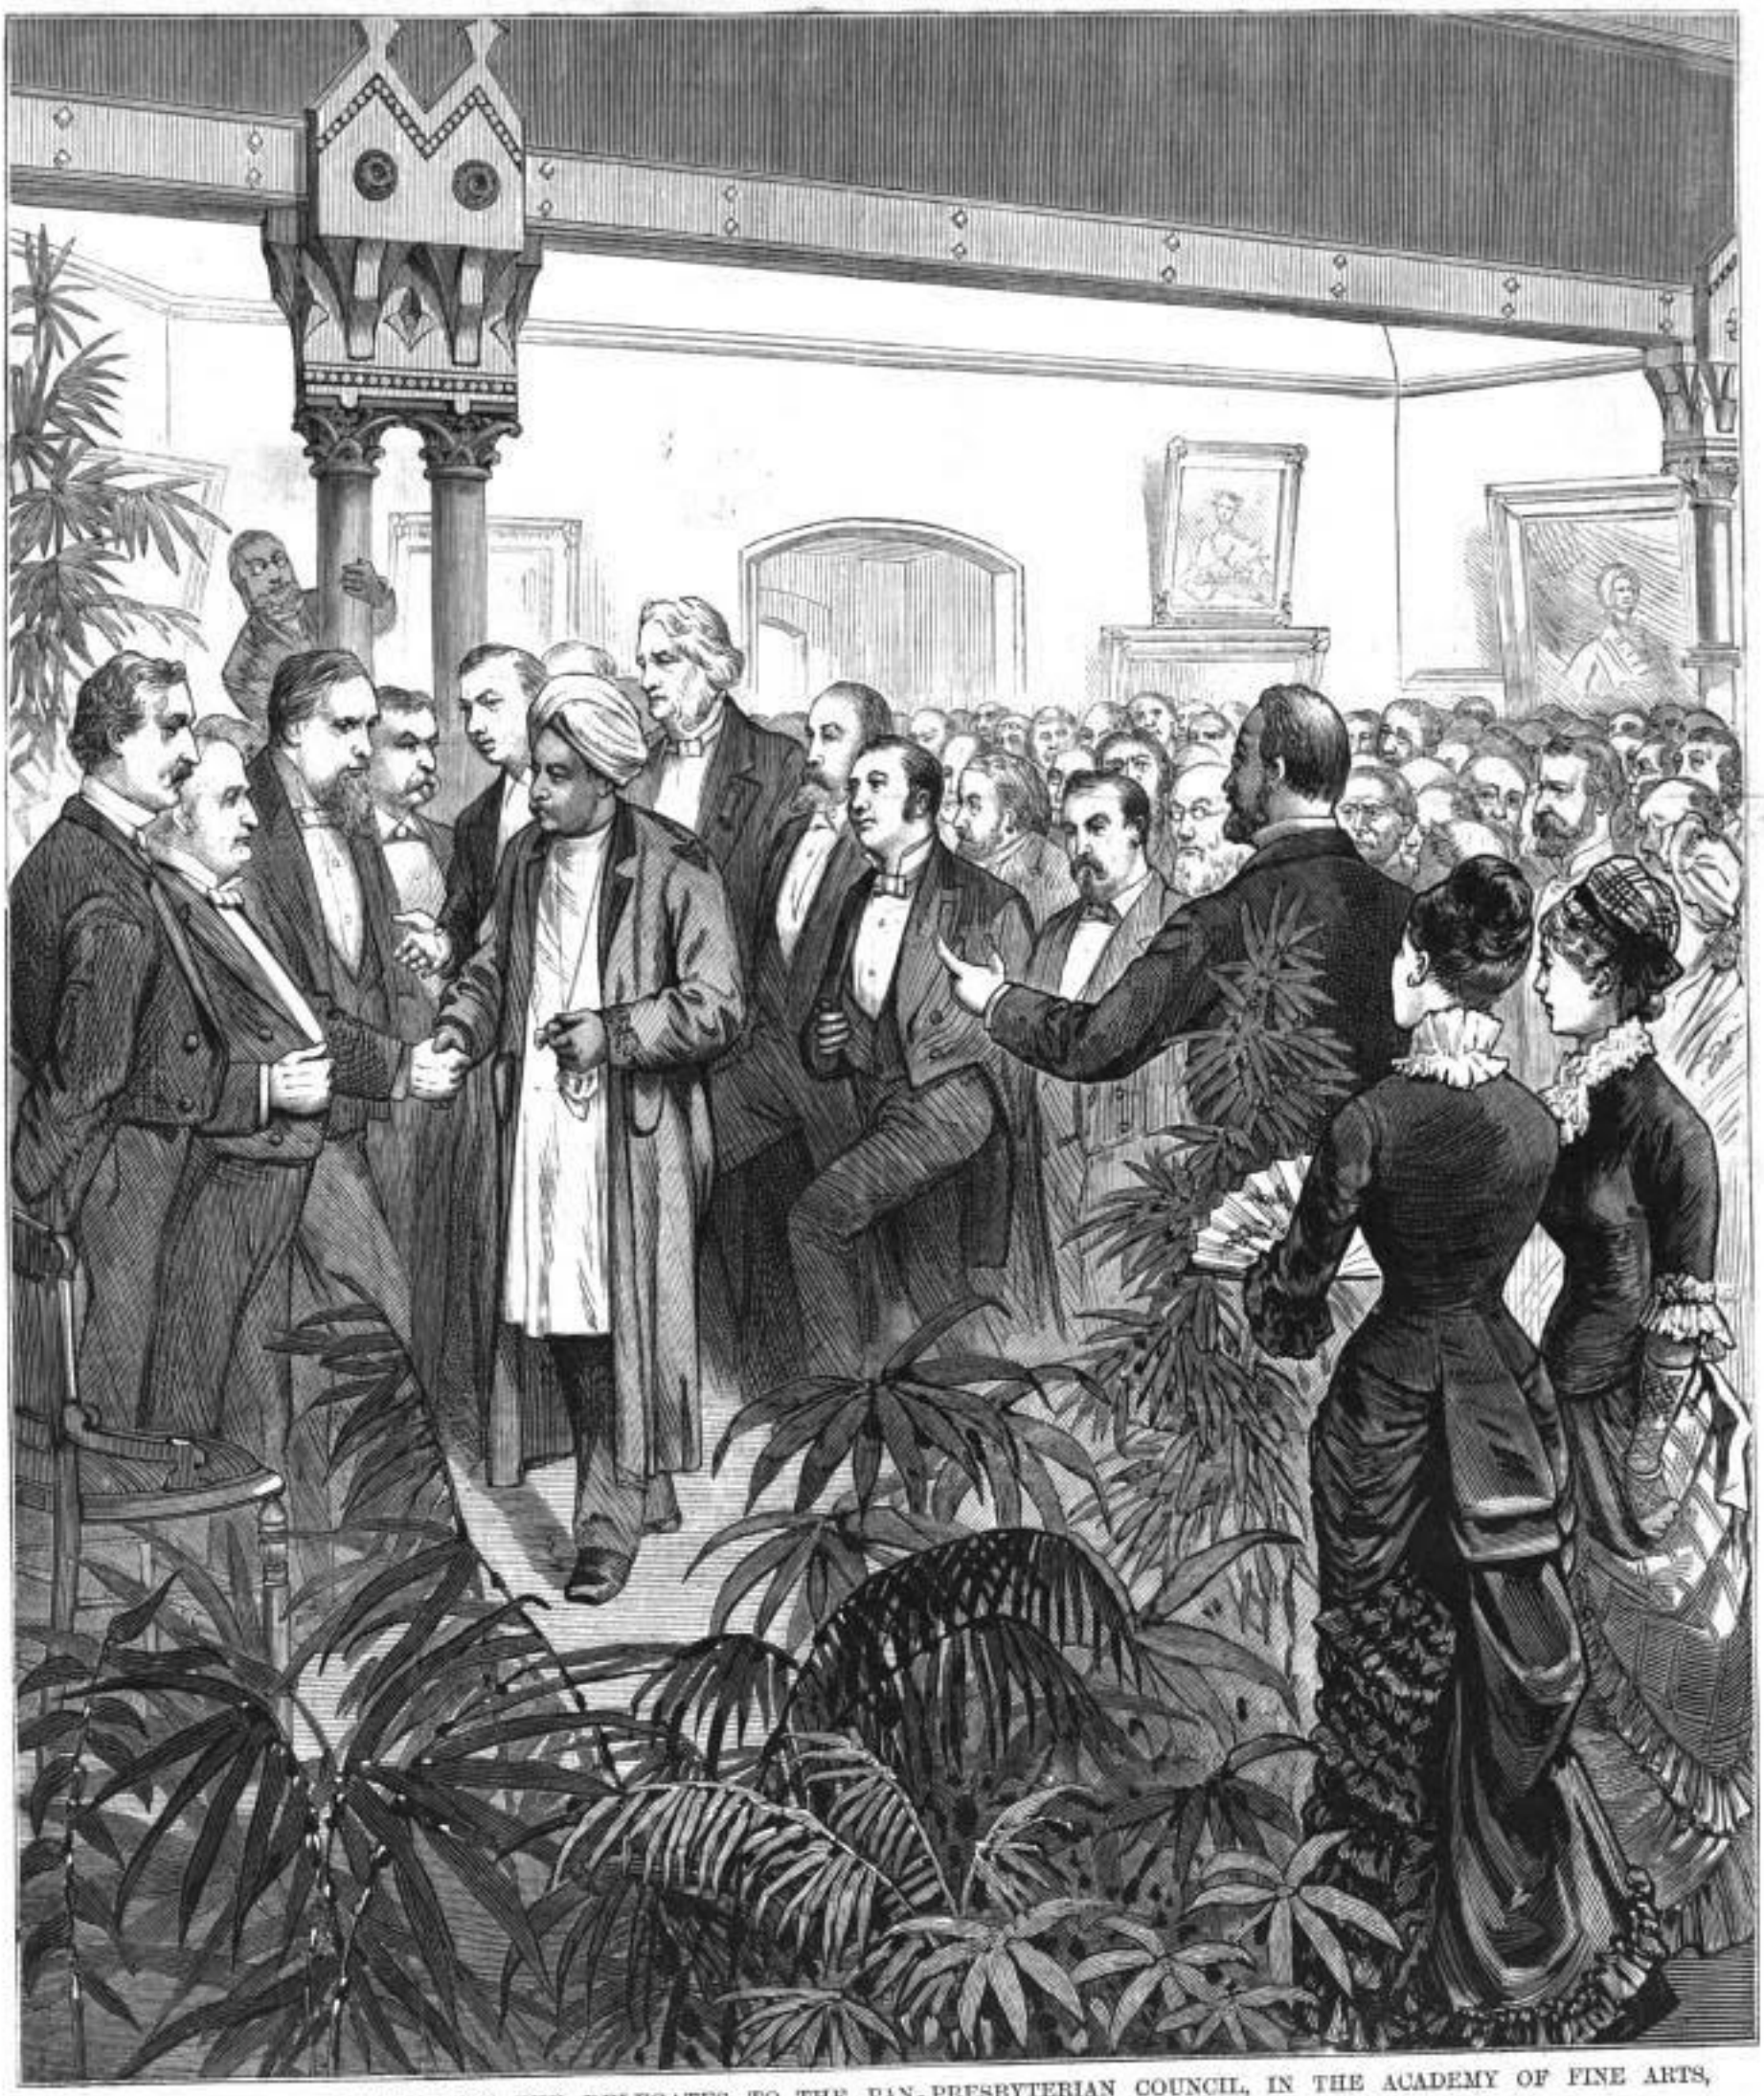
BROMA.
An admirable preparation, alike agreeable to the well or sick. Its delicacy of flavor and perfect solubility has made it a favorite drink among thousands.

GERMAN SWEET
CHOCOLATE.—A well-made cup of this Chocolate will be found not only palatable but nutritious and healthful.

BREAKFAST COCOA.
A general favorite. Medical men recommend it as preferable to tea or coffee for nervous or delicate constitutions.

NOURISHING.

Sold by Leading Grocers Everywhere.
Send for Descriptive Circular and Book of Choice Receipts.



STRENGTHENING.

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER

Entered according to act of Congress, in the year 1880, by F. W. Ehemann, Assignee, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.—Entered at the Post Office, New York, N.Y., as Second-class Matter.

No. 1,306.—Vol. LI. NEW YORK, OCTOBER 9, 1880. Price 10 Cents. $4.00 Yearly. 13 Weeks, $1.00

PENNSYLVANIA.—RECEPTION OF THE DELEGATES TO THE PAN-PRESBYTERIAN COUNCIL, IN THE ACADEMY OF FINE ARTS, PHILADELPHIA, SEPTEMBER 22D.—From a Sketch by H. A. Ogden.—See Page 86.

The next Number of FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER will contain the Opening Chapters of Wilkie Collins's New Story, "THE BLACK ROBE."

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,
53, 55 & 57 PARK PLACE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 9, 1880.

SECTIONAL COMPARISONS.

MR. SENATOR CONKLING, in his recent elaborate speech, delivered in this city on the 17th of September, summed up the "broad issue" of the pending Presidential election, as he conceived it, in the following terms:

"I affirm that the broad issue at this election is whether our colossal fabric of commercial, industrial and financial interests shall be under the management and protection of those who chiefly created and own it, or shall be handed over to the sway of those whose share in it is small, and whose experience, antecedents, theories and practices do not fit them or entitle them to assume its control."

Assuming that the Republican Party "represents the tax-paying portions of the country," he argued that it is the Republican Party which can best be trusted with the management of "tariffs, tax laws, finances, currency, banks, courts and appropriations," since these are the things on which the prosperity of the nation depends. Assuming, on the other hand, that the Democratic Party is controlled chiefly by "the South," and, therefore, represents "less than one-seventh of the people of the Union" and "not more than one-fourteenth of the producing, commercial, industrial, tax-paying and property interests of the country," he argued that to place the taxing power in the hands of those who do but little of the tax-paying, would be to make a situation "like that of the man who sat on a limb and sawed off the limb between himself and the tree."

We do not propose to analyze the "statistics" by which Mr. Conkling seeks to establish his comparative view of the Republican and Democratic parties, considered as the respective representatives of "the tax-paying portions of the country." Some of his data are too fallacious to deceive any reader, as, for instance, when he credits "the North" with all the custom duties collected at Northern ports (which duties amounted, in 1879, to $135,104,543), and credits "the South" with all the duties collected at Southern ports, amounting to only $2,145,605. Everybody sees that the great mass of the revenue from imports is collected at New York, and is collected there for the whole country—for the South and West and East, as well as the North.

Just as little do we purpose to remark on the inconsistency of an argument which contends that the government of the whole country should be given to the Republican Party because it represents "the tax-payers," and which at the same time contends that the government of "the South," wherever the negroes are in a majority, should be in the hands of the negroes, not because they are the tax-paying class, but because it would be in their hands if they had their rights under popular suffrage. At the South, it will be seen, the Senator contends for "manhood suffrage," without regard to capacity for tax-paying, but on the broader stage of the whole Union he thinks that the majority of tax-payers, or, rather, the payers of the major part of the taxes, are entitled to control the Government.

We are frank to say that we do not like such invidious comparisons as those to which the Senator invites us, at least when such comparisons are made a basis of political propagandism. But if such comparisons must be made, we insist that they should be made with candor and fairness, according to the facts as they are, and not according to the political bias which gives to facts a false significance by giving to them a false color and a false arrangement.

The Government of the United States is a Government of the people, not in mass, but of the people voting by a majority or plurality within certain definite territorial limits. Representatives in Congress are chosen by a majority vote within each Congressional District; Senators, by a majority of the votes of the Legislature in each State; and the President of the United States, by a majority of the electoral votes cast by all the States according to their numerical representation in both Houses of Congress. This principle of territorial circumscription, combined with popular suffrage, is the very basis of representative government. In no other way can one government be spread over the whole people, and yet be representative of the people in their local wishes and their reserved State rights.

And it is precisely because the people must vote by segments, by States and by sections, that the danger of "geographical parties" has always been a formidable one in the United States. Hence the warning of Washington in his Farewell Address to the people, and hence the evils which have come upon the land from an exaggerated sectionalism in politics, as seen in the late civil war, which was but the armed culmination of a long political and sectional conflict between "the North" and "the South" in the matter of slavery and its "rights" under the Constitution.

Deploring as we do the sectional aspects of the pending Presidential contest, we do not look with complacency on the attempts which are made to exacerbate the bitterness of the struggle by invocations drawn from the financial pride and material predominance of "the North" as compared with the poverty of "the South." This kind of argument is a two-edged sword, and might as well be wielded by the rich white man of the South against the political rights of the poor colored voter, as by the rich white man of the North against the political rights of the poorer Southern brother. Such an argument would be entirely valid if the right of suffrage were made universally dependent on a property qualification, but in the absence of such a qualification it is as baseless as it is invidious.

And even admitting the argument to be well taken, we have further to add that there is no ground on which Mr. Conkling can stand for the purpose of wielding it in the service of his own party as against the party of his opponents. We presume that he will admit—it would be idle to deny the fact—that the great tier of central and powerful States, extending from Connecticut in the East to Illinois in the West, and comprising the States of Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, is the most important "section" of the country. If regard be had to its population, its intelligence, its enterprise and its wealth. According to the last census these States contained a population of 19,418,000, nearly one-half the entire population of the country, while in point of tax-paying power it is safe to say that this population is superior in riches to the entire residue of the American people. For this reason, according to the logic of Mr. Conkling, they ought to have the most potential voice in deciding the destinies of the Republic at our Presidential elections; and yet at the last Presidential election the Democrats had in these great central States of the North a majority of nearly ten thousand on the popular vote, though the Republicans had a majority of seven in the Electoral Colleges. The popular vote stood 1,861,312 for the Democrats against 1,852,821 for the Republicans. In the combined electoral colleges of the same States the vote stood 72 for Hayes against 65 for Tilden.

It will thus be seen that, in a group of Northern States comprising nearly one-half of the American people, and representing more than one-half of the wealth of the United States, the division of parties at the last Presidential election was so evenly balanced as to lend no weight to the sectional comparisons instituted by Mr. Conkling. If any party is entitled to profit by such comparative views it is the Democrats, seeing as we do that in the most populous, the most productive and the most wealthy part of the Union they did not receive in the electoral colleges a vote proportionate to their numerical preponderance.

TWO AND A HALF CENTURIES.

WHEN Samuel Maverick, from his farm on Noodle's Island, hailed the arrival of Governor Winthrop and his band of emigrants at John Blackwell's home upon the opposite peninsula of Shawmut, he little dreamed of the great city which should one day occupy the place of both farm and homestead. As little did John Blackwell, selling, five years later, his "right and title to the peninsula of Shawmut" for thirty pounds, foresee the mighty commerce of which this was the first transaction. Nor did even Governor Winthrop, while founding the settlement of Tremont upon the three hillsides of the peninsula, at all realize whereunto his work should grow. It was no part of his plan to lay the corner-stone of an edifice through whose wide portals men should pass out into the boundless realms of free thought. If he, in his visions of the future, could have foreseen the celebration of Boston's quarter-millennium a fortnight ago, surprise at the outward transformation would have been the least of his emotions had it been possible for him to comprehend the moral and social changes which have come to city and nation in these two and a half centuries. Had it been possible, indeed!—for a child's vocabulary is as impotent to express the wrestlings of that strong soul with the problems which beset him in the founding of the infant State, as is even such a mind as his to appreciate the vast moral advancement of these two hundred and fifty years.

The settlements of Virginia and Delaware, of Maine and New Hampshire, separated from the infant town by a wilderness as limitless as eternity, now bridged by a lightning flash; mighty steamers thronging that ocean which then lay inexorable as death between the colonists and their former life—changes such as these a man like Winthrop might vaguely apprehend; but the electric light, which flooded the procession of work before last with an illumination as of eighty thousand candles, when contrasted with the flickering pine-knots of the Puritan emigrants' log hut, is but a dim emblem of the white light which has dawned upon the civil and social questions among which the greatest minds of that early era darkly groped their way.

It was not all bigotry which led to the banishment of the Baptists and the persecution of the Quakers. Such measures were a stern necessity in the minds of those who had braved death and desolation for the privilege of serving God after their own manner. A privilege so dearly bought was not to be hazarded by granting to another liberty to indulge in his own views of religious service; whoever would be with this people must be of them. And if religious freedom was no principle in the commonwealth, as little was civil liberty among its tenets. No Czar of all the Russias was more absolute than were the fathers of the young State, with their Blue Laws and their banishments, their persecutions and their pillories. Yet this arbitrary government was the root from which has grown the fairest flower of liberty which the world has ever seen—liberty of action as unrestrained as the desire of right-doing; liberty of thought as boundless as the range of intellectual power. The seed-leaves of that flower were put forth when the first public school was formed, only five years after the settlement of the town; and it made a rapid growth when within three more years the University of Harvard was founded in the neighboring village of Newtown, which then first took on its classic name. The ten students whose names stand enrolled upon the first page of the college records were a prophecy of the thousands of young men and women now in halls of learning all up and down the land, from Bowdoin to Michigan, and from Wellesley to Hampton.

Still it is not to education alone that we owe the advance of these two and a half centuries from narrowness to freedom. The founders of the commonwealth might be bigots, but they were holy men; they might be mistaken, but they were true. They persecuted witches and trafficked in slaves, but to-day the idiotic, the insane, the criminal are sought out and uplifted towards the light, and in the celebration the other day the flag which led the colored troops to the assault of Fort Wagner waved above the heads of men whose ancestors, perchance, bought and sold slaves in the market-place of Boston. Through the errors of those days the nation has been brought forward towards the right, not by virtue of the errors, but of the rigid integrity, the stern self abnegation, the sweetness of life of those heroes of whom, with all their errors, the world was not worthy. These asylums and reformatories, these slaves emancipated and criminals reclaimed, are the legitimate outgrowth of that order of things of which, in the dimness of the early dawn, they planted the seed. And so far as we find its fair growth stunted, whether by lax principle or bigotry, by oppression of the weak or corruption in the powerful, so far must we apply those remedies of truth and purity which have nourished its life, and caused it to grow upward towards the light of day.

IMPROVING THE CONDITION OF THE POOR.

HOW is it that this is a perennial question? How is it that every year as Winter approaches appeals are made for the relief of the poor, and that, in spite of enormous charities and the vastly increased productiveness of labor by the aid of inventions in these latter days, their condition remains from year to year always about the same? In the great cities of civilization thousands are always to be found on the verge of absolute destitution. Schemes without end have been devised to remedy the evil, but have invariably failed to accomplish more than its temporary alleviation. Public and private charities have been maintained at a vast expenditure of money and effort; recourse has been had to legislation, to charitable foundations, endowments, and all kinds of philanthropic effort; but poverty, degrading servitude, vice, disease and crime remain around us, among us and under us, and threaten at times to rise in agrarian and communistic floods and overwhelm society itself. The truth is, the application of the remedy rests mainly, if not wholly, with those to be benefited by it; but how can they be expected to know this when the world's teachers have scarcely learned it, and when philanthropists direct their efforts to removing not the cause but the effects of poverty.

The surroundings of the poor cannot be permanently improved till they themselves are in some degree raised morally and intellectually. If the man can be elevated so far that he can be led in some degree to live prudently and wisely, his circumstances will take care of themselves. Charities, so-called, may lessen the sufferings and supply the immediate necessities of the poor for a time, but the work has constantly to be done over again, with the certainty that its tendency has been to aggravate the evil it is intended to remedy.

The ever-recurring problem of what shall be done to extinguish extreme poverty has yet to be solved. It is certain that its solution has not been found in almsgiving, or in contriving perfect tenement-houses, or in sumptuary laws, or in good government, or in civil liberty, or in equality before the law, or in a thousand other good things and privileges secured to every man by advancing civilization and increased enlightenment. It is to little purpose that in this age the working man has within his reach luxuries and conveniences and means of culture and improvement unattainable to nobles and princes in centuries past, if he does not avail himself of them. The most abject poverty and destitution are just as possible now as at any time in the world's history, and are as certain to accompany or follow certain courses of life now as in the days before the railway and the telegraph. To him who will avail himself of the advantages of modern civilization and the vastly increased liberty of thought and action of the present age, the world is immeasurably better worth living in than in any preceding times. The true work of charity does not consist in supplying gratuitously the wants of the poor, but in teaching and training them to supply themselves.

The task, therefore, to which all efforts of philanthropists should be directed is the reformation, elevation and development of the individual—a hopeless task, it may be said, but certainly not so hopeless as the attempt to fill up a bottomless pit, which all efforts to supply the wants of the poor, even in part, have been found to be. Society can be regenerated by the regeneration of the individuals of which it is composed, and in no other way. Nor let it be doubted that the united efforts of the philanthropists could fail of accomplishing this task sooner or later. The hope of the extinction of poverty, or even its gradual reduction in a long term of years, should form a motive of action far stronger than the pleasure of temporarily relieving it, with the suspicion, if not the conviction, that well-intended efforts have resulted in the aggravation of the ills they were intended to alleviate. While every one must admire the liberality and perseverance of societies for improving the condition of the poor, it must be regretted that so much effort is not more wisely directed. If a part of their work consisted in systematic endeavors to disabuse the minds of their beneficiaries of the belief too prevalent among them that permanent relief can come from anything but self-help, a gradual improvement sooner or later could not fail to appear.

FOREIGN AND AMERICAN MANNERS.

CONSIDERABLE discussion has been caused recently by the publication of various articles, written from different points of view and dictated, no doubt, by a Chesterfieldian instinct of politeness, reflecting on American manners. We have already had occasion to mention Mr. Richard Grant White in this connection, and another gentleman, Mr. James Jackson Jarves, comes forward as the advocate of what may be termed, for purposes of classification, Civil Suavity Reform.

These two gentlemen differ widely, however, in their judgment on the causes of our social bonsquerie. The former seems to regard American rudeness as only educational, a result of too much indulgence in the extravagant luxury of grammar and high schools; while the latter believes it to be inherent in our people, a defect to be remedied only by constitutional amendment. In the view of Mr. White, we were once in the possession of tolerably good manners, which have been lost; but, in the judgment of Mr. Jarves, manners are something to which we never yet obtained any title, either through accumulation or inheritance. Now, which of the two gentlemen is right? That is a question to be answered only by a Chesterfield—by gentlemen who are themselves polished, courtly and aplomb on all the duties and obligations of courtesy.

But is it not possible that both these critics of American manners are wrong? There are a great many people in the United States—and the number, under the stimulus of foreign travel, is increasing from year to year—who have lost more of their comprehension of the American character and situation than the American people have lost in the practice of good manners. Some of our people go to Europe occasionally, and they see there a style of deportment never observed in this country; and, without looking very closely into cause and effect, they regard the European style as the standard from which all deviation is rudeness and barbarism. But the inspiration of European manners is rank. Save in France, where republicanism is an exotic of too recent growth to have reached a very high order of development, every man below the rank of Emperor confesses to a social superior; he confesses it, too, with more or less of servility in his deportment. The schools of manners abroad are in courts and camps. There men are taught to be respectful to superiors, to regard the rules of precedence, and to look upon themselves, in short, as subject and subaltern. Would those who censure American manners wish to establish similar schools in this country? We have scarcely enough material to form a nucleus. Nearly all those who have received a strict mannerly training, in accordance with European standards, in the United States, are needed on the frontier to teach deportment to the Indians. We cannot use our soldiers for tutors of politeness in our drawing-rooms; and if they could be spared for that service, we might not care to employ them, since we have never learned to see anything very admirable in the style of manners that they represent.

Digitized by Google

But let those who deplore the want of politeness in America take comfort in one fact. We practice better republican manners here than they understand abroad. We know better than Europeans how to be considerate to inferiors and respectful to women. Our manners are controlled by principle. The deportment of mankind everywhere, indeed, has its fundamental source of inspiration in political institutions, and the community that exemplifies the best form of government can be relied upon to display the best type of breeding. Manners inspired by monarchical institutions are very formal, very respectful, very servile, even, to superiors in rank, but in the treatment of inferiors they sanction and encourage insolence. Republican manners, on the contrary, hold men only to the respect due among equals; and, if less formal, they are more dignified and manly than the so-called proprieties inspired by social inferiority. For this advantage we can be excused for the indulgence of a little of the spirit of self-approbation.

But there is no just cause for complaint that American manners are not respectful. None but those destroyed by egotism and vanity will assert that they do not receive here all the consideration to which they are entitled. Recognized talent, when free from affectation, is treated by all classes of our citizens, born and bred in the country, with almost excessive regard; and if we have a weakness, it grows from a disposition to overrate slight accomplishments. Doubtless there are many among us who lay claim to larger possessions in the domain of intellectual attainment than the public is willing to concede; but we cannot help these slight differences of opinion. We mean always to be deferential to character, to refinement, to delicacy, to mental accomplishments, and to every virtue that can be admitted as a republican title to respect. If we sometimes fail of discriminating justly, the fault—for which we beg pardon—lies in the imperfection of the human judgment.

On the whole, it may be claimed that we are quite a mannerly people in our way, and that our way is better than the foreign way. Doubtless there are still left a few individuals in the rural districts who are so imperfectly ballasted that they will continue to sit with their feet on the mantelpiece. "Out of respect for the ladies, gentlemen will please not to spit on the floor," is an inscription to be found also on some of the Jersey City ferry-boats. But we are improving. We are not learning to conform any more closely to European models; but we are becoming better educated, and, our critics to the contrary notwithstanding, education brings refinement, and refinement always results in improved breeding.

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

THE change in the French Ministry, which has been threatened since M. de Freycinet made his conciliatory speech at Montauban, has taken place. When Gambetta made his inflammatory address at Cherbourg during the naval festivities, it was obvious that the Government had to take some notice of his attack upon Germany, if they wished to preserve amicable relations between the two countries. Accordingly, M. de Freycinet hastened to make a most temperate and far-sighted speech at Montauban, in which, among other things, he spoke of the decrees against the religious bodies, and seemed unwilling to press them very severely. The more radical members of the Government, backed up, no doubt, by M. Gambetta, found fault with this hesitating policy, and insisted upon the immediate execution of the decrees that had not as yet been carried out. This split in the Cabinet induced M. de Freycinet to resign, and M. Jules Ferry, the introducer of the anti-religious decrees and the most active partisan of the anti-Jesuit party, has succeeded in forming a Ministry which has several strong elements of vitality in it. But Gambetta, the arch-conspirator, who really brought about the late crisis, still holds back and refuses to accept the Premiership, greatly to the annoyance of his friends. It is, of course, a deplorable state of affairs that the policy of the Government should be directed by an irresponsible person like Gambetta, who controls the Cabinet, and yet is not answerable for its mistakes or shortcomings. Jules Ferry, the new Premier, has had more experience in public affairs than either of his immediate predecessors. Last year he entered Waddington's Cabinet as Minister of Public Instruction, and initiated a sweeping educational reform which culminated in the famous "Article 7," driving the Jesuits out of France and attacking all the other religious educational bodies. He has now to carry out the policy which he began, and he probably will do so without flinching.

Since the prorogation of Parliament there has been little of interest in England. Everyone is in the country shooting, or at the various watering-places. The grouse and partridge season is said to be very good, and the legislators, who were detained in London until a very late date, are now enjoying the delights of the moors or stubbles. There is a rather serious strike among the weavers, who complain that the masters had promised to increase their wages as soon as the state of trade would permit it, and that the great improvement in business of late warrants such an increase. This the masters deny, and appeal from the paid emissaries of the Trades Unions to the good sense of the weavers.

A good deal of excitement has been caused in London by the activity of the Nihilists, who are congregating in large numbers in a suburb of the metropolis known as Kentish Town. The cause of the excitement was the discovery of a package containing four pounds of dynamite which was laid under a rail on the London and Northwestern Railroad. It appears that the Czarowitz, who was on a visit to England, was going to Scotland to inspect the yacht Livadia, which is building for the Czar. Fortunately he went by another railroad, the Great Northern, and the authors of the plot were thus foiled in their nefarious attempt.

The situation at Dulcigno is unchanged since the delivery of the ultimatum by Admiral Seymour. The Moslem population refuse to be transferred to Montenegro. They affirm that they will fight for their rights, and that they will be assisted by the other Albanian tribes. They also pretend that Riza Pasha, the Turkish commander, is in full accord with them. The Montenegrins, on the other hand, do not seem to have much energy. Thirty-five of the leading citizens of Dulcigno have presented a letter to the consuls, declaring that they will never consent to be detached from Turkey and annexed to Montenegro, and that they will oppose any Montenegrin attack by force. The situation is very grave, and may lead at any moment to a declaration of war between Turkey and Russia. It is rumored, and generally believed, that six of the best vessels belonging to the Russian squadron in the Pacific have been ordered by telegraph to be in readiness to return to the Mediterranean at a moment's notice. Admiral Seymour has visited Cettinje to inquire into the exact position of affairs. The Porte has issued another note protesting against any armed pressure, which would be an infringement upon the rights of the Sultan. Meanwhile, the weather is very unhealthy; a fierce sirocco has been blowing, and the Turkish soldiers are dying at the rate of some two hundred a day. The naval demonstration was set down for Monday last.

The intrigues at the Court of Madrid since the birth of the Infanta are becoming serious. The King's mother, the ex-Queen Isabella, is there, as well as the Austrian Archduchess, mother of the young Queen. Ex-Queen Isabella pays great attention to the Marshals Campos and Concha, and the other chiefs of the dynastic Liberal Party, whose wives throng her salon. Besides this, all the members of the old aristocracy flock around her in greater numbers than they have ever done since the restoration of King Alfonso. When she drives on Sundays with the King to the bull-fights she is greeted with hearty cheers from everyone, particularly the lower classes. As she has large claims against the treasury, she is pressing them, not, however, too strongly, for the Spaniards are very short of ready cash. So far, the Austrian party have gained the day, and the infant is being treated in the Anglo-Saxon system—that is, the limbs are not swathed so tightly that the royal child cannot stir, which is the pure Castilian method. The Spanish pride has been horribly shocked by the English nurse who, in spite of all objections, has charge of the little princess. The nominal chief of the baby's household is the Duchess Medina de las Torres, but the second governess, Señora de Tacon, is the real ruler. Señora de Tacon was the governess of the present King twenty-three years ago, and under her is the English nurse, who has been in the family of the Duke of Fernan-Nunez for several years. These apparently trifling matters are all subjects of intrigue, and may at any time lead to grave difficulties and even to a change of ministry.

A BRISK emigration of British agriculturists in the direction of Texas has lately set in, 150 having sailed from Liverpool last week for that State. Texas has ample room for the entire agricultural population of Great Britain, and with the advantages she offers it can scarcely be doubted that the tide of emigration will continue to swell in volume from year to year. No State in the Union can, if it chooses, become more truly imperial in wealth and influence than that to which the British farmers are now looking for homes and prosperity.

LAST week was observed by the people of Memphis, Tennessee, as "a week of jubilee, of thanksgiving and gratitude for safe deliverance from epidemic disease and for the unusual prosperity that," according to the Appeal, "has flooded every house during the year." The churches of all denominations were open on the first day for religious services, and a grand procession, a pageant of trade, of commerce and manufactures, supported by the military and police and fire departments and civic societies, was a principal feature of the week's rejoicings. There was also a fine pyrotechnic display and a grand masked ball. Memphis has suffered from pestilence and death as few cities have ever done, and her people have done well to recognize, with festivities at once sober and grateful, the kindly Providence which has permitted sunshine only to fall across their thresholds in the Summer now over and gone.

THE National Liberal League, founded on a denial of everything sacred and divine, has divided on the question of taking political action. Colonel "Bob" Ingersoll and others have refused to serve the League officially, and persons without prominence are now advanced to the front. This whole "Liberal" movement is a flagrant and impious immorality which can only prosper at the expense of the most precious interests of mankind, and any indication of its disintegration and decay must afford real satisfaction to all right-minded people.

THE next term of the United States Supreme Court, which will be opened on the 11th of October, will be a very busy and important one. Among the cases to be argued is that of Miles vs. the United States, which involves the constitutionality of the law of Congress enacted against polygamy in Utah. Miles, it will be remembered, was convicted and sentenced to imprisonment and to pay a fine of $100 for bigamy, and thereupon appealed to the Court of last resort. It is not at all probable that the laws of which he and his Mormon associates complain will be set aside. The Louisiana and Kentucky Lottery cases and the Florida Railroad cases will also be argued at the approaching term.

THE Fall trade of the metropolis has attained a volume greatly exceeding the expectations of business men. The drygoods district especially abounds in scenes of almost unprecedented activity. In many of the large wholesale houses the work of filling orders is carried far into the night goods being packed and shipped in the glare of electric lamps. A special feature of the Autumn trade is that Southern merchants are buying more largely here than for many years. Many Western men who have not been seen in this market for six years have been brought back by the successful crops, and buyers generally are bringing more money to pay on purchases than for three or five years previous.

WE certainly have a "vigorous" and unique foreign policy. It is so vigorous that it seems able to run itself. Here is our Minister to Austria, Hon. John M. Kasson, looking after a nomination to Congress out in Iowa instead of loitering about the court at Vienna; then Hon. J. M. Langston, our Minister to Hayti, is making stump speeches in Indiana, and a score or more of consuls and other officials, who are supposed to be under pay as representatives of the country abroad, are scattered about the country, doing dirty work for campaign committees. Of course Secretary Evarts must be ignorant of all this; or are we to suppose that he regards the diplomatic service as a mere partisan machine to be used for party ends in the face of all the rules of "civil service reform?"

THE present year has been a notable one in the sporting world. This is especially true in the illustrations afforded of the improvement of American horses by the judicious processes of breeding and selection. At the opening of the year the record of St. Julien, 2.12¾, stood unchallenged. Since that time he has himself made 2.11¼, and now Maud S. has trotted a mile in 2.10¾, a performance which eclipses all previous achievements. The best running time on record, up to September 18th, was that of Lexington's four miles at New Orleans, in 1855, in 7.23¾, but on the Coney Island course, on the date named, this was reduced by Ferida to 7.23½. These performances justify the claim that the American trotter is the fleet animal of his type in the world. In pedestrianism, the year has been equally wonderful for beating past records. The Boston colored man, Frank Hart, has eclipsed the best record hitherto with 565 miles scored in a six-days' go-as-you-please match; Morrill, of the Boston Athletic Club, has beaten the best American record for a mile walk in 6.33½, and Hughes and Albert come to the front in a 72-hours' go-as-you-please race with 418¾ and 412 miles respectively.

THE attempt to consolidate the Democratic and Greenback forces in Maine upon a single electoral ticket is encountering pronounced opposition from some of the more radical of the Greenback leaders. At the Greenback State Convention last week it was decided to ratify the joint ticket of four Greenbackers and three Democrats, agreed upon by the State committees some time since; but this action was stubbornly opposed by a resolute minority, who at once withdrew and nominated a straight anti-Fusion ticket, which, it is understood, will be kept in the field to the end of the fight. If this purpose should be adhered to the Fusion campaign will be seriously embarrassed, since the withdrawal of even a few hundred votes from the combination ticket would endanger the success, at least, of the three Democrats whose names appear upon it. As the case stands, it is plain that Maine cannot be claimed with confidence by either party, and the struggle in November can scarcely be less desperate than it was in September. Following is the pronunciamiento adopted by the bolting Greenbackers:

"For the enlightenment and encouragement of our Greenback brethren in other States, we, the straight Greenbackers of Maine, in convention assembled, declare that there is a Greenback Party in Maine, pledged to the interests of the whole people; that the late fusion and confusion in this State was due wholly to the exigencies of State issues, and that in national matters we vote with our brethren elsewhere in the Union for Weaver and Chambers.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.

DURING August 50,508 immigrants arrived in the United States.

GOVERNOR CORNELL was seriously ill last week from an attack of malarial fever.

THE town of Bristol, R. I., celebrated its 200th anniversary on September 24th.

A FIRE in Green Bay, Mich., last week, destroyed sixty dwellings, many barns and a church.

SUPERVISORS of Election are to be appointed in Indiana to prevent frauds in the coming contest.

THE Cheyenne Indians, in the Indian Territory, are manifesting great discontent and becoming disorderly.

HON. C. P. THOMPSON has formally accepted the Democratic nomination for Governor of Massachusetts.

GENERAL GRANT has informed the Republican National Committee that he cannot preside at any political meetings.

ONE hundred and forty-seven women voted at a School Commissioner election in Binghamton, N. Y., September 21st.

THE citizens of Mobile, Ala., have resolved to levy a tax of one per cent. on the value of property in that city, to help pay its debts.

THE Franklin exploring party which sailed for the Arctic seas in the schooner Kelkes in June, 1878, has reached New Bedford, Mass.

PRESIDENT HAYES visited Sacramento and other towns in California last week. At the State capital he had a formal and enthusiastic reception.

THE Tammany and Irving Hall conference committees are still negotiating with a view to a cordial union of the Democratic forces in this city.

AN international cricket match will be played at Philadelphia, October 6th and 7th, between English and Americans, whether amateurs or professionals.

THE Indiana Supreme Court has refused to reconsider its decision regarding the constitutional amendments, and an October election must, therefore, be held.

AS NEAR as can be estimated the number of lives lost during the fiscal year of 1880 from the different classes of accidents to which steamboats are subjected amounted to 185.

THE semi-millennial of John Wycliffe's translation of the Bible was celebrated at Trenton, N. J., last week by a meeting of delegates from all the Bible societies of the State.

THERE is severe distress in some counties of Kansas, growing out of the failure of the wheat and corn crops. In Norton County there are said to be 1,500 people in absolute want of food.

AN international convention to promote the sheep and wool industry was held in Philadelphia last week, in connection with the sheep show at the Permanent Exhibition buildings.

THE twelfth annual session of the Irish Catholic Benevolent Union of the United States was held in Washington last week, 100 delegates from various parts of the country being present.

THE Massachusetts Greenback Convention last week nominated General B. Money Sargent for Governor, with a full State ticket. A resolution denunciatory of General Butler was voted down.

SILAS M. WHITE, the defaulting President of the First National Bank of Brattleboro, Vt., was arrested at Omaha last week. Last June it was discovered that he had committed forgeries to the extent of $250,000.

THE Ute Commission have secured to the instrument of ratification the signatures of 582 adult males of the confederated bands of Ute Indians in Colorado. This number is more than three-fourths of the male adults of the Ute bands.

DRAFTS of a Bill intended to be introduced at the next session of Congress have been forwarded to army officers at Washington for inspection. It provides for a national militia system imposing compulsory service upon every citizen between the ages of eighteen and forty-five.

GENERAL HANCOCK has written a letter on the question of rebel war claims, in which he says: "If I were President I would veto all legislation which might be before me providing for the consideration or payment of claims of any kind for losses or damages by persons who were in rebellion, whether pardoned or not."

THE National Conference of Unitarian and other liberal Christian churches held its biennial session at Saratoga last week. A number of questions of Church polity were discussed, and reports were submitted showing the progress of the denominational work. Governor John D. Long, of Massachusetts, was elected President of the association.

ALL the returns of the Maine election are now in, and they show a plurality of 62 for Plaisted, including more than 1,400 votes of various kinds for Plaisted. Making allowances for 25 votes which were not contained in a local return, but which were discovered on recount, General Plaisted's apparent plurality by the clerk's returns is 37.

Foreign.

SPAIN is expected to withdraw, shortly, 15,000 troops from Cuba.

THE religious decrees are to be vigorously enforced by the new French Cabinet.

MR. ARCHIBALD FORBES, the celebrated war correspondent of the London Daily News, sailed for New York last week.

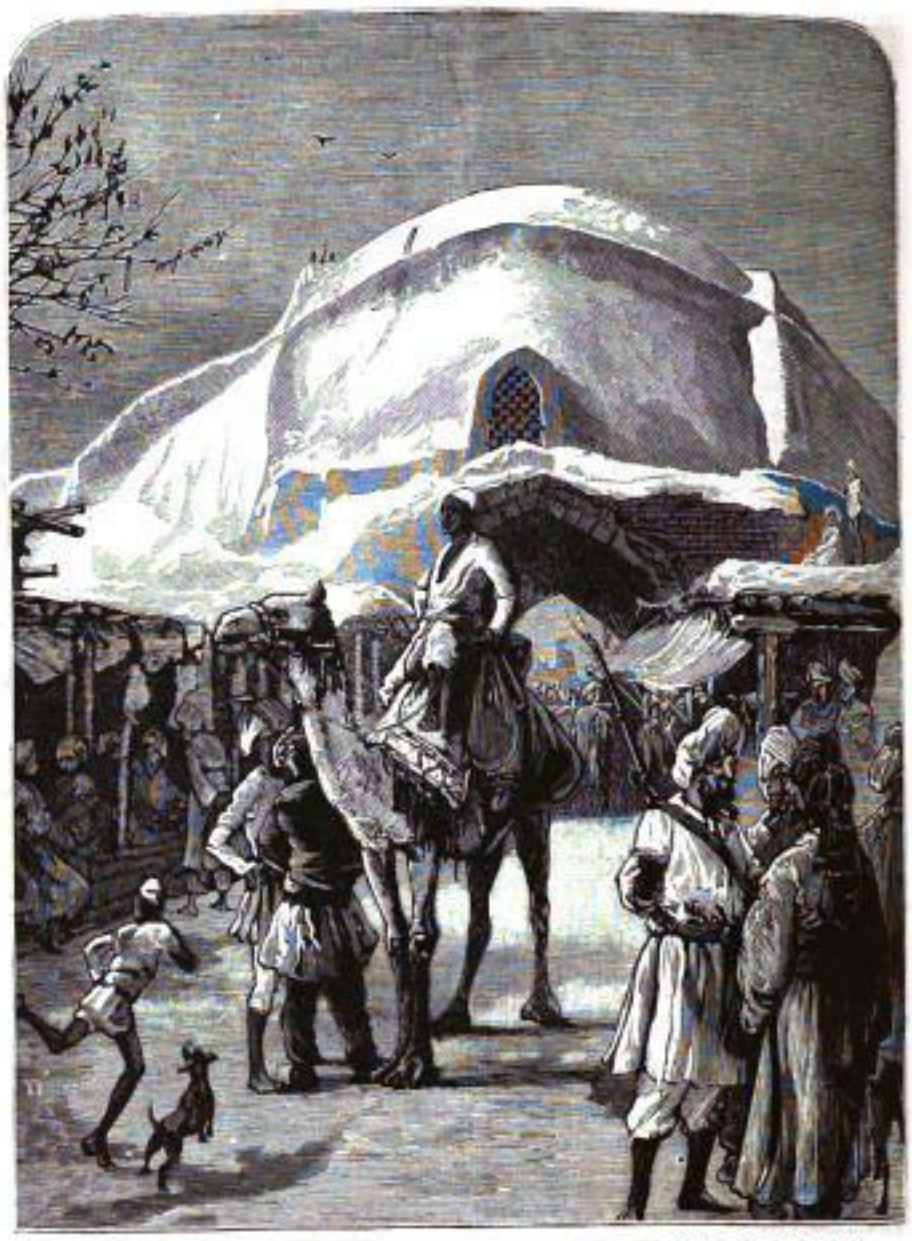
THE Chilian Minister has received intelligence that 2,500 Chilians will shortly advance on Lima in conjunction with other forces.

A DESPATCH from Havana announces the capture of the last remaining insurgent in Cuba, leaving the island now altogether peaceful.

MR. PARNELL has been in England consulting eminent lawyers on the subject of the rumored Government prosecution of members of the Land League.

CANADIAN capitalists are about to establish a bi-monthly line of steamers to ply between Canada and Brazil, touching at one or more of the West India ports.

THERE has been a revolt of the natives against the French in the island of Dominica, one of the Marquesas group in the Pacific Ocean. Several whites and natives were killed. The whites fortified themselves as well as possible, but were on the point of surrender when relieved by a French gunboat from Nukahiva.



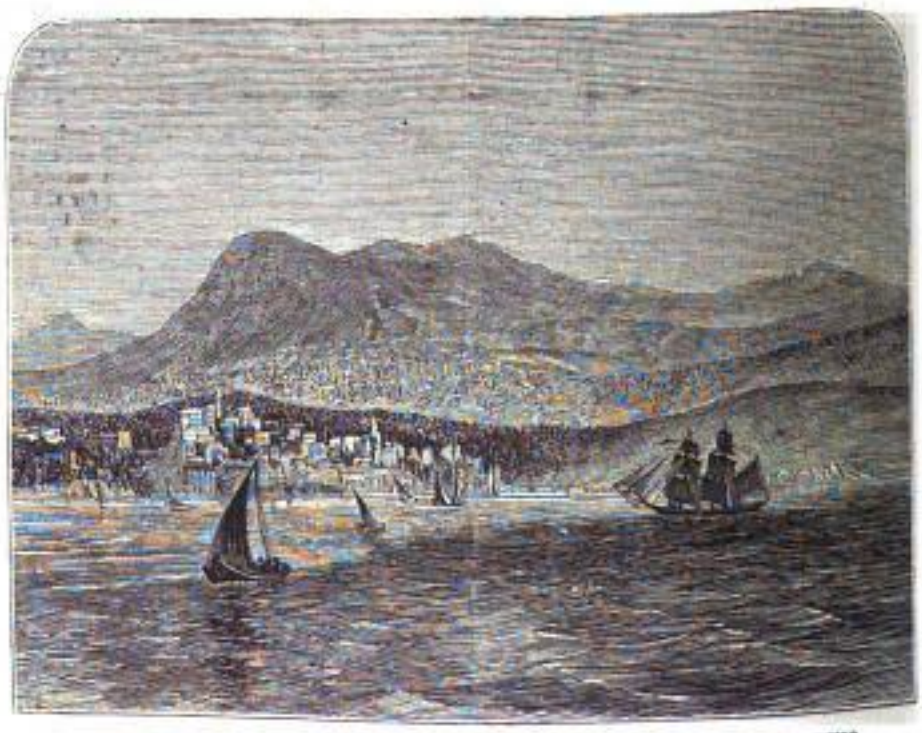
THREE of Her British Majesty's ships have been ordered to the Newfoundland fishing grounds to investigate the recent difference between an American vessel and the natives. An American vessel on a recent trip was twice boarded by hostile parties of Newfoundlanders while the crew were engaged in rigging for squid, and fishing operations were forbidden.

Digitized by Google

The Pictorial Spirit of the Illustrated Foreign Press.—SEE PAGE 87.

AUSTRIA.—THE "GROSSE RING" AT PRAGUE, BOHEMIA.

AFGHANISTAN.—DOME WHERE FOUR PRINCIPAL STREETS MEET IN CANDAHAR.



THE EASTERN QUESTION.—MONTENEGRINS LISTENING TO SONGS OF WAR.

THE EASTERN QUESTION.—A GROUP OF MIRIDITE CHIEFS, MONTENEGRIN FRONTIER.

SPAIN.—PILGRIMS ENTERING THE CATHEDRAL OF SANTIAGO DE COMPOSTELLA.

TURKEY.—THE EASTERN QUESTION—THE CITY AND SUBURBS OF DULCIGNO.

Digitized by Google

NEW YORK CITY.—THE SEMI-CENTENNIAL OF BELGIUM'S INDEPENDENCE—FESTIVAL OF BELGIAN RESIDENTS AT JONES'S WOOD.—SEE PAGE 86.

KANSAS.—THE RILEY COUNTY PRIZE EXHIBIT AT THE WESTERN NATIONAL FAIR, BISMARCK GROVE, LAWRENCE.—FROM A SKETCH BY H. WORRALL.—SEE PAGE 85.

Digitized by Google

HOW FRAGILE IS LOVE.

A ROSE, as fair as ever saw the North,
Grew in a little garden all alone;
A sweeter flower did Nature ne'er put forth
Nor fairer garden yet was never known.
The maidens danced about it morn and noon,
And learned lands of it their ditties made;
The nimble fairies, by the pale-faced moon,
Watered the root, and kissed her pretty shade.
But, well a day! the gardener careless grew,
The maids and fairies both were kept away,
And in a drought the caterpillars threw
Themselves upon the bud and every spray.
God shield the stock! If heaven send no supplies,
The fairest blossom of the garden dies.

MY COUSIN ERENE

WE both sat eating bon-bons and waiting for dinner—my little French cousin, Mademoiselle Erène, whom I was visiting, and I. She sat in a tumbled little heap in one corner of her cushioned sofa, her brilliant black eyes gleaming with excitement under her dark eyebrows as she talked. She had light, crisp, airy blonde hair surrounding a very fair, colorless face, and her dark eyes made her appear singularly beautiful. I was a modest little American, with beauty (if any) of a quiet order; hair and eyes brown, and my figure slim and petite. Erène was a Parisian born, with all their tastes and ways. She was sputtering forth impulsively now about a friend of her father's, an Englishman of high birth, whom we expected to dine with us that day. They had met him on the continent, and although Erène said a great deal against him, I knew her so well that in my heart I somehow felt she liked him. She never made so much ado about any one or "Mon Dieu-ed" so often when she did not.

"Oh, but that was the great nuisance—that piece of high dignity, Lord Stolholm! Mon Dieu! what a name was that! His father must have been a Swede! His lordship, then, was to dine with us on this particular day, when we were going to the Santé's grand ball at night, and needed the day to rest! Ah, those English!—they were made of stone! How they walk! Ma foi! three miles or four a day—she had seen them! And how he would carry his nose in the air!—they all did—and sit stiff as a post when every one else talked like live people and enjoyed themselves! Mon Dieu! but it was a trial. And how gay would she be when the wine came to leave his lordship and go back to her good novel, 'Virginie.' Ah, but she was getting horribly ennuyed, and would sleep soon, she was sure!" and she indulged in a big yawn and held two tiny hands over her mouth.

Here we were summoned to dinner. I could see nothing disagreeable about Lord Stolholm. He appeared a sensible, pleasant gentleman, of about thirty-five. He treated Erène and myself with gallantry, and I thought Erène honored him with quite as much courteous notice as he did her. He told me that he had once known my mother, and had esteemed her highly. He further remarked that I greatly resembled her. He spoke very kindly, and I was pleased that he had known mamma, for she was dead, and papa I had left with my only brother in Germany.

At the Santé Hotel that night we again met Lord Stolholm. He danced several times with me, and I—well, I was only seventeen, the scene was gay and fresh to me, and Lord Stolholm was very handsome that night. But I could not but feel sore at heart when Erène was so disagreeable after the ball and the next day. Surely I had not tried to draw Lord Stolholm's attention from her! This manner increased as he continued to show me his regard, and I grew homesick and wrote to papa that he must send fraulein to bring me to Germany. I left suddenly without seeing Lord Stolholm, and I thought, "Erène may now know I don't wish to interfere with her preferences." But, alas! I was sad, and knew before long that I had grown to think much more of this kind friend than I was aware of. Weeks passed and I heard nothing from him. To be sure, he did not know where I was, unless Erène had chosen to tell him.

Erène wrote very pleasantly now, and frequently mentioned Lord Stolholm. Presently I began to look ill. Fraulein fretted and said I must travel again. So my father went down to Italy; but I continued pale and sad. At last one day I received the following letter, written with the impulsiveness of Erène's nature in its happiest mood:

"MA CHÈRE, PETITE COUSINE—I write now while I can scarcely use my pen, I am so wild with pleasure. What will you think when I tell you?—Lord Staunton Stolholm loves me! This I knew last night for the first time. Is he not a fine match? The world talks of him everywhere; but, then, he has not much money. It is his title that makes every one now wild about him. Papa will, of course, consent, even though he has no wealth, for I shall have so much. Mon Dieu! I am so happy, for every body wants him, he is so handsome! Write me your congratulations, chère cousine, for in a few months I shall be Lady Stolholm; and no more—though yours still in affection— ERÈNE L'ARTÉE."

The letter came to me in the soft Southern twilight as I sat alone under the clear stars of the Italian sky. It pierced my tired little heart like the unexpected stroke of a stiletto, and, like it, brought the silence of death—death to a feeble, fading hope. I did not moan or cry out, but despair numbed all my senses, and mechanically, almost unknowingly, I wandered off to a secluded spot amid the lime-trees and threw myself upon the warm, soft turf. There I lay, grasping in my hand still the letter with its hidden sting, turning my little, wan face up to the waving boughs above me, through which came the glint of the lights of heaven, as if they would fain comfort me.

"No, no, naught could comfort me!" I moaned within myself; and like the echo of my heart, sounded the distant vesper-bell—clear, but faint and wailing—borne on the evening air.

"Ach, mein Gott! what is this?" It was the rugged voice of fraulein that startled me, and I realized that the long twilight was spent and the night was far on. She roused me and took me up in her strong arms and carried me home. A long insensibility followed. A month passed under the power of the fever that seized me. Upon my recovery we again traveled for six months. With my brother, who was in the University in Germany, came two students. We all journeyed together. One was a Bavarian—handsome, intellectual and fiercely impulsive; the other a Hollander, whom I thought intolerably stupid, for he smoked all the time, and nothing more. Both of these men made overtures to my father for my hand in marriage, and, though my father urged the suit of the Bavarian, I declined, not caring for either of them. And upon the Hollander essaying one day to make love to me, I said, very decidedly:

"I can never marry you, so pray do not harbor such an idea."

On the evening of the same day a ball was held at one of the palatial residences in Vienna, for it was in that courtly city that we were now sojourning. Although I was no more in love with the Bavarian than with the Hollander, he was more agreeable company, and he paid me much court this night. My glass told me before I left my dressing-room that my toilet was most becoming. Its pale-green sheen contrasted with my brown hair and eyes, and lent an ethereal aspect to my pale, small-featured face. It was when the evening was far advanced, and I was dancing with the Bavarian, that suddenly a familiar voice struck upon my ear. I looked up and saw—Lord Stolholm. He stood near me, in company with some eminent gentlemen. He saw me, bowed quietly, and after the dance came and spoke with me. He was changed and looked pale and worn. His manner was kind but constrained. I felt the barrier that existed between Erène's lover and myself. I asked if Erène were still in Paris, and he briefly replied "Yes." He disappeared soon after, and I felt as though a tempest had passed over me, and left me beaten down and half dead. As the night advanced, feeling strange and alien to this crowd of foreigners, I stole softly out alone on to a deserted balcony. The stillness of the moonlit night soothed me, and as I listened to the soft splash of the fountains playing in the garden below, I murmured within myself at the fate which carried me into foreign lands. The one longing of my soul was to return to America or England. I descended the balcony and wended my way through one of the labyrinthine paths of the shrubberied garden. Lights gleamed everywhere amid the dark-green foliage, and the fountains glistened and statues stood out cold and white in the light of the moon. I gathered the sheen of my ball-robe about me and seated myself on the ledge of an artificial grotto. "Oh, why," I murmured, "had my old love shown himself to me for one fleeting moment and then vanished? Why speak to me when he was no longer mine? Did he ever think of me, or had I been merely the toy of the passing hour? It would seem that I had; and yet how strangely he looked at me to-night! Would it have all been well if I had but sent him a note when I left Paris? But surely Erène would have told him where I was! Surely she would not be so cruel as to withhold my address had he asked it! But why do I talk thus, forsooth? Foolish heart! do not harbor such a thrill of hope. He is bound to another—he cannot be yours. To you he is lost—lost—lost!" And the shuddering night-air soughed away through the firs in a sad echo that sounded its sepulchral murmur deep within my soul.

From my despair I was startled by the sound of voices approaching. They were male voices, and as I was hidden from view, I believed I could remain undisturbed. Very soon they reached a spot near me where the path assumed a sudden curve, and instead of passing on, they stopped suddenly, and I recognized the voices as belonging to the Bavarian and his companion. They were angry and were disputing, but I could not hear their words. Presently their tones grew louder, and I heard the Hollander say, "I know your ways, Holstein of old, you are misleading her—you chide me for your own advancement." I heard a start and a fierce hiss from the Bavarian, instantly followed by a mighty oath and the rattle of his sword. I leaped from my seat and rushed out between them, crying, "Hold! Would you kill each other?" only in time, however, to see the sword of the Bavarian gleaming over his head as he fell dead at my feet. Although quicker than the Hollander, his stroke had been too rash and missed its aim, and, before he could regain himself for another, the first cool stroke of the Hollander had pierced him to the heart. The latter, seeing he was discovered, immediately fled, and I essayed to reach the house, but fell midway up the path in a swoon.

When consciousness returned, it was to feel some one lifting me tenderly in his arms, and to hear words uttered in a voice strangely familiar to my ears.

"My God! is she killed?—my little love! my darling!" cried the voice.

I opened my eyes and they met Lord Stolholm's. "Oh, it is a dream," I thought, and closed my eyes again. But no, it could not be. I felt his arms about me still, and his face bending close over mine in the quiet solitude to which he had borne me.

"Did they find him?" I asked, excitedly, looking round.

"Find whom?" he asked.

"The Bavarian. The Hollander killed him, and he is lying by the grotto."

He thought I was delirious, and tried to soothe me. At last I made him understand the scene I had witnessed. He conveyed me to the house, and, after notifying the proper authorities, again sought me alone. The news he had communicated caused great excitement, but, by means of Lord Stolholm's caution, my name was kept out of the tragic account.

"I cannot hope to comfort you over the loss of one to whom the love of your heart was given," began Lord Stolholm.

"The love of my heart?" I repeated, bewildered. "I don't understand you, Lord Stolholm."

"Pardon me, but were you not affianced to the Bavarian? It was so reported."

"Never!" I exclaimed, "nor ever cared for him in the least, though I am sorry for him now."

"And is it possible you are then free?"

"Quite free, and have always been, Lord Stolholm."

"Strange! Your cousin Erène told me when you left Paris that you were summoned to the sick-bed of your lover, and hearing that you were betrothed to the Bavarian, it seemed, of course, only too true."

"I have never been betrothed to any man," I exclaimed, Erène's duplicity impressing me for the first time. "Had Erène said that?"

"She had."

"And he had never loved Erène—never been betrothed to her?"

"He had never loved Erène, or liked her in the least. Nor had he ever been betrothed to any woman. I was the one woman he had loved from the first time he saw me. He loved me, and me only," he exclaimed, passionately. "If I were indeed free, would I not be his—his own little wife?"

Ah, as he thus speaks, how plainly I see it all—Erène's infidelity, to serve her own vanity. Well, she was too shallow to know the misery she had caused. I think not of that now—I only think of the sweet present. Is it true that my lover stands by my side—that I hear him say o'er and o'er that he loves me, and has loved me from the first—that his eyes are telling me more truly still? The spell of the hour is sweet! The half-moon shifting over the church tower near, the faint music issuing from the hall, the languid perfume of rare blooms wafted over the air! I fain would suspend all things as they are—why must it change, dissolve? Why must life move on?

A month later I received wedding-cards from my cousin Erène. The name accompanying hers was that of a Frenchman, an old admirer.

THE PAN-PRESBYTERIAN COUNCIL.

THE Pan-Presbyterian Council, which assembled in Philadelphia last week, is the second international convention ever held by the branches of the Presbyterian family scattered throughout the world—the first gathering having taken place at Edinburgh, Scotland, three years ago. The technical title of the council is "The Alliance of Reformed Churches throughout the World holding the Presbyterian System." The council is not clothed with, nor does it exercise any, authority over the churches or church organizations. It aims simply to promote the mutual comfort and edification of all. Its design is not to effect a visible unity, but rather harmonious co-operation of the various branches in every good work. There are among its advocates and supporters, however, some who would like to see Presbyterianism presenting that solid front to the world which they think is needed to resist Catholicism. Among Protestants now there is only two organized bodies capable of thus combating the Roman Catholic Church—namely, the Evangelical Alliance and this Presbyterian Alliance.

Some idea of the importance of the interests represented in the council may be gathered from the number of churches and ministers of the Presbyterian denomination in the world. On the Continent of Europe, excepting Germany, which is omitted as not being wholly Presbyterian, there were reported at the last council 5,126 congregations and 5,499 ministers; in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland 5,038 congregations and 4,457 ministers; in the United States, 9,703 congregations and 7,634 ministers; in the British Colonies, 1,641 congregations and 1,291 ministers; in mission fields, 679 churches.

It is claimed that the last council accomplished a great deal of good, especially for churches in Continental Europe, where it is much harder to disseminate the truth than is the case here. The present council is expected to be even a greater success than the first one. The sessions are held in Horticultural Hall, which is decorated in the most elaborate manner. Over 2,000 feet of canvas has been painted for the adornment of the walls, representing ecclesiastical subjects. Between the windows are hung solid columns of canvas, on which are painted the portraits of distinguished Presbyterian reformers, princes and preachers, and historic emblems. On the south side of the hall are pendent the seals of the Church in the following countries: Italy, Bohemia, Hungary, Switzerland, Holland, France, England, Ireland, Scotland, Spain and Geneva. Surmounting each column is an American flag, with the flag of each country named. Evergreen encircles the seals. At each side wall in front of the auditorium are streamers of all colors inscribed with Scriptural texts, while the seals of the Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia are pendent below the apex. The seats in the auditorium are arranged in the form of an amphitheatre, with a capacity for 936 members. On the stage and in the rear of the Moderator there are accommodations for 400 distinguished and invited guests. The general public is accommodated as far as possible in the extreme rear of the hall and in the gallery.

The number of delegates present is over 300. Great Britain commissions her foremost theologians, and America puts forward her favorite sons; Europe and Africa, Australia and the islands of the sea send their quota to the great gathering.

The Programme Committee, which has had a year or more to consider and select its work and workmen, chose thirty topics—ten theological, ten practical relating to human life and conduct, and ten ecclesiastical. The list of theological topics presented to and discussed by the council includes papers on the "Inspiration, Authenticity and Interpretation of Scripture," "The Vicarious Sacrifice of Christ," "Future Retribution," "Modern Theological Thought," "Theology of the Reformed Church," "Religious Science and Philosophy," "Modern Fidelity." In Ecclesiology: "Christian Life and Worship," "Principles of Presbyterianism," "Ruling Elders," "Creeds and Confessions," "Bible Revision," "Presbyterianism and Education," "Presbyterianism and Liberty," "Presbyterian Catholicity," "Admission to Sealing Ordinances," "Church Discipline," "Systematic Benevolence," "Support of Ministers," "Pastoral and Parochial Visitation," "Training of Candidates for Ministry."

Among practical subjects are: "Religion in Secular Affairs," "Family Religion and Training of the Young," "Application of the Gospel to Employers and Employed," "Christianity the Friend of the Working Classes," "Sabbath-schools, their Use and Abuse," "Sabbath Observance," "Temperance," "Popular Amusements," "Revivals of Religion," "Personal Religion." Foreign missions, church extension, evangelists and evangelistic work will receive special attention, and reports on the state of religion in the various countries represented will be given.

But besides these assigned topics and reports, it is expected also that the council will adopt some plan or action whereby conflicts between sister churches shall be avoided hereafter. Many churches of the same faith and order, but with names slightly differing, as "Reformed," "United," "Associate," etc., live upon the same ground, and grievances necessarily arise. They produce divisions, often create scandals and waste Christian energy.

Ample arrangements were made in advance for the entertainment of all delegates and of those who prepare papers to be read. The ocean expenses of foreign delegates who prepare papers will be paid, but the traveling expenses of other delegates will be a personal charge or paid by the churches they represent. The expenses of delegates falling on the Business Committee will range from $12,000 to $20,000, one-half of which sum was subscribed by New Yorkers at a meeting held last November.

On Wednesday evening last the delegates to the council were given a brilliant social reception at the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts. The spacious halls and galleries were crowded with the most prominent clergymen and laymen of the Presbyterian Church, a large number of ladies also being present. In one of the most commodious galleries space was reserved for the delegates and their ladies, and here, upon a raised platform, were seated Governor Hoyt, Mayor Stokley, Governor McClellan, of New Jersey, ex-Governor Hartranft, of Pennsylvania, and John Wanamaker and George Junkin of the Committee of Arrangements. Governor Hoyt formally welcomed the delegates in a speech, in which he said: "The City of Philadelphia, as indeed does the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, desires to acknowledge the significance of such an assembly as this within its borders, and to receive them with a cordial welcome. The organization they represent has had a large share in the intellectual awakening of the last 300 years—a large share in molding modern thought in Church and State, and in erecting the superstructure of religion, freedom and civil liberty." Mayor Stokley extended the hospitalities of the city to the delegates, and Governor McClellan spoke as a delegate from New Jersey. These addresses were responded to by the Rev. Dr. Cairns, of Edinburgh, Scotland; the Rev. Dr. Murkland, of Baltimore, the Rev. Dr. McIntosh, of Ireland, and the Rev. Marian Shoshadri, of India; after which the delegates were presented to Governors Hoyt and McClellan and Mr. Wanamaker. The formal opening of the Council took place on Thursday, when the Rev. Dr. William M. Paxton, of New York, preached an introductory sermon.

Subsequently, the delegates assembled in Horticultural Hall, and there organized the business sessions of the council. The formal address of welcome to the delegates was made by the Rev. Dr. William P. Breed. Rev. Dr. Calderwood, of Edinburgh, was elected chairman of the session, and the Rev. Drs. Matthews and Blaikie were elected clerks of the council. The Rev. Dr. Prime, of New York, referred to the deaths of Rev. Drs. William Adams, of New York, and E. S. Beadle and H. A. Boardman, of Philadelphia, since the last council, and offered a suitable minute, which was adopted, expressive of the regret of the council, and its sense of loss at the deaths of those mentioned.

A BELGIAN NATIONAL FESTIVAL.

A TWO days' festival was held last week by the Belgian residents of this city at Jones's Woods, in honor of the fiftieth anniversary of the independence of Belgium. The festival was opened by the Belgian Minister at Washington, Maurice Delfosse, E. Van Bruyssel, Belgian Consul at Washington and Charles Mali, the Consul at New York. The preparations were made without regard to expense. The grounds and colosseum were profusely decorated with flags and Chinese lanterns, and with colored lamps during the evening. The large dancing hall was lined with flags and festoons of bunting. At one end of the hall was the motto: "50me Anniversaire de l'Indépendance de la Belgique. 1830-1880." Around the room were flags with the names of the various States of the Union, and across the other end of the room were flags with the names of the Belgian States: Namur, Luxembourg, Limburg, Hainault, Liege, Brabant, Antwerpen and Flanders. The motto of the Belgian nation, "L'Union fait la Force," was conspicuous in several places.

During the day the visitors were entertained with music and games. Great sport was created by masked men, who tried to trundle wheelbarrows between posts a short distance apart. The winners received prizes. For women there was a scissors exercise. Twelve red wooden balls were hung from a horizontal rope by twelve strings of twine. For five cents a woman allowed herself to be blindfolded, and a pair of scissors was put into her hand. She was requested to open them wide, march for one of the twelve strings, and cut it off if she could do it in one trial. If she succeeded, then she plunged her hand into a bag of tickets and drew one out. On the ticket was a number, and the number drew some knick-knack. Women also engaged in a "race for the spoons," in which each one was furnished with a spoon containing an egg. The winner was she who first arrived at the goal with her egg safe. The greased pole created much fun, and was finally climbed by some sailors, who carried sand in their pockets to apply to the pole. They were rewarded with hams, bottles of wine and watches. Another source of fun was a game called "tilting the tub," which is portrayed in our illustrations. There were shooting-matches for medals, and a kind of lottery, called "Tombola," which was popular, and evaded the law by giving a prize with every ticket. There were 10,000 tickets at twenty-five cents each, and the prizes included a $900 Weber piano and a $500 United States bond, besides many other costly articles. All the tickets were sold before the drawing. In the evening there was dancing.

A MARVELOUS AGRICULTURAL EXHIBIT.

THE authorities of the Kansas Inter-State Fair, just closed at Bismarck Grove, near Lawrence, Kansas, invited the counties to make separate displays, competing for a first prize of $1,000. The invitation was responded to by eight counties, all of which made unusually fine displays. A special building, 400 feet long, was constructed to contain the county displays, and proved one of the most interesting buildings on the grounds. We illustrate a part of the first-prize display, that of Riley County, which has the distinction of being the geographically central county of the United States. This exhibit was arranged under the superintendence of our artist, Mr. Henry Worrall, under a series of arches covered with blue cloth, bordered with bright-colored apples and profusely ornamented with grasses and kernels of corn, arrayed in figures and ornamental letters. Beginning with the first arch were thirty-five varieties of wood, all from the timber belts which extend along the streams in Riley County; here, also, was a beautiful collection of hot-house plants, contributed by the ladies of that county simply for the beautifying of their display. When it is remembered that Riley County is eighty miles west of Bismarck Grove, the enterprise of its citizens must be commended for a display so varied and large that there were still unopened,

Digitized by Google

When our sketch was taken, forty crates of fruit, twenty crates of grain, there being no need of a larger display than that already opened. In the second arch were specimens of silk cocoons, champion butter, cheese, and steel horse-shoes, handmade, for the use of trotting horses. One lady showed here one hundred and eighteen and another ninety-eight different kinds of jelly. Next to this was the fruit arch, in which was shown one hundred varieties of apples, twenty-two of pears, fourteen of grapes and six of peaches, besides honey and sorghum.

The next was the vegetable arch, in which were every possible kind of vegetable grown in the West. The funny features of this arch were two immense squashes, labeled respectively, "Garfield" and "Hancock," and the legend concerning them runs thus: A farmer named two young scions of the squash family after the two Presidential candidates; the two squashes grew in beauty side by side, but Garfield would insist upon gaining over Hancock, and he now weighs ninety-five pounds, while General Hancock weighs but eighty-five.

The grain arch was supported on either side by columns of mason work ten feet high, built of Kansas cotton rock, dimension-stone and Fabblestone, with which Riley County abounds. Here were more than 100 samples of small grain, thirty varieties of corn, sod corn of three months' growth, thirteen feet high; one stalk of corn sixteen and a half feet high, castor-bean stalk eighteen feet, sunflower stalk twenty-two feet high and bearing 1,200 blossoms. Here also were baled prairie hay and hemp, fifteen varieties of grasses, ranging from one to ten feet in height. Another arch contained their exhibit of flour, and samples of bread made of it.

The natural history arch had eagles, beavers, pelicans, white swans, besides all of the smaller birds and animals found in the West, all of which were found in Riley County. Then samples of soil—river bottom, upland and lowland—which show a depth of thirty inches of unsurpassed richness.

The credit of the whole of this splendid exhibit is largely due to the Blue and Kansas Valley Agricultural Society, of which Mr. W. C. Johnson is secretary. The exhibit occupied 325 feet in all.

CENTENNIAL OF MAJOR ANDRE'S CAPTURE.

ON the morning of September 23d, 1780, three men took up a position on the highway, at a point near Tarrytown, on the west side of the road, their object being to intercept parties who might be prowling about stealing. Numerous thefts of cattle having been committed by some of those friendly to the British, the patriot farmers were compelled to keep themselves constantly on the alert. On the morning in question the three men must have taken their position early, as, upon arriving at the ground, their stockings were so wet with the dew that they were obliged to take them off and hang them upon the bushes to dry. They selected a spot in a clump of bushes secure from observation, and arranged that two of the party were to amuse themselves by playing cards, while the third man was to keep a sharp lookout to discover any parties who might be coming up or down the road. They drew lots by cutting the cards to determine who should be the one to stand guard; and this having been settled, the two amused themselves with the cards, and the sentinel took up his position to watch.

Some time afterwards the man on the lookout said he saw some one whom he did not know riding down the road. The game ceased at once, and the party sallied out and brought the stranger to a halt. As he rode up to them he said, "I hope you are of our party?" He was asked, "Of what party?" He replied, "Of the lower party," and they said, "Yes, we are of the lower party;" then the stranger said, "I am a British officer, and am on special business, and I hope you will not detain me for a moment, and, for the token of a gentleman, I will show you my gold watch." They then said to him, "We are not of the lower party." Then the stranger said, "My God! we must do anything to get along these times," saying which he drew out his pass bearing the signature of General Arnold. But, their suspicions being aroused, they told him that he must submit to a search. They examined his clothing, but found nothing; they then proposed drawing off his boots, when the stranger said, "What will this needless search come to an end?" They, however, persisted, and upon pulling off the boot they noticed that the heel of the stocking sagged down. Pulling this off, they found a package of papers concealed therein; drawing off his other boot and stocking, they also found another package of papers. And then the stranger said: "Now, you have got all." He then dressed himself and remarked that he wished that they had blown out his brains the moment they stopped him. He begged them to release him, and offered to give them any amount of goods, or any amount of money they might name, and said they could conceal him anywhere until they had received the amount agreed upon for his release. These offers they refused, and proceeded at once with their prisoner to the headquarters of Colonel Jameson, at North Castle. They offered to allow him to ride his horse; but this favor he refused, and they proceeded on their way afoot, one walking ahead and two in the rear of the prisoner.

The subsequent trial and execution of Major André, and the reward granted General Arnold for his treachery by the King, are just now familiar matters of history. Congress passed a vote of thanks to the three militiamen, John Paulding, David Williams and Isaac Van Wart, and a silver medal was presented to each of them, with a pension of $200 a year. On Thursday, Sept. 23d, the one hundredth anniversary of the major's capture was celebrated at Tarrytown. At 9:45 in the morning, Battery C, United States Army, Brevet-Major St. Clair commanding, fired a national salute of 49 guns, one for each State and Territory, from the top of Mount André. The salute was returned by the United States man-of-war Kearsarge, which lay in the river. During the firing of this salute the church bells of the village were rung, and the noise was amply sufficient to awaken every sleeper. The villagers flocked into the streets to find that during the night nearly every house had been decorated with flags, some of them bearing mottoes in commemoration of the patriotism of Paulding, Williams, and Van Wart. The Kearsarge was completely covered with bunting, which represented the flags of all nations, and her rigging could scarcely be seen for the colors which incased it. From sunrise to 8 o'clock the villagers busied themselves in completing the decoration of the town, and preparing to receive their expected visitors. At 8 o'clock a "Te Deum" service was held in Christ Church, the Rev. J. S. Spencer officiating. The church was packed to overflowing, and several scores of people who failed to secure entrance remained outside the door until the service was concluded. At 10 o'clock—the hour that André was taken—a bronzed plaster-cast of the bronze statue of Patriotism on the monument that marks the spot was unveiled; at 11 o'clock there was a procession; at 1 o'clock an anniversary meeting in the great tent; at 4:30 o'clock a grand concert; at sunset more salutes, and in the evening a display of fireworks. The village church bells were kept ringing during the day. The Rev. Alexander Van Wart, a son of one of the captors, made the prayer at the afternoon meeting; Orlando B. Potter gave a historical reading, and Chauncey M. Depew delivered the oration.

The monument erected to the captors of André is situated in the grounds of A. C. Wheeler, in Broadway, and is on the bank of a little stream that flows down the hill underneath the street, marking the very spot where André was captured by Paulding, Williams and Van Wart. A granite shaft was erected here in 1853, but this has been entirely changed, and the ground underneath built up to the level of the street. The bronze statue is not yet completed, but a bronzed plaster cast was placed on the monument in time for the exercises. Mr. O'Donovan's statue represents, not the conventional minute man, but the countryman of the time and place, hastily turned soldier. The moment seized is when the tramp of André's horse is heard coming along the road. The "Skinner" springs to his feet and stands listening in an attitude of eager expectancy. His hat, the brim tilted up in front, is pushed back much upon his head, and his long hair straggles down over his brow. His right hand grasps tightly a flint-lock musket, while his left is slightly raised, the fingers outspread in intense suspense. One foot is advanced and the figure is leaning forward as if listening. The dress consists of a long-skirted coat and knee-breeches, and the powder-horn is slung on the left side. The statue is the gift of John Anderson.

On the front of the monument is a bronze bas-relief by Mr. Bauer, representing the scene when André endeavors to bribe his captors. An inscription setting forth the purpose of the monument appears on one side, while on the other are the words of Washington commending the captors.

The New French Cabinet

THE new French Cabinet is constituted as follows:

M. Jules Ferry, President of the Council and Minister of Public Instruction.
M. Barthelemy St. Hilaire, Minister of Foreign Affairs.
M. Constans, Minister of the Interior and of Worship.
M. Cazot, Minister of Justice.
M. Magnin, Minister of Finance.
General Farre, Minister of War.
Admiral Cloüet, Minister of Marine.
M. Carnot, Minister of Public Works.
M. Tirard, Minister of Commerce.
M. Cochery, Minister of Posts and Telegraphs.

M. Barthelemy St. Hilaire, Minister of Foreign Affairs, has addressed the following circular to the diplomatic agents of France abroad:

"My first duty is to request you to assure the Government to which you are accredited that the new Cabinet will make no change in the foreign policy of its predecessor. France has never attached greater value than now to the maintenance of peace, so fruitful of advantage for her prosperity and honor. This system, inaugurated by the wisdom of President Thiers, has been followed with constancy for the last ten years, and has borne excellent fruits. We shall remain faithful to so happy a tradition, and do everything to develop still further the good relations which France maintains with other Governments. As for myself, I shall apply all my strength to this object, and for assistance in this patriotic task I rely upon the most devoted cooperation from all the representatives of our diplomacy.

Honors to Ole Bull's Memory.

THE Norwegian papers give full accounts of the extraordinary funeral honors paid to the memory of Ole Bull, which were such as have never before been shown, except to the remains of royal personages. On the beautiful island of Lysoen (Isle of Light), about twenty miles from the city of Bergen, Ole Bull had recently built a large château, and to this island-home he was taken, on his return from America, suffering from a severe illness, which soon terminated fatally. As the last hour approached he took a tender leave of those around him, and while, at his request, his wife was playing Mozart's Requiem on the large organ, he passed away peacefully and without pain. In the grand music-hall his body lay in state, surrounded by trophies of his own life—a gold service from the Emperor Nicholas of Russia, a silver music-stand from the students of St. Petersburg, a crown of diamonds and pearls from California, orders and decorations from all the Kings and Queens of Europe, pictures and treasures of all kinds. The King sent telegrams of condolence to his family, and the Government ordered a large steamer to the island for the convenience of those who wished to pay their last tribute of respect to him whom the whole nation mourned. When the day for burial came the Government again sent a steamer to bring the remains to Bergen, and fourteen other steamers, all draped in mourning, with flags at half-mast, to escort it. The body was borne to the boat by the peasants on the estate, by whom Ole Bull was almost adored, and the imposing cortège proceeded to the city. When the landing was reached the remains were transferred to a funeral-car, drawn by four splendid horses, and all the musical societies joined the immense procession, which, preceded by sixteen young girls clad in mourning, moved forward to the sound of Chopin's Funeral March, the tolling of the bells and the booming of the minute guns from the two fortresses that guard the entrance to the harbor. The cemetery, on the outskirts of the city, is crossed by two broad avenues, and the point of intersection, overhung with trees, around which seats are placed, forming a kind of natural pavilion, was designated by the municipality of Bergen as the last resting-place of Ole Bull. All business in the city was suspended; shops, banks, and all public offices were closed; and all the way from the landing-place to the cemetery, a distance of three miles, the houses were draped in mourning and the street was strewn with flowers and evergreens.

Powerful Ocean Steamships.

THE London Times says: Twenty years ago the largest steamers known (in this, as in all such comparisons, neglecting the Great Eastern, which was a prodigy of engineering skill) did not reach 350 feet in length, 45 feet in breadth, 3,000 tons in tonnage, or 4,000 horse-power indicated. The list of fifty merchant steamers sailing, in the year 1860, from Southampton and other southern ports, which the largest vessels then frequented, includes but ten ships of more than 300 feet in length, none of which reached the limits of size and power just given, and the whole of which belonged to two companies—viz., the Royal Mail and the Peninsular and Oriental. At the present moment we have afloat and at work the White Star Liners, some of them 445 feet in length, 45 feet in breadth, and nearly 5,000 indicated horse-power; the Inman Liners, comprising such ships as the City of Berlin, 438 feet by 44½ feet broad, and of about the same steam-power; the Greece, of 445 feet by 46½ feet, with engines developing 5,600 horse-power; the Arizona, of about the same size, with still greater steam power and speed; and many other splendid vessels but little inferior to any of the foregoing. And these grand steamers—many of which reach the quays of New York with greater punctuality than railway trains reach the London suburbs from Victoria and Charing Cross, and would reach our quays with equal punctuality if they could avoid the abominable sands that bar the Mersey—are the forerunners of still larger and more powerful vessels now taking shape upon the banks of the Clyde and elsewhere. The Cunard steel ship, the Servia, now building by Messrs. Thompson, of Glasgow, is 500 feet by 50 feet, with over 10,000 indicated horse-power, and will, therefore, doubtless possess a speed considerably in advance of that of the very fastest ship at present afloat in the mercantile marine. The Inman steamship City of Rome, building of iron, at Barrow, will be still larger, having a length of 546 feet, a breadth of 52 feet, a gross registered tonnage of 8,000, and a steam-power nearly equal to that of the Servia. The Union Line is to be increased by ships of almost equal size and power, and the Allan Line is building others equal to the finest of the White Star boats. Notwithstanding the number and magnitude of the passenger-steamers now running between America and this country, the traffic is so great that it has only been possible to secure accommodation by arranging passages many weeks, and even months, in advance, while the rapidly-increasing population and wealth of the United States and of Canada make it certain that the interchange of agricultural produce and manufactured goods between them and ourselves will go on increasing.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

The "Grosse Ring" at Prague.

Prague, the capital of Bohemia, takes the first rank among the cities of the Austrian empire for picturesqueness of site, ancient architecture and historical associations. The view of the town from the Moldau Bridge surpasses in grandeur that of almost any other city in Germany. The interior of Prague is replete with buildings of quaint architecture and historical interest, which centres in the "Grosse Ring" of the Altstadt, the oldest part of the town. The name of "Ring" was given in Eastern Germany to the places in front of the town halls, which served as markets, or for tournaments of the nobility, for open-air meetings of the citizens, for public courts of justice, and for executing the last sentence on criminals. The monumental column visible on the left side of our engraving, and dedicated to St. Mary, was erected by the Emperor Ferdinand III. in commemoration of the liberation of the town from the hands of the Swedes. Opposite the town-hall, behind a row of houses, stands the Theinkirche, a Gothic church erected by German merchants at the beginning of the fifteenth century. In 1458 George Podiebrad was crowned there as King of Bohemia, and added two tall towers with taper roofs.

The Char-Su, Candahar.

The four principal bazaars or streets in Candahar lead from the gateways and meet nearly in the centre of the town in a large circular building, covered with a dome about 120 feet in diameter, called the Char-Su. This place is surrounded by shops, and is regarded as a public market-place. The streets which converge in it divide the town into four nearly equal districts. The Char-Su is almost the sole conspicuous architectural feature of the city, except the octagonal tomb of Ahmed Shah, with its cupola and minarets raised on a stone platform.

Montenegrins and their War Songs.

The warlike people of the Tzernagora, Montenegro, or Black Mountain, are in such an excited state, and so are their Albanian neighbors and hereditary foes, that it is most desirable to remove the present cause of hostilities between these races. Our illustration shows one of their characteristic entertainments in the way of a rude style of minstrelsy, usually devoted to singing the glories of battle and bloodshed. A special training is, no doubt, required for the perfect appreciation of highland music. But by what educational process the lowland foreigner is to attune his outraged tympanum to the dismal rasping and rumblings of that most melancholy monochordium, the guzla, we cannot tell. Yet the effect of the harrowing instrument appears to be entrancing to the Montenegrins. They will listen to it for hours, without a single symptom of its setting their teeth on edge. There is scarcely a homestead in that country where at nightfall its sounds may not be heard, the performer singing the glorious wars of Montenegrin and Servian heroes—of Tzenai George and Milosh Obrenovich, of Tzernoievich and Milosh Obilich, or of the fabulous Scanderbeg, under whom their ancestors fought against the Turks.

Miriditte Chiefs of Albania.

In a recent issue we gave a portrait of the Miriditte Prince, and types of the soldiers of the Albanian League. Our present illustration represents a few of the Miriditte chiefs and captains. Colonel Nicoli Bairaktar, of Fosedi, is standing beside an Austrian visitor, Lieutenant von Zubovits, of the Hussar Cavalry, who has won a European reputation by his famous riding feat on the road from Vienna to Paris, and still better, his performance of saving 150 lives in the inundation of the Danube at Szegedin. He is here shown, dressed simply in shirt and trousers of European fashion, having thrown off his coat on account of the heat; while the other persons are in their national military costume. Their names are Mustafa Ajeti, Pluk or Chief of Laria, Per Deda of Spacz, Captain Marcodozzi, Marco Dieta, Pluk of Little Debrida, Marco Tepuli and Peter Djozi, Pluks of Orosh, Colonel Preoga and Djak Prenga, the Stra-pluks of Orosh, Captain Ded Turzi, Marco Noa, Pluk of Spacz, and the Secretaries, Lorenzo Parcocchi and Starr. It would seem likely that some of these people are of Italian descent; but the Mustafa, who is the man standing at the left-hand side in our engraving, should be a converted Mussulman.

Pilgrims Entering the Cathedral of Santiago de Compostella, Spain.

No shrine in Western Europe attracted greater armies of pilgrims than that of the Apostle St. James at the Galician town of Compostella, in Spain. Every country sent its votaries, and the scallop-shell, a peculiar attribute of the devotion, has become everywhere the emblem of a pilgrim. In this little city, bedded in hills, the cathedral still towers, and with all the changes made by religious and civil revolutions attracts its yearly tide of pilgrims. The sketch made in 1880, with the bare-footed women from the various provinces of Spain and France, might almost answer for the days of the crusades, or the time when Ferdinand III., with his mailed warriors, wrested the sacred city from the hands of the Moors, who had held it for two centuries. Spanish legends tell how the apostle came to find a resting place in this secluded town, and how, to reward the piety of the Spaniards, he appeared at the head of their armies in the desperate battle of Clavijo some thousand years ago, and with his good sword routed the victorious Moors. His name was for ages the battle-cry of Christian Spain.

Dulcigno and the Powers.

Dulcigno, of which we have been hearing so much of late, is a picturesque village on the Adriatic which, like the whole Adriatic coast, has seen better days. When, in 1420, it gave itself up to the Venetians, from fear of the Turks, it had a considerable mercantile fleet and carrying trade. It eventually fell into the hands of the Turks in 1571, after undergoing a protracted siege, and from that moment its commerce dwindled and disappeared, and its roadstead became the haunt of pirates, who ravaged the coasts of the Adriatic and the Ægean. It was besieged by the Montenegrins and stormed, after a resolute resistance, in January, 1878, but the conquerors behaved so humanely and prudently that their departure was regretted by the Dulcignotes when, in February, 1879, the place was restored to Turkey. On September 2d the Ottoman Government declared in a circular note its acceptance of the line proposed by the Powers on the western shore of the Lake of Scutari including the cession of the district of Dulcigno to Montenegro, but it was said that, unless the Albanians were positively assured of favorable changes in the line on the eastern shore, the cession would be full of difficulties and might lead to great complications. The Powers have demanded the surrender; the Porte temporizes; meanwhile an allied fleet under command of the British Admiral Seymour is at Ragusa, ready to storm the town if not surrendered.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

—THE Afghan war has already cost $90,000,000, and has lasted two years.

—NEW ORLEANS expects to ship 30,000,000 bushels of grain this year.

—NEARLY 100 agricultural engines are in use in Anderson County, S. C.

—A MRS. HAZZARD, of Monticello, Ill., recently gave birth to five children. They are all alive.

—THE erection of Roumania into a kingdom is disapproved by the Austrian and Hungarian Governments.

—THE St. Louis Cotton Exchange offer a premium of $5,000 to the largest shipper of cotton from Texas to that market this season.

—A DISPATCH from Alexandria reports that the rise in the Nile is quite up to the average, and the prospects of the crops are very satisfactory.

—OUR consul at Hong Kong reports that during the quarter ending June 30th, 1880, emigrants numbering 5,662 left Hong Kong for the United States, of whom seven were females and forty-four boys.

—THE report of the Illinois State Board of Agriculture indicates that, notwithstanding the August drought and the early September frosts, the aggregate corn crop of that State will not fall below the average.

—A DESPATCH from Shanghai reports serious disturbances in Corea. The Europeans have been threatened and are in a state of alarm. The Catholic mission has been attacked. The military have been called out. Several sisters have been killed and wounded.

—THE anniversary of the entry of the Italian troops into Rome was enthusiastically celebrated on September 21th. Members of the Cabinet and the municipality took part in the procession. Premier Cairoli and other distinguished men made patriotic speeches at the Porta Pia.

—A GENEVA dispatch says the Catholic members of the Swiss Federal Assembly will vigorously oppose the proposed revision of the Constitution, and, as the measure is highly unpopular in the Protestant cantons, there can be little doubt that it will be rejected by a large majority.

—THE crop prospects in Northern and Western India continue to improve. A good rain has fallen in most districts of the northwestern provinces, but some of the crops in Central Doab are hopelessly burned up. Should a moderate rain fall within a week or two there will be no immediate danger of scarcity.

—THE Freemasons will have charge of the laying of the corner-stone of the Egyptian obelisk in Central Park, October 20th. The parade, it is expected, will be second only to that of June, 1870, before the laying of the corner-stone of the Masonic Temple. It will probably be a month before the stone reaches the site chosen for it.

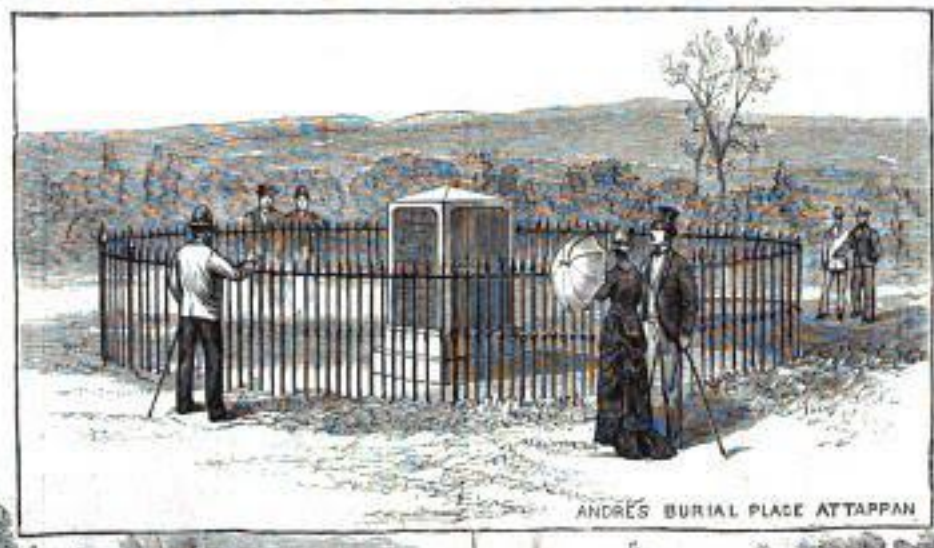
—TRUSTWORTHY information from the Indian Territory is to the effect that the Cheyennes are again threatening. A few days ago a party of 300, well mounted, visited the agency from Fort Reno and became very demonstrative even slapping the agent's face, and another party ransacked the commissary stores at the Wichita Agency.

—IT is announced that Mr. Amasa Stone will give $200,000 to "Western Reserve College," at Hudson, Ohio, if it is removed to Cleveland. At a meeting of the trustees held recently it was practically resolved to remove the college to Cleveland and to change the name to "Western Reserve University." The college already has an endowment fund of $250,000.

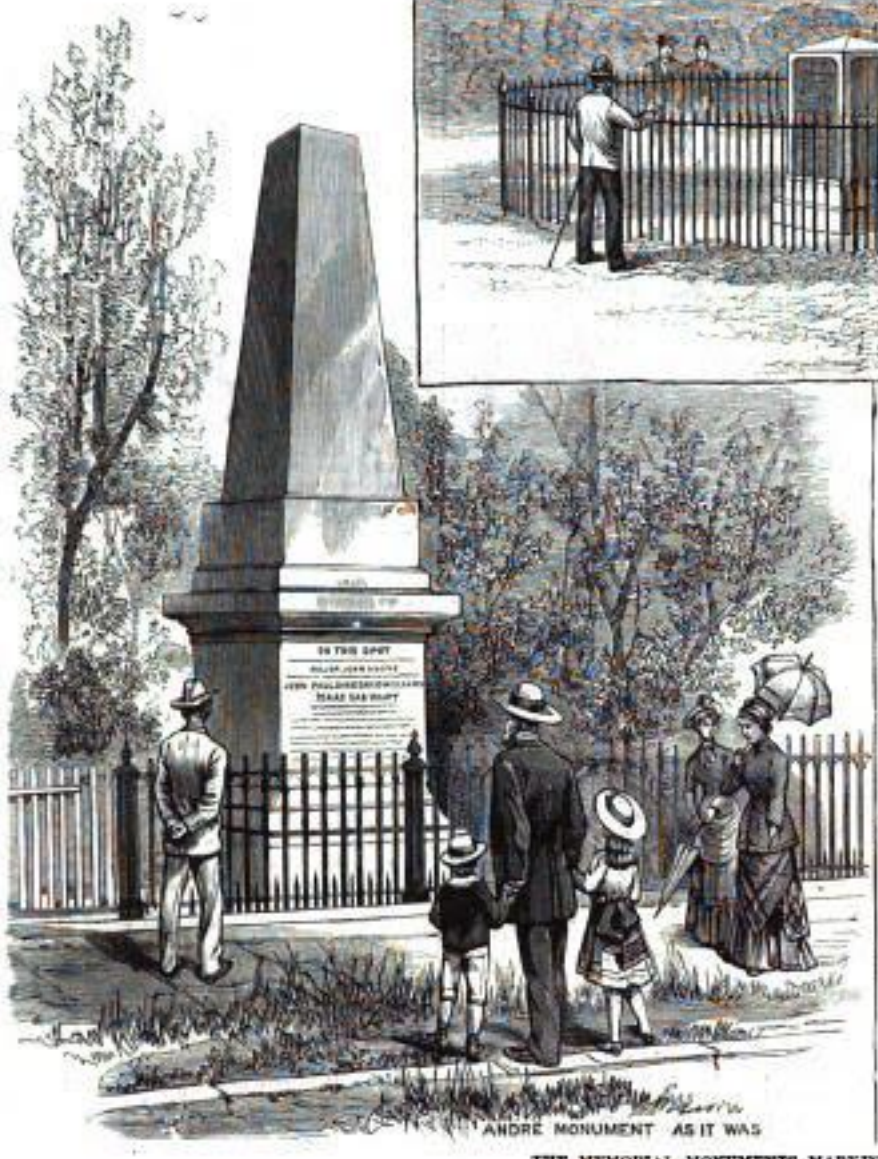
—A DISPATCH from Victoria says: "A genuine sea serpent, six feet in length, with an orthodox mane, head shaped like a panther's and a tail whittled down to a sharp point, was brought in by Indians yesterday, they having caught it in deep water in the Straits of Debara. Its appearance creates intense interest among scouts, and old fishermen cannot place the monster.

—IT is a curious fact that the locomotive which, with its train, went down with the Tay Bridge, is now running regularly between Glasgow and Edinburgh. For three months it lay at the bottom of the Tay, but when it was brought up it was found uninjured, except the funnel, dome and weather-board, which had to be renewed. It ran on its own wheels to Glasgow just as it came out of its long bath.

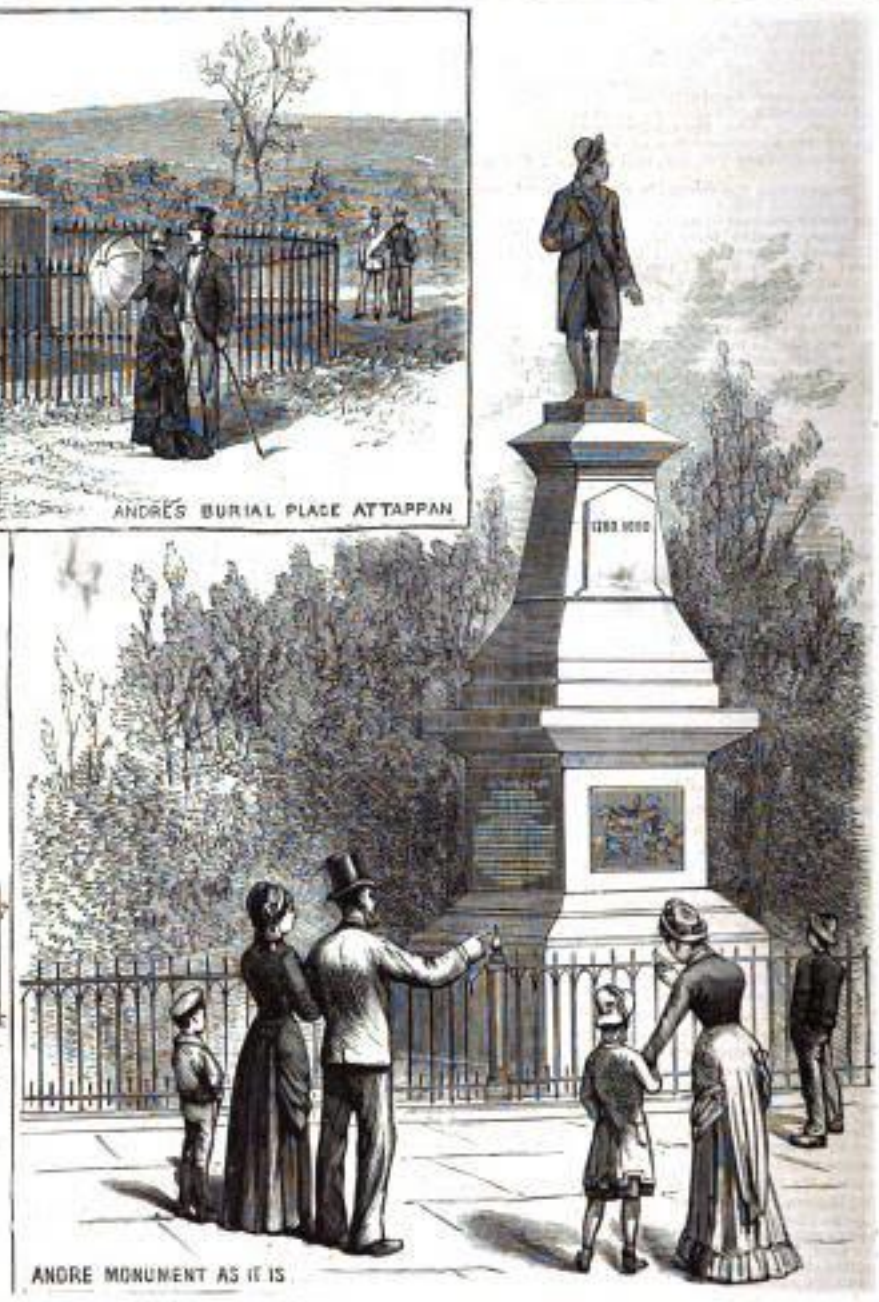
—MR. FAWCETT, the British Postmaster-General, has a new plan for facilitating the small savings of the poor. A saving child may now get an official strip of paper intended to hold twelve stamps, add a stamp at a time to it as he can save a penny, and when it is full take it to the post-office and get a savings-bank receipt for a shilling, the minimum deposit which it will pay the Post Office Savings Bank to take.



—THE business of the Post-office in this city has so increased during the last month that it will be found necessary to increase the working force by adding forty clerks to the present number. The receipts have increased the revenue of the Government over $1,000 per day since August last. Week before last $67,500 worth of stamps were sold, an increase of nearly $4,000 over the sales for the corresponding week of last year.

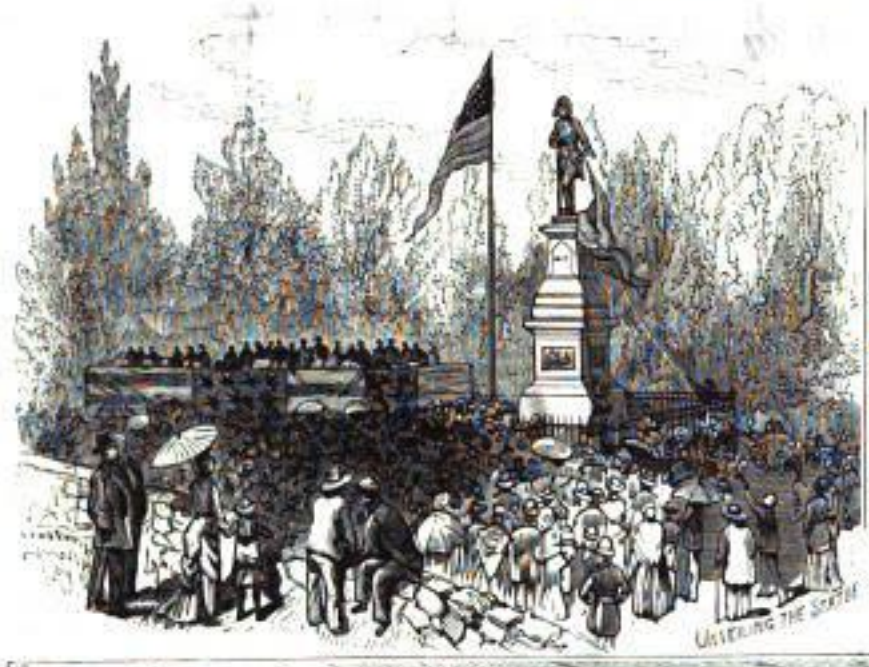


—TWO MINES, prepared for the assassination of the Czar, have been discovered on the line of the Emperor's journey to Livadia. One of these was on the railway in the Ekaterinoslav Government, and the other was in the Taurida Government, at a distance of 118 versts on the railway to Simferopol, and was found charged with three poods of dynamite, in two cases equally divided, and also an electric wire, but with no battery.

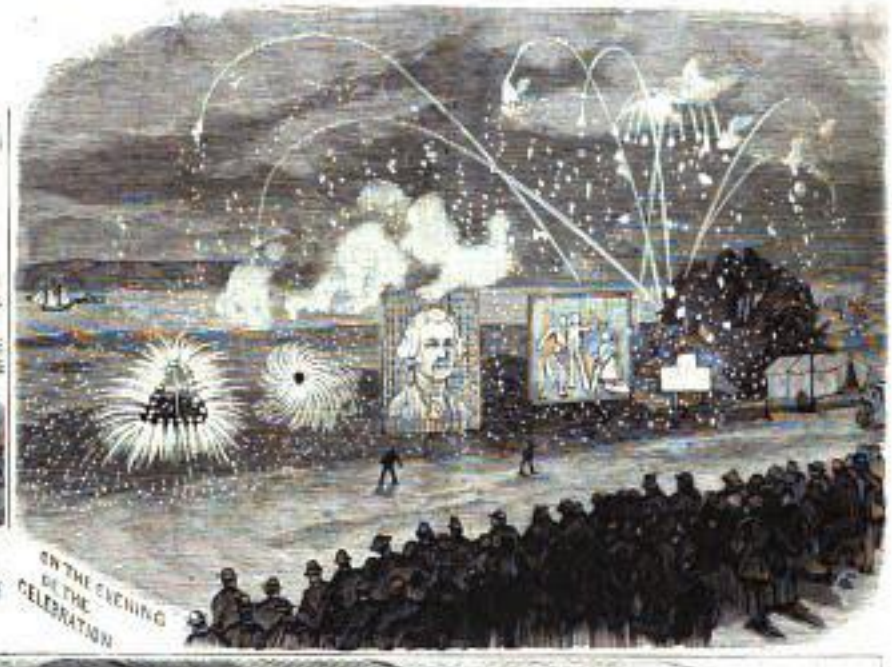


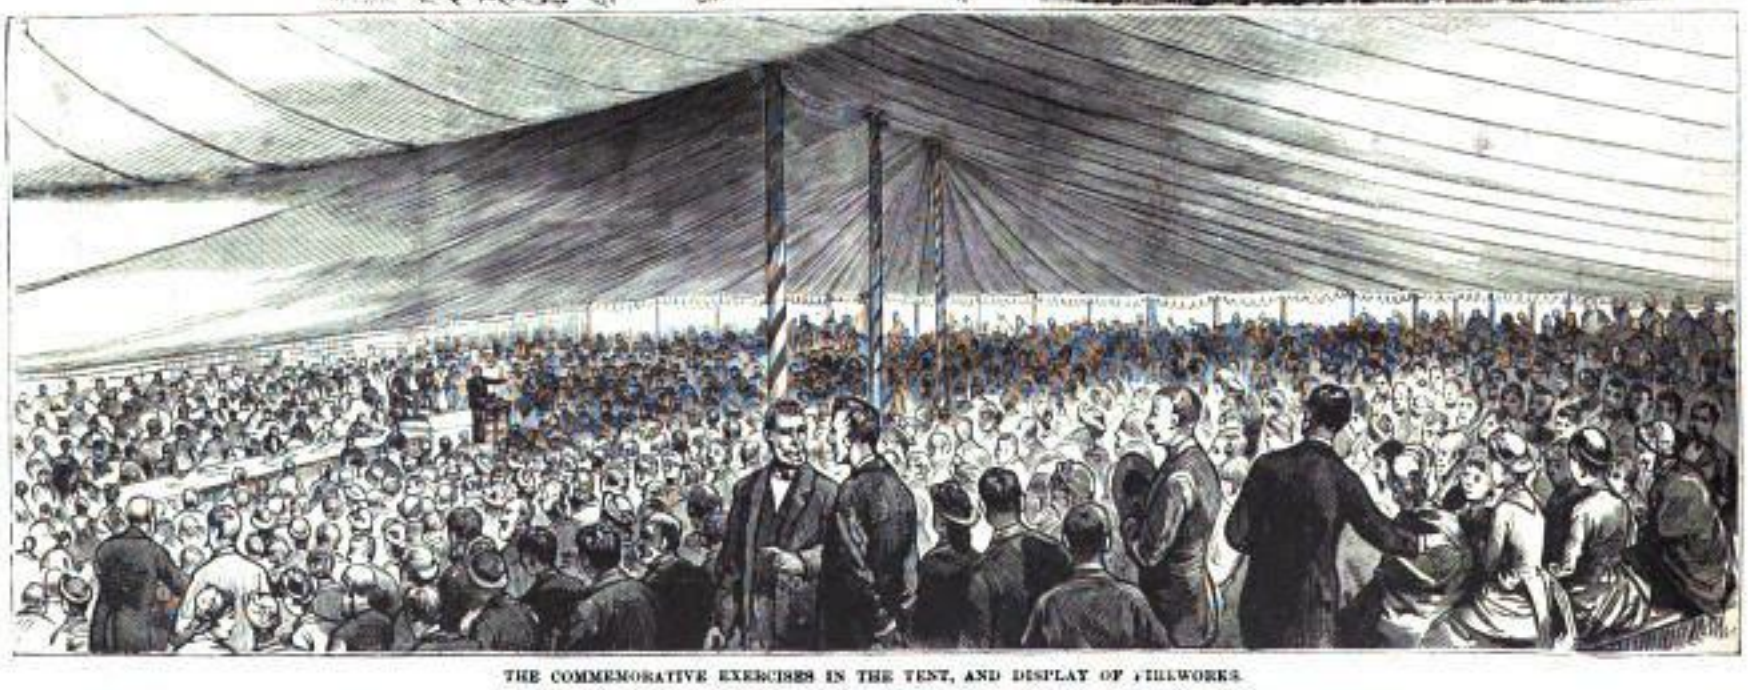
—THE Franco-American Claims Commission will be composed of the following gentlemen: Commissioners on the part of the United States—Judge A. O. Aldis, Vermont; on the part of France—Louis de Geoffroy; Arbitrator on the part of Brazil—Baron de Arinos, Brazilian Minister to Belgium. The Marquis de Chambrun will act as counsel for France, and William B. Peddrick, of Washington, has been appointed as American secretary. The American counsel has not yet been selected.

—A FINE specimen of horological art has been lately added to the Germanic Museum at Nuremberg. It has been erected at the expense of the princes of the royal house, and is intended as a memorial of the Wittelsbach Jubilee, celebrated a few days ago. The clock is placed at an elevation of 14·2 metres, or a little over 46½ feet. It is surrounded with ornamental work in mediæval style and several gilt figures, most of which move by mechanical arrangement. The idea intended to be expressed is that the Bavarian people at all times reverence their King, who governs under the protection of God. Above is the sitting figure of the Saviour, and below that of Louis II., also seated. Around the Saviour are arranged eight angels, some of whom strike the clock bells; others blow trumpets, others hold a curtain behind the king, before whom two citizens bow down reverentially. An inscription records the object and authors of the work. The old arms of the Palatinate are set below. The whole work is in the style of the fourteenth century.

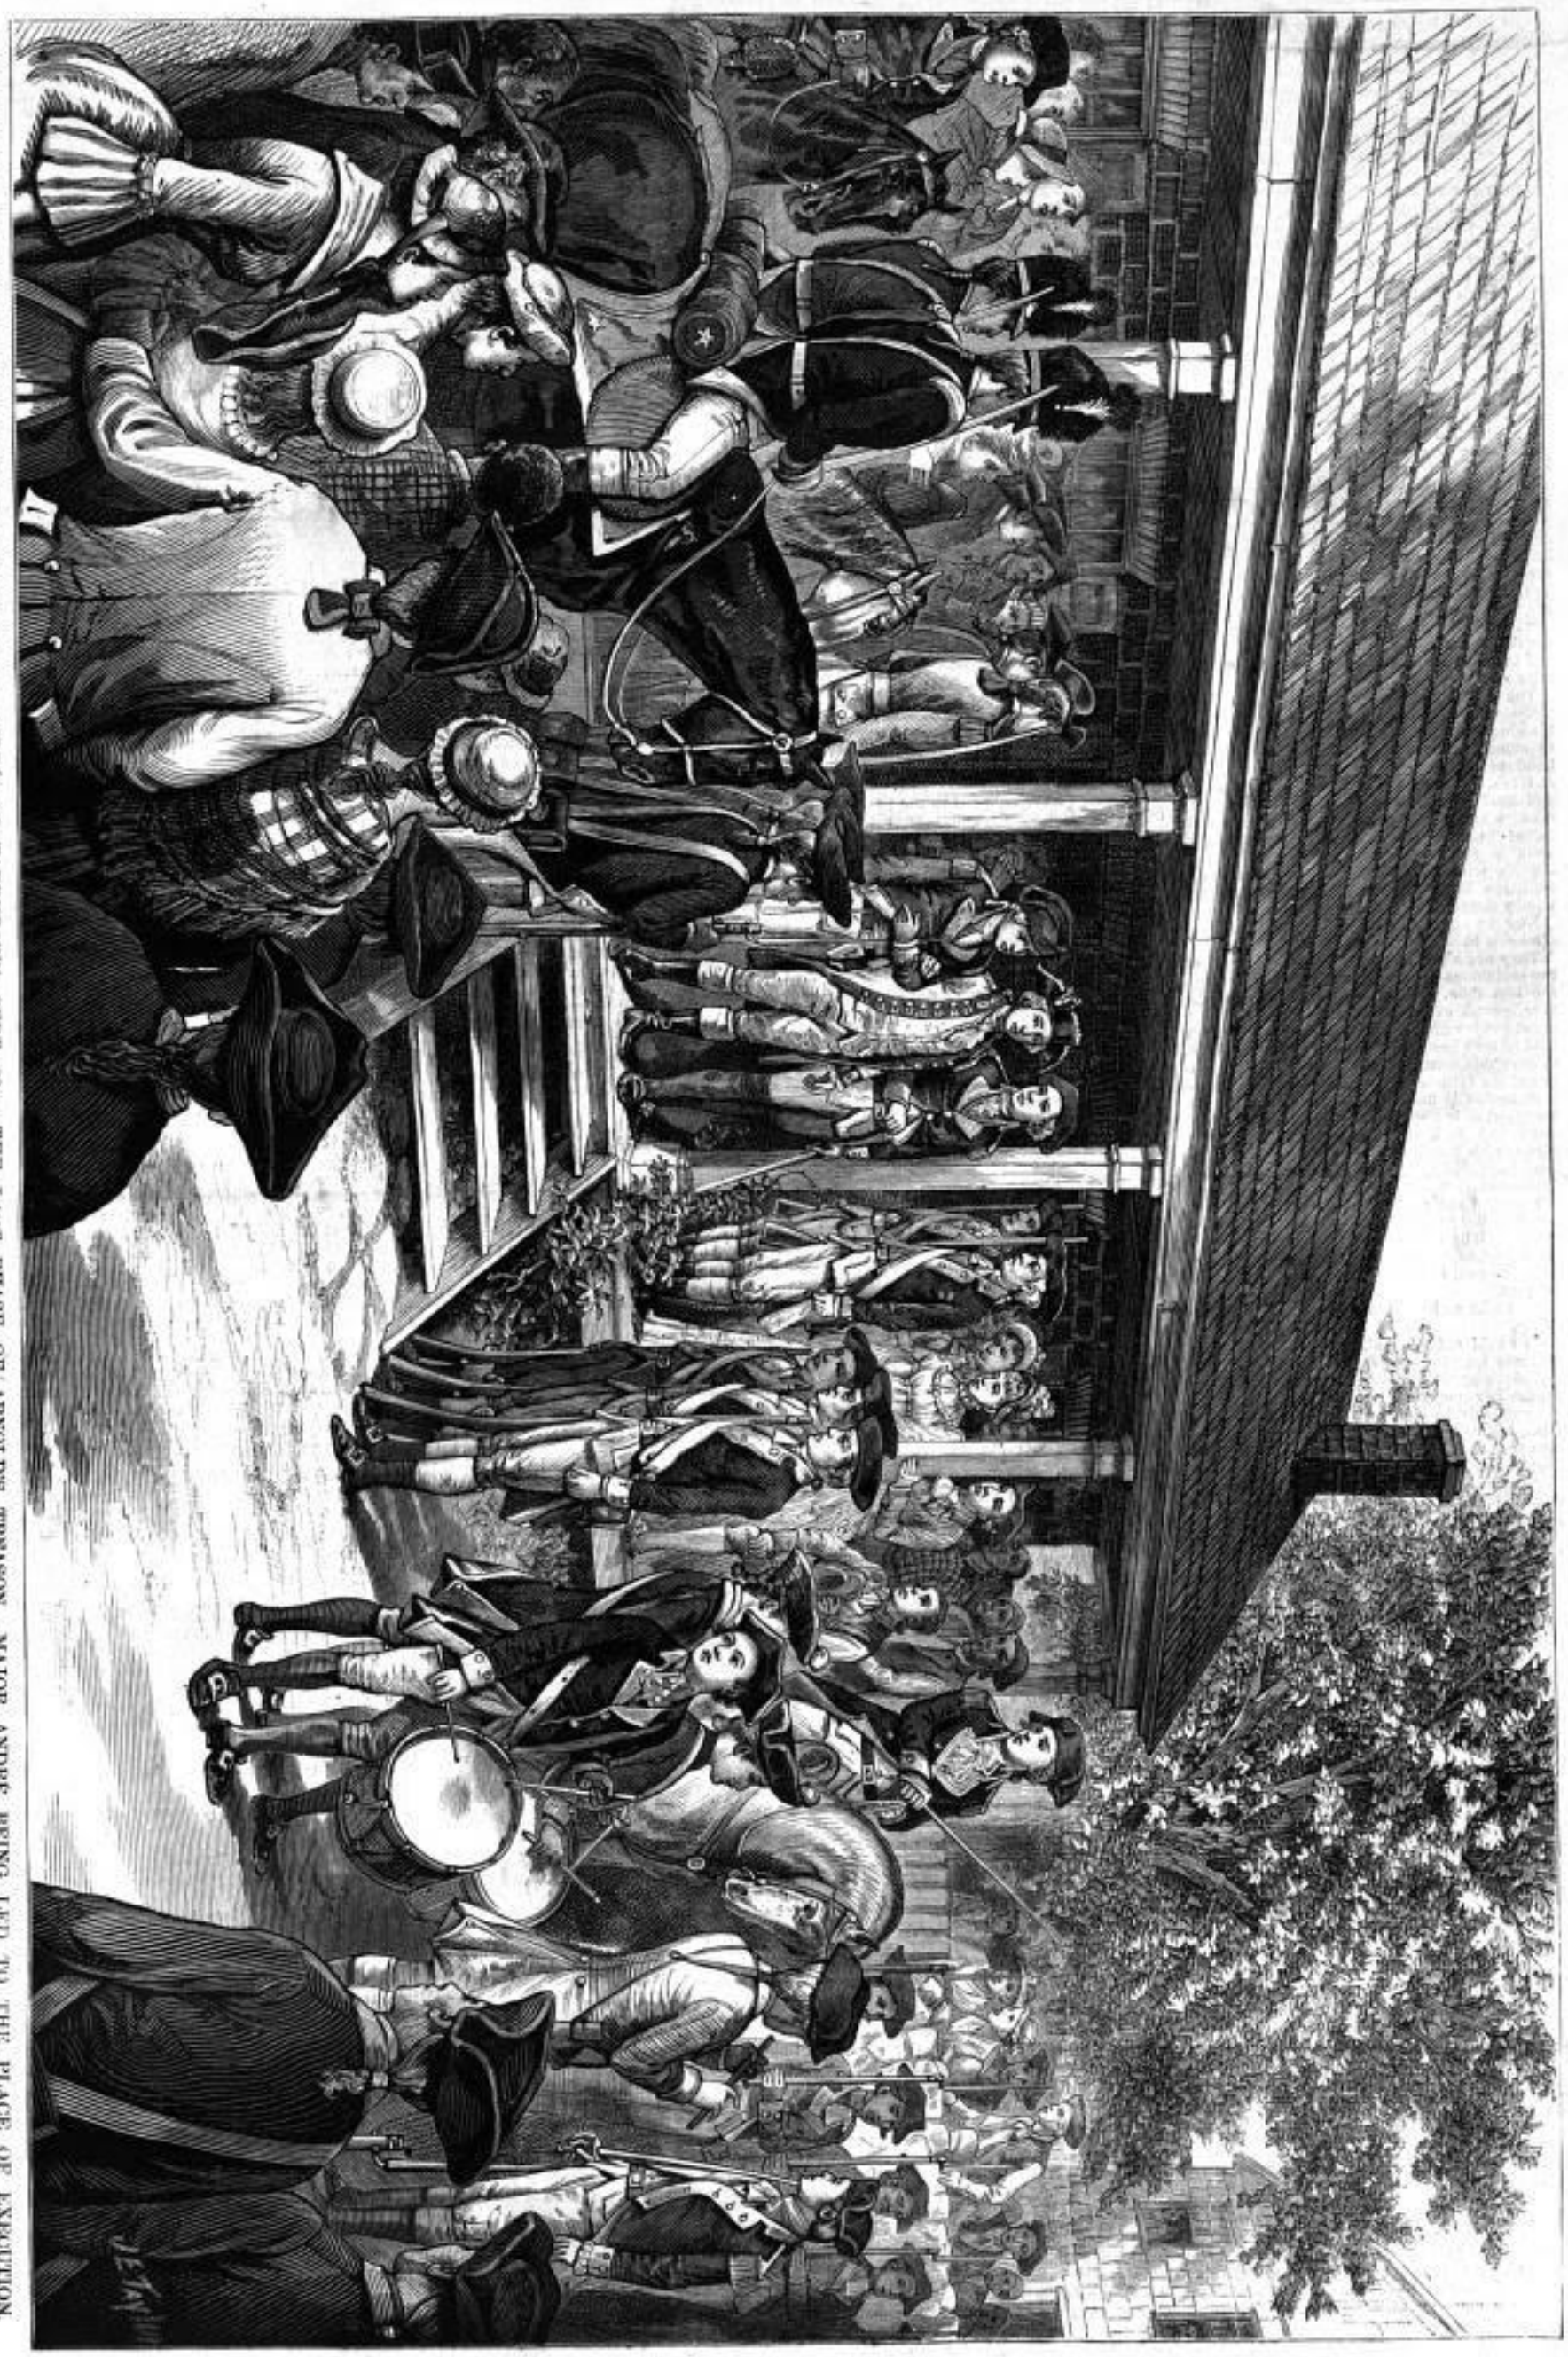


Digitized by Google





THE MEMORIAL MONUMENTS MARKING THE LOCATION OF THE CAPTURE.



THE COMMEMORATIVE EXERCISES IN THE TENT, AND DISPLAY OF FIREWORKS.

NEW YORK.—CENTENNIAL OF THE CAPTURE OF MAJOR ANDRÉ, AT TARRYTOWN, SEPTEMBER 23D.
FROM SKETCHES BY WALTER GOATER.—SEE PAGE 87.

Digitized by Google

NEW YORK—CENTENNIAL OF THE CAPTURE OF MAJOR ANDRÉ, AT TARRYTOWN, OCT. 23D—THE LAST PHASE OF ARNOLD'S TREASON—MAJOR ANDRÉ BEING LED TO THE PLACE OF EXECUTION.
DRAWN BY JAS. E. TAYLOR.—SEE PAGE 87.

Digitized by Google

THE SCHAFFUSKIE LANDS.

BY ANNIE DUFFELL,

AUTHOR OF "IN THE MESHES," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.—(CONTINUED.)

IN the dull, maddening routine of life in the mines one day is as a month, one week as a year. And now that almost a month has passed in his silent, distant association with a woman of his own rank, in his heart, fully developed and eternal as the hills, is a love for her purer than ever yet has been given her—a love grand and immutable in her affliction, matchless in its devotion, sacred in its might and holy in its hopelessness. And even as into Lady Jet's soul has entered that steadfast purpose of rescuing him, so to him has come an immutable resolution to save this woman from the lethargy, the despair, the insanity of long years spent in the mines. As he toils with the spade his eyes are fastened upon the object of his love. Her lips are closed tighter, her eyes more unearthly bright, her hands hang clinched by her side; he sees that her physical endurance is entirely exhausted, and even while he looks her form sways, she flings out her hands, and in the next moment drops heavily to the rocky floor.

What follows next he never knows; a mist comes before his eyes, and when it clears he finds himself standing above that long, lithe form which is stretched upon a pile of blankets, and the superintendent's voice sounds in his ear:

"Do what you can for her, while we send for the doctor. The count is interested in her, and has given orders that she shall be treated with every consideration."

The officer hastens away, and the exile is alone with the woman of his love. It is a blessing, a joy that he never expected to have, to stand so close beside her, to touch her hand, to look in her face with its divine and stricken loveliness! Owing to his refinement and intelligence, his natural aptness in sickness, which was accidentally discovered, Count Smoleff has frequently been called upon in sickness among the convicts, and always with success, his native talent for medicine being the one instinct that never wholly deserted him.

Now he sees what a blessing, what a godsend this is.

They are alone in a tunnel branching off of the main ones—alone for the first and, perhaps, the last time. He looks down in the white face, grand even in unconsciousness, and a great prayer goes up from his soul—a prayer that he may be allowed, through his great love, to save this woman from the snares and misery of the future. Applying a simple restorative, he finally has the great joy of seeing her come out of her swoon, and her great eyes unclose and look straight up into his, while through his frame courses a thrill of tremulous, hot delight. She remains motionless for a moment, then staggers to her feet; her manner is wild and a trifle unnatural.

"Why did you bring me back to life?" she cries. "Why did you not let me drift away, far away to the other world? Whatever it holds it cannot be equal to the anguish of the present."

He looks at her in a pity vast and neverdying.

"I could not do that, I dared not, though severely tempted," he says, mournfully.

Something in the low, sympathetic tones arouse her interest. Looking at him intently, she suddenly becomes aware of his majestic mien, his hair snow-white, his shrunken face, stamped with its grandeur and its strength, deeply lined with the mark of tedious years. For a minute she loses sight of her own wretchedness in a boundless pity for this man with his stricken life.

"Ah?" she says, bitterly, "the curse is upon you, too! I presume you are an exile, or rather convict?" Oh! the mad, bitter scorn in her tone!

He bows in that old, grave, courteous dignity that asserts itself now that he is thrown with his equal.

"Yes," he says, simply, "I am an exile."

"And for how long?"

He raises his head, and across his face flashes a sudden look of inestimable bitterness.

"I have lost the count of time," he says, "yet I think it must be between ten and fifteen years. But, estimated by the pangs I have suffered—the weary, endless torture—it has been a century since I was torn from life and thrust out into this living death."

She shudders as she listens, and notes the hollow, sunken face, the white hair, the stooped shoulders, the hands, worn and seamed with toil. And this is the fate for her! She must grow old and gray and haggard like a worn-out brute. In her languid eyes gather a terror and agony too great for words.

"You see yours is not the only bitter lot, madame," says the noble, sadly, "though I would gladly save you if I could."

"But were you innocent?" she cries, passionately. "Did they do as heinous a wrong in condemning you as if they had taken a young child and sent it out to exile?"

"Yes, I was innocent," he replies, and, unconsciously, his voice gathers sternness as he recounts past wrongs. "I was a true patriot of my country and a favorite of my Emperor. Yet, in a moment, when I thought destruction furthest from me, I was accused of treachery, seized, tried and condemned. And my offense? I transgressed a rule of the royal palace by interpreting the language of a Polish visitor to my Empress."

Maize starts convulsively and raises her hand to her brow. Where has she heard this history before? She struggles desperately with her memory, then, while a swift pallor settles upon her face, recollection does its duty. Though many years have since passed, she remembers that day at Brighton, when, to Jack and Gypsy, the Russian Ambassador related the circumstance of the sentence of his friend.

"Did you once know Count Tuboskie?" she inquires, while the ashen hue of her countenance deepens.

"Yes," replies the noble, in surprise. "He was my dearest friend, and left no means untried to save me. But, pardon me, did you know him?"

Over her straight and perfect lips flits a bitter, scoffing smile.

"Yes," she says, "I knew him. He is my deadliest foe. He sent me here to this endless torture."

Her companion looks dazed and bewildered.

"I can't see how it was possible," he mutters. "Raoul was so just, so honorable. And you"—he looks at the lovely, bitter face, the steady eyes, the lofty brow—"I know you are innocent."

"Yes; I was innocent, but it pleased him to believe me guilty. And he tore me from everything that I held dear. He slew me more cruelly than if he had spilled my blood, for he killed my soul, my spirit, everything that was life, save my body. He sent me forth to this life that I must henceforth lead. Oh! why did you bring me back to it? Why did you not save me while yet there was time? Oh, God! if you had sent me away, far ever away from the horror, the agony of this wretched existence." She lifts her face with its passionate misery, its blanched loveliness, and, unconscious of her actions in her excitement, her clinched hands fall upon his broad chest. Over his noble face sweeps a hot flush, and throughout his massive, gaunt form rushes a tremulous shudder. But he never touches them—those two small, frail hands—he only looks steadfastly in her eyes, while his own grow strong and brave and resolute.

"I dared not let you die, though, as I say, I was strongly tempted to kill you, so that you might not drink the cup that I have drained to the dregs. But I will save you. By all the pangs that I have suffered in the past I swear that you shall not drag out your life in the gloom and misery of the mines."

She shakes her head mournfully.

"I owe you many thanks for your interest, but it cannot be done," she says, wearily.

"It can, it shall be done!" he says, passionately. "But I hear some one coming. Do not forget my words, and, above all, do not despair. I swear that I will save you!"

In another moment the officer returns.

"Ah, miladie!"—even in this rough, brutal officer is forced respect for the girl—"you are better. I am glad to see it. The doctor is absent. No. 3,671, you may return to your work." The noble bows and, turning wearily, leaves the spot. "You, miladie, if you are still faint, had better remain here and rest."

"I feel quite strong, thank you, and will return. It was only a sudden faintness." And she goes back to the women.

CHAPTER XXXIX.—MADAME'S STORY.

IT is Lady Jet's study hour. In one of her apartments sits the young peeress and Madame Polleskie, who lives but a short distance from the count's mansion. Madame is a tall, slender lady, with a sallow and rather cold face, a highly intellectual brow, and large, black, deep-set eyes. There is silence in that chamber of sybaritic ease, while Lady Jet sits with her book held listlessly in hand, and Nick kicks up his heels in a corner, always allowed to remain during these educational exercises in the hope that he, too, may glean some stray bit of enlightenment. He is now entertaining his companions with a doleful scraping of his heels upon a chair-rung, which sends forth such harrowing, blood-curdling sounds that Madame Polleskie is but a few degrees removed from insanity.

"Nick!" at last screams Lady Jet, who, between her struggles with a difficult Latin root, and her own individual and secret troubles, is in anything but a placid frame of mind. "Nick, if you don't stop that, I'll—I'll throw you out of the window—you little wretch!" glancing furiously at him. But Nick, impervious to threats, calmly proceeds with his cheerful employment, without the slightest sign of abatement.

"Nick!" shrieks her ladyship, clapping two small hands to her ears, as a particularly melancholy wail proceeds from the chair, "will you behave yourself?"

Nick, prostrate upon his back and gazing meditatively at the ceiling, makes no response beyond another dismal groan—startlingly like a human cry—from the chair-rung.

"I give you," says Lady Jet, in a sudden, desperate calm, "one minute to get out of this room. If you are not gone by that time——" She leaves to his imagination the direful consequences of his disobedience, and Nick, leering upon the floor, is not, however, rash enough to brave that wild menace, and just as the minute expires, and Lady Jet rises threateningly to her feet, he leaps up and takes himself off.

After his departure a dead silence falls upon the two women. Her ladyship is not at all disposed to study, and her glance, seldom resting upon her book, falls more frequently than anywhere else upon the colorless face of her companion. Looking at her steadily, Lady Jet sees that madame is even paler than usual, and that in her dark eyes is a restless, feverish fire, while the straight, delicate brows are drawn together as though in pain.

"Madame," says the girl, impulsively, at last compelled to speak, "you are not well; you are suffering."

"I have a slight headache, that is all," is the weary reply.

"Let me bathe your temples," says Lady Jet, and, getting a cut-glass bottle of rare perfume, she commences to moisten her teacher's brow. To her anxiety she sees that the flesh is dry and burning, and that her temples throb heavily.

"You are sick!" she cries, in alarm. "Let me send for the doctor or your husband."

At that name the sensitive mouth of madame quivers—that delicate mouth usually drawn in cold lines and which is all of beauty that she can be said to possess—and throwing out her hand convulsively, she half-springs to her feet.

"No, no!" she cries, "not him—don't send for him!" Then, seeing Lady Jet's look of astonishment, she makes a desperate effort to control herself. "It would not be worth while to disturb him at his office. I am quite well."

"Dear madame," and the girl bends caressingly above the straight, rigid form of the woman, "I know you are not well. You are suffering in your mind or heart. You look just as I feel when I am in trouble. Won't you let me sympathize with you?"

The gentle, loving tones unnerve madame. Her cold, icy, repressed nature gives way, and, bending her head upon her companion's shoulder, a flood of tears rushes to her eyes and fierce sobs shake her slender form. Lady Jet is appalled. Never before has she seen anything like weakness in this cold, dignified, silent woman.

"Is there anything I can do for you?" she murmurs, viewing the dark head upon her shoulder in sorrowful perplexity. "Because if there is, you know how willingly I would do it."

"There is nothing, thank you—nothing at all," replies madame. "Oh, I am so wretched!"

"Perhaps, if you were to tell me," suggests Lady Jet, dubiously, "it might relieve you."

Her companion sits suddenly erect.

"It will not relieve me," she says, "but—but—" looking wistfully at the young girl, "you may possibly aid me."

"If it is possible, most assuredly I will," assents Lady Jet, eagerly.

Then Madame Polleskie narrates the secret trouble which has for weeks been gnawing at her heart, and which has broken down the icy barriers of her nature, and caused her to crave sympathy and companionship.

"I will begin at the beginning," she says, while her eyes are unnaturally bright. "When I married my husband we lived in Moscow with my parents and sisters. By nature our race are cold and undemonstrative, even where we love; but no one ever heard of a Scholsky being faithless to any tie that claimed them. I loved my husband with all my heart and soul, blindly, foolishly, else, perhaps, I had not married one so much my junior. Whether Rudolph loved me I cannot say; he always treated me with respect and consideration. But I—I worshiped him! I do yet. Oh, my husband, my husband!" The words break from the speaker in a wail, showing how intense is her suffering. "We lived for some time in Moscow," she continues, growing calmer, "and then Rudolph, who is young and ambitious, wanted to accept this good opening offered him by your father, who was a friend of Baron Polleskie, my father-in-law. Without a murmur I consented, and followed him here to this distant land. It was nothing to me where I went so that I was but with him. Quiet and cold as I have seemed, child, I have worshiped my husband, and been happier in this forlorn spot than I have ever been in my life. When we were in Russia I sometimes pined for more than was in Rudolph's heart to give me. Seeing the love-like attention with which some husbands treated their wives, I yearned for such tenderness from mine. But here I have had no such companions to make me unhappy and envious. I have been happy, wildly, superlatively happy, until a few weeks ago."

"And then?" cries Lady Jet, highly interested in this poor little romance.

"And then a serpent came into my Eden," says madame, bitterly. "Though Rudolph may not have loved me in the past, I still had the consolation of knowing that his heart was no other's. Now that comfort is taken from me. I know that my husband loves another with that deep, passionate, intense nature of his race. Oh, my God! it kills me! I was mad to marry him—mad! mad!"

"But who was it?" gasps Lady Jet. "Who in the world has dared to tamper with your happiness?"

The shame and misery in the lady's face deepens.

"No one," she says, lowly, "who is responsible for it. It is the beautiful Greek woman who has unconsciously stolen my husband's heart—that lovely exile, the angel-faced murderess."

"Great heavens!" ejaculates Lady Jet; and then upon her flashes the recollection of the secretary's intense, though suppressed, admiration when he first beheld this woman, and her own apprehensions for the future.

"But you surely don't suspect her of leading him on?" she continues, after a pause. "I wouldn't believe evil of a woman with such a face as hers. Papa says some great injury has been done her—some great mistake made. Even he believes her innocent."

"I don't know about that," says madame, wearily. "They say she committed a great murder; however, that is nothing to me. I know that she is innocent of any desire to lead my husband from me—that she is entirely ignorant of his passion for her. She scarcely knows that he is in existence. But it is not so with him. Oh, no!"

"But how do you know this?" urges Lady Jet, in vain hope.

"I have watched him," replies madame, relapsing into a sort of stolcal despair. "I and my housemaid. He never used to visit the mines; now he goes there upon every available occasion and upon every pretense. He has stood for hours in dark niches never moving, scarcely seeming to live, but with his eyes, dark and fierce and fiery, fixed upon the woman. Oh, I know how he looks, and he never looked thus at me! But how can I blame him! She is so grand, so divinely beautiful; she looks like a sovereign with her shining hair and her great, lustrous eyes. The people in the mines have already grown to worship her. She is grand and haughty to the officers, but to the exiles she is a saint. She cases the weary and helps the women when they are nearly fainting with toil, and though she has been there nearly three months no one has ever seen her smile, or heard her lips utter a word save in answer, and her eyes are always dark and bitter and passionate. Oh, she is beautiful—beautiful—with that soft, dazzling, ravishing loveliness that men sell their souls for! I don't think I blame either of them, I only suffer!"

Lady Jet has listened in sorrow and regret. Ah! love—love! what a taskmaster, what a tyrant you are! How many can say with that wounded, loving heart, "I only suffer!" Thus thinks Lady Jet as she watches the thin, convulsed, sallow face, the locked hands, the quivering breast.

"And I pity her," continues madame, rising and pacing the floor excitedly. "I pity her, because," shuddering, "she is entirely in Rudolph's power, and if he loves her as I know he does, he will go mad and stop at no obstacle that keeps her from him. He would have her if he took her over every heart in the universe. Ah, Rudolph is so strong, so resolute. Never in my life have I seen him angered, yet he conquers all things. He never yields a hair's-breadth!"

"Oh, it is dreadful—dreadful!" exclaims Lady Jet. "What can we do? And yet I know that she would never listen to him. She is too grand and true!"

"I don't know about that," says madame, wearily. "No one can ever tell of such things. I know that she is unconscious of his passion now, and that she has never as yet in any way attempted to attract him. But that is so much the worse. It drives him distracted; his eyes are always wild and unnatural, and nights when he is home he is silent and distraught and so utterly changed, while upon his face is always that deep flush. And he doesn't sleep. All night he tosses upon the bed, and sometimes when I waken I see him dressed standing by the window looking over to the mines."

"But," says Jet, brightening, "how do you know that it is so bad? He has never said so. And you, blinded by suspicion, may misconstrue his actions, and attribute every little thing at all unusual to his infatuation."

Madame shakes her head drearily.

"I wish I could think so, child; but I know too well that he loves her. Last night he fell asleep towards morning, and he talked continually, and always of her. 'She is a sorceress,' he cried once. 'She could drag me down to hell if she but loved me! Oh, honor! What is honor? I love her—I love her!'"

"It might have been you of whom he was talking," suggests Lady Jet, perfectly conscious that she is advancing a false hope.

Madame stops in her rapid walk and stares at the girl; then a laugh that holds but little of mirth breaks from her.

"Me?" she says, bitterly. "Heaven, what an idea! Before this he has lain like a log and slept, and I might have died a hundred times and he not known. I drag him down to purgatory!"—again that hollow, bitter laugh. "Why, child, never to save my life, if his mind was once set, could I have induced him to turn one step from his path. I could no more change the wind. He is hard, resolute, unconquerable, and it is that sort of men that always goes mad over the white loveliness of a woman—that would sell his soul for her kiss."

The girl shudders.

"And he can hate," she murmurs, involuntarily.

"Hate!" cries madame. "Oh, child, yes—with the venom of a Pagan. With such a mad, desperate love as his, hate is but one degree removed. If she scorn and repulse him I shudder for her."

"What shall we do?" cries the girl, in pity and alarm. Her whole soul cries out in horror at that proud, grand, fearless womanhood being at the mercy of this wild passion that she has unconsciously enkindled. "If she repulse him," she continues; "she will repulse him. Papa knows her entire history through letters from Russia. Why, she is a born Greek, and the legally adopted daughter of one of the proudest of English earls. She has been reared like a sovereign. Some great calamity befell her—I don't quite know what—and she was exiled. Oh, it is horrible—horrible! Every day I grow to loath my country more and more for such tyranny and injustice. Think of the delicate and high-bred women sent forth to exile, always through the despotism of the Government. It kills me when I think how tenderly they have been nurtured—how jealously guarded by husbands, lovers and fathers, and only to sink to the shame and degradation of the mines—nothing to protect them from the human brutes that have control of them. When I think of the curse this land has been to poor, helpless victims—of the anguish and bitterness it has seen—of the unavailing tears that have been shed—I wonder that God does not blot out Siberia from existence, does not sweep it away in wrath and condemnation?" As her passionate utterance dies away there is intense silence in the chamber. Finally madame rises, wearily, and commences gathering up her books. For all the trouble, national and individual, there is no hope.

CHAPTER XL.—POLLESKIE'S FIRST STEP.

POLLESKIE is alone in the office. Suddenly his solitude is disturbed by the entrance of the count, holding in his hand an open letter.

"It is concerning the Greek lady," he says.

The secretary starts sharply, then continues with his writing.

"And what of her?" he inquires, carelessly.

The count does not reply directly, but tosses the letter to Polleskie, saying:

Digitized by Google

"It is a curiosity in a sense—it is from the great politician, Count Toboskie."

A jealous, savage gleam shoots into the secretary's eyes.

"And what does he say?" he queries.

"He writes to recommend the lady to our leniency. He says it was merely circumstantial evidence that convicted her, and begs me to take her in my household. He speaks of her high attainments as making her particularly fitted for a companion for my daughter. But, of course, this I could never consent to do. I pity and respect the lady, and regard her fully as my equal. But while there is a doubt of her innocence I would not consent to her mingling with my family. Toboskie writes very strongly, and it would be good policy to conciliate so powerful a statesman, but I can't accept his proposition, though, as I say, he writes urgently, almost imperatively.

"And I can explain his reason for so doing," says the secretary, a tinge of excitement in his manner. "I have written to a friend of mine in St. Petersburg and got all the particulars of this remarkable case. Count Toboskie was in love with the young lady, and made no effort to conceal his infatuation. He was her constant attendant. But when, through a long line of circumstantial evidence, this murder was fastened upon her, he deserted her, believing, he affirmed, her guilty. I suppose now his conscience accuses him, and he is using his influence in her behalf."

"And yet I do not feel willing to take her in my family," observes the count after a pause, and much surprised at her history.

Polleskie resumes his pen, but his eyes glisten as he speaks, though his tones and words are careless.

"If you are disposed to aid the young lady, I have long thought that we require an assistant here in the office; some days I am overrushed with writing. If you approve of it, why not have her here in the office?"

"The very thing!" cries the count, eagerly. "Why did I not think of it myself?"

Polleskie lays down his pen: his manner is thoroughly composed, though around his mouth a certain fine muscle quivers convulsively.

"Then, suppose I inform her of our decision? She has been now three months in the mines, a horrible siege to one reared like her."

"Go immediately."

A few minutes later sees the secretary in the mines. A short distance off he sees the woman of his mad passion, apparently utterly lost to her surroundings. She kneels upon the rocky floor with a large gang of female convicts, washing the metal that another group assorts. He stands for a moment watching her, and slowly upwards over his dark face rushes that deep crimson tide of much passion.

He believes himself unnoticed, but not so. That grand and abiding love that encompasses the stricken girl around and about is ever on the alert. And where he toils in the hard rock, the exiled noble has never once lost sight of this man on his many visits to the mines. His God-like intellect once more re-enthroned, he reads like a book the soul of his rival, and sees there its desperate purpose, the same as in his eyes he reads the lust and passion enkindled by the divine splendor of this woman.

He sees him now as he stands there in that steady, passionate glance, and in the soul of the fallen noble pierces an anguish that has never touched him through all those weary years of exile. He knows that the whole nature of Polleskie has gone over to the object of his sudden attachment, and is entirely engrossed with the desperate purpose of securing her for himself. He sees that the girl is unconscious of her peril which is intensified thereby. Looking ahead, he sees nothing in the world where by the honor and proud purity of his idol can be saved. Filled with the passion, the fire, the haughty instincts of his race, this agony of torture and anxiety wellnigh maddens him. He must stand by silent and helpless, while the woman of his great and boundless love is betrayed to her everlasting shame—and he of that race that have spilled blood like water for insults merely offered to the name of the woman of their choice! Not until this moment has he drunk to the dregs the cup of bitterness pressed upon him. "Oh, my God!" he pants, while his eyes, angry and lurid like a wild brute's, fasten upon the unconscious secretary. "Oh, my God! if I could only warn her, or if I could only lay my hand upon that villain, how quickly I would wring out his dastardly life!"

In the meantime Polleskie approaches Maize, and stands with uncovered head before her. Count Smoloff sees the quick start of surprise with which she observes him, and in the short distance that is between them he even hears her calm, haughty voice:

"You have business with me?"

"I have, madame," replies Polleskie, bowing as if she were an empress. "Count Zickwoff offers you a position in the office as assistant secretary."

A hand of ice grips the noble's vitals at those words, and he sees how adroitly, yet unsuspiciously, the trap is laid to lead the girl to her ruin.

Her great, dark eyes flash up at the secretary in a sweeping glance.

"I want no charity," she says, and her voice has a hard, cold ring. "If this position is offered through pity, I decline it absolutely."

"It is not offered through charity," replies the calm voice of Polleskie, he knows so well the haughty, intolerant nature with which he has to deal. "We have more work than we can attend to; we must have an assistant. Our choice of material is not broad here. We have been looking around and find, madame, that you are the best suited to fill the position of any who are available."

She looks down at her delicate hands, seamed and blistered with handling the metal, and as she hesitates, the look, hunted and agonized, in Count Smoloff's eyes is intense enough to warn her of her peril. Still she is unconscious of it.

"It would be madness," she says, at last, "to refuse this offer. Anything for a change in this horrible monotony would be a blessing. This position you offer is a luxury. I will accept it."

In the noble's throat breaks a great, hoarse cry. She is going from him—beyond his protecting and watchful love—and, worst of all, to shame and dishonor. His hands clinch; upon his brow stands the dank dew of anguish. Yet with all his love he is powerless to save her. As she passes him a few minutes later by Polleskie's side, she looks at him in that sweet, silent communion that has come between them, and starts as she meets his agonized eyes, eloquent with danger and warning. It shows her that he fears for her, and arouses a vague apprehension in her own soul. But she has gone too far to recede now, and, with one backward farewell glance, she follows her companion to the shaft.

(To be continued.)

The Irish Constabulary.

In Ireland the parish constables disappeared in the reign of George III., and were replaced by constables appointed by the justices, sixteen being appointed for each barony and Protestantism being a necessary qualification. In the time of William IV. these were in turn swept away, and the Irish constabulary force was raised. By this act the independent appointment of constables by county justices was put an end to, and all candidates were appointed through provincial depots. With the difference that the provincial depots were soon afterwards concentrated in one central depot in Dublin, that regulation remains in force up to the present time. The candidate for the Irish constabulary must be over five feet nine inches high, and between the ages of eighteen and twenty three. He must be recommended by a magistrate or an officer of constabulary, who is supposed to vouch for his character. He is then examined by the county inspector in reading, writing from dictation, and the elementary rules of arithmetic, and his papers are sent to the commandant of the depot in Phœnix Park. If he has made no mistake and his writing is satisfactory, he is entered among the candidates of the first class. If he makes even one mistake he takes his place with the second: and as the list of first-class candidates must be exhausted before the candidates from the second-class are called up for medical examination, and there are generally over five hundred names on that list, the man who is not perfect in his examination has very little chance of becoming a sub-constable. In the meantime, inquiry has been made into the character and position of the family of the successful candidate, and if that is satisfactory he is in due course called up to Dublin, where, having undergone a medical examination, he is taken on the strength of the depot and begins his police training. His life in the depot, so far as his drill is concerned, is exactly the same as the life of a recruit with his regiment for the first six months, in which time he has generally gone through the three squads and been drilled in the battalion, besides going through a course of musketry.

Every day the constable is obliged to attend school for an hour, however proficient he may have been found when he offered to join the force; moreover, three times a week he has to attend a school for a couple of hours, where instruction is given to him in his police duties. His powers under various statutes are explained to him by the detective instructor, and he is taught the proper mode of action in the prevention or detection of particular crimes. He thus joins whatever county force he may be appointed to with a better preparatory training than that of any police in the world. He may be sent to any part of Ireland except his native county, in which he can never serve. But he frequently applies to be quartered in an adjacent county, and his request is never refused. Arrived at his station, he is paraded with the other men each morning, the constable inspecting his arms and appointments. The entire party are interrogated as to their knowledge of the descriptions of criminals in the "Hue and Cry," and every day questions are asked as to their general duties. Once out of the depot the men receive no instruction in drill, except when an opportunity offers by a number being brought together for duty at fairs and so forth. In the daytime, when on duty, the Irish policeman carries no weapon but his staff, except in a few districts, where men armed with staves alone would not be safe. Here they carry their short swords. Two men are sent together on every duty. This arrangement is necessary for the safety of the men and for corroboration of evidence. For it must be remembered that while in England a constable has the people at his back, in Ireland it is quite different, and, unfortunately, any amount of evidence necessary for the contradiction of one policeman would be readily forthcoming. At night the constables are armed with rifles and swords. Without these arms they would be about as effective for the prevention of outrage as a body of cripples, and without their drill they would be at best an armed mob. Even with their discipline, their steadiness and courage, they sometimes find an Irish mob whose passions are roused very dangerous to them. Long before the revolver came in as a common weapon, a party of thirty-six armed policemen were killed to a man at Carrickshock by a crowd to whom they refused to deliver up a tithe-proctor. The Nationalists are right in attacking the armament of the police. Had they not been armed and disciplined in the late process-serving campaign, where in places they found themselves confronted by thousands of angry men armed with pitchforks and scythes, the West of Ireland would be at this moment in confusion, to say the least. Few know how nearly there was a bloody engagement when in Connemara fifty constables marched into a circular hollow filled with two thousand furious peasants to protect a bailiff in posting a notice on the door of a house in the centre. Had not the flanking detachments of constabulary charged the crowds with the bayonet and taken possession of the hills commanding the little glen, the fifty men would never have left the spot. The Irish constabulary could be concentrated in twelve battalions in twenty-four hours.

A Conflict of Authority in Norway.

A new conflict has arisen in Norway between the Royal Government and the Representative Assembly, and the point at issue is again the question whether, in the Norwegian Constitution, the King or the Storthing forms the real centre of power. In its sitting of June 19th the Storthing appointed a committee to draw up a plan for a new army organization, and voted that this committee should continue in activity after the close of the regular session. The measure is a little extraordinary, according to the parliamentary usage in Norway; but there is a good, practical reason for it, as the Storthing cannot sit for more than two months without a special permission from the King, and the pressure of business generally is so heavy that no committee could finish so comprehensive a work as a new army organization during a regular session. Nevertheless, the Government chose to denounce this measure as unconstitutional. It forbade the committee to hold its meetings in the official committee-rooms of the Storthing; it refused to pay its expenses, to grant those of the members who were Royal officers a permit of absence, to allow any intercommunication with its own office: in short, it refused to recognise the legal existence of the committee. Not that it overlooked the practical value of the measure. On the contrary, it immediately appointed a committee itself, and invited all the members of the committee of the Storthing to join it. But it denies that the Storthing, which cannot sit beyond its legal term without a special permission from the King, can appoint a committee which is exempt from this restriction, and it considers the measure an actual encroachment upon the royal prerogatives, and a most dangerous precedent, as it assumes that the Storthing could elude the King's right to close its session by constituting itself a committee. Meanwhile, the members of the committee of the Storthing have declined to accept the invitation of the Government. They will sit on the commission of the Storthing, and they will not sit on the commission of the King; and in this resolution they are almost unanimously supported by the Norwegian press, whose articles evince a fury as if its editors had smelt gunpowder.

Interesting British Statistics.

Ireland has decreased in population since 1865 more than a quarter of a million, and the marriages have decreased by 6,000. In the same time the population of the United Kingdom has increased from 29,801,908 to 34,569,043. While pauperism has decreased in England and Wales from 971,000 to 847,000, and in Scotland from 121,000 to 97,000, the returns for Ireland show an increase from 69,000 to 100,000. In criminal returns, Scotland, with a little more than three millions of population in 1865, furnished 2,353 convictions for serious offenses, and in 1879, with half a million more possible offenders, 2,060. In Ireland, with a diminished population, the convictions were respectively 2,661 and 2,207. Ireland is thus proportionately far less criminally disposed—at least as far as serious crime is concerned—than Scotland, if we are to judge by the number of convictions. But, on the other hand, out of 2,669 persons committed for trial in Scotland, 2,060 were convicted; while in Ireland the proportion is 4,363 to 2,207. This contrast, we can scarcely doubt, points to a great evil in the political state of Ireland. As to the other indications of progress in civilisation it may be noted that whereas, taking an average, each inhabitant of England and Wales received 28 letters in 1868, 37 in 1879, in Ireland the increase is from 20 to 14; while the average receipt of newspapers is 10 per head for England and Wales, and only 5 for Ireland. The money in savings banks averages about £10 50 per head in the United Kingdom, and about £4 in Ireland; while there can be little doubt that a comparison of the accounts of friendly societies and other forms of providence would be equally unfavorable to Ireland.

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

It is Estimated that about 500,000,000,000 tons of sediment are yearly carried to the Gulf of Mexico by the Mississippi River.

The Ancient Black Glass of the Venetians is now so closely imitated as to defy detection. The process is to use a mixture of sand and sulphur, with an addition of fifteen per cent. of manganese.

Statistics of English Mortality show that during the last thirty years more women have reached the age of seventy-five or eighty years than men. The latter suffer more from lung, heart and kidney diseases, which have of late been on the increase in England.

The Papyrus Manuscript recently discovered in the cave of a hermit near Jerusalem, and said to be the work of St. Peter, has been submitted to a committee sent out by the Biblical Society of London, and they have come to the conclusion that the papyrus is in reality the work of the great apostle. They have offered $100,000 for the document in vain.

In the Course of Inquiries as to the phosphorescence of the sea, a German naturalist has discovered that the phenomenon occurs whenever sea fishes are brought into three per cent. salt solution. The luminous aspect begins in the eyes, spreads over the whole body, and increases each day. The phosphorescent substance is a kind of mucus, which is white by day and shines in the dark.

The Entire Absence of Scurvy during the voyage of the Vega is attributed by Professor Nordenskjöld to the free use of a little berry that springs out of the ice and snow during the Summer. It bears profusely, and has a taste like the raspberry, but more acid. The fruit is dried and mixed with the milk of the reindeer, and can be carried in a frozen state for thousands of miles.

The Following Substances have been sanctioned by the Public Health Department of Germany for use in confectionary and other edibles as non-poisonous coloring matter: Flour and starch for white; cochineal, carmine, madder-red, and the juice of carrots and cherries for red; saffron, safflower and turmeric for yellow; indigo and litmus for blue; the juice of spinach and mixtures of the already-mentioned blues and yellows for green; burned sugar and Spanish juice for brown, and India ink for black.

News has been received from the French expedition which started up the Niger on the 4th of April last, under Captain Gallieni, with two doctors, two lieutenants, and a number of Senegal men. On the 11th of May, near the village of Dio, in the Barbara country, the expedition was attacked by a thousand natives. After several hours' fighting, Captain Gallieni retired, with the loss of fourteen killed and eleven wounded. All the baggage was lost. The expedition was refitted and started again by another route.

On the Slopes of Amethyst Mountain, in the Yellowstone Park, are exposed at different levels a large number of silicified trees, many being rooted in the position in which they grew, and from twenty to thirty feet in height. Some lying down are of immense size. The series of sandstone and conglomerates in which the trees are imbedded is more than 5,000 feet thick, forming a vertical mile of fossil forests. The woody structure is well preserved. Where cavities have been formed by the rotting of the wood they are filled with crystals of amethyst and quartz.

The Corporation of Swansea, Eng., have spent some $250,000 on a scheme for disposing of the sewage of part of the borough by discharging it into the river Tawy; but the work, although almost complete, is useless, as the Duke of Beaufort has warned the corporation against proceeding further, and has threatened them with an injunction if they disregard his mandate. The Dukes of Beaufort have for hundreds of years exercised proprietary rights of quite a unique nature over the beds of certain Welsh rivers, the duke, in point of fact, owning the beds, although he has no property on the banks.

M. Lambrigot, a Frenchman, who invented a cheap form of phonograph, proposes to use steamers for receiving the impressions of the voice, and to take electrotypes of the phonograms so produced, which, being not only cheap but very durable, may be employed in schools and by private students as a means of acquiring the correct pronunciation of a language. M. Lambrigot invented what was called the "sixpenny phonograph," and an electrotype containing a long passage from Molière or Goethe, or a specimen of Hindostanee or Chinese, could be sold at a very low price, so that the schools in the future may possibly be supplied with a teaching-machine of far more real utility than the pronouncing dictionary.

PERSONAL GOSSIP.

Professor Tyndall has spent the Summer rambling on the Alps.

The Middlesex Club of Boston will give a banquet to General Grant, October 13th.

A Paris correspondent announces that Sara Bernhardt will start for America on October 4th.

Rev. W. T. Brooks, of West Haven, Conn., has been appointed president of the collegiate institute at Austin, Texas.

Secretary Schurz has returned to Washington after an absence of eight weeks, during which he visited the Indian country and the Western frontier.

Prof. Rev. Francis L. Patton, President of the Chicago Theological Seminary, has accepted the professorship in the Princeton Theological Seminary which was endowed by A. T. Stewart.

Marie Roze, the celebrated prima donna, sailed from Liverpool last week for New York to fill her professional engagement with Mr. Strakosch. She is accompanied by her husband, Mr. Henry Mapleson.

It is reported that the Right Hon. Henry Fawcett, Postmaster-General, will, if he can find time, pay a short visit to New York this Autumn for the purpose of studying the American telegraphic system.

Miss Isabel Thora Lublin has just successfully passed the Oxford local examination held at the University of London. She is the first English girl entirely educated on the Kindergarten system, who has passed.

George A. Smyth, Professor of Chemistry and Physics in the University of Vermont for several years past, has been appointed to a place in the service of the National Board of Health. Professor Saida, of Ripon College, takes his place.

Police Justice Nelson K. Wheeler, of this city, died of heart disease, September 21st, at his farm in Deposit, Delaware County, N. Y. Justice Wheeler was in his seventy-third year, but was still possessed of so vigorous a constitution that he seemed much younger.

William Thompson, who has resigned the Hebrew professorship of the Hartford (Conn.) Theological Seminary, will remain Dean of the Faculty, and have some select branch of his favorite department as a topic for lectures. He has been for forty-eight years a member of the faculty.

At the annual reunion of the old settlers of Texas at Denton, the procession was headed by George Morris, who located in Texas fifty-six years ago, and has lived in the State under the Crown of Spain, Republic of Mexico, dictatorship of Santa Anna, Republic of Texas, United States, Confederate States and again the United States.

Field-Marshal Count von Moltke has been presented with the freedom of the City of Cologne, and, in addition to this honor, he has been informed by the town council that his statue is to be erected in their ancient town in the course of the next year, as a pendant to the bronze memorial of Prince Bismarck, his rival in fame.

The new commander of the Russian Guards, the Grand Duke Vladimir, is the second living son of the Czar. He was born in 1847, and married in 1874 the Duchess Marie, daughter of the Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin. He is not a particularly clever prince, but he is very amiable, and has none of the vices which rendered his uncle Nicholas so odious.

The statue of M. Thiers was unveiled on September 30th at St. Germain, Paris, in the presence of a large crowd. M. Jules Simon delivered the address. M. Olivier Pain, the Radical journalist, protested vehemently, amidst a scene of great excitement, against the erection of the statue. He was arrested by a gendarme in order to protect him from the violence of the crowd.

Professor Malcom McVicar, Ph.D., LL.D., at present Principal of the Potsdam Normal and Farming School, New York, has been elected as Principal of the Michigan State Normal School, to succeed Professor Estabrook, lately resigned. He enters upon his duties about November 1st. Professor McVicar has the reputation of being a successful educator. His salary will be $3,000.

A young Japanese lady of sixteen, Miss Mineé Yebi, daughter of an official in the Emperor's household, has arrived in the East in San Francisco. She is a graduate of the English school in Tokio, and will remain three years in America to perfect her education. She is a poet and a landscape painter, and is described as being extremely petite. She has a light complexion, fascinating black eyes, and a bright, cheerful countenance.

The will of the late Marshal O. Roberts bequeaths to the Ladies' Christian Union, $1,000; to the American Bible Society, $2,000; to the Young Women's Christian Association, $1,000; to the Sheltering Arms, $2,000; to the American Tract Society, $2,000; and to Calvary Church, $2,000, with a request that it be applied especially to the support and maintenance of the chapel attached to the church. Mr. Roberts's estate is valued at $8,000,000.

It is currently reported in St. Petersburg that the Czar of all the Russias was married a fortnight ago in the presence of three witnesses, the two Russian Ministers, and General Baranof, to the Princess Dolgorouky. The marriage is also said to have been made with the approval of the Czarewitz, who imposed the condition that until the abdication of the Czar all changes in the Ministry shall be submitted to his approval, and that no new appointments to office shall be made without his consent.

In addition to the noble castle on the Hradschin, overlooking Prague, Prince Rudolph and his bride will also have a residence in Vienna. The Belvidere Palace, which every traveler to the Danubian capital has visited, will soon be changed from a picture gallery into a royal abode, the old paintings to be transferred to the new museum opposite the Burg gates. The portfolio of views which members of the fashionable court circle have ordered for a royal wedding present will cost $60,000.

Jesse Grant, the third son of General U. S. Grant, and Miss Lizzie Chapman, daughter of W. S. Chapman, of San Francisco, were married, September 21st, in the latter city. The father of the bride is the wealthy capitalist whose bold and gigantic operations in real estate have been the subject of many newspaper articles in San Francisco. The married couple will visit General Grant at Galena, Illinois, and will then visit Philadelphia, where they will be entertained by George W. Childs. They will subsequently go to Boston, where a banquet is to be given to General Grant.

When Ouray was sick, there being several Indian medical men in attendance upon him, it was with the greatest difficulty that proper medicines could be administered by the three white physicians. Within thirty minutes from the time he died his body was wrapped in his blanket and robes, placed across a sad-dled horse and borne some five miles distant, to a secluded spot in the mountains and hid away in the crevices of the rocks. Five of his best horses were killed and his personal effects burned. Some of the Ute Commissioners desired to be allowed to accompany his remains to their final resting-place, but were refused, no white being allowed to witness their funeral ceremonies.

Digitized by Google

NEW JERSEY.—THE LATE HUDSON RIVER TUNNEL DISASTER AT JERSEY CITY—SEARCHING FOR THE BODIES OF THE VICTIMS.

NEW YORK CITY.—DEMOCRATIC DEMONSTRATION ON SEPTEMBER 23D—THE COOGAN LEGION PASSING TAMMANY HALL.

Digitized by Google

H. H. WARNER, FOUNDER OF THE WARNER OBSERVATORY.

the misfortune of a broken leg coming upon the subject of this sketch in his boyhood, rendered him of little use as a farmer, and was the means of his being sent to school, and thus receiving a better education than his brothers.

From his father he inherited a penchant for astronomy, which mature reading caused to develop into a life purpose. He constructed, with his own hands, his first telescope (a three-inch instrument), which was, not long afterwards, shattered by a careless servant, and which was succeeded by a four and one-half object glass. With this telescope he has made all his discoveries. He has discovered four comets (for three of which he has received valuable gold medals from the Court of Austria), and, at the total solar eclipse of July 29th, 1878, he had the good fortune to discover two new planets interior to Mercury's orbit.

In April, 1879, he was elected a Fellow of the Royal Astronomical Society of England. In the following June the University of Rochester conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. The present year the American Association for the Advancement of Science has added his name to its list of members.

Mr. H. H. Warner has been an indefatigable worker, though his studies have hitherto been pursued in the face of great difficulties; but the long lane seems at last to have a turning, and the pleasant vista of improved facilities stands just ahead. His reputation as an advanced astronomer has been gracefully recognized by the leading astronomers and astronomical societies of the Old World. While, with exceedingly limited facilities, the results of his "star-gazing" in the past have brought to him much honor, his future study in the projected Observatory will undoubtedly add immensely to his present distinction.

NEW RESERVOIR IN JERSEY CITY.

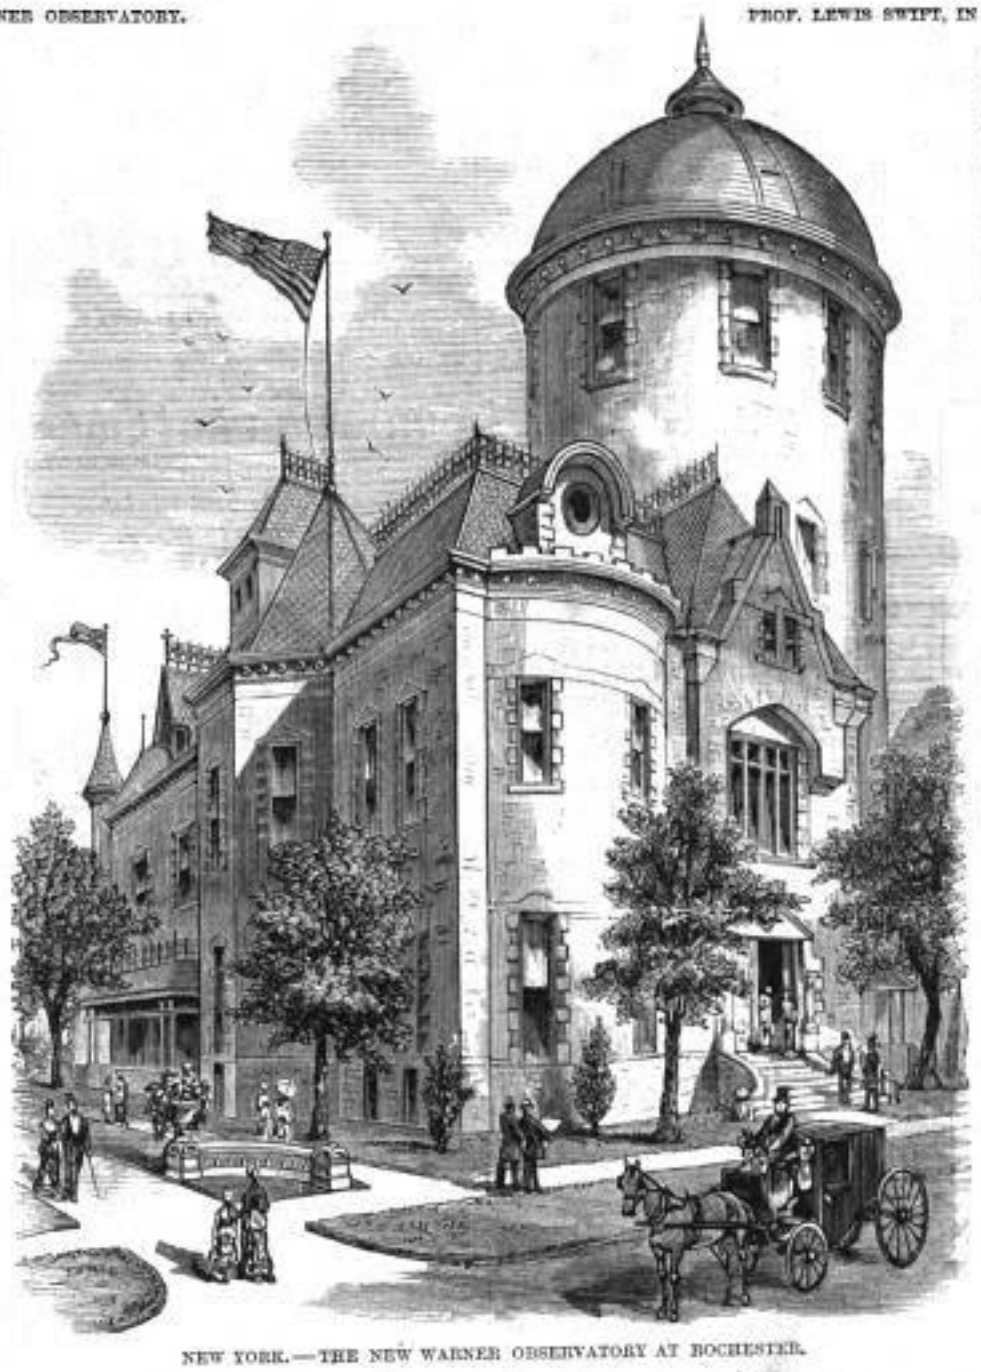
IN connection with the water-supply system of Jersey City a reservoir has just been completed, with a capacity of 70,000,000 gallons. The dimensions of the reservoir are as follows: 60 feet on the west side, 838 feet on Central Avenue, 752½ feet on Summit Avenue, and 802½ feet on Jefferson Avenue. It has cost over $600,000. Some fear has been felt that the walls are not sufficiently strong to stand the pressure to which they will be subjected, but there seems to be no ground for this apprehension. When the reservoir is full the water will, in some parts, be thirty feet deep. There will then be a pressure of fifteen tons to every square yard of bottom, and of about twenty tons to every square yard of sloping sidewall, the pressure on it bearing both downwards and outwards at the same time. On this page we give an illustration of the new reservoir.

PROF. LEWIS SWIFT, IN CHARGE OF THE WARNER OBSERVATORY.

THE WARNER OBSERVATORY IN ROCHESTER.

THE new Warner Observatory at Rochester, N. Y., which is under process of erection, will, both in design and finish, be far the finest private observatory in the world. It is being erected especially for Professor Lewis Swift, who will give his entire time to the work of the institution, although it will be devoted primarily to discovery rather than of record. Exclusive of the telescope, the building will cost over $50,000.

During the past fifty years American astronomers have made very great strides in the work of discovery. The separation of Biella's comet into two parts was first noted in this country. Professor Hall, of the Washington Observatory, was the discoverer of the two moons which accompany Mars — one of the finest achievements of the present century. In 1848 Professor Bond found the eighth satellite of Saturn, and in 1850 the transparent ring of Saturn, while Professors Watson and Swift discovered three intra-mercurial planets in 1878. In addition to these most notable discoveries, over one thousand double and triple stars—many of them the finest in the entire catalogue of these luminaries—more than fifty asteroids and fifteen comets have been brought to the attention of the world through the research and industry of American astronomers. This is a record of which this nation may well be proud.



The new telescope for the Warner Observatory will be twenty-two feet in length, with a lens sixteen inches in diameter, making it third in size of the telescopes now in use. It is to have some new appliances in its mountings, so that it will most readily sweep the heavens even to the horizon.

The general plan of the building is admirably arranged for the purpose intended, and includes, in addition to the residence, a large reception-room, library, experimenting-room, etc., while the tower is reached by a passenger elevator.

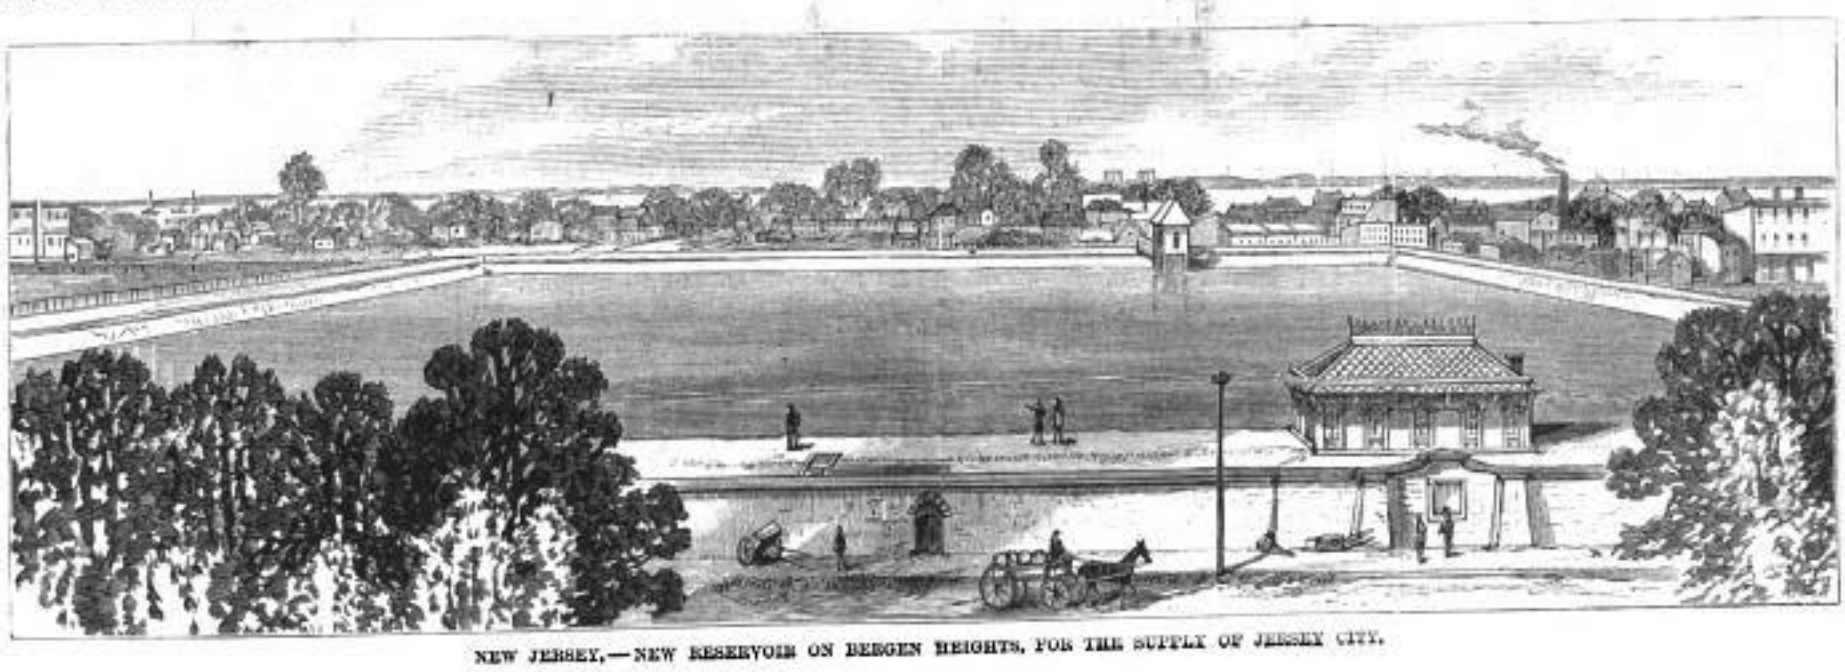
The locality of Rochester is not specially favorable for observing the heavens, as it is subject to frequent and often severe storms; but as Professor Swift has been able to discover four comets and two planets with a 4½ inch lens glass, there is good reason to expect very much in the near future from this point of observation.

Mr. H. H. Warner, the founder of the Rochester Astronomical Observatory, is but yet thirty-nine years of age, and belongs to that prominent American class known as "self-made men." His large fortune has been accumulated in the past eleven years through an extensive business. Mr. Warner's most prominent personal characteristic is energetic enterprise, and everything he undertakes is prosecuted with an indomitable "push," such as is seen nowhere but in America. He endowed the observatory and has placed Professor Swift in charge in the same regal style with which he has carried forward his other enterprises, and the celestial bodies that are yet undiscovered will be compelled to hide carefully if they escape Professor Swift's wonderful telescope.

The distinguished astronomer, Professor Lewis Swift, was born in Clarkson, Monroe County, N. Y., and was one of a numerous family. His father, General Swift, was among its early settlers, and, like all pioneers, was forced to practice great economy. Settling on a farm, he shared its labors with his sons. But

NEW YORK.—THE NEW WARNER OBSERVATORY AT ROCHESTER.

RECOVERING THE BODIES FROM THE HUDSON RIVER TUNNEL.



FROM the 21st of July last, when the top of the temporary entrance to the Hudson River Tunnel at the Jersey City terminus caved in, the officers of the company have labored with great pertinacity to effect a recovery of the bodies of the twenty workmen then entombed. On Tuesday, September 22d, the workmen came upon the body of one of the victims, and on Thursday night it was recovered. At nightfall the workmen in the caisson reached the bent and twisted iron plates of the roof of the temporary entrance of the tunnel. The silt which covered them was taken off and blown out of the caisson by compressed air. After several hours of hard labor the bolts which held two of the plates together were severed and they were pried apart. In a cavity under the plates was found a body. It was in a kneeling position and badly decomposed, there being scarcely any flesh upon the bones, excepting upon the lower limbs. The skull was completely bare, and a few shreds of flesh clung to the cheek-bones. The body was lifted out and laid upon a board, the limbs being carefully straightened. It was then covered with stout sailcloth, and was lifted through the iron air-lock and carried into the engine-house near the caisson. By the clothing it was recognized as that of Peter Woodland, the foreman of the unfortunate gang.

The work of sinking the caisson is being pushed rapidly, and those in charge say they expect to find the bodies of the other buried workmen not far from the place where that of their foreman was discovered. About the tunnel, throughout the working-hours of every day, there is a throng waiting to see the bodies removed.

DEMOCRATIC MASS MEETING AND PARADE IN NEW YORK.

THE Democracy of New York City literally poured into the streets on Thursday evening, September 23d, to formally ratify the nomination of Hancock and English. There were ten meetings. Those held indoors were in Tammany Hall and Irving Hall. The outdoor gatherings were at Broadway and Fourteenth Street, Broadway and Fifteenth Street, Broadway and Sixteenth Street, Broadway and Seventeenth Street; Fourth Avenue, between Fourteenth and Fifteenth streets; Fourteenth Street, opposite Tammany Hall, and Fourteenth Street on either side of the entrance to Tammany Hall.

The procession began to move at half-past 9 o'clock. It was estimated that there were over 35,000 people in line. There were said to be 32,000

NEW JERSEY.—NEW RESERVOIR ON BERGEN HEIGHTS, FOR THE SUPPLY OF JERSEY CITY.

Digitized by Google

torches in the ranks. At midnight many organizations that had not been afforded an opportunity to march disbanded and went to their homes. The procession was composed of the various ward, assembly and congressional district clubs, and an endless variety of political associations. Congressman Muller's friends numbered 2,000, and were distributed among nineteen clubs, while the James J. Coogan legion, which stretched over a space of half a mile, showed 3 000 men in caps and capes, and 2,000 without uniform.

The review stand, a commodious platform erected on the eastern limit of Union Square, opposite Sixteenth Street, was filled soon after 8 o'clock. It had been reserved for members of the National and State Committees, invited guests and the judges of the parade. Among those who were upon it during the evening were Chairman W. H. Barnum, Speaker Randall, ex-Governor Randolph of New Jersey, Judge Mackey of South Carolina, Senator Beddleman of Pennsylvania, Senator Williams of Alabama, S. S. Cox, Senators Hill of Georgia, Garland of Arkansas and McPherson of New Jersey; Daniel P. Dougherty of Pennsylvania, Surrogate Calvin, Tax Commissioner John Wheeler, Edward Kearney, Fire Commissioners King and Gorman, Edward Cahill, Assemblyman Browning, Dr. Merkle, John O. O'Keeffe, and many others. The judges of the parade were General George W. Wingate, Colonel George D. Scott, Major P. N. Haverty, Colonel Anton Meier, and Colonel C. M. Clyphant.

It was 11 P. M. before the approach of a mass of torchlights told that the procession was at hand. Then for hour after hour the show was a moving and a novel one. Blue, white and red costumes were brought in sharp relief by the electric-lights and the torch-lights. Cheers were sent up again and again by the pro-cessionists as each division passed the stand, and the crowd, jammed in on all sides, was always ready to meet the oft-repeated call for three cheers for Hancock. At midnight only a small portion of the line had worked its way slowly by the grand stand.

In Tammany Hall speeches were made by August Belmont, Senators Bayard and Hill, Daniel Dougherty and others, and Senators Kernan, Hampton, Whyte, Withers and Morgan were among the speakers at the outside stands.

A PLEASANT BOOK.

THE STAGE: OR, RECOLLECTIONS OF ACTORS AND ACTING FROM AN EXPERIENCE OF FIFTY YEARS. A Series of Dramatic Sketches by James E. Murdoch. Philadelphia: J. M. STODDART & Co., 1880.

Mr. Murdoch's book is a veritable treat and will find a favored niche in many a well-stocked library. Mr. Murdoch is an authority, in the best sense of the term, whether upon tragedy or comedy, while as regards the art of elocution, his dictum is law. His vast experience, extending as it does over half a century, has filled the store-house of his brain, and the "sweet, dried fruits" taste all the better for their mellowness. The book is full of charming reflections, and it fairly bristles with anecdotes. We have the players of one hundred years ago. We read of John Philip Kemble, Charles Kean and Cooke, of Edmund Kean and his critics, of Booth and Kean in London, of Miss Cushman and her early studies, of Macready and Forrest, of London theatrical sensations, peculiarities of actors and actresses; in a word, we have a most fascinating volume, and one which the reader lays aside with a grateful remembrance and a sigh full of regret.

FUN.

THE first American inscription put upon the obelisk will be, "Post no Bills."

ROWELL, the pedestrian, is writing his biography. It will be in a rather ironical strain.

AN Indiana peddler, 61 years old has just run away with his third wife. While there's life there's hope.

HUSBAND: "Mary, my love, this apple-dumpling is not half done." Wife: "Well finish it, then, my dear."

A CINCINNATI dyer recently went insane from political excitement. We suppose the more he red the madder he got.

A MAN out West was offered a plate of macaroni, but declined it, declaring that they "couldn't play off any biled pipe stems on him."

MERCY!" exclaimed an old lady, on first seeing an engraving of the passage of the Red Sea by the children of Israel—"mercy! what a family the man had!"

A MODERN novel has this thrilling passage: "With one hand he held her beautiful golden head above the chilling wave, and with the other called loudly for assistance."

TODDLEKINS is a very small man indeed, but he said he never minded it at all until his three boys grew up to be tall, strapping young fellows and his wife began to cut down their old clothes to fit him. And then he said he did get mad.

MANY physicians claim that intemperance is a disease. It must be contagious then: at any rate, a man who gets drunk usually catches it when he goes home. There may appear to be some little discrepancy or contradiction here, but we can't stop for that now.

A YOUNG man in the city of Galveston gave a collector a bill of $25 to collect. Meeting the collector the young man asked: "Did you get the money?" "Yes, he paid up." "How much are you going to charge me?" "Well, I tell you; I rather like your looks. I ought to charge you something, but I won't. I'll just keep the $25 and call it even."

A SCENE in a picture-gallery shows a "model Model" in a man who serves as a model for an artist, and in the artist's absence explains the pictures to a lady visitor. "From whom did Mr McGilp paint that head?" "From yours obediently, madam. I sit for the 'eds of all 'is 'oly men." "He must find you a very useful person." "Yes, madam. I order his frames, stretch his canvas, wash all his brushes, set his palette and mix his colors. All he's got to do is to shove 'em on."

SOME few weeks back a worthy lady advertised for a plain cook, and several persons applied for the situation. Owing to her fastidiousness, however, none of them seemed to suit her requirements; but at the "eleventh hour" a maiden from the Emerald Isle made application. In reply to a question whether she was able to do plain cooking, she gave an affirmative answer, adding—"The plainer the better for me." After being further tested in an oral manner, the good lady said: "My husband likes his meat boiled, and I like mine roasted. Now, if you had a fowl to cook, how would you do?" "Please, ma'am," said the girl, "I wud roast it first, an' you could ate your share; then I wud boil what you left for the masther."

"AND THE LEAVES WERE FOR THE HEALING OF THE NATIONS."

This is fully exemplified in the demonstration that so common a pasture weed as smart-weed, or water pepper, possesses medicinal properties, which, when combined with essence of Jamaica Ginger and other efficacious vegetable extracts, as in Dr. Pierce's compound Extract of Smart-Weed, it constitutes a most potent remedy for bowel affections, as diarrhœa, dysentery, flux, etc. It is also an efficacious medicine for colds, and to break up fevers and inflammatory attacks, and for the alleviation of pain. Every family should keep a supply of it. 50 cents by druggists.

FISK & HATCH,
Bankers,
AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT BONDS,
And other desirable Investment Securities,
No. 5 Nassau St., New York,

Buy and sell all issues of Government Bonds, in large or small amounts, at current market prices, and will be pleased to furnish information in reference to all matters connected with investments in Government Bonds.

We are prepared to give information in regard to first-class Railway Securities, and to execute orders for the same.

Buy and sell all marketable Stocks and Bonds on commission, at the Stock Exchange and in the open market.

Receive accounts of Banks, Bankers, Merchants and others, and allow interest on daily balances; and for those keeping accounts with us we collect United States coupons and registered interest, and other coupons, dividends, etc., and credit without charge.

☞ We give special attention to orders from Banks, Bankers, Institutions and investors out of the city, by Mail or Telegraph, to buy or sell Government Bonds, State and Railroad Bonds, Bank Stocks, Railroad Stocks, and other securities.

We have issued the Seventh Edition of "Memoranda Concerning Government Bonds," copies of which can be had on application.

FISK & HATCH.

ANGOSTURA BITTERS, the world-renowned appetizer and invigorator. Used now over the whole civilized world. Try it, but beware of imitations. Ask your grocer and druggist for the genuine article, prepared by Dr. J. G. B. Siegert & Sons.

EVANS'S ADVERTISING AGENCY.—This well-known agency has removed to the Tremont Temple, where it has secured finely-arranged offices for its large business. Mr. T. C. EVANS is one of the most energetic men in the business; his long and extensive experience with the press of the country gives him excellent facilities for securing to his patrons the largest returns for their money. The reputation of the Evans Agency is of the best character, and its steadily increasing business is proof of the confidence of its patrons, secured by the careful and prompt attention given to their business.—Boston Evening Traveler.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE
IN NERVOUSNESS, WAKEFULNESS, ETC.

DR. REUBEN A. VANCE, of New York Institute and Bellevue Hospital, says: "The preparation on which I place the most reliance is Horsford's Acid Phosphate."

THE ST. NICHOLAS HOTEL has peculiar claims on the public attention, for it has become one of the historic institutions of the city, and is managed with a liberality and knowledge which make its cuisine a delight of the bon vivant, its apartments admirably furnished and fitted, and all its conveniences competent to meet the most exacting tastes. Its standard of excellence is higher than ever.

THE EVANS MAGAZINE RIFLE is undoubtedly one of the best bargains ever offered to the sportsmen of this country. Examinations of the arm have been made by competent judges, and we are satisfied that the claims made for it are true, and that the opportunity is one to be improved by all who desire to own a fine weapon at a moderate price. The sale in one transaction of $200,000 worth of Evans rifles is said to be the largest operation on record in sporting arms.

The great advantage of the genuine Asbestos Coverings for Steam Pipes, Boilers, etc., over any other forms of non-conducting coverings, aside from their superior effectiveness and fireproof qualities, is that they are manufactured in convenient form, ready for use, and can be easily applied without the aid of skilled labor. The H. W. Johns' Manufacturing Company, 87 Maiden Lane, New York, are the sole manufacturers.

EPPS'S CHOCOLATE ESSENCE.

Product of a special refining process. It is Chocolate divested of its over-richness and substantialising. Sugarless, and when made, of the consistence of coffee. An afternoon Chocolate. Each packet is labeled JAMES EPPS & Co., Homœopathic Chemists, London.

THE PENN MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY
Of Philadelphia.
Office, 921 Chestnut Street.
Assets, $7,031,318.00. Surplus, $1,514,147.00.
SAMUEL C. HUEY, President.

The Penn is strictly Mutual. Thirty years successful business. Insurance at the Lowest Rates. All Policies non-forfeitable for their value.

Endowment Policies issued at Life Rates.

EDWARD M. NEEDLES, HORATIO S. STEPHENS, } Vice-Presidents.
HENRY AUSTIN, Secretary. JESSE J. BARKER, Actuary.
HENRY C. BROWN, Assistant Secretary.

AGENTS WANTED to sell the NEW BOOK, FARMING for PROFIT
TELLS HOW TO Cultivate all the Farm Crops in the Best Manner; Breed, Feed and Care for Stock; Grow Fruit; Manage Farm Business; Make Happy Homes, and How to Make Money on the Farm
Every Farmer should have a copy. 860 Pages, 140 Illustrations. Send for circulars to J. C. McCURDY & CO., Philadelphia, Pa.

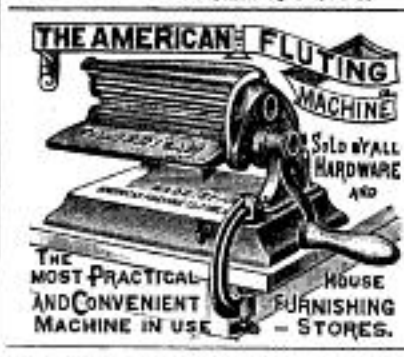
"The Black Robe,"
"The Black Robe,"
The NEW SERIAL NOVEL by
WILKIE COLLINS,
Will be commenced in No.
1307, 1307, 1307, 1307, 1307
OF
Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper,
issued
WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 6th.

Brain and Nerve Food.
VITALIZED PHOS-PHITES.
Composed of the Nerve-giving Principles of the Ox-Brain and Wheat-Germ.

PHYSICIANS HAVE PRESCRIBED 300,000 PACKAGES WITH THE BEST RESULTS IN ALL FORMS OF IMPAIRED VITALITY, MENTAL EXHAUSTION, OR WEAKENED DIGESTION. IT IS THE BEST PREVENTIVE OF CONSUMPTION AND ALL DISEASES OF DEBILITY. IT GIVES REST AND SLEEP TO INFANTS, CHILDREN AND ADULTS, BY STRENGTHENING THE BRAIN AND NERVES WITH THE FOOD THEY ACTUALLY REQUIRE.

For sale by Druggists or mail, $1. F. CROSBY, 664 & 666 Sixth Avenue, New York.

H.W. JOHNS' ASBESTOS
LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING, BOILER COVERINGS
Steam Packing, Sheathings, Fireproof Coatings, Cements
Send for Samples, Illustrated Pamphlet and Price List.
H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO. 87 Maiden Lane, N.Y.



KARL HUTTER'S
PATENT
Lightning Bottle Stoppers.
Also a Full Assortment of
LAGER & WEISS BEER BOTTLES,
With or without Stoppers, on hand.
Special attention paid to orders with name blown in the bottles.
A Large Selection of Bottlers' Supplies.
KARL HUTTER, 185 BOWERY, NEW YORK.

CHEAP MUSIC
Send your address on a postal card for our new Catalogue of Popular Music at Popular Prices. Address,
HITCHCOCK'S MUSIC STORE,
32 Park Row, N. Y.

"THE BLACK ROBE,"
The New Serial Novel by
WILKIE COLLINS,
Will be commenced in No. 1307 of
FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,
issued Wednesday, October 6th.

Carpets,
NEW FALL STYLES.
WE ARE NOW OPENING LARGE LINES OF NEW DESIGNS AND STYLES IN CARPETINGS RECEIVED FROM OUR OWN FACTORIES,
WHICH WILL BE FOUND TO COMBINE TO AN UNUSUAL EXTENT
Elegance in Style and Finish,
Durability in Wear,
and Economy in Prices.
WE ALSO OFFER AN EXTENSIVE ASSORTMENT OF TURKISH, PERSIAN AND EAST INDIAN CARPETS AND RUGS, AND OTHER POPULAR FLOOR COVERINGS, AT EXTREMELY MODERATE RATES.
J. & J. DOBSON,
40 & 42 WEST 14TH STREET, N. Y.,
Near 6th Ave. Elevated R. R. Station.
JOHN VAN GAASBEEK, Manager.

Bouquetiere.
The Bouquetiere is the Acme of Perfection for securing the Bouquet to Coat, Dress, Belt or Hair. Simple and durable; in Gilt or Bronze. Mailed free on receipt of price, 25 cents each five for $1; or per dozen, $4.
GEORGE B. COOPER (Sole Agent), No. 27 Union Square, N. Y.

Morrow's Colorific
Will change hair to a Brown or Black. One preparation easily applied. Contains no poisonous ingredients. This signature on the wrapper. Sold by all druggists. Depot, 10 Frankfort St., New York.
Jos. F. Morrow

HONEY BEES
New Principles in Bee-keeping.
Every one who has a farm or garden can now keep Bees with profit. Send for circular. Address,
MRS. LIZZIE E. COTTON, West Gorham, Maine.

Magic Lantern Catalogue, 150 pp. and Lectures, 10 Cts.
MAGIC LANTERNS AND VIEWS
THE MAGICAL ORGANETTE, ONLY $8.00.
Double size Reeds, extra strength and finish.
Circulars and beautiful set Fancy Cards, 3 Cents.
THEO. J. HARBACH, 809 FILBERT ST., PHILA., PA.

Newspaper Advertising Bureau.
BY ADDRESSING GEO. P. ROWELL & CO., 10 Spruce St., New York, the exact cost of any proposed line of advertising can be learned. 100 page pamphlet, 25c.

BENJ. H. SHOEMAKER,
Importer and Dealer in Foreign and Domestic Window Glass,
German Looking-Glass Plates, Floor and Sky-light Glass.
AGENT FOR THE
FRENCH PLATE GLASS COMPANIES.
Nos. 205, 207, 209 and 211 North 4th St.
(above Race), PHILADELPHIA.

THE STAGE by JAS. E. MURDOCH, Veteran Comedian and Tragedian. A series of Dramatic Sketches rich in Anecdote and reference to favorite Actors and Actresses. Price, $2. Special Terms to Agents.
J. M. STODDART & CO., Philadelphia.

CANDY Send one, two, three or five dollars for a retail sample box, ass'd, by express, of the best Candies in America, put up elegantly, and strictly pure. Refers to all Chicago.
C. F. GUNTHER, Confectioner, 78 Madison St., Chicago.

TO THE PUBLIC.
BOKER'S BITTERS.
BEWARE OF COUNTERFEITS AND IMITATIONS
In accordance with the desire frequently expressed, both in the United States and abroad, these Bitters, so long and justly celebrated for their firmness as a cordial, and for their medicinal virtues against all diseases of, or arising from, the digestive organs, will henceforth be put up and sold not only in quart, but
ALSO IN PINT BOTTLES,
for medicinal, family, traveling, and other purposes. To be had at all the principal druggists', grocers', liquor-merchants', etc. I. FUNKE, Jr., Sole Agent, New York, 78 John Street. Post Office Box 1,929.

The Unrivaled Illustrated Family Paper.
Frank Leslie's
CHIMNEY CORNER,
THE
Popular American Family Journal, Story Paper and Home Friend.

Its Literary and Artistic Attractions are brilliant, and novelties are presented in constant succession; it best suits the wants of families.

As a Story Paper it is without a successful rival; the department of fiction contains serial novels by the most popular writers in this country, and wherever our language is spoken; but in addition to this, the information conveyed in every number is of the highest interest, and given in the most attractive form to win readers among old and young.

The Serial Novels, Short Stories, Sketches of Foreign Life and Travel, etc., are contributed by such popular writers as—John Habberton, author of "Helen's Babies"; N. Robinson, author of "That Mother-in-Law of Mine," "The Janitor's Daughter," etc.; Eliza W. Pierce; Christian Reid; Meta Victoria Victor, author of "The Dead Secret"; M. T. Caldor; Frank Lee Benedict; J. W. De Forest; Corry Carew, author of "Belle Boilkin of Ballyboden"; Prof. H. G. De Mille, etc., etc., etc.

Biography, all that is wonderful in Art and Nature, Anecdotes of celebrated persons, etc., Science divested of technicality, Poetry, etc., etc., are embraced in the contents of each number, and all accompanied by Illustrations executed in the most refined style.

The CHIMNEY CORNER is a paper of high character, as its unwasting popularity surely attests.

Each Number contains sixteen pages of reading matter, with eight pages of admirably executed illustrations.

"Madeleine's Atonement,"
BY
MRS. HARRY BECKETT,
Is the title of a new short serial story just commenced; it is a tale of passion, beautifully told, and full of exquisite pathos. It is a novel such as is not often presented in periodicals, and will appeal to all the finer instincts of our nature.

Published every Monday, and for sale by all newsdealers, price 10 cents. Annual subscription, $4; three months, $1—sent postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

TWO THINGS
For Sunday-school Teachers.
The Sunday School Times. A 16-page weekly paper for teachers, superintendents and pastors. The low club rates enable the teachers of any school to take it. From 1 to 4 copies, $2.00 each. From 5 to 9 copies, in a package to one address, $1.50 each. From 10 to 19 copies, in a package to one address, $1.25. Twenty copies or more, in a package to one address, $1.00 each. No charge for postage. Subscriptions will be taken for any portion of a year at yearly rates. The paper will be sent every week for three months, on trial, to a new subscriber, for twenty-five cents. Specimen copies free.
The Scholars' Quarterly. Published every three months. This is just what you want for your class. It contains the International lessons, with a large variety of helps, including beautiful pictures and a colored map. Price, 25 cents a year. Send a ten cents for a specimen. Samples of The Weekly Lesson Leaf free. Address,
JOHN D. WATTLES, Publisher,
718 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

ASTHMA. WESTLAKE'S ASTHMA REMEDY gives relief instantly. Samples free. C. D. WESTLAKE & CO., 68 John Street, New York.

Digitized by Google

KNOW THYSELF.

THE untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase the new medical work published by the PEABODY MEDICAL INSTITUTE, Boston, entitled THE SCIENCE OF LIFE; Or, SELF-PRESERVATION. Exhausted vitality, nervous and physical debility, or vitality impaired by the errors of youth or too close application to business, may be restored and manhood regained.

Two hundredth edition, revised and enlarged, just published. It is a standard medical work, the best in the English language, written by a physician of great experience, to whom was awarded a gold and jeweled medal by the National Medical Association. It contains beautiful and very expensive engravings. Three hundred pages, more than 50 valuable prescriptions for all forms of prevailing disease, the result of many years of extensive and successful practice, either one of which is worth ten times the price of the book. Bound in French cloth; price only $1, sent by mail, postpaid.

The London Lancet says: "No person should be without this valuable book. The author is a noble benefactor."

An illustrated sample sent to all on receipt of 6 cents for postage.

The author refers, by permission, to Hon. P. A. BISSELL, M.D., President of the National Medical Assoc'n.

Address, Dr. W. H. PARKER, No. 4 Bulfinch Street, Boston, Mass. The author may be consulted on all diseases requiring skill and experience.

HEAL THYSELF

WILKIE COLLINS'S NEW SERIAL STORY,

"The Black Robe,"

"The Black Robe."

The opening chapters will appear in No. 1307 of

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper,

ISSUED ON

Wednesday, October 6th,

FOR SALE BY ALL NEWSDEALERS, PRICE 10 CENTS A COPY.

DAY'S Kidney PAD

A CURE for the most prevalent and fatal diseases that afflict mankind FOUND AT LAST.

Internal medicines never did nor never can cure KIDNEY DISEASE. STOP IT NOW; apply Day's Kidney Pad AT ONCE, and be cured of all affections of the Kidneys, Bladder and Urinary Organs. It is the only treatment that will cure NERVOUS AND PHYSICAL DEBILITY, and that distressing complaint, "BACK ACHE." It will annually save many times its cost in medicines and plasters, which at best give but temporary relief. Sold by druggists or sent by mail on receipt of price, $5. Our book, "How a Life Was Saved," giving a history of this new discovery and a large record of most remarkable cures, sent free. Write for it.

DAY KIDNEY PAD CO., [illegible]

HOPE FOR THE DEAF

Garmore's Artificial Ear Drums

PERFECTLY RESTORE THE HEARING and perform the work of the Natural Drum. Always in position, but invisible to others. All Conversation and even whispers heard distinctly. We refer to those using them. Send for descriptive circular.

Address JOHN GARMORE & CO., S. W. Corner 5th & Race Sts., Cincinnati, O.

TAPE-WORM

INFALLIBLY CURED with two spoons of medicine in 2-3 hours. For particulars, address, with stamp, H. ECKHORN, 4 St. Mark's Place, New York.

ELGIN WATCHES,

All styles, Gold, Silver and Nickel, $6 to $50. Chains, etc., sent C. O. D. to be examined. Write for Catalogue to STANDARD AMERICAN WATCH CO., PITTSBURGH, PA.

GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Send stamp for Catalogue.
Rifles, Shot Guns, Revolvers, sent C. O. D. for examination.

SCHMITT & KOEHNE.

Central Park Brewery

AND

Bottling Company.

Brewery, Bottling Department and Office, 159—165 East Fifty-ninth Street, Icehouse and Rock-vaults, Fifty-ninth and Fifty-seventh Street, Avenue A and East River, N. Y.

BOHEMIAN and LAGER BEER.

The finest Beer for family use. The best Shipping Beer in bottles, warranted to keep in any climate for months and years.

My New Illustrated Price List describing over 150 Gold and Silver Waltham Watches sent for a 3c stamp. It tells how I send watches to all parts of U.S. to be examined before paying any money. Unbroken reference. N. H. White, Jeweler, Newark, N. J.

---

20 NEW CHROMO Cards, No 2 Alike 15c. or 50 Fancy Cards 10c, With Name, J. B. Husted, Nassau, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's

BUDGET.

A MONTHLY VARIETY MAGAZINE,

Spicy and Entertaining.

Each Number contains 98 pages quarto, and over 100 beautiful illustrations.

Published on the 1st of every month, and for sale by all Newsdealers. Annual subscription, $1.50; single copies, 15 cents. Sent postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place New York.

DR BROWNING'S TONIC AND ALTERATIVE

The Celebrated Prescription of
W. CHAMPION BROWNING, M. D.

FOR GENERAL DEBILITY AND PURIFYING THE BLOOD.

Perfectly purifies the Blood, enriches the Blood, reddens the Blood, makes new Blood, wonderfully improves the Appetite, and changes the Constitution suffering from General Debility into one of vigorous health.

The best proof of its wonderful efficacy is to be obtained by a trial, and that simple trial strongly establishes its reputation with all.

☞ It is most scientifically and elegantly compounded by its author and sole proprietor, W. CHAMPION BROWNING, M. D., 1117 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

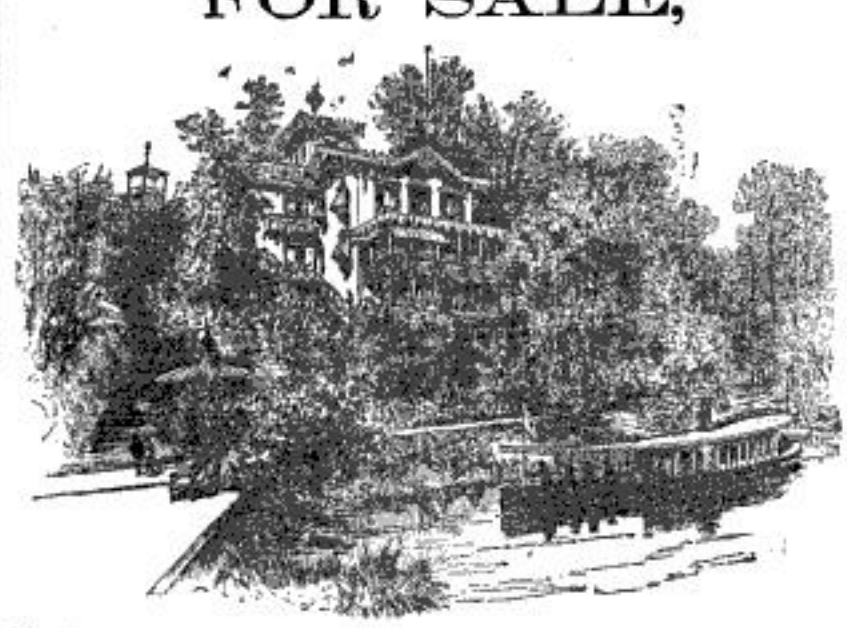
A regular graduate of Jefferson Medical College, of Philadelphia, a thorough Chemist and skilful Pharmacist.

Price, 50c. and $1.00. For sale by the Proprietor and all Druggists and Dealers in Medicine.

A $30 RIFLE for $20—THE FINEST REPEATER IN THE WORLD.

☞ ONE RIFLE GIVEN FREE WITH EVERY SIX ORDERED. ☜

26 Shot. 44 Cal. Wt. 8 to 10 lbs.



A CHANCE OF A LIFETIME.

We unhesitatingly assert that the following is the most remarkable offer ever made by any firm. Read it carefully.

THE NEW EVANS MAGAZINE RIFLE, WITHOUT EXCEPTION, THE MOST ACCURATE, LONGEST RANGED, EASIEST LOADED, QUICKEST FIRED, BEST CONSTRUCTED, SIMPLEST, AND MOST PERFECT BREECH-LOADING REPEATING RIFLE EVER MADE. "Twenty-six shots in 60 seconds, without removing the Rifle from the shoulder." No hammer in the way; throwing down the guard ejects, loads and cocks. With commendable spirit, in the face of the general advance in all merchandise, the Evans Rifle Co. have decided to temporarily reduce the price of their World-Renowned Arm, placing it within the reach of every sportsman, and thereby enabling for a the largest sale ever obtained by any repeating rifle in this country. The new model and latest improved Evans Magazine Rifle is exactly represented by the above picture. It is 44 cal., centre-fire, 26 shot in both barrels, weight from 8 to 10 lbs., checkered black walnut stock, and finished with oxidized steel. Sights up to 1,200 yards, the finest, further than any other repeating arm, of which distance it will penetrate 12 pine boards (being the most powerful repeating rifle ever constructed. The Magazine, which carries 26 long cartridges, is located in the stock and not under the barrel, the pose or bang of the rifle is in no way affected, for its security imparted by the supporting of the magazine, and so each cartridge is carried in a separate compartment, the gun is ABSOLUTELY SAFE. The working parts are all steel, the frame wrought iron, and the new locking device renders it POSITIVELY SAFE to carry when loaded. In short, the many improvements made in the New Model Evans, make it without doubt the finest magazine rifle in the world, and it carries more cartridges than any other arm. As stated above, the manufacturers of the Evans Rifle, in order to introduce their improvements quickly and favorably in the public, have placed in our hands THEIR ENTIRE PRESENT STOCK OF OVER SIX THOUSAND RIFLES, to the value of over one hundred and twenty thousand dollars, for this purpose only, and on receipt of $20, which is only half the regular price, we will send by express or freight, boxed free, to any address, one of the New Model improved Evans 26 Shot Rifles, as above described, warranted and guaranteed in every respect to beat the gun manufacturers and expressed, or will send C. O. D., on receipt of the express Agent's guarantee that the rifle will be returned free if not taken. When cash comes with order we give free a box of cartridges; samples of the new Paradox ball cartridges go free with each rifle. The New Evans Saddle Rifle is similar to the sporting Rifle, except it is a little lighter (about 8 lbs.), and 22 inch barrel, only finishes shorter than the regular Winchester Rifle, and accurate up to 600 yards; 26 shot, same as other style, and provided with swivel and strap. This is the best all round rifle in the market for Western mounted use. Price, $18 (former price, $30), and one given free with every six ordered. N. B.—THE EVANS CAN BE USED AS A SINGLE SHOT RIFLE, INDEPENDENT OF THE MAGAZINE, WHICH CAN ALWAYS BE KEPT FULL AND HELD IN RESERVE. We ask no Money in Advance, of the purchaser does not care to risk it. WE ARE UNDER INSTRUCTIONS FROM THE EVANS RIFLE CO. to forward a rifle C. O. D. on receipt of simply your address against guarantee that it will be returned free if not taken; but when paid for in advance, cartridges are included free; not when sent C. O. D. Ordering at once and sending one five guinea the cost only about $17. Texas Jack says: "The Evans Rifle is the best in the world. It shoots like a house afire." A. J. Sage (sharpshooter) says: "It is the best gun I ever put to my shoulder. It can't be beat." Kit Carson, Jr., says: "I have shot over 60 buffaloes with the Evans in one run. I will shoot against any man living at 500 yards," and the Evans Rifle Co. have thousands more testimonials equally commendatory. Address all orders to

C. W. TURNER & ROSS, Agents for the Evans Rifle, 16 & 17 Dock Square, Boston, Mass.

FOR SALE,

"INTERLAKEN,"

THE COUNTRY HOME OF
THE LATE FRANK LESLIE, ESQ.,

Consisting of 62 acres, situated on LAKE SARATOGA, and extending back to Lake Lonely.

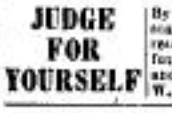
The house contains twelve rooms, gas and water.

The stable, finished in fine woods, has six box-stalls.

Finely appointed billiard-room, and three handsomely furnished sleeping-rooms over coach-house.

Gardener's cottage.

Conservatories profusely stocked with rare plants.



The furniture, steam-yacht, sail and row boats, French omnibus, etc., will be sold with the place.

Apply to

HOMER MORGAN, 2 Pine Street; or,
V. K. STEVENSON, 25 Pine St., and 661 Fifth Av

JUDGE FOR YOURSELF

By sending 15c. money or 60c. postage stamps, with age, you will receive by return mail a correct picture of your future husband or wife, with name and date of marriage. Address, W. FOX, Box 38, Fultonville, N.Y.

MUSTACHE AND WHISKERS.

[illegible] Agents, Pittsburg, Pa. [illegible]

---

18 Elegant New Style Chromo Cards, with name, 10 cts. postpaid. GEO. I. REED & CO., Nassau, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Pleasant Hours.

A MONTHLY PICTORIAL JOURNAL of LIGHT, PLEASING LITERATURE, PLEASING TALES, ADVENTURES, ANECDOTE, AND MIRTH-PROVOKING ILLUSTRATIONS.

For sale by all newsdealers, price 15 cents. Annual subscription, $1.50, postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Agents Wanted.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. Address, H. HALLETT & Co., Portland, Maine.

$350 A MONTH—AGENTS WANTED—75 best selling articles in the world; 1 sample free. Address Jay Bronson, Detroit, Mich.

SALESMEN WANTED $105 A Month and Expenses [illegible] "ALL CIGARS" [illegible]

AGENTS WANTED EVERYWHERE to sell the best Family Knitting Machine ever invented. Will knit a pair of stockings, with HEEL and TOE complete, in 20 minutes. It will also knit a great variety of fancy-work for which there is always a ready market. Send for circular and terms to the Twombly Knitting Machine Co., 499 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

Diseases of Live Stock

And their most efficient remedies, including Horses, Cattle, Sheep and Swine, by LLOYD T. TELLER, M.D. Sold by subscription only. Price $2.50.

Agents Wanted.

Apply for terms and territory to H. C. WATTS & CO., 508 and 508 Mirror Street, Philadelphia.

Imitation Gold Watches.

$5, $10, $15, $20 and $25 each; Chains $2 to $12 to match. Jewelry of the same. Sent C.O.D., by Express. Send stamp for Illustrated Circular. COLLINS METAL WATCH FACTORY, 335 Broadway, N. Y. Box, 3096.

MEMORIAL BALM restores and develops the beard. Warranted safe and sure. Price, $1. NEW ENGLAND MEDICAL INSTITUTE, 24 Tremont Row, Boston, Mass.

$72 A WEEK. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly Outfit free. Address, TRUE & Co., Augusta, Maine.

---

50 Chromo, Snowflake and Lace Cards, with name, 10c. 40 all chromos, 10c. Star Printing Co., Northford, Ct.

SCARCE GOODS.—Books, Photos, &c. Sample Catalogue 3c. Paris Book Co., Chicago, Ill.

---

50 New Style Cards, Lithographed in bright colors, 10c. 60 Agents Samples 10c. Clam. Card Co., Northford, Ct.

$777 A YEAR and expenses to agents. Outfit free. Address, P. O. VICKERY, Augusta, Maine.

---

50 Elegant Cards, New Chromos, Shells, Gilt-edge, etc., with name, 10c. G. A. SPRING, Northford, Ct.

---

30 Gilt Edge, Chromo, Snowflake, Glass, Lace & Cards. Name On, 10c. Franklin Pr'g Co., Fair Haven, Ct.

$1.75 Watches, $1.25 Revolvers. New Novelties. Bankrupt Stocks. Fisher & Co., Arcadia, N. Y.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address, STINSON & Co., Portland, Maine.

---

40 New Styles Chromos, with name 10c. 40 Agents Samples 10c. Canaan Co., Northford, Ct.

The OLDEST and BEST of the JUVENILE PUBLICATIONS.

Frank Leslie's

Boys' & Girls' Weekly

Is now publishing the following admirable serial stories all beautifully illustrated:

"The Lost Trail; Or, On the Wild North Border." By W. O. STODDARD.

"'Swoppy'; Or, The Adventures of a Yankee Boy." By NAT URNER.

"Trap-door Tom."

"Jim Jeffs; Or, The Mystery of the House by the River." By SYLVESTER ROSNEY.

"Left to Himself." By COMMODORE AH LOOF.

"The Pearl of the Sahara; Or, The Adventures of Two American Boys," By COMMODORE ROSNEY.

"Hal Harkforward and Tom Tallyho's Schooldays." BY BRACKENRIDGE HEATHO (Jack Harkaway).

Sold by all newsdealers. Price 5 cents a copy; $2.50 a year, postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

A New Serial by Wilkie Collins!

A NEW POWERFUL SERIAL STORY,

ENTITLED

"The Black Robe,"

BY

WILKIE COLLINS,

Will be commenced in No.

1307, 1307, 1307, 1307, 1307

OF

Frank Leslie's

ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER

The story is one of absorbing interest, possessing all the attractions of style, ingenuity of plot and felicitous delineation of character which peculiarly distinguish Mr. Collins's works, and will, we are confident, afford the reader genuine enjoyment.

"THE BLACK ROBE" will be published exclusively in FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER, from advance sheets purchased directly of the author.

No. 1307, No. 1307, No. 1307, No. 1307,

ISSUED

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 6th.

Persons who desire to have the story complete, as presented to our columns, should send in their subscriptions at once.

For sale by all newsdealers. Single copies, 10 cents each. Annual subscription, $4, postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place New York.

Digitized by Google

HECKER'S PERFECT BAKING POWDER

PURITY AND STRENGTH GUARANTEED.

AN EXPERIENCE OF OVER THIRTY YEARS IN THE MANUFACTURE OF BAKING POWDER FOR USE IN MAKING SELF-RAISING FLOUR, WARRANTS US IN OFFERING THIS AS A PERFECT BAKING POWDER.

For Sale by all Grocers.

GEORGE V. HECKER & CO.,

CROTON FLOUR MILLS, 203 CHERRY ST., N. Y.

N.Y. Central & Hudson River R.R.

THE BEST ROUTE EAST OR WEST.

Through Cars between New York or Boston and Chicago or St. Louis.

See NIAGARA FALLS, SARATOGA and the HUDSON.

C. E. MEEKER, General Passenger Agent.

A WONDERFUL INVENTION!

The CLARIONETTO. A new musical Instrument—perfect substitute for the Clarionet; valuable addition to Bands and Orchestras; splendid accompaniment to the voice; can be played in any key (flats, sharps or minors); it requires no skill. Any one can play it. Can play any tune. Sent in a handsome French morocco embossed case, lined with silk, with full instructions, postpaid, for 30 cts., stamps or silver. THOMAS & CO., Box 415, LeRoy, N.Y.

I use the CLARIONETTO in my band and orchestra, and can say it is a truly wonderful invention and a marvel of simplicity and cheapness.—Prof. Jas. Jones, Palmerville, O.

H. R. Sayres, of Sheldon, Ct., says: "I have earned as much as seven dollars per evening with the CLARIONETTO, playing for dances."

Prof. Gerrow, of Danville, Ky., Musical Institute, says: "Your CLARIONETTO is all that you claim for it. Found the two."

[Mention this paper.]

FISHERMEN!

TWINES AND NETTING

MANUFACTURED BY

WM. E. HOOPER & SONS, Baltimore, Md.

☞ Send for Price-List, naming your County and State.

NICOLL THE TAILOR.

Fall and Winter Styles

NOW READY.

ELECTRIC LIGHTS used in BOTH STORES.

620 BROADWAY,

AND

139 to 151 Bowery, New York.

Samples and Rules for Self-Measurement

SENT BY MAIL.

INMAN ROYAL MAIL STEAMERS

For QUEENSTOWN and LIVERPOOL.

NOTICE.—The steamers of this line take Lieutenant Maury's lane routes at all seasons of the year.

CITY OF MONTREAL.....Thursday, September 30, 2 P. M.
CITY OF RICHMOND.....Saturday, October 9, 9 A. M.
CITY OF CHESTER.....Saturday, October 16, 2 P. M.
CITY OF BRUSSELS.....Thursday, October 21, 7 A. M.

From Pier 37, North River, foot of Charlton St.

Cabin, $80 and $100. Return tickets on favorable terms. Steerage, $28. Drafts at lowest rates.

Saloons, state-rooms, smoking and bathrooms amidships.

These steamers do not carry cattle, sheep or pigs.

JOHN G. DALE, Agent, 31 and 33 Broadway, New York.
G. A. FAULK, 105 South Fourth Street, Philadelphia.
L. H. PALMER, 3 Old State House, Boston.
F. C. BROWN, 32 South Clark Street, Chicago.

EARS FOR THE MILLION.

FOO CHOO'S BALSAM OF SHARK'S OIL,

Positively restores the hearing, and is the only absolute cure for deafness known.

This Oil is extracted from a peculiar species of small White Shark, caught in the Yellow Sea, known as Carcharodon Rondeletii. Every Chinese Fisherman knows it. Its virtues as a restorative of hearing were discovered by a Buddhist Priest about the year 1410. Its cures were so numerous, and many so seemingly miraculous, that the remedy was proclaimed by the priesthood over the entire Empire. Its use became so universal that for over 300 years no deafness has existed among the Chinese People. Sent (charges prepaid) to any address at $3 per bottle.

Only Imported by HAYDOCK & CO.,

SOLE AG'TS FOR AMERICA. 7 Dey St., New York.

KIDNEY-WORT

The Great Remedy For THE LIVER, THE BOWELS, and the KIDNEYS.

These great organs are the Natural cleansers of the System. If they work well, health will be perfect. If they become clogged, dreadful diseases are developed because the blood is poisoned with the humors that should have been expelled naturally. KIDNEY-WORT will restore the natural action, and throw off the disease. Thousand have been cured, and all may be. For sale by all Druggists.

OPIUM

Morphine Habit Cured in 10 to 20 days. No pay till Cured. DR. J. STEPHENS, Lebanon, Ohio

FIRM'S Can for Explosive Fluids.

PATENTED JAN. 21st, 1879.

P. O. Box 4278, New York.

THE CHEERFUL OUTLOOK OF "YOUNG AMERICA."

A. T. Stewart & Co.

HAVE OPENED

A Superb and Varied Collection of Black and Colored

FALL DRESS FABRICS,

Representing all the

NEWEST STYLES AND SHADES,

From the Leading Manufacturers of Europe and America,

AT PRICES

That will command satisfaction.

Broadway, 4th Ave., 9th & 10th Sts.

COLUMBIA BICYCLE

The Bicycle has proved itself to be a permanent, practical road-vehicle, and the number in daily use is rapidly increasing. Professional and business men, seekers after health or pleasure, all join in bearing witness to its merits. Send 3c. stamp for catalogue with price list and full information.

THE POPE MFG. CO., 59 Summer St., Boston, Mass.

DR. SCOTT'S ELECTRIC HAIR BRUSH.

A REMARKABLE INVENTION,

Which has won its way to royal favor in England, been cordially indorsed by the Prince and Princess of Wales, and written upon by the Rt. Hon. W. E. Gladstone, is now brought to the notice of the American public. It cures by natural means, will always do good, never harm, and is a remedy lasting for many years. It should be used daily in place of the ordinary Hair Brush. The Brush Handle is made of a new odorless composition resembling ebony; a combination of substances PRODUCING A PERMANENT ELECTRIC VOLTAIC CURRENT, WHICH ACTS IMMEDIATELY UPON THE HAIR GLANDS AND FOLLICLES. This power can always be tested by a silver compass which accompanies each Brush.

It is Warranted to

Cure Nervous Headache in 5 minutes!!
Cure Bilious Headache in 5 minutes!!
Cure Neuralgia in 5 minutes!!
Prevent Failing Hair and Baldness!!
Cure Dandruff and Diseases of the Scalp!!
Promptly arrests Premature Grayness!!
Makes the Hair grow Long and Glossy!!
Immediately soothes the Weary Brain!!
Money returned if not as represented!!

IT NEVER FAILS TO PRODUCE A RAPID GROWTH OF HAIR ON BALD HEADS, where the Glands and Follicles are not totally destroyed.

Proprietors: The Pall Mall Electric Association of London. New York Branch: 842 Broadway.

[From REV. DR. BRIDGEMAN.]

"Brooklyn, June 1st, 1880.

"Gents: I have never before given a testimonial, but am willing to encourage the use of an honest remedy. I am so pleased with your Hair Brush that I deem it my duty to write you recommending it most cordially. My hair, about a year since, commenced falling out, and I was rapidly becoming bald; but since using the Brush a thick growth of hair has made its appearance, quite equal to that which I had previous to its falling out. I have tried other remedies, but with no success. After this remarkable result I purchased one for my wife, who has been a great sufferer from headache, and she finds it a prompt and infallible remedy. A. C. BRIDGEMAN, D.D."

From the Mayor of Saratoga.

"August 12, 1880.

"I cheerfully testify to the merits of Dr. Scott's Electric Hair Brush. It cures my headaches within a few minutes. I am so pleased with it, I purchased another for my wife. It is an excellent Hair Brush, well worth the price, aside from its curative powers. JAS. B. CHAFFAR."

"9 Goodwin St., Bradford, England, Dec. 19th, 1879.

"My Aunt writes me they are the greatest blessing to her, as in all cases they relieve her at once. My hair is growing rapidly, the bald place being quite covered. I do think you ought to make these things known, for the benefit of others, as I am convinced it is the best Hair Brush yet put before the public. Yours truly, J. JEWETT."

"Over 1,200,000 in use. An honest remedy, worthy of all praise."—British Medical Index.

"Round Lake Camp-Meeting Grounds, Saratoga Co., N. Y., June 8th, 1880.

"Your Brush is certainly a remarkable cure. I am highly pleased with it. Its effect is most wonderful, and you may be sure I shall recommend it heartily among my friends. It is also a splendid Hair Brush, well worth the money, and will last me for years. REV. J. D. ROGERS, Superintendent."

[From PLINY F. SMITH, Law Publisher.] "218 Fulton St., N. Y., Aug. 31, 1880.

"Dr. Scott—Dear Sir: My wife suffered daily for ten years with terrible headaches. Three able physicians failed to cure her. Your Brush did so the first time she used it, in five minutes, and has never failed since in a single instance. PLINY F. SMITH."

Mr. Smith is a gentleman well known, being one of the promoters of the Midnight Mission in New York.

Over 7,000 similar Testimonials can be seen at our Office.

Remember that this is not a "Metallic" Wire Brush, but made of PURE BRISTLES.

A BEAUTIFUL BRUSH, Lasting for Years.

Mention this Paper. We will send it Postpaid on receipt of $3. Or by Express, C.O.D., at your expense, with privilege of opening and examining it.

Or request your Druggist or Fancy Store to obtain it for you, from us.

MONEY RETURNED IF NOT AS REPRESENTED.

As soon as you receive the Brush, if not well satisfied with your bargain, write us, and we will return the money. What can be fairer?

This paper will not knowingly publish any humbug, and before advertising the Brush one was placed in the hands of the Editor, with a request to test its merits. We have also placed one in the hands of Mayor Cooper and Postmaster James of New York, as a guarantee of our good faith.

Remittances should be made payable to GEO. A. SCOTT, 842 Broadway, New York. Agents wanted in every town.

They can be made in Checks, Drafts, Post-office Orders or Currency, in Registered or Non-registered Letters.

The Ladies OF THE White House

OR,

IN THE HOMES OF THE PRESIDENTS

A History of every Administration from Washington to the present time. Includes much Personal and Private history never before published. Agents wanted. For full description address the Publishers, BRADLEY & CO., 66 North Fourth St., Philadelphia, Pa.

SPECTACLES, Eye, Field and Opera Glasses, Microscopes, Barometers, Thermometers, Compasses, at reduced prices. R. & J. BECK, 1016 Chestnut Street, Phila. Send 5 stamps for Illustrated Catalogue of 146 pages. Mention this paper.

TRUSS EGGLESTON SENSIBLE TRUSS.

Made on new principles. Send for Circulars. Eggleston Truss, Chicago, Ills.

$55.66 Agents Profit per Week. Will prove it or forfeit $500. $4 Outfit free. E. O. RIDEOUT & CO., 10 Barclay St., N.Y.

Do Your Own Printing $3 [illegible]

14 STOP ORGANS SUB BASS & Oct. Coupler, 4 Set Reeds, $145

Pianos $185 and upwards, sent on trial. Catalogue free. Address, DANIEL F. BEATTY, Washington, N.J.

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER

Entered according to act of Congress, in the year 1880, by J. W. Ehrlann, assignee, to the Office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.—Entered at the Post Office, New York, N.Y., as Second-class Matter.

No. 1,307.—Vol. LI. NEW YORK, OCTOBER 16, 1880. [Price, with Supplement, 10 Cents. $5.00 Yearly; 13 Weeks $1.00.

"THE BLACK ROBE." BY WILKIE COLLINS.

Published exclusively in this Journal by special arrangement with the Author.

BEFORE THE STORY.

FIRST SCENE. BOULOGNE-SUR-MER — THE PIER.

I.

THE doctors could do no more for the Dowager Lady Berrick.

When the medical advisers of the lady, who has reached seventy years of age, recommend the mild climate of the South of France, they mean in plain language that they have arrived at the end of their resources. Her ladyship gave the mild climate a fair trial, and then decided (as she herself expressed it) to "die at home." Traveling slowly, she had reached Paris at the date when I last heard of her. It was then the beginning of November. A week later, I met with her nephew, Lewis Romayne, at the club.

"What brings you to London at this time of year?" I asked.

"The fatality that pursues me," he answered, grimly. "I am one of the unluckiest men living!"

He was thirty years old; he was not married: he was the enviable possessor of the fine old country seat, called Vange Abbey; he had no poor relations, and he was one of the handsomest men in England. When I add that I am, myself, a retired army officer, with a wretched income, a disagreeable wife, four ugly children, and a burden of fifty years on my back, no one will be surprised to hear that I answered Romayne, with bitter sincerity, in these words:

"I wish to heaven I could change places with you!"

"I wish to heaven you could!" he burst out, with equal sincerity, on his side. "Read that."

He handed me a letter addressed to him by the traveling medical attendant of Lady Berrick. After resting in Paris, the patient had continued her homeward journey as far as Boulogne. In her suffering condition, she was liable to sudden fits of caprice. An insurmountable horror of the Channel passage had got possession of her: she positively refused to be taken on board the steamboat. In this difficulty, the lady who occupied the post of her "companion" had ventured on a suggestion. Would Lady Berrick consent to make the Channel passage, if her nephew came to Boulogne expressly to accompany her on the voyage? The reply had been so immediately favorable that the doctor lost no time in communicating with Mr. Lewis Romayne. This was the substance of the letter.

It was needless to ask any more questions. Romayne was plainly on his way to Boulogne. I gave him some useful information.

"Try the oysters," I said, "at the restaurant on the pier."

He never even thanked me. He was thinking entirely of himself.

"Just look at my position," he said. "I detest Boulogne; I cordially share my aunt's horror of the Channel passage; I had looked forward to some months of happy retirement in the country among my books; and what happens to me? I am brought to London in the season of fogs, to travel by the tidal train at seven to-morrow morning—and all for a woman with whom I have no sympathies in common. If I am not an unlucky man, who is?"

He spoke in a tone of vehement irritation which seemed to me, under the circumstances, to be simply absurd. But my nervous system is not the irritable system—sorely tried by night study and strong tea—of my friend Romayne. "It's only a matter of two days," I remarked, by way of reconciling him to his situation.

"How do I know that?" he retorted. "In two days the weather may be stormy. In two days she may be too ill to be moved. Unfortunately, I am her heir; and I am told I must submit to any whim that seizes her. I'm rich enough already; I don't want her money. Besides, I dislike all traveling—and especially traveling alone. You are an idle man. If you were a good friend, you would offer to go with me." He added, with the delicacy which was one of the redeeming points in his wayward character, "Of course, as my guest."

(Continued on page 102.)

"THE BLACK ROBE."—Scene in the Drawing-room at Boulogne—Romayne knocking down the General at the Card Table.

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,
53, 55 & 57 PARK PLACE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 16, 1880.

NOTICE.

FRANK LESLIE'S PUBLISHING HOUSE,
53, 55 and 57 Park Place, New York City, N. Y.
P. O. Box 4123.

NEW YORK, January 17th, 1880.

Under the assignment, and with the assent of Mrs. Miriam F. Leslie, the widow of FRANK LESLIE, and his sole legatee under his will, the publications of the House will be continued as heretofore under the management of the undersigned.

All communications should be addressed to 57 Park Place, or to P. O. Box 4123, New York City, N. Y.

I. W. ENGLAND, Assignee.

THE REPUBLICAN HANDICAP.

IN some recent comments on the drift of the present political canvass and the uncertain issue of the contest, we expressed the opinion that each of the competing parties has some heavy weights to throw off, if it would make sure of the prize. Since only one of the parties can win the prize, and since they now seem, in sportsman's phrase, to be running "neck and neck," it has occurred to us that it might be instructive to review very briefly the nature and shape of the weights with which they are each handicapped in the race set before them.

We are the more encouraged to make this review because we discover that it is beginning to dawn on the senses of even the partisan press that, as the New York Times phrases it, "the considerations at present involved in our politics are somewhat mixed and affect different minds differently," insomuch that "waverers and doubters" are not found merely among the "thoughtless and the sordid," but are perhaps most numerous "among men who think," and who think with candor and earnestness, as becomes those who address themselves to a difficult question of duty.

As first in position and first in the order of a triumphant career, covering the last twenty years, we naturally begin with the Republican Party. "Pointing," as it does, "with pride" to a long array of splendid achievements in our civil and military history, it is also called, by the length of its "record," to confront the manifold sins of omission and of commission which have dimmed the lustre of its name, and which nearly threatened it with eclipse at the last Presidential election. This waning prestige, in itself a source of weakness, was complicated at that epoch with charges against the integrity and fairness of the "electoral count" by which the party secured a new lease of power, and these charges, in turn, have added to the other historical burdens which are to be borne in the present contest. So eminent a man as the Hon. Charles Francis Adams has assigned this "scandal" as his sole reason for opposing the candidature of General Garfield, notwithstanding the contemporaneous scandal of the "cipher telegrams," which has weakened its moral effect in the eyes of most people.

But much the gravest obstacle to the Republican Party's success in the pending Presidential contest is the sectional battle-flag which it has waved in the fore-front of its legions. The nation longs for reconciliation between the late belligerent sections of a reunited country, and, without shutting its eyes to the alleged plague-spots which still rest on the South, it sees clearly enough that they will be aggravated rather than healed by turning the wounds of war into the running sores of politics. It would have been wise if the Republican leaders had accepted the nomination of General Hancock by the Democrats as an end of strife on the score of the rebellion, and as an homage paid to Republican primacy in defending the Union and in reaping the legitimate fruits of the war under an amended Constitution. But, instead of moving forward to this high vantage ground, the managers of the canvass have preferred to burrow in the mud and mire of the dead past—evoking memories which are repulsive to the people, and so disinfecting them for the patient consideration of real and living defects in the social and political system of the South. When Republican journals like the New York Evening Post protests against "the cold-blooded sectionalism" of Mr. Conkling's recent argument, as being "ill-judged, illogical and malicious," and when an independent supporter of General Garfield, such as the New York Nation, makes bold to say that if the Republican Party should "father" Mr. Conkling's doctrine, "it will insure itself as deep and swift damnation as overtook the Federal Party for sins much less grievous," it is surely time to call a halt along the whole line of the present Republican movement. We say "the whole line of the movement" as now directed by the managers of the Republican Party; for the reader who turns to pages 170 and 171 of the "Republican Campaign Text-Book" will there learn that Mr. Conkling was merely speaking from the brief prepared by these managers for the use of the Republican Press and the Republican hustings throughout the whole land. His doctrine is already "fathered" by the party as now led and now directed.

The exploded doctrine of Protection is another weight that hangs on the flanks of the Republicans. It does not hang as heavily as it might, because the Democrats in Pennsylvania and New Jersey and elsewhere dispute with Republicans their exclusive right to play the part of Issachar, crouching between his burdens. But the drift of opinion in the two parties is clear. The Republicans, as a party, cling to "protection for protection's sake." The Democrats, as a party, tend to such a revision of the tariff "as shall make it purely and solely a tariff for revenue." On a motion couched in these terms, introduced in the House of Representatives on the 1st of December, 1877, and instructing the Committee on Ways and Means to undertake such a revision, the vote stood: yeas, 67; nays, 76. Of the 67 yeas, 60 were Democrats and only 7 Republicans. Of the 76 nays, 54 were Republicans and only 12 were Democrats.

In the matter of the currency issue, it is a great hindrance to the Republican cause that its managers should wish to profit by their weakness as well as their strength. As the begetters and foster-parents of the greenback, the Republicans are weak. As the authors and patrons of specie resumption, they are comparatively strong. But nearly the whole of Chapter XVII. in the "Republican Campaign Text-book," the official manual of the party in its present canvass, is devoted to the glorification of the greenback; and the Republican Party is commended to popular favor as its "Father, Friend and Guardian," while the Democrats are held up to public opprobrium as its bitter and relentless "enemies." Surely the political managers who play fast and loose in this wise are betraying the Republican cause in its stronghold.

The partiality of the Federal election laws, as at present upheld and administered, afford a just ground of complaint against the Republican Party. Two wrongs do not make a right, and however indefensible may have been the Democratic attitude on this question, there will remain in many minds a strong repulsion against the control of elections by marshals selected from the Republican Party alone. If the conditions of things were reversed, this repugnance would be as strong in Republican as in Democratic bosoms. And even as it is, the Democrats are able to cite the language of General Garfield himself against the justice of a law which "has been used, or is capable of being used, to fill election precincts with men of one party, whose time may be employed at the public expense for party electioneering purposes."

The alleged preference of the Republican Party for a "strong Federal Government" may weigh in some minds against the candidature of General Garfield. It is well said by Judge Cooley, in his comments on the Constitution, that "the gradual energizing of Federal authority has been accomplished quite as much by the course of public events as by the new amendments to the Constitution"; and it cannot be doubted that the Republican Party is mainly responsible for this "gradual energizing" of the Federal prerogatives. But it seems to us that the course of the party in this direction, so far as it was dangerous, has been arrested by the constitutionally scrupulous administration of President Hayes.

It is a great source of weakness to the managers of the Republican canvass that they have depended so much on simulated terrors and panic cries. The outcry raised against "rebel claims" is a case in point. This clamor has never affrighted the intelligent voter, and the folly of it has been enhanced by the consideration that it was liable to be silenced at any moment by a word from General Hancock. That word has come in the shape of a letter which puts an end to this species of propagandism; and, embarrassing though it be to change the line of battle in the presence of the enemy, it may be doubted whether the spiking of this gun by General Hancock would not prove advantageous to the Republicans if it should drive them to the use of genuine weapons. It would certainly be advantageous to the dignity and sincerity of American politics.

RELIGION AND SCIENCE.

AMONG the subjects which have engaged the attention of the Pan-Presbyterian Council in Philadelphia is that of the relation between science and theology—a subject which has acquired special importance from the assaults of latter-day Agnostics upon the elemental statements of modern theology. The papers submitted to the council were from some of the most distinguished scholars of the Presbyterian communion, and they were simply conclusive as to all the essential points involved. They only confirmed in their searching logic the truth, accepted by all reverent minds, that there can never be any real conflict between religion and science—meaning by religion our knowledge of the Author and Ruler of the universe, and by science our knowledge of the laws of matter. There is as much possibility of a "conflict" between a granite ledge and the light of far-off Arcturus. A battle implies that the contestants stand near enough together so that their weapons can cross the intervening territory. In the relations between religion and science this condition is wanting. Lord Rosse tells us that with his great telescope he looked into space a distance so tremendous that light, which travels at the rate of 200,000 miles in one second, would require 250,000,000 years to pass the stellar gulf. Science and religion are further apart than that. For they deal with different things, from different points of view, for different objects, in different ways. One deals with that which is apprehended only by the senses; the other with that which is cognizable to that higher sight called Faith. One treats of phenomena which the physical eye can reach; the other of phenomena detected only by the clarified vision of the soul. The religionist and the mere scientist may, indeed, indulge in verbal controversy as to the superiority of sense and sight, but there can never be any excuse for real conflict.

The fact should by this time be well understood by the Church that the Darwin-Wallace theory of natural selection—the theory that all organic life has been evolved from lower forms—is entirely consistent with a great First Cause. The introduction of varieties through secondary causes does not touch the question of ultimate origin. After Darwin and Huxley have evolved all they can, after they have analyzed the whole struggle for existence and made a map of the survival of the fittest and reduced all known and knowable biology to a diagram, they are still as much in the dark as ever. If they could demonstrate that the Anglo-Saxon came from an Asian, the Asian from an African, the African from an ape, the lemur from a kangaroo, the kangaroo from a woodchuck, the woodchuck from a bull-frog, the tadpole from an oyster, and the oyster from a trilobite, the problem is still just as far from solution as ever. For the tranquil trilobite leans against a Silurian bullrush and defies the evolutionists. He laughs at the search for his ancestors. He declines to be deduced from anything. The primordial germ—that is the Sphinx that sits upon the sands of eternity early and late, and Science has no Œdipus for that. It is the essential miracle which nothing short of the proof of spontaneous generation can solve, and even then the marvelous matrix would have to be accounted for. The microscopist has no lens that will reach this germ, the chemist no retort that will resolve it. The outreaching fingers of infallible law are around it and before it; behind it is an unfathomable shadow where the eye of faith sees the outlines of a Creator. Astronomy may yet succeed in proving that the solar system was once a globe of incandescent gas, and that the planets resulted from secondary spheres of fire flung off from its periphery and condensed through millions of years of cooling, and, perhaps, compel the inference that the whole universe of systems had a similar centrifugal development; but evolution is not origin, and still the question arises again, "Where did the primary globe of gas come from, and what started it in motion?"

Science cannot answer this question. With the cause of causes Science is modest enough not to deal. Scientific men speculate for the purpose of bringing the imagination to the aid of reason, but they should never dogmatize beyond their eyes, and never put their foot into the realm of the infinite. That is the province of Faith. It is time that intelligent men ceased to cherish puerile fears about the permanence of everlasting pillars. Of two things we may be certain, that no scientific apparatus can take cognizance of the infinite, and that God has never written anything that contradicts the records of creation in field and sky and sea, and in the marvelous life of man.

THE RECORD OF REPUDIATION.

THERE are three States at present in which schemes of repudiating State obligations are being considered by the people. Arkansas has just voted upon the question of refusing to pay either interest or principal of its debt; Virginia is the scene of a struggle between "Adjusters and Debtpayers," and Tennessee is involved in an unlimited number of lawsuits, in which its liability on railroad bonds is brought into question. The record of State debts repudiated is not a flattering one certainly, and its influence is plainly in the direction of destroying both State and individual credit everywhere throughout the country. The list of repudiating States numbers twelve in all.

Alabama, in 1876, repudiated two-thirds of its debt, amounting to $20,000,000, and cut down its interest on the remainder about one-half. No reasonable excuse has yet been made for this heroic action. In Arkansas the Legislature repudiated nearly $12,000,000 of bonds, issued principally on account of the construction of railroads. The plea for this was that the debt had been created by "alien adventurers." The Supreme Court of the State, in 1878, declared that certain bonds, of the State issued in 1869 and 1870, and amounting to over $2,000,000, were invalid, owing to certain constitutional provisions not having been complied with when the debt was created. The "unrecognized debt" of the State, including unpaid interest, amounts to $19,000,000, and the creditors of the State have offered to surrender four-fifths of their claims if the other fifth should be secured to them. The proposition was not accepted, and the amendment just voted upon by the people of the State was passed by the Legislature. It provided that no tax shall be levied, and no appropriation be made, to pay either interest or principal of nearly all the bonds outstanding. It is gratifying to know that the people have rejected that repudiation proposition.

Florida has sponged out $4,000,000 of its indebtedness, comprising a loan to the railroads of the State, by virtue of a decision of the State Supreme Court to the effect that it was not an obligation binding upon the State. Georgia, by an Act of the Legislature in 1877, repudiated $8,000,000 bonds issued on account of railroads, which, with accrued interest, makes an aggregate of nearly $12,000,000 lost to the creditors of that State. Louisiana has been prolific in repudiation schemes. In 1874 the debt was funded at 60 per cent., netting the State a profit of about $8,000,000. In addition, nearly $6,000,000 of bonds and overdue interest have been repudiated. A Constitutional Convention was held in June, 1879, at which it was proposed to declare the entire debt, with the exception of about $4,000,000, invalid. This proposition was defeated, but a resolution was adopted to scale the interest to three and four per cent. It cannot be denied, on the one hand, that Louisiana was made the victim of great frauds in connection with the contraction of its debt, nor, on the other hand, that it has violated in an inexcusable manner its pledged faith. As an instance of the former, it has been shown that all the benefit received for $2,500,000 bonds issued by the State to one railroad was in the shape of a basket of champagne valued at thirty-two dollars, and two spades worth two dollars.

Minnesota stands pre-eminently the worst among repudiating States. It received six million acres of land from the United States Government to aid the construction of railroads. It issued $2,275,000 bonds to the railroads, and, upon the default of the latter, bought them in under foreclosure and acquired title to their franchise and to one hundred and forty miles of completed road, as well as regaining its Congressional land grant. In 1860, by an Act adopted by the people, the entire issue of bonds was repudiated, and every effort since that time to induce the State to recognize its obligations has been defeated. Mississippi, in 1842, repudiated its issue of $7,000,000 bonds, and no interest has been paid on it since 1840. The courts have frequently declared the bonds valid, but the State has steadily refused to pay them. Missouri has refused to pay $3,000,000 bonds issued on account of the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad.

North Carolina enacted, in February, 1879, a funding law under which the debt was reduced to forty, twenty-five, and fifteen per cent. of its face value, about $12,000,000 being thus wiped out. There were also nearly $11,500,000 bonds entirely repudiated, and overdue interest amounting to nearly $20,000,000 more. South Carolina, in 1873, refunded its debt at fifty per cent. and made over $6,500,000 by the operation. About $6,000,000 in addition were repudiated, part of the debt included in that amount being declared invalid by the courts. In 1878, the State Court of Claims declared $2,000,000 of consolidated bonds invalid.

Tennessee stands in the list of repudiating States, as it has refused to pay interest on its debt since 1876. Its indebtedness is about $24,000,000, and several attempts have been made to repudiate a large portion of it. An Act was passed by the Legislature to fund the debt at fifty per cent., but it was defeated by a vote of the people, many who voted against it being in favor of open repudiation of nearly all the debt. Tennessee has less excuse for refusing to meet its obligations than any of the other States. Its debt was, in the main, honestly contracted, and in nearly every case it received dollar for dollar to the full amount of the liabilities assumed.

Virginia is now, and for two years past has been, the scene of a bitter fight for and against the maintaining of the State's honor. In March, 1879, a Bill was passed reducing the rate of interest on the debt from six per cent. to four per cent., while one half of the overdue interest was repudiated, the reduction amounting to nearly $2,000,000. During the present year a Bill was passed by the State Legislature to repudiate one half of the debt, but this measure was vetoed by the Governor and failed to become a law. The people in the State are now divided upon the question of "forcibly adjusting" the debt, or, in other words, repudiating it. In this fight political lines have been lost sight of, and neither of the great political parties has any particular interest in the issue.

Digitized by Google

This issue of State repudiation is quite sufficient to illustrate the fact that State honor is not always a safe guarantee of the payment of a State's obligations. The question whether a method should not be adopted for forcing States to pay their debts is one now being carefully considered. As a step towards its solution, some of the States—notably New Hampshire and New York—have been enacting laws permitting their citizens to assign to them claims which they have against other States, for the purpose of enabling the States to bring suit thereon. The efficacy and wisdom of this method remain yet to be determined.

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

THE King of France who marched his army up the hill merely to march them down again was never in a more ludicrous position than the allied fleet is at the present moment at Ragusa. When the Great Powers of Europe resolved to make a naval demonstration along the Albanian coast, and thus terrify Turkey into compliance with the articles of the Berlin Treaty, it was taken for granted that Turkey would at once yield. The Sultan is a weak, irresolute man, liable to be easily impressed and easily led; but in the present crisis he has proved that he is also very obstinate. He is also very strong in the weakness of the position of the Great Powers. The admirals in command of the fleet have orders not to land men, and it is more than suspected that the French admiral has orders not to commit any act of hostility. It is said that the President of the French Republic has no power to declare war, and that the Chambers alone can do so. The other admirals are more or less under strict orders from their home Governments, and England and Russia are probably the only Powers ready to take any open step of attack. The Albanians, on the other hand, are firm. They are a military people, inhabiting a mountainous country, where it would be almost impossible to attack them with any hope of success. They are resolved to defend their little port of Dulcigno to the last, and the Montenegrins, to whom it was ceded by the Treaty of Berlin, are either unwilling or unable to advance upon it. Riza Pasha, the Turkish commander, is either in sympathy with the Albanians, or else assisting them, and they are aware that no pressure will be brought to bear upon them by the Porte. A detachment of Montenegrins might be taken on board the fleet and landed at Dulcigno under protection of the guns of the men-of-war; but such an act would probably be too aggressive for the present policy of the Great Powers. So it happens that after a great deal of bluster, the allied fleet has returned to Gravosa, the port of Ragusa, there to await further developments. Some talk has been rife as to a naval demonstration in the Bosphorus before Constantinople; but it is extremely unlikely that any such foolish attempt will be made. The latest indications are that the Sultan may ultimately yield, if he cannot find some avenue of escape by dalliance and delay.

The important position that Italy has taken in the naval demonstration has directed some attention to the maritime power of that country. Since the days when Christopher Columbus had to seek Spanish aid in his enterprise, Italy has been almost a cipher upon the seas, but she has quietly made enormous strides, and her ironclad fleet is now one of the finest that sails the waters of the ocean. The Italians have not very much money to spend upon their fleet, but they are shrewd and know how to make a little go a long way. They saw that England and France were yearly increasing the power of their guns and the thickness of the armor-plating on their ships. Italy could not afford, with her small fleet and small revenue put aside for naval purposes, to keep pace with this advance. But she could build ships in advance of the time, and she consequently went to work and produced the famous Duilio and Dandolo, either of which could send the most powerful of the English or French ironclads to the bottom. Not content with them, she has recently launched the Italia, a monster ironclad of 14,000 tons, covered throughout with armor of three feet in thickness; and a companion ship, to be called the Lepanto, is on the stocks. These two ships are the most powerful men of war which have ever been constructed.

The state of affairs in Ireland is most deplorable. From the parts of the country where the agitators have been at work come daily accounts of agrarian outrages of the most brutal description. Ruffianism is rampant, and the agents of the secret societies are traveling about inciting the people to murder and idleness. The murderers skulk behind hedges and fire on the unsuspecting victims as they pass by. The last and most cowardly murder was that of Lord Mountmorres, at Rusheen, in the County of Galway. His Lordship, who is of common stock with the French Montmorencies, was shot while returning from the neighboring town of Clonbur, where he had attended a meeting of magistrates. The body was almost riddled with bullets. One bullet had penetrated the head, three were lodged in the neck and two others in the body. The cause of this outrage was of course a difficulty between landlord and tenant. Not only have these outrages alarmed the landlord class, but employers generally are becoming frightened, and the "patriots," as they most improperly call themselves, are driving from the Emerald Isle the very things which are most needed there—capital and enterprise.

In France the new Ministry is quietly going to work to carry out the anti-religious decrees. Gambetta has gone to Switzerland, and Constans, the Minister of the Interior and Worship, under whose direction the expulsion is taking place, has gone for a while to the country. He has resolved to leave to the Tribunal of Conflicts, which meets in November, the question whether the expulsion of the Jesuits is altogether a matter pertaining to the Executive, or whether the courts can listen to appeals. The first Orders which will be broken up are those which, like the Passionist Fathers, are not recognized by the Vatican. Then it will be the turn of Orders composed for the most part of foreigners. After that, all bodies not coming under either of these categories will be called upon to obey the law.

The latest literary novelty in France is Alexander Dumas's political pamphlet, entitled, "Les Femmes qui votent et les femmes qui tuent," or "The Women who Vote and the Women who Kill," the latter being a reference to the numerous cases which have recently occurred in France. Paris is fast filling up again, and the fashionables are returning to town after the Summer season at the seaside or in the mountains. The races at Longchamps were well attended, and Henri Rochefort was a prominent figure as he went round renewing his acquaintance with the various bookmakers. Gounod has written a new opera which will shortly be produced. It is called "La Tribut de Zamorra," and is founded upon an incident during the Moorish occupation of Spain. The libretto is said to be very good, but although there has been a private trial at the Grand Opera, where Gounod himself sang and played, it is impossible to form any idea of the musical ability of the work.

IT looks as if the Republicans of Ohio have been counting too confidently on their ability to carry the State in next week's election without any serious effort. The Democrats have been quietly but earnestly at work for some weeks past, and, so far as can be judged from surface indications, they are in better shape than their opponents for the final and decisive grapple. Should the Republicans lose the State, or carry it by only a meagre majority, General Garfield might as well abandon all hope of occupying the White House.

EIGHT years ago, Senator Hendricks of Indiana, in a speech at a Democratic meeting, said: "General Butler is coming over here, and you must look out for your spoons." The General has now "gone over" to Indiana and the Democrats, and is speaking from the same platform with Mr. Hendricks. Of course, the latter must have put his spoons in a safe place, but, as a contemporary suggests, the meeting of these distinguished gentlemen must afford to students of human nature a rare opportunity to observe the usefulness of self-control.

RAILROAD enterprise seems likely to invade Mexico in earnest. A company recently organized in Boston proposes to build a road from the City of Mexico to El Paso, Texas, a distance of 1,200 miles of which more than 200 miles have been surveyed, and a small portion from the City of Mexico graded. The intention of the projectors is to make a connection with the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé road, which is now completed to Albuquerque, New Mexico, and, jointly with the St. Louis and San Francisco Company, is rapidly constructing a road to the Pacific Coast.

THE logic of Mr. Conkling's recent speech in this city was, substantially, that the South ought to be disfranchised because it does not pay as much tax, or possess as much commerce, as the North. Why did he not urge the application of that principle when the South was almost solidly Republican? He was quite willing then to count the Southern vote in the Electoral College and in Congress, and the South pays now more tax and has a larger commerce than it had then. Mr. Conkling errs egregiously if he supposes that votes can be caught by any such slatternly argument as he has set up, in this particular, in support of the Republican cause.

A LONDON society journal makes a damaging accusation against English women of the higher classes. It says, in plain words, that the love of strong drink is "increasing among the educated women of our day," and it adds: "During the season just past instances of this were so frequent as to lead to the conjecture that a kind of epidemic of drink was pervading these classes of society in which culture, position, and the possession of every comfort of life would appear to be a sufficient guarantee against so degrading a vice." This is a very serious statement, and we are scarcely prepared to accept it as entirely true. Doubtless, there are exceptional cases in England and on the Continent of the excessive use of liquors by women "in society"; but we suspect there is nothing to warrant the sensational charge that the practice is a common one, as intimated by the journal we have quoted.

THE political campaign in Indiana is red hot. Both the principal parties are working with desperate energy, and the State has not been so thoroughly stirred since the days of the civil war when the popular passions found expression in acts of murderous violence. The Greenbackers, who hold the balance of power, are courted assiduously by the Democrats, and it is not impossible that a partial alliance may be effected in some of the districts. In that event, the Republicans may suffer defeat, and, indeed, it is quite possible that, even with the Greenback vote thrown for distinctive Greenback candidates, the Democracy may carry the State by a fair majority. They have some advantages as well as certain obvious elements of weakness in the fight, and they will not hesitate to use any means at their command to secure success. It cannot be said that the Republicans are in this respect any less unscrupulous than their adversaries. If the election shall not be largely determined by wholesale corruption and fraud, it will not be fault of the party leaders who are setting the battle in array.

THE report of the Northern Pacific Railroad for the year ending with June last shows that this great enterprise is steadily advancing toward completion. Last year the company operated seven hundred and twenty-two miles of road, with an increase of $823,971 in the gross receipts, the net income being sixty per cent. of these receipts. The company has in contemplation the construction of one thousand three hundred and twenty miles of road, upon which work is being rapidly pushed by contractors and surveyors. The stockholders have adopted resolutions authorizing the directors to advance the work of construction to Puget Sound with all the speed consistent with economy and prudence, and to that end have authorized the issue of bonds upon the road or any portion of it now built, and as fast as completed.

EITHER peaceably or violently, the question of Irish land tenure must at no distant day be grappled with and settled. The troubles which have grown up in recent years as the result of the system of landlordism cannot be composed or removed by a repressive policy. One would suppose that, under the circumstances now existing, the class which has the chief stake in the maintenance of law and order would address itself to an intelligent treatment of the cause of the danger, and, by removing all ground of complaint through the introduction of justice and fair play into the administration of the land system, put an end to disorders and peril to the social and political fabric. The recent agrarian outrages must be punished, indeed, but what will be gained if, after they have been punished, the spirit out of which they have grown still remains not less desperate and defiant?

TRADES UNIONISM in Great Britain has attained an influence and strength which make it practically autocratic as to the regulation of many industries. Indeed, the annual congress, representing a constituency of six hundred thousand members, of trade societies and councils, enacts laws as to subjects in which workingmen are interested with just as much deliberation and authority as the British Parliament manifests in dealing with any question of governmental polity. If this vast power were employed temperately and wisely, and with a just regard for the rights of both capital and labor, trades unionism might be a source of enormous benefit; but exercising its authority as it does in direct antagonism to the employing class, its influence can only be regarded as prejudicial to the largest development and prosperity of the industrial interests of the kingdom. It is fortunate that the conditions of social and industrial life in this country do not afford any foothold for a permanent class organization of this sort.

THOSE persons who have imagined that Mr. John Kelly was dead politically will be compelled to conclude, in view of the proceedings of the Democratic State Convention at Saratoga last week, that he is about as lively a political corpse as the campaign has produced. Mr. Kelly never displayed a more absolute authority over his party than he exhibited in the management of that convention. Even the men who bitterly denounced and opposed him a few months ago courted his favor and eagerly executed his decrees. He stands now, unquestionably, at the head of the Democracy of the State, and the organization which he controls advances once more to supremacy in the councils of the party which at Cincinnati treated it with downright insult and contempt. Such a victory as this could never have been achieved by a man destitute of the qualities of leadership, and these Mr. Kelly, whatever may be thought of some of his methods, unquestionably possesses to a larger extent than very many have been willing to concede.

THE Greenback leaders seem to be unable to agree as to the disposition of their stock in trade in the break-up which is now in progress. General Weaver, their candidate for President, insists upon holding on to the party effects instead of putting them up at auction, while Mr. Frank Hughes, an equally conspicuous Greenbacker in Pennsylvania, and a few others, denounce General Weaver as desiring to play into the hands of the Republicans by favoring a straight Greenback ticket in Maine. this General Weaver has replied: "I am opposed to a joint Electoral ticket with the Democratic Party in Maine or with the Republican Party in West Virginia, as has been requested in that State, and will prevent such action in any section of the Union if within my power. I am in favor of an open, straight fight against the Democratic and Republican wings of the money power, and have no choice between them. If you have, take your choice and go where you belong." This is certainly explicit, and it suggests that possibly General Weaver is, after all, honest and sincere in his advocacy of Greenback doctrines, while his assailants have not yet been able to break entirely away from old party entanglements. The truth is, that the Greenbackers are rapidly being resolved into their original elements, and will very soon be found occupying just the party relations which they sustained before the Greenback craze took possession of them.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.

SECRETARIES SCHURZ and SHERMAN are making campaign speeches in Ohio and Indiana.

SIX illicit distilleries have been seized at Red Oak, Ga., by the internal revenue agents.

THE national reunion of Union prisoners of the late war was held in Indianapolis last week.

A STRIKE in several of the Fall River mills is contemplated in case of a reduction of wages.

TWO LOTTERY dealers were last week sentenced to terms of imprisonment, and several others subjected to fines, in the Court of General Sessions of this city.

THE population of Virginia is shown by the recent census to be 1,599,335, an increase of 284,173 since 1870.

THE California Supreme Court has decided that no election can be held for municipal officers in San Francisco in November.

THE New York Democratic State Convention last week nominated Associate Judge Rapallo for Chief Judge of the Court of Appeals.

A BRITISH steamship took 7,118 bales of cotton from Savannah, Ga., last week, the largest cargo of cotton ever cleared from any Atlantic port.

THE Grand Jury of St. John's County, Florida, have indicted two persons for robbing trunks and bodies which came ashore from the wreck of the City of Vera Cruz.

WHEAT in Minnesota and Dakota has turned out better than was expected, and the crop is but little short of an average. Dakota's crop is fully up to the average.

IMMENSE swarms of grasshoppers have recently swept over some parts of Texas. In some cases farms were left wholly desolate, even the cotton-stalks being devoured.

THE Land Office annual report shows that 15,699,238 acres of public lands were surveyed and 6,048,579 entered under the Homestead Act in the year ending June 1st.

A CONVENTION of Irish Republicans of New York was held at Saratoga last week. An address to the Irishmen of the country in favor of the Republican Presidential ticket was adopted.

AMONG recent nominations for Congress is that of General W. S. Rosecrans in the First District of California. Speaker Randall has been renominated in the Third Pennsylvania District.

THE American Union Telegraph Company is permitted, by a decision of Judge Miller of the Supreme Court, to extend its telegraphic system over the Union and Central Pacific Railroads.

SECRETARY EVARTS addressed a Republican mass meeting in this city last week. The Union League Club has formed a committee of fifty to further the interests of the Republican Party in the campaign.

THE famous Stevens Battery, which originally cost $1,000,000, was sold last week for $55,000. It belonged to the estate of the late Robert L. Stevens, of New Jersey, who built it as an experiment in naval architecture.

GENERAL GRANT presided and Senators Conkling and Logan made addresses at a Republican mass meeting held at Warren, Ohio, on the 28th ult. General Garfield was subsequently visited by these gentlemen at his home at Mentor.

THE reduction of the public debt in September was $8,974,831, and for the three months of the current fiscal year, $26,500,000. This is a marked improvement over the corresponding period of 1879, when the total reduction for the months of July, August and September reached only $4,800,000.

THERE has been an eager demand for tickets for the Bernhardt season at Booth's Theatre. On the night previous to the opening of the sale, a line of people occupied the sidewalk in front of the theatre from twilight until morning. Tickets sold for $60 each, and $30,000 was realized on the first day.

THE clearings of the associated banks of Chicago for the month of September were $142,360,000, or $28,000,000 greater than for September, 1879. The clearings for the nine months ending in September were $1,195,600,000, an increase compared with the same period last year of $243,000,000.

THE influenza which has for some time prevailed among horses at Boston is reported to have reached this city, and a small percentage of animals among the street-car horses show signs of disease by coughing, but they yield readily to treatment, and a recurrence of the epizooty of 1872-73 is not generally anticipated.

A DISPATCH from Tucson, Ari., says that General Carr recently had a fight with a small party of Victoria's band, eighteen in number, in the Estebel Mountains, killing them all. Bloody fighting is also said to have occurred lately between the Salteaux and Mandrill Indians, in which a large number of both bands were killed.

THE Greenbackers of South Carolina have nominated a full State ticket, with L. W. R. Blair for Governor. In New Hampshire the same party has nominated Warren B. Brown for Governor, and denounced all attempts at fusion. Ex-Governor Gaston has been nominated for Congress in Massachusetts, and ex-Governor Curtin in Pennsylvania. The Nebraska Democrats have nominated Thomas Tipton for Governor.

Foreign.

MR. FORSTER, the Chief Secretary for Ireland, does not deem any new coercive legislation necessary.

THE Melbourne Exhibition was opened October 1st with great éclat. All the principal nations are represented.

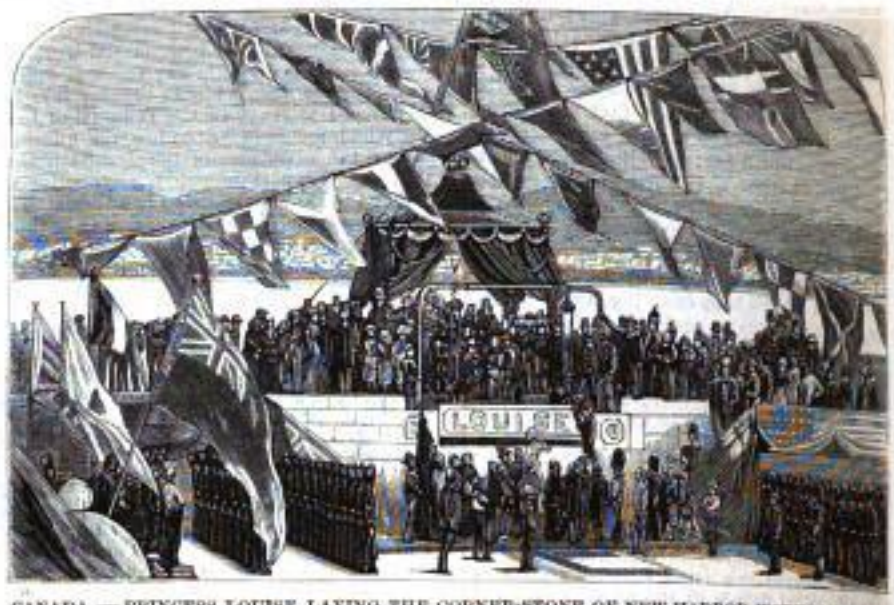
THE supporters of Yakoob Khan intend to organize attacks on the British until he is proclaimed Ameer of Afghanistan.

RUMORS are rife in Italy of Garibaldi's intentions and of revolutionary movements, against which the Government has taken precautions.

THE Spanish Government has resolved to proceed against all priests who introduce politics into their sermons and to dismiss notorious Carlist mayors.

IN Austria a strong opposition to any future war with Turkey is daily developing. France will not separate from the European concert as to affairs in the East.

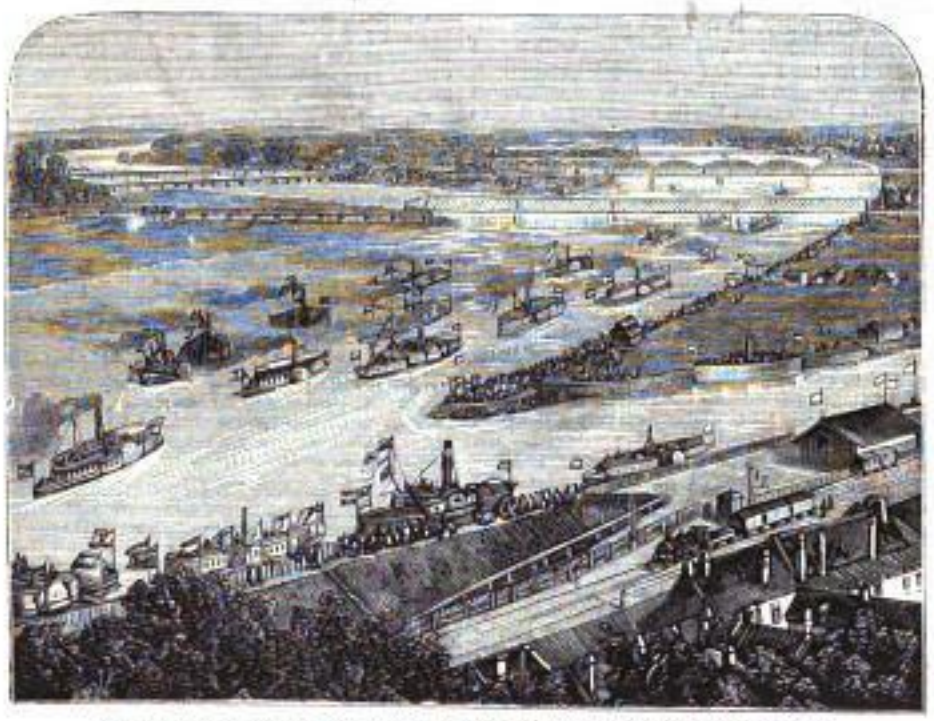
ONE thousand pounds reward has been offered for the arrest of the murderers of Lord Mountmorres. The two farmers arrested for the murder have been remanded.



THE Mexican Congress opened its session on the 16th ult. President Diaz's opening address expressed great satisfaction at the political and moral advancement of the republic. He said the negotiations for the re-establishment of diplomatic relations with France had resulted satisfactorily.

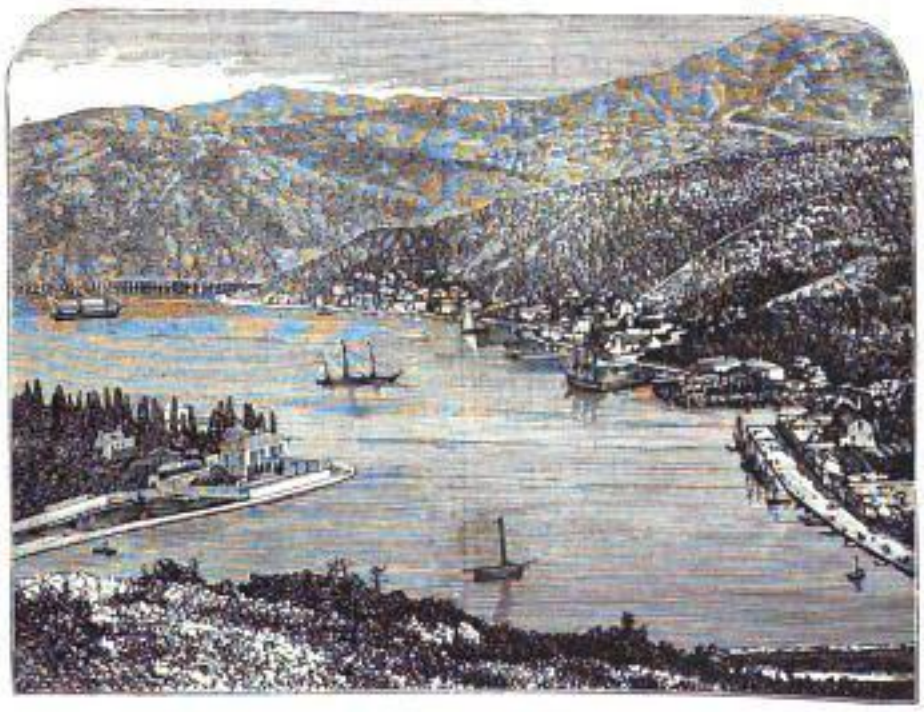
Digitized by Google

The Pictorial Spirit of the Illustrated Foreign Press.—SEE PAGE 103.



FRANCE.—INAUGURATION OF THE BLAISE PASCAL STATUE, CLERMONT-FERRAND.

CANADA.—PRINCESS LOUISE LAYING THE CORNER-STONE OF NEW HARBOR WORKS, QUEBEC.



SPAIN.—THE MILITARY PONTOON DISASTER ON THE EBRO.

AUSTRIA.—STRAIGHTENING THE COURSE OF THE DANUBE, NEAR VIENNA.

AUSTRALIA.—INTERIOR VIEW OF THE INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION BUILDING, MELBOURNE.

AUSTRIA.—GRAVOSA, WHERE THE ALLIED FLEET ASSEMBLED.

AUSTRIA.—CATTARO, ON THE ADRIATIC COAST.

Digitized by Google

RHODE ISLAND.—CELEBRATION OF THE TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE SETTLEMENT OF BRISTOL.
FROM SKETCHES BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—SEE PAGE 103.

Digitized by Google

THE BLACK ROBE.

BY WILKIE COLLINS.

(Continued from front page.)

I had known him long enough not to take offense at his reminding me, in this considerate way, that I was a poor man. The proposed change of scene tempted me. What did I care for the Channel passage? Besides, there was the irresistible attraction of getting away from home. The end of it was that I accepted Romayne's invitation.

II.

SHORTLY after noon, on the next day, we were established at Boulogne—near Lady Berrick, but not at her hotel. "If we live in the same house," Romayne reminded me, "we shall be bored by the companion and the doctor. Meetings on the stairs, you know, and exchanging bows and small talk." He hated those trivial conventionalities of society, in which other people delight. When somebody once asked him in what company he felt most at ease, he made a shocking answer—he said, "In the company of dogs."

I waited for him on the pier while he went to see her ladyship. He joined me again with his bitterest smile. "What did I tell you? She is not well enough to see me to-day. The doctor looks grave; and the companion puts her handkerchief to her eyes. We may be kept in this place for weeks to come."

The afternoon proved to be rainy. Our early dinner was a bad one. This last circumstance tried his temper sorely. He was no gourmand; the question of cookery was (with him) purely a matter of digestion. Those late hours of study, and that abuse of tea, to which I have already alluded, had sadly injured his stomach. The doctors warned him of serious consequences to his nervous system, unless he altered his habits. He had little faith in medical science; and he greatly over-rated the restorative capacity of his constitution. So far as I know, he had always neglected the doctor's advice.

The weather cleared towards evening, and we went out for a walk. We passed a church—a Roman Catholic church, of course—the doors of which were still open. Some poor women were kneeling at their prayers in the dim light. "Wait a minute," said Romayne, "I am in a vile temper. Let me try to put myself into a better frame of mind."

I followed him into the church. He knelt down in a dark corner by himself. I confess I was surprised. He had been baptized in the Church of England; but, so far as outward practice was concerned, he belonged to no religious community. I had often heard him speak with a sincere reverence and admiration of the spirit of Christianity, but he never, to my knowledge, attended any place of public worship. When we met again outside the church, I asked if he had been converted to the Roman Catholic faith.

"No," he said, "I hate the inveterate striving of that priesthood after social influence and political power as cordially as the fiercest Protestant living. But let us not forget that the Church of Rome has great merits to set against great faults. Its system is administered with an admirable knowledge of the higher needs of human nature. Take, as one example, what you have just seen. The solemn tranquillity of that church, the poor people praying near me, the few words of prayer by which I silently united myself to my fellow-creatures, have calmed me and done me good. In our country I should have found the church closed out of service hours." He took my arm and abruptly changed the subject: "How will you occupy yourself," he asked, "if my aunt receives me to-morrow?"

I assured him that I should easily find ways and means of getting through the time. The next morning a message came from Lady Berrick to say that she would see her nephew after breakfast. Left by myself, I walked towards the pier, and met with a man who asked me to hire his boat. He had lines and bait at my service. Most unfortunately, as the event proved, I decided on occupying an hour or two by sea-fishing.

The wind shifted while we were out, and before we could get back to the harbor, the tide had turned against us. It was six o'clock when I arrived at the hotel. A little open carriage was waiting at the door. I found Romayne impatiently expecting me, and no signs of dinner on the table. He informed me that he had accepted an invitation, in which I was included, and promised to explain everything in the carriage.

Our driver took the road that led towards the High Town. I subordinated my curiosity to my sense of politeness, and asked for news of his aunt's health.

"She is seriously ill, poor soul," he said. "I am sorry I spoke so petulantly and so unfilially when we met at the club. The near prospect of death has developed qualities in her nature which I ought to have seen before this. No matter how it may be delayed, I will patiently wait her time for the crossing to England."

So long as he believed himself to be in the right he was, as to his actions and opinions, one of the most obstinate men I ever met with. But once let him be convinced that he was wrong, and he rushed into the other extreme—became needlessly distrustful of himself, and needlessly eager in seizing his opportunity of making atonement. In this latter mood he was capable—with the best intentions—of committing acts of the most childish imprudence. With some misgivings, I asked how he had amused himself in my absence.

"I waited for you," he said, "till I lost all patience, and went out for a walk. First, I thought of going to the beach, but the smell of the harbor drove me back into the town, and there, oddly enough, I met with a man, a certain Captain Peterkin, who had been a friend of mine at college."

"A visitor to Boulogne?" I inquired

"Not exactly."

"A resident?"

"Yes. The fact is, I lost sight of Peterkin when I left Oxford—and, since that time, he seems to have drifted into difficulties. We had a long talk. He is living here, he tells me, until his affairs are settled."

I needed no further enlightenment—Captain Peterkin stood as plainly revealed to me as if I had known him for years. "Isn't it a little imprudent," I said, "to renew your acquaintance with a man of that sort? Couldn't you have passed him with a bow?"

Romayne smiled uneasily. "I dare say you're right," he answered. "But, remember, I had left my aunt, feeling ashamed of the unjust way in which I had thought and spoken of her. How did I know that I mightn't be wronging an old friend next, if I kept Peterkin at a distance? His present position may be as much his misfortune, poor fellow, as his fault. I was half inclined to pass him as you say, but I distrusted my own judgment. He held out his hand, and he was so glad to see me. It can't be helped now. I shall be anxious to hear your opinion of him."

"Are we going to dine with Captain Peterkin?"

"Yes. I happened to mention that wretched dinner yesterday at our hotel. He said, 'Come to my boarding house. Out of Paris, there isn't such a table d'hote in France.' I tried to get off it—not caring, as you know, to go among strangers; I said I had a friend with me. He invited you most cordially to accompany me. More excuses on my part only led to a painful result. I hurt Peterkin's feelings. 'I'm down in the world,' he said, 'and I'm not fit company for you and your friends. I beg your pardon for taking the liberty of inviting you!' He turned away with the tears in his eyes. What could I do?"

I thought to myself, "You could have lent him five pounds, and got rid of his invitation without the slightest difficulty." If I had returned in reasonable time to go out with Romayne, we might not have met the captain; or, if we had met him, my presence would have prevented the confidential talk, and the invitation that followed. I felt I was to blame—and yet, how could I help it? It was useless to remonstrate—the mischief was done.

We left the Old Town on our right hand, and drove on past a little colony of suburban villas, to a house standing by itself, surrounded by stone walls. As we crossed the front-garden on our way to the door, I noticed against the side of the house two kennels, inhabited by two large watch-dogs. Was the proprietor afraid of thieves?

III.

THE moment we were introduced to the drawing-room, my suspicions of the company we were likely to meet with were fully confirmed.

"Cards, billiards and betting"—there was the inscription legibly written on the manner and appearance of Captain Peterkin. The bright-eyed, yellow old lady who kept the boarding-house would have been worth five thousand pounds in jewelry alone, if the ornaments which profusely covered her had been genuine precious stones. The younger ladies present had their cheeks as highly rouged and their eyelids as elaborately pencilled in black as if they were going on the stage, instead of going to dinner. We found these fair creatures drinking Madeira as a whet to their appetites. Among the men, there were two who struck me as the most finished and complete blackguards whom I had ever met with in all my experience, at home and abroad. One, with a brown face and a broken nose, was presented to us by the title of "Commander," and was described as a person of great wealth and distinction in Peru, traveling for amusement. The other wore a military uniform and decorations, and was spoken of as "The General." A bold, bullying manner, a fat, sodden face, little leering eyes, and greasy-looking hands, made this man so repellent to me that I privately longed to kick him. Romayne had evidently been announced, before our arrival, as a landed gentleman with a large income. Men and women vied in servile attentions to him. When we went into the dining-room, the fascinating creature who sat next to him held her fan before her face, and so made a private interview of it between the rich Englishman and herself. With regard to the dinner, I shall only report that it justified Captain Peterkin's boast, in some degree at least. The wine was good, and the conversation became gay to the verge of indelicacy. Usually the most temperate of men, Romayne was tempted by his neighbors into drinking freely. I was unfortunately seated at the opposite extremity of the table, and I had no opportunity of warning him. The dinner reached its conclusion, and we all returned together, on the foreign plan, to coffee and cigars in the drawing-room. The women smoked and drank liqueurs as well as coffee, with the men. One of them went to the piano, and a little impromptu ball followed, the ladies dancing with their cigarettes in their mouths. Keeping my eyes and ears on the alert, I saw an innocent-looking table, with a surface of rosewood, suddenly develop a substance of green cloth. At the same time a neat little, roulette-table made its appearance from a hiding-place in a sofa. Passing near the venerable landlady, I heard her ask the servant, in a whisper, "if the dogs were loose?" After what I had observed, I could only conclude that the dogs were used as a patrol to give the alarm in case of a descent by the police. It was plainly high time to thank Captain Peterkin for his hospitality, and to take our leave.

"We have had enough of this," I whispered to Romayne in English. "Let us go."

In these days, it is a delusion to suppose that you can speak confidentially in the English language when French people are within hearing. One of the ladies asked Romayne tenderly if he was tired of her already. Another reminded him it was raining heavily (as we could all hear), and suggested waiting until it cleared up. The hideous General waved his greasy hand in the direction of the card-table, and said, "The game is waiting for us."

Romayne was excited, but not stupefied, by the wine he had drunk. He answered, discreetly enough, "I must beg you to excuse me: I am a poor card-player."

The General suddenly looked grave. "You are speaking, sir, under a strange misapprehension," he said. "Our game is lansquenet—essentially a game of chance. With luck, the poorest player is a match for the whole table."

Romayne persisted in his refusal. As a matter of course, I supported him, with all needful care to avoid giving offense. The General took offense, nevertheless. He crossed his arms on his breast, and looked at us fiercely.

"Does this mean, gentlemen, that you distrust the company?" he asked.

The broken-nosed Commander, hearing the question, immediately joined us, in the interests of peace—bearing with him the elements of persuasion, under the form of a lady on his arm.

The lady stepped briskly forward, and tapped the General on the shoulder with her fan. "I am one of the company," she said; "and I am sure Mr. Romayne doesn't distrust me!" She turned to Romayne with her most irresistible smile. "A gentleman always plays cards," she resumed, "when he has a lady for a partner. Let us join our interests at the table—and, dear Mr. Romayne, don't risk too much!" She put her pretty little purse into his hand, and looked as if she had been in love with him for half her lifetime.

The fatal influence of the sex, assisted by wine, produced the inevitable result. Romayne allowed himself to be led to the card-table. For a moment the General delayed the beginning of the game. After what had happened, it was necessary that he should assert the strict sense of justice that was in him. "We are all honorable men," he began.

"And brave men," the Commander added, admiring the General.

"And brave men," the General admitted, admiring the Commander. "Gentlemen, if I have been led into expressing myself with unnecessary warmth of feeling, I apologize, and regret it."

"Nobly spoken!" the Commander pronounced. The General put his hand on his heart and bowed. The game began.

As the poorest man of the two, I had escaped the attentions lavished by the ladies on Romayne. At the same time, I was obliged to pay for my dinner by taking some part in the proceedings of the evening. Small stakes were allowed, I found, at roulette; and, besides, the heavy chances in favor of the table made it scarcely worth while to run the risk of cheating, in this case. I placed myself next to the least rascally-looking man in the company, and played roulette.

For a wonder, I was successful at the first attempt. My neighbor handed me my winnings. "I have lost every farthing I possess," he whispered to me, piteously; "and I have a wife and children at home." I lent the poor wretch five francs. He smiled faintly as he looked at the money. "It reminds me," he said, "of my last transaction, when I borrowed of that gentleman there, who is betting on the General's luck at the card-table. Beware of employing him as I did. What do you think I got for my note of hand of four thousand francs? A hundred bottles of champagne, fifty bottles of ink, fifty bottles of blacking, three dozen handkerchiefs, two pictures by unknown masters, two shawls, one hundred maps, and—five francs."

We went on playing. My luck deserted me; I lost, and lost, and lost again. From time to time I looked round at the card-table. The "deal" had fallen early to the General; and it seemed to be indefinitely prolonged. A heap of notes and gold—won mainly from Romayne, as I afterwards discovered—lay before him. As for my neighbor, the unhappy possessor of the bottles of blacking, the pictures by unknown masters, and the rest of it, he won, and then rashly presumed on his good fortune. Deprived of his last farthing, he retired into a corner of the room, and consoled himself with a cigar. I had just risen to follow his example when a furious uproar burst out at the card-table.

I saw Romayne spring up and snatch the cards out of the General's hand. "You scoundrel!" he shouted, "you are cheating!" The General started to his feet in a fury. "You lie!" he cried. I attempted to interfere; but Romayne had already seen the necessity of controlling himself. "A gentleman doesn't accept an insult from a swindler," he said, coolly. "Accept this, then!" the General answered, and spat on him. In an instant Romayne knocked him down.

The blow was dealt straight between his eyes; he was a gross, big-boned man, and he fell heavily. For the time he was stunned. The women ran, screaming, out of the room. The peaceable Commander trembled from head to foot. Two of the men present, who, to give them their due, were no cowards, locked the doors. "You don't go," they said, "till we see whether he recovers or not." Cold water, assisted by the landlady's smelling-salts, brought the General to his senses after a while. He whispered something to one of his friends, who immediately turned to me. "The General challenges Mr. Romayne," he said. "As one of his seconds, I demand an appointment for to-morrow morning." I refused to make any appointment unless the doors were first unlocked, and we were left free to depart. "Our carriage is waiting outside," I added. "If it returns to the hotel without us there will be an inquiry." This latter consideration had its effect. On their side, the doors were opened; on our side, the appointment was made. We left the house.

IV.

IN consenting to receive the General's representatives, it is needless to say that I merely desired to avoid provoking another quarrel. If those persons were really impudent enough to call at the hotel, I had arranged to threaten them with the interference of the police, and so to put an end to the matter. Romayne expressed no opinion on the subject, one way or the other. His conduct inspired me with a feeling of uneasiness. The filthy insult of which he had been made the object seemed to be rankling in his mind. He went away thoughtfully to his own room. "Have you nothing to say to me?" I asked. He only answered, "Wait till to-morrow."

The next day the seconds appeared.

I had expected to see two of the men with whom we had dined. To my astonishment, the visitors proved to be officers of the General's regiment. They brought proposals for a hostile meeting the next morning, the choice of weapons being left to Romayne as the challenged man.

It was now quite plain to me that the General's peculiar method of card playing had, thus far, not been discovered and exposed. He might keep doubtful company, and might—as I afterwards heard—be suspected in certain quarters. But that he still had, formally speaking, a reputation to preserve, was proved by the appearance of the two gentlemen present as his representatives. They declared, with evident sincerity, that Romayne had made a fatal mistake, had provoked the insult offered to him, and had resented it by a brutal and cowardly outrage. As a man and a soldier, the General was doubly bound to insist on a duel. No apology would be accepted even if an apology were offered.

In this emergency, as I understood it, there was but one course to follow. I refused to receive the challenge.

Being asked for my reasons, I found it necessary to speak within certain limits. Though we knew the General to be a cheat, it was a delicate matter to dispute his right to claim satisfaction, when he had found two officers to carry his message. I produced the seized cards (which Romayne had brought away with him in his pocket) and offered them as a formal proof that my friend had not been mistaken.

The seconds—evidently prepared for this circumstance by their principal—declined to examine the cards. In the first place, they said, not even the discovery of foul play (supposing the discovery to have been really made) could justify Romayne's conduct. In the second place, the General's high character made it impossible, under any circumstances, that he could be responsible. Like ourselves, he had rashly associated with bad company, and he had been the innocent victim of an error or a fraud committed by some other person present at the table.

Driven to my last resource, I could now only base my refusal to receive the challenge on the ground that we were Englishmen, and that the practice of dueling had been abolished in England. Both the seconds at once declined to accept this statement in justification of my conduct.

"You are now in France," said the elder of the two, "where a duel is the established remedy for an insult among gentlemen. You are bound to respect the social laws of the country in which you are for the time residing. If you refuse to do so, you lay yourselves open to a public imputation on your courage of a nature too degrading to be more particularly alluded to. Let us adjourn this interview for three hours, on the ground of informality. We ought to confer with two gentlemen, acting on Mr. Romayne's behalf. Be prepared with another second to meet us, and reconsider your decision before we call again."

The Frenchmen had barely taken their departure by one door, when Romayne entered by another.

"I have heard it all," he said, quietly. "Accept the challenge."

I declare solemnly that I left no means untried of opposing my friend's resolution. No man could have felt more strongly convinced than I did that nothing could justify the course he was taking. My remonstrances were completely thrown away. He was deaf to sense and reason from the moment when he had heard an imputation on his courage suggested as a possible result of any affair in which he was concerned.

"With your views," he said, "I won't ask you to accompany me to the ground. I can easily find French seconds. And, mind this, if you attempt to prevent the meeting, the duel will take place elsewhere, and our friendship is at an end from that moment."

After this, I suppose it is needless to add that I accompanied him to the ground the next morning as his second.

That night he made his will—in preparation for the worst that could happen. What actually did happen was equally beyond his anticipations and mine.

V.

WE were punctual to the appointed hour—eight o'clock.

The second who acted with me was a French gentleman, a relative of one of the officers who had brought the challenge. At his suggestion, we had chosen the pistol as our weapon. Romayne, like most Englishmen at the present time, knew nothing of the use of the sword. He was almost equally inexperienced with the pistol.

Our opponents were late. They kept us waiting for more than ten minutes. It was not pleasant weather to wait in. The day had dawned damp and drizzling. A thick white fog was slowly rolling in on us from the sea.

When they did appear, the General was not among them. A tall, well-dressed young man

Digitized by Google

saluted Romayne with stern courtesy, and said to a stranger who accompanied him, "Explain the circumstances."

The stranger proved to be a surgeon. He entered at once on the necessary explanation. The General was too ill to appear. He had been attacked that morning by a fit—the consequences of the blow that he had received. Under these circumstances, his eldest son (Maurice) was now on the ground to fight the duel, on his father's behalf, attended by the General's seconds, and with the General's full approval.

We instantly refused to allow the duel to take place, Romayne loudly declaring that he had no quarrel with the General's son. Upon this, Maurice broke away from his seconds, drew off one of his gloves, and, stepping close up to Romayne, struck him on the face with the glove. "Have you no quarrel with me now?" the young Frenchman asked. "Must I spit on you as my father did?" His seconds dragged him away, and apologized to us for the outbreak. But the mischief was done. Romayne's fiery temper flashed in his eyes. "Load the pistols," he said. After the insult publicly offered to him, and the outrage publicly threatened, there was no other course to take.

It had been left to us to produce the pistols. We therefore requested the seconds of our opponent to examine and to load them. While this was being done, the advancing sea-fog so completely enveloped us that the duelists were unable to see each other. We were obliged to wait for the chance of a partial clearing in the atmosphere. Romayne's temper had become calm again. The generosity of his nature spoke in the words which he now addressed to his seconds.

"After all," he said, "the young man is a good son—he is bent on redressing what he believes to be his father's wrong. Does his flipping his glove in my face matter to me? I think I shall fire in the air."

"I shall refuse to act as your second if you do," answered the French gentleman who was assisting us. "The General's son is famous for his skill with the pistol. If you didn't see it in his face just now, I did—he means to kill you. Defend your life, sir!" I spoke quite as strongly to the same purpose when my turn came. Romayne yielded—he placed himself unreservedly in our hands.

In a quarter of an hour the fog lifted a little. We measured the distance, having previously arranged (at my suggestion) that the two men should both fire at the same moment, at a given signal. Romayne's composure, as they faced each other, was, in a man of his irritable nervous temperament, really wonderful. I placed him sideways, in a position which in some degree lessened his danger, by lessening the surface exposed to the bullet. My French colleague put the pistol into his hand, and gave him the last word of advice. "Let your arm hang loosely down, with the barrel of the pistol pointing straight to the ground. When you hear the signal, only lift your arm as far as the elbow; keep the elbow pressed against your side—and fire." We could do no more for him. As we drew aside—I own it—my tongue was like a cinder in my mouth, and a horrid inner cold crept through me to the marrow of my bones.

The signal was given, and the two shots were fired at the same time.

My first look was at Romayne. He took off his hat and handed it to me with a smile. His adversary's bullet had cut a piece out of the brim of his hat, on the right side. He had literally escaped by a hair-breadth.

While I was congratulating him, the fog gathered again more thickly than ever. Looking anxiously towards the ground occupied by our adversaries, we could only see vague, shadowy forms, hurriedly crossing and recrossing each other in the mist. Something had happened! My French colleague took my arm and pressed it significantly. "Leave me to inquire," he said. Romayne tried to follow; I held him back; we neither of us exchanged a word.

The fog thickened and thickened, until nothing was to be seen. Once we heard the surgeon's voice calling impatiently for a light to help him. No light appeared as we could see. Dreary as the fog itself, the silence gathered around us again. On a sudden it was broken, horribly broken, by another voice, strange to both of us, shrieking hysterically through the impenetrable mist. "Where is he?" the voice cried, in the French language. "Assassin! assassin! where are you?" Was it a woman, or was it a boy? We heard nothing more. The effect on Romayne was terrible to see. He who had calmly confronted the weapon lifted to kill him, shuddered dumbly like a terror-stricken animal. I put my arm round him, and hurried him away from the place.

We waited at the hotel until our French friend joined us. After a brief interval he appeared, announcing that the surgeon would follow him.

The duel had ended fatally. The chance course of the bullet, urged by Romayne's unpracticed hand, had struck the General's son just above the right nostril, had penetrated to the back of his neck, and had communicated a fatal shock to the spinal marrow. He was a dead man before they could take him back to his father's house.

So far, our fears were confirmed. But there was something else to tell, for which our worst presentiments had not prepared us.

A younger brother of the fallen man (a boy of thirteen years old) had secretly followed the dueling party on their way from his father's house, had hidden himself, and had seen the dreadful end. The seconds only knew of it when he burst out of his place of concealment, and fell on his knees by his dying brother's side. His were the fearful cries which we had heard from invisible lips. The slayer of his brother was the "assassin" whom he had vainly tried to discover through the fathomless obscurity of the mist.

We both looked at Romayne. He silently looked back at us, like a man turned to stone. I tried to reason with him.

"Your life was at your opponent's mercy," I said. "It was he who was skilled in the use of the pistol; your risk was infinitely greater than his. Are you responsible or an accident? Rouse yourself, Romayne! Think of the time to come, when all this will be forgotten."

"Never," he said, "to the end of my life."

He made that reply in dull, monotonous tones. His eyes looked wearily and vacantly straight before him. The extraordinary change in him had startled me. He showed no signs of a coming loss of consciousness; and yet, all that was most brightly animated in his physical life seemed to have mysteriously faded away. I spoke to him again. He remained impenetrably silent; he appeared not to hear, or not to understand me. The surgeon came in, while I was still at a loss what to say or do next. Without waiting to be asked for his opinion, he observed Romayne attentively, and then drew me away into the next room.

"Your friend is suffering from a severe nervous shock," he said. "Can you tell me anything of his habits of life?"

I mentioned the prolonged night studies and the excessive use of tea. The surgeon shook his head.

"If you want my advice," he proceeded, "take him home at once. Don't subject him to further excitement, when the result of the duel is known in the town. If it ends in our appearing in a court of law, it will be a mere formality in this case, and you can surrender when the time comes. Leave me your address in London."

I felt that the wisest thing I could do was to follow his advice. The boat crossed to Folkestone at an early hour that day—we had no time to lose. Romayne offered no objection to our return to England; he seemed perfectly careless what became of him. "Leave me quiet," he said, "and do as you like." I wrote a few lines to Lady Berrick's medical attendant, informing him of the circumstances. A quarter of an hour afterwards we were on board the steamboat.

There were very few passengers. After we had left the harbor my attention was attracted by a young English lady—traveling, apparently, with her mother. As we passed her on the deck she looked at Romayne, with compassionate interest so vividly expressed in her beautiful face that I imagined they might be acquainted. With some difficulty I prevailed sufficiently over the torpor that possessed him to induce him to look at our fellow-passenger.

"Do you know that charming person?" I asked.

"No," he replied, with the weariest indifference. "I never saw her before. I'm tired—tired—tired! Don't speak to me; leave me by myself."

I left him. His rare personal attractions—of which, let me add, he never appeared to be conscious—had evidently made their natural appeal to the interest and admiration of the young lady who had met him by chance. The expression of resigned sadness and suffering, now visible in his face, added greatly no doubt to the influence that he had unconsciously exercised over the sympathies of a delicate and sensitive woman. It was no uncommon circumstance in his past experience of the sex—as I myself well knew—to be the object, not of admiration only, but of true and ardent love. He had never reciprocated the passion—had never even appeared to take it seriously. Marriage might, as the phrase is, be the salvation of him. Would he ever marry?

Leaning over the bulwark, idly pursuing this train of thought, I was recalled to present things by a low, sweet voice—the voice of the lady of whom I had been thinking.

"Excuse me for disturbing you," she said; "I think your friend wants you."

She spoke with the modesty and self-possession of a highly-bred woman. A little heightening of her color made her, to my eyes, more beautiful than ever. I thanked her, and hastened back to Romayne.

He was standing by the barred skylight which guarded the machinery. I instantly noticed a change in him. His eyes wandering here and there, in search of me, had more than recovered their animation—there was a wild look of terror in them. He seized me roughly by the arm and pointed down to the engine room.

"What do you hear there?" he asked.

"I hear the thump of the engines."

"Nothing else?"

"Nothing. What do you hear?"

He suddenly turned away.

"I'll tell you," he said, "when we get on shore."

(To be continued.)

THE BI-CENTENNIAL OF BRISTOL, R. I.

THE celebration, on the 24th ultimo, of the two hundredth anniversary of the settlement of the town of Bristol, R. I., was a very pleasant and successful affair. The celebration proper began on the evening of the 23d, when the town was illuminated from one end to the other with electric lights, fireworks, etc. On the anniversary day the town was gayly decorated, and the streets were crowded with visitors. A national salute was fired at sunrise, and the church-bells were rung an hour. A procession, in five divisions, was formed at 10:30, comprising military escorting State and town officers; a company of gentlemen in ancient costume, carrying and guarding the flag presented to the town in 1770 by Colonel Byfield; the Fire Department; Sons and Daughters of Bristol, and representatives of the trades. The column moved through the streets to a tent on the Common where Le Baron Colt delivered an address of welcome. Professor J. Lewis Diman, of Brown University, delivered an oration; Bishop Howe, of Central Pennsylvania, read a poem, and the schoolchildren sang an original ode and hymn. Dinner was served in the afternoon, and speeches were made by prominent gentlemen.

An interesting feature of the occasion was the planting of four trees in memory of Burton, Oliver, Byfield and Walley, the original purchasers of the town from the Plymouth Colony. Mayor H. K. Oliver, of Salem, Mass., great-great-grandson of one of the purchasers, planted one of the trees. The others were planted by Messrs. William J. Miller and Wilfred H. Munroe, of the town. Their addresses were appropriate. In the evening a grand promenade concert was given in the tent by the Cadet Band of Boston. Thousands visited the Town Hall during the day for the purpose of seeing the exhibition illustrative of the history of the town. Here was to be found the portraits of the famous De Wolf family; interesting relics of bygone days in the shape of dress goods, china, crockery, cooking utensils, Revolutionary mementoes, Indian relics, etc., all of which were neatly arranged for the free inspection of those who had a taste for such articles. The collection is one of finest of the kind in the country, and it is justly prized for its historical association by the inhabitants of the town.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

Inauguration of the Pascal Statue.

The latest outbreak of what may be termed statue dedication has taken place at Clermont-Ferrand, France, where there has just been "inaugurated" a statue of the famous mathematician and satirist of the Jesuits, Blaise Pascal. Pascal was the possessor of vast mathematical gifts; he was a treacherous and epigrammatic writer; his "Pensées" (if he wrote them) contain many noble religious and philosophic maxims, and he was a little cracked. The citizens of Clermont-Ferrand have been some time in finding out what a great man the bitter foe of the Jesuits was, for Pascal died in 1662. A very pompous ceremonial marked the "inaugural" proceedings, in which took part the mayor and municipality, the general commanding the troops in the district, the magistracy, the rector of the Academy, and the professors of the various faculties, the Inspector-General of the Council of Public Instruction, and several prefects of adjoining departments.

New Harbor Works, Quebec.

These works, which occupy an important place among the engineering enterprises of the Dominion of Canada, have been constructed at the point where the St. Charles, a tributary of the mighty St. Lawrence, joins the latter river at Quebec. Indeed, in size, construction and position, these additions to the harbor accommodation already existing will be, in reproductive result and self-redemption at first cost by the reclaimed land within their walls, without parallel. From end to end this great basin measures 4,000 feet. It is 900 feet wide, and will inclose a water area of 60 acres, 40 acres of which are to be wet dock, and 20 acres of tidal basin, with a minimum depth of 27 feet and 42 feet respectively below high water, while the level of the quays will be six feet above the line. The new docks appear as the outwork of a fortification, forming by its perfect line and workmanship a finished river frontage to the north side of Quebec. Under the protection of the embankment, a valuable ship will be enabled to Winter, avoiding all risk of "ice above"; and with the completion of the Graving Dock, Quebec will have advanced towards being one of the most commodious naval stations in the Dominion. Moreover, by the construction of these works, the most effective terminus for the shipment of the general traffic of the Canada Pacific Railway, and the systems already in operation in the direction of Manitoba, is clearly indicated. Our illustration shows the ceremony of July 29th, when the "Tablet Stone" was laid by Her Royal Highness, the Princess Louise.

Military Pontoon Disaster in Spain.

The melancholy subject of an illustration now presented is the disaster that took place on the river Ebro, near Logrono, in Spain, where the upsetting of a pontoon raft cost more than a hundred soldiers' lives. An official statement informs us that a battalion of infantry, numbering 875 officers and soldiers, had been ordered, in the programme of military manœuvres, to cross the river on a raft made of pontoons. The raft was being moved slowly towards the Navarre bank. The band continued playing, and the soldiers, mostly young lads of the last conscription, began to keep time with their feet, despite the warnings of their officers. The result was that very soon the raft began to roll ominously. Suddenly the raft gave a lurch forward and another all; the soldiers rushed forward and capsized it. Eleven officers and ninety-seven men were drowned, while the colonel, twelve officers and a hundred soldiers were saved. The Spanish Government has authorized a subscription for the victims. The King has given $2,000, and the Queen and Princess $3,500.

Straightening of the Danube.

As is the case with our Mississippi, the navigation of the Danube is hindered by many turns, which are not only troublesome and dangerous, but entail loss of time. The Austrian Government some years ago accepted the plan of three French engineers—Langlois, Letel and Vamet—who undertook to straighten the course of the river near Vienna by cutting new channels across the necks of peninsulas. Our illustration shows the first of the new channels. Another channel runs from Roller to the Spandau bridge, while another will reach Albern above Lobau Island. The Austrian capital will not only gain by having safer and quicker connections with other points, but will acquire additional land for six thousand buildings, and obtain good wide streets for railroad and carriages along the new river bank.

The Melbourne International Exhibition.

The above is the official title decided upon at a recent meeting of the Commissioners, a proposal to call the exhibition "The Carlton Palace and Melbourne Palace of Industry" having been negatived. The exhibition was to be opened on Friday, October 1st. Having already given a view of the exterior of the Exhibition Building, we now present an interior.

The Naval Demonstration in the Adriatic.

Our illustrations of Gravosa and Cattaro, Austrian seaports of the Adriatic coast, have a special interest connected with the presence at the first-named port of the combined naval squadrons of the six Great Powers, to enforce upon the Ottoman Government and the Albanians a recent decision of the Conference at Berlin, for the cession of Dulcigno by the Turkish Empire to the Principality of Montenegro. The bay or inlet of Gravosa, as shown in our illustration, is landlocked and surrounded by hills, so that it affords a secure harbor, except against a southerly wind, the "Bora," which in the Autumn and Winter is frequent and extremely violent. The harbor is formed by a hilly and rocky peninsula, which projects two miles from the mainland in a northwesterly direction. The village of Gravosa, at the head of its harbor, is only a mile and a half distant from the town of Ragusa, which is situated on the more open shore to the southeast of Gravosa. Cattaro, which may possibly be visited by the combined naval squadrons, as it is the port nearest to Montenegro, possesses the best harbor of the Adriatic. This is formed by a winding gulf or inlet, thirty miles long, which presents three basins, with connecting straits, inclosed by protecting hills or mountains. The town is even smaller than Ragusa, but was once a petty commonwealth, which became part of the Republic of Venice in 1420. It was, like Ragusa, taken by the French under Napoleon I., from whom it was taken by England, and was given to Austria at the Congress of Vienna in 1815.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

—DURING the last ten years 2,811,677 immigrants have arrived in this country.

—THE American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions have received a check for $150,000 from the Stone estate.

—THE statue of Admiral Farragut, by Mrs. Vinnie Ream Hoxie, has been placed in position in Farragut Square, Washington.

—FROM a few isolated cases during the Summer months, diphtheria has become epidemic in Bennington, Vt., and the public schools are closed in consequence.

—THE Prussian Government has requested that a proclamation of a state of siege be issued in Leipzig and Hamburg, denouncing these as hotbeds of Socialism.

—THE thirty-ninth representation of the Passion Play at Oberammergau (the last performance this year) took place on September 26th. Thirty-five hundred persons were present.

—THE monster iron-clad Italia, of 14,000 tons, covered throughout with armor three feet thick, has been successfully launched. The Italia is the most powerful iron-clad ever constructed.

—DURING the year ending with June last there were exported from this port 31,031,610 pounds of butter, valued at $5,179,071, and 19,851,330 pounds of oleomargarine, valued at $2,581,317.

—THE Internal Revenue receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30th last were $124,039,274, of which Illinois contributed $22,035,614; Ohio, $18,018,999, and New York, $16,249,677.

—THE city officials and leading business men of New Orleans are enthusiastic over the proposal to bring the steamship Great Eastern to that port for use in the meat trade. Governor Wiltz has no doubt but that the channel is sufficiently deep.

—PRINCE BISMARCK has drafted a Bill establishing a State Workmen's Assurance and Mutual Assistance Society. Its workings will be temporarily applied to Prussia only. All laborers and employers will be compelled to contribute to the fund.

—M. CONSTANS, the French Minister of the Interior and of Worship, will begin the breaking up of the religious Orders by first removing Orders not recognized by the Vatican, then those composed of foreigners, and then deal with the others separately.

—THE British Government have practically decided to abandon Cyprus. They have stopped public works and withdrawn a war vessel. The event has passed almost unnoticed by the press. This shows the collapse of Lord Beaconsfield's theatrical annexation scheme.

—THE tobacco grown in Pennsylvania in 1879 amounted to 31,000,000 pounds, the largest crop yet grown. The present crop, while the largest—amounting to 40,000,000 pounds—will not, perhaps, realize much more than the crop of last year, in consequence of the ravages of worms.

—THE cashier of the United States Treasury is now shipping daily to different parts of the country—principally South and West—about $25,000 in fractional silver. The demand for fractional silver has doubled within the past month. The orders are mostly for dimes, half-dimes and quarters.

—GREAT excitement has been caused throughout Australia by the discovery of the Temora gold field, near Sydney. The rush of people into the township increases daily, men arriving even from Victoria. The great drawback to the field is want of water for puddling purposes. Gold is being struck very freely.

—THE last quarterly payment of pensions has been the most speedily accomplished of any ever known, considering the number of pensions paid. The agents paid 184,000 pensions in the first ten working days, and ended with the fifteenth at night. Of these 24,000 were personal payments, made to the pensioners at the several agencies.

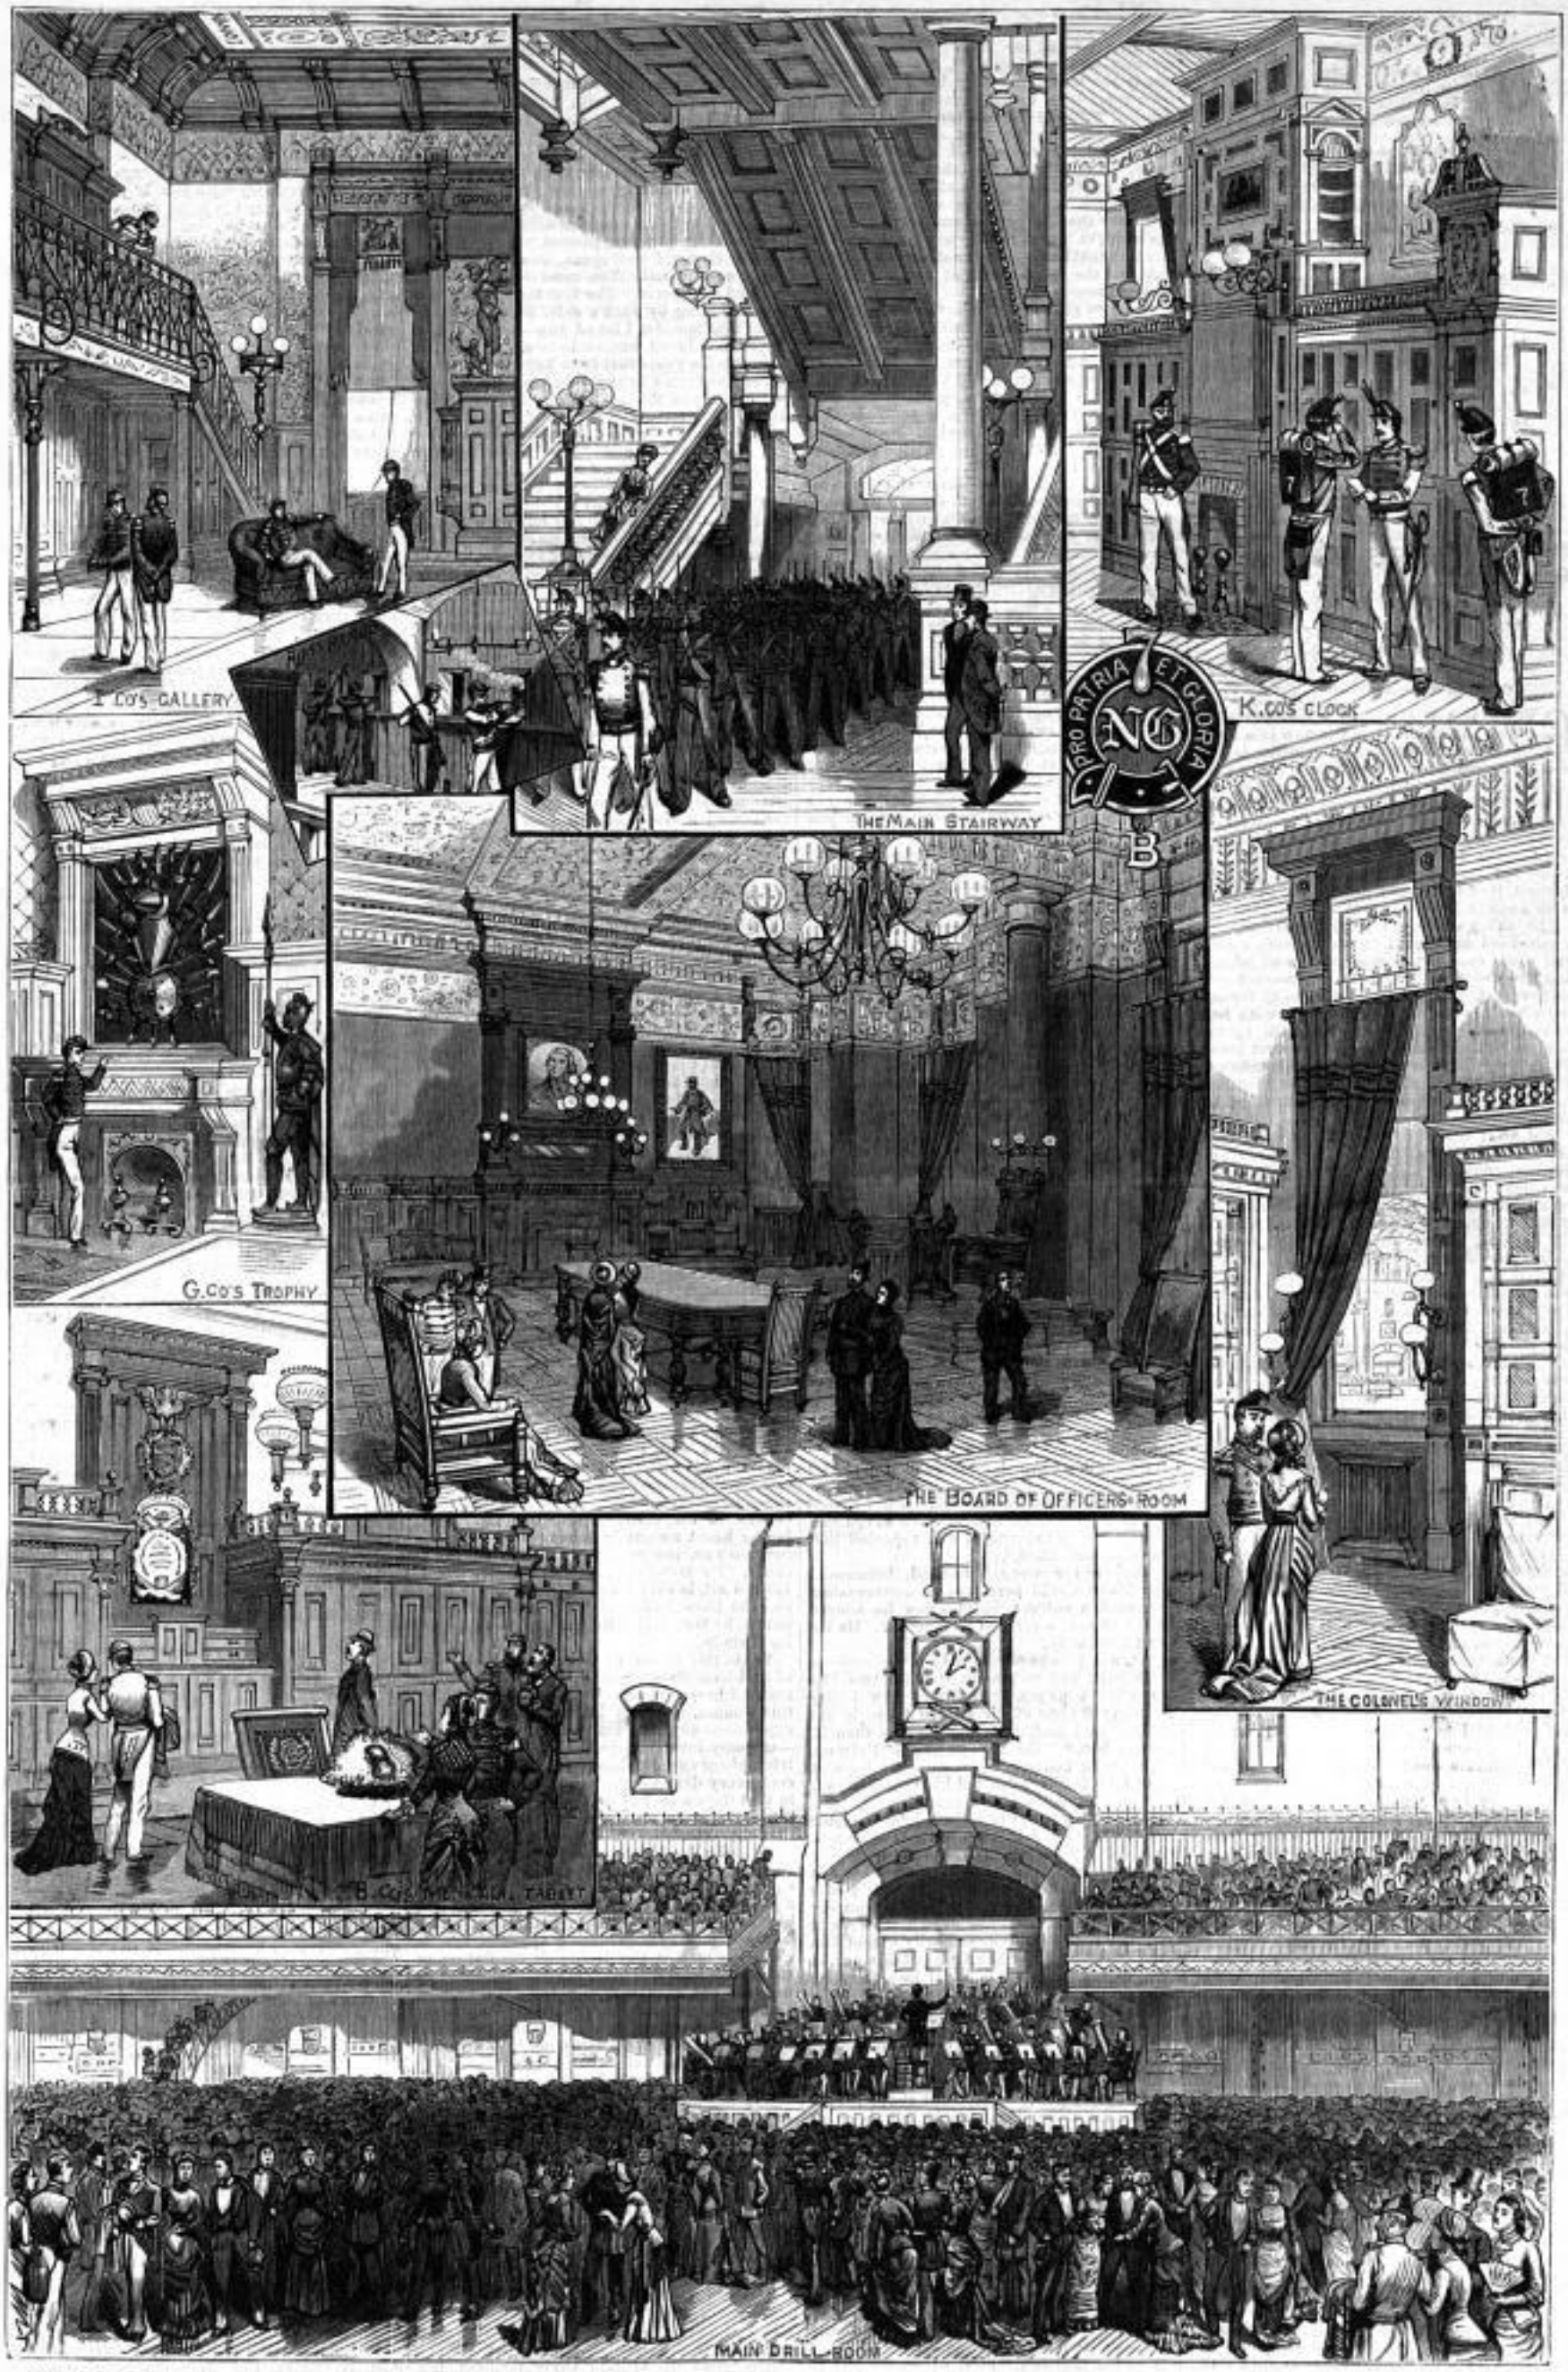
—THE Ecumenical Methodist Conference, which is to assemble in the City Road Chapel, London, in September, 1881, will be composed of four hundred members—two hundred from Great Britain and two hundred from the United States and Canada—one half ministers and one-half laymen. The conference will have no legislative or administrative functions, but its object will be to promote union and to stimulate to more zealous Christian effort.

—THE charters of two of the notorious bogus medical colleges in Philadelphia have been annulled by the courts, with the consent of the notorious Dean, John Buchanan, who was at the head of both institutions. The charters confiscated were those of the Eclectic Medical College and the American University of Medicine, of Philadelphia. From Buchanan's own admission there have been sold in this country and Europe nearly 40,000 bogus diplomas from the two institutions.

—THE Mexicans have given a brilliant reception to the daughter of General Ord, who married General Trevino. On the evening of the 15th of August a grand ball was given at El Teatro del Progreso in Monterey, in honor of General Trevino and lady, by the governor and civil and military dignitaries of the State. The theatre was handsomely decorated, about 5,000 colored lights contributing to the general effect. The floor for dancing was covered with dark Brussels carpeting, sprinkled over with gold leaf. The attendance was greater than at any ball for the last ten years, and the display of costumes was brilliant. A free bar was kept, where wines and liquors flowed without stint. The dancing lasted from 10 P. M. to 4 A. M.

—THE business of the Manhattan Beach hotels during the recent season was fifty per cent. greater than in 1879. An idea of the number of guests at the Manhattan Hotel during the season may be obtained from the following statement of expenditures: For fresh meats, $58,319; smoked meats, $3,617; poultry and game, $15,137; fish, $10,710; clams and oysters, $6,329; soft crabs, $2,788; fruits and vegetables, $13,230; milk and cream, $6,474; coffee, $2,851; butter and lard, $9,521; eggs, $2,786; groceries, $19,688; lemons and oranges, $1,804; salad oil, $720; crackers, $260; soap, $1,961. To these figures about two-fifths should be added for the Oriental Hotel and one-fifth for the Pavilion and Point Breeze Hotel.

—THE official returns of the foreign commerce of the United States during August show a continuance of heavy gains, both in exports and imports, as compared with last year. The value of merchandise exported again foots up heavier than that of merchandise imported, and the balance on the side of exports since January 1st shows further augmentation, contrary to general anticipation. Merchandise imp rtations during the month reached $58,266,021, an increase of $13,183,253, or about 30¼ per cent. over last year. In merchandise exports the increase is $4,302,242, or about 14¼ per cent. Of merchandise and specie combined, the month's exports were $1,678,850 in excess of imports; while of merchandise exclusively, the balance on the side of exports proves to be nearly $11,000,000. For the first month of the second year of resumption of specie payments, the treasure import exceeds that for the corresponding period last year by $2,083,021.



Digitized by Google

"CHRISTIAN" GARFIELD'S SLOUGH OF DESPOND.

"Wherefore Christian was left to tumble in the Slough of Despond alone; but still he endeavored to struggle to that side of the slough that was still further from his own house, and next to the wicket-gate; the which he did, but could not get out because of the burden that was upon his back."

Digitized by Google

NEW YORK CITY.—THE NEW ARMORY OF THE SEVENTH REGIMENT, N. G. S. N. Y.—THE RECEPTION ON SUBSCRIBERS' DAY, SEPT. 30TH.
SEE PAGE 107.

Digitized by Google

UNDER THE LILACS.

FOR A PICTURE.

With her head in languorous guise
Under fragrant lilacs blending,
And her half-drooped, amorous eyes
Their coquettish glances sending,

She waits where the wild-bees hum
And the butterflies flit and hover,
She tarries to hear him come—
Her supple and straight-limbed lover.

But she will not turn her head
Or move her small foot to meet him;
Her heart may beat to his tread
Yet her lax hand will not greet him;

Till the blossoms around her fall
Like Danäe's golden shower,
And he stoops his form so tall
To taste of her mouth's red flower.

And then with a low, glad laugh
She will lean her head on his bosom,
And when he love's wine would quaff
I know she will not refuse him.

Will the sun-warmed hours wane?
Will the bees and the sunlight leave them?
Can love, who has found these twain,
Of his fragrant shade bereave them?

JOHN MORAN.

THE SCHAFFUSKIE LANDS.

BY ANNIE DUFFELL,

AUTHOR OF "IN THE MESHES," ETC.

CHAPTER XLI.—A FAITHFUL LOVE.

GYPSY is a widow, and a lovely widow does she make. She sits now in a large armchair, a picture of pensive loveliness. She is dressed in some dark, rich morning robe, which enhances the delicacy of her rare complexion. Her bright brown hair—the hair that poor Jack loved so well—is coiled up in heavy braids low in the neck, and ornamented with strings of jet, which also adorn her throat and arms. Her eyes, of the deepest, loveliest azure, are bright and filled with a sunny light of expectancy.

She makes a rare picture, sitting in that long, vaulted old apartment of the Russian castle, and looks thoroughly contented with herself and the world. No wretched memory comes to her of the loved and lost, who in former days sat in this same apartment with her, though their empty chairs are still by the hearth. Not a cloud is upon her perfect brow. To do her justice, both Maize's misfortune and Jack's death were at the time great shocks to her, and her weak nature almost sank under them.

But after the first blow she rallied; with one of her variable, versatile nature, no emotion could be lasting. Jack, poor dear! was dead, and no amount of grieving could resurrect him; while at the same time she would be ruining her complexion and damaging her eyes. Maize's fate was also irremediably fixed—that fate from which, had it been possible, she would have saved her—and it was equal madness for her to fret her life away about the inevitable; and nothing is so detrimental to beauty as fretting. And, although at two-and thirty a woman is not a Methuselah, still she has arrived at that point where a reckless disregard of her personal advantage is not desirable. Sometimes in the still small hours of the night a memory comes to her that is not pleasant, and a phantom that chills her blood. It is not possible for her to entirely banish all memory of the girl, who for her weakness is dragging out her life in exile.

And it is in such moments that Jack's full loss sweeps upon her; if she could hear his brave, bright voice, if she could feel the loving touch of his hand, these harrowing fancies would be swept away. But as he is gone, she philosophically calls to mind that respected adage of "spilled milk," and covers up her head and goes to sleep, remembering that nothing is so disastrous in its consequences to beauty as loss of sleep. Besides, a fat sorrow is much better than a lean one; and, in point of this, she is very well off indeed. Although of late years their financial affairs have been somewhat complicated, the sale of the Schaffuskie Lands in a measure restored their wealth, and now that the family is lessened by two, why, the bank account is sufficient to keep her and Valentine in luxury for the rest of their lives. And, too, Lady Ashhurst tells herself, there is a possibility—nay, a probability—that she may in the future exchange her title for another which will bring with it greater wealth.

As she sits now, evidently awaiting the arrival of some one, a step sounds in the hall and pauses at the door. She springs to her feet and stands in a listening attitude, while still the invisible person stands motionless as though gaining courage or composure before entering. When her impatience has almost reached its climax the door is flung open and on the threshold stands—yes—Chetewood! His large dark-gray eyes fasten upon that lovely picture—Gypsy, standing, with her graceful, slim figure bent slightly forward, her lovely mouth half-parted in a smile of expectation, and over her beautiful face the sweetest, faintest wild-rose flush.

Chetewood himself is little changed since the days of our first acquaintance with him at Brighton. His face is still filled with that fair, Saxon beauty, though upon his low brow are worn a few lines by his weary waiting. In his eyes, as he looks at this woman, shines all that mighty, patient love he has borne for her all these many years. Though he has striven to compose himself, he is frightfully agitated, and his breath breaks from him in sharp gasps. He stands for a moment motionless, then with one bound he gains her side, and has her two small hands grasped tightly in his, while his eyes look down at her in piteous yearning.

"Oh, my love! my love!" The words are scarcely audible, but with the keenness of vanity she hears, and over her lovely, bright face spreads a radiant smile. She is not touched with the patience and fidelity of this man's love. She does not see how near to sublimity approaches this steadfastness of years. It is only the fact that by her beauty and his infatuation she has chained him to her side, though for years the wife of another; that, now that she is free, one word from her has brought him to this distant land; it is only this fact that she is capable of appreciating.

At last the soft murmur of her voice brings back his senses.

"I am so glad that you have come; it is so kind of you. Yet how could I expect it? I was amazed when I got your letter saying that you were coming. If there had been time I should have written to you and forbidden it." She tells this lie unblushingly. "But you were already on your way when it arrived. And yet," blushing adorably, and giving a dainty pressure to the hands that cling so tightly to hers, "I—I am very glad to see you, and it seems very like old times." The faintest quiver of the childish lip, which, to do her justice, is sincere; in this moment a swift, brief vision of the past sweeps upon her with crushing force.

"Could you doubt that I would come?" he says, passionately. "I should have been here long before, only that I did not know I would be welcome. After I received your letter there is nothing in the world could have kept me from you. One word from you, and I would go to the furthest end of the earth but for one look at your face."

It is not until evening has fallen and they sit together in the red light of the fire that he is composed enough to converse rationally. Then looking at her with his great loving eyes, he says:

"You are not changed a particle since you left England, yet what seas of trouble you have seen!"

"Trouble!" She shudders; somehow to-night the past is heavy upon her. "Yes, I have been nearly crushed with it. I only wonder that I have lived." The small hands lock convulsively, this time without any affectation.

He is silent with his native delicacy, refraining to allude more directly to past events.

"Poor Jack!" she continues; "but I am trying to teach myself to be resigned to his death. But, Maize—oh, Dredmond!—did you ever know anything so horrible? Sometimes it seems as though I must go mad!"

"It is horrible!" he replies, with a shudder. "I can't persuade myself that it is true; it seems like a horrid nightmare. Now that I am with you, it seems harder than ever to realize. I am listening constantly for her step. Good heavens! it is the most shocking thing I ever knew!" he rises and paces the floor excitedly.

"What do the people in England think?" she asks, behind her handkerchief.

"No one will believe her guilty. We all know that some horrible mistake has been made. My God! I don't wonder it killed poor Jack. And I suppose nothing can be done for her?"

"Nothing. The English Government communicated with the Czar in her behalf, but it was of no use. They were determined she should suffer. Oh, my poor child!" Gypsy is now sobbing convulsively, and Chetewood, pausing behind her chair, reaches over and takes her hand.

"Do not grieve so, dar—Gypsy. I must call you 'Gypsy.' And yet I know that a sorrow like yours is almost inconsolable. But I should have thought Toboskie could have saved her. At one time, in England, it was reported that they were betrothed."

"They never were betrothed, because I know Maize would permit of no conversation upon such a subject, but I know he adored her. And yet he refused to save her. He believed her guilty."

Chetewood looks perplexed.

"Then he suffered the most of the two," he says, after a pause. "Heavens, how I pity that man; for one of his nature there is but one love, and nothing of more value than it, save his honor. He always had that strong, high sense of honor. When we were boys at school he was characterized by it. Oh, how I pity him! How does he bear it?"

"People say that life is killed for him for ever." Chetewood does not see that her small hands are clinched, or he would not be telling himself that he was mad to fancy that she cared for Toboskie in the past. "Society sees nothing of him. He devotes himself entirely to political affairs, and has grown colder and haughtier than ever. Occasionally I meet him in the street, and his face always looks cut in stone, so hard and icy is it. If he suffers, he shows no other signs of it."

"Ah, but he does suffer!" says Chetewood, lowly. "He is not a man with weak and transient emotions. In the dead hours of the night he wrestles with the anguish that I know is for ever present with him. His race is strong, desperate, reckless; but above everything else is their pride, and he will bear his misery in secret until he can endure it no longer, and then he will calmly blow his brains out. That is what it will end in—suicide."

An exclamation of horror bursts from Gypsy, and all the rich color recedes from her face.

"Pardon me if I have shocked you," murmurs Chetewood, tenderly. "I ought to have been more considerate. If possible, we will let unpleasant subjects go for to-night. Raoul has my deepest sympathy, though I am well aware that if I were to mention the subject it would be almost at the risk of my life. I shall see him in the morning. First of all I came to you."

The color struggles back to her face, and she smiles a sweet, alluring smile at his adoring glance. He looks at her hungrily, yearningly.

"It doesn't seem possible," he murmurs, "that I am indeed with you. Oh, Gypsy, Gypsy, let me tell my story. Now that the barrier is swept away, why should I not speak?" He has come to her side and knelt down beside her, looking up in the soft, alluring heaven of her eyes. She shudders a little with nervous excitement, and for an instant a vision of Jack shuts out the delicate, beautiful face, with its pleading passion.

"Oh, Gypsy, I must speak, though I have nothing new to tell. You must long ago have divined my secret. The first time I ever saw you, standing by Jack's side, his child bride, from that moment I loved you—loved you as never man loved woman before, I think. All through the years that have kept you from me there has been a heavy ache upon me. I could not forget you though I tried. I can't understand it. I have called myself a fool and a villain, and sworn that I would have done with the accursed nonsense of loving another man's wife. I have tried to love other women, but it was impossible. Gypsy, no other woman has ever entered into my heart, or even touched it. And now that I have the right, I ask you, will you be my wife?" No shadow comes across that lovely face as the old, sweet solemn words fall upon her ear. No memory of that far-distant past, with its sin and weakness, smites her conscience as again she holds in her soft small hands the destiny of another high and lofty life. Fickle, shallow, erring as she is, it has always been this woman's lot to hold in her thankless possession that most valuable of all treasures—a man's true and unchangeable love. Vain, faithless and weak, nevertheless, the best, the purest, the noblest of two men's lofty natures have been hers.

And outside, as she listens to the tender, wooing words of her lover, sweeps a carriage containing a single occupant—a man with a face cold and set as stone, with eyes dry and lustreless, with mouth drawn in hard, deep lines of silent suffering—a man whose whole life is wrecked and lain waste, whose dead and solitary existence holds nothing save the ghastly phantom of a dead love and a shattered faith, between whom and all semblance of rest and contentment there is an impassable gulf, and whose entire soul is filled with a torturing and never dying misery. It is the great statesman, on his way to a state dinner—Toboskie, with his inner life burned away to dust and ashes. And further away in this ice girt land tosses upon the rough bed of the convict the delicate form of the girl who has gone down beneath the waves of an adverse fate—that form, tenderly nurtured as a royal princess's, now throbbing with the pain of labor, the torture of exhaustion, and the soul struggling with its evil and its good, in deadly peril of utter destruction. And still further away, far, far away in old England, this same moonlight streams through the the narrow, deep-set window of an ancient chapel and lights cold and gleaming upon the tall, white marble shaft that designates the spot where Jack, the last of the haughty lords of Ashhurst, lies slowly crumbling to dust—Jack who, of the three, has the more merciful fate.

But no thought of this comes to the woman in her lovely witchery; the death and destruction that have marked her path leave her entirely untroubled. She smiles down in her lover's eyes, her own unclouded in their sunny insouciant laughter, their dewy lustre, while she weighs, with that cold, calculating exactness, the advantages of his offer. Wondrous and angelic in innocent and infantile loveliness, she is nevertheless by nature selfish and mercenary to the core. And while the great, loving heart awaits in a torture of suspense her answer, she recounts his merits—financially. He is wealthy, has many titles, and, besides all, is very handsome and attractive; and she likes him really very well, and, poor fellow, he is so desperately in love!—suppressing a smile.

Yet in this moment comes to her a memory of that haughty statesman who has heretofore resisted her witchery. If it were possible for this woman, with her inherent selfishness, to experience any true emotion, it is for this man—the only love ever denied her in her sunny, triumphant career, though that denial has become very dear to her. She yearns to rouse in that frozen, locked-up breast all those swift, fiery, dangerous emotions that she knows are the characteristics of his race. Once, she muses, she held that strong, haughty, dominant soul fast bound in the thralldom of passion; surely her loveliness that then broke down the icy barriers of his nature has not yet lost its potent spell. Far back in the azure depths of her eyes gathers a spark of fire as upon her fastens the desperate resolution of seeing this man and making one final effort to win the one love that she has ever valued. Yet, with natural shrewdness, she determines not to refuse her companion until she has cast her last chance of winning Toboskie; and then, if that fail!—her hands clinch and that desperate spark deepens—why, she will marry Chetewood and go back to England.

"Gypsy, you are very cruel!" murmurs her companion. "Will you not answer me? See! I have come all the way to Russia to hear your answer! Surely—surely you will reward the patience and long waiting of my love!"

"But it is so soon," she whispers, while a rosy flush creeps over her face, and her eyes look down. "Dredmond, you are so impatient and——"

"Impatient!" cries Chetewood, in pain. "How can you accuse me of that? I have waited years for you; I would wait years longer if it were necessary. But as it is not, why, Gypsy, take pity on me!"

She looks up at him shyly through her thick, brown lashes.

"Would you take me back to England?" she says, in a half-whisper.

"Anywhere?" he cries, rapturously. "You shall be my queen, I your slave. I will know no will save your wishes."

"And—and—may I have Valentine with me?"

"Certainly," he responds, eagerly. "I wouldn't think of separating you from your life-long friend. My darling, you shall have anybody, everybody with you, if you will only put your little hand in mine and say, 'Dred, I will be your wife.'"

And she does "lay her little hand" in his, but discreetly refrains from uttering the words, complacently reflecting that she can easily recede from this unspoken betrothal if she be successful in that purpose which she resolves to execute on the morrow. Chetewood scarcely misses the words. In his strong, warm grasp lies her hand, and in her sweet, blushing face, her downcast eyes, he reads his answer. Without a word he catches her in his arms and strains her to his breast. A few minutes later, with her sweet, willful imperiousness, she dismisses him, and, with a heart beating with wild rapture, he returns to his hotel.

CHAPTER XLII.—A RELAPSE OF GYPSY'S OLD MALADY.

IN the sweetest of morning robes Gypsy stands waiting in the reception-room the next morning. She has appointed an early hour that she may be uninterrupted in her interview by the impatient Chetewood. She has to wait but a few minutes before the door is thrown open and "Count Toboskie" is announced and shown in. He at first believes the room deserted, but as he advances he beholds that lovely vision, as Gypsy stands in her dainty robes, her face pale, her eyes unusually bright with excitement. A shudder convulsed him. Of this woman, lovely in her radiant youth, he has always had a mortal abhorrence, and now the sudden sight of her brings a harrowing memory of the woman he has loved and lost, of the man he saw fall dead at his feet. To his deep, haughty, repressed nature the coming to this house has been an agony that could never touch a weaker one. Every muscle in his magnificent frame quivers with fierce suffering as he glances around this apartment, wherein he has so often sat with one now far away dragging out her life in the bondage of shame and bitterness. In this moment that proud, unnatural suppression of weary months is very near exhaustion, and under this ordeal, which is like tearing asunder the festering wounds of his heart, his strength almost deserts him.

As Gypsy sees his stern, set face, with its icy grandeur, his deep eyes cold and questioning, as he stands towering above her in his haughty and perfect manhood, her courage oozes out at her finger-tips, though over her sweeps all the strength and the passion of her futile love. She sinks down upon the divan and looks up at him with her great azure, piteous eyes, while her small hands clasp in her lap. A shuddering horror and aversion seizes him. Something in that look brings back to him that night many years ago when, through this woman's weakness, he gave way to the one act that stains his honor—that branded him a false friend to Lord Ashhurst, whose hospitality he had enjoyed, and whose hand he had taken in friendship.

"You sent for me, my lady, and I came as soon as possible." His voice is chill with a mortal coldness. "May I ask in what way can I serve you?"

Her hands lock more tightly, and upon each cheek burns a scarlet flame. All semblance of composure and dignity are swept aside. Still she remains silent.

"Have you business with me, madam?" he urges. "Though I shall be most happy to serve you, I must remind you that my time is limited."

Gypsy springs to her feet; her eyes, passionate, beseeching, intense, look straight into his.

"I sent for you," she says, in excitement, "because I am so lonely and miserable. I sent for you because you once were Jack's friend—or professed yourself such—though since his death you have never once visited his widow or befriended her in any way. Why is this? In common humanity, stricken as I have been, I should have thought you would have tendered your sympathy occasionally, and for the sake of your dead friend been a friend to one he loved so dearly!"

Despite his shrinking dislike of this woman, that stern sense of right that has always actuated him shows him that her accusations are just.

"I acknowledge," he says, lowly, "that I have been selfish, and, perhaps, even brutal in my sorrow. I have neglected you, it is true. But the only plea that I have to offer is that in the past year I have grown insensible to every tie that once bound me. I have grown hardened to everything and everybody."

Gypsy's breath comes sharply, and under the rich lace which is a dainty pretense of concealment, her white breast heaves convulsively; she knows only too well what has occasioned this entire oblivion and withdrawal from society. She lifts her face with its dangerous loveliness: her eyes, passionate and alluring, look straight into his. But he is invulnerable to her beauty. Once it moved him—the weaker, more animal portion of his nature; but even that cannot be touched by her now. His blood is like ice in his veins, his once fiery impulses burned to ashes. Looking at this woman, whose favor even royalty has coveted, there is no more of passion in him than in a block of stone.

"Can nothing rouse you from that lethargy?" she murmurs, and draws nearer him. "I will not feign ignorance; I know what has changed you so vastly. But—is it sensible to mourn after the inevitable? Because you once loved a woman unworthy of your preference, must that fact necessarily deaden you to all future joy? There are other women—women, perhaps, as lovely and alluring as she; and you are young yet, do you willingly cut yourself off from all chance of happiness, will you starve and outrage all the quickness and impulse of your nature?"

Digitized by Google

Tobeskie's eyes grow chill and dangerous.

"Did you send for me to converse upon this?" he says, haughtily.

"I did," she cries, in the abandonment of her weakness. "I sent for you to see if I could not rouse you from this dead existence, to show you that there are other women in the world besides Maize"—a swift quiver crosses the strong, cold face at that name—"women who are more worthy of your preference, and who would love you in return; who are not blocks of ice as she was."

"Madame!"—there is a desperate wrath in his tones that for an instant appalls her—"this is a subject that I have never allowed discussed in my presence, and your imprudence compels me to say that I think you take an unwarranted liberty in addressing me in this manner."

"Ah! you love her yet," she cries, scornfully, driven frantic with rage and disappointment. "You love her, the convict and exile!"

Her words lash him into a wild, brave, untamable fury. (To be continued.)

THE SEVENTH REGIMENT ARMORY.

THE new armory of the Seventh Regiment, National Guard of the State of New York, was thrown open to visitors on Thursday last—"Subscribers' Day." Twenty-five thousand invitations had been issued to public and military officials and to subscribers to the building fund, and the occasion was very generally embraced to inspect this magnificent and enduring structure, which is at once an honor to the city, and to the regiment of which it is the home. The building is bounded by Park and Lexington Avenues, and Sixty-sixth and Sixty-seventh Streets. The main entrance is on the west side. On entering the building, a walk across the main hall brings one at once into the enormous drill-room, 200 feet by 300 feet in size. The roof is supported by eleven enormous iron trusses, which are elegantly finished with fresco-work. Indeed, the entire drill-room is finished in brilliant colors, in order to dispel the natural gloom which pertains to a room of such vast size. There are thirty-three large reflectors suspended from the roof in three rows. There are galleries at three elevations on the west side, and a long one at the eastern end; also numerous seats on the floor along the northern and southern walls, furnishing altogether a seating capacity of 1,096. These seats are all to be numbered. One thousand muskets, the entire arms of the regiment, are arranged compactly in glass cases on the west wall of the drill-room. The room is lighted by electricity. At the east end of the room is a large clock, also a temporary music-stand, only to be used on special occasions, which can be taken apart in sections and stowed away in an hour's time.

A spacious hall extends from the north to the south end of the building on all three of the floors, from which the various rooms open. On the right of the entrance to the drill-room is the room of the superintendent and armorer, where the muskets are cleaned. Next to this is a squad-drill room. There are two of these on the first floor and two more on the second, the latter being provided with extensive washing apparatus. The visitor next enters the colonel's room, which is on the southern side of the building. This is the only room which is finished in black walnut. In it, and inclosed in a glass case, are the colors that are carried on parade. Small toilet and dressing-rooms open out of the colonel's room, and there is a window through which a view of the large drill-room may be obtained. Near the entrance to the colonel's room, at the lower end of the hall, is a bronze statue of Mercury, won by the regiment at Creedmoor three years ago.

Crossing the hall, the officers' room is entered. Here are about twenty valuable flags, inclosed in cases, which have been presented to the regiment during the last fifteen years. Over the fireplace is a large painting of Washington. On the right of the painting of Washington is a life-sized portrait of Colonel Clark in uniform. Passing north, the next room is the general reception-room. This is tastefully fitted up in maple, and contains two handsome oil-paintings. Further north is the entrance to the building. Two bronze tablets adorn the walls on either side, that on the left bearing the inscription:

"Seventh Regiment Armory, erected by the Seventh Regiment, N. G. S. N. Y., Colonel Emmons Clark commanding, aided by many citizens of New York; 1877-1880."

That on the right bears the names of the Building Committee, the architect, builders, engineers and all engaged in the work of completing the structure. The library, 25 x 40 feet, is next entered. This will not be completed for some time. It is to be finished in mahogany, will have a gallery entirely around it; it will contain 15,000 volumes. The books are to be entirely upon military subjects. The veterans' room, north of the library, is also still unfinished. It is to be of oak, with walls containing iron panels. The veterans' room is in the northwest corner of the building; it is 40 x 40 feet in size, and is to be finished in antique style; it will have a rich ceiling of wood panels. Across the hall is the field and staff room, 25 x 40 feet, with a finish of mahogany in its natural state. South of the field and staff room is a squad drill room, and then comes the quartermaster's rooms.

Passing up the main staircase, the first gallery is reached, commanding a fine view of the drill room below, and then a few more stairs bring one to the second floor. On this floor are the rooms of the adjutant and those of the ten companies of the regiment. These apartments are all well worthy of inspection, as nothing that fancy could suggest or art supply has been omitted to suit the varying tastes of the members. The fireplaces in most of them are marvels of ingenious design and faultless execution. On the third floor are the rooms of the drum corps, the memorial room, squad drill-rooms, gymnasium, etc. There is also a room for the band of the regiment, which has just been organized with fifty four members, led by a former assistant of Mr. Grafulla, who retires on account of ill health.

In the cellar are six rifle galleries, each 200 feet in length, with a narrow walk along the side on which open numerous magazines. Here are also several rooms containing extra lockers, benches for repairing muskets; a stuling-room where smoking is allowed, etc., and the boiler-room, which contains four immense boilers.

The armory building has cost $450,000, and the finish of the interior entailed an expense of $150,000, $140,000 of which was realized as the proceeds of the great fair, while the remaining $10,000 was paid from the regimental fund. The expense of the building itself was covered as follows: Subscriptions of citizens and ladies, $100,000; regiment, $80,000; veterans, $27,000; banks and other corporations, $33,000; loan $150,000; miscellaneous, including grand ball, $60,000.

THE PAN-PRESBYTERIAN COUNCIL.

THE sessions of the Presbyterian Council, at Philadelphia, during the past week, were marked by great interest, many of the discussions touching upon vital questions of church polity and belief. All the sittings were attended by large audiences. The morning sessions were held at Horticultural Hall, and those in the afternoon and evening at the Academy of Music, the great capacity of which was sometimes taxed to accommodate the crowds pressing for admittance. No religious convocation of recent years has attracted larger attention, or is apparently destined to exercise a more pronounced influence upon the future life of Presbyterianism than this, which included some of the very ablest representatives of that particular denomination. Among the subjects considered during the week were "Creeds and Confessions," the "Revision of the Bible," "Presbyterianism and Education," the "Relation of Presbyterianism to Civil and Religious Liberty," "Final Restitution," "Church Extension and the Evangelization of Ireland," "The Conflict between Faith and Ritualism in Holland," "Theology of the Reformed Church, "Church Discipline, its Province and Use," "Church Order and Life."

One of the most notable discussions of the council was that on "Agnosticism." In this discussion Professor Flint, of Scotland, who had said in a paper that the failure to comprehend or to believe portions of Presbyterian dogma was to be overcome not by church discipline so much as by a more faithful study and explanation of dogma, was assailed as having "sneered at church discipline." This accusation was taken up by Rev. Principal Grant, of Canada, who said, with an emphasis which created a profound sensation, "We do err if we say the Westminster Catechism is beyond the region of inquiry. Creeds grow, and how can there be growth unless there is liberty of thought. You say to a minister, if he has his doubts about the accuracy of your interpretation, 'Go out of the church.' You say no honest man should stay in it if he has doubts. You call him dishonest if he does stay in. I say no, no. Let the Church cast him out if it will. Is the Church afraid of liberty?" were Principal Grant's closing words, and he said them in ringing tones whose echo seemed to be heard above the applause they occasioned. Another divine, Rev. Mr. McDonald, of Toronto, spoke in the same vein. He asked whether it was expedient for the Church always to exercise its unquestioned right of discipline. "The question to day is, What is faith? A young man full of the desire to preach salvation and, believing that he is prepared for it, is brought up all standing by the creed. He can't make it all out, in the way the Church interprets it. What are you going to do with him? Shall he be forbidden to preach? He asks you whether you have any right to impose on him conditions that Christ did not impose. I suggest that you reduce your creed to a few well-defined articles that are absolutely essential, and require your minister to stand by these and hold his own views about the non-essentials." There was more applause when this daring divine had finished. The whole discussion was a triumph of the champions of free thought, and its significance cannot be mistaken by any thoughtful mind.

Another important discussion related to the revision of the New Testament. Dr. Schaff, the eminent Biblical scholar of this city, announced that the New Testament revision was almost completed, and, at the furthest, might be expected by February. He thought the council should take some action in the matter and report at the next meeting, four years hence. Judge Strong further elaborated this idea by making a motion that the revised edition be recommended to the careful consideration of every church represented in the Alliance. This resolution was referred to the business committee.

The Hon. William E. Dodge, of New York, read a paper on temperance, which was an earnest argument in favor of prohibition. He said that there are in this city 10,000 places for the sale of intoxicating drinks, and seven-eighths of these places are kept by foreigners. Interior Department returns, he asserted, show that there are in the United States 3,632 distilleries, 2,830 breweries, and 175,206 places where intoxicating drinks are sold, involving annually a direct outlay and waste of not less than $700,000,000, and an indirect loss in the cost of crime and pauperism of $500,000,000 more, while to the financial loss must be added the destruction of not less than 100,000 lives. The Christian Church, he said, had the remedy in its hands.

The council authorized a committee to consider and report on the creeds at the next council. A report of the Committee on Foreign Missionary Work suggested the establishment of a great training college at Pekin, China, and urged a more energetic prosecution of mission work in heathen and pagan countries. The report stated that 2,000,000 pagans had been rescued from darkness during the past seventy years by Protestant missionaries, and referred to the greater facilities and advantages that may be now enjoyed by mission workers. The Rev. Dr. Paxton, of New York, submitted from the American portion of the committee a written history of the mission enterprises connected with the following churches: The Presbyterian Church of Canada, the United Presbyterian Church in the United States, the Reformed Dutch Church, the Reformed Presbyterian Church (General Synod), the Associated Reformed Church, the Presbyterian Church North, and the Presbyterian Church South. A summary of the statistics submitted in the report may be thus stated: Missionaries in the field, 295; native missionaries, 135; native licentiates and preachers, 128; medical missionaries and teachers, 113; American women connected with the missions, 268; native teachers and Bible-readers, 804; communicants, 16,271; scholars in boarding-schools, 1,691; scholars in day schools, 12,987.

The next Council will be held at Belfast, Ireland, in 1884.

REMOVING THE OBELISK TO ITS SITE.

FOR the removal of the obelisk from the platform at the foot of Ninety-sixth Street to the site selected in Central Park, the stone is enveloped in a heavy plank box which shows its shape. Underneath the obelisk at the outer edges are iron rails grooved on the bottom. Under these rails are other rails with grooves facing upwards, and between the two are cannon-balls. One hundred feet from the railroad tracks, which are eighty feet from the original position of the obelisk, is an anchor—a large pile driven in the ground and braced—and about thirty feet beyond, wire ropes are wound around a huge boulder to stay the anchor. From this anchor to the railroad tracks runs a chain, of studded links, which are made of 2½ inch round wrought-iron. Where it is attached to a fourfold purchase pulley-block worked by two-inch ropes. The ropes of this pulley stretch across the railroad tracks and run through a similar block which is attached to the upper rails on which the obelisk rests. One end of the pulley rope is made fast to the block nearer the anchor, and the other end, after passing around the pulley blocks four times, follows the chain up to the anchor, there goes through a single block which pulls the end of the large chain, and then stretches about 250 feet down to the water's edge, where it is wound upon the drum of a thirty-horse power engine. The blocks at the railroad tracks can be unhooked at a moment's notice and a train allowed to pass by. The obelisk itself weighs 196½ tons, but the box increases its weight, so that as it lies on the tracks it weighs 200 tons. With the tackle used on the first day of the removal a force of about twenty-five tons had to be exerted by the engine in order to move the monolith. The iron balls are used because they have the greatest strength and present the least friction of any kind of roller.

As the cannon-ball apparatus is likely to be clogged up by a little dust and dirt, it is intended to use the ordinary double-flange rollers between the running tracks after the railroad tracks are passed, because much dirt, etc., will inevitably get into the machinery as the obelisk is drawn along over the streets. The course it will follow is up Ninety-sixth Street to the West Boulevard, down the West Boulevard to Eighty-sixth Street, across Eighty-sixth Street to Fifth Avenue, down Fifth Avenue to the Metropolitan Museum entrance to Central Park, and from there across on trestle-work to the site—a distance of 9,700 feet. The length of the trestle bridge is 870 feet, and it is in process of construction now in Jersey City. The obelisk will be carried about four feet from the ground all the way to the Park. It probably will reach its destination in about thirty days.

SIGNOR RAVELLI.

A VERY bright, particular star has appeared on the operatic firmament. Mr. Mapleson has unearthed a glittering jewel—a blue diamond. He has discovered a brand-new tenor. Society is enraptured, fascinated; it gushes, it explodes, and the name of Ravelli is now upon the lips of double duchesses. A few weeks ago and no one had heard of Signor Ravelli; to-day not to know all about him is "bad form." Chance, luck, kismet, played the highest card in the pack for this son of song when Mr. Joseph Maas, being announced for the part of Edgardo, at Her Majesty's, London, felt it his duty to insist upon a full-dress rehearsal. Not to be up in the score of "Lucia" seemed so ridiculous that the management pooh-poohed the rehearsal, especially as every square inch of time was occupied with Boito's "Mefistofele," and Mr. Joseph Maas, in a pet, threw up his engagement. What was Mr. Mapleson to do? Where was Edgardo? It was four o'clock, and in four hours the crème de la crème of upper-tendom would be languidly occupying boxes and seats. "Edgardo is such a charming rôle, you know!" It was four o'clock and the impresario was—no, Mapleson is never flurried, he's always as cool as an iced cabbage-leaf—he was calmly considering the best thing to be done to soothe the denizens of Mayfair and Belgravia, when a hungry and seedy Italian was announced. "I want a chance," said the man. "I am a tenor." "Here's a chance," said Mapleson: "Can you sing Edgardo?" "I can." "Just let me hear a few notes of 'Fra Poco.'" The seedy one obeyed. "That will do," cried the impresario. "You'll sing Edgardo to-night."

The seedy one muttered something about the suddenness and the want of rehearsal. "Take your chance," said Mr. Mapleson. Arrayed in a stock costume, gorgeous in moldy velvet and dingy spangles, the seedy one appeared on the stage. The audience received him with contemptuous silence. "Where was Maas?" Before the end of the first act his fortune was made. Society "rose" at him. By the time that Edgardo had asked Lucy Ashton if she recognized his handwriting, Mr Mapleson's handwriting was to a contract of a different nature, and when the curtain rang down on the death-agonies of the luckless cavalier, Ravelli was in everybody's mouth. We shall hear the wondrous tenor during Mr. Mapleson's coming season, and the æsthetic musical world of New York may fairly anticipate a phenomenal treat.

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

German Physicians assert that railway employés are more liable to affections of the spinal cord than other men.

Immense Quantities of implements belonging to the stone and bronze age have just been discovered near the rapids of the Dnieper. It is also said that an ancient boat, dating back to the time of Rurik, has been unearthed.

At a Recent Examination for admission to the British Indian medical service, out of twenty-six successful candidates, nine were natives of India. A Mohammedan from Oudh passed fifth, closely followed by a Brahmin from Bengal.

The French Branch of the International African Association have lately appointed M. Mizon, a naval officer, to be the chief of the station in West Africa, for which M. Savorgnan de Brazza is now endeavoring to find a suitable position on one of the affluents of the river Ogowé.

The Russians have at last figured out how much ammunition they used in their late war with Turkey. The infantry fired 14,326,342 shots, the cavalry 1,917,026, and the artillery 187,793, making a total of 16,431,161. These figures indicate that in order that one man may be hit, about 150 shots have to be fired.

The Danish Scientific Expedition to Siberia, under M. Tegner and Captain Hage, is reported to have reached Semipalatinsk on June 30th, and to have started again for Veracye a few days later. A subsidiary object of the expedition is to endeavor to establish commercial relations between Denmark and that part of Siberia.

M. Lacroix has offered to lead an exploring expedition to Central Africa for the purpose of solving the Ogowé problem, which was not entirely cleared up by M. Savorgnan de Brazza's journey. It is thought by some that this river is connected with a large waterway across the centre of Africa, extending nearly to Lake Albert, on the other side of the continent.

A Discovery has just been made by M. Toussaint, a professor of the veterinary school at Toulouse, by which he has succeeded in inoculating animals with vaccine taken from an infected one, and rendering them proof against epidemics, such as pleuro-pneumonia, etc. M. Pasteur, it is well-known, was successful in vaccinating poultry, and thus preserving them from the attack of what is known as chicken cholera.

The Systematic Excavation of ancient sites in Egypt is being bitterly opposed in many parts of the globe, and societies are being formed to prosecute parties and corporations engaged in the work. Several prominent Egyptologists have promised their support to these societies, and we learn that a Miss Edwards contemplates a tour of the United States, at an early day, with the object of assisting the fund, and working up a sentiment against the excavators.

A Little Time Ago workmen employed in making the road to Zéa, discovered, quite close to the bay of Zéa, some ancient walls. The archæological society had a clearance made, and the excavations revealed that a theatre dominating the bay once stood on this spot. This theatre, the existence of which was asserted by some travelers and contested by others, is undoubtedly that of which Xenophon speaks (Hell. ii. 4), and is quite distinct from the theatre of Munychia, the ruins of which are seen in the extreme distance, at the northeast of the bay of Zéa.

The Second International Geological Congress will be held at Bologna in September, 1881. It is proposed to award a prize of 5,000 francs for the best international scale of colors and conventional signs for the graphic representation of formations on geological maps and sections. Each scale should be accompanied by an explanatory memoir and a sufficient number of maps and sections relative to regions of different geological characters; for the memoirs the French language is recommended. The scales and memoirs should be addressed, before the end of May, 1881, to the President of the Committee, Signor J. Capellini, 46 Via Zamboni, Bologna.

PERSONAL GOSSIP.

SPEAKER RANDALL has gone to Ohio to participate in the Democratic rantans.

UNITED STATES SENATOR ANGUS CAMERON, of Wisconsin, declines to be a candidate for re-election.

A MARBLE statue of Senator Blaine has just been completed in Rome by Mr. Simmons, who pronounces it his best work.

THE will of the late H. M. Spofford, contestant of the seat of Senator Kellogg, of Louisiana, shows that he owned $154,000 in United States bonds.

MR. WILLIAM MCARTHUR, member of the House of Commons for Lambeth, has been elected Lord Mayor of London. Mr. McArthur is a Liberal.

IT is now stated that the marriage of the Baroness Burdett Coutts and Mr. Ashmead Bartlett will be celebrated in October, the precise date being kept a secret.

THE Executive Committee of the Republican National Committee will meet on October 14th to receive General Grant, who is expected to arrive in this city the evening before.

COLONEL JAMES G. FAIR has written a letter to prominent citizens of Virginia City announcing his readiness to accept the nomination for United States Senator from Colorado.

THE Rev. Michael A. Corrigan, D. D., Bishop of Newark, N. J., has been appointed coadjutor to Cardinal McCloskey, with the rank of archbishop and the right of succession to the archbishopric.

COLOSSAL statues of Michael Angelo and Albert Durer, by Mr. Ezekiel, the American sculptor in Rome, have been received at the Corcoran Gallery in Washington. They are companion statues to his Phidias and Raphael.

MR. P. T. BARNUM is a practical worker in the field of temperance as well as lecturer. He offers to give $1,000 towards a reading and amusement room in Bridgeport, where young men may find sociability away from the saloons.

MRS. CHALMERS DALE gives the town of Monson, Mass., $25,000 for a granite building for a public library, in memory of Horatio Lyon, her father, a leading manufacturer of the town, and his widow $20,000 for an endowment fund.

THE widow of the late Mark Hopkins, in an answer to a petition filed in the Probate Court of San Francisco, by one of the heirs, for the revocation of letters of administration issued to her, says property to the value of nearly nineteen millions has already been divided among the heirs.

LATE advices from the Presidential party are to the effect that the President and family will probably remain in the West until after the Presidential election. They expect to reach their home at Fremont, Ohio, during the latter part of October and to remain there until the November election is over.

MR. JAMES W. MACKEY, the "Bonanza" millionaire, is a collector of agates. When Mrs. Hayes and her traveling companions inspected Mr. Mackey's collection, during the Presidential visit to Virginia City, they were much pleased with the agates, and each received a handsome specimen as a present.

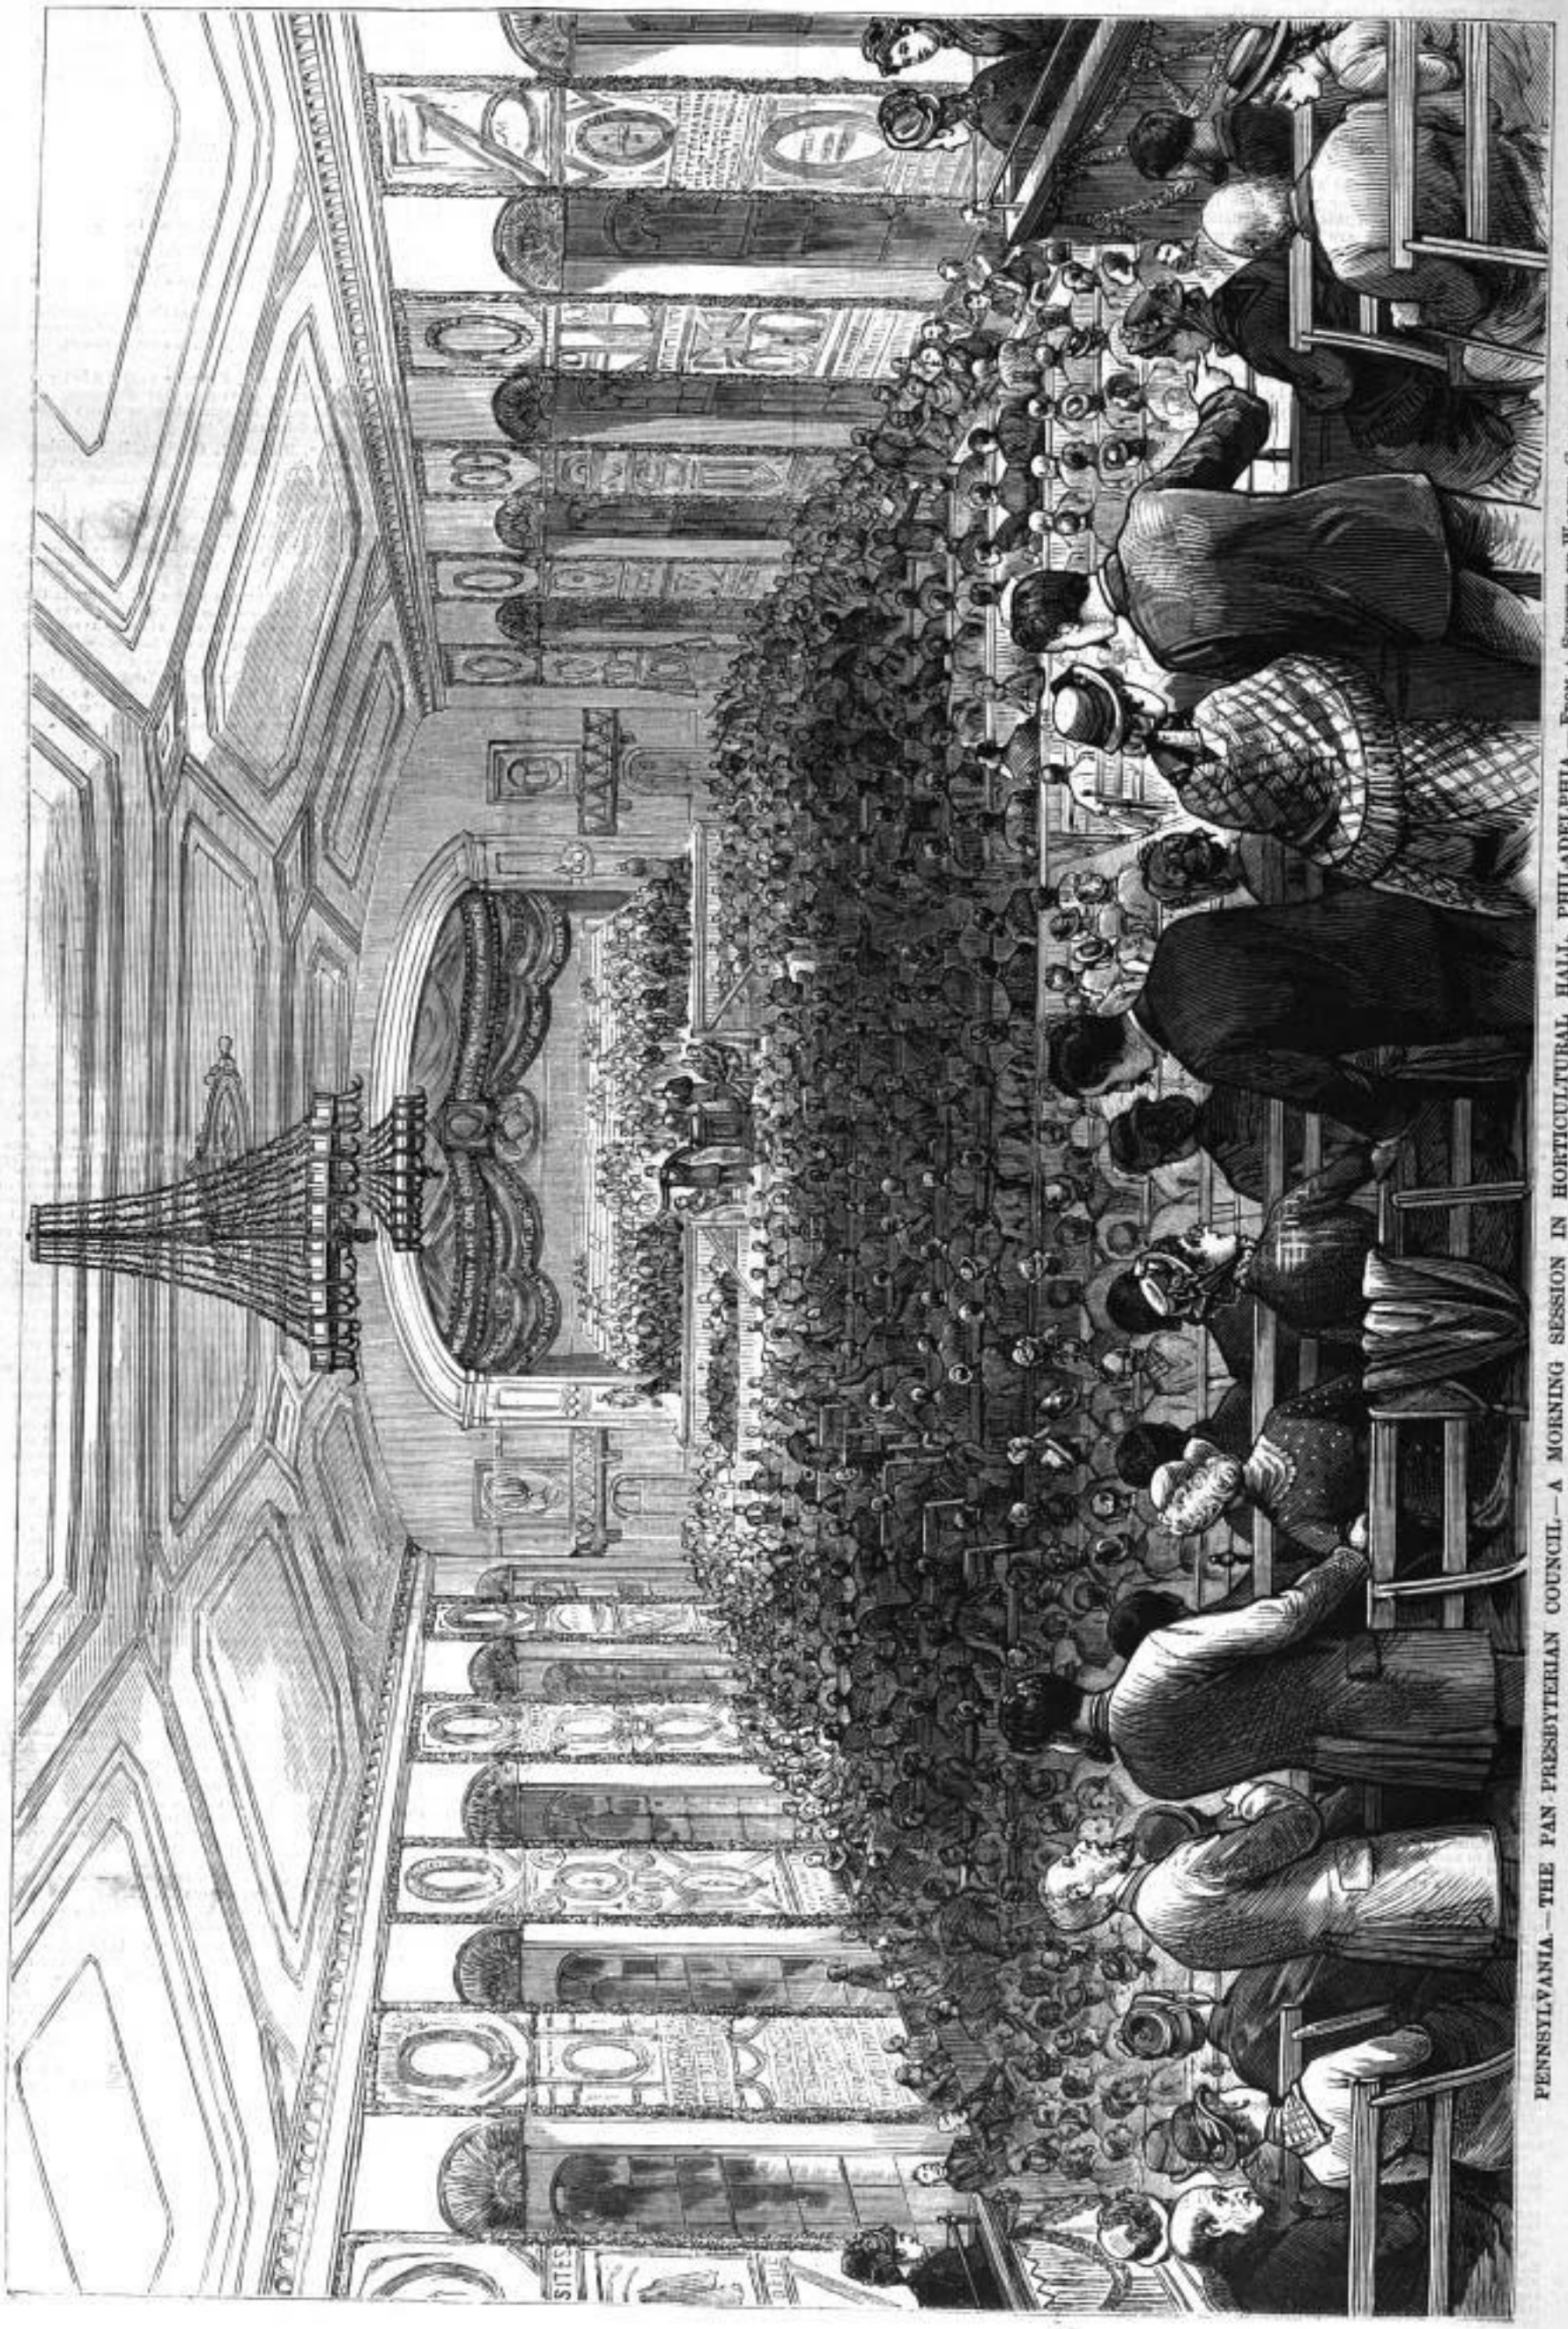
MRS. PRUDENCE LARKIN died at Hancock, N.Y., a few days ago, at the age of 104 years. She was born in Delaware County in 1776, and had always lived within the limits of the county. She never rode upon the cars, and never saw a telegraph-wire. Several of her children, between seventy and eighty years old, survive her.

THE Count de Chambord completed on Wednesday last his sixtieth birthday. The occasion was celebrated by about a dozen banquets in various parts of Paris, and a commemorative Mass at the Church of St. Germain des Près was attended by a thousand persons. Masses were also celebrated at Marseilles, Bordeaux and other towns.

SIR ANDREW BARCLAY WALKER, ex-Mayor of Liverpool, who gave several hundred thousand dollars for a magnificent art gallery in that city and whose statue was recently unveiled there, is traveling in Southern Colorado, in company with Mr. Pearson, another ex-Mayor of Liverpool, who has purchased property in Colorado.

A PLEASANT feature of ex-Senator Simon Cameron's visit in Indiana was the renewal of his acquaintance with Dr. John G. Kennedy, of Acton, after a separation of sixty-two years. The former is eighty-one and the latter eighty-eight. Mr. Cameron learned the printing trade of Dr. Kennedy's father. The old friends found themselves standing on the same political platform.

THE Empress Eugénie, it is said, has decided to leave England, being moved to that determination by Parliament's acting its foot definitely against the erection of a monument to the Prince Imperial in Westminster Abbey. She will probably go to reside at her Château of Arenenberg, Switzerland, and her present intention is to erect a mausoleum wherever she fixes her residence, and remove the remains of her husband and son from England.



PRINCETON COLLEGE has just received the princely gift of $100,000 from Mr. Robert L. Stuart, one of New York's most public-spirited citizens. It is given in trust for the support of such professorships as are not now endowed or only partially so. It is said that the Theological Seminary at Princeton also receives $100,000 from Mr. Stuart for the endowment of a new professorship, which the Rev. Francis L. Patton, of Chicago, has recently been invited to fill.

THE death is announced, at the age of eighty-eight, of the Countess Lydia von Wrangel, born a Von Bulow, widow of the deceased Field Marshal of the same name, who preceded her to the grave about three years ago. Married in 1810, the departed lady celebrated her golden wedding in 1860 and her diamond one in 1870—a very rare achievement even among the robust and long-lived gentry of Prussia. In the Countess von Wrangel the poor, the sick and the afflicted of Berlin lose one of their most charitable friends.

THE venerable littérateur, S. C. Hall, of London, writes to General Wilcox, of New York City, that he has abandoned the great metropolis, where he has lived for half a century, for a beautiful cottage in Surrey, near Hampton Court, which will hereafter be his permanent residence. At Christmas Mr. Hall will withdraw from the editorship of the Art Journal, which he has conducted for the long period of forty-one years, and of which he was the founder in 1839. Both Mr. and Mrs. Hall are still in the enjoyment of good health after a happy married life of more than fifty years. They celebrated their golden wedding in the Summer of 1875.

MINNIE HAUK'S parlor in London is a particularly pleasant though small room. The opera piano is covered with opera scores; on the tables are albums of letters from kings and queens and poets; there are volumes of autograph music from Abt, Liszt, Wagner and others; there are bits of china and water-color sheet, and an aggressive little dog (a royal gift) lies on his gay cushion in a place of honor. She sings fifty operas in German, Italian, French, Hungarian and English. She was educated in a French convent, but learned to speak among the Creoles of New Orleans, where she lived while General Butler was in command of that city.

Digitized by Google

PENNSYLVANIA.—THE PAN-PRESBYTERIAN COUNCIL.—A MORNING SESSION IN HORTICULTURAL HALL, PHILADELPHIA.—FROM A SKETCH BY WALTER GOATER.—SEE PAGE 107.

Digitized by Google

FRANCIS W. DAWSON, EDITOR OF THE "NEWS AND COURIER," CHARLESTON, S. C.—FROM A PHOTO. BY F. A. NOWELL.

CAPTAIN FRANCIS W. DAWSON,

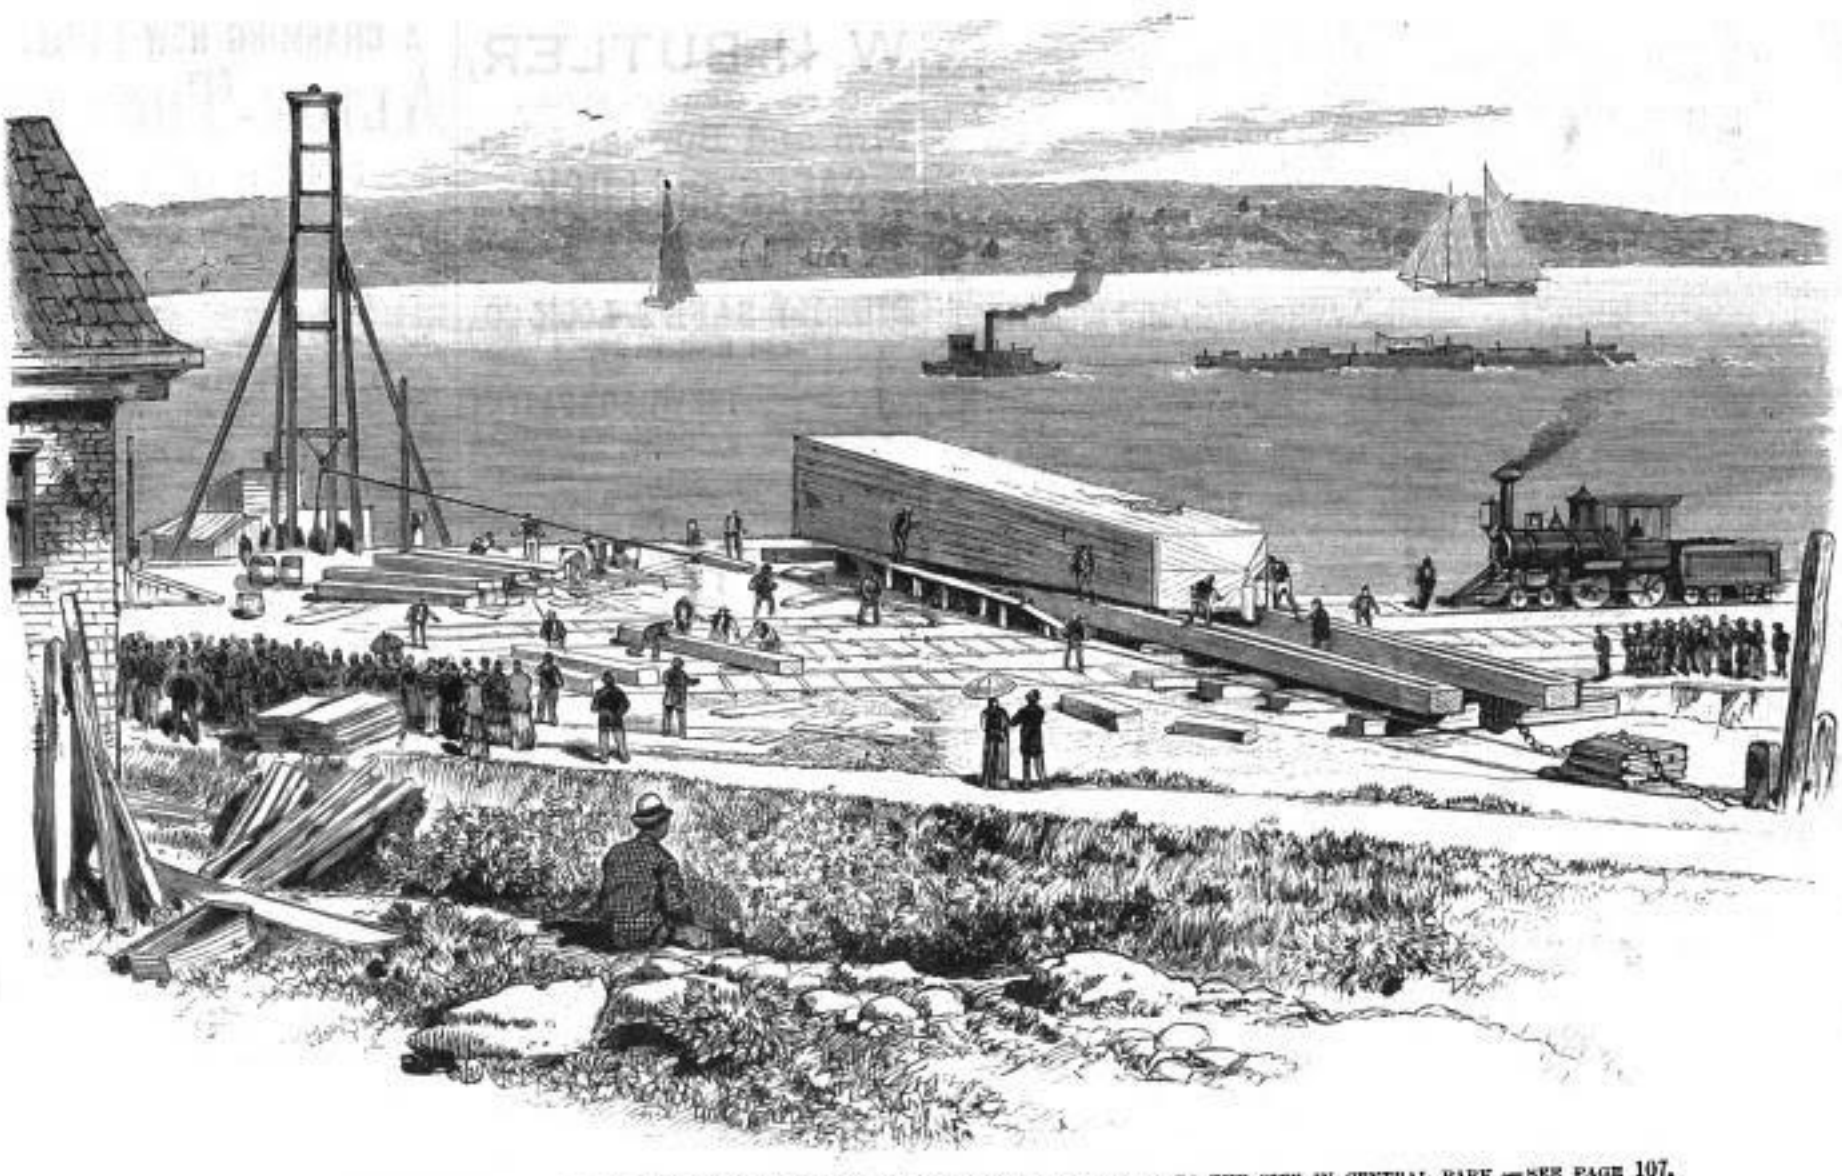
EDITOR OF THE CHARLESTON "NEWS AND COURIER."

CAPTAIN FRANCIS W. DAWSON, editor of the Charleston News and Courier, was born in London, England, May 17th, 1840. Having acquired a good education, he engaged for a time in literary labors, but becoming interested in the struggle of the Southern States in 1861, he enlisted as a sailor on the Confederate steamship Nashville, and, immediately that vessel had run the blockade at Beaufort, N. C., was appointed master's mate in the Confederate Navy. This was early in 1862. After serving for a short time at Norfolk, he resigned his naval commission and took service as a private in a battery attached to the Army of Northern Virginia. He participated in the Peninsular campaign, being wounded at the battle of Mechanicsville, and was promoted to a lieutenancy for his bravery, and ordered to duty with Longstreet's corps, as assistant advance officer of which he served until the Fall of 1864. After the battle of South Mountain, in 1862, he was captured, but was subsequently exchanged just in time to take part in the battle of Fredericksburg, in December of that year. He was with Longstreet through Gettysburg and his East Tennessee campaign, and by his side when wounded at the Wilderness. In the Winter of 1863-64, he passed an examination for promotion, and received his commission as captain of artillery in May, 1864. After his promotion he was relieved of his command at his own request, and appointed Ordnance Officer of Fitzhugh Lee's Division. In this capacity Captain Dawson served through the Valley Campaign and at Five Forks on March 31st, 1865, where he was wounded in the shoulder.

At the end of the war, being penniless and homeless, Captain Dawson first found employment as a bookkeeper in a drygoods store in Petersburg, Va., but his literary tastes still predominating, he soon found employment in a journalistic capacity in Richmond, where he remained until 1866. In the Fall of that year he became assistant editor of the Charleston Mercury, which position he filled until October, 1867, when he bought an interest in the Charleston News, which he published as joint owner until 1873, when the Courier of that city was purchased and consolidated with the News. The News and Courier at once took a leading place in journalism, and now its influence is not second to that of any newspaper in the Southern States.

Captain Dawson was the pioneer in the organization of the Southern Press Conference, and upon the organization of the State Press Association in South Carolina, was made First Vice-President, becoming subsequently President of the body. He has taken a prominent part in the politics of the State ever since the war, and has pursued a consistent conservative course. So anxious has he at all times been for the peaceful arbitration of great political questions, that he has frequently fallen under the displeasure and censure of the extreme men of his own party, who have said many hard things of him to their own discredit and to the injury of the cause. But his influence has remained unbroken, and he is to-day in every respect an acknowledged, potential leader of his party. He opposed the nomination of Wade Hampton and a straight-out Democratic ticket in 1876, believing it to be best to acquiesce in the retention of Governor Chamberlain. This caused him to be denounced with especial bitterness, as did his own denunciation of the Hamburg massacre. Upon Hampton being nominated, the News and Courier wheeled into line, and it is not too much to say that without its efforts Hampton would not have been elected. Captain Dawson is now the member of the National Democratic Committee from South Carolina, and was a delegate to the Cincinnati Convention from the Charleston District. It is a prime rule of his life that a journalist, in the active pursuit of his profession, should not accept any public office of profit, and he has acted upon this from the beginning. Captain Dawson has been twice married. His present wife is a daughter of Hon. Thomas Gibbes Morgan, of Louisiana, and sister of the present United States Minister to Mexico. Being now in the prime of life, with his powers at their full, doubtless his future career will be even more distinguished than his past.

SIGNOR RAVELLI, THE DISTINGUISHED ITALIAN TENOR. FROM A PHOTO. BY ELLIOTT & FRY.—SEE PAGE 107.



GENERAL HARRIS M. PLAISTED, GOVERNOR-ELECT OF MAINE. FROM A PHOTO. BY L. C. DILLON.

HON. HARRIS M. PLAISTED,

GOVERNOR-ELECT OF MAINE.

GENERAL HARRIS M. PLAISTED, Governor-elect of Maine, was born in Jefferson, N. H., on November 3d, 1828, and was brought up on his father's farm, working during the Summer months and teaching school in Winter. He finally graduated at Colby University in 1853, and at the Albany Law School in 1855, when he was admitted to the Bar, and began the practice of the law in Bangor, Me., in 1856. He served in the Union army throughout the war as Colonel of the Eleventh Maine Volunteers, and received at its close the brevet of Major-General. In 1867-68 he sat in the State Legislature; was a delegate-at-large to the National Republican Convention in 1868, and served as Attorney-General of the State during 1873-75. In 1874 he was elected to Congress from the Fourth District by about 1,000 majority, but was not a candidate in 1876. In that year he was an earnest champion of Mr. Blaine's Presidential claims. When General Plaisted received the Greenback nomination for Governor, in June last, he made a speech in which he set forth his present peculiar views in the following strain:

"I am utterly opposed to the system that would trim the currency of the country to a coin basis, a system that will end but in forcing the nose of the people against the grindstone. Then, the system of national banks is to be considered. I do not blame the bondholders; they are looking after their own interests, and man

NEW YORK CITY.—THE REMOVAL OF THE OBELISK FROM THE FOOT OF NINETY-SIXTH STREET TO THE SITE IN CENTRAL PARK.—SEE PAGE 107.

Digitized by Google

is selfish. I stand, however, on the platform of Thomas Jefferson — equal privileges, no special privileges, equal rights for all. It is not the use, but the abuses, of government that we would abolish."

Iron Steamboats.

A COMPANY has been formed in New York City whose purpose it is to build a fleet of iron excursion boats intended for the navigation of the Hudson River, New York Bay, Long Island Sound, and other waters. Eight or nine boats will be built at once. Each of them will be divided into not less than 12 water-tight compartments, and provided with improved compound engines, steel boilers and all appliances conducive to comfort, safety and speed. It is designed to make them perfectly seaworthy, so that they can be sent for Winter use to Savannah, Charleston, Florida and New Orleans, and it is expected that their average rate of speed will be not less than 20 miles an hour. The company proposes to build 30 of these steamboats between now and 1883, the year of the proposed World's Fair. The total amount of the capital stock is $10,000,000, which is divided into 100,000 shares of the par value of $100 each. The sum of $500,000 has already been pledged.

South American Pampas.

THE South American correspondent of the London Times writes: "The Provinces of Buenos Ayres and Montevideo are as yet far from being overcrowded; but an immigrant will not fare worse for going further for elbow-room, provided he be as careful to insure free and easy communication as a good general would be anxious to keep within reach of his base of operations. There are rivers in this region navigable by steam for thousands of miles, and the railways, which seem to have been providentially invented to serve the purposes of American colonization, are already reaching the borders of the Grand Chaco, the Grand Pampa, Patagonia and other great deserts, where land is to be had for the mere asking, and where the red Indian has ceased to be the bugbear he was, and cannot be made to face a breech-loading rifle. The land is in the main an immense flat, no doubt; very large tracts of alluvial soil, without a tree or a pebble: part of it mere swamps or salt wilderness. But even these thousand miles of unbroken level are not without a peculiar beauty of their own; their boundless horizon and awful solitude; the freshness and purity of the atmosphere, and the keen enjoyment of unlimited freedom. Nor, apart from intercourse with his fellow-men, is a man here crushed by the sense of utter forlornness: for nothing is more striking than the teeming life of the animal kingdom in the pampas—the abundance of game, the storks and herons, the owls and hawks, the flights of wild turkeys and flocks of ostriches, to say nothing of ubiquitous piero-piero and chattering little cardinal; a multitude and variety of fowls and brutes—numberless to me as well as numberless—the gayety of whose plumage and fur, and the strangeness and wildness of whose screeches and howls a settler will always and everywhere have with him, and which will only gradually make room for the flocks and herds, the barking and bellowing, the crowing and cackling, of his domestic surroundings. Life in the prairies is life in the saddle, for the very beggar here is mounted; and, away from rail or tramways, neither for sex nor age is there any other practicable, or at least endurable, means of locomotion than on horseback; and the horses are fleet and sure-footed, brave as lions and gentle and docile as cows, and their purchase and keeping cost little and their stabling and shoeing nothing."

A Chinese Secret Political Organization.

THE Society Ge Gung Tong, which is an organization of Chinese, banded together for mutual protection and relief, and having for its main object the overthrow of the present Emperor, whose predecessors overran China with a host of Tartars and set up this dynasty in conquered Cathay, have just completed a very fine three-story brick building in Spofford Alley, San Francisco. The building is the headquarters of the society, which numbers ten thousand Chinese in California and about one million five hundred thousand in China, and cost with the ground about $10,000. The structure is divided into offices, joss-temples and conference rooms, which are all fitted up with an elegance eclipsing that of any other building in Chinatown. Bronzed dragons, hideous-looking deities and attending angels are grouped together in untold numbers and with truly Oriental taste. The dedicatory exercises began one night recently, and continued one week, and consisted of unlimited feasting, offering of devotions, and burnt sacrifices of sacred paper, celestial candles and fruit, and other food offerings to the all-powerful and inexpressibly ugly-faced "josses." The society also provided a free-lunch throughout the week for about two hundred of the poor, the halt and the blind of their members who might be in the city. Delegations of the society's officers are in attendance from Sacramento, Nevada City, Grass Valley, and other large towns in the interior.

Dulcigno.

ALTHOUGH Dulcigno, pronounced like an Italian word, has been made very prominent lately by dispatches from the East, it is quite probable that many newspaper readers scarcely remember to have heard of it until the recent trouble between the Albanians and the Porte. Dulcigno is playing a much more conspicuous part than it is entitled to by any importance of its own. Its momentary fame is accidental, like the fame of so many insignificant points that have been the scene of military operations and military movements. Philippi, Blenheim, Leuthen, Actium, Wagram, Austerlitz, Waterloo, Bosworth, Antietam, Pittsburg Landing and Woerth, are notable examples. Dulcigno is an inconsiderable town and seaport of European Turkey, Province of Albania, is situated on the shore of the Adriatic, fifteen miles south west of Scutari. The inhabitants were long notorious for piracy, but are now comparatively law-abiding, being mostly occupied in the oil and coasting trade. It is the seat of a Catholic Bishop, and has a population of some seven thousand, about half of whom are Turks. It was anciently known as Olcinium, and the Turks call it Olgeno. It is perched on Cape Kadille, a rocky peninsula. It might be made a very strong place, and would at any time be hard to take, if vigorously defended. When the present Turkish-Montenegrin-Albanian flurry shall have passed Dulcigno will sink into its former obscurity, like some Western politician, who has managed, for the hour, to draw the eyes of the nation to his rampant absurdity.

Precious Manuscript.

THE manuscript of the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Mark, recently discovered by two German scholars in the palace of the Archbishop of Rossano, is made of purple parchment, and the material used throughout the writing is silver, except in the first three lines in each Gospel, where the letters are golden. There is only one other manuscript of this kind in existence containing any portion of the New Testament, and it is in a mutilated condition, four of its leaves being in London, six in Rome, two in Vienna, and thirty-three have been more recently discovered in the island of Patmos. The present volume, on the other hand, consists of one hundred and eighty eight leaves, and contains the whole of the Gospel of St. Matthew, and the Gospel of St. Mark down to the middle of the fourteenth verse of the sixteenth chapter. All the criteria used in judging of manuscripts indicate the end of the 5th or beginning of the sixth century as the date of this. The manuscript is written in uncial characters, with two columns in each page. There is no separation of words, no breathing, no accent, and only the slightest attempt at punctuation. There are capitals double the size of the uncials, and the Eusebian canons may have been given, for it contains a portion of the letter of Eusebius to Carpianus and there is good reason for conjecturing that this was followed by a table of the Eusebian canons.

A Young Girl Sleeps for Many Months.

SCARCELY less astonishing than Dr. Tanner's recent feat of fasting is the condition of a young lady, the daughter of the Mayor of Grambke, a village near Bremen, in Germany, who is said to have been fast asleep ever since the second week in January, with the exception of a few hours of semi-wakefulness at intervals of from six to eight weeks. An interesting account of her extraordinary state is published in the Hanover Courier. It appears that she lies, plunged in a profound slumber and entirely unconscious of all that goes on around her, night and day, reclining on her left side, warmly covered up and with a light gauze spread over her head. Nourishment, chiefly in a liquid form, is daily administered to her, which she swallows without awaking for a second.

She is a pretty, slender girl, of a pallid complexion, but she does not lose in weight during her trances of from forty to sixty days, and, when awake, exhibits a cheerful disposition and an eager desire to perform such small household tasks as her strength enables her to fulfill. Her father is a well-to-do man, who has consulted several eminent medical men, in the hope of discovering some remedy for his daughter's abnormal condition, which entails serious inconvenience and constant anxiety upon the other members of his family; but all efforts hitherto made to keep the unlucky girl awake have resulted in total failure. Since the case of the sleeping Ulian at Potsdam, no such interesting subject for study and observation on the part of the faculty has arisen as that of the strangely somnolent burgomaster's daughter of Grambke.

AMUSEMENTS.

COLONEL MAPLESON will open the season of Italian Opera at the Academy, on the 18th of October, with "Lucia." Gerster, Gallassi and the new tenor, Ravelli, are in the cast. About two hundred good seats have been added, and the advance sale indicates a very prosperous season. Several new operas will be produced, of which the announcements will soon be made. Arditi will wield the baton.

JOHN HARBERTON'S play, "Deacon Crankett," at the Union Square is a revelation. It contains a deacon without cant, and a good villain—surprises in their way. The story, simply told, of home-life in New England, with a genuine Bible-reading deacon for a hero, is natural and bids fair to prove one of the few dramatic successes of the day. It is well acted and carefully put on the stage.

THE regular season at the Union Square opens with "Daniel Rochat." It is likely to run till the close of the season.

FUN.

"IN what condition was the Patriarch Job at the end of his life?" asked a Brooklyn Sunday-school teacher of a quiet-looking boy at the foot of the class. "Dead," calmly replied the quiet-looking boy.

A DRUNKEN fellow meeting a man coming out of an undertaker's shop with a small coffin under his arm, a short time since, asked him what he had got there. "A new coffin," he replied. "Well," said the balmy chap, "can't you afford to treat on it?"

"HOW are you coming on with sea-bathing?" asked a gentleman of an invalid." "Splendid! I bathe three times a day." "How do you like it?" "The doctor says I must take a toddy after each bath to restore the circulation—that's how I like it!"

AN old farmer's wife who had a servant that was notorious for breaking dishes, on one occasion fell asleep in church. During her slumbers her elbow unluckily overturned a bible, when, to the amusement of her fellow-worshipers, she was heard to mutter in a very audible voice—"Another bowl, ye hissin."

HE was lying in front of the store door when the Galveston merchant came out, and, stirring him up with the toe of his boot, said: "Are you drunk?" "You bet." "Then you move off from here." "Are you drunk?" queried the inebriate. "No; I am sober," was the indignant response. "Then you can move off from here a sight easier than I can."

A TALL, slab-sided Yankee, who strolled down Manhattan Beach last month, on seeing the bevy of beauties disporting in the waves, burst into a fit of enthusiasm. "Je-ru-sa-lem! if that don't jest remind me of something good we have to hum." "What is that?" remarked a friend, who heard him. "What is it?" said Jonathan, smacking his lips—"why, 'lasses in water."

IT is asserted that, after a few drinks of both liquids, no man can distinguish claret from buttermilk by the taste, and this statement has been proved by experiments. There is nothing remarkable about that, however. Beyond a certain point, which is ordinarily reached by 1 A. M., few men can tell the difference between whisky and seltzer, especially if he takes them together.

THE minister stopped at a house last week, and sought to improve the time by giving an eight-year-old boy an instructive lesson in morality. "My boy, said the minister; "I have lived forty-five years, and have never used tobacco in any form, nor sold a lie, nor uttered an oath, or played truant, nor——" "Gimminy crickets!" interrupted the lad, "yer ain't had no fun at all, have ye?"

DR. R. V. PIERCE, CONSULTING PHYSICIAN to the World's Dispensary and Invalids' Hotel, Buffalo, N. Y., has resigned his seat in Congress that he may hereafter devote his whole time and attention to those applying to the WORLD'S DISPENSARY MEDICAL ASSOCIATION for the treatment of Chronic Diseases.

A SIMPLE trial of DR. BROWNING'S TONIC AND ALTERATIVE convinces the most obstinate of its superior health-giving qualities. It is a perfect Blood Purifier, changes the constitution suffering from General Debility into one of Vigorous Health, and enriches and reddens the Blood. Manufactured by its author and sole Proprietor, W. Champion Browning, M. D., 1117 Arch Street, Philadelphia. All Druggists and Dealers in Medicines keep it.

ANGOSTURA BITTERS are indorsed by all the leading physicians and chemists, for their purity and wholesomeness. Beware of counterfeits, and ask your grocer and druggist for the genuine article, prepared by Dr. J. G. B. Siegert & Sons.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE, by its healthful action upon the nervous system and stomach, relieves Indigestion, Headache, etc.

FISK & HATCH,
Bankers,
AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT BONDS,
And other desirable Investment Securities,
No. 5 Nassau St., New York,

Buy and sell all Issues of Government Bonds, in large or small amounts, at current market prices, and will be pleased to furnish information in reference to all matters connected with investments in Government Bonds.

We are prepared to give information in regard to first-class Railway Securities, and to execute orders for the same.

Buy and sell all marketable Stocks and Bonds on commission, at the Stock Exchange and in the open market.

Receive accounts of Banks, Bankers, Merchants and others, and allow interest on daily balances; and for those keeping accounts with us we collect United States coupons and registered interest, and other coupons, dividends, etc., and credit without charge.

☞ We give special attention to orders from Banks, Bankers, Institutions and investors out of the city, by Mail or Telegraph, to buy or sell Government Bonds, State and Railroad Bonds, Bank Stocks, Railroad Stocks, and other securities.

We have issued the Seventh Edition of "Memoranda Concerning Government Bonds," copies of which can be had on application.

FISK & HATCH.

THE ST. NICHOLAS HOTEL, New York, has begun the Fall and Winter season under the pleasantest auspices. Its central location has always made the ST. NICHOLAS a favorite resort for business men, and now the tide of travel has turned towards the metropolis its liberal hospitality is being pushed to the utmost. Transient visitors, however, can always be amply accommodated, owing to a special reserve of rooms in their favor.

Hygeia Hotel, Old Point Comfort, Va., Aug. 3d, 1880.
H. W. Johns Mfg. Co., 87 Maiden Lane, New York.
DEAR SIRS: I desire to express most heartily my entire satisfaction with your paints, which I have been using a number of years. I now have over thirteen acres of woodwork covered with your paints. They have successfully withstood the effects of salt air and I consider them in every way satisfactory, and take pleasure in recommending them. Most respectfully, H. FINNIGAN, Prop'r.

Stuttering cured by RAPHO'S APPLIANCES. Send for description to SIMPSON & Co., Box 2230, New York.

EPPS'S COCOA.
GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast-tables with a delicately flavored beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.

Sold only in soldered tins, ½ and lb., labeled:
JAMES EPPS & CO., Homœopathic Chemists,
LONDON, ENG.

Amusements.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC. SEASON 1880-81.

MR. MAPLESON has the honor to announce that the OPERA SEASON will commence on MONDAY, OCTOBER 18th. The prospectus of the arrangements will be issued in due course.

Applications for boxes, etc., to be addressed in the meantime to Mr. ARNOLD, Academy of Music.

UNION SQUARE THEATRE.

UNQUALIFIED SUCCESS.

DEACON CRANKETT (×10)

SATURDAY MATINEE AT 2 O'CLOCK.

By JOHN HARBERTON, author of HELEN'S BABIES.

Every Evening at 8 o'clock and Saturday Matinee.

Magic Lantern Catalogue, 150 pp., and Lecture, 10 cts.
MAGIC LANTERNS AND VIEWS
THE MAGICAL ORGANETTE, ONLY $8.00.
Double size Hoods, extra strength and finish.
Circulars and beautiful Set Fancy Cards, 5 Cents.
THEO. J. HARBACH, 809 FILBERT ST., PHILA., PA.

Thos. Potter, Sons & Co.,
MANUFACTURERS OF OIL CLOTHS,
418 Arch Street,
PHILADELPHIA.

A MOST WELCOME PRESENT.
Invaluable to Every Smoker.
Self-Loading!
No Waste! No Odor!
Complete with Handsome Pipe.
No. 1, $1.25; No. 2, $1.75; No. 3 $3.
The No. 3 case is all Vele't—very rich & stylish. No. 2 is Russia leather. Sent by mail on receipt of price.
Eton Mfg. Co., 687 Broadway, N. Y.

Newspaper Advertising Bureau.

FREE!—100-PAGE PAMPHLET, containing complete lists of newspapers and schedules of advertising rates. GEO. P. ROWELL & CO., 10 Spruce St., N. Y.

Brain and Nerve Food.
VITALIZED PHOS-PHITES.
Composed of the Nerve-giving Principles of the Ox-Brain and Wheat-Germ.

PHYSICIANS HAVE PRESCRIBED 300,000 PACKAGES WITH THE BEST RESULTS IN ALL FORMS OF IMPAIRED VITALITY, MENTAL EXHAUSTION, OR WEAKENED DIGESTION. IT IS THE BEST PRE-VENTIVE OF CONSUMPTION AND ALL DISEASES OF DEBILITY. IT GIVES REST AND SLEEP TO IN-FANTS, CHILDREN AND ADULTS, BY STRENGTHENING THE BRAIN AND NERVES WITH THE FOOD THEY ACTUALLY REQUIRE.
For sale by Druggists or mail, $1. F. CROSBY, 664 & 666 Sixth Avenue, New York.

W. H. BUTLER,
Formerly VALENTINE & BUTLER,
Fire and Burglar-Proof
SAFES and LOCKS
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.
GENERAL AGENT FOR
DIEBOLD SAFE & LOCK CO.,
291 Broadway.

THE WILSON PATENT
Adjustable Chair,
WITH THIRTY CHANGES OF POSITIONS.
Parlor, Library, Invalid Chair, Child's Crib, Bed or Lounge, combining beauty, lightness, strength, simplicity and comfort. Everything to an exact science. Orders by mail promptly attended to, Go de shipped to any address, C. O. D. Send stamp for Illustrated Circulars. Quote FRANK LESLIE'S POPULAR MONTHLY. Address the WILSON ADJUSTABLE CHAIR MANUF'G CO., 561 BROADWAY, New York.

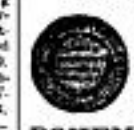
Send Promptly for a Full Report of the Proceedings of the Great Presbyterian Council,
At Philadelphia, September 23d to October 3d, 1880. Published by the PRESBYTERIAN PRINTING AND PUBLISHING CO., 1510 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia. Price $1, postpaid, paper cover; $2 in cloth.

KARL HUTTER'S
PATENT
Lightning Bottle Stoppers.
Also a Full Assortment of
LAGER & WEISS BEER BOTTLES,
With or without Stoppers, on hand.
Special attention paid to orders with name blown in the bottles.
A Large Selection of Bottlers' Supplies.
KARL HUTTER, 185 BOWERY, NEW YORK.



CANDY
Send one, two, three or five dollars for a retail sample box, etc., by express, of the best Candies in America, put up elegantly, and strictly pure. Refers to all Chicago.
C. F. GUNTHER, Confectioner, 78 Madison St., Chicago.

A CHARMING NEW NOVEL.
ALTON-THORPE.
By LUCY N. JANNEY.
12mo. Extra Cloth. $1.50.

"The best constructed and best written American novel that has appeared this season. The story itself is peopled with well-drawn characters, and made interesting by ingeniously arranged dramatic incidents that lead to a good conclusion."—Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.

 For sale by all Booksellers, or will be sent by mail postage prepaid, on receipt of the price by
J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.,
Philadelphia.

SCHMITT & KOEHNE.
Central Park Brewery
AND
Bottling Company.

Brewery, Bottling Department and Office, 160—168 East Fifty-ninth Street, Ice-house and Rock-vaults, Fifty-sixth and Fifty-seventh Street, Avenue A and East River, N. Y.

BOHEMIAN and LAGER BEER.
The finest Beer for family use. The best Shipping Beer in bottles, warranted to keep in any climate for months and years.

Frank Leslie's
BUDGET.
A MONTHLY VARIETY MAGAZINE,
Spicy and Entertaining.

Each Number contains 98 pages quarto, and over 100 beautiful illustrations.

Published on the 1st of every month, and for sale by all Newsdealers. Annual subscription, $1.50; single copies, 15 cents. Sent postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Digitized by Google

H.W. JOHNS ASBESTOS

LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING, BOILER COVERINGS
Steam Packing. Sheathings. Fireproof Coatings. Cements
Send for Samples, Illustrated Pamphlet and Price List.
H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO. 87 Maiden Lane, N.Y.

Carpets,

NEW FALL STYLES.

WE ARE NOW OPENING LARGE LINES OF NEW DESIGNS AND STYLES IN CARPETINGS RECEIVED FROM

OUR OWN FACTORIES,

WHICH WILL BE FOUND TO COMBINE TO AN UNUSUAL EXTENT

Elegance in Style and Finish,
Durability in Wear,
and Economy in Prices.

WE ALSO OFFER AN EXTENSIVE ASSORTMENT OF TURKISH, PERSIAN AND EAST INDIAN CARPETS AND RUGS, AND OTHER POPULAR FLOOR COVERINGS, AT EXTREMELY MODERATE RATES.

J. & J. DOBSON,

40 & 42 WEST 14TH STREET, N. Y.,
Near 6th Ave. Elevated R. R. Station.
JOHN VAN GAASBEEK, Manager.

MARCY'S OIL CHROMO SCIORTICONS
With New Improved and Carefully Selected
MAGIC LANTERN SLIDES,
L. J. MARCY, 1210 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.
For convenience and efficiency, for private or for public use, they stand
UNRIVALLED.
Circulars free. Catalogues, Free.

CHAMPLIN'S
LIQUID PEARL
Is used by Actresses, Opera Singers, and Ladies of Fashion, to create the distinguished appearance so much admired by every one. By its use the roughest skin is made to rival the pure radiant texture of youthful beauty. Use the LIQUID PEARL according to direction, and you need no longer complain of a freckled, tanned or rustic complexion. Sold by all druggists. Price 50 cents a bottle. Beware of imitations. CHAMPLIN & CO., Prop'rs, Buffalo, N. Y.

CATARRH
Bronchitis, Asthma & CONSUMPTION
Cured at home by INHALENE
A Compound of Carbolated OIL OF TAR
And Balsams, which is conveyed into vapor, and inhaled direct to the diseased parts, where it heals as quickly as the hot blood in a human body, as ordinary sores. J. Price Miller, M.D., Physician in Charge. Send Address Home Building, S. W. cor. 16th & Arch Sts., Philadelphia, Pa.

JUDGE FOR YOURSELF By sending 35c. money or 40c. postage stamps, with age, you will receive by return mail a correct picture of your future husband or wife, with name and date of marriage. Address, W. FOX, Box 38, Fultonville, N.Y.

$72 A WEEK. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly Outfit free. Address, TRUE & Co., Augusta, Maine.

The Most Practical and Valuable in the World.

USED IN ALL MANUFACTURES REQUIRING Greatest Elasticity and Security
OF SEAM!

FOR FAMILY WORK,

absolutely unapproachable!

No Lady careful of Health can afford to use any other!

No. 2 stand—Open.

No. 3 Stand—Closed.

Machine Head removed from Table and arranged for use by hand.

No accidental Ripping.

NO TENSION.

No guessing as to adjustment of stitch.

No delay in getting ready for work.

Excels all others in Make, Style and Finish.

By far the Cheapest
WHEN QUALITY AND MERIT
are considered.

The above and many other important features cannot be truthfully claimed for any other Sewing Machine in the world; hence the growing demand for

THE "AUTOMATIC" OR "NO TENSION" MACHINE.

Correspondence solicited, and full particulars sent on application. Please mention the number of this advertisement, 1,500. Free Trial in your own home can be arranged, if desired.

WILLCOX & GIBBS S. M. CO., 658 Broadway, N. Y.

SONGS, 25 Cts. a 100.

1 Baby Mine.
4 The Old Cabin Home.
6 The Little Ones at Home.
7 Old Black Joe.
12 See That My Grave's Kept Green.
13 Grandfather's Clock.
16 Sweet 23 and 2.
20 When, Emma. [Maggie.
21 When You and I were Young,
26 When I Saw Sweet Nellie Home,
40 Take this Letter to My Mother.
42 A Model Love Letter—Comic.
44 Wife's Commandments—Comic.
45 Raphael's Correspondence.
50 Little Old Log Cabin in the Lane.
56 Marching Through Georgia.
60 Widow in the Cottage by the Sea.
62 The Wanted Boy.
70 Take Back the Heart.
71 The Faded Coat of Blue. [Night.
77 My Old Kentucky Home, Good
84 I'll be all Smiles To-Night, Love.
90 Listen to the Mocking Bird.
92 Her Bright Smile Haunts Me Still.
94 Sunday Night, When the Father's
97 The Dipper's Warning. [Fill.
100 'Tis but a Little Faded Flower.
104 The Girl I Left Behind Me.
105 Little Buttercup.
107 Carry Me Back to Old Virginny.
113 The Old Man's Drunk Again.
114 I Am Waiting, Eulu. Dear.
119 Take Me Back to Home & Mother.
123 Come, Sit by My Side, Darling.
125 Kiss Me, Kiss Your Darling.
127 A Flower from Mother's Grave.
128 The Old Log Cabin on the Hill.
129 Dancing Thro' the Rye.
131 Meet Me, Tom, Meet as Strangers.
132 The Eyes Behind the Door.
136 I'll Remember You, Love, in My
142 Old Wooden Rocker. [Prayer.
144 You May Look, but Mustn't Touch.
150 There's Always a Seat in the Parlor for You. [for You.
151 I've an Mother Now, I'm Weeping
154 Mamma's in de Cold, Cold Ground.
156 Say a Kind Word When You Can.
160 Come for Sunday—Comic.
161 I Cannot Sing the Old Songs.
163 Waiting, My Darling, for Thee.
166 I'm Lonely Since My Mother Died.
170 Resting on the Old Camp Ground.
172 Don't You Go, Tommy, Don't Go.
176 Willie, We've Missed You.
182 Over the Hills to Our Poor Home.
185 Don't be Angry with Me, Darling.
187 Flirtation of the Fan.
188 Time Has Learned to Love As. Gilbert.
189 There's None Like a Mother.
194 You Were False, but I'll Forgive.
198 Old Log Cabin in the Dell.
200 Whisper Softly, Mother's Dying.
201 Will you Love Me When I'm Old?
207 Annie Laurie.
211 Sherman's March to the Sea.
214 Come, Birdie, Come.
217 Love Among the Roses.
219 Old Arm Chair (as sung by Barry).
220 The Sailor's Grave. [In the Garden
243 Farmer's Daughters; or, Chickens
248 Old Dear Gabbet Slippers.
249 Poor, but a Gentleman Still.
260 Nobody's Darling but Mine.
262 Put My Little Shoes Away.
268 Darling Nellie Gray.
285 Little Brown Jug.
286 Sea Gull.
287 Good-bye, Sweetheart.
290 Sadie Kay.
292 Tim Finigan's Wake.
312 The Hat My Father Wore.
314 I've Only Been Down to the Club.
317 Kiss Me Again.
319 The Vacant Chair.
320 The Sweet Bunny Smith.
323 Come Home, Father.
324 Little Widgie May.
326 Molly Bawn.
328 Sally in Our Alley.
330 Poor Old Joe.
340 Man in the Moon is Looking.
350 Broken Down.
360 My Little One's Waiting for Me.
361 I'll Go Back to My Old Love Again.
369 The Mother Boy.
385 I've Gotten Back to Dixie.
416 Where is My Boy To-Night?
420 The Five Cent Piece.
470 Linger Not, Darling.
486 Dancing in the Moonlight.

We will send by mail, postpaid, any ten of these songs for 10 cents; any twenty five songs for 15 cents; or, we will send all the above one hundred songs, postpaid, for 25 cents. Remember, we will not send less than ten songs by mail. Order songs by number only. Send one or three cent postage stamps. Valuable Catalogues of Songs and Agents' Goods free. Mention this paper. Address—LYNN & CO., 104 & 106 John Street, New York.

Imitation Gold Watches.
$5, $10, $15, $20 and $30 each; Gaining $2 to $12 to month. Jewelry of the same. Sent C.O.D., by Express. Send stamp for Illustrated Circular. COLLINS METAL WATCH FACTORY, 338 Broadway, N. Y. Box 3896.

50 Elegant, All New, Chrome & Scroll Cards, no 2 alike, Name Nicely printed, 10c. Card Mills, Northford, Ct.

$777 A YEAR and expenses to agents. Outfit free. Address, P. O. VICKERY, Augusta, Maine.

50 Elegant Cards, New Chrome, Shells, Gilt-edge, etc., with name, 10c. G. A. SPRING, Northford, Ct.

SCARCE GOODS.—Books, Photos, &c. Sample Catalogue 3c. Paris Book Co., Chicago, Ill.

40 Lovely Chromo Cards, New Designs just out, with name, 10c. STAR PRINTING CO., Northford, Ct.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address, STINSON & Co., Portland, Maine.

WITH

$5

you can buy a whole

DUCAL BRUNSWICK GOVERNMENT BOND,

Which bonds are issued and secured by the Government, and are redeemed in drawings

THREE TIMES ANNUALLY

until each and every bond is drawn.

THE THREE HIGHEST PRIZES AMOUNT TO
150,000 Reichsmarks,
90,000 "
60,000 "

And bonds not drawing one of the above prizes must draw a Premium of not less than 60 MARKS, as there are No Blanks.
One Reichsmark is equal to about 24 Cents Gold.
The next drawing takes place on the 1st of November, 1880.

Country order, sent in REGISTERED LETTERS inclosing $5, will secure one of these bonds for the next drawing, 1st of November.
For circulars and other information address the

INTERNATIONAL BANKING CO.,
16) Broadway, N. Y. City.
ESTABLISHED SINCE 1874.

N. B.—In writing, please state you saw this in the English Frank Leslie.

ETIQUETTE OF VISITING CARDS.—Latest rules for style, sizes, turning corners, etc.; mail 25c. HOWARD & CO., Box 2,828, New York.

50 New Style Cards, Lithographed in bright colors, 10c. 60 Agt's Samples 10c. Conn. Card Co., Northford, Ct.

53 Gilt Edge, Chromo, Snowflake, Glass Lace &c Cards, Name On 10c. Franklin Ptg Co., Fair Haven, Ct.

50 Landscape, Chromo Cards, etc., name on, 10c. 20 Gilt edge Cards, 10c. CLINTON & Co., North Haven, Ct.

50 ELEGANT CARDS, 50 styles, with name 10c. 40 Transparent, 10c., stamps taken. PEARL CO., Brockport, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's
PLEASANT HOURS,

A MONTHLY PICTORIAL JOURNAL of LIGHT, PLEASING LITERATURE,
INTERESTING AND BEAUTIFULLY ILLUSTRATED STORIES, COMPLETE IN EACH NUMBER.
PLEASING TALES, ADVENTURES, ANECDOTE, AND MIRTH-PROVOKING ILLUSTRATIONS.

For sale by all newsdealers, price 15 cents. Annual subscription, $1.50, postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Agents Wanted.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. Address, H. HALLETT & Co., Portland, Maine.

IT PAYS to sell our Rubber Hand-Printing Stamps. Circulars free. G. A. HARPER & BRO., Cleveland, O.

BIG PAY to sell our Rubber Printing Stamps. Samples free. Taylor Bros. & Co., Cleveland, O.

$350 A MONTH—AGENTS WANTED—75 best selling articles in the world; 1 sample free. Address Jay Bronson, Detroit, Mich.

AGENTS WANTED. $5 PER DAY made selling our PLATFORM FAMILY SCALE. Weighs up to 25 lbs. Retail price, $5. A BOOK FOR AGENTS. Exclusive territory free. Terms and rapid sales surprise Agents. DOMESTIC SCALE CO., Cincinnati, O.

AGENTS WANTED EVERYWHERE to sell the best Family Knitting Machine ever invented. Will knit a pair of stockings, with HEEL and TOE complete, in 20 minutes. It will also knit a great variety of fancy work for which there is always a ready market. Send for circular and terms to the Twombly Knitting Machine Co., 409 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING
Presses and outfits from $3 to $500. Over 2,000 styles of type. Catalogue and reduced price list free.
H. HOOVER, Philadelphia, Pa.

THE STAGE by Jas. E. Murdoch, Veteran Comedian and Tragedian. A series of Dramatic Sketches rich in Anecdote and reference to favorite Actors and Actresses. Price, $2. Special Terms to Agents.
J. M. STODDART & CO., Philadelphia.

MAMMARIAL BALM restores and develops the bust. Warranted sure and safe. Price, $1. NEW ENGLAND MEDICAL INSTITUTE, 24 Tremont Row, Boston, Mass.

20 New Chromo Cards, Bouquet, Motto or Moss Rose with name, 10 cts. Nassau Card Co., Nassau, N. Y.

The Unrivaled Illustrated Family Paper.

Frank Leslie's
CHIMNEY CORNER.
THE
Popular American Family Journal, Story Paper and Home Friend

Its Literary and Artistic Attractions are brilliant, and novelties are presented in constant succession; it best suits the wants of families.

As a Story Paper it is without a successful rival; the department of fiction contains serial novels by the most popular writers in this country, and wherever our language is spoken; but in addition to this, the information conveyed in every number is of the highest interest, and given in the most attractive form to win readers among old and young.

The Serial Novels, Short Stories, Sketches of Foreign Life and Travel, etc., are contributed by such popular writers as—John Habberton, author of "Helen's Babies"; N. Robinson, author of "That Mother-in-Law of Mine," "The Janitor's Daughter," etc.; Etta W. Pierce; Christian Reid; Mrs. Victoria Victor, author of "The Dead Secret"; M. T. Caldor; Frank Lee Benedict; J. W. De Forest; Corry Carew, author of "Belle Boskin of Ballyboden"; Prof. R. G. De Mills, etc., etc., etc.

Biography, all that is wonderful in Art and Nature, Anecdotes of celebrated personages, Science divested of technicality, Poetry, etc., etc., are embraced in the contents of each number, and all accompanied by Illustrations executed in the most refined style.

The CHIMNEY CORNER is a paper of high character, as its unceasing popularity surely attests.

Each Number contains sixteen pages of reading matter, with eight pages of admirably executed illustrations.

"Madeleine's Atonement,"

BY
MRS. HARRY BECKETT,

Is the title of a new short serial story just commenced; it is a tale of passion, beautifully told, and full of exquisite pathos. It is a novel such as is not often presented in periodicals, and will appeal to all the finer instincts of our nature.

Published every Monday, and for sale by all newsdealers, price 10 cents. Annual subscription, $4; three months, $1—cost postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

The OLDEST and BEST of the JUVENILE PUBLICATIONS.

Frank Leslie's
Boys' & Girls' Weekly

Is now publishing the following admirable serial stories all beautifully illustrated:

"The Lost Trail; Or, On the Wild North Border." By W. G. STONEMAN.
"Swoppy"; Or, The Adventures of a Yankee Boy." By NAT USHER.
"Trap-door Tom."
"Jim Jeffs: Or, The Mystery of the House by the River." By NED HOUET.
"Left to Himself." By COMMODORE AP-LOOT.
"The Pearl of the Sahara; Or, The Adventures of Two American Boys." By COMMODORE ROSS.
"Hal Harkforward and Tom Tallyho's Schooldays." BY SHACKERIDGE HEATHS (Jack Harkaway).

Sold by all newsdealers. Price 5 cents a copy; $2.50 a year, postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

COMPREHENSIVE, ATTRACTIVE AND CHEAP.

Frank Leslie's
POPULAR MONTHLY.

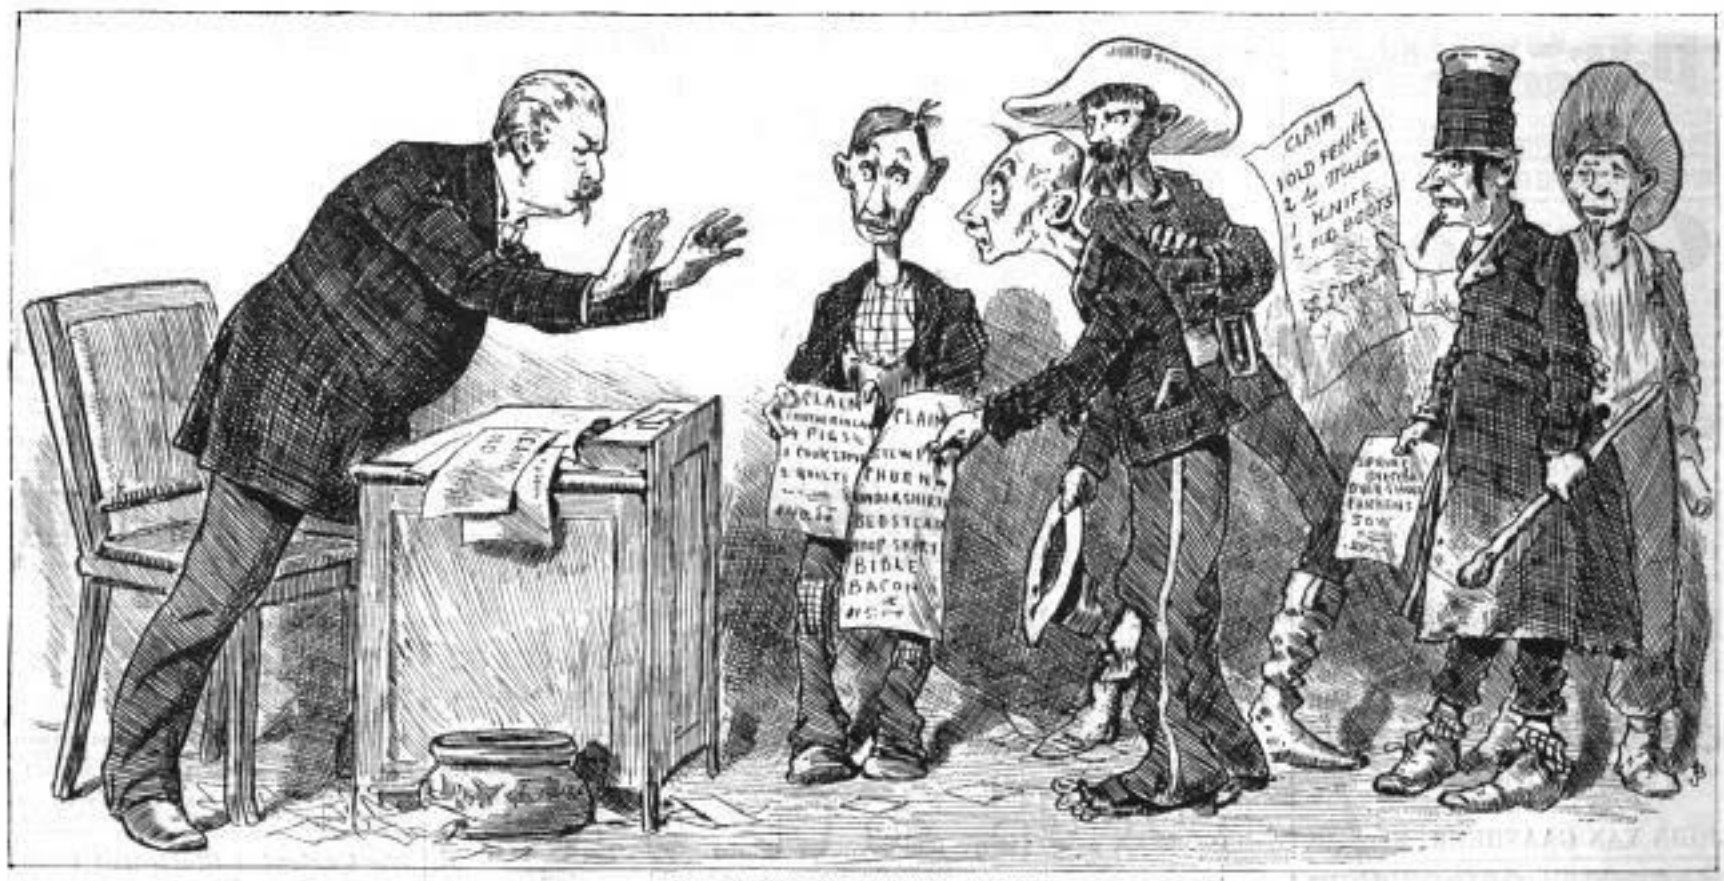
THE OCTOBER NUMBER NOW READY

WITH THE FOLLOWING ATTRACTIVE TABLE OF

CONTENTS:

"The Theatres of New York." By J. Brander Matthews. Twelve Illustrations.
"My Four Breakfasts in the Palais Royal." By N. Robinson. Four Illustrations.
"Cleopatra's Needle." Four Illustrations.
"The Empire of Annam, and the French Colony of Cochin China." Thirteen Illustrations.
"The Escape of Casanova De Seingalt from the Piombi, Venice." Illustrated.
"Sir Peter Paul Rubens." By Mrs. S. Reed. Nine Illustrations.
"Some Gossiping Papers." No. 3. By Mrs. Barrow.
"An Old Sea-Dog." Four Illustrations.
"The Hand." By F. Jeffrey Bell, R.A. Fourteen Illustrations.
Serial and Short Stories.—"The Amber Witch" (Chapters I.-V.), by the Author of "The House with an L," etc.; Illustrated. "Minola's Triumph"; Illustrated. "The Tutor's Story"; Illustrated. "Loving and Being Loved"; Illustrated. "Doubles," by Charles Reade; Illustrated. "Picaroon"; Illustrated. "Debby's Wash-tub"; Illustrated. "Under the Culvert," by C. Shackelford; Illustrated—etc., etc.
Sketches, etc.—"A Few Friends and a Little Music." "My Narrow Escape"; Illustrated. "Joseph Bonaparte—His Life in this Country—Cemetries of Bonaparte Park." "Chinese Whims and Ways." "A Superstition of the Sea"; Illustrated. "Rahma Ben Jaafar, Pirate of the Persian Gulf"; Illustrated. "Greenlander Harpooning a Narwhal"; Illustrated, etc., etc.
Poems.—"Robin and I," a Rustic Song, by Fanny Forrester. "Instability." "The Petrified Tryst"; Illustrated. "The Garden of Cymodoce," by A. C. Swinburne. "Hymn to the Sea," by Dean Alford; Illustrated. "The Lily," by W. G. Bennett. "Tree Rose"; Illustrated—etc., etc.
Miscellany.—"Gloves." "The Cedar-Bird"; Illustrated. "On Shaking Hands." "The Raccoon"; Illustrated. "Women at an Arabic Fountain, Jerusalem"; Illustrated. "The Gorge of the Tankiut, Peru"; Illustrated. "Antiquity of the Spanish Merino." "An Interesting Relic." "How Screws are Made." "The Marble Rocks of Central India." "King and Conjurer." "How Specimens are Made." "The Boy and the Snail." Giuseppina, the Heroine of Sicily"—etc., etc. "Recent Progress in Science." "Entertaining Column," etc., etc.

128 PAGES QUARTO—100 ILLUSTRATIONS.



Colored Plate Frontispiece, "THE COQUETTE," from the Original Painting by Palmarole.

Single copies, 25 cents. Annual subscription, $3; six months, $1.50; four months, $1—postpaid.

Send 25 Cents for a Specimen Copy.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House, 53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Digitized by Google

NO CHANCE FOR "REBEL CLAIMS."

GENERAL HANCOCK—"No, gentlemen, this claim business is a thing of the dead past; the Government can't recognize any claims in the interest of persons who were in rebellion."

HECKER'S PERFECT BAKING POWDER

PURITY AND STRENGTH GUARANTEED.

AN EXPERIENCE OF OVER THIRTY YEARS IN THE MANUFACTURE OF BAKING POWDER FOR USE IN MAKING SELF-RAISING FLOUR, WARRANTS US IN OFFERING THIS AS A PERFECT BAKING POWDER.

For Sale by all Grocers.

GEORGE V. HECKER & CO.,

CROTON FLOUR MILLS, 203 CHERRY ST., N. Y.

NICOLL THE TAILOR.

Fall and Winter Styles

NOW READY.

ELECTRIC LIGHTS used in BOTH STORES.

620 BROADWAY, AND 130 to 134 Bowery, New York.

Samples and Rules for Self-Measurement SENT BY MAIL.

KIDNEY-WORT

PERMANENTLY CURES KIDNEY DISEASES, LIVER COMPLAINTS, Constipation and Piles.

Dr. R. H. Clark, South Hero, Vt., says, "In cases of Kidney Troubles it has acted like a charm. It has cured many very bad cases of Piles, and has never failed to act efficiently."

Nelson Fairchild, of St. Albans, Vt., says, "It is of priceless value. After sixteen years of great suffering from Piles and Costiveness it completely cured me."

C. S. Hazelton, of Berkshire, says, "One package has done wonders for me in completely curing a severe Liver and Kidney Complaint."

IT HAS WONDERFUL POWER. WHY?

Because it Acts on the LIVER, the BOWELS and the KIDNEYS at the same time.

Because it cleanses the system of the poisonous humors that develope in Kidney and Urinary diseases, Biliousness, Jaundice, Constipation, Piles, or in Rheumatism, Neuralgia and nervous disorders.

KIDNEY-WORT is a dry vegetable compound and can be sent by mail prepaid.

One package will make six qts of medicine.

TRY IT NOW!

Buy it at the Druggists. Price, $1.00.

WELLS, RICHARDSON & CO., Proprietors,

12 (Will send prepaid.) Burlington, Vt.

ANEY THAT WILL NOT GET OUT OF ORDER AND NOT WEAR OUT SOLD by Watchmakers, by mail 30 cents. Circulars free. J. Busch & Co., 38 Dey St., N.Y.

OPIUM Morphine Habit Cured in 10 to 20 days. No pay till Cured. DR. J. STEPHENS, Lebanon, Ohio

IN CASES OF CHOLERA, Brown's Ginger does Good. Frederick Brown, Philadelphia, 1822.

FISHERMEN! TWINES AND NETTING

MANUFACTURED BY

WM. E. HOOPER & SONS, Baltimore, Md.

Send for Price-List, naming your County and State.

14 STOP ORGANS SUB BASS & Oct. Coupler, 4 Set Reeds, $65

Pianos $145 and upwards, sent on trial. Catalogue free. Address, DANIEL F. BEATTY, Washington, N.J.

COLUMBIA BICYCLE

The Bicycle has proved itself to be a permanent, practical road-vehicle, and the number in daily use is rapidly increasing. Professional and business men, seekers after health or pleasure, all join in bearing witness to its merits. Send 3c. stamp for catalogue with price list and full information.

THE POPE MFG. CO., 59 Summer St., Boston, Mass.

The Ladies OF THE White House OR, IN THE HOMES OF THE PRESIDENTS

A History of every Administration from Washington to the present time. Includes much Personal and Private history never before published. Agents wanted. For full description address the Publishers, BRADLEY & Co., 55 North Fourth St., Philadelphia, Pa.

TRUSS EGGLESTON SENSIBLE TRUSS. Made on new principles. Send for Circulars. Eggleston Truss, Chicago, Ill.

FIRM'S Can for Explosive Fluids.

PATENTED JAN. 21st, 1879.

P. O. Box 4272, New York.

A WONDERFUL INVENTION!

The CLARIONETTO. A new musical Instrument—perfect substitute for the Clarionet; valuable addition to Bands and Orchestras; splendid accompaniment to the voices can be played in any key (flats, sharps or minors); it requires no skill. Any one can play it. Can play any tune. Sent in a handsome French morocco embossed case, lined with silk, with full instructions, postpaid, for 30 cts., stamps or silver. THOMAS & CO., Box 415, LeRoy, N.Y.

I use the CLARIONETTO in my band and orchestra, and can say it is a truly wonderful invention and a marvel of simplicity and cheapness.—Prof. Jas. Jones, Palmerville, O.

H. B. Sayre, of Meriden, Ct., says: "I have earned as high as seven dollars per evening with the CLARIONETTO, playing for dances."

Prof. Galasch, of Trenville, Ky., Musical Institute, says: "Your CLARIONETTO is all that you claim for it. Fond motives." [Mention this paper.]

N.Y. Central & Hudson River R.R.

THE BEST ROUTE EAST OR WEST.

Through Cars between New York or Boston and Chicago or St. Louis.

See NIAGARA FALLS, SARATOGA and the HUDSON.

C. K. MEEKER, General Passenger Agent.

INMAN ROYAL MAIL STEAMERS

For QUEENSTOWN and LIVERPOOL.

NOTICE.—The steamers of this line take Lieutenant Maury's lane routes at all seasons of the year.

CITY OF RICHMOND.....Saturday, October 9, 9 A.M.
CITY OF CHESTER.....Saturday, October 16, 3 P.M.
CITY OF BRUSSELS.....Thursday, October 21, 7 A.M.
CITY OF BERLIN.....Saturday, October 30, 2 P.M.
CITY OF MONTREAL.....Thursday, November 4, 6 A.M.

From Pier 37, North River, foot of Charlton St.

Cabin, $80 and $100. Return tickets on favorable terms. Steerage, $28. Drafts at lowest rates. Saloons, state-rooms, smoking and bathrooms amidships.

These steamers do not carry cattle, sheep or pigs.

JOHN G. DALE, Agent, 31 and 33 Broadway, New York.
G. A. FAULK, 105 South Fourth Street, Philadelphia.
L. H. PALMER, 3 Old State House, Boston.
F. C. BROWN, 32 South Clark Street, Chicago.

A. T. Stewart & Co.

Are now exhibiting the Largest and Most Varied Collection of

REAL INDIA SHAWLS

Ever shown in this Market, including

Valley Cashmeres, Punjaubs, Umritzers, Deccas, Bombays, ETC., ETC.

Novel Colorings and Designs. Also an Extensive Assortment of Beaver, Velvet, Camels' Hair, French Broche and Imitation India SHAWLS

Of Every Quality.

PRICES EXCEPTIONALLY LOW.

Broadway, 4th Ave., 9th & 10th Sts.

MABIE, TODD & BARD.

GOLD PENS.

Pencils, Holders, Cases, etc.

180 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Send for Price-List.

Our Goods are for sale by First-class Dealers in U. S.

Do Your Own Printing $3 PRESS prints cards, labels, &c. (Self-inker $4) Larger sizes for larger work. For old or young. Great money saver. A paying business anywhere for all or spare time. Send two stamps for a CATALOGUE of all sizes Presses, Type, Cards, Paper, &c., to the Manufacturers KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

The Autumn Fashions just received from Paris,

Frank Leslie's LADY'S JOURNAL, THE Acknowledged Fashion Periodical of the Country.

This popular periodical has now entered on its Eighteenth Volume; it will be especially notable for the completeness of its fashion reports, always earlier and more reliable than those of any similar publication; the beauty of its art illustrations; the excellence and variety of its serial and short stories, and the comprehensiveness and interest of its miscellaneous articles.

Every effort will be made to surpass, if possible, the high standard of merit which the paper long since attained, and to render the LADY'S JOURNAL not only indispensable in every household, but the recognized arbiter of Fashion throughout the Western World.

Accurate Reports and Illustrations of the Prevailing Fashions at Home and Abroad.

16 PAGES, WITH BEAUTIFUL ILLUSTRATIONS

The literary contents comprise Brilliant Serials, attractive Short Stories, Sketches of Life, Character and Scenery, Fashion and Society Gossip, etc., etc. Its art and other miscellaneous engravings are selected with a view to variety, interest and beauty.

Published every Friday. Price 10 cents, at all newsdealers'. Annual subscription, $4, postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House, 53,55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

FOR SALE, "INTERLAKEN," THE COUNTRY HOME OF THE LATE FRANK LESLIE, ESQ.,

Consisting of 62 acres, situated on LAKE SARATOGA, and extending back to Lake Lonely.

The house contains twelve rooms, gas and water.

The stable, finished in fine woods, has six box-stalls.

Finely appointed billiard-room, and three handsomely furnished sleeping-rooms over coach-house.

Gardener's cottage.

Conservatories profusely stocked with rare plants.

The furniture, steam-yacht, sail and row boats, French omnibus, etc., will be sold with the place.

Apply to

HOMER MORGAN, 2 Pine Street; or,
V. K. STEVENSON, 25 Pine St., and 661 Fifth Av.

Digitized by Google

PRESIDENT HAYES IN CALIFORNIA.

THE visit of President Hayes and party to the Pacific slope has been attended by hearty demonstrations of satisfaction by the populace everywhere. The popular reception of the distinguished visitors in San Francisco was especially cordial. The population of the city turned out en masse to welcome the chief magistrate of the nation. Flags were displayed from all the buildings, public and private, and the principal streets were gayly decorated with bunting. The President was escorted to the Palace Hotel by a procession of militia and civic societies, the streets being densely thronged. The decorations of the Palace were superb. In the courtyard the most prominent feature was a large golden star, twenty-two feet in diameter, suspended from the centre of the roof, from between the points of which were extended six wide streamers of red, white and blue, reaching to the sides and corners of the yard, the corner ones falling below the second floor. Between the second and fifth floors, on the four sides of the quadrangle, were placed shields, 25 by 13, bearing the names of four Pacific States and Territories, bordered with evergreens and surrounded with flags, the one on the north side being mounted with a large American eagle. The two largest of the flags surrounding each of these shields measured thirty-six feet in length. The balustrades of the sixth, fifth, fourth, and third floor galleries were tastefully relieved with stars of silver and gold and shields, between which were entwined long stringers of evergreens. Dependent from the second floor were nineteen yard-colored Venetian banners, on which were the names of the Presidents of the United States, the name of "Rutherford B. Hayes" occupying the post of honor; on either side the names "Lincoln" and "Grant," and opposite, the names "Washington," "Adams," "Jefferson." Between the columns, separating the arches of the courtyard proper, were flags of all nations, loaned by the authorities of the Navy-yard, bearing shields, with the names of the principal cities on the Pacific coast and stands of ancient battle-axes. The arches themselves were draped and festooned with curtains of a rich gold color, falling in graceful folds, with a blue tassel in the centre. On the west side, directly facing the entrance, were two large and costly silk flags of the Stars and Stripes, thrown back and showing in the centre a large portrait of President Hayes. On the pavement surrounding the driveway and at the several doorways were set large stands of palms and ferns.

The suite of rooms occupied by the President and family were numbered 119, and were situated on the second floor of the hotel. They were four in number, being parlor, dining-room, and two sleeping apartments, all of which were furnished especially for this event. The parlor was especially elegant in its appointments. It was furnished in ebony and gold, and the furniture was covered with maroon satin. The floral decorations were at once elegant and unique.

The President, having visited the principal points in California last week, proceeded to Oregon, where he was welcomed with processions, illuminations, etc., in all the towns through which he passed.

CALIFORNIA.—VISIT OF PRESIDENT HAYES AND PARTY TO SAN FRANCISCO—THE FLORAL DECORATIONS OF THE PRESIDENT'S PARLOR IN THE PALACE HOTEL.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY I. W. TABER.

IRON MINING IN TENNESSEE.

THE most abundant and valuable minerals of Tennessee are coal, iron and copper. The iron industry, with which we have to deal at present, springs primarily from four distinct belts or areas. The eastern belt stretches across the eastern part of the State, at the base of the border range of mountains, extending into Virginia on the northeast and Georgia on the southeast; the drystone belt skirts the east base of the Cumberland table-land, extending beyond the limits of the State on the northeast and southeast; the Cumberland table-land belt is co-extensive with the great coal-field; and the western belt crosses the State north and south, and lies mainly between the Central Basin and the Tennessee River.

While the State has been in the fullest possession of advantages for making iron, in the abundance, cheapness and contiguity of ore and of fuel, the industry has been greatly retarded by the want of adequate means of transporting either the ore or the iron to markets. To-day iron-working is thriving as never before, because of the extension of the vast railroad system of the State; and yet all that is being done is but a small percentage of the results that may be achieved when the facilities of transportation are still further increased. So learned an authority as Commissioner Kilbebrew is quite sanguine that with close connection with Nashville, with a prospect of a navigation of the Tennessee River from Knoxville to its mouth, and on the completion of the canal around the Muscle Shoals, the time is not far distant when the various deposits will be worth many millions of dollars. A special advantage of these ores over most ores is their adaptability for steel-making. All analyses heretofore made of the ores of the Western iron belt show them to be low in phosphorus and sulphur, and, indeed, the ores found in Stewart County show no sulphur, and only 16-100 to 24-100 of phosphorus. Long before the war, these ores were used in the manufacture of the best steel used in the South. A short time ago a heavy iron dealer of Pittsburgh, Pa., visited Tennessee to examine into her mineral wealth, and to ascertain the point nearest Nashville where iron ore abounded in the greatest quantities. He was taken to Hickman County, sixty miles distant from Nashville. Attaining the top of a mountain-mass of iron ore beholds, as far as the eye can reach, one vast, inexhaustible bed of iron of incalculable value. Upon reaching the point indicated the Pittsburgher grew fairly enthusiastic with the scene that lay stretched out before him. Said he, as he lifted his hat in the warmth of his admiration, "I have visited the iron regions of Champlain, I have been to the ore-banks of Lake Superior, I have stood on the Iron Mountain of Missouri, but I declare to you that I see here around me more iron ore than can be found in all three of those places." As a rule, the plateaus are well wooded, and many of the streams afford good working-power.

Our illustrations show the methods of mining and manipulating the ore at Carter's Furnace, near Knoxville, where the latest advancements in the industry may be witnessed. In the other belts mentioned, the same enterprise is now displayed.

DAVIS ISLAND DAM.

A GREAT GOVERNMENT WORK AT PITTSBURGH, PENNSYLVANIA.

THE subject of the improvement of our Western rivers has for many years occupied the attention of the General Government. The Mississippi, with its two principal tributaries, the Ohio and the Missouri, forms a system that, for the transportation of products of the central part of the United States, is unequaled. These streams, unlike most of the rivers of the Atlantic coast, have their periods of high and low water extending over greater or less lengths of time, and varying from two or three days to as many months. The Ohio during high water is a mighty river, having at its beginning a breadth of a thousand to twelve hundred feet, with a depth of twenty-five feet or even more, and moving with a velocity of seven or eight miles an hour. Again it is a mere brook, reduced in places to a width of less than two hundred feet and to a depth of less than one foot.

These periods of low water greatly interfere with the value of the river as a highway. Their duration is very uncertain, and frequently, when water is most needed, it stays longest away. Owing to these periods of low water, one great point aimed at in the construction of vessels to navigate the Ohio is the greatest lightness of draught consistent with carrying capacity. The necessity for this is at once apparent when it is known that a depth of five feet of water does not exist during one-half of the year on the upper river. Steamboats are all flat-bottomed and are all high-pressure, since low-pressure boats would require additional weight of machinery. The boats on the upper river can be run with profit on as little as three feet of water, but every additional inch is so much gained.

The steamboats, however, do but a very small part of the transportation, especially of anything like bulky articles. This sort of material is carried in barges, several of which are put together in a single tow. These tows are, however, very different from those with which most of our readers are familiar on the Hudson River. Here the tow-boat is placed at the stern of the tow, and acts as a huge rudder to guide the mass of barges in front. The barges are all fastened to each other and to the tow-boat in such a way as to form a compact and rigid mass. None of the barges have rudders, all the steering being done by the boat. As a general rule the boat steers by backing and throwing herself from side to side in order to let the current act on one side of the tow or on the other, as circumstances may require.

There are four classes of barges:

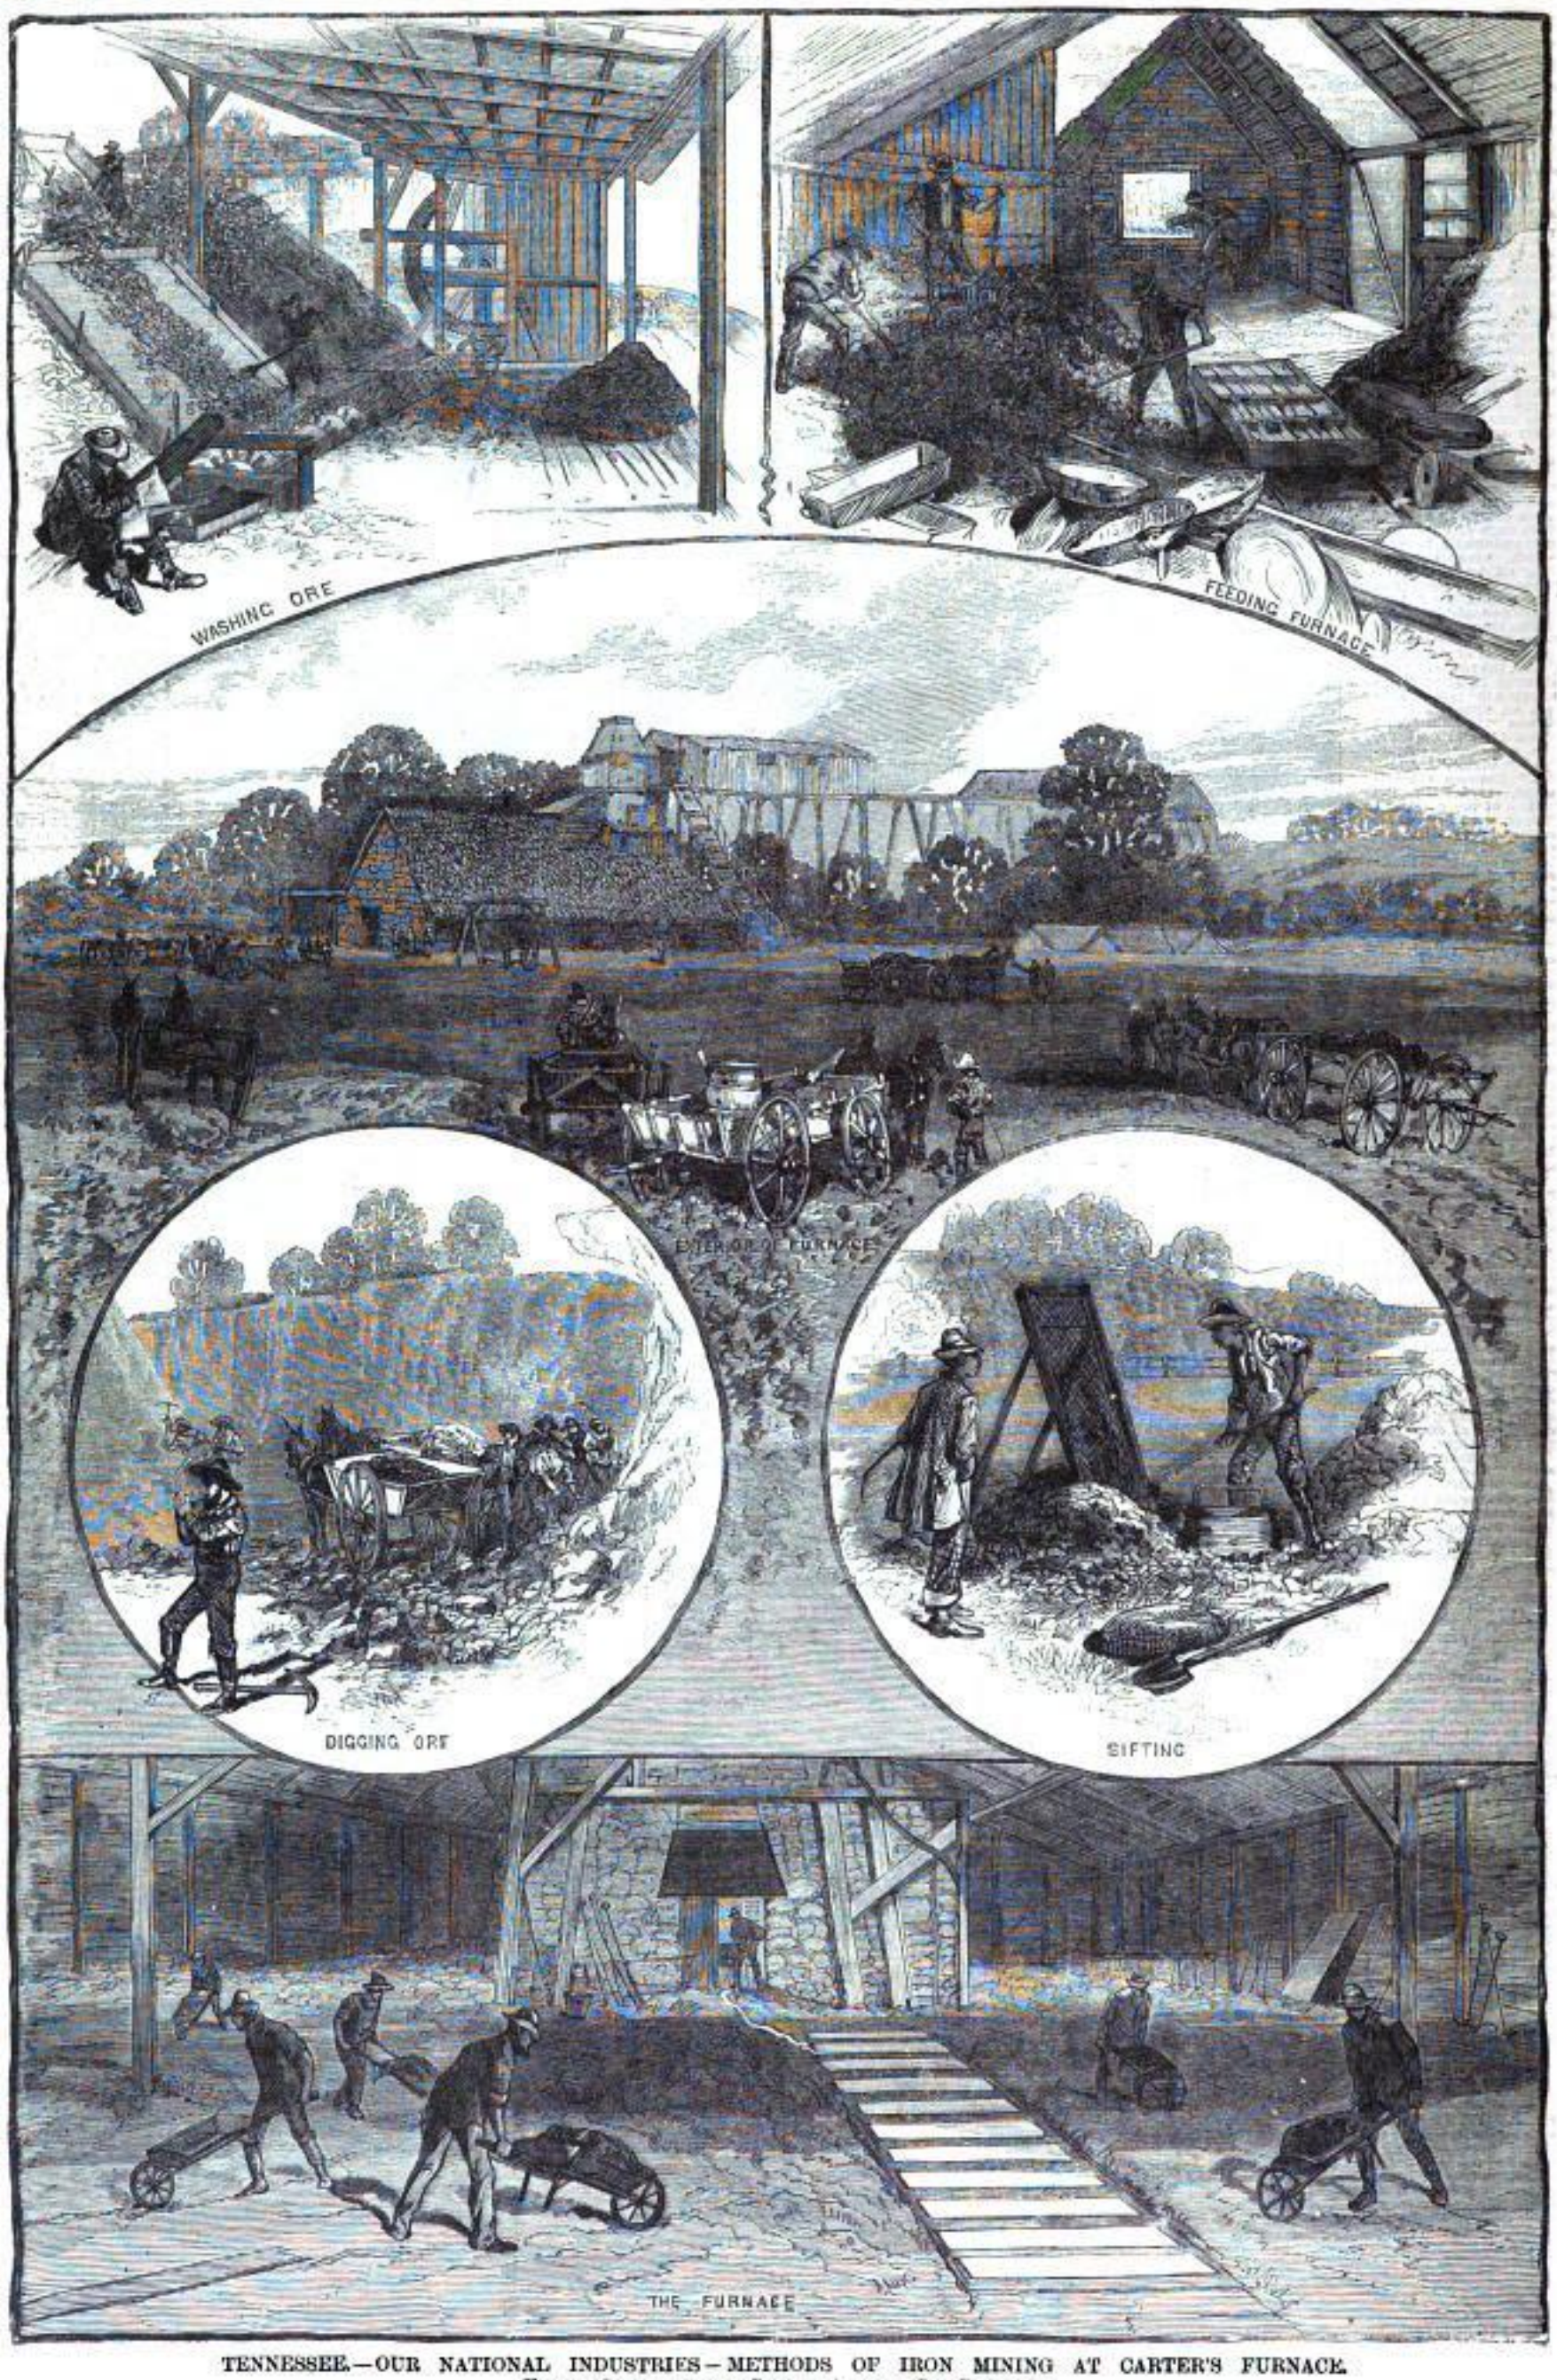
First. The coal barge proper, which is 125 feet long, 25 feet wide and 7 feet deep, drawing, when loaded, about 6 feet. These barges are rectangular in shape, but have a rake at each end so as to make them somewhat easier to tow. These vessels carry about 11,000 bushels, or nearly 425 tons of coal at a time.

Second. The coal-boat, which is 165 feet long, 26 feet wide and 9 feet deep, drawing, when loaded, about 8 feet. These vessels are simply huge boxes built without much strength, and are intended to take out only one load of coal, and then to be broken up at the end of their trip and sold for the timber they contain. They carry about 20,000 bushels, or 750 tons of coal.

Third. The flat, which is generally 80 feet long by 16 wide by 4 deep.

Fourth. The model barge, shaped somewhat like a canal-boat, from which it differs in this, that it has a bow at each end and tows equally well either way.

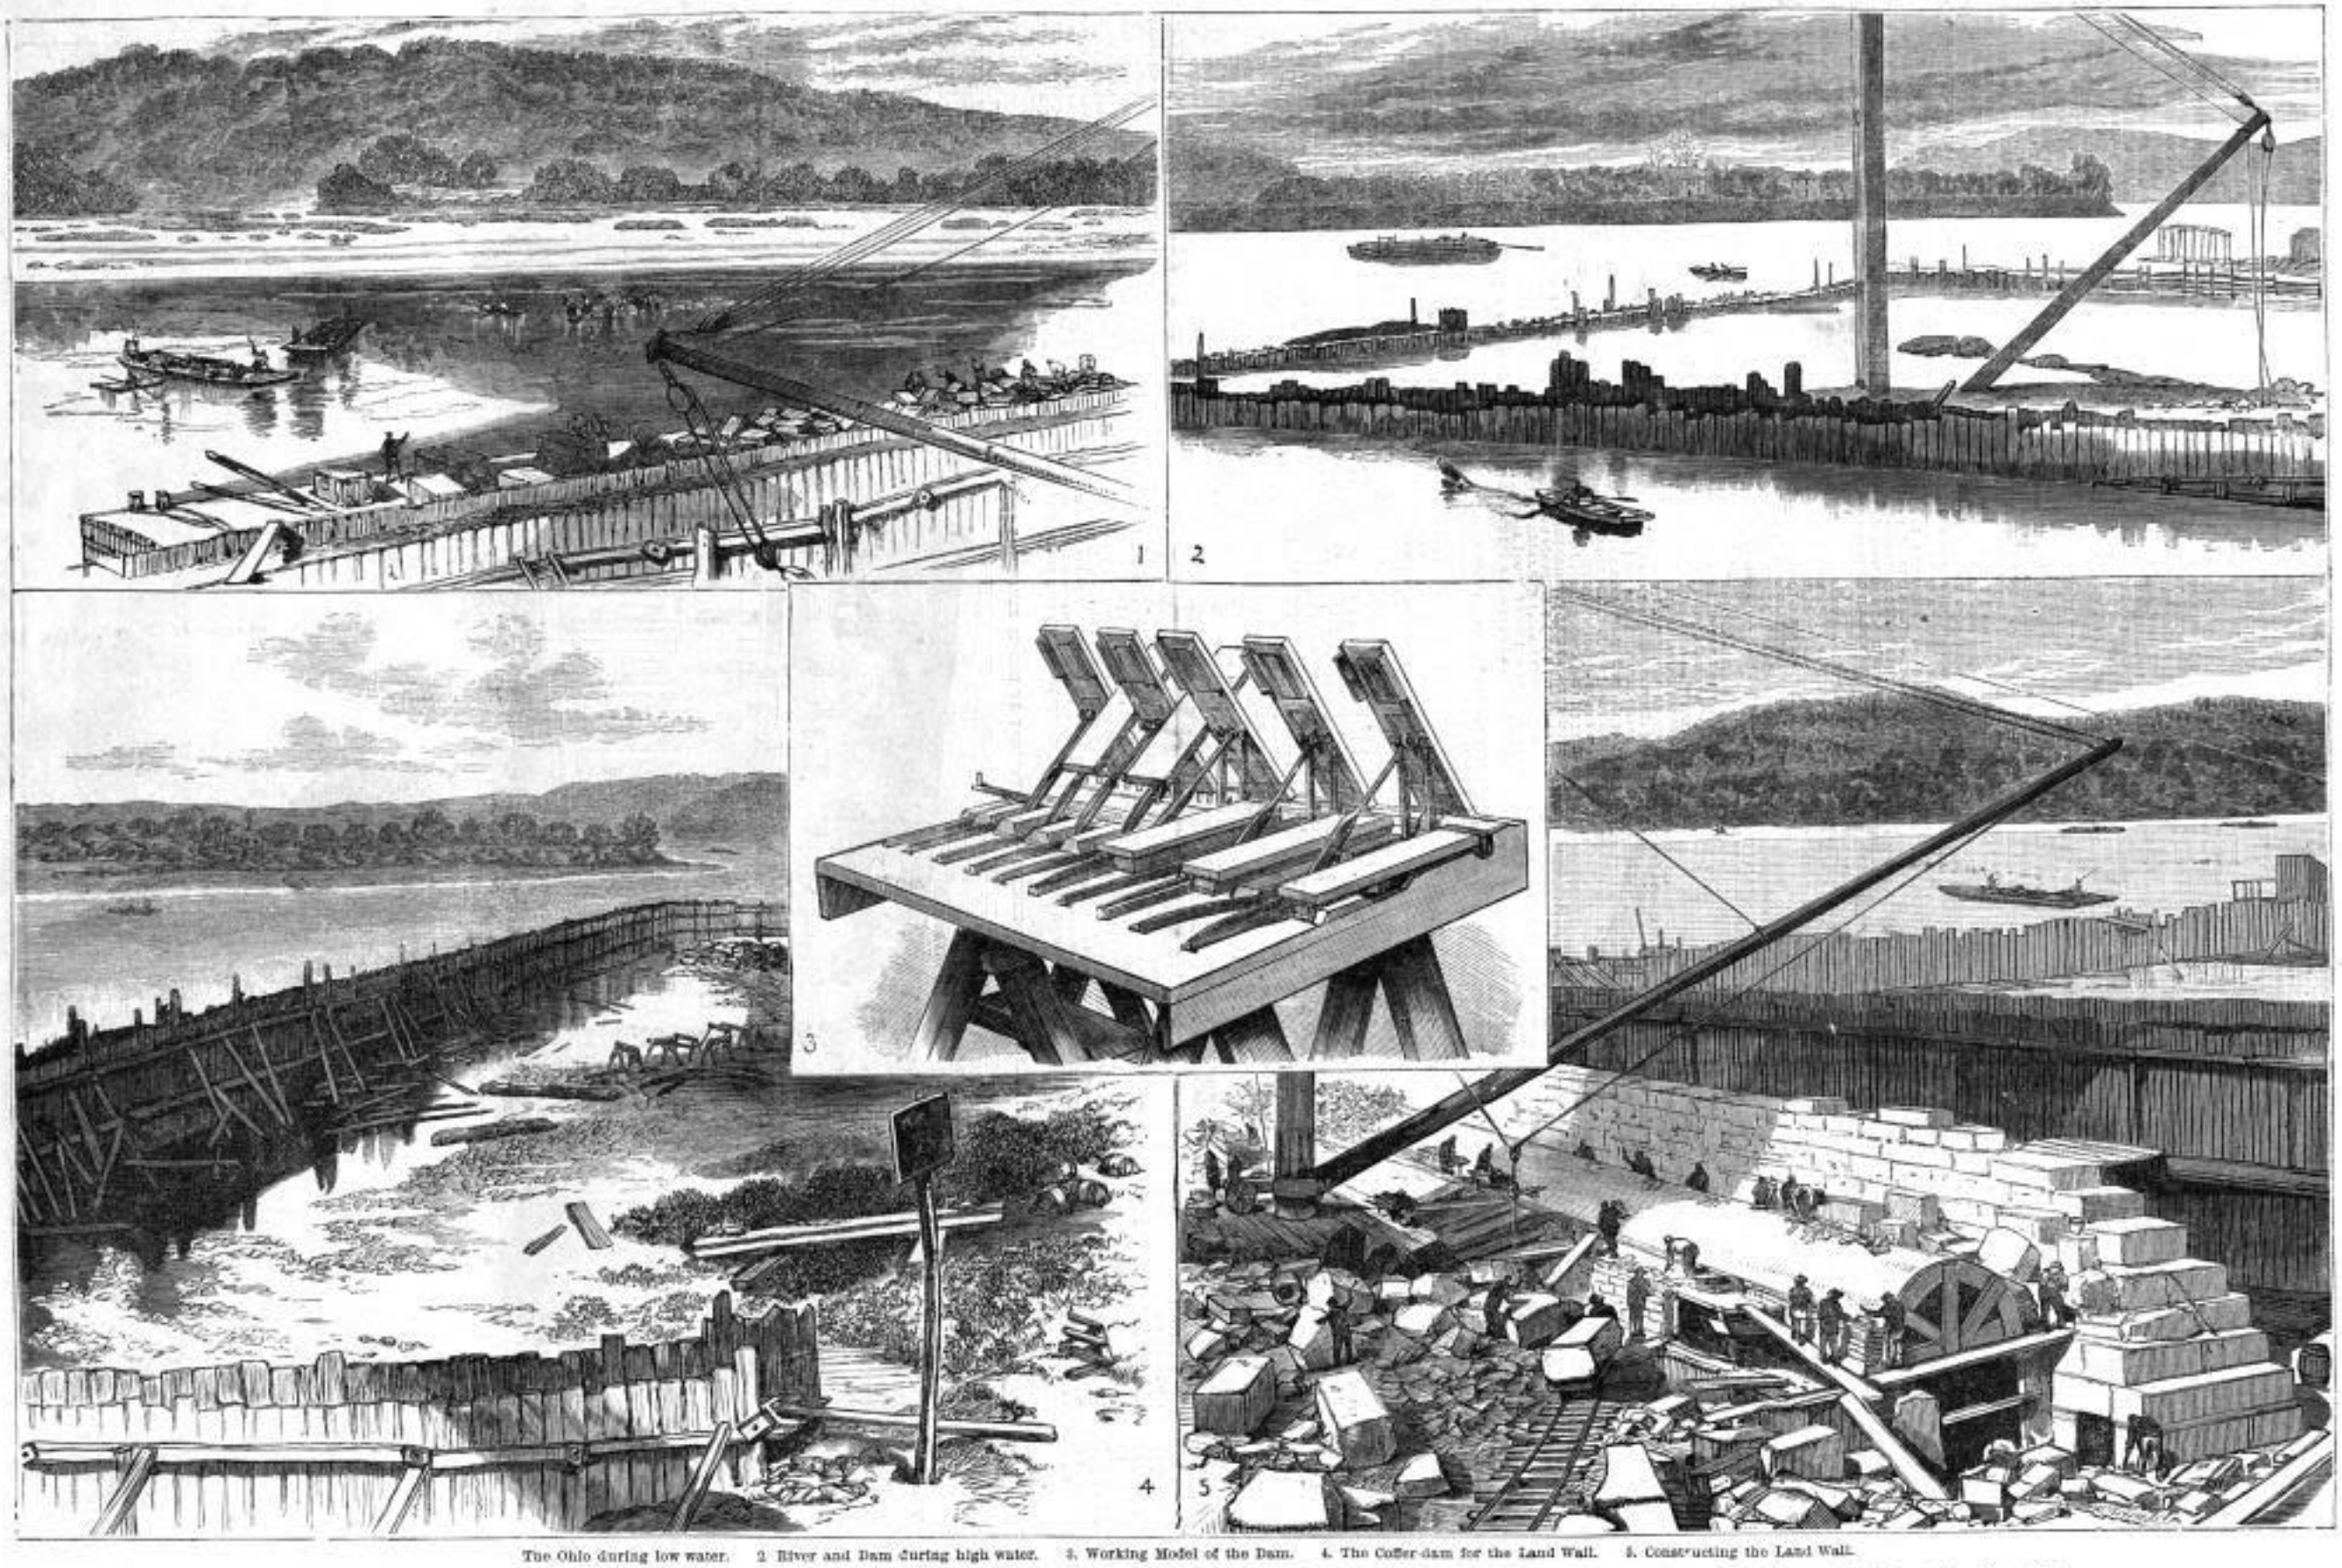
The great bulk of the material carried by river from Pittsburgh is bituminous coal. Of this about sixty millions of bushels go down the river every year. This amounts to more than two million tons. The principal coal shipments for the year are in February, March, April and May, because it is mostly in these months that the river is high enough to let the coal tows go out. The Summer is the season for low-water, extending from about July 1st to nearly the middle of November, with one or two spasmodic rises during that period. During the last season, from the middle of May to the middle of November, there was one rise sufficient to take out the coal. This occurred towards the end of July and lasted but three days. From the 11th of September to the 13th of November navigation was wholly suspended, the water being so low that no sort of vessel could run.



The length of the low-water season is the great obstacle to the usefulness of the river as a highway. This acts in two ways. First, a large amount of capital is invested in vessels lying idle and bringing in no compensation; and second, great delays are caused by vessels being run aground while the river is falling, and having to wait until the water rises sufficiently to let them off. Another obstacle is the bars that are found at many points. These are shoal places and bear somewhat the same relation to the river that grades do to a railroad. The capacity of a railroad is that of its steepest grade; the capacity of a river is that of its shortest bar.

For fifty years the Government has given more or less attention to, and spent more or less money for, improving the Ohio. Up to the present time everything done has been of a temporary nature and calculated to afford but little relief. Wing-dams and dikes have been built, and channels around some islands have been closed, diverting the water into the main channel on the other side. These attempts at improvements were carried on as a rule in a desultory sort of way. The sums appropriated by Congress were not sufficient to do any real good. In some cases work had to be begun with appropriations insufficient to finish the structure, which, being left incomplete at the end of one season, would be so injured by the ice and floods of the Winter and Spring as to make it necessary to rebuild a good part of it during the next Summer.

Not until the Winter of 1873-74 was anything done that could be said to look towards a permanent system of improvement for the river. At that time a board of engineer officers was organized for the purpose of examining and reporting on an adjustable chute invented by the Hon. Felix R. Brunt, of Pittsburgh. The models and drawings sent to the board were very incomplete, and from this cause it was unable to give an intelligent report on the subject. In the course of the investigation the board was gradually led to the consideration of various systems that had been in use among the French engineers for the past fifty years or more. The work involved in all this was enormous. The accounts and descriptions were contained in various official reports and documents covering many years. All these had to be collected and translated and compared, to try to determine the system best adapted for the purpose. In the Spring of 1874 Lieutenant Mahan, of the Corps of Engineers, was especially assigned to this work under the orders of Colonel Merrill. He assisted in the preparation of many articles on this subject.



After careful consideration and a comparison of all the systems then in use in France, so far as any knowledge of them could be obtained from official documents, the Board recommended the adoption of the system known as the Chauvine wicket-dam. This seemed to offer the best means for a thorough and permanent improvement of the river. This dam is the invention of a very celebrated French engineer, M. Chauvine, and has been in use in France for nearly thirty years. It is composed of a number of sections four feet wide from centre to centre. An interval of four inches is left between the sections. Each section is formed of four principal parts, one being of wood and the others of iron. The wooden part is called the panel, and consists of two heavy upright pieces, or stiles, thirteen feet long, twelve inches wide, and eight inches thick. These form the sides of the panel, and are securely framed together by means of four short, heavy rails. These stiles and rails form the skeleton of the panel, which is completed by having some two-inch planks firmly fastened to the frame. On the back and at the centre of each stile is fastened a cast-iron journal-box, in which are engaged the journals of the first principal piece of iron called the horse. The horse is composed of two upright and four horizontal pieces. Of the latter, the two at the top and bottom project sufficiently beyond the uprights to leave and to be turned down to form a journal; the remaining two are simply riveted to the uprights, and are merely braces or stiffeners. The top horizontal piece, in addition to the two journals at the end, has a third heavy journal in the middle, on which is fastened the second principal of iron called the prop. The journals of the lowest horizontal are each placed in a pillow-block, which is firmly fastened to a sill in the floor of the dam. The horse can revolve about the lower journals, and the panel can swing on the journals at the head of the horse. The prop extends from the head of the horse to the fourth iron piece called the barber.

Digitized by Google

TENNESSEE.—OUR NATIONAL INDUSTRIES—METHODS OF IRON MINING AT CARTER'S FURNACE.
FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—SEE PAGE 113.

Digitized by Google

The Ohio during low water. 2. River and Dam during high water. 3. Working Model of the Dam. 4. The Coffer-dam for the Land Wall. 5. Constructing the Land Wall.

PENNSYLVANIA.—THE NEW GOVERNMENT WORK AT DAVIS ISLAND DAM, PITTSBURGH.—FROM PHOTOGRAPHS FURNISHED BY LIEUTENANT MAHAN, U. S. A.—SEE PAGE 113.

Digitized by Google

INDIANA.—THE NEW STATE HOUSE AT INDIANAPOLIS—CORNER-STONE LAID SEPTEMBER 28TH.

This is is a heavy step, or shoulder of cast-iron, against which the lower end of the prop rests. The hurter is firmly imbedded in the floor of the dam, and is the support of the entire system. Besides the pieces mentioned above, there are certain secondary parts which are also important for the successful working of the dam. These are the slide and the trip-bar and its appurtenances. The slide is a piece of cast-iron extending beyond the hurter, and so arranged that the prop, when the wicket falls, shall go into a certain position from which it is sure to rise into its proper place in front of the hurter when the wicket is raised. The trip-bar, as its name implies, is used for tripping the props, or, in other words, removing them from the hurters, and thus taking away the support of the wickets, which are then thrown down by the pressure of the water against them. The dam is called movable because it can be either raised or lowered. In the former case it holds the water back in a pool in the same way as a fixed dam, and in the latter, it allows the water to pass over it, leaving the river free to navigation.

For convenience of handling, the dam is divided into three parts: First, the navigable pass; second, the low weir; third, the high weir. Each of these parts has a very firm foundation of masonry, to which are fastened the sills and other parts that must be held securely in place. The highest point of foundation of the pass is two feet below low water, that of the low weir is at the level of low water, that of the high weir is three feet above low water. A pier is placed between the pass and the low weir and another between the low and high weirs.

With a dam of this sort it is very easy to maintain a constant depth of six feet above low water at the head of the pool. This can be done whether the river be on the rise or on the fall.

Suppose, for example, that the dam is up and the pool filled. News is received that a rise is coming from some of the rivers that enter the Ohio above the dam. The dam-tender knows about when the rise will reach the work, and whether it will be great enough to give six feet above low water or not. He makes his preparations to meet the rise, and gives constant attention to his water gauge. So soon as the river begins to rise at the dam, he opens one or two wickets of the high weir, and, as the water comes up, he opens another and another, until finally the whole weir is opened. If the river still continues to rise, he gradually opens the low weir in the same manner as he did the other. After this the navigable pass is opened if necessary. When the pass is open, vessels drawing six feet can pass the work with perfect safety.

When the rise has passed and the river has fallen a little below six feet, the dam-tender begins to raise the wickets of the navigable pass, and, as the water continues to fall, he gradually raises the wickets of the low weir and afterwards those of the high weir.

In cases of emergency, the whole dam may be thrown down in about ten minutes, but this is very dangerous because it lets loose an enormous volume of water that may do untold damage in the pool below.

As the raising and lowering of the dam depends entirely upon the movements of the river, it can easily be seen that there are times when each operation would be exceedingly slow, and, in fact, one may not be entirely completed before the other would have to be begun.

When the dam is up and the pool formed, there is a great difference of level between the water above the dam and that below. In order to overcome this a lock is needed. The locks of the Ohio have to be adapted to the commerce of the river, and are, therefore, very large. The one belonging to the Davis Island Dam is 600 feet long and 110 feet wide in the clear, giving an area of 66,000 square feet, or a little more than an acre and a half. This lock will allow a tow-boat, ten barges and two flats to pass through at a time. This arrangement is of the utmost importance, because it is a matter of a great deal of time, and therefore of expense, to break up and put together again one of these large tows. In order to make them secure and rigid, the barges have to be firmly lashed together and to the tow-boat with lines and chains. From this some idea can be formed of the amount of time that would be needed to undo all these fastenings, to pass the tow through the lock by two or three barges at a time, and then to assemble it below the lock, as would be necessary were its dimensions less than they are.

On account of the great size of the lock several special features have appeared, and in these it differs very much from the ordinary canal lock. In the first place the mitre-gates generally used for locks would not answer at all, as they would be too heavy and unwieldy. The one adopted for this lock is best likened to an ordinary Howe truss bridge laid on its side in such a position as to place the bottom chord down-stream and the top chord up-stream. The deck, or floor, of the bridge forms the face of the gate and prevents the water from passing through. The dimensions of the gate are 118 feet of length, 13 feet 6 inches of breadth, and 15 feet of height. The length is made so great in order that it may have a bearing of four feet on each wall. The recesses, into which the gates must be run when they are put out of the way, are 120 feet long, or two feet more of length than has the gate. The width of the recesses is fifteen feet. As there will frequently be times when for a considerable period the water will stand still in these recesses, a deposit of greater or less amount will be formed. Some means to remove this must be had. The simplest way of doing this is to let the water cut the deposit out. To this end the lock has been so arranged that the water in entering the lock must pass through the upper recess, and in leaving it must pass through the lower recess. The floors of the recesses have a very steep slope from the up-stream to the down-stream side in order to assist the scouring effect of the water. The head of water acting will never be less than six feet, consequently it will have a great force in passing through the recesses, a force great enough, in all probability, to cut away any ordinary deposit.

Let us now trace the water in its passage from the upper to the lower pool. From the upper pool it goes through the upper gate recess; thence it passes by means of seven openings 4 feet 6 inches in diameter into the filling culvert. This culvert is a large arched subterranean gallery 9 feet wide and 13 feet high to the highest point of the inside of the arch. It lies behind the entire length of the lower wall of the upper recess, and then turning sharp to the right, it follows the land wall for a distance of 230 feet. In the land wall are built ten openings 3 feet wide by 3 feet 6 inches high, through which the water passes from the filling culvert into the lock chamber. From here it passes through the lower recess, and by means of seven openings, exactly similar in size and location to those in the upper recess, into the emptying culvert, whence it passes into the lower pool.

The land wall, including the walls of the gate recesses, has a development of 1,170 feet, and contains about 6,000 yards of masonry. The river wall is nearly 650 feet long, and will contain, when finished, about 4,000 yards of masonry.

The gate, as has been already explained, is an immense structure running on seven pairs of wheels across the lock chamber. As can be easily seen, it will be impossible to move the gate across the lock if there be any current, because if one end of the gate were unsupported the current would have such a leverage against it that it would either be thrown out of its place or be broken. In order to make it possible to move one gate when the other is in its recess, a small movable dam is built across the head of the lock. When a rise comes and it is desired to leave the lock open, one of the gates is removed into its recess under shelter of the other. The small movable dam is then put up. This holds the current back and makes still water below it. The remaining gate is then opened and afterwards the dam is thrown down. In like manner, when the rise goes down the dam is put up, and one of the gates is closed. The dam is then laid down out of the way.

It might be asked, Why cannot the lock-gates be left closed during the rise? The objection to this is because the dock, projecting as it does 130 feet into the river, would cause a very strong set of the current into the right bank just below the lock, and it would be well to avoid this. Again, the scouring effect of the current passing through the lock is very great, and, during the time of a rise the deposits that may form there at other times can be cleared out.

Much opposition has been raised to this work, but it has mainly come from those who do not wish to give up their chances of speculating in coal. The profits in coal are enormous, if the period of low water should extend over a considerable time. For example, the ordinary price for coal in Cincinnati is from 8 to 10 cents a bushel; but last year, on account of the long dry season, it went up to 40 and 50 cents. An advance of 30 cents per bushel on a barge of coal represents a clear profit of $3,300 for any dealer who has it on hand. All the large shippers in Pittsburgh have offices in Cincinnati. The number of these shippers is now only about ten or twelve, because, with the river as it is, a very large capital is required to enter the business. After each run of coal these large shippers go to Cincinnati and to other points and make a pool regulating the price of coal. This improvement will make the river navigable during the entire year, and the supply of coal constant. It will also place the small operator on a par with the great, and the coal trade, instead of being speculative, will become a legitimate business.

The coal interest, large as it is, represents but a small part of the value of the commerce of the river. The best data available place the value of the commerce of the Ohio at something more than $300,000,000 per annum. Of this the value of the coal shipped annually is but three per cent., or $6,000,000, and yet the large coal-dealers wish to arrest the only improvement that will permanently benefit the entire Ohio Valley. So far they have fought hard and have been defeated. The Government has spent a large amount on this work, and it is not likely to let that go to waste.

THE NEW INDIANA STATE HOUSE.

ON Tuesday, September 28th, the corner-stone of the new State House of Indiana was laid at Indianapolis with appropriate ceremonies, under the auspices of the State officers and State House Commissioners, ex-Governor Hendricks delivering the oration. Our view is from a drawing by Edwin May, the architect, and is in perspective from the northeast corner of Washington and Tennessee Streets, embracing the principal Washington Street facade and every part of the dome, showing in bold relief all the east wing or Tennessee Street front. The building, which will be in the Corinthian style of architecture, will present a massive yet elegant appearance, and will take rank with the finest structures in the West.

The architect's estimate of the cost of the new capitol at the time the Commissioners accepted the plan was $1,721,911.61, and the experts' estimate $1,792,791.71. The cost of construction is limited to $2,000,000 by the State House Act, and the Commissioners requested architects to keep their estimates inside of $1,800,000.

The dimensions are: South and north fronts, 185 feet; east and west fronts, 492 feet; centre, east to west, 282 feet by 118 feet in width; height of dome, 234 feet; diameter, 72 feet; height of east and west fronts, 100 feet; south and north fronts, 92 feet. first story, 18 feet 6 inches; second story, 19 feet; Representatives' Hall, 48 feet; Senate Chamber, 48 feet; Supreme Court-room, 40 feet; third story, 16 feet 6 inches.

The entire business departments of the State will be on the first floor, which include offices for the Governor, Secretary of State, Auditor of State, Treasurer of State, Attorney-General, Superintendent of Public Instruction, State Board of Agriculture, Clerk of Supreme Court and Adjutant-General. The Representatives' Hall, 70 by 70 feet; court room, 50 feet 6 inches by 57 feet 6 inches; law library, 30 feet 6 inches by 56 feet 8 inches; library, 44 feet by 56 feet 8 inches; and the library, museum and reading-room, are all on the second floor, with numerous necessary ante-chambers, officers' rooms, committee-rooms, water-closets, wash-rooms, etc.

The third story will contain 18 committee-rooms, two joint committee-rooms, public gallery to house—seating capacity 236; standing room, 150; ladies' toilet-room, two public water-closets, public gallery to Senate Chamber—seating capacity, 408; standing room, 120.

Mr. May's design was selected from a list of twenty four competitors, by the Board of Commissioners, consisting of James D. Williams, President; John Love, Vice-President; General T. A. Morris, Professor John Collett and Hon. I. D. G. Nelson, who decided only after a four months' critical examination of the competing plans.

PRIMEVAL MAN.

AT the recent meeting of the British Association, Prof. Boyd Dawkins lectured upon "Primeval Man." Professor Dawkins, generalizing from the distribution of the animal remains found in the early tertiary periods, concluded that Europe was then joined to Africa. The evidence found in the midpliocene period of the existence of the river-drift hunter in France, Italy, Spain, Greece, North Africa, and also in India, brought us, in his opinion, face to face in that period with the primitive condition of human culture, on which, as all probability, all progress had been based. The absence of geographical limitations already referred to would account for the freedom with which the hunter passed to and fro. Subsequently, in the cave-men he found the successors of the river-drift huntermen of much higher type. He gave of their habits the following hypothetical description: They dressed themselves in skins and were gloves not unlike those worn at the present time. They wore necklaces and armlets, and probably pierced their ears for the reception of ear-rings for ornamentation. They used red raddle, and, indeed, some of the practices of the present time might be looked upon distinctly as being survivals. [Laughter.] The skins with which they clothed themselves they sewed together with bone-needles, and from the sketches they had left behind on bones and pieces of skin and the like, it appeared that they were able to form a distinct idea of the creatures which they hunted, the representations thus left probably being the trophies of the chase. They were fowlers and fishermen, and it was evident from the figures of animals which had been discovered that the hunters of these times had great facility in representing forms of animals on bone; but their attempts at representing the human form were rude. They had also left behind them evidence of the art of sculpture. They were ignorant of metals. They had no domestic animals. Apparently they were not in the habit of burying their dead. We were not aware of what sort of physique they had, but there was reason to believe they were most closely related to the Esquimaux. They were wholly different from the river-drift men. The river-drift man was in a state of primeval savagery; the cave-man was of a higher type, but in his turn was wholly inferior to the farmer, herdsman and merchant who followed him. We had this proof of the development of the human race in times before history began, and it occurred to him they had no reason for fixing any limit as to where progress would end, his opinion being that man would go on increasing in knowledge and improving in the arts of civilization until, in perhaps not a very remote future, he would be as superior to the men of 1880 as we were superior to the early hunters and cave-men.

AMERICAN WHEAT IN RUSSIA.

RUSSIAN journalists appear (says the London Telegraph) to be painfully exercised by the announcement that two American steamers, laden with grain, have entered the port of Revel for the purpose of discharging their cargoes, a circumstance hitherto without precedent in the annals of Russian commerce. That Russia would never need to import cereals from foreign countries has heretofore been a firmly established article of popular faith throughout the Czar's dominions. So rapid, however, has been the falling off in productiveness exhibited in the agricultural districts of the Empire that the seemingly impossible has at length come to pass, and Northern Russia is importing wheat from the United States. It is but justice to the Russian press to acknowledge that it has been profuse of warnings with respect to the probable consequences of slovenly and unintelligent farming, persistence in old-fashioned and exploded systems of cultivation, reluctance to invest capital in modern agricultural improvements, absenteeism and other lashes which have practically disqualified Russian grain-growers from competing for foreign custom with their transporting rivals. But Russian boyars and peasant farmers alike were so immutably possessed by the conviction that Russia was the predestined granary of Europe that they calmly ignored these salutary monitions. They are now stricken with amazement and consternation by proof positive, such as is afforded by the importation of American grain into Revel, that the cereal yields of Northern and Central Russia no longer suffice to meet the consumptive requirements of the native population. Germany, too, is giving to America the preference over Russia for what grain she finds it necessary to import from abroad, on the reasonable grounds that the American wheat is at once cheaper and of better quality than the Russian. Russian agriculture is just now at an extremely low ebb, and its future promises to prove even gloomier than the present.

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1880, by I. W. England, Assignee, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.—Entered at the Post Office, New York, N.Y., as Second-class Matter.

No. 1,308.—Vol. LI. NEW YORK, OCTOBER 23, 1880. [Price 10 Cents. $4.00 Yearly. 13 Weeks, $1.00.

MARYLAND.—"IN DE MORNIN' BY DE BRIGHT LIGHT"—NEGRO OYSTERMEN OF ANNAPOLIS ON THEIR WAY TO THE FISHING-GROUND IN CHESAPEAKE BAY.—From a Sketch by Joseph Becker.—See Page 122.

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,
53, 55 & 57 PARK PLACE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 23, 1880.

NOTICE.

FRANK LESLIE'S PUBLISHING HOUSE,
53 55 and 57 Park Place, New York City, N. Y.
P. O. Box 4121.

NEW YORK, January 27th, 1880.

Under the assignment, and with the assent of Mrs. Miriam F. Leslie, the widow of Frank Leslie, and his sole legatee under his will, the publications of the House will be continued as heretofore under the management of the undersigned.

All communications should be addressed to 57 Park Place, or to P. O. Box 4153, New York City, N. Y.

I. W. ENGLAND, Assignee.

THE DEMOCRATIC HANDICAP.

IT is the misfortune as well as the fortune of the Democratic Party that it has a long history, and that the recent pages of this history contain little more than a record of blunders. Confining our review of its record to the annals of the last twenty years (as it seems to be just in instituting a comparison between it and the Republican Party), we shall find that even as an Opposition party it has failed, on nearly every occasion, to take hold of things by the right handle. And so it comes to pass that its name and fame during this period of "storm and pressure" have been chiefly identified with dead issues and lost causes.

Among these dead issues and lost causes Slavery and the Rebellion stand pre-eminent, and the main responsibility for each still hangs like a millstone around the neck of the Democracy, from the fact that so large a part of its following is found to-day within the limits of the late slave-holding and insurgent States. Whatever may be the strength and validity of the causes which have conspired to produce a "Solid South" and to array this section on the side of the Democratic Party, it remains none the less clear that the abnormal fact of such a coalescence of political opinion at the South is well suited to excite suspicions and to invite attacks, even if there be no sufficient grounds for the suspicions and no justice in the attacks. It is impossible to effect a divorce between the sentiments of a people and their politics. The resentments left by the war have for long years been a source of strength to the Republicans and a source of weakness to the Democrats. The nomination of General Hancock is a frank admission of the fact; for, unless we gravely misinterpret the political strategy which inspired it, it was a nomination purposely made to weaken the Republicans at the point where they were seen to be strongest, and to strengthen the Democrats at a point where they knew themselves to be weakest. Regarded from these points alone, it might perhaps be an open question whether in the present canvass it is the Democratic Party which is supporting General Hancock or General Hancock who is supporting the Democratic Party.

And this inversion of relations between the party and its leader naturally calls us to consider another stone of stumbling and rock of offense in the Democratic pathway. While the nomination of General Hancock by the Democrats of the North and of the South seems to us to do a full, frank and open homage to the loyal sentiment of the country, and while it seems to us a marvel of political obtuseness as well as of political injustice that the Republican leaders should resolutely shut their eyes to the fact and profess not to see it—thereby setting a stone of stumbling and rock of offense for themselves—it still remains none the less proper to say that General Hancock's want of civil experience is an objection to his candidature, especially in a time like the present, which calls for administrative skill and business capacity of the highest kind. Some compensation for this want may be found, it is true, in his freedom from the entanglements of a long political career, and in the fact that the highest duties of a Chief Magistrate are so clearly defined by the Constitution and the laws that they serve to make a plain and safe path for him if he cannot make a brilliant one for himself.

After the pacification of the country, it seems to us that the greatest need of the present time is a settlement of the currency on a sound and stable basis. The resumption of specie payments in which the country exults is uncertain and insecure so long as the depreciated silver dollar and the uncanceled greenback lurk like a Guy Fawkes beneath the fabric of the nation's credit. Neither party seems equal to the demands of the crisis. But after making due allowance for Republican shortcomings, and after awarding due pre-eminence to that intrepid band of Northern and Eastern Democrats who have never bowed the knee to the Greenback Baal, it must still be conceded that the Democracy of the South and West have fallen into a well-nigh hopeless declension from the standards of a true faith under this head. This defection is the heaviest weight which the party has to carry in the pivotal States of New Jersey, New York and Connecticut. In the medley of its opinions on the subject of the currency, and in the confusion of its entangling alliances, there is some danger that the party may be enough for hard money to keep the Greenbackers from its support, and enough for soft money to drive the "solid men" of business from its ranks.

The historical attitude of the Democratic Party in the matter of the public patronage is another obstacle to its success in the approaching Presidential election. The managers of the Republican canvass are not entitled, it is true, to bring a railing accusation against the Democrats on this score, for they are making daily requisitions on the offices of the country, as if these offices were "spoils of war" by right of lawful conquest in a former campaign. But reformers of the civil service have learned to look with special distrust on the Democratic Party as the author of the "spoils system" in our politics, and until the party purges itself of this "bad eminence," it must expect to pay the penalty of its evil repute. The agitation for a genuine civil service reform makes but small headway in the Republican Party. In the Democratic Party it has not even begun.

In opposing any and all legislation which has for its object to supervise the election of members of the House of Representatives, the Democratic Party, through its leaders in the past and the present Congress, has assumed a position which exposes it to assault. The laws as they stand are a just ground of reproach to the Republican Party, but it also is a ground of reproach to the Democratic Party that it should have sought their abolition rather than their amendment, and should have sought an extreme redress by the threat of revolutionary proceedings. The whole people are interested in the integrity of the Federal elections at every point, and the Democratic Party, in view of the aspersions so freely cast on the purity of the ballot-box and the freedom of elections in the Southern States, can least of all afford to shrink from the lawful scrutiny which is provided by the Constitution under this head.

Like the Republicans, the Democrats, too, have their spurious clamors and panic cries, which impose as little on the intelligent public as on their authors. The affected dread of "troops at the polls" is not a whit more respectable than the bugaboos with which the Republicans insult the intelligence of the people. The spectre of "Imperialism" and of the "Man on Horseback" was laid in the grave of the "Third Term" dug at Chicago, and the attempts of the Democrats to conjure with it are as idle as Republican attempts to conjure with the vanished ghosts of the "Rebel Claims."

It appears, then, from this review, combined with the review previously made of the Republican situation, that neither of the two parties, as we conceive, has risen to the full height of its mission. Neither is so good that the success of either offers much of high promise, and neither is so bad that the success of either threatens much of deep calamity. If the people shall decide, with some misgivings, to retain the Republicans in office, it will not be so much from satisfaction with their rule as from a lurking fear that the Democrats have not sufficiently trained themselves, in the opposition, for a wiser and purer administration of the Government. If they shall resolve, with some misgivings, on a change of administration, it will not be so much from impatience of Republican rule under President Hayes as from impatience of the political artifices and disgust at the sectional antipathies by which the Republican managers have sought to perpetuate their power, and by which they have roused a popular fear that they may control the administration of General Garfield as they have controlled the canvass in his name.

THE LOW RATES FOR MONEY.

ONE of the most gratifying, and at the same time one of the most interesting, features of the financial situation continues to be the cheapness of money. The rates for call-loans remain at two to three per cent. The drain of money to the interior for the purpose of moving the crops is large, but not so large as last year, because the West and South are richer now than then. Last year immense amounts were shipped to both sections and never returned, being absorbed by the industries there. Of course the rates for money here depend largely on the demand for remittances from the West and South to move the crops. It is an interesting fact that, notwithstanding specie imports of no less than $24,000,000 at this port since August 1st, the bank reserves have been reduced $4,500,000, and the specie balance in the Treasury shows a falling off of more than $10,000,000; and it is likewise true that the loss in legal-tenders within the last two months has been $7,500,000. Still, there is even now an abundance of money, and though the loans of the banks show a large expansion, their reserve is larger by $18,000,000 than at this time last year.

One explanation of the present low rates for money, after making allowance for the increased wealth of the West and South compared with last year, is the fact that very little speculation is going on at this time. Last year there were large speculations in breadstuffs, iron and other merchandise; now speculation is the exception rather than the rule. In fact, the only notable speculation in merchandise just now is the corner in pork, and that interests only a comparatively few individuals. The trade of the country is proceeding quietly, undisturbed by the harassing influences of speculation. It is true that our exports of breadstuffs are not as large as they should be, but the blame for this rests solely with the farmers who are holding their grain for higher prices than the situation warrants. The exports of other merchandise, however, show a gratifying volume; and the total of all kinds—including breadstuffs—from January 1st to September 1st, was $550,887,300 against $451,800,000 last year, an increase this year of close to $100,000,000, with three active months yet before us, during which time it is hoped that the balance of trade in our favor—which is not so large as at this time last year—may be increased. Less money is called for to speculate in stocks, for the reason that most shares have risen to such a high point that there is less room for speculative ventures than formerly; though it may be added that a net increase of nearly $25,000,000 in their earnings in seven months and the prospect of a further large increase, owing to our abundant crops and the activity in general manufactures, have added materially to the value of railroad property.

Another reason for the present cheapness of money is that throughout the commercial world there is a larger amount of funds awaiting profitable investment than has been known for many years. As an illustration of this, capitalists point to the facts that our four per cent. bonds are bringing 109, thus showing that in order to secure a safe investment many investors are willing to lose the interest for two years; that many first-class railroad shares pay only 3½ to 4½ per cent. net; that English consols and railway shares—favorite investments—pay even less; and that the French bonds pay the investor very little and yet are readily taken. Intelligent observers, moreover, remind us that the amount of interest-paying securities placed on the market of late years has shown a decided decrease, as well as the undoubted fact that the Government has reduced its debt during the last seven years no less than $225,000,000, and is redeeming its obligations at the rate of $125,000,000 per annum. Of course the resumption of specie payments in the United States added several hundred millions to the world's supply of money by making the legal tenders and the national bank issues equal to gold.

To sum up, it may be briefly stated that the outlook for the commercial interests of the country is more promising than at any time for many years. The people have been frugal since the panic, and large harvests have added their blessings. That the people are more economical than formerly is seen in the fact that the savings banks' deposits are increasing largely. In this State the deposits show an increase of over $20,000,000, and the number of depositors is larger than in 1879 by 54,000. Our exports exceed our imports, even if the balance in our favor is not so large as last year. The crops everywhere are abundant. We are prosperous now, and, what is more, the future holds out promises of even greater prosperity. And there are not a few who predict that the time is not far distant when the United States will be entirely independent of European capital. To-day the amount of American gold coin in the country is over $200,000,000, or considerably more than at any former period.

CONSCIENCE IN POLITICS.

TO say that to cast an honest and intelligent vote should be a sacred duty with every citizen, and that to allow any consideration to determine it other than a desire to promote the well-being of the community is to be guilty of a violation of trust, is but to repeat what every one knows, and a common truism; but it cannot be said, in the face of the general indifference to it in practice, that iteration is unnecessary or uncalled for. If the determining motive is one of self-interest, the guilt is incurred, practically, of taking a bribe or of selling a vote; for the offense consists essentially in sacrificing the public good—it may be in greater or less degree—to interests that are wholly private and selfish, but it differs only in degree from that of the man who should sell his country for a price. There was one such.

If at any time self-seeking demagogues have been placed in power, it is the private citizen who has done it; if unwise laws of far-reaching deleterious influence have been enacted, it is the private citizens who are responsible for the mischief, in having cast their votes for ignorant or bad men. It is a duty every citizen owes to the commonwealth—and he is recreant if he neglects it—to inform himself as far as he can as to the character of actual and proposed public policy, but in an especial manner it is his duty to make himself acquainted with the antecedents and disposition of at least the leading men whom it is proposed to put in positions of public trust; and he should do this so that when he casts his vote, he may do so intelligently and not ignorantly as to questions or men. Everywhere, but especially in this land of universal suffrage, as the people are, such will the Government be. If every citizen voted always wisely and well, then we should have in reality what we have in theory—a true republic. Unfortunately every citizen is not good and wise. It cannot be denied that a very large proportion of those intrusted with citizenship are not only ill-informed, but so far wanting in moral sense that they easily become the instruments of demagogues, with the result that inferior and unprincipled men make their way into office, good men are excluded, and corrupt legislation comes at times to be the rule instead of the exception. The evil is very great. The remedy can come only with those causes that shall bring about the moral and intellectual elevation of the great masses of the people. If these causes are now operating, and it is it to be hoped they are, then there may be witnessed, sooner or later, a gradual purification of the popular vote; but if no signs of such improvement can anywhere be discerned, then is there the more reason for the performance of duty by those who are sensible of it. It too frequently happens that the very men who are best able to judge of the wisdom or otherwise of public measures proposed, and to inform themselves of the fitness or unfitness of candidates, are prevented from taking an active part in politics and even from voting, discouraged by the corrupt methods and motives of the so-called politician. It must be acknowledged that these are offensive. Integrity is at a discount with them. Deceit is at a premium. They are not like Esau, willing to give much for little; their characteristics are rather those of Judas, ready at any time to betray their country, not having the opportunity to betray their Lord. The conduct of Judas, however, it is to be regretted, they imitate only in part—their extermination will never be their own work. It must be accomplished, and will be sooner or later, but only when a majority of citizens shall make the casting of an intelligent and honest vote a matter of conscience.

JACQUES OFFENBACH.

THE composer of the maddest merriest music that can set heads a-wagging, Jacques Offenbach, has gone over to the great majority. He has laid down his score for ever, and the world will never again be on tip-toe with the expectation of some new creation of his melodious genius. The chords are silent, and Opera Bouffe has lost its creator.

Jacques Offenbach was a glittering light in the world of music, an ignis fatuus, a sort of Will-o'-the-Wisp, who lured the lovers of music onward in the hope of finally grasping a something that deserved the name of classical composition: but his fancy yielded nothing but airy dancing strains, and, instead of being enrolled with the great composers of the century, he stands on a pedestal in the outer hall.

Born in 1819, of Hebrew parents, a German by birth, but a Frenchman, like Henri Heine, to the innermost core of his soul, Jacques reached the age of 28 years before the ears of Paris commenced to turn towards the leader of the orchestra of the Théâtre Français whose handling of both 'cello and violin was pronounced très chic. The first composition that attracted any valuable notice to Offenbach was his setting of La Fontaine's celebrated "Fables." Being a mad, merry wag, his musical buffooneries became the delight of the inner artistic circles of the glittering capital, and when, in 1864, "La Belle Helene" was produced, Paris shrieked his fame. In 1865 he took the town by storm at the Bouffes by a series of madcap compositions, and in 1866 "Barbe Bleu" and the "Grande Duchesse de Gerolstein" told the world that Opera Bouffe had crowned its king. A number of other compositions followed in due course, with all of which the public is familiar, and yellow gold came pouring into the Offenbachian treasury. The gifted composer has been ill for many months, but, despite the downdrag of physical ailment, in March last he celebrated the one hundredth performance of his one hundredth production—"La Fille du Tambour Major"—by conducting the third act in person at the Hotel Continental, Paris. If Jacques Offenbach made "piles of money," he lost so heavily in operatic and dramatic speculations, notably in the production of Sardou's drama "La Haine," upon the getting up of which fabulous sums were expended, that he died comparatively poor. The copyright of his numerous works must be worth a considerable sum, although his later efforts have not proved financially successful. On dit that his dying regret lay in having missed the first performance of his new opera, "Contes d'Hoffman," which he urged M. Carvalho to hasten with all possible dispatch. The "bony finger of destiny" was against Jacques Offen-bach, and his wish was not to be fulfilled. Who is it that did not like his "jingle"? Who is it that will not have a pleasant memory of the works of the composer who passed away from us on the 5th day of October, aged sixty-one years?

Digitized by Google

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

THE Eastern Question has entered upon a new phase. The hardy Albanians were unterrified by the appearance of a combined fleet off their shores. The Sultan smoked his hookah with undiminished placidity on the shores of the Bosphorus, and laughed at the attempts of the Great Powers to frighten him into obedience to their will. Meantime, the fleet was moved from harbor to harbor, and no doubt enjoyed a pleasant cruise. Then the admiral in command sent an ultimatum. The Porte replied by asking for a delay of a few days. It was granted; and at the expiration of the term, the Porte coolly answered that the Sultan would yield to the pressure of the Powers, but in so doing made several proposals. The Porte proposed to endeavor to induce the Albanians to cede Dulcigno, to create a new frontier line with Greece, to carry out, as soon as possible, the reforms in Europe, and within three months to introduce the promised reforms in Turkey in Asia, and to invite the Turkish bondholders to send delegates to Constantinople, to whom certain revenues should be ceded as guarantees for the payment of the interest upon the various Government loans. This remarkable document ended by insisting that, in return for all this, the allied Powers should abandon the naval demonstration. These proposals were, of course, treated as impertinent by the Great Powers; but there is an evident difference of opinion among them as to future action. France is apparently averse to any active measure of hostility, and seems to wish that the other Powers should do the dangerous work. But even the cession of Dulcigno is not secured by the Sultan's note. He promises to use his influence with the Albanians to give up their town without fighting, and he promises to withdraw his troops; but he adds that he cannot be held responsible for any complications which may arise out of the refusal of the Albanians to comply with the request of the fleet. It is now thought likely that the Great Powers will seize several islands in the Ægean Sea, and thus hold pledges that the Sultan will perform his promises. According to the latest dispatches, Greece is actively at work mobilizing her forces, and 20,000 men of the reserve will be summoned.

The Socialistic movement seems to gain ground daily. The amnestied Communists, like Rochefort, Blanqui and Felix Pyat, were desirous of holding a meeting in Paris to protest against the naval demonstration, but the Government quietly interfered and forbid it. It happened that there was an excellent excuse for doing so, as no meeting can be held in France without permission from the authorities, and the Government took the stand that by licensing such a meeting they would lend themselves to the spread of a belief that there was danger of a war with Turkey. The Socialistic meeting which was recently held at Zurich, in Switzerland, has alarmed all the Governments. The demeanor and menaces of the delegates present were so threatening, and the proposal to hold a Socialistic conference next year, with representatives from all lands, seemed such an open act of defiance, that a feeling of alarm has been general. Count Eulenberg, the Minister of the Interior, at the debates in the Reichstag upon the prolongation of the repressive law, spoke very strongly upon this subject. He pointed out that there were hotbeds of Socialism apart from Berlin, and that a state of siege might be the only remedy there after a while. The Government seems to have laid these remarks to heart, and they have drawn the attention of the Saxon Government and that of the Hamburg States to the necessity of some measures of repression.

The irrepressible Garibaldi has once more been disturbing the peace of Italy. Unfortunately, he is now old and almost in his dotage, nor has he any such noble object in view as the unity and freedom of Italy. His old companions in arms still stick closely to him, and one word from their beloved leader would probably rouse them to take up arms in no matter how trivial or unjust a cause. One of his bravest and well-known followers was Major Canzio, who married Teresita Garibaldi, a daughter of the great general. About a year ago a procession in honor of Mazzini took place at Genoa, where Canzio lives, and a tumult ensued necessitating the interference of the police. Among the rioters who were taken prisoners was Canzio, and on trial he was condemned to six months' imprisonment. He appealed from this sentence, and, while his case was still before the courts, he was mixed up in another tumult in Milan. Recently he has been imprisoned in Genoa, in spite of his own and his father-in-law's influence with Signor Cairoli, the Prime Minister, who was formerly a strong Garibaldian. When it was found that the sentence would not be annulled, Garibaldi became very indignant and resigned his seat in the Italian Parliament. His son Menotti did the same, and they left Caprera for Genoa, apparently with the intention of attacking the prison and releasing Major Canzio. But wiser counsels prevailed, and it is now generally given out that Garibaldi had merely visited Genoa for his health. The general paid Canzio a visit in his prison, and assured him that he would not ask the ungrateful Government to release his son-in-law. On his way to and from the prison Garibaldi was loudly cheered, and was followed by a large crowd of people.

The news from Ireland is every day becoming more and more deplorable. Mr. Parnell, who should, by birth and education, be above inflaming the passions of an ignorant peasantry, is blamed on every side for his unwarrantable conduct. He has on several late occasions openly advised the use of violence, and, his influence being great, his advice will probably be followed. As is well-known, Ireland is divided into two almost separate peoples. In the North and East the inhabitants have a large quantity of Scotch blood in their veins, and the prevailing religion is Protestantism. These people are for the most part thriving and contented. In the West and South, on the other hand, the pure Irish race is found. Among them there are no industries, no trades and no desire to do more than to live from day to day. They all want to be land-owners, and think any labor except the cultivation of the soil to be below them. Hence, in a land where the land is very poor—where it is made less fertile by being worn out by unskilled agriculture and by the exhaustion consequent upon small holders who cannot afford to manure—poverty must be a necessary consequence. It is among this latter class of people that the Home Rule and Fenian agitators make their converts. Undoubtedly the Irish have much to complain of, just as any other conquered people find their yoke galling. But much of the old injustice has been removed, and the Irish tenantry are just as well treated at the present day as are their English brethren. Under these circumstances, it is not surprising that a movement should be on foot among the Protestants of the North to defend themselves and their co-religionists against the Catholics of the South. One well-known landlord in the North of Ireland recently made a speech, in which he openly said that as long as the State looked after the interests of the people, it was the duty of all good citizens to leave the management of affairs to the State; but if the time should come when the State neglected to protect the interests of the people, the people must look after them. This speech points to a movement among these people to oppose the work of the Home Rulers and Fenians, and the quarrel will probably resolve itself, as such quarrels usually do in Ireland, into a religious war. Meantime the Government, alarmed at all these signs of disturbance, are becoming a little more alert, and troops are being dispatched to Ireland.

According to the latest news from Mexico, General Gonzales has been elected by an overwhelming majority. To any person who is acquainted with Mexican affairs this election is a matter of no surprise. General Gonzales is the friend and the favorite candidate of President Diaz. He is commander-in-chief of the army, which was carefully distributed throughout the country, and he thus held all the civil and military power necessary. Gonzales has been declared elected, but the real election takes place as soon as he attempts to take his seat. Thus a revolution will probably take place, and the strongest will rule the fair land of Montezuma. France and Mexico have resumed their diplomatic relations, which were interrupted since the death of Maximilian. A French Minister has been appointed to Mexico, and Señor Velasco, a Mexican long resident in Paris, will represent his Government there.

CAMPANINI, the famous Italian tenor, is once more with us, fully equipped for the new operatic season. He sang but once during his Summer vacation—for the benefit of a company of comedians, who had fallen into difficulties and appealed to him for aid. The receipts were sufficient to pay all the company's debts, and send them on their way with replenished pockets.

ANOTHER partisan charge has come to grief. General Walker, Superintendent of the Census, has inquired into the alleged frauds committed by census enumerators in South Carolina, and reports that they were groundless. The census of 1870, he says, was undoubtedly defective, and the suspicion that the recent enumeration was fraudulent has grown out of the fact that it exhibits a growth of population which, from the lying figures reported ten years ago, seems to be unnatural and impossible.

ALL doubts as to the result of the vote on the repudiating amendment to the Arkansas Constitution are set at rest by the declaration of the official returns. These show the rejection of the amendment by a majority of nearly 4,000. This is very far short of the Democratic majority in the State, showing that a considerable portion of the party vote must have been cast for the amendment; but it is sufficient for all practical purposes, and places Arkansas distinctly in the list of debt-paying States. The influence of such a result on the prosperity of the State cannot be otherwise than beneficial.

THE commercial convention held at Boston last week declared against "free ships," and adopted a resolution asking a Government bounty on American-built vessels. In this convention it was voted to recommend to the Senate and House of Representatives the passage of an Act to set apart all Custom House dues, including the tonnage tax collected from vessels of all nations, including our own, in all parts of the United States, as a special fund which shall be appropriated exclusively to pay bounty to American ship-owners. This general subject will undoubtedly force its way to the front, and compel consideration at the hands of Congress at no remote day.

THE formation of a syndicate of French and American bankers for the construction of the Panama Canal seems at length to have been definitely accomplished. It is understood that the syndicate will issue a loan of $80,000,000, but it is not expected that any considerable part of this amount will be taken in this country. By the terms of the grant of the Columbian Government to the Panama Railroad Company, no canal can be constructed within its territory without the awarding of damages to the railroad company by a board of arbitration; and no railroad can be constructed at all across the isthmus without the unqualified consent of the Panama Railroad Company. As it is necessary to have a railroad before a canal can be built, De Lesseps is said to have concluded to purchase the Panama Road outright, and it is now intimated that the latter company is prepared to deliver its power to the syndicate whenever it shall obtain sufficient money to pay for it. It is yet to be seen whether the expectations of the syndicate will be realized in the actual commencement of the great undertaking. It is quite certain, we think, that it will encounter a good many obstacles outside of the difficulty of raising the capital necessary for its successful prosecution.

BILLS of indictment have been found against thirty-eight citizens of Georgia for armed attacks on revenue officers while in the discharge of their lawful duties. Twenty of these outlaws belonged to a gang which burned the property of a deputy collector and fired upon his family under cover of the night. These violent interferences with Federal officials engaged in attempts to suppress illicit distillation have become entirely too common in some Southern localities, and the law-abiding citizens of that section should see to it that the efforts of the Government to punish the offenders are not permitted to miscarry from any want of local sympathy and co-operation.

THE transactions of the New York Clearing House Association for the year ending on the 1st instant were the largest for any one year since its organization, amounting to $38,698,667,252. The largest transactions for any one day were made on November 3d of last year, when they amounted to $202,558,252. The average daily transactions during the last year were $126,466,232. The largest balance on any one day occurred on November last, when it amounted to $11,208,025. Of this sum $8,300,000 was paid in gold coin, weighing about 15½ tons. The total amount of gold coin received for the year was $340,538,000. These figures exhibit very strikingly the immense business transacted by this association.

THE Newfoundland authorities are at length actually investigating the complaints of ill-treatment made by Gloucester fishermen against the Newfoundland fishermen who have so often interfered with their rights in British waters. The testimony of witnesses summoned by the Government fully confirms all the charges of the Americans. It is shown that in one case our fishermen were attacked by the people on shore and furiously pelted with missiles while engaged in fishing for bait, as permitted to do under treaty stipulations. If the Colonial authorities shall now ignore the testimony of their own witnesses, and make no honest effort to put a stop to the lawlessness and violence to which Americans are now exposed, a demand for reparation should instantly be made by our Government.

GENERAL GRANT'S assault upon General Hancock in a recent published interview is, to say the least of it, in very bad taste. Moreover, some of the statements attributed to General Grant touching Hancock's course in Louisiana and Texas are flatly in conflict with other statements previously made by Grant, and also with the official correspondence which took place fourteen years ago between the two generals. Two months ago Grant, speaking of General Hancock, said, "No better or safer man could be elected to the Chief Magistracy." Now he says that the officer thus commended "is crazy to be President," and "ambitious, vain and weak." General Grant is deliberately false to himself and to the truth in one of these deliverances. Which is it? In any event he has injured himself more than the object of his assault.

TOM HUGHES'S new colony at Rugby, in East Tennessee, starts out under favorable auspices. It seems to be founded on a basis of common sense and practical business sagacity, and its successful development can scarcely be doubted. In his address last week, at the formal opening of the colony, Mr. Hughes said that æsthetic considerations will not be lost sight of in its management; the beauty of the site will be preserved, and parks and gardens reserved among the hills; buildings, fences, and all private improvements will be constructed according to the best standards of good taste; and no intoxicating liquors will be permitted to be sold. He added: "All that helps to make healthy, brave, modest and true men and women will get from us all the cordial sympathy and help we are able to give. In one word, our aim and hope are to plant on these highlands a community of gentlemen and ladies, not that artificial class which goes by those grand names both in Europe and here, the joint product of feudalism and wealth, but a society in which the humblest members, who live (as we hope most if not all of them will, to some extent) by the labor of their own hands, will be of such strain and culture that they shall be able to meet princes in the gate without embarrassment and without self-assertion, should any such strange persons ever present themselves before the gate tower of Rugby in the New World." The colony of Plateau now embraces some fifty thousand acres, and it is proposed to gradually absorb additional lands until four hundred thousand acres have been secured. This, of course, will be contingent upon the success of the present nucleus at Rugby.

NEWS OF THE WEEK

Domestic.

A FATAL cattle disease has appeared in Virginia.

TOM HUGHES was entertained at a banquet by the Literary Club of Chicago on October 8th.

REV. HENRY WARD BEECHER has taken the stump for the Republican Presidential ticket.

THE amount of tax to be raised in New York City this year, for all purposes, is $28,937,272.

THE election in Georgia, October 6th, resulted in the re election of Governor Colquitt by a majority of 30,000.

TWO PERSONS were killed and twelve injured by an accident on the Fitchburg (Mass.) Railroad, at Littleton, on the 7th instant.

AN effort to break the will of the late Marshall O. Roberts, of this city, has been abandoned, and the will admitted to probate.

TWO mills in Lowell, Mass., employing four hundred and twenty-five men, were burned on October 6th, involving a loss of $200,000.

THE next meeting of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions will be held in St. Louis on the third Monday of October, 1881.

GENERAL GRANT arrived in New York on Saturday evening last for the purpose of reviewing the great Republican demonstration on Monday evening.

EX-GOVERNOR SEYMOUR addressed an immense Democratic meeting in New York, on Friday evening last, in support of the party cause and candidates.

THE Masonic ceremonies in connection with the laying of the corner-stone of the Egyptian obelisk in Central Park took place on Saturday last. There was a fine parade of Masons and Knights Templar.

THE centennial anniversary of the battle of Kings Mountain, North Carolina, was celebrated last week on the battle-ground. There was a large attendance, and the ceremonies were full of interest to the people of the Carolinas.

MRS. LIZZIE P. RALSTON, widow and legatee of the late California millionaire, has commenced an action against Senator Sharon, one of the executors of Mr. Ralston's will, charging that he has defrauded her in the settlement of the estate.

THE total value of stamps of all kinds issued by the Post Office during the last fiscal year was $32,687,345, an increase of nine per cent. The newspapers and periodicals forwarded weighed nearly 31,000 tons and paid $1,226,452 postage.

THE reunion of General Grant's old regiment, the Twenty-first Illinois, was held at Decatur, last week. General Grant presided at the business meeting of the regiment. Over 3,000 old soldiers, representing nearly all the Northern States, were present.

A SEMI-OFFICIAL statement of the vote in Maine on the Constitutional Amendment, gives, on the amendment electing Governor by plurality, 37,316 in favor of, to 35,764 against; on the amendment relative to the change in the term of office, 40,217 in favor of, to 16,660 against.

THE town elections in Connecticut last week showed Republican gains. The Constitutional Amendment taking the nomination of judges from the Legislative caucus and vesting it in the Governor, was carried. The late town elections in Maryland also show gains for the Republicans.

REPRESENTATIVES of fifty-one commercial organizations throughout the country met in Boston last week to consider a proposed revision of the navigation laws and to adopt some plan for the relief and recovery of our shipping interests. The convention rejected a resolution to admit ship-building materials free of duty.

THE Vermont Legislature met in annual session on October 6th. Governor Farnham was inaugurated on the day following. His message states the assets of the State at $235,074; liabilities, $150,871. The amount of deposits in the savings banks of the State on July 1st was $9,075,214.39, an increase of nearly $1,000,000 during the past year.

THE formation of a new trunk line from New York and Philadelphia to the Southwest, with the Shenandoah Valley Railroad as its base, is authoritatively announced. Surveys have been made for an extension of the road to the Atlantic, Mississippi and Ohio. The new line, it is said, will reach New York by the proposed extension of the Shenandoah Valley Railroad to Harrisburg, Pa., and from Harrisburg over the old Allentown Short Line, now operated by the Reading and Jersey Central.

Foreign.

KALAKAUA, King of the Hawaiian Islands, has appointed a new Cabinet, and great satisfaction is expressed at the result.

THE funeral of M. Offenbach is said to have attracted more mourners than ever gathered in Paris, even on State occasions.

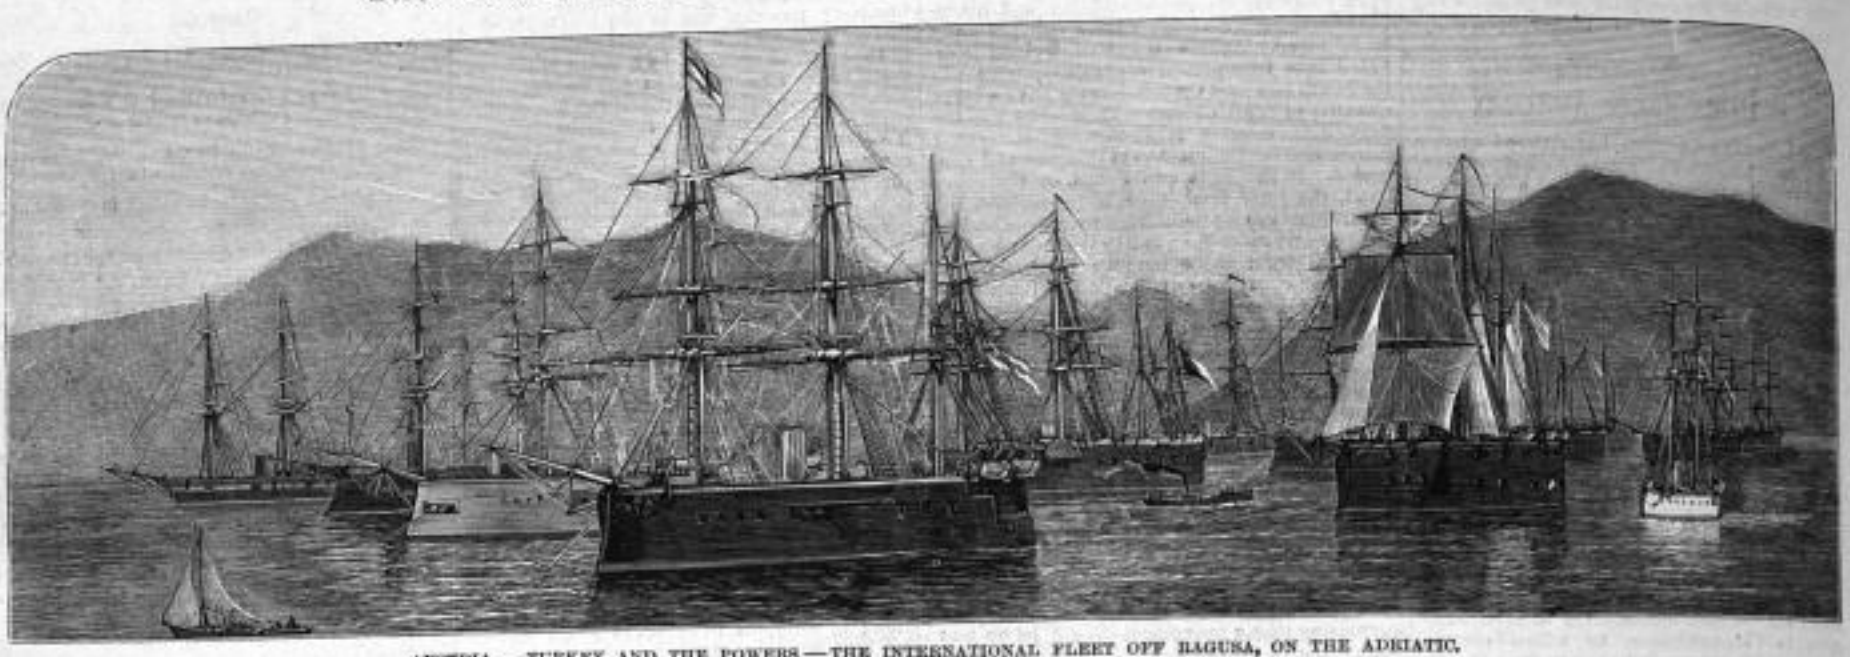
A DUBLIN paper contains a proclamation declaring Galway and Mayo in a state of disturbance requiring additional police.

THE Russian Government has called a convention of Russian cotton manufacturers to discuss a threatened crisis in that industry.

MUCH damage has been done in Great Britain by recent storms and floods. At Penzance great injury was done to shipping by a gale on October 6th.

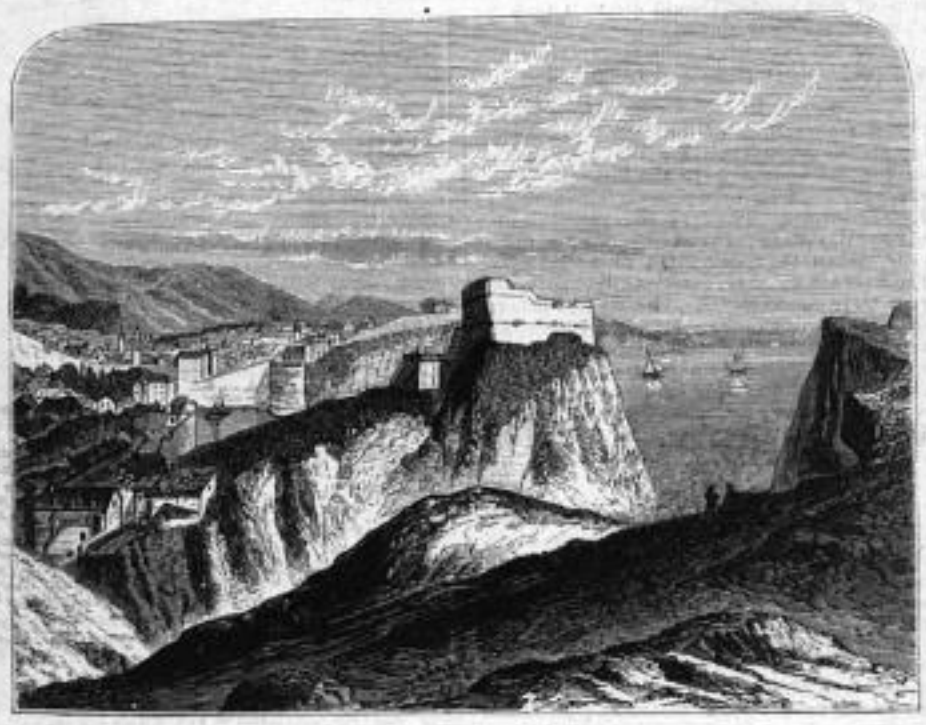
THE Prussian Government is becoming alarmed about the Socialists, and warns the Saxon Government and Hamburg State to take measures to secure the peace.

THE Mexican House of Representatives on the 25th ult., by a large majority vote, passed a resolution declaring General Gonzalez President of the Republic, his term of office to begin on the 1st of December next.



MR. LOWELL, the American Minister to England, delivered, on Thursday night last, the opening address of the present session of the Workingmen's College, London. He was very cordially received. His subject was "Books and Reading."

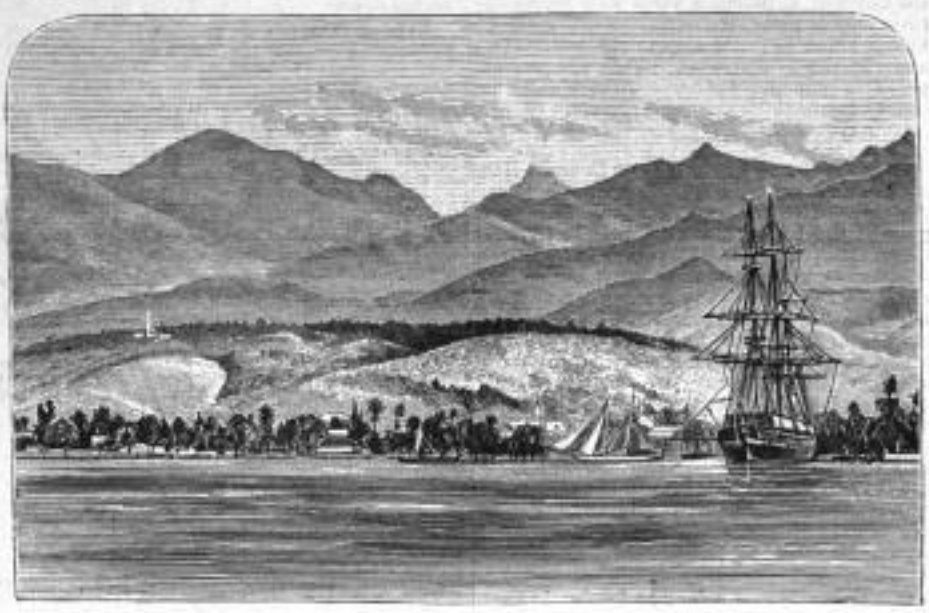
THE Board of Trade returns for the month of September show that the value of the imports into the United Kingdom was $32,500,000 in excess of those for the same month last year, and the value of the exports was $13,125,000 in excess of those for the same month last year.



THE French Minister of Public Worship is proceeding against the unrecognized Orders. Six German Franciscans at Ernal have already been expelled from France, and the English Passionists in Paris are threatened with a similar fate, though their chapel is the only place of worship where English and American Catholics can hear sermons in their own tongue.

Digitized by Google

The Pictorial Spirit of the Illustrated Foreign Press.—SEE PAGE 123.



AUSTRIA.—TURKEY AND THE POWERS—THE INTERNATIONAL FLEET OFF RAGUSA, ON THE ADRIATIC.

AUSTRIA.—VIEW OF RAGUSA, ON THE ADRIATIC.

SPAIN.—PREPARING THE LAYETTE FOR THE ROYAL BABE.

SOUTH PACIFIC.—THE ROADSTEAD OF TAHITI, SOCIETY ISLANDS.

SOUTH PACIFIC.—A VILLAGE OF TAHITI, ANNEXED TO FRANCE.

SPAIN.—THE ROYAL BIRTH—KING ALFONSO PRESENTING THE INFANTA TO THE AMBASSADORS AND STATE OFFICIALS.

Digitized by Google

RT. REV. MICHAEL A. CORRIGAN, D.D.,

COADJUTOR TO THE ARCHBISHOP OF NEW YORK.

THE selection of a coadjutor bishop to assist Cardinal McCloskey in the government of the diocese over which he has presided for many years engaged the attention of that high dignitary and the suffragans of the province of New York. Among the names proposed by them to the Pope, that of the Bishop of Newark was selected, and the telegraph recently announced his transfer to his new field of labor.

Although still a young man, Bishop Corrigan has made a high reputation in church circles by his piety, learning and rare administrative ability. Since his appointment as Bishop of Newark, he has been unremitting in his ecclesiastical duties. By his constant visitations and attendance in the various parishes of the State of New Jersey, he has become personally familiar with the clergy, institutions and congregations, and has always been prompt to check evils, and to further progress in good. Affable, unaffected and winning in manner, he has inspired confidence and acquired a great influence for good, which makes his flock deplore his removal.

Michael Augustine Corrigan was born in Newark on the 13th of August, 1840. His parents, Thomas and Mary English Corrigan, were natives of Leinster, Ireland. His father acquired a competence before his birth, and determined to give his children a liberal education.

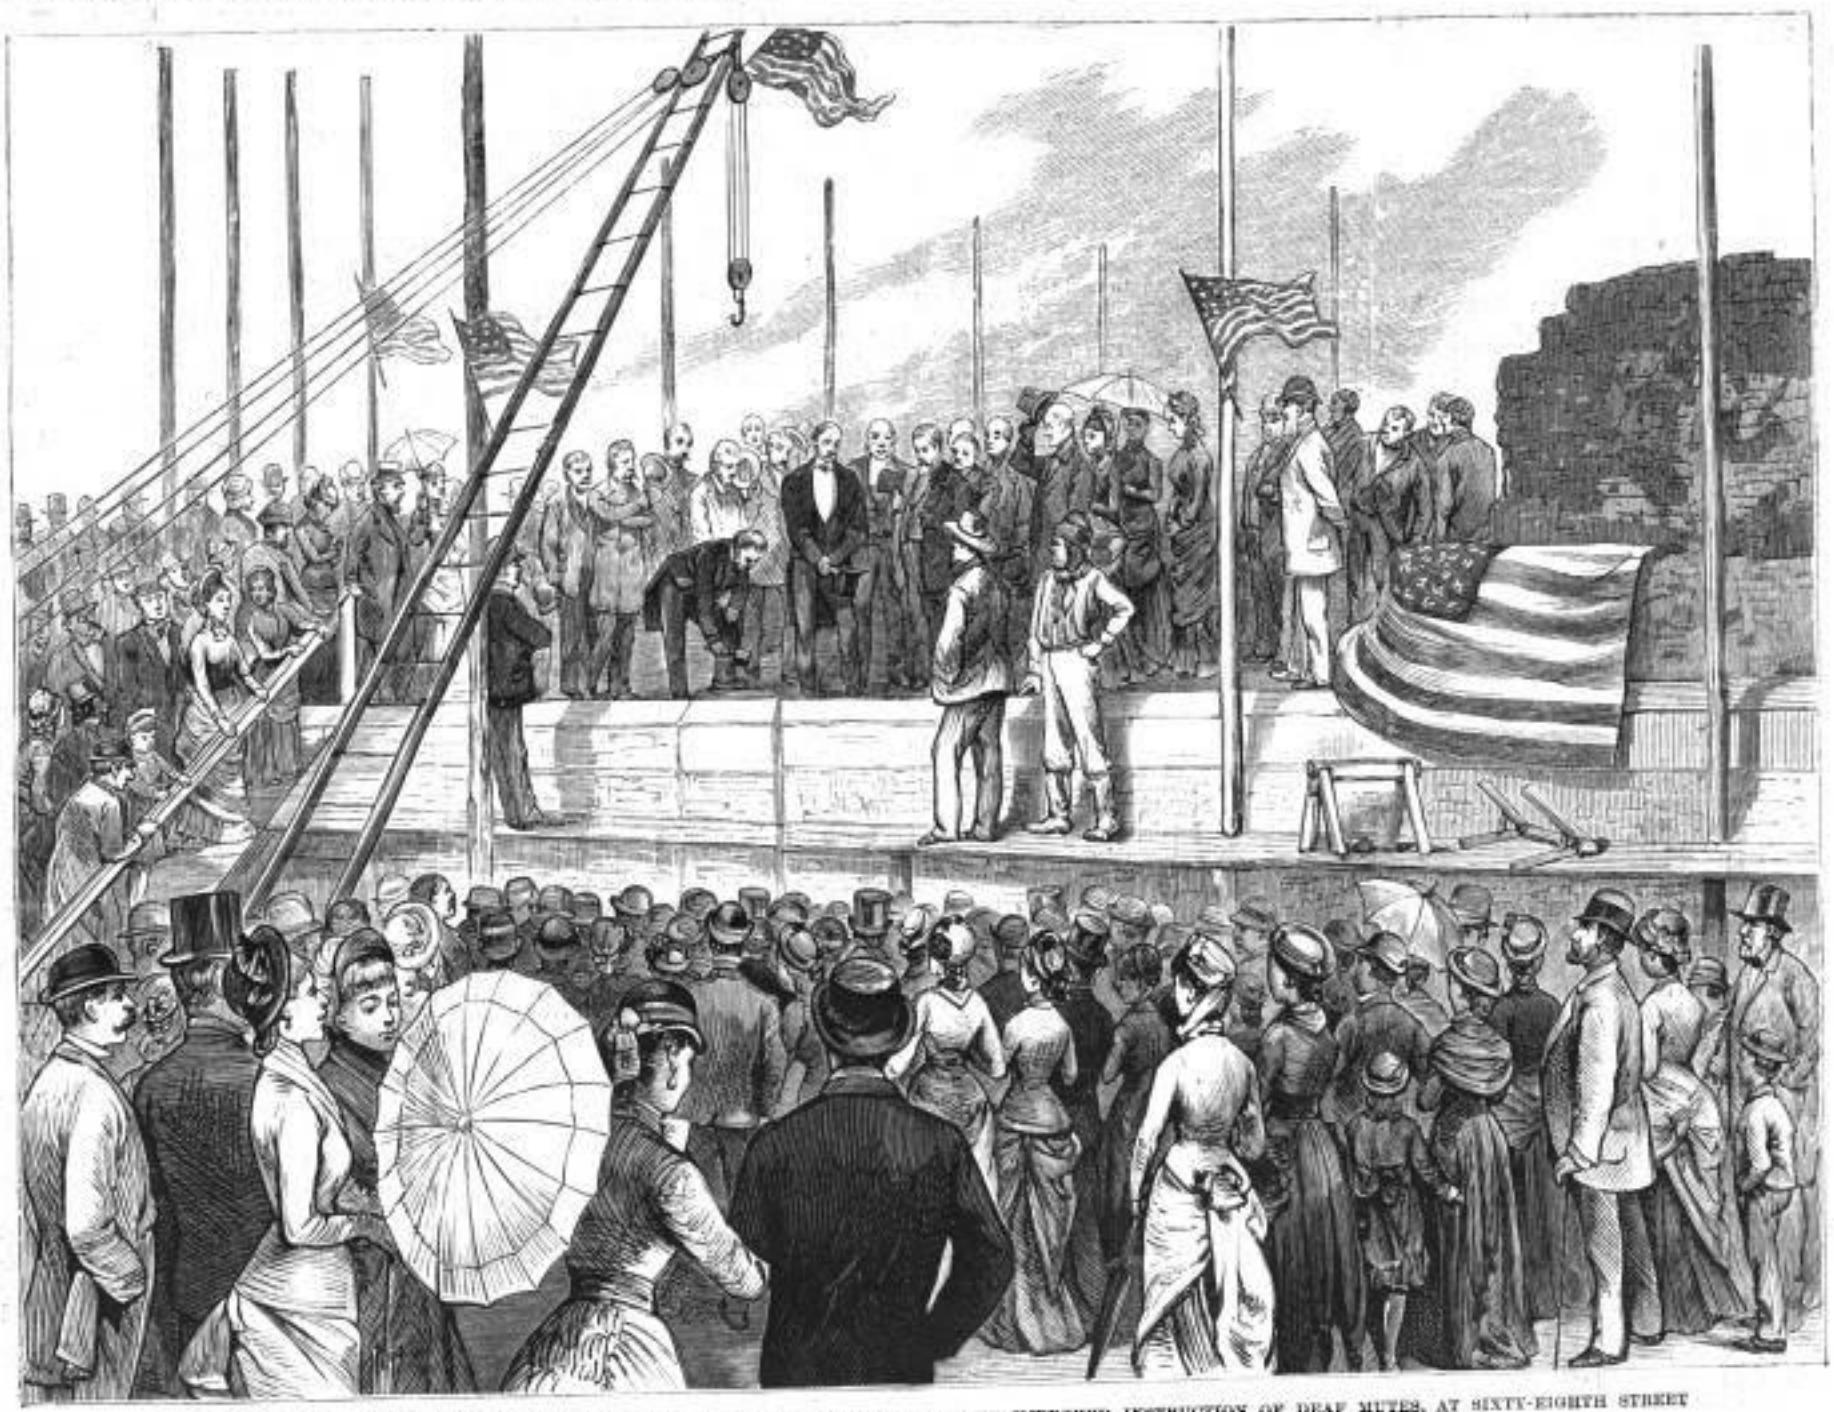
After a brief stay at St. Mary's, Wilmington, Michael proceeded to Mount St. Mary's, at Emmittsburg, the nursery of Catholic priests and bishops. Here he soon took the lead in his studies, and after making a tour of Europe with his sister he resolved to enter the ecclesiastical state. He graduated from the College of Mount St. Mary's, at Emmittsburg, Md., in 1859, and with the highest honors of his class. Thence he went to Rome to complete his studies, and was one of the thirteen students with whom the American College at Rome opened. He was ordained priest on the 19th of September by Cardinal Patrizi, in the Basilica of St. John, at Rome, and before leaving that city won the degree of D.D. On his return to New Jersey he was appointed Professor in the Diocesan Seminary at Seton Hall, South Orange, and upon the nomination of Dr. McQuade, the President, to the Bishopric of Rochester, N. Y., in 1868, Dr. Corrigan was appointed President of Seton Hall College. In 1870, during the absence of Bishop Bayley at the Vatican Council, Dr. Corrigan filled the offices of Administrator and Vicar-General of the diocese of Newark, and on May 14th, 1873, after Bishop Bayley had been promoted to the See of Baltimore, Dr. Corrigan was, upon his recommendation, appointed his successor, and was consecrated Bishop of Newark by Cardinal McCloskey.

Seton Hall College has been his home, and he watched with critical eyes the training of the candidates for the priesthood in the Seminary and of the collegians in the University course. He encouraged the erection of churches wherever needed, and has dedicated no fewer than forty-two. He welcomed to his diocese several religious Orders, as coadjutors in the mission work, and has seen the Jesuits establish a fine college, and Dominicans, Franciscans and Carmelites active in the ministry. One great object was to establish a Catholic Protectory, where the wayward youth of both sexes might be under religious influence and be saved from becoming scourges of society. This work he accomplished and has maintained for several years amid countless difficulties.

Bishop Corrigan is of medium size, and slight but muscular build. His hair and eyes are dark brown, and his face is well shaped and ruddy. He habitually wears gold spectacles, being near-sighted to some extent; but his eyes, when seen without the glasses, are bright and piercing. Every motion is full of energy, and he speaks quickly and directly to the point. Yet he is very courtly in his bearing. Besides Father James H. Corrigan, he has another brother, Father George Corrigan, pastor of the Roman Catholic Church of Newtown, N. J. His sister became an Augustinian nun about the time that he entered the priesthood, and died, some years ago, in Meaux, France.

No intelligence has yet arrived of the title henceforth to be borne by him. According to usage, he will be transferred to some episcopal or archiepiscopal See in partibus infidelium, as Bishop Hughes, when coadjutor, was Bishop of Basileopolis, and Cardinal McCloskey, in the same position, Bishop of Axieren.

RT. REV. MICHAEL A. CORRIGAN, D.D., NEWLY-APPOINTED COADJUTOR TO CARDINAL M'CLOSKEY.



A NEW SCHOOL FOR DEAF MUTES.

THE formal ceremony of laying the corner-stone of the new institution for the Improved Instruction of Deaf Mutes, at Sixty-eighth Street and Lexington Avenue, which took place on October 4th, was an occasion of much interest to persons whose sympathies are enlisted for that class of unfortunates. The institute fronts on Sixty-eighth Street, corner of Lexington Avenue, 150 feet, the depth of the wings being 100, and of the centre 60 feet. The lot is 200 by 150 feet, and the building is four stories high. It will be constructed of Philadelphia brick, with gray stone trimmings, in the Queen Anne style of architecture. The walls have been erected up to the windows of the second story. In 1865 a Viennese deaf mute, named Englesmann, began, in New York, teaching deaf mutes to speak and understand language by the motion of the lips. Two years later this Society was formed for the benefit of poor deaf mutes, and a school was opened at No. 134 West Twenty-seventh Street with ten pupils. The school was supported by the annual dues of members of the Society, which became incorporated in 1869, and has since received a little State aid. The school is now conducted in four dwelling-houses at Broadway and Forty-fourth Street, having 123 pupils. Over thirty applicants have been turned away for want of room. About $125,000 has been subscribed for the new building, which will be ready for occupancy by the 1st of May next.

The exercises preliminary to laying the corner-stone were held in the chapel of the Normal College. They were opened with prayer by the Rev. Dr. Gotheil, after which President Isaac Rosenfeld delivered a brief address of welcome. Oscar S. Straus related the history of the undertaking. Chief-Justice Shea followed by giving a record of the institution from the date of its formation in President Rosenfeld's parlor, in February, 1867, up to the resolution to erect a new building. His remarks were mainly addressed to Mayor Cooper, who responded at some length. The Mayor said that a deaf and dumb person did not "now need the Bishop of Beverly to make the sign of the cross over him to restore his speech," and the class of men and women, which in past ages had been banished to obscurity, was, by modern teaching, restored to all the benefits conferred upon more favored members of society.

Chief-Justice Noah Davis said the occasion was the most interesting in which he had taken part since he came to this city. "Not more than half a century ago it would have been considered a miracle of God that the dumb should speak. But now, under the ministrations of kind women, one of the grandest accomplishments of human nature was being developed." The city, he said, was proud of its charitable institutions and of its educational system. The institution whose birth was now celebrated was "one of the city's crowning glories. He was glad that the idea of founding such an institution had "emanated from the most distinguished of all the races of mankind," a race which, "trodden under foot in the Old World, found in the New World an opportunity to show the depths of charity dwelling in the Hebrew heart." Twenty five years' experience had taught the speaker that it was unwise to wait until death had compelled man to relax his grasp on his possessions before he made charitable offerings, and through technicalities in the contest of wills many deserving charities had been disappointed.

At the close of the address a procession, headed by the trustees, marched to the new building, where the corner-stone was laid. A copper box, containing copies of the daily newspapers of October 3d, reports of the institutions, a gold coin of each of the denominations of the United States mintage,

NEW YORK CITY.—LAYING THE CORNER-STONE OF THE NEW INSTITUTION FOR THE IMPROVED INSTRUCTION OF DEAF MUTES, AT SIXTY-EIGHTH STREET AND LEXINGTON AVENUE, OCTOBER 4TH.

Digitized by Google

and lists of the subscribers to the building fund, was placed in the stone, after which a slab was placed over it, and each of the trustees struck with a wooden mallet a blow on the stone. Prayer by the Rev. Dr. W. J. Seabury closed the exercises.

THE BLACK ROBE.

BY WILKIE COLLINS.

BEFORE THE STORY.

SECOND SCENE: VANGE ABBEY—THE FOREWARNINGS.

VI.

AS we approached the harbor at Folkestone Romayne's agitation appeared to subside. His head drooped, his eyes half closed—he looked like a weary man quietly falling asleep.

On leaving the steamboat, I ventured to ask our charming fellow-passenger if I could be of any service, in reserving places in the London train for her mother and herself. She thanked me, and said they were going to visit some friends at Folkestone. In making this reply, she looked at Romayne. "I am afraid he is very ill!" she said, in gently lowered tones. Before I could answer, her mother turned to her with an expression of surprise, and directed her attention to the friends whom she had mentioned, waiting to greet her. Her last look as they took her away rested tenderly and sorrowfully on Romayne. He never returned it—he was not even aware of it. As I led him to the train he leaned more and more heavily on my arm. Seated in the carriage, he sank at once into profound sleep.

We drove to the hotel at which my friend was accustomed to reside when he was in London. His long sleep on the journey seemed, in some degree, to have relieved him. We dined together in his private room. When the servants had withdrawn, I found that the unhappy result of the duel was still preying on his mind.

"The horror of having killed that man," he said, "is more than I can bear alone. For God's sake, don't leave me!"

I had received letters at Boulogne which informed me that my wife and family had accepted an invitation to stay with some friends at the seaside. Under these circumstances, I was entirely at his service. Having quieted his anxiety on this point, I reminded him of what had passed between us on board the steamboat. He tried to change the subject. My curiosity was too strongly aroused to permit this; I persisted in helping his memory.

"We were looking into the engine-room," I said, "and you asked me what I heard there. You promised to tell me what you heard, as soon as we got on shore——"

He stopped me before I could say more.

"I begin to think it was a delusion," he answered. "You ought not to interpret too literally what a person in my dreadful situation may say. The stain of another man's blood is on me——"

I interrupted him in my turn. "I refuse to hear you speak of yourself in that way," I said. "You are no more responsible for the Frenchman's death than if you had been driving, and had accidentally run over him in the street. I am not the right companion for a man who talks as you do. The proper person to be with you is a doctor." I really felt irritated with him—and I saw no reason for concealing it.

Another man, in his place, might have been offended with me. There was a native sweetness in Romayne's disposition, which asserted itself even in his worst moments of nervous irritability. He took my hand.

"Don't be hard on me," he pleaded. "I will try to think of it as you do. Make some little concession, on your side. I want to see how I get through the night. We will return to what I said to you on board the steamboat to-morrow morning. Is it agreed?"

It was agreed, of course. There was a door of communication between our bedrooms. At his suggestion it was left open.

"If I find I can't sleep," he explained, "I want to feel assured that you can hear me if I call to you."

Three times in the night I woke, and, seeing the light burning in his room, looked in at him. He always carried some of his books with him when he traveled. On each occasion when I entered the room he was reading quietly.

"I suppose I forestalled my night's sleep on the railway," he said. "It doesn't matter; I am content. Something that I was afraid of has not happened. I am used to wakeful nights. Go back to bed, and don't be uneasy about me."

The next morning the deferred explanation was put off again.

"Do you mind waiting a little longer?" he asked.

"Not if you particularly wish it."

"Will you do me another favor? You know that I don't like London. The noise in the streets is distracting. Besides, I may tell you I have a sort of distrust of noise since——"

He stopped with an appearance of confusion.

"Since I found you looking into the engine-room?" I asked.

"Yes. I don't feel inclined to trust the chances of another night in London. I want to try the effect of perfect quiet. Do you mind going back with me to Vange? Dull as the place is, you can amuse yourself. There is good shooting, as you know."

In an hour more we had left London.

VII.

VANGE ABBEY is, as I suppose, the most solitary country house in England. If Romayne wanted quiet it was exactly the place for him.

On the rising ground of one of the wildest moors in the North Riding of Yorkshire, the ruins of the old monastery are visible from all points of the compass. There are traditions of thriving villages clustering about the Abbey, in the days of the monks, and of hostelries devoted to the reception of pilgrims from every part of the Christian world. Not a vestige of these buildings is left. They were deserted by the pious inhabitants, it is said, at the time when Henry the Eighth suppressed the monasteries, and gave the Abbey and the broad lands of Vange to his faithful friend and courtier, Sir Miles Romayne. In the next generation, the son and heir of Sir Miles built the dwelling-house, helping himself liberally from the solid stone walls of the monastery. With some unimportant alterations and repairs, the house stands, defying time and weather, to the present day.

At the last station on the railway, the horses were waiting for us. It was a lovely moonlight night, and we shortened the distance considerably by taking the bridle-path over the moor. Between nine and ten o'clock we reached the Abbey.

Years had passed since I had last been Romayne's guest. Nothing out of the house or in the house seemed to have undergone any change in the interval. Neither the good North-country butler, nor his buxom Scotch wife, skilled in cookery, looked any older; they received me as if I had left them a day or two since, and had come back again to live in Yorkshire. My well-remembered bedroom was waiting for me, and the matchless old Madeira welcomed us when my host and I met in the inner-hall, which was the ordinary dining-room of the Abbey.

As we faced each other at the well-spread table, I began to hope that the familiar influences of his country home were beginning already to breathe their blessed quiet over the disturbed mind of Romayne. In the presence of his faithful old servants he seemed to be capable of controlling the morbid remorse that oppressed him. He spoke to them composedly and kindly; he was affectionately glad to see his old friend once more in the old house.

When we were near the end of our meal something happened that startled me. I had just handed the wine to Romayne, and he had filled his glass, when he suddenly turned pale and lifted his head like a man whose attention is unexpectedly roused. No person but ourselves was in the room; I was not speaking to him at the time. He looked round suspiciously at the door behind him leading into the library, and rang the old fashioned handbell which stood by him on the table. The servant was directed to close the door.

"Are you cold?" I asked.

"No." He reconsidered that brief answer, and contradicted himself. "Yes—the library fire has burnt low, I suppose."

In my position at the table, I had seen the fire; the grate was heaped with blazing coals and wood. I said nothing. The pale change in his face and his contradictory reply roused doubts in me which I had hoped never to feel again.

He pushed away his glass of wine, and still kept his eyes fixed on the closed door. His attitude and expression were plainly suggestive of the act of listening. Listening to what?

After an interval, he abruptly addressed me. "Do you call it a quiet night?" he said.

"As quiet as quiet can be," I replied. "The wind has dropped, and even the fire doesn't crackle. Perfect stillness—indoors and out."

"Out?" he repeated. For a moment he looked at me intently, as if I had started some new idea in his mind. I asked as lightly as I could if I had said anything to surprise him. Instead of answering me, he started out of his chair with a cry of terror, and left the room.

I scarcely knew what to do. It was impossible, unless he returned immediately, to let this extraordinary proceeding pass without notice. After waiting for a few minutes, I rang the bell.

The old butler came in. He looked in blank amazement at the empty chair. "Where's the master?" he asked.

I could only answer that he had left the table suddenly, without a word of explanation. "He may perhaps be ill," I added. "As his old servant, you can do no harm if you go and look for him. Say that I am waiting here, if he wants me."

The minutes passed slowly and more slowly. I was left alone for so long a time that I began to feel seriously uneasy. My hand was on the bell again, when there was a knock at the door. I had expected to see the butler. It was the groom who entered the room.

"Garthwaite can't come down to you, sir," said the man. "He asks if you will please go up to the master on the Belvidere."

The house—extending round three sides of a square—was only two stories high. The flat roof, accessible through a species of hatchway, and still surrounded by its sturdy stone parapet, was called "The Belvidere," in reference as usual to the fine view which it commanded. Fearing I knew not what, I mounted the ladder which led to the roof. Romayne received me with a harsh outburst of laughter—that saddest false laughter which is true trouble in disguise.

"Here's something to amuse you!" he cried. "I believe old Garthwaite thinks I am drunk—he won't leave me up here by myself."

Letting this strange assertion remain unanswered, the butler withdrew. As he passed me on his way to the ladder, he whispered, "Be careful of the master! I tell you, sir, he has a bee in his bonnet this night." Although not of the North country myself, I knew the meaning of the phrase. Garthwaite suspected that the master was nothing less than mad!

Romayne took my arm when we were alone—we walked slowly from end to end of the Belvidere. The moon was, by this time, low in the heavens; but her mild mysterious light still streamed over the roof of the house and the high heathy ground round it. I looked attentively at Romayne. He was deadly pale; his hand shook as it rested on my arm—and that was all. Neither in look nor manner did he betray the faintest sign of mental derangement. He had perhaps needlessly alarmed the faithful old servant by something that he had said or done. I determined to clear up that doubt immediately.

"You left the table very suddenly," I said. "Did you feel ill?"

"Not ill," he replied. "I was frightened. Look at me—I'm frightened still."

"What do you mean?"

Instead of answering he repeated the strange question which he had put to me down-stairs.

"Do you call it a quiet night?"

Considering the time of year and the exposed situation of the house, the night was almost preternaturally quiet. Throughout the vast open country all around us not even a breath of air could be heard. The night birds were away, or were silent at the time. But one sound was audible when we stood still and listened—the cool, quiet bubble of a little stream, lost to view in the valley-ground to the south.

"I have told you already," I said. "So still a night I never remember on this Yorkshire moor."

He laid one hand heavily on my shoulder.

"What did the poor boy say of me, whose brother I killed?" he asked. "What words did we hear through the dripping darkness of the mist?"

"I won't encourage you to think of them. I refuse to repeat the words."

He pointed over the northward parapet.

"It doesn't matter whether you accept or refuse," he said. "I hear the boy at this moment—there!"

He repeated the horrid words, marking the pauses in the utterance of them with his finger, as if they were sounds that he heard.

"Assassin! assassin! where are you?"

"Good God!" I cried, "you don't mean that you really hear the voice?"

"Do you hear what I say? I hear the boy as plainly as you hear me. The voice screams at me through the clear moonlight as it screamed at me through the sea-fog. Again and again. It's all round the house. That way now, where the light just touches on the tops of the heather. Tell the servants to have the horses ready the first thing in the morning. We leave Vange Abbey to-morrow."

These were wild words. If he had spoken them wildly, I might have shared the butler's conclusion that his mind was deranged. There was no undue vehemence in his voice or his manner. He spoke with a melancholy resignation—he seemed like a prisoner submitting to a sentence that he had deserved. Remembering the cases of men suffering from nervous disease who had been haunted by apparitions, I asked if he saw any imaginary figure under the form of a boy.

"I see nothing," he said; "I only hear. Look yourself. It is in the last degree improbable; but let us make sure that nobody has followed me from Boulogne, and is playing me a trick."

We made the circuit of the Belvidere. On its eastward side, the house wall was built against one of the towers of the old Abbey. On the westward side, the ground sloped steeply down to a deep pool or tarn. Northward and southward, there was nothing to be seen but the open moor. Look where I might, with the moonlight to make the view plain to me, the solitude was as void of any living creature as if we had been surrounded by the awful dead world of the moon.

"Was it the boy's voice that you heard on the voyage across the Channel?" I asked.

"Yes; I heard it for the first time—down in the engine-room; rising and falling, rising and falling, like the sound of the engines themselves."

"And when did you hear it again?"

"I feared to hear it in London. It left me, I should have told you, when we stepped ashore out of the steamboat. I was afraid that the noise of the traffic in the streets might bring it back to me. As you know, I passed a quiet night. I had the hope that my imagination had deceived me—that I was the victim of a delusion, as people say. It is no delusion. In the perfect tranquillity of this place, the voice has come back to me. While we were at table I heard it again—behind me, in the library. I heard it still when the door was shut. I ran up here to try if it would follow me into the open air. It has followed me. We may as well go down again into the hall. I know now that there is no escaping from it. My dear old home has become horrible to me. Do you mind returning to London to-morrow?"

What I felt and feared in this miserable state of things matters little. The one chance that I could see for Romayne was to obtain the best medical advice. I sincerely encouraged his idea of going back to London the next day.

We had sat together by the hall fire for about ten minutes, when he took out his handkerchief and wiped away the perspiration from his forehead, drawing a deep breath of relief. "It has gone!" he said, faintly.

"When did you hear the boy's voice," I asked—"do you hear it continually?"

"No, at intervals; sometimes longer, sometimes shorter."

"And, thus far, it comes to you suddenly, and leaves you suddenly?"

"Yes."

"Do my questions annoy you?"

"I make no complaint," he said, sadly. "You can see for yourself—I patiently suffer the punishment that I have deserved."

I contradicted him at once. "It is nothing of the sort! It's a nervous malady which medical science can control and cure. Wait till we get to London."

This expression of opinion produced no effect on him.

"I have taken the life of a fellow-creature," he said. "I have closed the career of a young man who, but for me, might have lived long and happily and honorably. Say what you may, I am of the race of Cain. He had the mark set on his brow. I have my ordeal. Delude yourself, if you like, with false hopes. I can endure—and hope for nothing. Good-night."

VIII.

EARLY the next morning the good old butler came to me, in great perturbation, for a word of advice.

"Do come, sir, and look at the master! I can't find in my heart to wake him."

It was time to wake him, if we were to go to London that day. I went into the bedroom. Although I was no doctor, the restorative importance of that profound and quiet sleep impressed itself on me so strongly, that I took the responsibility of leaving him undisturbed. The event proved that I had acted wisely. He slept until noon. There was no return of "the torment of the voice," as he called it, poor fellow. We passed a quiet day, excepting one little interruption, which I am warned not to pass over without a word of record in this narrative.

We had returned from a ride. Romayne had gone into the library to read; and I was just leaving the stables, after a look at some recent improvements, when a pony-chaise with a gentleman in it drove up to the door. He asked politely if he might be allowed to see the house. There were some fine pictures at Vange, as well as many interesting relics of antiquity; and the rooms were shown, in Romayne's absence, to the very few travelers who were adventurous enough to cross the heathy desert that surrounded the Abbey. On this occasion the stranger was informed that Mr. Romayne was at home. He at once apologized—with an appearance of disappointment, however, which induced me to step forward and speak to him.

"Mr. Romayne is not very well," I said, "and I cannot venture to ask you into the house. But you will be welcome, I am sure, to walk round the grounds and to look at the ruins of the Abbey."

He thanked me and accepted the invitation. I find no great difficulty in describing him generally. He was elderly, fat and cheerful; buttoned up in a long black frock-coat, and presenting that closely shaven face and that inveterate expression of watchful humility about the eyes, which we all associate with the reverend personality of a priest.

To my surprise, he seemed, in some degree at least, to know his way about the place. He made straight for the dreary little lake which I have already mentioned, and stood looking at it with an interest which was so incomprehensible to me, that I own I watched him.

He ascended the slope of the moorland and entered the gate which led to the grounds. All that the gardeners had done to make the place attractive failed to claim his attention. He walked past lawns, shrubs, and flower-beds, and only stopped at an old stone fountain which tradition declared to have been one of the ornaments of the garden in the time of the monks. Having carefully examined this relic of antiquity, he took a sheet of paper from his pocket, and consulted it attentively. It might have been a plan of the house and grounds, or it might not—I can only report that he took the path which led him, by the shortest way, to the ruined Abbey church.

As he entered the roofless inclosure he reverently removed his hat. It was impossible for me to follow him any further without exposing myself to the risk of discovery. I sat down on one of the fallen stones waiting to see him again. It must have been at least half an hour before he appeared. He thanked me for my kindness as composedly as if he had quite expected to find me in the place that I occupied.

"I have been deeply interested in all that I have seen," he said. "May I venture to ask, what is perhaps an indiscreet question on the part of a stranger?"

I ventured, on my side, to inquire what this question might be.

"Mr. Romayne is indeed fortunate," he resumed, "in the possession of this beautiful place. He is a young man, I think?"

"Yes."

"Is he married?"

"No."

"Excuse my curiosity. The owner of Vange Abbey is an interesting person to all good antiquaries like myself. Many thanks again. Good-day."

His pony-chaise took him away. His last look rested—not on me—but on the old Abbey.

(To be continued.)

SONG OF THE OYSTERMEN.

ONE of the quaintest cities in the Union is Annapolis, in Maryland, which was first "settled" in 1649 by Puritan refugees from Virginia. Formerly called Providence, it was, in 1694, regularly laid out, and, in compliment to Queen Anne, called after Her Most Gracious Majesty. At the close of the Revolution, Maryland offered to cede Annapolis to the General Government as the Federal capital, and it was at the Session of Congress held in Annapolis in 1783 that Washington surrendered his commission as Commander-in-chief, on the 23d day of December. The United States Naval Academy occupies a superb position, the largest vessels in the Navy being able to ride alongside the Academy wharf. Many of the houses are pre-Revolution and built of red English brick, the doors and windows being pure Queen Anne. Dotted all over the bay at this season of the year, and as far as the eye can reach, are the boats of the oyster fishermen in search of the luscious bivalves, while dredgers sail away down the Chesapeake Bay, followed by the "maledictions loud and deep" of the toilers who work in frail skiffs nearer shore. The "Irish Fleet," as it is called, is very strong, and such names as the Invader, the Monocacy, the Cuba Maiden, are to be deciphered on the sterns of a large percentage of the fishing craft. Our illustration represents an oyster-boat en route to Tully's Point Reef, a happy hunting-ground about six miles down the bay. She is manned by colored folk, who while away the sailing time by vocal and instrumental melody, their favorite song at this date being "In de Morn-

Digitized by Google

ter by de Bright Light." The melodious strains, as, on a clear autumnal morning, they float across the tranquil waters of the bay, possess a quaint fascination, all the more subtle for the picturesque surroundings—for Annapolis, as viewed from the Chesapeake, is a perfect gem in the glittering waters of the bay. Each small boat is manned by an adult and a boy, called a "culler," who is employed to take oysters from the tongs, to select the fish from the debris, and to dress the shells by means of a small hammer. A good culler will dress 25 bushels a day, or 3,744 oysters. As many as 200 boats may be seen working on Tally's Point Reef, each taking 30 bushels, or 450,000 oysters a day. There are 4,000 licensed oyster-boats in the waters of the Chesapeake. "Shucking," or oyster-opening, is a regular profession at Annapolis. One firm employs over 800 shuckers, who shuck over 100,000 bushels a week. A smart shucker will shuck from 20 to 26 pots of six pints each, one bushel to a pot, for which he is paid at the rate of 10 cents a pot. Girls are largely employed at shucking and canning, and the opening of the oyster season at Annapolis makes things as lively as when the Fairy Prince kissed the sleeping Beauty in the wood.

PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL TRIENNIAL CONVENTION.

THE Triennial General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church convened in the Church of the Holy Trinity, Madison Avenue and Forty-second Street, in this city, on October 6th. The convention is divided into the House of Bishops, which is composed of the sixty bishops of the Church in the United States, and the House of Deputies, which embraces eight delegates—four clergymen and four laymen—from each diocese of the Church—about 326 in all. Bishop Smith of Kentucky presided over the House of Bishops, he being the senior bishop of the Church. The Rev. H. C. Potter, D. D., of this diocese, acted as Secretary, and the Rev. W. Tablock, D. D., of Connecticut, as Assistant Secretary. The proceedings of the House of Bishops were conducted, with closed doors, in the chapel of the church. The House of Deputies met in the body of the church, and their proceedings were public.

The House of Deputies holds about the same relation to the House of Bishops that the House of Representatives does to the Senate in Congress. The proceedings of the Convention are conducted under parliamentary rules, and a measure originating in either House must be passed in the other before it becomes effective in the government of the Church. A majority of votes is sufficient to carry a resolution in either branch of the Convention.

The devotional exercises preliminary to the opening of the Convention were held in St. George's Protestant Episcopal Church, in Rutherford Place, on the morning of the 6th. There was a great throng of visitors. In the chancel of the church seats were provided for the bishops and the officiating clergy. The communion-table, spread with a snow-white cloth, stood in the centre of the sanctuary, and behind it was a high-backed chair for the presiding bishop, flanked by two other chairs with backs not so high. On the table rested the alms-basin, of solid gold, presented to the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States by the Convocation of Canterbury, England, and the solid silver communion-service presented by Trinity Church in 1812, and used by each General Convention which has assembled since that date. The full choir of Trinity Church occupied the organ-gallery, and furnished the music of the morning services. At 11:10 the grand procession of the bishops and clergy left the chapel, the clergy leading, and the venerable Bishop Smith of Kentucky, leaning on the arm of Bishop Cotterill of Edinburgh, bringing up the rear. The clergy and the bishops were habited in their ecclesiastical vestments, and as they marched through the churchyard, on their way from the chapel to the church, presented a very dignified and solemn spectacle. When the head of the procession entered the church, the Trinity choir began the processional hymn, "The Church's one foundation is Jesus Christ the Lord," and the great congregation arose and stood until bishops and clergy were seated. As Dr. Tyng and Dr. Williams, who led the march, reached the steps of the altar they stopped. Those who followed ranged themselves in a double column down the centre aisle, and the bishops passed through, preceded by Bishop Smith, and took their seats in the sanctuary. Bishop Smith had to be supported to the high-backed chair set apart for him. This is the sixth General Convention over which he has been called to preside, and he is very weak from age. On his right sat Bishop Cotterell of Edinburgh, and on his left Bishop Lee of Delaware. The other bishops, forty-seven in number, had seats within the railing of the church, while the officiating clergymen sat without the railing, inside the lectern and pulpit. The services, in which the Rev. Dr. W. M. Williams, Rev. Dr. Tyng, Bishop Lee of Delaware, Bishop Herzog of Germany, Bishop Kip of California, Bishop Williams of Connecticut, and others, participated, were eminently impressive.

The House of Deputies organized with Rev. Dr. E. E. Beardsley, of Connecticut, as President, and Rev. Charles L. Hutchings, of Massachusetts, as Secretary. On Friday the two Houses met in joint convention as a Board of Missions. During the session several questions of church polity and church unity generally have been discussed, and the results of the Convention will no doubt be in every way important.

MONTICELLO,

ONCE THE HOME OF THOMAS JEFFERSON.

NEAR Shadwell, the place of Thomas Jefferson's birth and the home of his boyhood, "was an isolated mountain five hundred and eighty feet high, which he afterwards named 'Monticello,' or the Little Mount, covered to the summit with perpetual forest." Far up towards the apex of this little mountain Thomas Jefferson and his boon-friend, Dabney Carr (who, like Jefferson, was at that time a law student), constructed a rustic seat under an old mountain oak. To this place they were in the habit of repairing with their law-books to spend pleasant hours in study and conversation. These students became strongly attached to the spot, and made the compact that whichever died first should be buried here by the other. Carr, after taking an honorable part in the opening scenes of the war for Independence, died, and Jefferson buried him where the two had spent hours together in pleasant and retired intercourse. Here Jefferson was afterwards consigned to his mother earth, and that spot was from that time used as the burial-place of the Jefferson family. The attachment of the future statesman for this isolated eminence grew stronger and stronger, and he selected it as the site whereon to build a mansion which he intended should be the most elegant and refined home in "Old Virginia."

From the summit of this mountain a grand panoramic view of hill and dale, mountain and plain, is under the eye. There is within the range of vision a large expanse of land whose fertility is unexcelled; and a pretty stream, called the Rivanna River, can be seen for miles as it winds around the base of the Monticello and through green meadows and well-tilled fields. To the east the country, from the base of the mountain, extends for miles a level plain. To the north is a chain of hills, with here and there a neat farmhouse peeping modestly from amongst its old shade trees. To the south is Willis Mountain, and in the southeast arise in rugged grandeur what one of Virginia's orators has called "the majesty of her everlasting hills and mountains." It is, indeed, a fair spot, and it is not remarkable that Jefferson's attachment to it was so strong, or surprising that he chose it as the site of his future home.

While he was yet a student, he made the first preparations for building on the mount. He commenced by removing its apex, forming thus an elliptical plain. The work of construction went on very slowly, no needed article being purchasable at a point nearer than Williamsburg—a hundred and fifty miles distant—and very many of these articles, such as sashes, etc., had to be brought from London, England.

In 1770—he was at that time a young lawyer at the Albemarle Bar—the Jefferson family was burned out of house and home, and even the notes which the young lawyer had prepared for the purpose of arguing a case in the court at Charlottesville at the following Term were lost. Mrs. Jefferson found temporary shelter under the roof of an overseer, while her son took up his residence in his mountain home. This was the first occupancy of Monticello. For the next twenty-five years the mansion was under course of construction—or, rather, remained unfinished. Jefferson's time was greatly broken into, first by State and then by Federal politics—he being successively Governor of Virginia, Vice-President under John Adams, and twice President of the United States. He was also a representative of the American Government at foreign courts, but he never lost sight of his beloved Monticello, and finally completed it.

The following is a description of the interior of the house, written by a member of Mr. Jefferson's family, who lived there many years: "The house, externally, is of the Doric order of Grecian architecture, with its heavy cornice and massive balustrades—its public rooms finished in the Ionic. The front hall of entrance recedes six feet within the front wall of the building, covered by a portico the width of the recess, projecting twenty five feet and the height of the house, with stone pillars and steps. The hall is also the height of the house. From about midway this room passages lead up to either extremity of the building. The rooms at the extremity of these passages terminate in octagonal projections, leaving a recess of three equal sides, into which the passages enter, piazzas the width of the recess projecting six feet beyond; their roofs, the height of the house and resting on brick arches, cover the recesses. The northern one connects the house with the public terrace, while the southern is arched for a green-house. To the east of these passages, on each side of the hall, are lodging-rooms. This front is one and a half stories; the west front, the rooms occupy the whole height, making the house one story, except the parlor, or central room, which is surmounted by an octagonal story, with a dome or spherical roof. This was designed for a billiard-room, but, before completion, a law was passed prohibiting public and private billiard-tables in the State. It was to have been approached by stairways connected with a gallery at the inner extremity of the hall, which itself forms the communication between the lodging-rooms on either side above. The two assigned for the rooms being prohibited, these stairways were never erected, leaving in this respect a great deficiency in the house. . . . The floor of this room (the parlor) is in squares, the squares being ten inches, of the wild cherry, very hard, susceptible of a high polish, and the color of mahogany. The border of each square, four inches wide, is of beech, light-colored, hard, and bearing high polish. The original cost was two hundred dollars. After nearly seventy years of use and abuse, a half-hour's dusting and brushing will make it compare favorable with the handsomest tessellated floors."

All around the mansion extended beautiful lawns, and around the lawns oaks, lindens, poplars, birch and many other fine old shade-trees. Standing on the western portico and looking over the western lawn, one sees at a distance of two and a half or three miles, the old town of Charlottesville, at whose Bar Jefferson was a lawyer, and within whose limits at one time sat the Legislature of Virginia; and just beyond arises the pantheon-shaped dome of the University of Virginia, the last great work of him who

"Had written the Charter of Treason,
Defying oblivion and death."

From the eastern portico, looking directly eastward, a view of Chesapeake Bay and the Atlantic Ocean is made impossible only by the great distance.

Jefferson retired from office in 1808 and went to dwell at his mountain home, where he lived eighteen years, dying at a ripe age on the 4th of July, 1826, the fiftieth anniversary of the signing of the Declaration of Independence, and the same day on which his political rival John Adams (exclaiming, "Thomas Jefferson still survives!") breathed his last.

The ex-President was very seriously involved at the time of his death, and Monticello was sold to pay his debts. Had it not been for the liberality of the State of Louisiana (which had been purchased from the French Government while Jefferson was President) and the State of South Carolina, his daughter, Martha Jefferson, who had intermarried with Thomas Mann Randolph, would have been very poorly provided for. Each of the above-named States gave her $10,000, all of which she invested in the bonds of the University of Virginia.

When the property was sold in 1830 Commodore Uriah P. Levy, of the United States Navy, purchased it. The commodore was the first naval officer to abolish corporal punishment, and served with distinction in the war of 1812. He presented to the United States the colossal bronze statue of Jefferson (by David) in 1834. At his death, in 1862, the property was confiscated and sold by the Confederate Government. After the war the commodore's will was found, by which the property was bequeathed to the State of Virginia on condition that that commonwealth would establish a school for Hebrew children at Monticello; but if Virginia failed to accept the legacy, then the property was to go to the United States, provided the United States would use it for the benefit of a Marine Hospital at Washington, D. C. The heirs of Commodore Levy contested the will in the courts of New York, and it was set aside, the property going to his direct heirs. At this juncture Virginia put in her claim for her bequest, but the court decided that the matter had been adjusted and declined to reopen the case. Under a decree of the Albemarle County Court the property was sold, when Mr. Jefferson M. Levy, a nephew of the naval officer, a son of Captain J. P. Levy, and a prominent member of the New York Bar, purchased a large proportion of it, and has since secured the remainder. He has thoroughly repaired it (sparing no expense or pains), restoring it to the exact condition it was in when Mr. Jefferson died, being studious to avoid the slightest modification of the original plan. It is at present his Summer residence, and no man ever had a more desirable one. It is one of the American Meccas.

On the western slope of the mountain, a few hundred yards from the mansion-house, is the grave of Jefferson and his family connections, inclosed by a modest brick wall. Vandals have been there. The shaft which marks his grave—humble enough in its best days—has been pecked to pieces by the desecrating hands of visitors desiring to place a specimen of it in their cabinets of relics and curiosities, and to-day the monument over the grave of one of the greatest men of the world is a rough and shapeless stone. This disfigured obelisk once declared—(but even this brief, yet glorious inscription has been defaced by tourists)—that on this spot lie buried the mortal remains of

THOMAS JEFFERSON,
Author of the Declaration of American Independence, of the Statute of Virginia for Religious Freedom, and Father of the University of Virginia.

In patriotic Americans the neglected grave of Jefferson awakens feelings of regret that it should have so long remained unthought of and uncared for by the millions who, with almost unfeeling words, daily extol his genius, and to those especially who have spent their lives in sight of the home of this great American and have come up like loyal sons to Alma Mater, the last great work of his cunning hand, it is a humiliation "bitterer to drink than blood."

Wheat-farming on the Pacific Coast.

SPEAKING of the mammoth farmers and farming in California, a San Francisco correspondent of the St. Louis Republican says: "Dr. Hugh J. Glenn made his first purchase of the Jacinto grant, California, in December, 1867, and commenced farming in the wonderfully productive Sacramento Valley. He has now a farm of 65,000 acres, 45,000 of which are in wheat, and has 125 miles of fence. Of this year's crop, Dr. Glenn says, although he has on hand 250,000 sacks, each holding 140 pounds, he thinks they will not hold his wheat. He has his own machine and blacksmith shops, boring, turning and planing machines, buzz-saws, etc. He manufactures his own wagons, separators, headers, harrows, and nearly all the machinery and implements used. He has employed 90 men in seeding and 150 in harvest, 200 head of horses and mules, 55 grain-headers and other wagons, 150 sets of harness, 12 twelve foot headers, 3 sulky hay-rakes, 32 eight mule cultivators, 4 Gem seed-sowers, 8 Buckeye drills, 8 mowers, 1 forty eight-inch separator, 36 feet long and 13½ feet high, with a capacity of 10 bushels per minute; 1 forty-inch separator, 36 feet long; 2 forty-foot elevators for self feeder, 1 steam barley or feed mill, and 2 twenty-horse power engines. The forty-eight inch separator threshed on the 8th of August, 1879, 5,732 bushels of wheat in one day."

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

The International Fleet at Gravosa.

The European concert of which we have heard so much, has at length been rendered complete by the arrival of the French contingent, and has been giving a performance in the harbor of Gravosa for the benefit of the Sultan of Turkey, but whether he will listen to the music remains to be seen. The port of Gravosa, which we have illustrated, resembles a Norwegian fiord. Upon their arrival Her Majesty's ships Alexandra and Temeraire, with the gun vessel Condor, and the dispatch boat Hideux, were moored with hawsers to rocks on shore. South of them were the Russian ships Svetland and Jenadchony. Beyond, moored in the stream, was the Austrian ironclad Custozza, next the Italian ironclad Palestro, with the German corvette Victoria. In shore, in Ombla Creek, was the Italian ironclad Roma, and in the oval port of Gravosa were the Austrian ships Lauden, Prinz Eugen and Strenpin. The French squadron, which was the last to arrive, consists of the Friedland, Saffren and Hirondelle (dispatch boat). A dispatch from Vienna, speaking of the situation and the temporizing disposition of the Porte, says: "The British and Russian Cabinets have already given their opinion of the Turkish note, that it is altogether unfit to form the basis of further negotiations. While communicating this opinion, the British Cabinet has urged the immediate resumption of combined action on a larger scale, namely, to make a naval demonstration nearer Constantinople, without abandoning the demonstration at Dulcigno." The town of Ragusa, on the Adriatic, is situated on the more open shore, a mile and a half southeast of the village of Gravosa. Like Cattaro, the port nearest to Montenegro, and the possessor of the best harbor of the Adriatic, Ragusa was taken by the French under Napoleon I., from whom it was in turn taken by England. At the Congress of Vienna in 1815 it was given to Austria. Further changes in the situation at this point will be noted in our news columns.

The French Annexation of Tahiti.

The protectorate which France has long exercised over Tahiti and the group of the Society Islands has just terminated; King Pomare V. abdicates and the islands become a French colony. This step is due mainly to the management of Mr. Chessé, who has acted as Governor. Tahiti can now enter on a career of real progress under French energy. As in other Pacific islands, the native population is fast disappearing, having fallen from 16,000 at the commencement of the century to about 6,000. Of the immigrant population, 138 only are French, while English and Americans count 407, and Chinese 408. The French aspect that on the opening of the Panama Canal, Tahiti will become a great stopping place for steamers. About one-fourth of the soil is rich and productive, but a very small portion is turned to account. Its proper hands it would furnish a rich supply of tropical fruits to the western shores of America.

The Spanish Heiress.

At half-past 8 o'clock in the evening of September 11th Dr. Riedel laid in the arms of the Archduchess Elizabeth the new-born Spanish Princess. The Archduchess showed it to the other members of the Royal family, and the news spread rapidly through the palace. At once the white flag was hoisted and a white lantern lighted, whilst the cannon of the artillery barracks close to the palace fired a salute of fifteen guns. The church bells rang out, and the public edifices were illuminated. An antique custom decrees that immediately after the birth of the first child of the King of Spain the sovereign shall, himself, present to the Corps Diplomatique and to an assemblage of high dignitaries, his infant heir. It was a quarter past 8, and the room set apart for the ceremony, which is not very large, presented a very imposing aspect, from the variety of costumes and the high rank of the personages; the whole, in short, was linged with the brilliancy which the Court of Spain gives to its great ceremonies. The Presidents of the Senate and of the Chamber of Deputies, the delegates from the Parliament and the Municipal Council of Madrid, the deputation from other provinces, contrasted with the throng, glittering with gold and Orders. There were also the cardinals, the Papal Nuncio, prelates to represent the Church, and all the heads of the diplomatic body. There were a few moments of anxious curiosity, and the Duke de Sesto disappeared, called by the Marquis de Santa Cruz, to receive the tidings, which he speedily communicated to those in the ante-room. An Infanta! A shade of disappointment was visible also in that brilliant assemblage, and then all eyes were fixed upon the door through which came the King, Alfonso XII. His Majesty carried a most exquisite basket, in which lay peacefully, in the midst of laces in softly-quilted silk, the little Infanta. Behind the King came the chief officials of the palace and M. Canovas del Castillo. Alfonso XII. looked very happy and carried his child with great care. The Prime Minister raised the lace veil, and the more favored ones could see the baby princess, who is reported to be fair, with blue eyes like Queen Christina. As soon as this formality was over the King gave the Infanta to the Marquis de Santa Cruz, who passed over the basket to the Duchess de Medina de las Torres. The King was surrounded by the heads of the Corps Diplomatique, and congratulated by all, whilst the Keeper of the Seals prepared the Act certifying to the presentation, and the registry of the birth of Doña Maria de las Mercedes Teresa Isabella de Borbon. The preparations of the Infanta for the Princess occupied much time. The mothers of the King and Queen vied with each other in procuring the most elaborate cradles and cradle linen and laces. Every article of baby raiment and adornment was of the richest character, and there was sufficient to satisfy the necessities of a hundred little ones—not Infantas of Spain.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

—GREAT poverty in the interior of Russia is reported in the St. Petersburg journals.

—THE Triennial elections throughout France have been fixed for the 7th of November.

—BAPTIST pastors in this city have designated November 1st as a day of prayer for the good of the country.

—STEAMBOATS are to invade the lagoons of the Adriatic at Venice, and the gondola will soon be a thing of the past.

—THE amount of foreign gold that has come to this country since July 1st last is estimated by Treasury officials to be about $35,000,000.

—ODESSA grain merchants are represented as buying wheat in both the English and American markets, owing to a deficiency in the Russian crops.

—THE Commissioners for the International Park on the Canada side have ordered a survey, which will extend a distance of three miles on the river front.

—A LARGE number of fraudulent naturalization papers have been issued in Philadelphia, and several of the persons concerned in their issue have been arrested.

—THE Italian Government is revising the decree enacted against the Jesuits in 1873, on account of the influx into Italy of large numbers of the exiled French members of the Order.

—AN invitation has been received by the United States Government to send a representative to the International Sanitary Conference, which is to be held in London in August, 1881.

—THE New Orleans Bee reports cotton reports from various points in Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Tennessee and Florida indicate a falling off in the crops compared with last year.

—THE Director of the Mint estimates that about $28,000,000 in silver was coined during the last fiscal year, and that the production of silver will amount to about $36,000,000, or $2,000,000 less than the previous year.

—IN 1800 the number of lunatics in England was 38,058. Now it is 71,191, an increase of no less than 87 per cent. During the same period the population increased only about 28 per cent., a third of the rate at which lunacy advanced.

—THE New York Historical Society has directed its executive committee to make arrangements for the erection of a suitable memorial to Captain Nathan Hale upon the spot where he was executed by the British, September 22d, 1776.

—THE seventy-first annual meeting of the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions was held in Lowell, Mass., last week. The official reports show that the total expenditures of the year were $627,861, and the total receipts $613,639, leaving a deficit of $14,222.

—THE Delta Kappa Epsilon college fraternity will hold its annual convention, October 20th and 21st, with the Trinity College Chapter in Hartford. At the literary exercises Bishop Robertson of Missouri will preside; Dr. E. P. Parker, of Hartford, will deliver the oration, and the Hon. George A. Marden, of Lowell, will be poet. About 200 delegates are expected to be present.

—OTTO, the son of a Nez Percés Indian chief is distinguishing himself as a sharpshooter in San Francisco. His most remarkable feat is to hit a mark while blindfolded. A glass ball is suspended twenty feet away, and the boy is allowed to gaze at it. Then his eyes are bandaged, and he is turned around several times; but more than half the time he breaks the ball, though how he manages his aim is a mystery.

—THE annual boat race between Harvard and Yale has grown to be quite a costly affair. The treasurer of the Harvard University Boat Club has just reported that the year's expenses were $4,428.65, and that the club is in debt $401 at that. The amount of money consumed, however, in preparing for the race, is a trifle compared with the time. Both Harvard and Yale have already begun their work for next Summer's regatta.

—THE largest casting ever made in this country was turned out at the Black Diamond Steel Works in Pittsburgh, Pa., last week. The casting was an anvil block for a 17-ton steam hammer, and its weight was 160 tons. Five furnaces were built expressly for melting the iron, and seven hours were occupied in running the metal. The hammer will be the largest in the country—the next largest of ten tons, being at Nashua, N. H. Four months will elapse before the block will be cool enough to handle.

—ADVICES from Yokohama, Japan, to the 19th of September, states that the depreciation of the paper currency has induced the Government to consider the expediency of contracting a foreign loan principally for the purpose of retiring a large portion of its paper. The natural resources of the country, combined with the good faith of the Government as manifested in a former financial transaction of a like nature, is a sufficient guarantee that the loan, if asked for, will be favorably entertained by Western capitalists.

—THE Government of Columbia proposes to establish a navy; four vessels are to be built at once. Two navy-yards are to be established—one at Carthagena and another at Panama. Two of the vessels will be school ships, and practical lessons in ship-building will be taught at the navy-yards. The sum of $600,000 is appropriated for the purpose of establishing this navy. The Government of Costa Rica has entered into a contract for the construction of an elevated railroad from San José, the capital, to Rio Sucio, there to connect with a railroad in course of construction from Limon. The road is to be ready for traffic within ten months.

—A SUBMARINE volcano has been discovered in the Pacific, south of Fortuna and the Hervis Islands, by Commander Huntington of the United States steamer Alert. First a column of vapor was discovered rising from the sea, followed by the upheaval of black masses. As the ship approached the submarine volcano the masses thrown up were distinguished as mud and ashes. The upheavals were accompanied by dull reports, like those from submarine mines, and by an odor of sulphur. Several days were spent in making the reconnoissance. A reef, or island, is in process of formation. Soundings were obtained in from five to twenty-one fathoms. The water was full of ashes and mud, and some of this and one specimen of the bottom were brought on board. At night flames were noticed issuing from the volcano.

—THE new colony of Rugby, in East Tennessee, was formally opened October 5th. There was a large attendance. The ceremonies commenced with an impressive religious service conducted by Bishop Quintard of Tennessee, and the Rev. H. H. Sneed, of Chattanooga. A poem was read by Miss L. Virginia French, and addresses were made by the Hon. Thomas Hughes; Cyrus Clark, manager of the colony; Judge O. P. Temple, Knoxville, Tenn.; L. Dana Horton, of Pomeroy, Ohio; and Franklin W. Smith, of Boston. Mr. Hughes gave a vigorous sketch of the hopes and purposes of those who are interested in the project, and pointed out what he thought was the true path to success. It was not an English colony in an exclusive sense, he said. He stood what he understood by the word "communism," remarking that the colonists had no sympathy with any form of communism.

Digitized by Google

NEW YORK CITY.—OPENING SERVICES OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL TRIENNIAL CONVENTION IN ST. GEORGE'S CHURCH.
SEE PAGE 123.

Digitized by Google

MISSOURI.—ANNUAL VISIT OF THE VAILED PROPHETS TO ST. LOUIS, OCTOBER 5TH—TABLEAU OF THE EGYPTIAN SUMMER.
FROM A SKETCH BY S. C. NEWHALL.—SEE PAGE 127.

Digitized by Google

TWO DESERTS.

ACROSS the silence of a land that swoons
Beneath the torture of its torrid skies,
An Arab falters, as the last hope dies,
To kneel for once before the Khalsian tombs.
And as he hears afar the dread simooms,
And, kneeling, to a callous Allah cries—
Dreamily fair before his famished eyes
A palm-groved Eden of the desert blooms!

And I, too, falter in my quest to see
The light of those pale orient stars that wane
Above my Mecca as a balm that cures,
But in the desert blooms no palm for me,
And through the mist of tears I search in vain
For one oasis in that heart of yours.

EDGAR EVERTSON-SALTUS.

THE SCHAFFUSKIE LANDS.

BY ANNIE DUFFELL,

AUTHOR OF "IN THE MESHES," ETC.

CHAPTER XLII.—(CONTINUED).

"I DO love her," he thunders. "You have spoken the truth for once. I love her in all her shame and degradation, and would not renounce that love for a queen upon her throne. Since you will press the subject, I will tell you that she is never absent from my mind for one day or hour or minute. The consciousness of her presence is ever with me. I believed her guilty but she had good cause to murder Lagors. She was the helpless victim of a rotten and dead and gone passion. She was the offspring of lust and sin. Ah! madame, well may you shrink and cower; I know your guilty secret; I know your shame and sin?" He is pacing the floor with rapid strides. "Lagors told me his history a few weeks prior to his death. There, then! Madame, do not touch me, for God's sake! Your secret is safe. I swore to him I would not betray you. There are some people doomed to misfortune from their birth; she is one of them, and she carried it in her face! But stricken as she is with shame and dyed with blood, she is dearer to me than my soul's salvation. She is pure with a purity that no other woman ever knew.

"I have given her my whole life—I would have given her my honor, but she refused all favor from me. I would have saved her at the price of my good name. But as she scorned my aid I resolved to lead in secret the life of an exile, to bear the pangs that she suffers. Have I done it? Could any one be more isolated from his kin than I? Never for an instant has the softness of luxury touched me. I vowed that as far as possible I would subject myself to the deprivations of her lot, and I have kept my vow. Never since she has gone forth to her doom have my limbs known any couch save the planks of my chamber floor; never in my own palace have I touched anything save the brown bread and cold water of the convict diet. Do you call this madness, fanaticism? So be it! But I have sworn that my life shall be as near hers as possible, and I will keep my vow. My existence is dead, solitary, repressed. Do you tell me that, after the wreck and ruin I have seen, any phantom of a new love could enter into my heart—that there is upon this earth any woman for me save the one toiling in the agony of exile?"

Shivering, trembling, crushed with shame and misery, Gypsy crouches upon the divan, her blue eyes filled with a terrified light, her hands locked, her lovely face blanched to the hue of marble. Not only has she lost the last chance of for ever winning his love, but he has shown her that the hidden page of her life, kept far away from all earthly knowledge, is bared to his vision. She shudders, her white lips move convulsively, and low moans occasionally break from her. Where he paces to and fro in the dusky shadows of the long apartment her hunted eyes follow his magnificent form. Oh, this fierce, pagan, mighty love from which she is for ever shut! How she yearns for it in this moment of shame and weakness. What is Chetewood's love? Its very patience condemns it in her sight—this wild, fierce, savage passion fills the measure of her desires, and shows her sensual nature how blest she would be in it. Yet it will never be hers—never—never!

Where she crouches in her misery great dry sobs break chokingly in her throat and rouse him. He stops before her. His face is very white and drawn; in his eyes is still a lurid glow like fire.

"Perhaps," he says, "I have been betrayed into saying too much. If I have said anything unbecoming a gentleman I beg your pardon. And now, will it not be better for this unprofitable interview to terminate?"

She looks up at him with lovely, piteous eyes. It is so hard to renounce the only heart that, of all the hundreds that have been given her, she ever held as valuable.

"You never, never can forget her!" she queries, in a curious little choked voice.

"Never! Shall I wish you good-morning?" He marks those lines of great moral weakness in her flushed face, and over him sweeps that great horror that was roused at his first sight of her. Always in his soul has been that great distrust of her, which, if possible, is intensified in this moment.

"And you—you—will not betray me? My secret is safe?"

He shudders with aversion.

"Yes, your secret is safe. And if I can in any way serve you in the future as a friend, command me. For Lord Jack's sake, I will always be at your service." He bows low, and in the next moment she is alone; and, overwhelmed with envy and mortification, she flings herself headlong upon the floor, while from her lips, that Lord Chetewood will soon rapturously kiss, breaks a stream of bitter blasphemy.

CHAPTER XLIII.—LADY JET BUYS A HORSE.

ONE morning Count Zickwoff leisurely descends the great staircase of his domicile, and, opening the door, is about to step out into the crisp, frosty air, when he pauses, his hand still on the door-knob, and stands transfixed upon the threshold. Before him is a striking and peculiar spectacle; the yard is literally filled with horses. Horses of every description—large and small, tall and short, fat and lean; horses careering around the yard, and horses standing in altogether dejected attitudes; white, red, gray, yellow—every color under the sun—meet his astonished eyes. It seems as though every equine creature in Siberia has congregated upon his premises. And upon the porch, a few steps removed from him, also stands his daughter, viewing with consternation the moving spectacle; while racing among the animals, crawling across their back, shouting, whooping, and conducting himself in an altogether reprehensible manner, is Nick.

"Great heavens!" cries the count, "have you turned my lawn into a livery-stable? What is the meaning of this?"

Lady Jet turns from her silent contemplation of the scene before her, and her eyes are filled with wonder, mirth and consternation.

"I insist upon an explanation," says her father severely. "What is the meaning of this array?"

"It means," replies Lady Jet, struggling with an hysterical desire to shriek with laughter, "that for a few days past I have publicly expressed a desire to purchase a horse; and I am not sure but that I told one or two people that if they knew of a good animal for sale to inform its owner of my need. But, good heaven!"—her horrified gaze goes back to that array of quadrupeds—"of course I had no idea that every horse in the country would be forthcoming."

"You have done a very imprudent thing," says her father, irritably—"exceedingly imprudent," as he hears the bickering and altercations of the respective owners of the collected steeds, which, in several instances, have resulted in hand-to hand skirmishes. "If you wanted a horse why did you not acquaint me with the fact, and I would have seen that your desire was filled in a proper manner."

"I see you so often," says Lady Jet, ironically. "I have so many opportunities of communicating my desires to you."

"You might have written me, and sent the note to the office."

"If you had known it was from me you would not have taken the trouble to open it." By this time, with the wisdom of her sex, the small pearess has worked herself into a passion, firmly persuaded that she is the injured one.

"The thing is to get rid of them," observes the count, his gloomy eye traversing the warlike assembly of steeds.

"Great saints! did you ever see such a jolly mess!" shouts Nick, oppressively radiant, now joining them, addressing himself to Lady Jet. "If I was you, Jet, I wouldn't stop at one. Lord, what a lot of beauties there is! and horses, you know—they're always useful. If I was you I'd take that dappled gray by all means; and there's another out there—a coal black—that the man swears he wouldn't part with nohow only that she is worthy of a better position than he can give her. Oh, but she's lovely! And that bay colt over there—such legs and neck!—he is a jewel. That groom there by the post is ready to take his oath on a stack of bibles that his white mare is the best horse of the batch, and I believe him. And, there, that little sorrel filly, it would be a burning shame to miss such a bargain; she's dirt-cheap and sound as a new drum. But, for a treasure, take that roan beast; she takes 'em all down. She and that spotted brown."

Wrought to the verge of madness by this discourse, delivered with a swiftness incredible, the count makes a furious lunge at the boy, who scampers off, while Lady Jet stands with her finger-tips thrust far into her small ears.

"Drive 'em away!" she says, faintly, to her father.

"But how am I to do it?" gasps the perplexed count.

"Tell 'em you don't want a horse; say your daughter was crazy and not responsible for what she said. Tell 'em you'll shoot 'em if they don't go," glaring vindictively at the contentious horsemen.

"But, if you do want a horse?" suggests her father.

Thus recalled to her senses, Lady Jet takes down her fingers.

"I did want a horse——" she begins, and then pauses.

"It is somewhat remarkable that I never heard you express such a desire before," observes her father. "What sort of an animal do you want?"

It occurs to Lady Jet that she feels very small, but a desperate purpose urges her on.

"I don't care much what the color is"—and it is noticeable that she does not look her father square in the face—"and I have no particular fancy as to the size and build. But," eagerly, "I want him strong, hardy, you know! Tough, don't you call it? One that will never tire or give out. And if you could get one that wasn't very fond of his nose, you know," somewhat dubiously, "that could go a good ways on a little, it would be very nice. But, above all, I want him fleet. No slow horse will do; he must be swift as the wind, and that."

"Is that all?" says her father, calmly. "Surely you are not through! Can't you think of some other merit that will be a necessary requisite in your horse?"

"That is all," meekly.

"Why, really, you are very modest in your demands. Let me see; you want a nondescript animal—one that is entirely proof against fatigue, that lives without food and travels like the wind. It seems to me, from your description, that a phantom steed, if procurable, would be the best suited to your wants."

Lady Jet taps her foot angrily upon the porch, but maintains an unbroken silence.

"May I inquire," resumes her father, after a pause, "for what desperate expedition you are fitting out?"

Into the girl's eyes comes a quick flash of fear, still she says nothing.

"Will you answer my question?"

"It is answered before it is asked," she says, somewhat vaguely.

"Ah, may I ask in what way?"

"You know very well," she bursts out impatiently, though there is a certain nervous twitching around the mouth, "that I am not going on any long journey. I wish to heaven I were!" pulling vindictively at a stunted, solitary runner that has valiantly twined itself around the post by which she stands. "I should not know how to behave myself if I were to go ten rods away from home, and such a home! shut up for ever in this frozen spot, never seeing anything but suffering and wretchedness." She bursts into a passion of stormy tears, and her father looks on astounded and made slightly uncomfortable.

"I thought you were contented," he says, after a pause.

Two deluged eyes flame wildest wrath upon him.

"Contented," she cries, "and buried alive! You must have a very vivid imagination, my lord!"

There is a long silence; upon the count's face rests rather a serious expression.

"Well," he says, at last, "this is no time to discuss such a subject. We must get rid of this Babel"—a confused combination of vociferous voices reaching them from the yard, intermingled with which is the snorting and neighing of the animals and the impatient stamping of their many feet. "If there is such a horse out there as will suit you, I will purchase it. But, first of all, tell me what it is for?"

"Is there anything remarkable in a young lady desiring a horse?" she asks, shrilly.

Her father is compelled to acknowledge that there is not, though, at the same time, he assures himself that he had not the slightest idea of the irascible temper possessed by his daughter.

"I want a horse because I am dying of ennui," she continues, unsteadily. "I never go anywhere or see anything. If I have a horse, I can take long rides over the country which will be better than nothing." Over her face is a crimson flush, as her father bows and turns away to execute her commission, for she knows that she has lied to him. She sees him go down among that crowd awaiting, and stand irresolute. Despite Nick's glowing eulogies, the boy's observation of horseflesh is limited the mere sight of a horse being a curiosity. It is a sorry-looking throng of animals that have made their way legally and illegally into Siberia, and now confront the confused and distracted count. He perambulates among the crowd, followed by those dealers who have made their steeds fast, surveys them from head to foot, inspects their mouths, and goes through all the forms necessary to secure a good brute, while at the same time fellows din in his ears the history of the angelic nature, the sound condition, the startling swiftness of their respective animals. So far he has not seen a horse that he would allow his daughter to mount, and is about to give up in despair when a quiet voice addresses him:

"Please, my lord, will you look at my horse?"

He follows the speaker to the far end of the yard, where is stationed a really fine animal as he sees at a glance—not one particularly beautiful, but one with a slim, muscular body and good clear limbs—a horse, to use Lady Jet's remark, that looks "tough." The count regards him in surprise.

"It is something unusual," he says to the owner, "to see such a fine beast as this here."

"I know it, my lord," replies the man. "I brought him with me from Russia a few weeks ago. My brother was exiled some years ago, being allowed by the Government a grant of land, which he tills. I am visiting him, and brought the horse along. If I could get a good price for him I would sell, as I can easily replace him when I get home."

"I like the beast and will take him," says the count. "But first let me get rid of this mob."

Then, by dint of expostulation and urging and vociferating, and after many explanations that he does not want but one horse and that he positively refuses to have more, the crestfallen horse-dealers retire, and he is free to bargain with his companion. At last these preliminaries are settled, and Lady Jet is the owner of a horse.

She pets him and caresses him to her heart's content, then gives him over into the hands of a newly-elected groom, who, keenly alive to his importance, cautiously leads the animal away.

A few minutes later she bursts into her chamber, where sits Phedora.

"Oh, Dorie!" she cries, breathlessly.

"Well, dear?"—in the gentle, mournful voice.

"I have got it!" radiantly triumphant.

"The horse?"

"Yes. Now the first step is taken, and a very important one, too."

The woman throws down her sewing and goes to the side of her young mistress.

"Lady Jet, won't you give up this mad freak? It may result in eternal disgrace. I beg of you! I implore you, dear, to desist!"

"It is no mad freak; it is a settled purpose, and I will not give it up," replies the girl, doggedly. "Risk there is, but it were a poor love that would hesitate at danger where the welfare of its object is concerned. I have got the horse and I intend to use it. And if you betray me I will hate you all my life!"

The poor, weak, timid woman shrinks back before the fiery eyes of her mistress, and, crossing to the window, Lady Jet stands looking moodily out at the dreary landscape.

CHAPTER XLIV.—"I WILL SUFFER RATHER THAN FALL."

IN the office sits Polleskie and his assistant-secretary. Both are busy with their pens; and in a distant corner, with her eyes fixed upon her husband, sits the miserable wife. Not a day since the Greek was admitted to the office has failed to see that silent, stony figure in its place, thus placing herself a living barrier between her husband and his criminal weakness. Owing to this, despite his fierce passion and desperate resolves, not a word of a private character has he been able to utter to his companion, and it but needed this thwarting and espionage to work his love to madness. But never for one hour has he been free from that vigilant and watchful eye. Whatever of strife and contention are indulged in in the secrecy of their own apartments, no outward change has been effected in the actions of madame, and the next morning finds her in her accustomed position.

But while the secretary is filled with his consuming passion for the one woman, and his fierce brutal rage for the other, no inkling of the truth has come to Maize, his assistant and beloved. In the dreary routine of her wretched life, crushed under the sense of injury and degradation, every natural instinct is killed in her; and it has never occurred to her that there is anything remarkable in the constant presence of that dark figure in the corner. If when her dull and weary eye has been raised from her labor and rested by accident upon it, into their shadowy depths has come no more of interest than when, by the same chance, her gaze has lit upon the man. To them both she is alike indifferent. Her mind is given over wholly to the past, and nothing in the present, with its horrible monotony, can rouse her.

But one day the usual silence of the office is disturbed by a low exclamation from Polleskie, who starts to his feet. Looking up, his assistant perceives that the stony figure in the corner has reeled back against the wall, and now lies with white drawn face and closed eyes. Madame has fainted at her post. With that blind instinct of womanhood Maize hastens to her side, followed by the secretary. The girl takes the cold, stiff hand of the unconscious woman, and then looks up at her husband.

"She has fainted," she says. "Who is it?" It is the first question that she has asked since her exile, but something in the pinched face, with its patient, mute anguish, rouses her sympathy.

"It is my wife," replies Polleskie, and in his eyes is a fierce, vindictive gleam. "I will send for the doctor and she must be carried home."

In a few minutes the poor lady is borne out of the office to her home, and Polleskie and her unconscious rival are alone. The hour against which she has guarded so faithfully has arrived at last.

Side by side stand the secretary and his assistant at the window—the latter with her gaze fixed upon the receding form of madame as it is borne away by two stout guards, the former with his eyes, fiery and dangerous, devouring the white regal loveliness of that divine face. At last the girl turns slowly from the window and meets that passionate gaze of her companion. Before it she involuntarily shrinks back, for in his burning eyes is suddenly revealed the entire story of his love. She draws in her breath sharply, while her lips close. A silence comes over them while they stand gazing steadily into one another's eyes. At last Polleskie slowly approaches her as though drawn by some invisible power, and a crimson flame burns unsteadily in either cheek.

"I see you have divined my secret," he murmurs. "I love you!"

Not a word says his companion, and he continues, with suppressed passion:

"I know that it is no new story to you—you may even be weary of it; women like you grow tired of adulation and worship in that gay world to which you once belonged. Yet in this to which you are now reduced love is a rare visitant. If we had met in that other existence to which both of us were born, I should have treasured mine in secret. But as we are thrown together in this distant and barren land, I take courage to speak. Will you listen?" His eager, passion-laden voice fills the room, but his companion still stands mute as stone.

"You may even consider my affection an indignity but I do not intend it as such," he continues. "True love sanctifies all things, and circumstances are to be considered. You are here in exile, smitten with shame, yourself branded throughout the country as the mistress of the man whom you afterwards murdered. No greater infamy can come to you. Yet how glad I would be if I could but make you my wife; but one mad step in my youth stands between me and that happiness. But, because of that, must I be debarred from the rapture of your love? If you but say the word I will be your slave, your friend, your lover for all the future. I have wealth, and, with myself, it shall be devoted to your service. I will pluck you out of your bondage. I will take you far, far away from the horror of this life. I will rescue you at the price of my honor and my loyalty. Will you permit it?"

Still that majestic figure stands motionless, her face white and cold as marble, her lips mute as stone. Never until this moment has she been utterly crushed—never until this moment has she felt every spark of pride and spirit leave her. Now she feels that she has sunk to the very slums of shame; lower she cannot go. An agony of degradation, of humiliation, of horrible self-loathing, sweeps her; her tongue cleaves to her mouth; to save her soul she could not utter a word.

Digitized by Google

"Even if you have no affection for me," continues the passionate tones, "it would be madness for you to refuse my offer. In all probability this is the last chance you will ever have of escaping from this horrible existence. I will restore you, not to your old world perhaps, as after your escape that would be impossible; but I will give back to you all the wealth and ease and luxury of your former life. I know of your petted, pampered existence, of your luxurious idleness, of your extravagant toilettes. I know that you have been reared like a queen and worshiped by royalty, and all this you shall have back. Though I cannot in reality give you the title of wife, the world shall have no knowledge of it. We will enter into a new existence in a foreign land. In our family there is a title descended from generation to generation, which has ever been held worthless, as it brought with it no wealth, and which is long since forgotten. By right of the oldest son it is mine now, and for your sake I will resurrect it. Under the name of Baron and Baroness Moschovia no shadow of our old identity could touch us. You should have back your sceptre. In the gay and highbred circles of a foreign court you should reign again in the royalty of your beauty. Do you hesitate? If you are innocent, you have been outraged and abused by the highest dignitaries of the royal law. Has society any title upon your consideration? If you outrage its laws in accepting my protection, is it more than it has done by you in casting upon you the stigma of infamy when you were innocent? If you are guilty, what matters it to you what further evil encompass you? I love you, and, without one word of questioning as to your past, will devote my whole life to you if you will permit it."

It is a dangerous sophistry—a deadly temptation to one with every muscle aching and quivering with the strain of labor, who has nothing to look forward to save the torture and trial and agony of a life spent in bondage. Yet the temptation of it never touches her. It is the shame, the horror, of her position—this new degradation—that crushes her. It has left her weak and quivering with self abhorrence. She has not the strength, the courage, to speak.

This numb, frozen horror maddens the man. He clutches the delicate wrist with all the force of his desperate passion.

"For God's sake speak to me!" he cries, that iron composure that has marked his speech giving way.

His touch at last rouses her from her stupor. She withdraws her hand, and looks at him in that frozen, unnatural way.

"Are you through?" she says, simply.

"No!" he exclaims, fiercely. "I see that you are about to refuse me, but I warn you not to for your own sake. I love you now with all my strength, and I have shown you what that love will do—take you in its keeping, all crushed and stricken with shame and crime as you are. But if you drive me to desperation, you will see what my hate can do. It will encompass you like a cloud of fate; it will haunt you, persecute you, torture you until your life is made a hell, and in sheer weakness you will yield to me, for I swear I will never give you up! You are entirely in my power; my word with the Count is law, and he would never question my acts, so whatever of punishment and persecution I see fit to sweep upon you you have no power to avert. But I implore you to reconsider my offer. Is true love of no value? One word and your ransom is here, and instead of my hatred you have my worship and eternal gratitude. Oh, madame, can you refuse so much? Can you trample upon your salvation? Can you deliberately consign yourself to this misery of exile when all the joy of love, all the ease of luxury await you? I beseech you to think before you act!"

Still she looks at him in that dumb, vacant way, and again she says:

"Are you through?"

"You are mad!" he cries. "Rouse yourself to the importance of the moment. Listen to me while I tell you how madly I love you—how you have grown into my heart in these long, miserable days while my lips were sealed; how I will give you my whole life, my entire devotion, if you will but accept them! Will nothing move you? Are you a block of stone? I swear by the living God, if you refuse me you shall repent of it in sackcloth and ashes! Between you and me there can be no friendship—it must be sweetest love or deadliest hate. Shall it be the former? Shall we not go far away to a new world where only bliss and sunshine dwell? I will take you to your own Greece—to Athens, Rome, Vienna—wheresoever you will. But speak the word and your shackles are burst asunder, yourself plucked from this living death." His passionate, fiery eyes devour her splendor; still that death-like immovability palls her, though now into her glorious eyes has come a bitter abased look, and her lips are hot and parched.

"Speak to me," he urges wildly. "What shall it be—love or hate, toil or luxury?"

All the pride and strength are crushed out of the girl's haughty mouth.

"If you are through," she says, and her voice is almost humble, "I will go away."

"What!" he gasps, while his face blanches with a swift, sharp agony.

"I want to go away," she murmurs, deprecatingly.

"You—you surely will not refuse me," he mutters, and there is a delirious light in his eyes. "What shall I say to move you? Your life shall be only one long dream of bliss; you——"

She throws out her hand as if to ward off a blow, and under the rough convict garb her delicate limbs shiver as with mortal cold. She is abased—utterly and entirely abased—she, once the haughty, courted, omnipotent court beauty. In her eyes, once so grand, so proud, so filled with their haughty insouciant laughter, is a piteous gleam.

"Spare me!" she says.

In her stricken, prostrate loveliness she is dearer to him than ever before in her silent haughty strength, her majestic endurance! He sees that she is stricken with a tempest of shame and humiliation—yet in her very weakness she is for ever above and beyond him.

"Listen to me," he moans. "I cannot live without you. My whole life is yours—my whole soul."

She has crossed to the desk and closed the ledger over which she has pored for nine weary months, with the same unnatural stillness she places her pen upon the desk. There is something in her manner—a sudden, reviving strength and grandeur—that awes him, that stills for a moment the fierce cries of his yearning passion.

Then, without a word, or a look, or a sign, she takes down the coarse cloak and hood, and, turning, goes out of the office and walks back to the mines to resume her toil. And as she goes Polleskie watches her, and as she disappears a hoarse cry breaks from him, and he falls prostrate to the floor.

(To be continued.)

PEN-MAR PARK.

WE give on page 128 an illustration of Pen-Mar Park, located some seventy miles from Baltimore, in the mountainous region of Washington County, Maryland. The spot is a most beautiful and romantic one. Near it is a rocky promontory, known as High Rock, elevated about two thousand feet above the ocean, from the summit of which is obtained a view over the surrounding country for a distance of from two thousand to three thousand square miles. On a clear day from this promontory can be seen parts of four States and fourteen counties, including two thousand square miles of the fertile valleys of the Cumberland and Shenandoah. The surroundings are picturesque and varied beyond description. A year or more ago a party of energetic capitalists of Baltimore discovered the beauties of the place; Pen-Mar was secured, and a vast hotel was planned to be placed on the grand plateau among the Maryland hills. Meantime, the Western Maryland Railroad Company, a comparatively new aspirant for public favor, had begun to branch out, and a scheme for cheap excursions was developed. The company erected a large pavilion in the park, holding eight hundred to one thousand people; a large dining hall, with a seating capacity for five hundred people; placed an observatory building on the summit of High Rock, capacious and comfortable for hundreds, and in June last opened the second season of cheap excursions from Baltimore. During the month of July alone over 50,000 people from that city and along the line of the road took the trip, and from the opening of the season up to September 1st—about eighty days—an aggregate of 80,000 persons, equal to an average of $1,000 a day, had gone from Baltimore to enjoy the rare attractions of the place. In addition to these, there has been about 30,000 others carried from various points along the line of the road, thus making in all 110,000 people who had visited Pen-Mar and High Rock. The park derives its name from the fact that it is situated on the boundary line between Pennsylvania and Maryland.

ANNUAL RECEPTION OF THE VAILED PROPHETS AT ST. LOUIS.

THE third annual visit of the mysterious Order of Vailed Prophets to St. Louis was made on Tuesday night, October 5th. Half-past seven was the time designated for the starting of the cavalcade from the great Den of the Prophets at the corner of Twelfth and Chestnut Streets, and the start was made on time. A little before the designated time men with axes and sledges began to knock away the high fence in this side of the structure. This increased the expectancy. The throng shouted wildly as the last boards of the fence fell. But there was still a heavy vail between them and the Arcana of the Prophets. Men on the roof of the Den stood ready to cut the ropes that held the tarpaulins spread over the side of the building. At the signal the axes were applied, the vail fell, the first team of eight horses was hitched to the Aurora float, and, amid an enthusiastic yell of exultation from the multitudes, the car was dragged out of the darkness of the Den into the brightness of the street. The Grand Oracle and his attendants were ready to take their places; the mounted police were also at hand; the regular detail of four mounted Arabian attendants, in white costumes and masks, to ride ahead of each float, moved in front of the tableau, six torch-bearers and four lamp-carriers deployed themselves on either side of the picture, and in this manner the first car of the cavalcade moved to the head of the pageant. The other cars were gotten out with commendable celerity, and by 8:30 the full panorama had passed the corner of Twelfth and Pine Streets. The floats represented Aurora, the Dawn, the Nomadic Era, Spring Land, Spring Life, the May Queen, Flora, an Egyptian Summer, the Alhambra, Summer Land, Rustic Sunshine, Autumn Land, Greek Autumn, Demeter, the Age of Chivalry, Autumn Princes, the Farmer's Joy, the Fates, the Grotto of Sigurd, War in Winter, Peace in Winter, the Arctic Regions, and the Frost King.

Our illustration shows the passage of the float on which the Egyptian Summer was typified, probably the most striking tableau in the entire pageant. The scene was laid upon the River Nile, and the picture presented was the barge of Cleopatra, with the beautiful Egyptian Queen and her Roman lover, Marc Antony, making a pleasure trip down the historic stream, attended by several attendants and much of the splendor and magnificence of Egyptian royalty. The barge had a monstrous silver fish for the hull and the upper portion, the railings and side-guards were of precious wood, covered with the richest gold and silver ornaments. The prow ran out straight, a distance of about six feet, when it bent upwards, and a great water-snake of bronze completed the figurehead. The fish's tail, raised as if to lash the waters, made the stern of the barge. The single sail, of pink silk embroidered with gold and silver, swelled before the breeze; the mast that supported it was ebony, and the ropes and guys and rigging were of silver cord. The throne of gold was canopied with pink velvet and satin, with blue fringe, set with precious stones, points of gold, and a profusion of embroidery of the same description. Two triple banners, in green and gold, stood above the canopy, and the mainmast supported a furled sail of pink silk, and a semi-circular banner with streamer and gold tips. A semi-circular banner, in green and gold, was displayed at the stern of the barge. There were fourteen figures on the float. Queen Cleopatra, the charming and accomplished daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, sat upon the throne, with Marc Antony, her lover and slave, reclining in her lap. The Queen was appareled as one of her wealth and dignity should have been. Her crown was of intersecting bands of gold, with golden wings at the sides, and rubies, emeralds, sapphires and other glowing stones burning in every golden band. Red satin with gold embroidery comprised her robe, and a white overskirt of silk with gold flowers and green embroidery covered this. Golden slippers, latched with precious stones; golden bracelets and amulets, also studded with shining jewels and connected by chains of gold, and strings of pearls and beads of gold over a collar of gold around the neck, completed her toilet. The much-envied lover, who rested his black curly head against her breast, had a red cloak thrown back over his shoulders, displaying his breastplate of gold. A helmet of the same metal, with a red plume, was lying on the floor at his side, and greaves of gold protected his lower limbs. He wore a white shirt with blue skirt under his mail, and had sandals bound with bands of gold to his feet. As the barge swept along, drapery of the most gorgeous pattern, that fell over the side of the boat, dragged along in the water, and the whole picture was a revelation of splendor and magnificence such as modern eyes have very few opportunities of looking upon.

Each float was drawn by six horses, with white "U. P." blankets, and six torch-bearers and four gasoline lamp carriers walked along on either side of each tableau. The torches burned in red, green, blue and yellow colors, and the lamps were supplied with a dozen flames each, whose full brightness was caught by an oblong reflector and thus thrown upon the adjacent picture.

After the floats had been drawn through the designated streets, the cavalcade halted at the building of the Merchants' Exchange. Here the Prophets held a grand ball, which was kept up until nearly breakfast-time on Wednesday.

An Important Historical Discovery.

MINISTER LOWELL'S recent discovery of new evidence concerning the Fayal outrage of 1814, recalls attention to a subject which greatly stirred the souls of our forefathers in the war of 1812-15. It was an attack by three British ships of war upon an American privateer, then lying at anchor in the harbor of Fayal, which was Portuguese territory and neutral ground. The attack was an extraordinary violation of the neutrality laws. The American vessel, fearing foul play, had moved up under the guns of the castle, when four boats, filled with armed men from the British ships, were seen approaching through the darkness. They returned no answer to the challenge of the American captain, who then fired upon them. The attack was renewed later with a much larger force, which was beaten off with a terrible loss of life. The Portuguese authorities were called upon to protect the American vessel, but only remonstrated with the British, and they could indeed have done little more against such a force. The following day the privateer was bombarded by the British until it was abandoned. The claim of our Government upon Portugal for failure to protect the vessel was decided adversely by Louis Napoleon, who acted as arbitrator. Now, nearly seventy years after the event, evidence is discovered by Mr. Lowell in the Admiralty archives in England which fully establishes the responsibility of Portugal, and if it had been known at the time would have caused a verdict in favor of our government. Of course, the case can have now only a historical interest.

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

Vigorous Efforts at tobacco culture are being made in Italy.

M. Lombard has gone to Abyssinia on a mission from the French Government, to study the topography of the country, as well as its civil and military organization.

After Spending two years in South Africa, Lieutenant Eeg, a Swedish traveler, has lately returned to Europe, bringing with him valuable collections which he has formed in Damara-land, in the departments of natural history and ethnography.

Ten Thousand English Miners are annually injured by accidents, and 850 of these die. In Prussia the mortality is much higher, a life being sacrificed for every 70,451 tons of coal raised, while in England the proportion is only one in every 89,429.

A New Process for using up old steel has lately been patented in England. By it a new metal of extraordinary strength and ductility is alleged to be introduced, which is expected to prove of great value. Steel remade on this plan has sold readily at $225 a ton.

Captain Casati, an Italian traveler, is going to the Bahr-el Ghazel, whence he will endeavor to reach Lake Chad through the Niam-Niam country, with the view of thoroughly investigating the interesting problem of the relations between the rivers Wells and Shari.

Traces of the last exceptionally cold Winter are now visible in Paris, a large number of trees in the squares and streets having lost their foliage at an early period. Many of them are showing leaves belonging to a second formation, and which are probably doomed to a speedy death.

On September 5th the adherents of the Positive Philosophy went in procession to the Père Lachaise to the tomb of Auguste Comte, the founder of this system. Their number was about two hundred. Three speeches were pronounced on the spot, and in the evening a banquet took place in the very rooms that Auguste Comte occupied during his lifetime and which have been preserved in their former state.

Professor Silvestri, of the Observatory, Ætna, has recently made an ascent of that volcano. He finds that the edges of the central crater have undergone considerable change and the cone last formed has diminished no less than thirty-six feet. The circumference of the crater was about 1,300 yards previously to the eruption of last year, but it has now increased to 1,920. Many other interesting alterations in the conformation of the mountain were also apparent. It was visited by the Italian Alpine Club from Catania on the 15th of September.

Mr. A. L. Siler has discovered at Malley's Nipple Ranch, near Pahreah, Kane County, Utah, remains of cliff-structures which he describes as follows: The remains seem to have been the foundations of small huts built on ledges of red sandstone under overhanging cliffs. The walls were about six inches thick, made of thin, flat sandstone, brought up from the valley below and laid in adobe. The structures are divided into rooms about four feet square, leaving all the space between the building and the back of the cliff, usually about ten feet, entirely free. Upon digging into one of the rooms, Mr. Siler found parched corn and rope in a good state of preservation.

The French Scientific Expedition, headed by Professor d'Ujalvy, the celebrated French explorer of Central Asia, has arrived at Nijni Novgorod, on its way to Turkestan, to explore Bokhara and the whole of Afghanistan north of the Hindoo Koosh. The expedition will proceed to Tashkend, where it will pass the Winter, via Siberia, taking the steamer from Nijni Novgorod to Perm, the train thence to Ekaterinburg, the post-road to Tarmin, the steamer again to Semipalatinsk, and completing the distance to Tashkend by post-road. As soon as possible in the Spring the expedition will set out for Samsroand, and, after exploring the antiquities in the Zeraishan district, will cross the border into Bokhara, proceeding thence, at the completion of the exploration of the Khanate, to the Pamir Wakhan, Badakshan, and other little known Afghan possessions in the Hindoo Koosh.

PERSONAL GOSSIP.

THE Hon. George Bancroft, the historian, celebrated his eightieth birthday October 3d.

MR. LOWELL, the American Minister, will, on the 5th of November, deliver the opening address of the session of the Edinburgh Philosophical Institution for 1880-81.

MR. U. S. GRANT, JR., sent to Mrs. Jesse R. Grant, as a wedding present, a conveyance of the furniture, tapestry and works of art of his elegant suite of rooms in a fashionable apartment-house near Madison Square.

PARIS journals state that during the recent Cabinet crisis, Grévy and Gambetta did not once meet, and that late events have apparently cooled the cordial relations which existed between the President of the Republic and the President of the Chamber.

CROWN PRINCE RUDOLPH of Austria, who has been visiting in Berlin, where he witnessed some of the Autumn military manœuvres, expressed to various German officers his unbounded admiration for the German army, at the same time giving utterance to the hope that the Austrian army would soon be placed on a par with that of Germany.

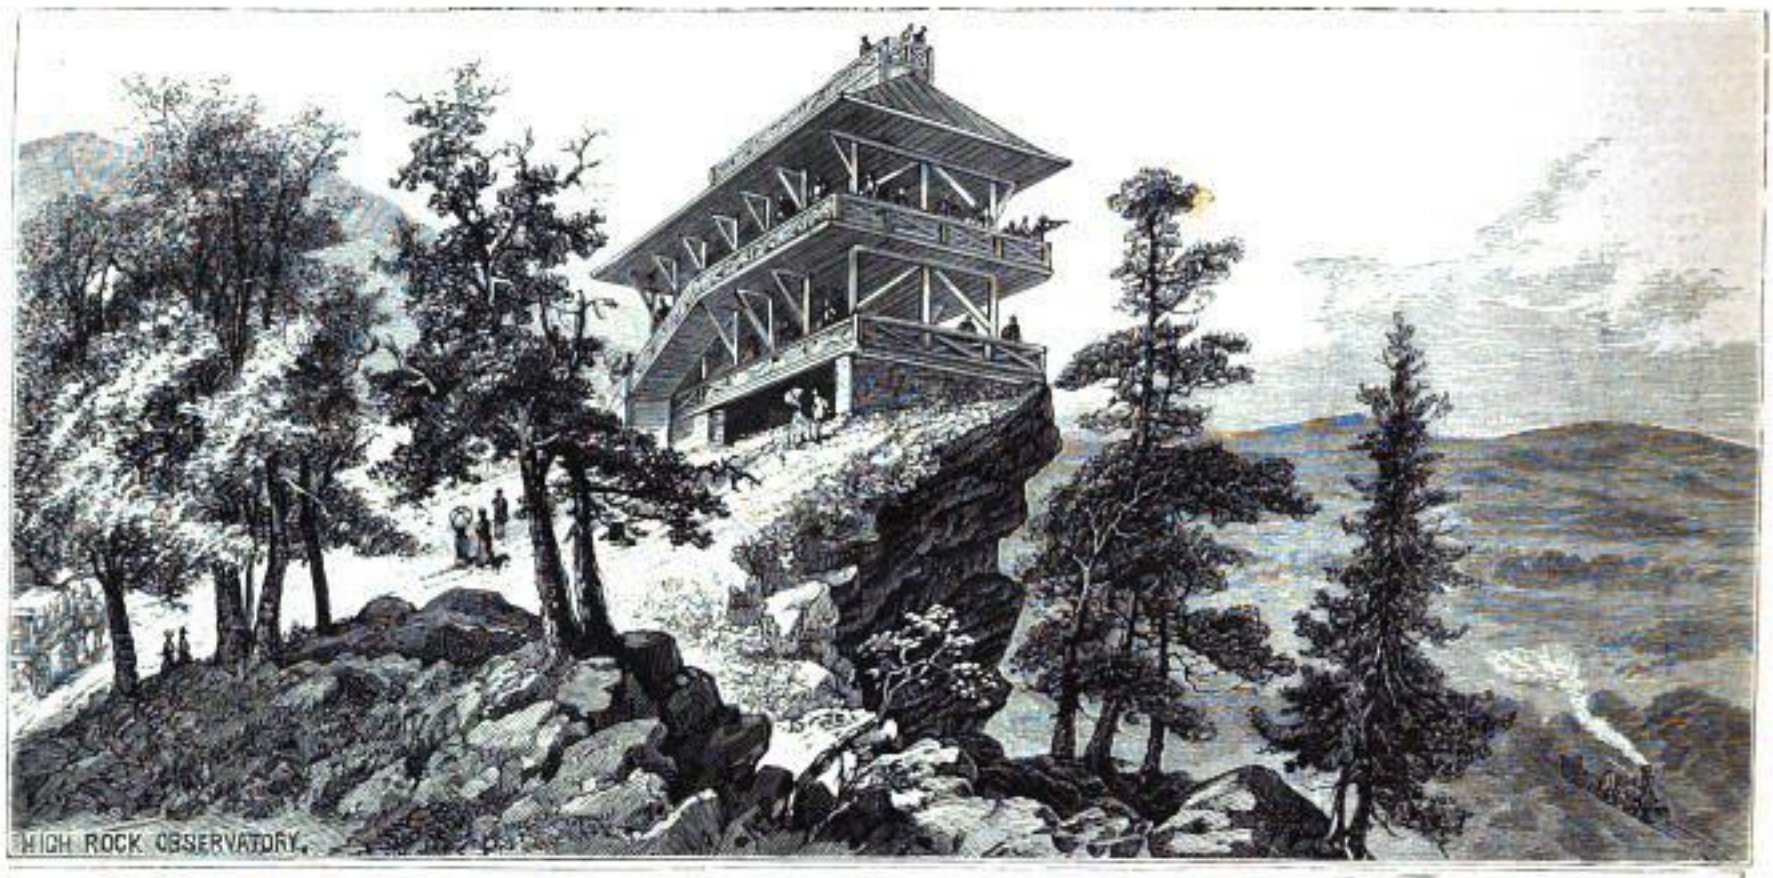
IT is now said that King Alfonso did not have his own way in calling his daughter Mercedes, after his first Queen, but that the Infanta is a Maria-Isabella-Jacinta, etc. The Maria is in honor of the Senora of the Atocha, the Isabella in honor of the ex-Queen Isabella, who was the godmother, and the Jacinta after a saint, whose forearm was placed beside the young Queen just before the birth.

IN our issue of October 9th, in speaking of the observatory built at Rochester, N. Y., by H. H. Warner for Professor Lewis Swift, the name of the donor was inadvertently inserted in the scientific record of the astronomer. This faux pas has doubtless occasioned much amusement for Mr. Warner's friends, who know that, with all his abilities, he has never attempted to shine as a stellar power, and we take pleasure in correcting the record.

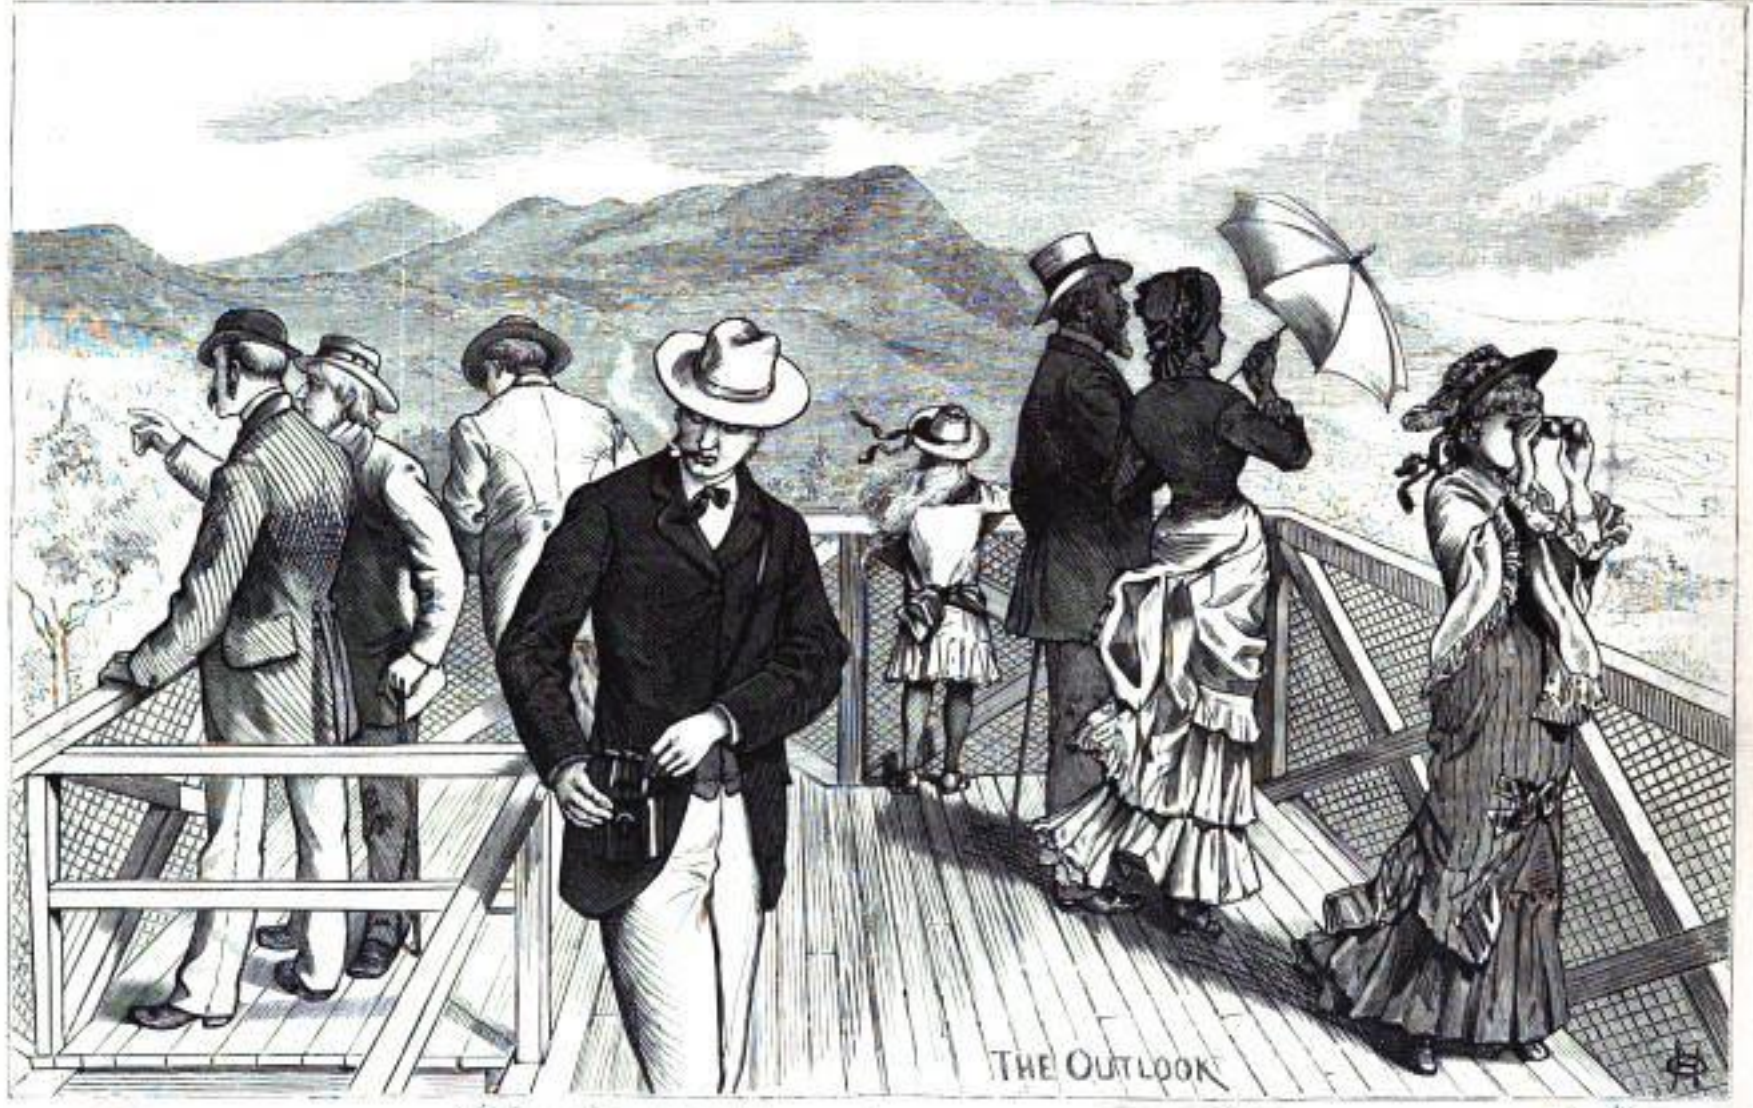
OBITUARY.—Rev. Samuel Hanson Cox, D.D., a famous Presbyterian divine, died in New York, October 4th, aged 86; M. Jacques Offenbach, the musical composer, at Paris, October 5th, aged 61; Professor Benjamin Pierce, F.R.S., LL.D., the eminent mathematician and astronomer, for forty-seven years a professor in Harvard College, at Boston, on October 6th, aged 72; Samuel Verplanck Hoffman, a retired lawyer and descendant of an old Knickerbocker family, at New York City, October 6th, aged 72.

THE report that Mr. Fawcett, the English Postmaster-General, contemplates a visit to this country during the recess of Parliament is corroborated by the London correspondent of the Manchester Guardian. It is Mr. Fawcett's intention to devote the recess to the question of telegraphic reform, including sixpenny telegrams in London, more efficient service on Sundays and the development of telephonic communication. In pursuance of his investigations, it is Mr. Fawcett's wish, if possible, to visit New York and to make a personal inspection of the telegraph service in this city.

THE mausoleum of the late Mark Hopkins, just completed, has cost, with two or three exceptions, more than any public or private structure in Sacramento. The tomb proper is twenty feet long, sixteen feet wide and twelve feet high. It is built of huge red granite blocks from the Sierra Nevada, some of which, it is said, weighed in the rough about thirty-six tons. They are doweled and jogaled together on the plan pursued in building the Eddystone Lighthouse. Black granite is used to some extent in the ornamentation, and the style of the coping is Egyptian. The great stones forming the doors are opened by a complicated system of locks and bolts.

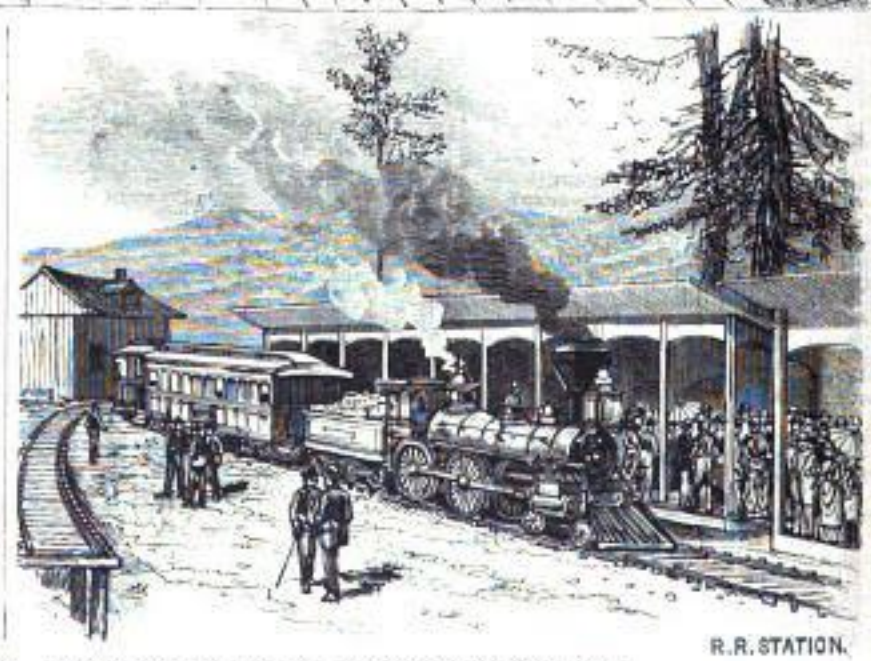


PRESIDENT HAYES has been cordially received in Oregon. On the way from Vancouver to Dalles, his party stopped at the Upper Cascades on the Columbia River and inspected the new canal, where a salute of thirty-seven blasts was fired. After leaving Dalles the party visited the "Narrows," where the waters of the Columbia rush in through a 200-foot channel between walls of solid rock, and attempts to cast rocks across were unsuccessfully made, the President, however, making the best throw by several feet. On the trip up the river to Umatilla, the party, under the leadership of Mrs. Hayes, formed a choir and spent two hours or more in singing. At Walla Walla, in Washington Territory, the reception was especially hearty, all the streets being decorated, and thousands of people uniting in the welcome of the guests.



SENATORS ANTHONY and Burnside, Mrs. Harriet Prescott Spofford and Mr. James Parton were among the guests at the marriage of the only daughter of Major Ben Perley Poore to Mr. Frederick Moseley, the son of a Newburyport banker. The wedding took place in Major Poore's ancestral mansion at Indian Hill Farm, among the hills of Essex, Mass. The house—in which the bride was born—is a hundred years old, and the property has been in the family over two hundred years. The parlor has the wide panelling and carved woodwork of the Governor's room in the old Province House of Boston, where the Colonial Governors resided. The carved white-marble mantel was taken from the Peter Stuyvesant mansion in New York.

DR. W. A. HALLOCK, the founder of the American Tract Society, died October 24. As secretary of the Society he edited 4,000 distinct works, of which 881 are volumes. He had much to do with the printing, by the Society's aid at foreign mission stations, of nearly 4,000 additional publications in 145 languages or dialects. He also for many years edited the American Messenger. He wrote several volumes and some excellent tracts, of which in all about 1,400,000 copies have been circulated. Besides this work of editing and authorship, he conducted the entire correspondence of the publishing and foreign departments of the society, and had the direction of its extensive manufacturing operations. For forty-five years he scarcely allowed himself even a vacation of a few days, Summer or Winter.



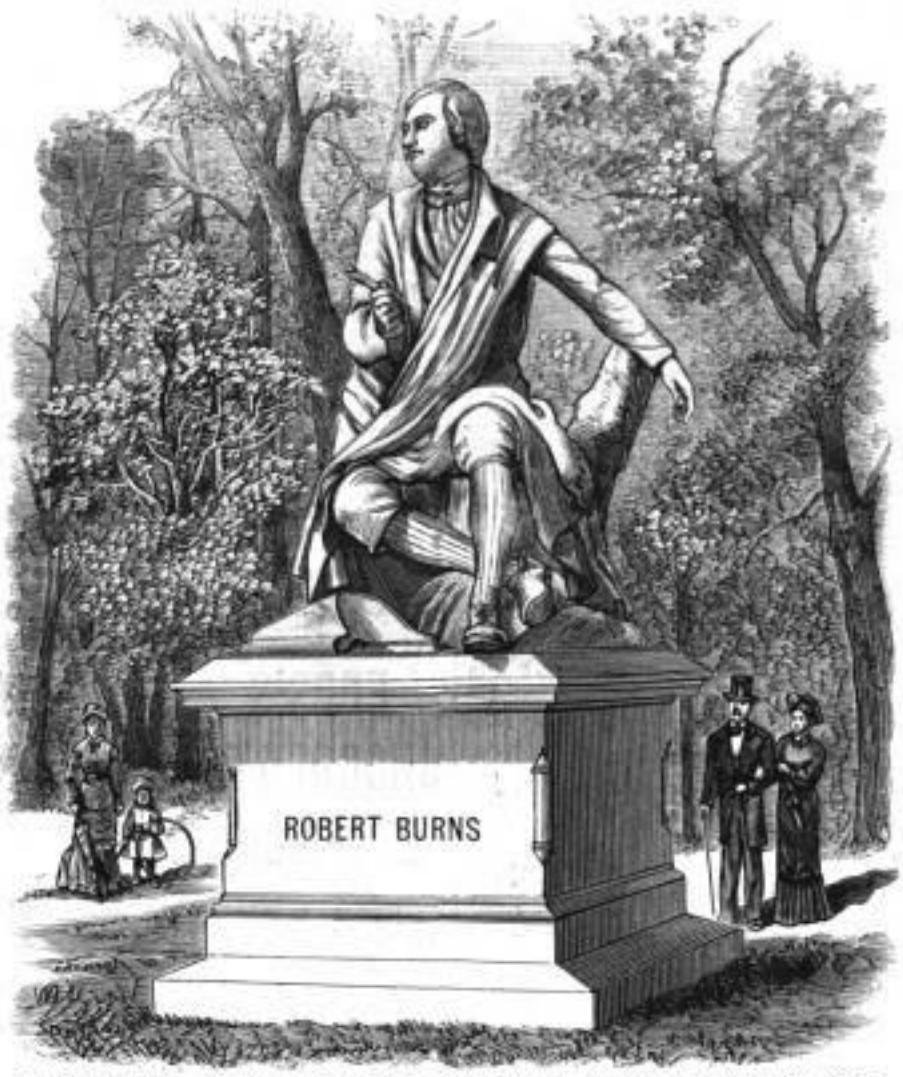
MR. F. J. CAMPBELL, the blind man who recently ascended Mont Blanc, is not an Englishman, as has been stated, but a native of Tennessee. He lost his sight when about three years old, was educated in the institution of his native State, and for a number of years was at the head of the musical department of the Perkins Institution for the Blind at South Boston. Eleven years ago he went to Germany to perfect himself in music, where he remained a couple of years. On his way home he stopped in England to visit the schools for the blind in that country. He found them much inferior to our own. He was fortunate enough to make the acquaintance of influential people, who were interested in the higher education of this unfortunate class. These friends not only listened to Mr. Campbell's views, but cordially aided him in opening a school according to his plans. This institution—the Royal Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind—although so young, is now permanently established and in a flourishing condition. It has the patronage of the Queen and others of the royal family and many of the nobility. The Duke of Westminster is its president. It has been under Mr. Campbell's management from the first, and to him is due its remarkable success. He is a man of wonderful energy, and his Semmer's feat, the ascent of Mont Blanc, is characteristic of the man. His school is at Upper Norwood, near Sydenham and the Crystal Palace, and it would well repay any American visiting London to make it a visit.

Digitized by Google

MARYLAND.—ATTRACTIONS OF PENN-MAR PARK AND HIGH ROCK, IN WASHINGTON COUNTY.
FROM SKETCHES BY D. EMMERT.—SEE PAGE 127.

Digitized by Google

THE BURNS STATUE IN CENTRAL PARK.



SIR JOHN STEEL'S statue of Robert Burns, which was unveiled in Central Park, in this city, October 2d, in the presence of a great crowd of spectators, fronts upon the Mall from the west, opposite the statue of Sir Walter Scott, by the same sculptor. The latter has well chosen to represent the great Scotch peasant-poet at the time of the composition of the beautiful poem, "To Mary in Heaven," and as he was said to have been found, after his wanderings about his farm, on the night preceding the third anniversary of the death of Mary Campbell, gazing at dawn upon a star. Permissible liberty has been taken with the facts of the case, and the poet is shown seated on the large stump of an elm-tree, the forking arms of which lend support to his form. His head is thrown up and back to the left, and, pen in hand, he looks at the star. His right arm, in whose hand is the quill, rests in a cramped position on the right and higher branch of the stump. Around his body are wrapped the heavy folds of his plaid, out of which his left arm projects and rests listlessly upon the left branch, the well-given hand falling inert. The left leg is extended, the foot projecting an inch or so over the edge of the pedestal. The right leg is bent, and, passing under the left, lies easily, with the sole turned up on the spread of the tree-trunk, where it meets the ground. At the poet's feet, to the left, is a scroll, on which is written a part of the poem, "To Mary in Heaven":

"Thou lingering star, with less'ning ray,
That lov'st to greet the early morn,
Again thou usherest in the day,
My Mary from my soul was torn."

The first five words of the last line of the quotation are hidden by the turn of the scroll. By the latter is a plowshare, typifying the poet's daily avocation. Burns is clad in a high-collared, long-tailed coat, which buttons up to the neck, but is thrown open. The plaid passes over the left shoulder, around the back, under the right arm, and falls over each thigh nearly to the ground. About the poet's neck is a many-folded neckcloth. He wears knee-breeches of corduroy, the stockings are ribbed and the low-cut shoes hobnailed. The face is said to have been taken from Nasmyth's portrait, and the features express a complete abstraction from all near-by surroundings.

The statue is nine feet in height, and stands on a fine pedestal of Aberdeen granite, six feet three inches high. The base measures eight feet four and a half inches by nine feet eight and a half inches. At the four corners of the die are half-columns. The granite is richer in color than that from the quarries which supports the Scott statue. In the front of the die are cut and gilded the letters "Robert Burns," and at the back is the inscription, "Presented to the City of New York by admirers of Scotia's Peasant Bard, on the 121st anniversary of his birth."

The ceremonies of unveiling, in which the representatives of several Caledonian societies and Burns clubs participated, were full of interest. The statue was presented to the City by John Paton, chairman of the Burns Monument Committee, and was accepted by Mayor Cooper in a short address. An oration was then delivered by George William Curtis. A more picturesque scene could scarcely be imagined than that visible from the platform. Directly before the speaker stood the Caledonians in all the glory of bonnets, plumes, kilts, tartans and trews. The varied colors and designs of the tartans showed the presence of descendants of many different clans. The broad red and black bars of the Rob Roy tartan, contrasted with the green, blue and yellow of the Stuart clan, while the variegated checks and colors of the MacKenzies and Campbells appeared side by side. Each tartan was pinned on the shoulder by a silver brooch, containing either the lion or thistle of Scotland, or a huge cairngorm. The sporrans, or pouches, with their long hair fringes, and the dirks, with curiously carved handles, added to the æsthetic elements of the costume, while the glimpse of hairy, muscular legs visible between the kilts and stockings spoke well for the physical development of the Scottish race. Beyond the treble line of fiercely upright plumes were seats filled principally with women, whose brilliant costumes peeped out here and there underneath the host of sunshades that looked like a grove of gigantic mushrooms. Outside the seats was gathered a great crowd, upon which the statue of Scott looked down benignantly, with head half-bowed, as if joining in the homage to his brother poet; and on the very outskirts of the vast group carriages had paused, whose occupants leaned eagerly forward to catch such words as they might of the eloquent tributes paid to Burns.

NEW YORK CITY.—BRONZE STATUE OF ROBERT BURNS, UNVAILED IN CENTRAL PARK, OCTOBER 2D.

HON. BENJAMIN DEAN, K. T.

SIR BENJAMIN DEAN, of Boston, the newly-elected Most Eminent Grand Master of the Grand Encampment of the United States, is a gentleman well qualified to fill the position, and the Knights Templar may be congratulated that the mantle has fallen on one so worthy. He is a fine-looking gentleman of fifty-six, though he does not look a day over fifty. Sir Knight Dean is not a native of this country, though he has resided here and made this his home for many years. He was born at Clitheroe, England, in 1824. His father brought him to this country when a mere child. At first the family resided in Lowell, Mass. His education was completed at Dartmouth College, New Hampshire. He returned to Lowell to study law, and after being admitted to the Bar continued to practice there, and later in Boston, where he now lives. He was a member of the Massachusetts State Senate several times, and also of the Boston City Government. He was a member of the Forty-fifth Congress of the United States. He became a Mason in 1854, a Knight Templar in 1855, and later, Grand Commander of the Grand Commandery of Massachusetts and Rhode Island (the two were united), then Grand Captain-General and Generalissimo of the Grand Encampment of the United States. He is Deputy for Massachusetts of the Supreme Council of Northern Jurisdiction of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite.

The twenty-first Triennial Conclave of the Grand Encampment Knights Templar of the United States was held in Chicago, beginning August 17th, and was the subject of very complete illustration in this paper. At that time the statistics of Templarism for 1877-1880 showed the following totals:

Number of Grand Commanderies constituent to the Grand Encampment (same for each year of the triennial)		31
Number of their Subordinates	1878..	466
" " " "	1879..	558
" " " "	1880..	552
Number knighted therein	1878..	2,705
" " "	1879..	2,681
" " "	1880..	2,780
Number of members (Sir Knights)	1878..	46,833
" " " " "	1879..	47,517
" " " " "	1880..	47,089
Number of Commanderies Subordinate to the Grand Encampment (in thirteen States and Territories)	1878..	21
Number in	1879..	22
" "	1880..	34
Number knighted	1878..	61
" "	1879..	102
" "	1880..	102
Number of members	1878..	1,429
" " "	1879..	1,476
" " "	1880..	1,320
Total number of Sir Knights returned as affiliated, July, 1880		48,409
Add for delinquents, taking the number as reported last year		2,485
Enrolled Knights in the United States, August 1st, 1880		50,894

JUDGE GEORGE W. LINDSAY, K. OF P.

JUDGE GEORGE W. LINDSAY, who was elected Supreme Chancellor Knights of Pythias of the World at the session of the Supreme Lodge held in St. Louis, Mo., in August last, is a native of Baltimore, where he was born, May 10th, 1826. After leaving school he served an apprenticeship at printing, and continued in the business until 1857,

HON. BENJAMIN DEAN,
GRAND MASTER OF KNIGHTS TEMPLAR OF THE UNITED STATES.
FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MARSHALL.

JUDGE GEORGE W. LINDSAY,
SUPREME CHANCELLOR KNIGHTS OF PYTHIAS OF THE WORLD.
FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY PERKINS.

VIRGINIA.—EASTERN PORTICO OF THOMAS JEFFERSON'S OLD HOME AT MONTICELLO.

VIRGINIA.—WESTERN PORTICO OF THOMAS JEFFERSON'S OLD HOME AT MONTICELLO.

SEE PAGE 123.

Digitized by Google

when, on account of failing health and the desire for more active employment, he went into the real estate business. In 1871 he was elected Judge of the Orphans-Court of Baltimore for the term of four years, and is now serving his third term. From early manhood he has been connected with the Masonic Fraternity, Odd Fellows, Red Men, Knights of Pythias, and other benevolent organizations, and has filled most of the important positions in each of these Orders. Judge Lindsay has also occupied honorable positions in the public and financial circles of Maryland and Baltimore. He is a man of tireless energy, and retains an active working membership in the organizations he has united with.

Upon his return to Baltimore at the close of the session of the Supreme Lodge, he was received with an ovation by the lodges and associations of the Knights of Pythias in the city.

The Order was organized February 19th, 1864, in Washington, and in seven years after its organization it numbered 78,297 members. In 1871 it adopted the endowment rank, and its membership quickly increased. It has accomplished great results in the alleviation of suffering, and in charity and benevolence.

The membership in the several Grand Jurisdictions, according to the reports submitted at the last session of the Supreme Lodge, for the year closing December 31st, 1879, aggregated 87,715.

Glass-making in Belgium.

THE Exposition now under way in Brussels has drawn together some very remarkable specimens of the handiwork of wonderfully busy people. In no branch of manufacture, however, are they so advanced as in that of window and plate-glass. The number of hands employed in the manufacture in the different countries is estimated as follows: France, 25,000; Austria, 60,000; Belgium, 12,000, and the United States about 12,000. Neither France nor Germany can compete with the Belgians in the production of window-glass. Belgian workmen are, from childhood, accustomed to glass making; and as dexterity is the essential point, this is one great reason of the superiority of their product. In the province of Hainault, glass making is hereditary, and the secrets of the Venetian workmen have come down directly to the present generation. Belgium now makes annually from fifteen to sixteen millions of square metres, nine-tenths of which is exported. Yet, strange to say, the manufacturing process remains about the same as two hundred years ago, although the introduction of improved apparatus has, of course, facilitated it. Specimens of plates four metres twelve centimetres by four metres fifty-six centimetres are exhibited at the Exposition. France can only turn out small pieces; and England, we are informed, has not the sand to enable its manufacturers to compete with the Belgians.

English Workingmen's Societies.

WORKINGMEN'S societies in England grow to enormous proportions, possibly because, in addition to their trades-union features, they take the place of the mutual aid and beneficial associations so common in this country. Four of the great English societies—the engineers, iron founders, boiler-makers and steam-engine makers—have nearly eighty thousand members, with incomes amounting to over one million dollars a year. They paid out in 1879, more than twice as much, chiefly for the benefit of members who were sick or out of work. A million of dollars was spent on the unemployed, mostly in form of donations, but a large amount for traveling expenses. A quarter of a million was awarded to men on strike, but this was only one-eighth of the whole amount distributed, the societies not encouraging struggles with employers, except in rare cases. The administration of the affairs of these and of co-operative societies in England is remarkable for economy and honesty, vast corporations being managed for years with quite as much success as attends the business ventures of merchants and bankers supposed to be specially qualified for such undertakings.

Fees in England.

BY the English tax law, if anybody leaves you $500 you have to pay $10, and if he dies without a will, you will then have to pay $15 to get this $500. The Government fee on a $50,000 legacy is $1,000, and $1,500 if there be no will; and if the legacy be $1,000,000, then the Queen's fee is $27,500, or, without a will, more than $100,000. If you study and become a barrister, the admission costs you $250, or as much as you are likely to earn the first year. When you graduate in medicine you pay $50. If you become a mere notary public to administer oaths it costs you $150. When you execute a lease to rent your house for anything above $100 a year, you pay about seventy cents. If you want arms and crest on your carriage, you pay $11, and if you get these arms "granted" to you, and in a measure fully recognized, you have to pay $50 license. One carriage is taxed $31 a year. Your dog costs you $1.05 a year. For a license to carry a gun you pay $2.50 a year. The tax for every male servant is $4.

Boston a City of Statues.

BOSTON is rapidly becoming a city of statues. Beginning at Beacon Hill, Horace Mann and Daniel Webster meet the eye as one climbs his way to the ancient State house. In front of the City Hall, Benjamin Franklin and Josiah Quincy keep watch over the City Fathers. Charles Sumner looks serenely over the stretch of landscape known as the Public Garden. In Park Square the statue of Lincoln in the act of emancipating the slave arrests the attention of the passer by. Within sight of Faneuil Hall, in the open space below Cornhill called Dock Square, the statue of Samuel Adams graces historic ground. A few steps away, in Scollay's Square, the statue of Gov. Winthrop will soon add its attraction to what has hitherto been so much vacant space. The latest step in what seems to be a general movement to honor those whose achievements have given fame to Boston is to erect a statue to Theodore Parker. A legacy of five thousand dollars exists for this purpose, and his friends seem inclined to double the amount and furnish a fitting tribute to his memory.

SARATOGA'S NEW RAILROAD.

THE beautiful lake at Saratoga is at last about to be brought into direct communication with the "village," and the thousands who annually sojourn at this most unique of watering-places will be enabled, in the coming season, to run out to the lake in the caressing easy-chair of a drawing-room car running upon the newest and most improved thing in steel rails, and drawn by the newest and most improved thing in locomotives. There are over three hundred men at work on the line at present, and everything requisite for the equipment of a first-class railroad is in stock. The line commences at Lake Avenue, and, taking a northerly direction, cuts through the Empire Spring Park, along the valley to the Excelsior Springs, thence past the White Sulphur Springs to the Bear Swamp, striking the Lake south of Stafford's Bridge, and on to the Briggs House. One pleasing feature in connection with the new line is, that it in no wise interferes with the avenue and delightful drives so well known to the frequenters of "sunny Saratoga."

FRANK LESLIE'S SUNDAY MAGAZINE

For November is one of the strongest numbers yet issued. It opens with an elaborate article on the Greek Church in Russia and Siberia, by the Rev. Henry Lansdell, of England, treating of the geography, history, doctrines, rites and ceremonies, constitution and government, missions and schisms, of the Russian Church. The article is fully illustrated. A portrait of Miss Jean Ingelow accompanies a critical review of her poetic genius. The recent murder of Dr. Justin W. Parsons, in connection with mission work in Turkey, is made the subject of an interesting article by the Rev. Daniel Edwards. A portrait of Dr. Parsons accompanies the article. The Old Testament portrait and sketch is, this month, of Jephthah; and Aretas, King of Arabia, is Mr. Herbert Lee's subject for the Gentile Rulers of Scripture. Mr. Godfrey A. Hudson has an extremely interesting paper on the Empire of the Incas, which is fully illustrated. A portrait and sketch of that old disciple of the church militant, John Knox, is given, and the Rev. Ross C. Houghton contributes another of his readable articles on Eastern Customs, the subject this time being "Marriage in China." The serials, "Hester Morgan's Husband" and "Maid Marjory," are continued, and the short stories are of excellent quality. Considerable poetry of a high order is given this month. The late Rev. Dr. Adams has his portrait accompanying his obituary notice. In the Editor's Portfolio the questions of Sunday Excursions is once more alluded to. A splendid hymn for the harvest or Thanksgiving celebration concludes one of the best numbers of this popular magazine yet issued.

FUN.

A CINCINNATI man had his portrait painted in Paris. His friends complained to him that it was much too old. "That's what I ordered," said he. "It will save the expense of another one ten years from now."

MAJOR DUNNUP: "Awf'lly dull down here, isn't it, Miss Maria?" Miss Maria. "Do you think so? Why don't you go, then? You're a bachelor, and have only yourself to please." Major Dunnup. "Only myself to please! You don't know what a doosed difficult thing that is to do."

'IT'S NOT MADNESS, MUM, IT'S MEAT!"—Lady to dead butcher: "Well, Mr. Smallbones, how do you find yourself to day?" Smallbones. "Well, I'm pretty well used up, mum. Every rib's gone, they've almost tore me to pieces for my shoulders, and I never had such a run on my legs."

THE Greenbackers hammer away on the Republicans at one time, and on the Democrats at another. They remind one of the man who used to come home late, and his own door having no knocker he got into the habit of using the knockers on the doors of his neighbors, saying: 'Don't let me disturb you. My people are asleep, and I want to wake 'em up. Don't let me disturb you at all."

OLD Mr Barnes was given to boasting of his religious standing. In prayer-meeting the other evening he said: "Yes, brothers and sisters, I feel as though I was put here to point the way to heaven." Before he could say more, Mrs Burnwell spoke out. "Well, Brother Barnes, I hope you will stay here and point long after the rest of us are safe in heaven." Barnes scarcely knew how to take her.

IN an action that was recently tried in an English court, when the question in dispute was as to the quality and condition of a gas-pipe that had been laid down many years before, a witness stated that it was an old pipe, and therefore out of condition. The judge remarking that "people do not necessarily get out of condition by being old," the witness promptly answered: "They do my lord, if buried in the ground."

MRS. PARTINGTON RETURNS FROM THE SEASIDE. "Yes I've been to a seaside retort. I have had my Summer extortion, and I must confess my anticipations surpassed my expectations. To people in indignant circumstances the recommendations might be satisfactory, but it is beyond my reprehension how people of effulgence—people who have luguterious homes, surmounted by all that embezzles civilized life—can put up in such caverns. They must have invested tastes."

THE harvest moon had just bid good-by to the Atlantic Ocean and was pushing its round, cool face above the eastern horizon. "Ah, Clementine," said he, softly, "you rising effulgence is but a faint emblem of the depth of my affection." "I know; you told me last night your heart was full, and the moon is just full to-night. Don't tell it all over again, please." "But, my dear—" "Yes, this is all very pretty, but mother says you're too young. There's just the nicest rich widower coming to visit at our house, and please don't come again till he goes." The young man curbs his ambition and concludes to let his mustache grow. This being called "young" is one too many for him.

A CAMBRIDGE mother sent her small boy into the country, and after a week of anxiety has received this letter: "I got here all right, and forgot to write before, it is a very nice place to have fun. A fellow and I went out in a boat, and the boat tipped over, and a man got me out, and I was so full of water I didn't know nothin' for a good long while. The other boy has got to be buried after they find him. His mother come from Chelsea, and she cries all the time. A horse kicked me over and I have got to have some money to pay a doctor for doin' my head. We are going to set an old barn on fire to-night, and I should smile if we don't have bully fun. I lost my watch and I am very sorry. I shall bring home some mud turtles and I shall bring home a tame woodchuck if I can get 'em in my trunk."

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE

FOR ABUSE OF ALCOHOL.

JOHN P. WHEELER, M.D., of Hudson, N.Y., says: "I have given it with present decided benefit, in a case of innutrition of the brain from abuse of alcohol."

THE HUMAN HAIR.—Many persons abuse this delicate and beautiful ornament by burning it with alcoholic soaker and plastering it with grease, which has no affinity for the skin and is not absorbed. Barnett's Cocoaine, a compound of Cocoanut Oil, etc., is unrivaled as a dressing for the hair—is readily absorbed, and is peculiarly adapted to its various conditions, preventing its falling off and promoting its healthy growth.

THE ST. NICHOLAS is one of the best conducted and most universally popular hotels in the United States. The policy of management is broad and generous, and of a kind that gives full equivalent for the standard of prices.

IF you suffer from looseness of the bowels, ANGOSTURA BITTERS will surely cure you. Beware of counterfeits, and ask your grocer or druggist for the genuine article, prepared by Dr. J. G. B. Siegert & Sons.

ONE of the greatest charms of DR. BROWNING'S TONIC AND ALTERATIVE is the small size of the dose. The various delicate combinations of drugs are concentrated in the most careful manner, and finally brought together by a series of original processes; consequently the dose is only one teaspoonful for an adult, and smaller in proportion for children. It is taken once before each meal. Last, but not least, a 50-cent bottle lasts ten days, while a $1 bottle lasts twenty-four days. For sale by the Proprietor, W. Champion Browning, 3117 Arch Street, Philadelphia, and all Druggists.

FISK & HATCH,
Bankers,
AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT BONDS,
And other desirable Investment Securities,
No. 5 Nassau St., New York,

Buy and sell all issues of Government Bonds, in large or small amounts, at current market prices, and will be pleased to furnish information in reference to all matters connected with investments in Government Bonds.

We are prepared to give information in regard to first-class Railway Securities, and to execute orders for the same.

Buy and sell all marketable Stocks and Bonds on commission, at the Stock Exchange and in the open market.

Receive accounts of Banks, Bankers, Merchants and others, and allow interest on daily balances; and for those keeping accounts with us we collect United States coupons, and registered interest, and other coupons, dividends, etc., and credit without charge.

☞ We give special attention to orders from Banks, Bankers, Institutions and investors out of the city, by Mail or Telegraph, to buy or sell Government Bonds, State and Railroad Bonds, Bank Stocks, Railroad Stocks, and other securities.

We have issued the Seventh Edition of "Memoranda Concerning Government Bonds," copies of which can be had on application.

FISK & HATCH.

EPPS'S CHOCOLATE ESSENCE.

Product of a special refining process. It is Chocolate devoided of its over-richness and substantiality. Sugarless, and, when made, of the consistency of coffee. An afternoon Chocolate. Each packet is labelled JAMES EPPS & Co., Homœopathic Chemists, London.

(A Medicine, not a drink,) contains Hops, Buchu, Mandrake, Dandelion, and the Purest and Best Medical Qualities of all other Bitters.

Is a preventive and cure for Weakness and General Debility, for Fever and Ague, and all Kidney and Liver Diseases.

A little Hop Bitters saves big doctors bills, and "$500 will be paid for a case they will not cure or help."

HOP BITTERS MFG. CO., Rochester, N. Y., and Toronto, Ont.

Morrow's Colorific
Will change hair to a Brown or Black. One preparation easily applied. Contains no poisonous ingredients. This signature on the wrapper. Jos. F. Morrow
Sold by all druggists. Depot, 10 Frankfort St., New York.

Amusements.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC. SEASON 1880-81.

MR. MAPLESON has the honor to announce that the OPERA SEASON will commence on MONDAY, OCTOBER 18th. The prospectus of the arrangements are now ready.

Box Office will open for the sale of tickets on WEDNESDAY, OCT. 13th.

Extra Dry Quality—The Finest in the Market.

BOLLINGER CHAMPAGNE
BRAND ON CORK.
FOR SALE BY
ACKER, MERRALL & CONDIT.
PARK & TILFORD.

NO MORE RHEUMATISM

GOUT OR GRAVEL. Schlumberger is the only patentee in FRANCE. L. A. Parle, 102 W. 14th St., N.Y., his only agent for the celebrated French Salicylates, which relieve at once, cure in four days, without dangerous consequences, their purity being controlled according to French laws by the Board of Pharmacy of Paris. Beware—The genuine has red seal and signature of agent on each box. $1, postpaid. Send stamp for pamphlet. Thousands of references.

KARL HUTTER'S
PATENT
Lightning Bottle Stoppers.
Also a Full Assortment of
LAGER & WEISS BEER BOTTLES,
With or without Stoppers, on hand.
Special attention paid to orders with name blown in the bottles.
A Large Selection of Bottlers' Supplies.
KARL HUTTER, 183 BOWERY, NEW YORK.

SCHMITT & KOEHNE.
Central Park Brewery
AND
Bottling Company.

Brewery, Bottling Department and Office, 150—165 East Fifty-ninth Street, Ice-house and Rock-vaults, Fifty-sixth and Fifty-seventh Street, Avenue A and East River, N. Y.

BOHEMIAN and LAGER BEER.
The finest Beer for family use. The best Shipping Beer in bottles, warranted to keep in any climate for months and years.

Brain and Nerve Food.
VITALIZED PHOS-PHITES.
Composed of the Nerve-giving Principles of the Ox-Brain and Wheat-Germ.
PHYSICIANS HAVE PRESCRIBED 300,000 PACKAGES WITH THE BEST RESULTS IN ALL FORMS OF IMPAIRED VITALITY, MENTAL EXHAUSTION, OR WEAKENED DIGESTION. IT IS THE BEST PREVENTIVE OF CONSUMPTION AND ALL DISEASES OF DEBILITY. IT GIVES REST AND SLEEP TO INFANTS, CHILDREN AND ADULTS, BY STRENGTHENING THE BRAIN AND NERVES WITH THE FOOD THEY ACTUALLY REQUIRE.
For sale by Druggists or mail, $1. F. CROSBY, 664 & 666 Sixth Avenue, New York.

THE WILSON PATENT
Adjustable Chair,
With Thirty Changes of Position. Parlor, Library, Invalid Chair, Child's Crib, Bed or Lounge, combining beauty, lightness, strength, simplicity and comfort. Everything to an exact science. Orders by mail promptly attended to. Goods shipped to any address. C. O. D. Send stamp for Illustrated Circulars. Quote FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER. Address the WILSON ADJUSTABLE CHAIR MANUF'G Co., 661 Broadway, N.Y.

Latest and Best Dictionary Extant!
HANDY, RELIABLE
DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

The most extensive and comprehensive book of its kind ever published. It contains the exact Spelling, Pronunciation and Definition of more than Twenty-five Thousand Words as used by the best Speakers and Writers in America and England.
It also contains a number of
Most Valuable Tables
and other Articles, giving information about WEIGHTS AND MEASURES (in connection with the METRIC SYSTEM); ARBITRATION used in WRITING; FOREIGN WORDS, PHRASES and PROVERBS, &c., making it indispensable to every READER, WRITER and THINKER. Fully Illustrated. Price, 10 Cts. By mail 5 cts. extra. Books at very low prices.
Before ordering Books elsewhere, send for catalogue of standard
THE CHEAPEST BOOK STORE in the WORLD.
Address, AMERICAN BOOK STORE, 241 Broadway, N. Y.

Welling Compressed Ivory Mfg. Co.
No. 831 Centre St., New York.
POOL BALLS, colored and striped same as ivory, 2¼in., $20 a set.
BILLIARD BALLS, 2⅜in., $8 a set, warranted for 12 mos.
Also MARTINGALE RINGS, POKER CHECKS, SLEEVE BUTTONS, HAIR BRUSHES, TOILET MIRRORS, etc.
Established 1853.

"The Black Robe,"
"The Black Robe,"
For this new great serial novel, by the celebrated
WILKIE COLLINS,
SEE
Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper.
Published every Wednesday. Single copies, 10 cents. Annual subscription, $4, postpaid. Sold by all newsdealers.

Read the New Serial Novel,
"THE BLACK ROBE,"
By WILKIE COLLINS,
Now publishing in
FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

TO THE PUBLIC.
BOKER'S BITTERS.
BEWARE OF COUNTERFEITS AND IMITATIONS.
In accordance with the desire frequently expressed, both in the United States and abroad, these Bitters, so long and justly celebrated for their freeness as a cordial, and for their medicinal virtues against all disorders of, or arising from, the digestive organs, will hereinafter be put up and sold not only in quart, but
ALSO IN PINT BOTTLES,
for medicinal, family, traveling, and other purposes. To be had at all the principal druggists', grocers', liquor-merchants', etc. H. FUNKE, Jr., Sole Agent, New York, 78 John Street. Post Office Box 1,929.

Newspaper Advertising Bureau.
FREE!—100-PAGE PAMPHLET, containing complete lists of newspapers and schedules of advertising rates. GEO. P. ROWELL & CO., 10 Spruce St., N.Y.

The OLDEST and BEST of the JUVENILE PUBLICATIONS.

Frank Leslie's
Boys' & Girls' Weekly
is now publishing the following admirable serial stories all beautifully illustrated:
"The Lost Trail; Or, On the Wild North Border." By W. H. THOMAS.
"'Swoppy'; Or, The Adventures of a Yankee Boy." By NAT USHER.
"Trap-door Tom."
"Jim Jeffs: Or, The Mystery of the House by the River." By NYM ROGET.
"Left to Himself." By COMMODORE AH LOOF.
"The Pearl of the Sahara; Or, The Adventures of Two American Boys." By COMMODORE ROGET.
"Hal Harkforward and Tom Tallyho's Schooldays." By BRACEBRIDGE HEMYNG (Jack Harkaway).
Sold by all newsdealers. Price 5 cents a copy; $2.50 a year, postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Digitized by Google

Carpets,

NEW FALL STYLES.

WE ARE NOW OFFERING LARGE LINES OF NEW DESIGNS AND STYLES IN CARPETINGS RECEIVED FROM

OUR OWN FACTORIES,

WHICH WILL BE FOUND TO COMBINE TO AN UNUSUAL EXTENT

Elegance in Style and Finish,
Durability in Wear,
and Economy in Prices.

WE ALSO OFFER AN EXTENSIVE ASSORTMENT OF TURKISH, PERSIAN AND EAST INDIAN CARPETS AND RUGS, AND OTHER POPULAR FLOOR COVERINGS, AT EXTREMELY MODERATE RATES.

J. & J. DOBSON,

40 & 42 WEST 14TH STREET, N. Y.,

JOHN VAN GAASBEEK, Manager.

PHILADELPHIA WAREROOMS, 809 & 811 Chestnut Street.

BOSTON WAREROOMS, 525 & 527 Washington Street.

HOPE FOR THE DEAF

Garmore's Artificial Ear Drums

RESTORE THE HEARING and perform the work of the Natural Drum. Remain in position without aid, and are not observable. All Conversation and even whispers heard distinctly. Worn by those using them. Send for descriptive circular. Address CARMORE & CO., S. W. Corner 5th & Race Sts., Cincinnati, O.

KNOW THYSELF.

THE untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase the new medical work published by the PEABODY MEDICAL INSTITUTE, Boston, entitled THE SCIENCE OF LIFE; Or, SELF-PRESERVATION, Exhausted vitality, nervous and physical debility, or vitality impaired by the errors of youth or too close application to business, may be restored and manhood regained.

Two hundredth edition, revised and enlarged, just published. It is a standard medical work, the best in the English language, written by a physician of great experience, to whom was awarded a gold and jeweled medal by the National Medical Association. It contains beautiful and very expensive engravings. Three hundred pages, more than 50 valuable prescriptions for all forms of prevailing diseases, the result of many years of extensive and successful practice, either one of which is worth ten times the price of the book. Bound in French cloth; price only $1, sent by mail, postpaid.

The London Lancet says: "No person should be without this valuable book. The author is a noble benefactor."

An illustrated sample sent to all on receipt of 6 cents for postage.

The author refers, by permission, to Hon. P. A. BISSELL, M.D., President of the National Medical Assoc'n, Address, Dr. W. H. PARKER, No. 4 Bulfinch Street, Boston, Mass. The author may be consulted on all diseases requiring skill and experience.

HEAL THYSELF

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. Address, H. HALLETT & Co., Portland, Maine.

WITH

$5

you can buy a whole

DUCAL BRUNSWICK GOVERNMENT BOND,

Which bonds are issued and secured by the Government, and are redeemed in drawings

THREE TIMES ANNUALLY

until each and every bond is drawn.

THE THREE HIGHEST PRIZES AMOUNT TO

150,000 Reichsmarks,
90,000 "
60,000 "

And bonds not drawing one of the above prizes must draw a Premium of not less than 50 MARKS, as there are No Blanks.

One Reichsmark is equal to about 24 Cents Gold. The next drawing takes place on the 1st of November, 1880.

Country order, sent in REGISTERED LETTERS inclosing $5, will secure one of these bonds for the next drawing, 1st of November.

For circulars and other information address the

INTERNATIONAL BANKING CO.,

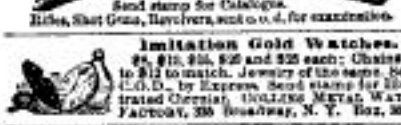
159 Broadway, N. Y. City.

ESTABLISHED SINCE 1874.

N. B.—In writing, please state you saw this in the English Frank Leslie.

My New Illustrated Price List describing over 100 Gold and Silver Waltham Watches sent for a 3c stamp. It tells how I send watches to all parts of U.S. to be examined before paying any money. Unobjectionable references. N. H. White, Jeweler, Newark, N. J.

TAPE-WORM

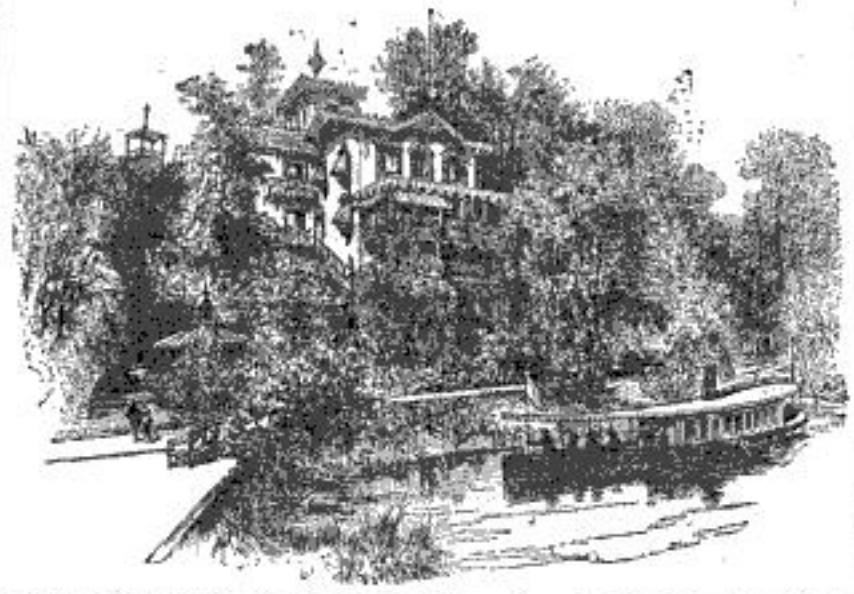


INFALLIBLY CURED with two spoons of medicine in 2-3 hours. For particulars, address, with stamp, H. KICKHORN, 4 St. Mark's Place, New York.

ELGIN WATCHES,

All styles, Gold, Silver and Nickel, $6 to $50. Chains, etc., sent C. O. D. to be examined. Write for Catalogue to STANDARD AMERICAN WATCH CO., PITTSBURGH, PA.

GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa.



Send stamp for Catalogue.
Rifles, Shot Guns, Revolvers, sent C. O. D. for examination.

Imitation Gold Watches.
$5, $10, $15, $20 and $25 each; Chains $1 to $12 to match. Jewelry of the same. Sent C.O.D., by Express. Send stamp for Illustrated Circular. DOLLIER METAL WATCH FACTORY, 398 Broadway, N. Y. Box 3696.

$72 A WEEK. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly Outfit free. Address, TRUE & Co., Augusta, Maine.

FOR SALE,

"INTERLAKEN,"

THE COUNTRY HOME OF THE LATE FRANK LESLIE, ESQ.,

Consisting of 62 acres, situated on LAKE SARATOGA, and extending back to Lake Lonely.

The house contains twelve rooms, gas and water.

The stable, finished in fine woods, has six box-stalls.

Finely appointed billiard-room, and three handsomely furnished sleeping-rooms over coach-house.

Gardener's cottage.

Conservatories profusely stocked with rare plants.

The furniture, steam-yacht, sail and row boats, French omnibus, etc., will be sold with the place.

Apply to

HOMER MORGAN, 2 Pine Street; or,
V. K. STEVENSON, 25 Pine St., and 661 Fifth Av.

H.W. JOHNS' ASBESTOS

LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING, BOILER COVERINGS
Steam Packing. Sheathings. Fireproof Coatings. Cements
Send for Samples, Illustrated Pamphlet and Price List.
H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO. 87 Maiden Lane, N.Y.

DAY'S Kidney PAD

A CURE for the most prevalent and fatal diseases that affect mankind FOUND AT LAST. Internal medicines never did nor never can cure KIDNEY DISEASE. STOP IT NOW; apply Day's Kidney Pad AT ONCE, and be cured of all affections of the Kidneys, Bladder and Urinary Organs. It is the only treatment that will cure NERVOUS AND PHYSICAL DEBILITY, and that distressing complaint, "BACK ACHE." It will assuredly save many times its cost in medicines and plasters, which at best give but temporary relief. Sold by Druggists or sent by mail on receipt of price, $2. Our book, "How a Life Was Saved," giving a history of this new discovery and a large record of total remarkable cures, sent free. Write for it.

DAY KIDNEY PAD CO., Toledo, O.

JUDGE FOR YOURSELF By sending 25c. money or 60c. postage stamps, with age, you will receive by return mail a correct picture of your future husband or wife, with name and date of marriage. Address, W. FOX, Box 38, Fultonville, N.Y.

ETIQUETTE OF VISITING CARDS.—Latest rules for style, uses, turning corners, etc.; mail, 25c. HOWARD & CO., Box 2,928, New York.

MAMMARIAL BALM restores and develops the bust. Warranted sure and safe. Price, $1. NEW ENGLAND MEDICAL INSTITUTE, 24 Tremont Row, Boston, Mass.

CHROMO cards—5 gold chromo, 5 silver chromo, 5 floral chromo, 5 floral motto, with name, 10c; 6 packs 50c. Royal Card Co., Northford, Conn.

40 Lovely Chromo Cards, New Designs just out, with name, 10c. STAR PRINTING CO., Northford, Ct.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address, STINSON & Co., Portland, Maine.

53 Gilt Edge, Chromo, Snowflake, Glass, Lace & Ca Name On 10c. Franklin Prt'g Co., Fair Haven, Ct.

40 New Styles Chromos, with name 10c. 40 Agents samples 10c. Canaan Co., Northford, Ct.

20 Gold and Silver Chromo Cards, with name, 10c., postpaid. G. I. REED & CO., Nassau, N. Y.

$777 A YEAR and expenses to agents. Outfit free. Address, P. O. VICKERY, Augusta, Maine.

50 Elegant Cards, New Chromo, Shells, Gilt-edge, etc., with name, 10c. G. A. SPRING, Northford, Ct.

SCARCE GOODS.—Books, Photos, &c. Sample Catalogue 3c. Paris Book Co., Chicago, Ill.

50 New Style Cards, Lithographed in bright colors, 10c. 60 Agt's Samples 10c. Conn. Card Co., Northford, Ct.

Agents Wanted.

600 Easy, Profitable and Pleasant WAYS TO MAKE MONEY with a capital of 25 cts. to $5, sent on receipt of 30 cts. EBBETS & CO., P. O. Box 2881, NEW YORK.

$350 A MONTH—AGENTS WANTED—75 best selling articles in the world; 1 sample free. Address Jay Bronson, Detroit, Mich.

SALESMEN WANTED $105 A Month and Expenses paid. DRAWING SAMPLES FREE. Send 3c. STAMP to S. FOSTER & CO., Cincinnati, O. CIGARS

Diseases of Live Stock

And their most efficient remedies, including Horses, Cattle, Sheep and Swine, by LLOYD V. TELLOR, M.D. Sold by subscription only. Price $4.50.

Agents Wanted.

Apply for terms and territory to H. C. WATTS & CO., 606 and 608 Minor Street, Philadelphia.

AGENTS WANTED EVERYWHERE to sell the best Family Knitting Machine ever invented. Will knit a pair of stockings, with HEEL and TOE complete, in 30 minutes. It will also knit a great variety of fancy-work for which there is always a ready market. Send for circular and terms to the Twombly Knitting Machine Co., 409 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

HISTORY OF

POLITICAL PARTIES

AND OF THE

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT,

From Colonial Days to the Present Date.

The most Valuable Publication of the age. Entirely Non-Partisan.

Entirely new in design, comprehensive and exhaustive, with beautifully-colored MAPS and DIAGRAMS, showing at a glance the constantly-recurring Political Events of the Country from 1600 to 1880, including a concise Biographical Sketch of all the Presidents, Governors, and other high officials, their popular and electoral vote, causing the mind to imbibe and retain the facts which are given both to the eye and the thought. The most ignorant through this Compendium can be informed upon these subjects, and read with pleasure and ease the researches of years reduced to hours. Should be in every household, school, and library. Issued in Book Form at $3, and as a Chart at $5. AGENTS WANTED everywhere at once. $25 to $75 per week. GRANGER, DAVIS & CO., Pub's, Indianapolis, Ind.

BOOK of Etiquette; Or, How to Behave in Polite Society. Gives rules for polite behavior at all times, including Courtship and Marriage. 25 cents, by mail free. Magician's Guide contains all the best tricks and 30 engravings, 15 cents. Catalogue free of Books, Songs, Plays, Magical Tricks, etc. T. L. DOY, Batavia, Ill.

CANDY

Send one, two, three or five dollars for a retail sample box, etc., by express, of the best Candies in America, put up elegantly, and strictly pure. Refers to all Chicago.

F. GUNTHER, Confectioner, 78 Madison St., Chicago.

20 NEW CHROMO Cards, No 2 alike 10c, or 50 Fancy Cards 10c. With Name. J. B. Husted, Nassau, N. Y.

MUSTACHE AND WHISKERS.

PRINTING PRESSES,

Types and Material. Send two 3c. stamps for catalogue. R. O. WOODS & CO., 49 Federal St., Boston, Mass.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING

Presses and outfits from $3 to $500. Over 7,000 styles of type. Catalogue and reduced price list free. H. HOOVER, Philadelphia, Pa.

The Best, Cheapest and Most Attractive of the Sunday Periodicals!

FRANK LESLIE'S SUNDAY MAGAZINE.

AN ENTERTAINING, EDIFYING AND FAMILY JOURNAL.

The November Number Now Ready.

Opinions of the Press:

"FRANK LESLIE'S SUNDAY MAGAZINE," as represented in the latest number, is still fresh, beautiful and good, and holds its place as the first of its class for the purpose intended. The reader finds a new charm in every number, and its attractiveness grows none the less with its increase of months and years."—Central Protestant, Greensboro, N. C.

"This very interesting magazine is filled with valuable matter and very handsome illustrations. The opening article, 'The Christians in the Turkish Empire,' by Alfred H. Guernsey, is filled with information of value. The other articles are also very interesting. Published at 53 Park Place, New York. Price 15 cents, or $3 per annum."—Albany (N. Y.) Sunday Press.

"This excellent, beautifully illustrated magazine is exactly suited for Sunday reading. It is adapted for old and young alike."—Herald, Guelph, Canada.

"FRANK LESLIE'S SUNDAY MAGAZINE comes to us fresh and readable. Its 120 large pages contain a mass of attractive, useful and interesting matter, profusely illustrated, suitable for everybody."—Newark (N. J.) Sunday Call.

"This attractive and interesting publication furnishes more good and cheap reading for its price—25 cents—than any other magazine published. Frank Leslie's Publishing House, 53, 55 and 57 Park Place, New York."—Burlington (Iowa) Gazette.

Contents of November Number:

"The Greek Church in Russia and Siberia." By Rev. Henry Lansdell. Seven Illustrations.
"Dr. Parsons and Mission Work in Turkey." Three Illustrations.
"The Empire of the Incas." By Godfrey A. Hudson. Seven Illustrations.
"Marriage in China." By Rev. Ross C. Houghton.
"The Story of Queen Esther." Illustrated.
"What Has Christianity Done for Us?"
"Summer Life at Chautauqua Lake." Illustrated.
"The Hans Christian Anderson Monument." Illustrated; etc., etc.
Serial, Short Stories, etc.—"Hester Morgan's Husband," by L. T. Meade (Chapters XXII. to XXIV.) "Maid Marjory," by the Author of "Little Rings" (Chapters XIV. to XIX.) "The Rector," by R. S. Lee; Illustrated. "My Soldier's Grave," by Jane G. Austin; Illustrated. "Two Poems," by Eleanor Kirk; Illustrated, Etc.
Sketches, etc.—"Jean Ingelow;" Illustrated. "Jephthah"; Illustrated. "Elizabeth Woodville"; Illustrated. "Arvia, King of Arabia," by Herbert Lee; Illustrated. "The Niagara of Brent"; Illustrated. "Edward Randolph's Portrait"; Illustrated. "John Knox"; Illustrated. "Mounts Sinai and Horeb"; Illustrated. "How to be Happy." "Lady Grizzel Baillie"; Illustrated. "Grandfather's Bank"; Illustrated. "Speaking the Truth in Love"; Illustrated, Etc., etc.
Poems.—"Denil's Changed Face," by Rev. F. Langbridge. "The Weary Pilgrim to His Soul." "The Mother's Lament," by A. L. A. Smith. "Autumn Song" (Illustrated border). "The Church Month," by Frances Ridley Havergal. "Quatrains from the Persian." "Thoughts in a City Church." "At the Convent Gate," by Austin Dobson. "Is not this the Carpenter?" etc., etc.
Miscellany.—"Jonathan Edwards." "The Oberammergau Passion Play." "Birds with Queer Names." "The Pawnee Indians." "Quiet Working for Christ." "The Revised Bible." "Uri Fisher Felt to Church." "The Turkey." "Strange Warfare." "The Sphinx"; Illustrated. "The Dominican Church of St. Stephen"; Illustrated. "The Wandering Albatross"; Illustrated. "Pagodas"; Illustrated. "The Valley of the Shadow of Death"; Illustrated. "Ancient Monuments in the Island of Cyprus"; Illustrated. "Art in the Cloister"; Illustrated. "Clinging to the Rock," Etc., etc.
"Religious Notes and News." "Editor's Portfolio." "Obituary Notices." "Recreations for Sunday Afternoon." MUSIC—"HARVEST HYMN."

128 Pages, Quarto—100 Illustrations.

Single copies, 25 cents. Subscriptions, $3 a year; six months, $1.50; four months, $1. Postpaid.

SEND 25 CENTS FOR A SPECIMEN COPY.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House, 53, 55 and 57 Park Place, New York.

Digitized by Google

HECKER'S PERFECT BAKING POWDER

PURITY AND STRENGTH GUARANTEED.

AN EXPERIENCE OF OVER THIRTY YEARS IN THE MANUFACTURE OF BAKING POWDER FOR USE IN MAKING SELF-RAISING FLOUR, WARRANTS US IN OFFERING THIS AS A PERFECT BAKING POWDER.

For Sale by all Grocers.

GEORGE V. HECKER & CO.,

CROTON FLOUR MILLS, 205 CHERRY ST., N. Y.

THE ESTEY ORGAN BEST
J. ESTEY & CO. BRATTLEBORO VT.

N.Y. Central & Hudson River R.R.

THE BEST ROUTE EAST OR WEST.

Through Cars between New York or Boston and Chicago or St. Louis.

See NIAGARA FALLS, SARATOGA and the HUDSON.

C. B. MEEKER, General Passenger Agent.

INMAN ROYAL MAIL STEAMERS

For QUEENSTOWN and LIVERPOOL.

NOTICE.—The steamers of this line take Lieutenant Maury's lane routes at all seasons of the year.

CITY OF CHESTER.....Saturday, October 16, 3 P. M.
CITY OF BRUSSELS.....Thursday, October 21, 7 A. M.
CITY OF BERLIN.....Saturday, October 30, 2 P. M.
CITY OF MONTREAL....Thursday, November 4, 6 A. M.

From Pier 27, North River, foot of Charlton St.

Cabin, $80 and $100. Return tickets on favorable terms. Steerage, $28. Drafts at lowest rates.

Saloons, state-rooms, smoking and bathrooms amidships.

These steamers do not carry cattle, sheep or pigs.

JOHN G. DALE, Agent, 31 and 33 Broadway, New York.
G. A. FAULK, 105 South Fourth Street, Philadelphia.
I. H. PALMER, 3 Old State House, Boston.
F. C. BROWN, 32 South Clark Street, Chicago.

The Ladies OF THE White House

OR,

IN THE HOMES OF THE PRESIDENTS

A History of every Administration from Washington to the present time. Includes much Personal and Private history never before published. Agents wanted. For full description address the Publishers, BRADLEY & CO., 65 North Fourth St., Philadelphia, Pa.

NEW CHAMPION

SHOT GUN.

Retail Price.—Thirty Barrels, 12 bore, $14.00; Plain Barrels, 10 bore, $15.00; Twist Barrels, 12 bore, $17.50; Twist Barrels, 10 bore, $19.00. The Frame and Mountings of all these guns are Nickel Plated. This gun possesses many advantages over any single breech-loading gun yet produced in this country. It has a patent axle-stop action with a safety attachment, by means of which it can be opened only when the gun is at half-cock, thus ensuring perfect safety in loading. The workmanship and materials used are first-class; no pains having been allowed to leave the factory until it has been thoroughly inspected. We take great pleasure in offering this gun to the public, and feel able to say it is the best American Single Breech-Loader yet produced. Send stamp for Illustrated Catalogue of Guns, Rifles, Revolvers, and Skates. Address JOSEPH P. LOVELL & SONS, Gun Dealers, Boston, Mass.

COLUMBIA BICYCLE

The Bicycle has proved itself to be a permanent, practical road-vehicle, and the number in daily use is rapidly increasing. Professional and business men, seekers after health or pleasure, all join in bearing witness to its merits. Send 3c. stamp for catalogue with price list and full information.

THE POPE MFG. CO., 59 Summer St., Boston, Mass.

FIRM'S Can for Explosive Fluids.

PATENTED JAN. 21st, 1879.

P. O. Box 4472, New York.

Frank Leslie's

BUDGET.

A MONTHLY VARIETY MAGAZINE,

Spicy and Entertaining.

Each Number contains 98 pages quarto, and over 100 beautiful illustrations.

Published on the 1st of every month, and for sale by all Newsdealers. Annual subscription, $1.50; single copies, 15 cents. Sent postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

EMPTY.

New York Policemen, serving under a commission representing both political parties, find the process of depletion by assessment anything but interesting.

FURS!

We offer a Superb Assortment OF

SEALSKIN SACQUES,
FUR-LINED GARMENTS,
MUFFS, COLLARS, ROBES,
TRIMMINGS, etc.,

Our Own Manufacture, AT

EXTREMELY LOW PRICES

Having made Extensive Purchases OF

SEALSKINS

At Early London Sales,

OUR CUSTOMERS WILL NOT BE REQUIRED TO PAY THE RECENT ADVANCE.

A. T. STEWART & CO.,

Broadway, 4th Ave., 9th & 10th Sts.

FISHERMEN!
TWINES AND NETTING
MANUFACTURED BY
WM. E. HOOPER & SONS, Baltimore, Md.
Send for Price-List, naming your County and State.

14 STOP ORGANS
SUB BASS & Oct. Coupler, 4 Set Reeds, $65
Pianos $125 and upwards, sent on trial. Catalogue free. Address, DANIEL F. BEATTY, Washington, N.J.

DR. SCOTT'S ELECTRIC HAIR BRUSH.

A REMARKABLE INVENTION,

Which has won its way to royal favor in England, been cordially indorsed by the Prince and Princess of Wales, and written upon by the Rt. Hon. W. E. Gladstone, is now brought to the notice of the American public. It cures by natural means, will always do good, never harm, and is a remedy lasting for many years. It should be used daily in place of the ordinary Hair Brush. The Brush Handle is made of a new odorless composition resembling ebony; a combination of substances PRODUCING A PERMANENT ELECTRIC VOLTAIC CURRENT, WHICH ACTS IMMEDIATELY UPON THE HAIR GLANDS AND FOLLICLES. This power can always be tested by a silver coupon which accompanies each Brush.

It is Warranted to

Cure Nervous Headache in 5 minutes!!
Cure Bilious Headache in 5 minutes!!
Cure Neuralgia in 5 minutes!!
Prevent Falling Hair and Baldness!!
Cure Dandruff and Diseases of the Scalp!!
Promptly arrests Premature Grayness!!
Makes the Hair grow Long and Glossy!!
Immediately soothes the weary Brain!!
Money returned if not as represented!!

IT NEVER FAILS TO PRODUCE A RAPID GROWTH OF HAIR ON BALD HEADS, where the Glands and Follicles are not totally destroyed.

Proprietors: The Pall Mall Electric Association of London. New York Branch: 842a Broadway.

[From REV. DR. BRIDGEMAN.]

"Brooklyn, June 1st, 1880.

"Gents: I have never before given a testimonial, but am willing to encourage the use of an honest remedy. I am so pleased with your Hair Brush that I deem it my duty to write you recommending it most cordially. My hair, about a year since, commenced falling out, and I was rapidly becoming bald; but since using the Brush a thick growth of hair has made its appearance, quite equal to that which I had previous to its falling out. I have tried other remedies, but with no success. After the remarkable result I purchased one for my wife, who has been a great sufferer from headache, and she finds it a prompt and infallible remedy. A. C. BRIDGEMAN, D.D."

From the Mayor of Saratoga.

"August 12, 1880.

"I cheerfully testify to the merits of Dr. Scott's Electric Hair Brush. It cures my headaches within a few minutes. I am so pleased with it, I purchased another for my wife. It is an excellent Hair Brush, well worth the price, aside from its curative powers.

JAS. B. CRAFHAM."

"2 Goodwin St., Bradford, England, Dec. 10th, 1879.

"My Aunt writes me they are the greatest blessing to her, as in all cases they relieve her at once. My hair is growing rapidly, the bald place being quite covered. I do think you ought to make these things known, for the benefit of others, as I am convinced it is the best Hair Renewer yet put before the public. Yours truly, J. JEWETT."

"Over 1,300,000 in use. An honest remedy, worthy of all praise."—British Medical Index.

"Round Lake Camp Meeting Grounds, Saratoga Co., N. Y., June 8th, 1880.

"Your Brush is certainly a remarkable cure. I am highly pleased with it. Its effect is most wonderful, and you may be sure I shall recommend it heartily among my friends. It is also a splendid Hair Brush, well worth the money, and will last me for years. REV. J. D. ROGERS, Superintendent."

[From PLINY F. SMITH, Law Publisher.] "218 Fulton St., N. Y., Aug. 31, 1880.

"Dr. Scott—Dear Sir: My wife suffered daily for ten years with terrible headaches. Three able physicians failed to cure her. Your Brush did so the first time she used it, in five minutes, and has never failed since in a single instance. PLINY F. SMITH."

Mr. Smith is a gentleman well known, being one of the promoters of the Midnight Mission in New York.

Over 7,000 similar Testimonials can be seen at our Office.

Remember that this is not a "Metallic" Wire Brush, but made of PURE BRISTLES.

A BEAUTIFUL BRUSH,

Lasting for Years.

Mention this Paper. We will send it Postpaid on receipt of $3, Or by Express, C.O.D., at your expense, with privilege of opening and examining it.

Or request your Druggist or Fancy Store to obtain it for you, from us.

MONEY RETURNED IF NOT AS REPRESENTED.

As soon as you receive the Brush, if not well satisfied with your bargain, write us, and we will return the money. What can be fairer?

This paper will not knowingly publish any humbug, and before advertising the Brush one was placed in the hands of the Editor, with a request to test its merits. We have also placed one in the hands of Mayor Cooper and Postmaster James of New York, as a guarantee of our good faith.

Remittances should be made payable to GEO. A. SCOTT, 842 Broadway, New York. Agents wanted in every town.

They can be made in Checks, Drafts, Post office Orders or Currency, in Registered or Non registered Letters.

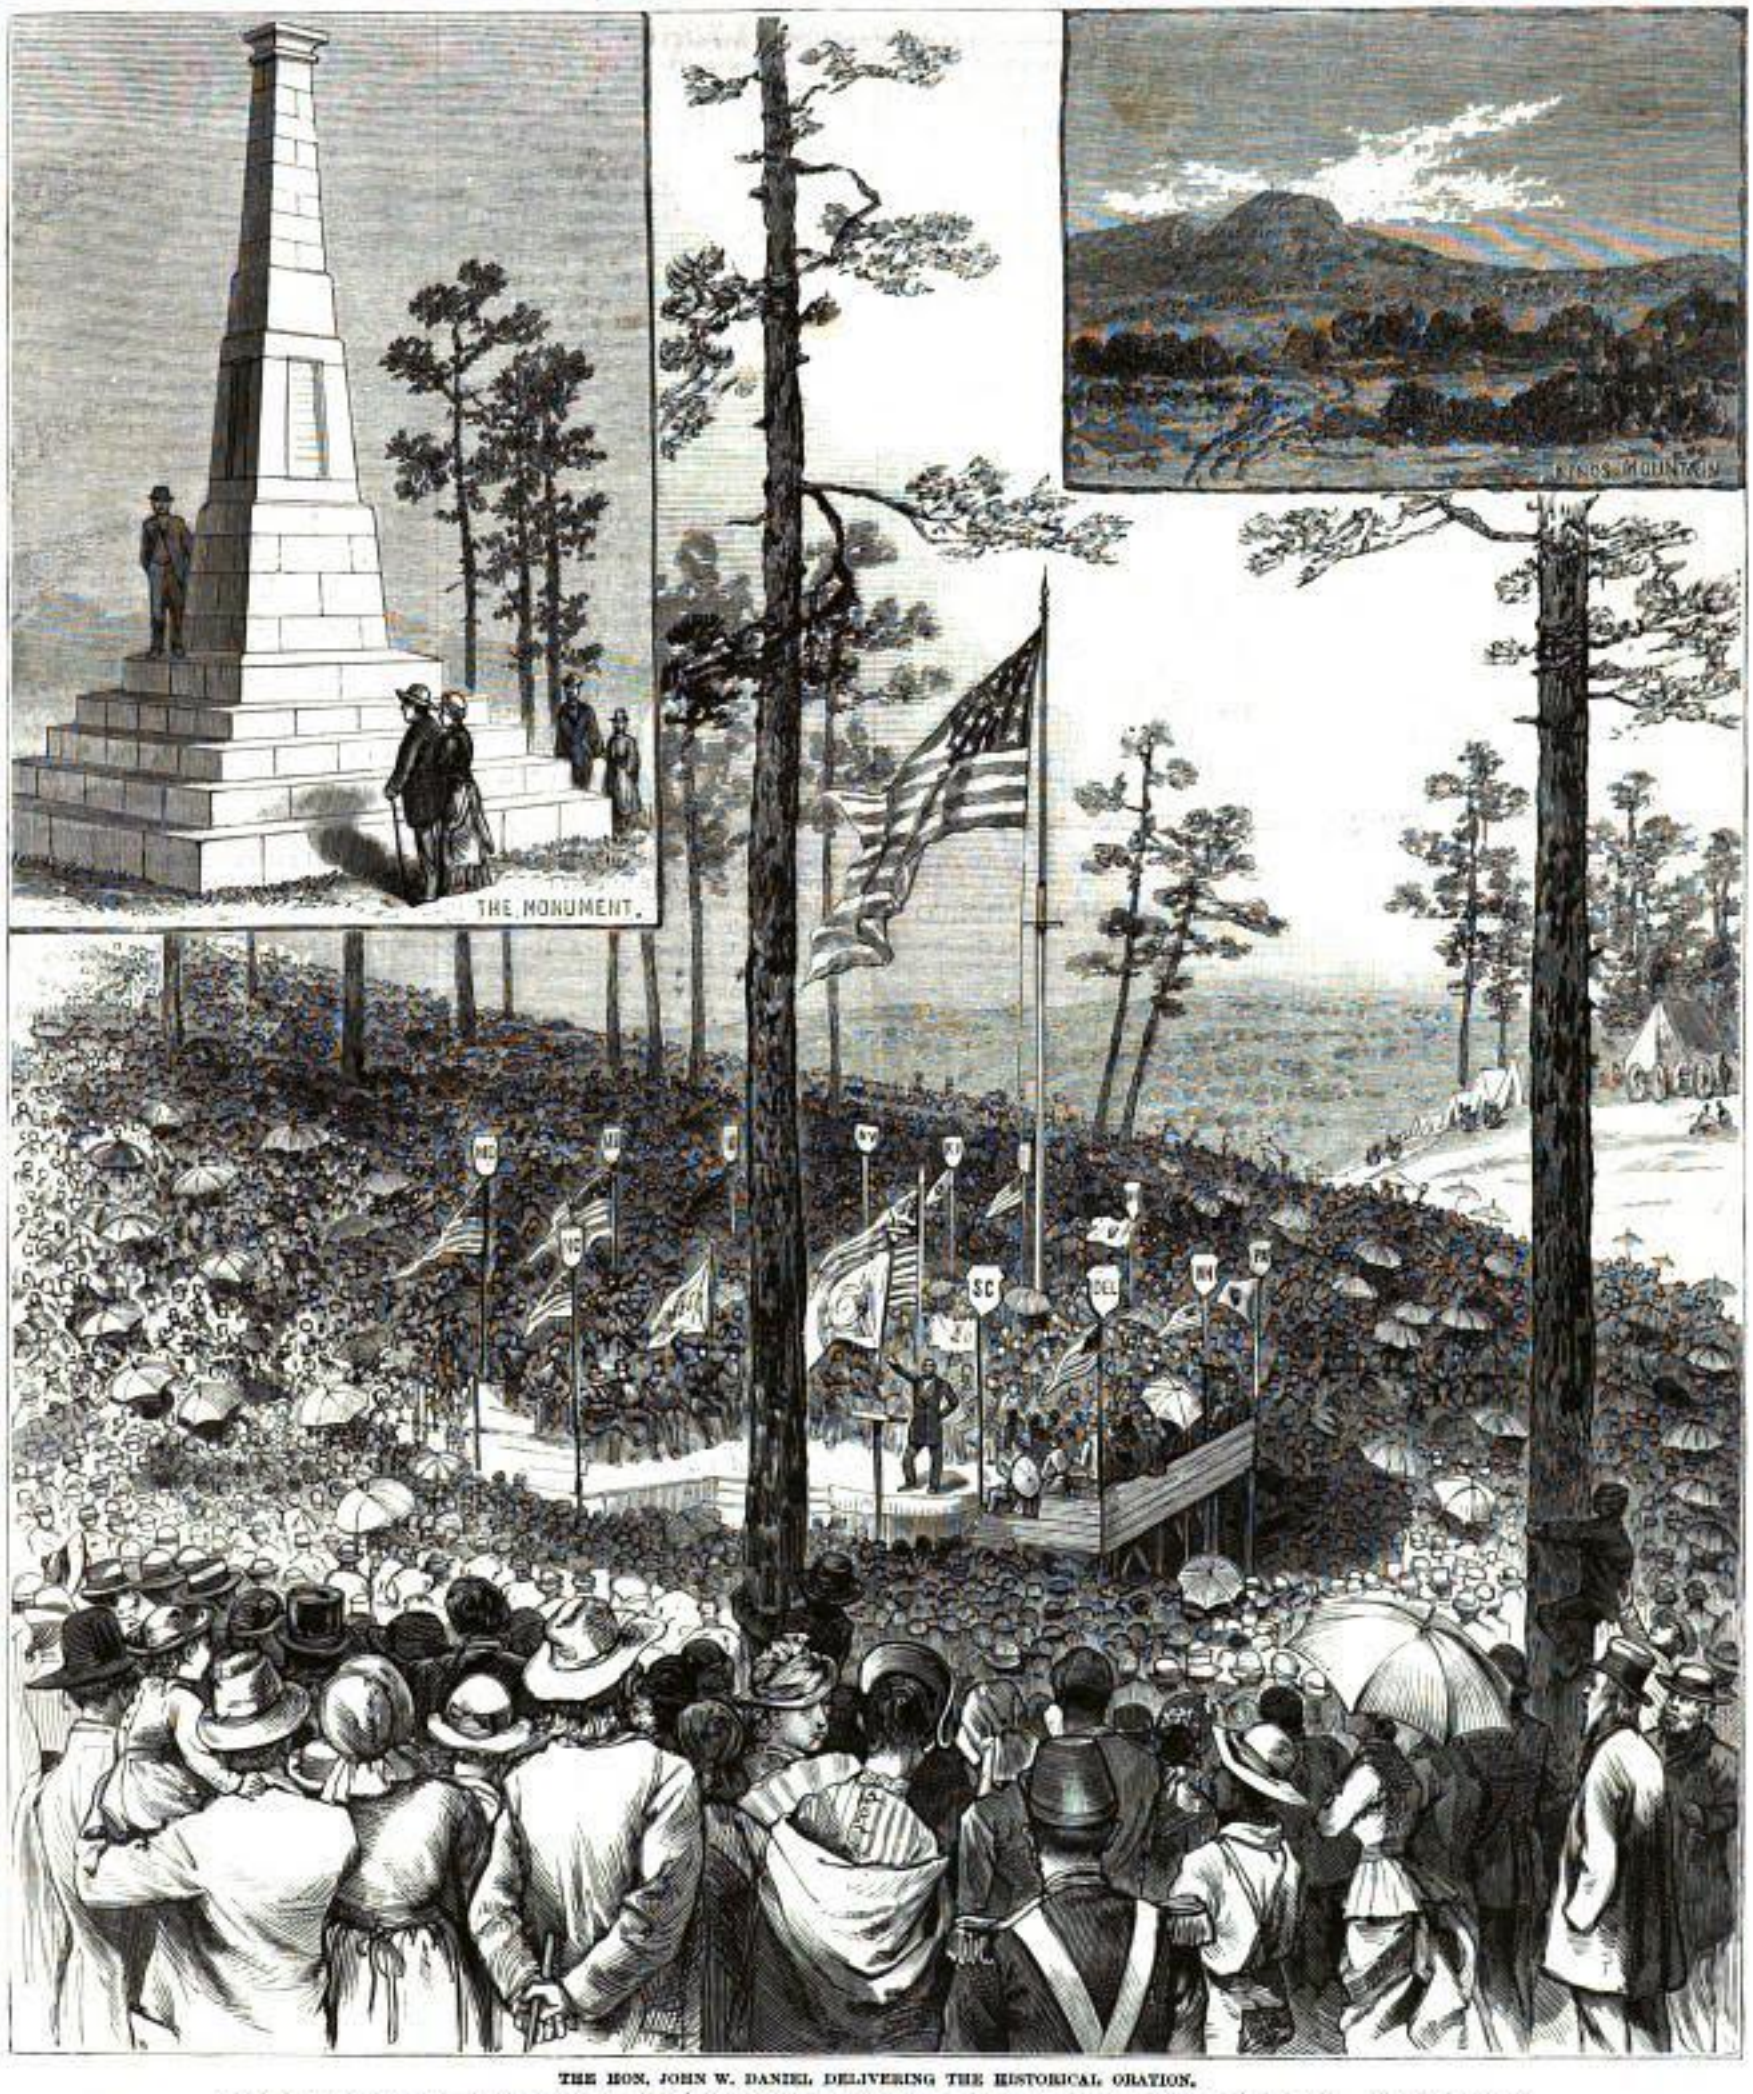
SPECTACLES, Eye, Field and Opera Glasses, Microscopes, Barometers, Thermometers, Compasses, at reduced prices. R. & J. BECK, 1026 Chestnut Street, Phila. Send 3 stamps for Illustrated Catalogue of 146 pages. Mention this paper.

TRUSS EGGLESTON SENSIBLE TRUSS. Made on new principles. Send for Circulars. Eggleston Truss, Chicago, Ill.

ORGANS 14 Stops, 4 Sets Reeds, ONLY $65. PIANOS $125 up. Paper free. Address Daniel F. Beatty, Washington, N. J.

$55.66 Agents Profit per Week. Will prove it or forfeit $500. $4 Outfit free. E. G. RIDEOUT & CO., 10 Barclay St., N.Y.

READ the NEW STORY by WILKIE COLLINS,



"THE BLACK ROBE,"

Commenced in No. 1,307 of FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER. Price 10c., at all news depots.

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1880, by F. W. KELLAND, Assignee, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.—Entered at the Post Office, New York, N.Y., as Second-class Matter.

No. 1,309.—Vol. LI. NEW YORK, OCTOBER 30, 1880. [Price 10 Cents. $4.00 Yearly. 13 Weeks, $1.00.

THE HON. JOHN W. DANIEL DELIVERING THE HISTORICAL ORATION.

SOUTH CAROLINA.—CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION OF THE BATTLE OF KING'S MOUNTAIN, OCTOBER 7TH.
From Sketches by Jas. H. Moser.—See Page 139.

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,
53, 55 & 57 PARK PLACE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 30, 1880.

NOTICE.

FRANK LESLIE'S PUBLISHING HOUSE,
53, 55 and 57 Park Place, New York City, N. Y.
P. O. Box 4121.

NEW YORK, January 27th, 1880.

Under the assignment, and with the assent of Mrs. Miriam F. Leslie, the widow of Frank Leslie, and his sole legatee under his will, the publications of the House will be continued as heretofore under the management of the undersigned.

All communications should be addressed to 53 Park Place, or to P. O. Box 4121, New York City, N. Y.

I. W. ENGLAND, Assignee.

THE OCTOBER ELECTIONS.

IT would seem that the present political campaign is destined to be, in great measure, a campaign of surprises. The nomination of General Garfield at Chicago was a surprise to the Republicans, and still more of a surprise to the Democrats, for they had counted on the nomination of General Grant, and had constructed their whole plan of attack accordingly. The nomination of General Hancock at Cincinnati was a surprise to the Democrats, and still more of a surprise to the Republicans, for they had counted on the nomination of Mr. Tilden, and had projected a plan of offensive operations based on the points in which they conceived him to be personally vulnerable. The result of the election in Maine was a surprise to the Democrats, for they had already discounted the prospect of a defeat, and still more of a surprise to the Republicans, for, after they had built great expectations on a sweeping victory, they were called to confront the depressing fact of a drawn battle, if not of an absolute defeat.

And now, as we take it, the result of the October elections has been a surprise to both parties—to the Republicans, because they had scarcely counted on the measure of success which they have gained in the State of Indiana; and to the Democrats, because they had counted with a full assurance of faith on increasing their majority in that State rather than on seeing it obliterated, while the prospect of a Republican triumph was not allowed to enter into their theory of political probabilities. The result in Ohio has not, we imagine, administered much of a surprise to either party, for the Republican preponderance in this State has scarcely at any stage of the present canvass been much more involved in doubt than the Democratic preponderance in West Virginia. Yet the success of the Republicans in the former of these States has fully equaled their just expectations, if it has not surpassed their sanguine predictions.

As in commenting on the result in Maine we took occasion to say, without professing any admiration for the Greenbackers and Democrats in the Pine Tree State, that the check then and there experienced by the Republicans was not undeserved, because of the personal bitterness and sectional exasperations infused by the Republican leaders in the methods of their canvass, so now, in presence of the check experienced by the Democrats in Indiana, we venture, with equal impartiality, to express the opinion that it, too, has been well earned by the methods with which the Democratic leaders have prosecuted their canvass in that State. And in so saying, we do not refer to the heats with which their political oratory has been inflamed, to the personal bickerings and jealousies which are supposed to exist among the chief captains and men of high estate in the party, or to any other among the surface indications which gather like foam and driftwood on the surface of an agitated and swollen stream. We refer to the absolute want of sound and definite political principles which has presided over the management of the Democratic canvass in this State as well as in the State of Ohio.

It must be admitted by all that, so far as the currency issue or the tariff issue is involved in the present canvass, the Democrats in Indiana have not met either of them with a clean record, with a clear aim, or a bold front. They have sought by indirection to find direction out—ready to go for hard money or for soft money according to the mood of the passing time, or according to the inclination of a seeming majority in the State. Now coquetting with the Greenbackers and now repelling any alliance with them; supporting a paper-money fanatic like De la Matyr one year and opposing him in the next; upholding in the same canvass a hard-money candidate for Vice-President of the United States and a soft-money candidate for the office of Governor; enough in favor of a revenue tariff to frighten the monopolists who are profiting by some "protected" branch of industry, but not enough in favor of a revenue tariff to win the confidence and deserve the support of ardent and earnest revenue reformers—the Democratic managers have seemed to act on the principle that mere success is the end and aim of political contention. They seem to have forgotten that the irreversible laws of the moral world are in opposition to a political success pursued in that direction, and still more have they forgotten that such a success is always the worst of defeats.

Great as is the natural cohesive power of the Democratic Party; mighty as are the strains which it has stood without dismemberment or disintegration; proud as is the historical eminence from which it surveys the wreck and ruin of the various parties which have littered the pages of American history with their debris, there are some political wrenches which no cohesive power in a party can stand, and there are some anachronisms in political conduct which no party can commit without "turning back the hands" on its own dial-plate, to the confusion alike of those who consult it and of those who falsify its normal movement.

Whatever may be the final outcome and influence of the Indiana election, whether it shall be only a check or a fatal repulse which the Democrats have received in the October contest, it is certain that the fortunes of the national struggle, so far as they were staked on the issue of the battle in that field, have not been won for the Democracy, but have, for them, been placed in greater doubt than they were before, while their Republican antagonists have received a corresponding encouragement. Whether there is enough of élan in the Democratic forces to recover from this backset, it is not ours to predict, as we do not conceive ourselves so much set to predict results as to record them. But as, after the check sustained by the Republicans in Maine, we undertook, in the interest of public propriety, to point a moral for the benefit of sincere and candid politics, if not for the benefit of the Republican Party, so now, in the interest of frank and straightforward conduct, we would point a moral for the benefit of a sound currency and of a wise tariff reform, if not for the benefit of the Democratic Party. In a world like ours, where time and chance come to all men, it is not for parties always to command success, but it is always in their power to deserve it by maintaining a faithful adherence, in evil report and in good report, to the principles of truth and righteousness. The life of a party is more than the meat on which it feeds, and the body of a party is something better and more worth preserving than the raiment in which it arrays itself from age to age. The truth of this proposition may be obscure to "practical politicians," but it is a truth to which all political history sets its seal.

DEVELOPMENT IN MEXICO.

THE recent speech of General Grant upon the condition of our commercial relations with Mexico is attracting, as its subject-matter imperatively demands, a good deal of attention in the various centres of commerce throughout the Union. Mexico is comparatively terra incognita. Our veterans know her through the medium of many a hard-fought field, while the younger generation regard her as an impossible country, situated at the very back of that apocryphal region, God-speed. The statements of the few who have visited the halls of the Montezumas are received with coldness, if not with incredulity, till the name of "Mexico" has become but a synonym for indolence, voluptuousness and semi-savagery.

It required the evidence of some prominent individual like General Grant to turn the attention of the commercial mind to our nearest neighbor, and we have little doubt that his Boston speech will prove the "Open sesame" to the heretofore double-locked gate that barred the road lying between the commerce of the two countries.

The election of Señor Gonzales to the Presidency without a pronunciamiento or revolution, speaks volumes in favor of the improved condition of Mexico. General Diaz, the outgoing President, is a man whose sterling honesty has won for him the respect of the bitterest opponents of his policy, and his determined refusal to accept a renomination has done much to give tone and stability to the political constitution. The coming Administration is determined to inaugurate a still broader policy and lay the foundation of an economical reform, without which it is impossible for the country to enter upon an era of peace and true progress. To refute the erroneous impressions held in foreign countries with respect to Mexico, and which have been so prejudicial to the interests of capital and labor; to open new markets for native productions; to protect the Mexican consumer by promoting competition in imported articles; to attract the elements which will place her in the position to solve her economical and social problems—these are the objects which the new Administration proposes to keep steadily in view; and should this programme be faithfully adhered to, the future prosperity of Mexico will be fully assured.

General Grant stated that the United States does an importation trade in tropical and semi-tropical products amounting annually to $200,000,000, and that all that is now required to enable us to save the percentage paid in sterling exchange is the bridging of the Rio Grande by railway arches. "Mexico," said the General, "could produce all those tropical and semi-tropical products if she had railroads to give her an outlet for them. Her people possess the industry to develop her resources—a fact not generally credited, nor did I believe it until my recent visit. With their climate, industry, and everything required for the production, why should we hesitate to afford Mexico every facility for creating an immense and mutually beneficial trade? If the trade of Mexico be fostered, she will take in exchange all that our workshops produce. When we can pay for imports of our tropical products with the products of our manufactories, we shall benefit Mexico, benefit ourselves, continue to give employment to the people that we now have and who are ever coming to our shores."

Mexico is striding to the front. A number of local railways are in progress of construction, and the line to Queretaro will be opened in a few weeks. The telegraph system continues to extend, and now includes the distant points of Tepic, Rosario, Mazatlan, Hermosilla, and others, bringing those places into direct communication with the capital. There are now over 10,000 miles of line in operation. The Mexican Gulf cable will be in operation next Spring. It is now being made in England, and will be landed at a Texas port in January, and laid thence to Vera Cruz. The country has awakened from its slumber, and is alive to the necessity for trading with the United States. The Government and people see that the days of filibustering have passed away, and that America has more territory on her hands than she can hope to hew into shape for centuries to come. The commercial pulse of both countries has commenced to beat, and, let us hope, in thorough unison.

THE NEXT CONGRESS.

IT begins to look as if the Republicans may control the next House of Representatives. In the present House there are 130 Republicans, 149 Democrats, 5 Republican Greenbackers, 7 Democratic Greenbackers, and 2 Nationals. A majority of the House is 147, making it necessary for the Republicans, supposing that the Greenbackers act on national issues with the parties to which they naturally lean—to gain twelve votes to obtain control. So far they have gained ten members—one in Oregon, one in Vermont, two in Indiana and six in Ohio. In the States yet to hold elections, it is quite probable that they will secure at least four additional members—two in Iowa, one in Minnesota and one in Wisconsin. This would give them a clear majority, on this basis, of ten. If they can gain three additional districts, they will have 147 distinctive Republicans, being a majority over the Democrats and Greenbackers combined—and this certainly does not seem now to be impossible.

There is a possibility, too, in the light of recent events, that Democratic ascendency in the Senate may be broken. As at present constituted, that body consists of 43 Democrats and 33 Republicans. Of the Republican members who will retire on the 4th of March next, all are reasonably certain to have Republican successors except Senator Bruce of Mississippi, who will be succeeded by a Democrat. In Ohio and Indiana Republicans will succeed Messrs. Thurman and McDonald, and Connecticut, New York, New Jersey and California are likely to elect Republicans in place of the present Democratic incumbents. Should this prove to be the case, the Republicans will have 38 Senators, or just one-half of the entire number, with the casting vote in the hands of the Vice President, who is now, to say the least, quite as likely to be a Republican as a Democrat.

Of course, this calculation is conjecture, but the balance of probabilities seems at this time to be in favor of its fulfillment.

A NEW SORT OF COMPETITION.

THE proposition for the establishment of a great co-operative store in this city by the Central Co-operative Board is a suggestion not to be entertained without careful consideration. The enterprise is one through which workingmen who have money to invest in trade may become stockholders in a commercial company, and be enabled to purchase their goods at wholesale prices. This sounds well; but, unfortunately, it looks like a misconception of the main purposes of co-operation.

Ostensibly, at least, all co-operative enterprises are intended for the benefit of workingmen, and if the principles of co-operation is ever to be of any advantage in ameliorating the condition of those who suffer from poverty, it can be only when its measures are so taken that they will work for the profit of the producing classes. But those classes cannot afford to help cheapen the goods which they themselves produce for sale. For the mere privilege of being permitted to buy back again a moiety of their own productions at low prices, they cannot wisely aid an enterprise that makes them the competitors of men who are offering for sale the same goods at better figures. To ask a workingman to take stock in a co-operative store is to ask him to become his own executioner—to assist in depressing the market value of articles from the production of which he draws his subsistence.

Those who are sincerely desirous of benefiting workingmen should understand that all co-operation that can accomplish the end in view must be industrial co-operation—co-operation in labor and not in traffic. The critical question with every man in this world is not whether he shall be compelled to pay more or less for the necessaries of life, but whether or no, in the first place, he can find employment to enable him to buy the necessaries of life at any price, and, after that is secured, whether or no he can obtain a sufficient compensation for his labor to enable him to live comfortably, and provide for the material and intellectual wants of his family. It is a question of whether he shall have considerable money and use it, or very little money—next to none at all, in fact—and save it. This is the problem that is agitating the working classes, and it cannot be solved by any merely economical devices.

In all wisely directed co-operative enterprises the first object must be to free the community of a class without an income, and no frequency of reiteration can too strongly enforce this fundamental idea. Organization must be made so complete and perfect among workingmen that the laborer can draw upon his resources, however humble, with a feeling of as much security against the casualties of life as the stockholders in a bank or a railroad. It will be the work of co-operation to find a remedy for idleness, to throw the shield of organization over the unfortunate, and to prevent want, pauperism, beggary and, indirectly, crime.

Will this be thought too heavy a task for the community to undertake? It will be much cheaper to dispense with hospitals, almshouses, and largely with prisons, and add the amount demanded for their support to the first cost of production on all articles offered for sale, than it is to maintain those institutions either by the tax levy or by voluntary contributions. This is a case where an ounce of prevention will be better than a thousand pounds of cure. But such an undertaking would compel an extravagant price for labor, it will be said. We have no occasion for fear. However corporations and individuals may treat the demand for an increase of compensation when made by workingmen, there is no load that society carries so easily and cheerfully as liberal wages. The community is never so prosperous as when the price of labor is reasonably high. True, it may be asserted that it is the general prosperity that enhances the value of labor; but it may also be claimed, with equal truthfulness, that it is the high price of labor that brings general prosperity. They act and react upon each other, and you can no more have a prosperous community without prosperous workingmen than you can have prosperous workingmen without an active market for goods. If there be any measure for ameliorating the condition of the working classes we need not be debarred from giving it a trial by any unfounded dread of an excessive price for labor.

The establishment of co operative stores is not a movement in the right direction. It is not co-operation at all in any true sense—it is only another form of competition, and not the less offensive because it is now and provided with a philanthropic name. We have no evidence that the vaunted success of co-operative stores in England has been of any advantage to the country. Strikes are just as frequent there as ever, and the working classes are just as unhappy. Indeed, if they are engaged in the work of cheapening the products of their own labor they may see the time, not very far distant, when they will have to look to emigration abroad as their best security against want and pauperism.

Let us have co-operation in America, but let it be established upon practical principles—on principles consistent with sound political economy.

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

IT is now more than a quarter of a century since the Emperor of Russia, in conversation with the British Ambassador at St. Petersburg, first called Turkey "the sick man." From that time until the present moment Turkey has undoubtedly been a miserable valetudinarian; but in two great wars which have been fought the Turk has been victorious in one, and was only beaten in the other after a magnificent fight. The Porte has been more talked and written about than any other nation during that period, and the great field for modern diplomatists has been found in their attempts to settle the affairs of the "sick man." How completely they have failed is a matter of history, and a satisfactory arrangement of the Eastern Question seems as far off as ever. The recent imbroglio brought about by a clause in the Treaty of Berlin, under which the town and district of Dulcigno, a small place on the eastern coast of the Adriatic, was to be ceded to Montenegro, has just ended. The Albanians, a hardy race of pirates and mountaineers, were in possession of Dulcigno, under a species of protectorate of the Porte, and these people, when called upon to surrender their territory to Montenegro, had recourse to arms. The Sultan sent a small body of men, under Riza Pasha, nominally to insist upon the surrender, but really to aid the Albanians in their resistance. Month after month passed; special ambassadors were sent to Constantinople, but Dulcigno was not ceded. At last the Powers sent a combined fleet to the Adriatic, but without definite orders to force a surrender. A naval demonstration along the coast ensued. The Porte insisted that everything possible had been done to make the Albanians give up quiet possession, and it was not until the fleet threatened to seize Smyrna that the Ottoman Government notified the Powers that Dulcigno would be at once ceded. This has ended the first act of the play, but two more remain. The rectification of the Greek frontier and the reforms in Asia Minor have not been completed. The Porte now asks as a return for the quiet cession of Dulcigno that some time should be allowed before any further pressure is brought to bear. The general feeling in Europe is that a pause in the course of Eastern affairs must ensue, and the great Powers, with the exception of Russia and England, seem satisfied with what has been done.

Digitized by Google

The morganatic marriage of the Emperor of Russia and the Princess Dolgorouki has been announced. The liaison between the Czar and the lovely fair-haired princess has been well-known for many years. It is more than twelve years since she first met her royal lover, and almost as long since he established her as the reigning favorite in her apartments upon the English Quay. She has borne him several children, who bear the titles of Count or Countess de Gourine, a title which belongs to an extinct branch of the Romanoffs. The late Empress was fully aware of the intimacy between her husband and the Princess, but her lymphatic nature and the superstitious bigotry in which she indulged during the later years of her life made her close her eyes to the Emperor's infidelity. It was only when the Czar proposed to legitimize the young Gourines that the long-suffering Empress raised her voice in protest, and last Winter she retired to Cannes nominally in order to recruit her health, but really as a protest against the Emperor's action. Since the death of the Czarina, the Emperor has made no secret of his intention to espouse the Princess. The Czarowitz and the Grand Dukes showed their dislike to the marriage by leaving St. Petersburg upon the day of the ceremony, which took place in the chapel of the Imperial Palace. It may be added that a morganatic marriage confers all the rights of an ordinary marriage upon the bride except the rank of her husband and the right of inheriting his possessions. The origin of the word is the German morgengabe, or dowry, which is the only property the bride can claim.

The festival celebrating the completion of the Cologne Cathedral was scarcely as great as was expected. This was owing to the refusal of the Pope to allow the clergy to take any part in the ceremonies except that the Suffragan Bishop and Chapter should celebrate a Te Deum. Besides, all the Ultramontane nobility of the fair Rhineland refused to be present; but the Emperor of Germany, the Crown Prince and Princess, and almost all the ruling princes, were at Cologne during the celebration.

The situation in Ireland is becoming more complex. The Catholic Archbishop of Dublin has issued a pastoral letter, in which he denounces the Land League in strong terms. This is a severe blow, for it will cut off the resources of the land leaguers who rely upon the peasantry for contributions. As the peasantry are under the domination of the priests, they will be forbidden to subscribe, besides which the moral opposition of the Church has great weight against any organization. In addition to this clerical movement, it is now believed that the Government have determined to prosecute the leaders of the Land League for conspiracy and seditious speaking. The ringleaders are alarmed, and Mr. Parnell is said to be drawing back, but some of the more enterprising spirits declare that they are delighted at the thought of receiving the crown of martyrdom, which they consider a prosecution would bring them. Meantime troops are being sent over from England, and, as the barracks do not offer sufficient accommodation, the Government are hiring private houses in some of the country towns. The position of things in Ireland will probably necessitate an early meeting of Parliament, and a more active policy in Irish affairs.

It is probable that the new French Ministry will at once proceed to put the decrees against the religious bodies into execution. Several Jesuits who had returned as professors in a college in Paris have again been ejected by the police, and the near approach of the triennial municipal elections makes it important that something should be done immediately.

THERE are few men who have seen so much within the last ten years as Archibald Forbes, the "Prince of Specials," as his confrères love to call him. He has witnessed nearly every event which has merged into the history of European nations during that comparatively short period, and his acquaintance with sovereigns and rulers is almost on a par with that of General Grant himself. Archie Forbes is brave as a lion, possesses the endurance of a mule, has the eye of a hawk, writes with the rapidity of a sewing machine, and can paint his story in a few words and in color worthy of the sun dipped brush of Fortuny. His lecture, delivered at the Chickering Hall the other night, was a perfect glitter. It held the audience spellbound, and until it seemed a profanation to applaud. Forbes has fairly won his first laurels on American soil. May the garland grow larger as he "goes upon his way."

SARAH BERNHARDT is en route for the United States, having sailed from Havre on Saturday last. In a little while, possibly, New York and the New World will lie at her feet. It is said that several enterprising Paris journals will send over special correspondents to record her triumphs for the entertainment of her admirers in the French capital.

THE Western Union Telegraph Company is not, to say the least of it, a losing concern. The gross earnings of the company for the year ending June 30th were $11,738,094, and the net earnings $6,146,639, leaving a surplus after the payment of interest, sinking fund appropriations, and 8 per cent. in dividends on the capital stock, of $1,397,846, all of which was invested in the construction of new lines and wires, and in the purchase of patents, real estate and other telegraph stocks.

IT doesn't look as if the women of New York placed a very high estimate on the suffrage. At the school elections held throughout the State last week, very few members of the sex availed themselves of the opportunity to vote, but in a number of places ladies were elected as trustees, the males gallantly coming to the help of the women's ticket. In Port Jervis, on the other hand, their ticket was badly beaten, the vote of every woman was challenged, and many who were entitled to vote were refused the privilege.

THE voters of General Garfield's Congressional District do not seem to sympathize with the assaults which have been made upon his character by the opposition press. The returns of last week's election show a net gain of 1,608 over the majority which Governor Foster received from the same district last year. This is probably much the largest gain in any Congressional district in the State, and shows very conclusively the prevalence of an intense popular interest in the success of the Republican Presidential candidates

---

IN the Tenth District of this city, Hon. Abram S. Hewitt has been again nominated for Congress, and will be supported by the united Democracy. Mr. Hewitt has ability, integrity and experience, and his accession to the Democratic ranks in the House will be a positive gain to the party and the country. In the Sixth District Hon. S. S. Cox has been renominated, and will, of course, be re-elected. Mr. Cox justly holds a high place in the regard of his party as one of its best and most trustworthy representatives, and his district could have no worthier or more influential servant in the House.

THE Republicans of the Eleventh Congressional District of this city have done wisely in nominating the Hon. Levi P. Morton for re-election. Mr. Morton has proved himself in every respect a capable and worthy representative of the important business and financial interests of the metropolis, and, with the experience he has already acquired, his services in the future will undoubtedly be even more valuable than they have been in the past. An increased majority should attest the esteem in which he is held by his constituents and the popular appreciation, especially of his pronounced hostility to all attempts to break down our present financial system.

THE Commissioners of Charities and Correction have asked the sum of $1,611,416 for the coming year. Of this amount, $285,416 is needed for salaries, and $875,000 for supplies. The salary appropriation certainly seems excessive, and perhaps it would not be unwise to apply the pruning knife in that direction. The poor and criminal classes must be cared for, indeed, but their guardians should not be paid an extravagant compensation. Possibly, too, if more money should be expended in compulsory education and the institution of juvenile reformatories, the public would be the gainers in the great reduction of the cost of our charitable and corrective systems as now established.

BISMARCK evidently desires to place in the hands of the German Government all the productive power of the country. One of his latest social schemes looks to the compulsory insurance of workmen for sickness and old age. "This 'State socialistic' system could doubtless be more readily attained if workmen were made dependent upon Government insurance funds, and both masters and men duly regulated by trade guilds, which are the projects immediately before the public. The opponents of the Government, according to the Examiner, do not hesitate to picture Germany as a State in which every human being shall be either a Government official or his dependent, and they represent Prince Bismarck as the most thoroughgoing socialist of his time."

THE Pennsylvania Railroad is, in the main, so safely and efficiently managed that the recent terrible disaster at Pittsburgh attracts especial attention. So far as can be judged from the facts at hand, the disaster was purely the result of inexcusable negligence. The second section of an excursion train ran into the rear of the first section, and the engineer of the former ascribes as the reason for the blunder that the back platform of the first section was so crowded that the signal lights were obscured, and thus when the first section was stopped at a block station it could not be seen from the train following it until it was too late. Now, obviously, the train hands who failed to properly display their lights, and to send back a flagman with a lantern when their train stopped to signal the second section, are flagrantly culpable. The block system, with its elaborate signals, is simply worthless if the ordinary precautions which were neglected in this case are carelessly omitted. The Railroad Company owes it the public to make an example of its negligent officials, who, so far as appears, are directly responsible for the twenty-seven lives which were lost through their stupidity and carelessness of proper precautions.

A RECENT letter from Spotted Tail to Secretary Schurz, asking the employment of a lawyer to defend the six young Indians who have been sent to Omaha for trial for certain offenses, affords a curious illustration of the influence of modern ideas upon the more civilized Indians. Spotted Tail writes:

"If these young men are guilty I want them punished; if they are not guilty I want them sent back to me and to their families. Now, they should have in the trial for their alleged crimes the same chances that the white man has; they should have as good lawyers as we can give them and we should defend them the same as you would be allowed to defend your children if they were in prison and were to be tried for offences they had been charged with. My people are a good people and want to do as the Great Father tells them. They love their children, and it makes them mourn when their children do wrong. Every way we can we want to help our children. Now, my people have put together from their earnings a little money to be used in helping our children in this trouble. All who were able to give have given to help them, and the money we have raised we are going to send to you that you may help us find good lawyers to defend our children."

The amount of money forwarded to the Secretary is $352. The spirit which suggested the contribution doubles and trebles its value; and it ought not to be difficult to find scores of able members of the profession who will be glad to perform the service required without any compensation whatever.

AMERICAN postal enterprise has just accomplished a feat which confers infinite credit on all concerned in its achievement. The steamship City of Sydney, carrying the Australian mails, left the port of Sydney on September 9th, and after an extraordinary rapid voyage arrived at San Francisco forty-eight hours ahead of schedule time, but too late for that day's train on the Central Pacific Railroad. Postmaster James, of this city, desiring to dispatch the mails by steamer leaving this city on the 12th, induced the Pacific Railroad to put on a special train from San Francisco which, leaving October 7th, by a flying trip of a thousand miles, overtook the regular train of October 5th, and transferred to it two hundred and forty-three sacks of mail-matter, which at ten o'clock in the evening of October 11th, were delivered in this city, and on the morning of the 12th, were dispatched by the steamship Arizona for Europe. It was expected that the latter would make the trip to Queenstown in seven days, thus making the time from Sydney to London about forty-one days. According to the last report of the Postmaster-General of New Zealand the average time consumed in the voyage from Sydney via San Francisco has been forty-five days and about six hours, and by way of the Suez Canal forty-six days and about four hours. It will therefore be seen that the present exploit has reduced the time nearly four and one-half days.

IN his annual report to the Secretary of the Interior, Governor Murray of Utah takes decided ground in favor of the enforcement of the laws against polygamy. After showing that the growth and prosperity of the Territory have been impeded by the existence of polygamy and the evils resulting from it, he proceeds to say that the indifference of the Government to the enforcement of the paramount law is absolutely indefensible, since it really offers a premium to crime, and fails entirely to enforce equal and exact justice to all citizens. "Why," he inquires, "should the Government of the United States allow one of its citizens to be sentenced to the penitentiary, say in New York, for violating a law of Congress, and allow another here to go unwhipped in willfully violating a law similarly passed, and be promoted to office as a premium for his crime?" He adds:

"Congress should wipe out its statute against polygamy, remove every officer who is sworn to see its laws executed, furnish free transportation to a quarter section of free land to each of the thousands of non-Mormons who, with their stout hearts and strong muscles, have made homes in this part of their country, repeal all laws objectionable to the dominant church here, so that the Territory may be run under ecclesiastical suggestion, pass a law constituting this an independent polygamous State, a thing apart from the "wicked people" of the United States; or it should at once make it possible to execute the laws already passed—one or the other. Sheer justice to the thousands of children yet to be born with illegitimacy as their birthmark under this illegal and indecent system; mercy to the first and only wife, when lustful or religiously fanatical husbands thrust them aside for new and fresher companions; respect for its own laws, equal and exact justice to all, these and more make plaintive demands of Congress for speedy and sure adjustment of the wrongs, the termination of contentions that curse this goodly land, and must continue to do so until proper legislation brings relief. Time will not prove the remedy. It is revelation (so called) against statute law. If the United States proposes that Utah and several other of its Territories soon to be overspread by emigration is to be governed by revelation, well and good. If, however, it proposes in the future, as in the past, to govern by laws of Congress, applicable for all the people, then it is all wrong."

The justice and force of these remarks cannot be disputed. The Administration of President Hayes could not in anything commend itself so cordially to the popular approval as by initiating at once a vigorous and uncompromising policy as to the whole Mormon abomination.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.

SECRETARY SHERMAN addressed Republican meetings at Chicago and Milwaukee last week.

THE Southern Pacific Railroad has reached a point within twenty-five miles of Eastern New Mexico.

SEVEN persons were killed and four severely injured by an explosion in a Chicago distillery, October 15th.

SPECULATION in grain never ran so high as since the finish of last harvest. The price of wheat is $1.02.

THE sixth German General Baptist Conference of North America began its session at St. Louis, September 13th.

THE old residence of John C. Calhoun, in the southern portion of Pickens County, S. C., was burned last week.

PRESIDENT HAYES continued his travels in Washington Territory last week, being everywhere received with enthusiasm.

THE Academy of Music in Chicago was destroyed by fire on October 12th. A number of firemen were injured by the falling of the roof.

WENDELL PHILLIPS has been nominated for Congress by a fragment of the Greenback Party in the Fourth Massachusetts District.

A FOOLISH story that Mr. English has been asked to withdraw from the Democratic ticket because of the party reverse in Indiana is authoritatively denied.

THE Norwegian Lutheran Synod of the United States held its annual session at La Crosse, Wis., last week. Over 150 ministers were in attendance from all parts of the United States.

THE coffee "corner" is about coming to a settlement disastrous to all who had anything to do with it. Brazilian coffee is very low, owing to the unexpectedly very large supply this year.

THE eighth congress of the Association for the Advancement of Women was held in Boston last week. Papers were read and discussions had upon a variety of topics relative to woman's work and sphere.

THE 150th anniversary of the settlement of the Cumberland Valley, Pa., by the Presbyterians, was observed at Oakville, October 12th. Among those who delivered addresses was Rev. Narayan Sheshadri, of Bombay, India.

AN amendment is proposed to the Vermont Constitution making the sessions of the Assembly begin on the first Wednesday of January after 1885, and changing the day of election to the first Tuesday of November, beginning in 1886.

THE Director of the Mint estimates that on October 1st there was in the United States $369,881,903 in gold coin and $149,799,335 in silver. The Treasury holds in addition $68,040,540 in gold bullion and $5,867,749 in silver bullion.

THE convention of Mutual Protective Associations of the United States and Canada, in session at Erie, Pa., last week, organized a permanent association of all the societies for the common purpose of defense against old line insurance companies.

THE payment of enumerators is being pushed as rapidly as the resources of the Census Office will allow. One hundred and ninety clerks are constantly employed on this work, fifty working at night. Eighteen thousand three hundred accounts have already been paid in full.

IN the Protestant Episcopal General Convention last week the Committee on the Tenure of Church Property recommended that hereafter no church shall be consecrated in which pews are sold, and that in all consecrated churches no pews shall be sold in the future. The matter was referred to the Committee on Canons.

ORDERS have been issued at the Post Office Department to place railway mail service on the newly completed Louisiana Western Railroad, from Vermilionville, La., to Orange, Texas. This service, which is to begin on the 1st of November, will make a continuous line of railroad mail communication from New York City to Houston, Texas.

INDIAN COMMISSIONER MEACHAM has telegraphed from Los Pinos, Col., to Secretary Schurz, that a conflict between Colorado and the Federal Government seems probable on account of the arrest of Agent Berry for alleged complicity in the murder of Jackson by the Indians. Secretary Schurz has telegraphed to Governor Pitkin asking him to co-operate with the Government. Berry subsequently escaped from his captors.

THE State election in Indiana, October 12th, resulted in the success of the Republicans, who elected their Governor and State ticket by a plurality of 6,500, with eight (and possibly nine) out of the thirteen Congressmen, and secured a majority in the Legislature. This last will give them a United States Senator in place of Mr. McDonald, Democrat. In Ohio the Republican State ticket was elected by 20,000 majority. The Republicans elected fifteen Congressmen, being a gain of six. In West Virginia the Democratic State ticket was elected by a reduced majority.

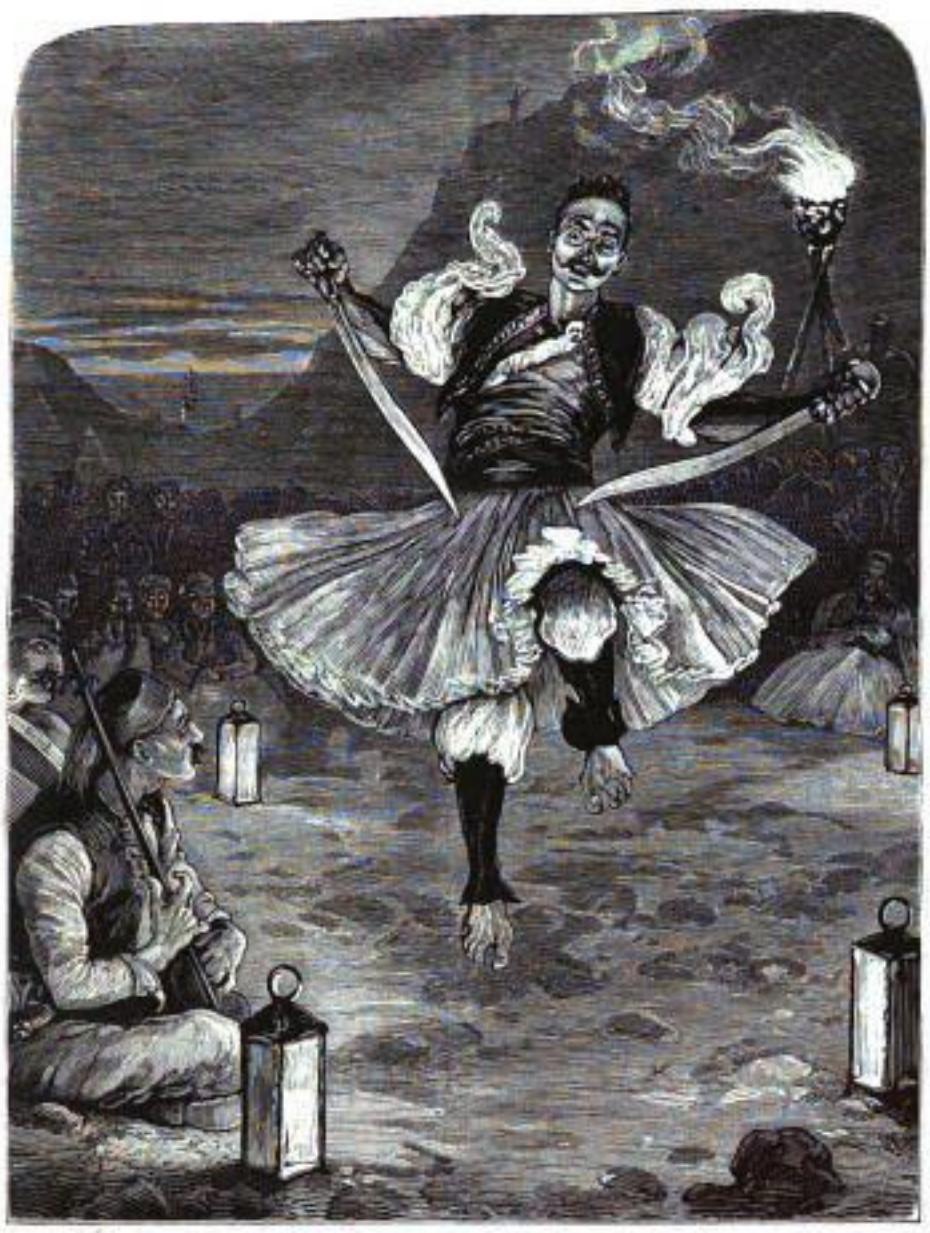
GENERAL GRANT last week addressed the Boston Merchants' Association at considerable length on the benefits to be derived from the development of the resources of Mexico by American capital. While in Boston he was entertained at a banquet by the Middlesex Club. Subsequently he visited Plymouth, Mass., where he was shown the famous rock and the seeds of Miles Standish. He addressed 600 school children there and a number of veterans at Bingham, and in the evening attended two mass-meetings in Hanson, where he confined his remarks to expressions of thanks only.

Foreign.

THE French Legislature will probably meet on November 9th.

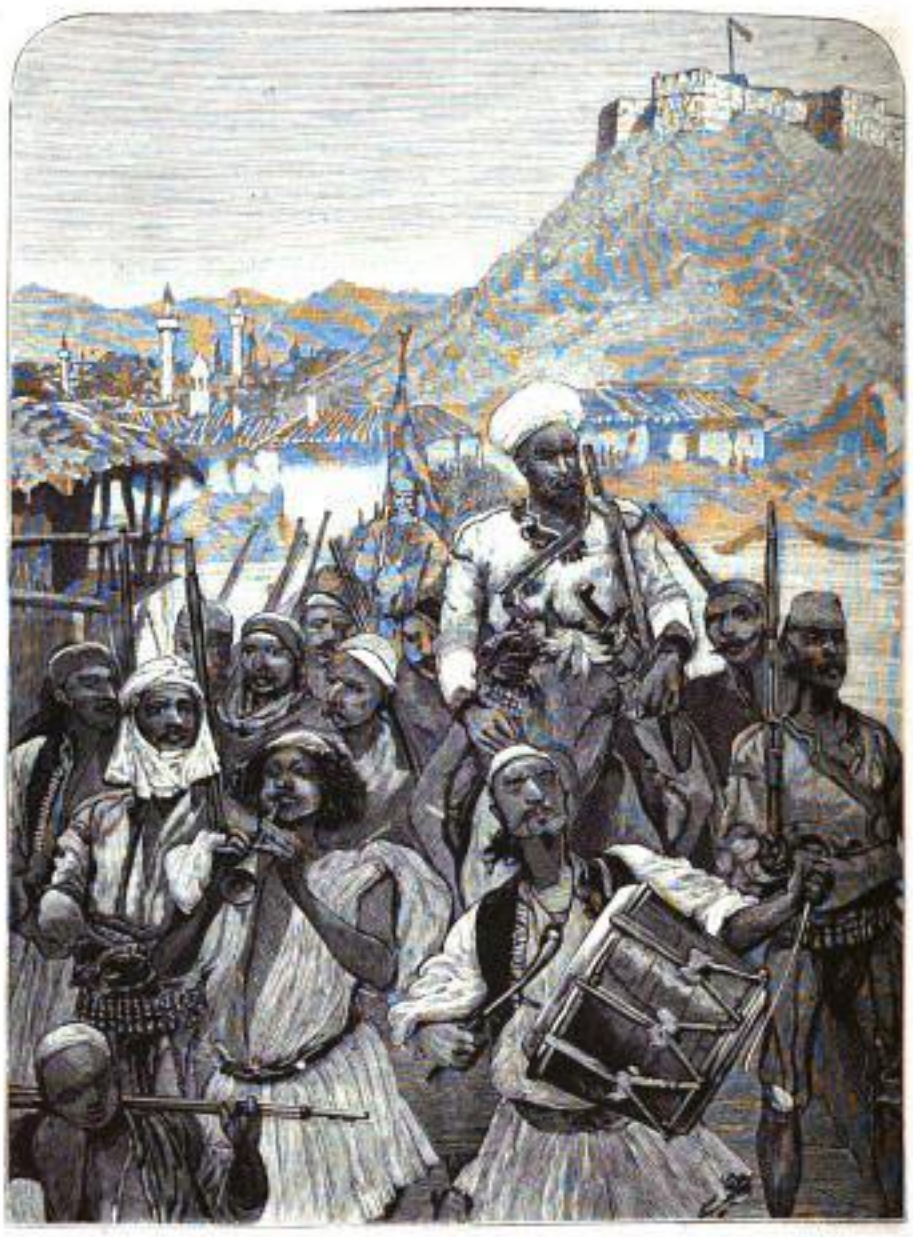
IN the next session of the German Reichstag a motion will probably be made to reduce the duty on grain about sixpence.

THE contractors of the St. Gothard Tunnel have applied to the Federal Tribunal to prolong the time for the completion of the tunnel 700 days. The line will not be opened for traffic until late in 1883.



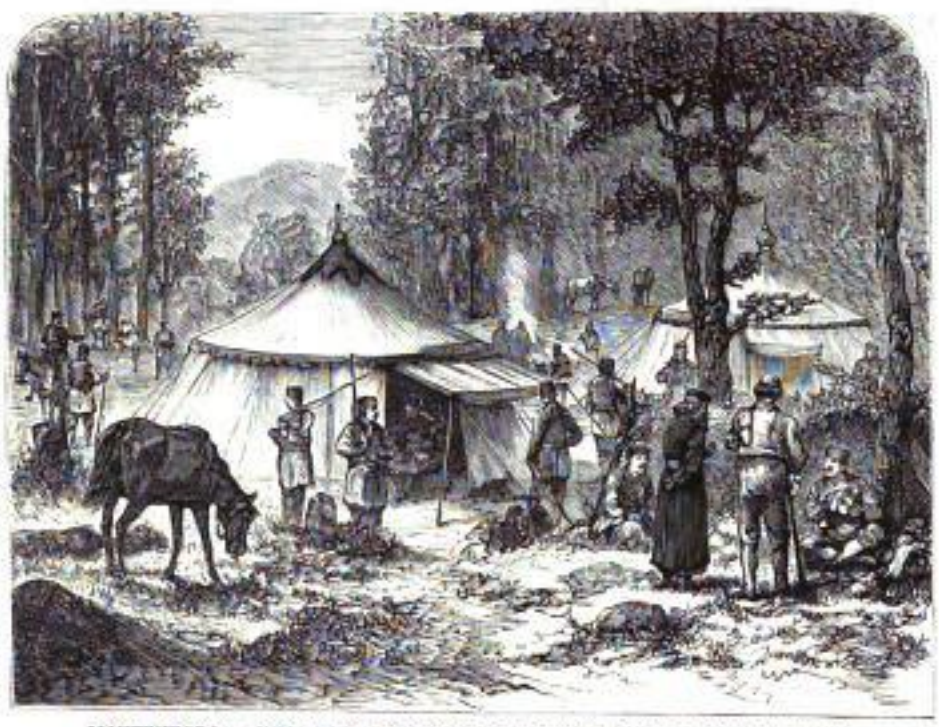
THE Albanian League has determined to resist the cession of Dulcigno to the Montenegrins. At Constantinople it is believed that Riza Pasha is master of the situation and that no serious trouble will occur.

THE election of Gonzales as President has been accepted in every part of the Mexican Republic. Business and the financial situation continue to improve. All current expenses are promptly paid, and debts are being paid off.

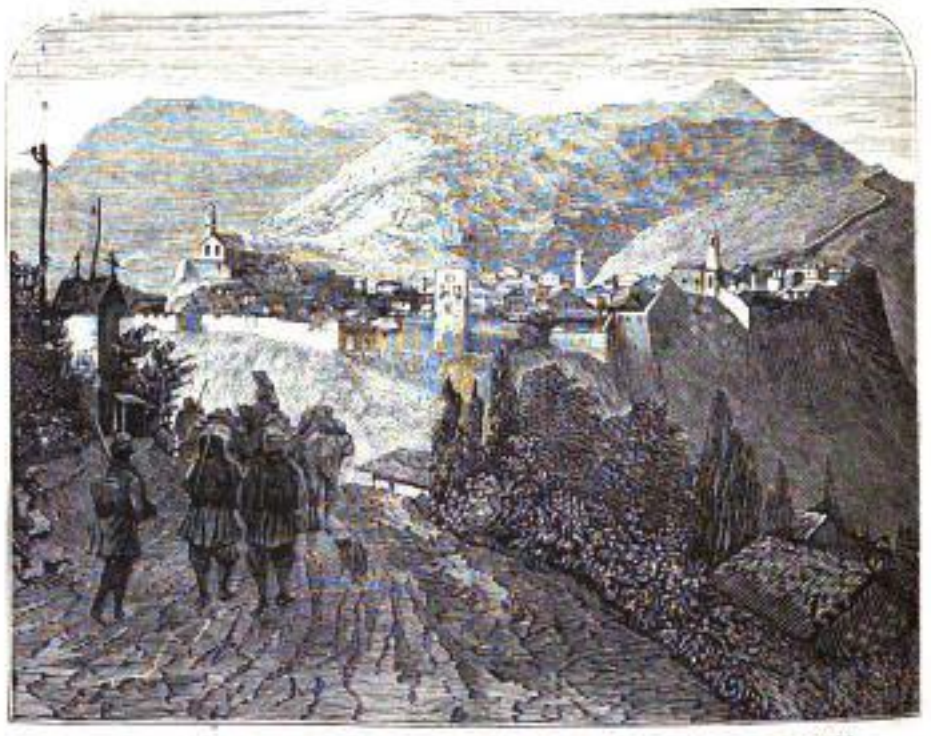


THE Pope has summoned some of the Irish Bishops to instruct them how to act in the present state of affairs in Ireland. The four prisoners arrested for the murder of Lord Mountmorres have been discharged. In a public letter Mr. Forster, the Chief Secretary for Ireland, says, "The first duty of Government is the protection of life and property, but no Government ought to ask exceptional legislation until it has exhausted its ordinary powers.

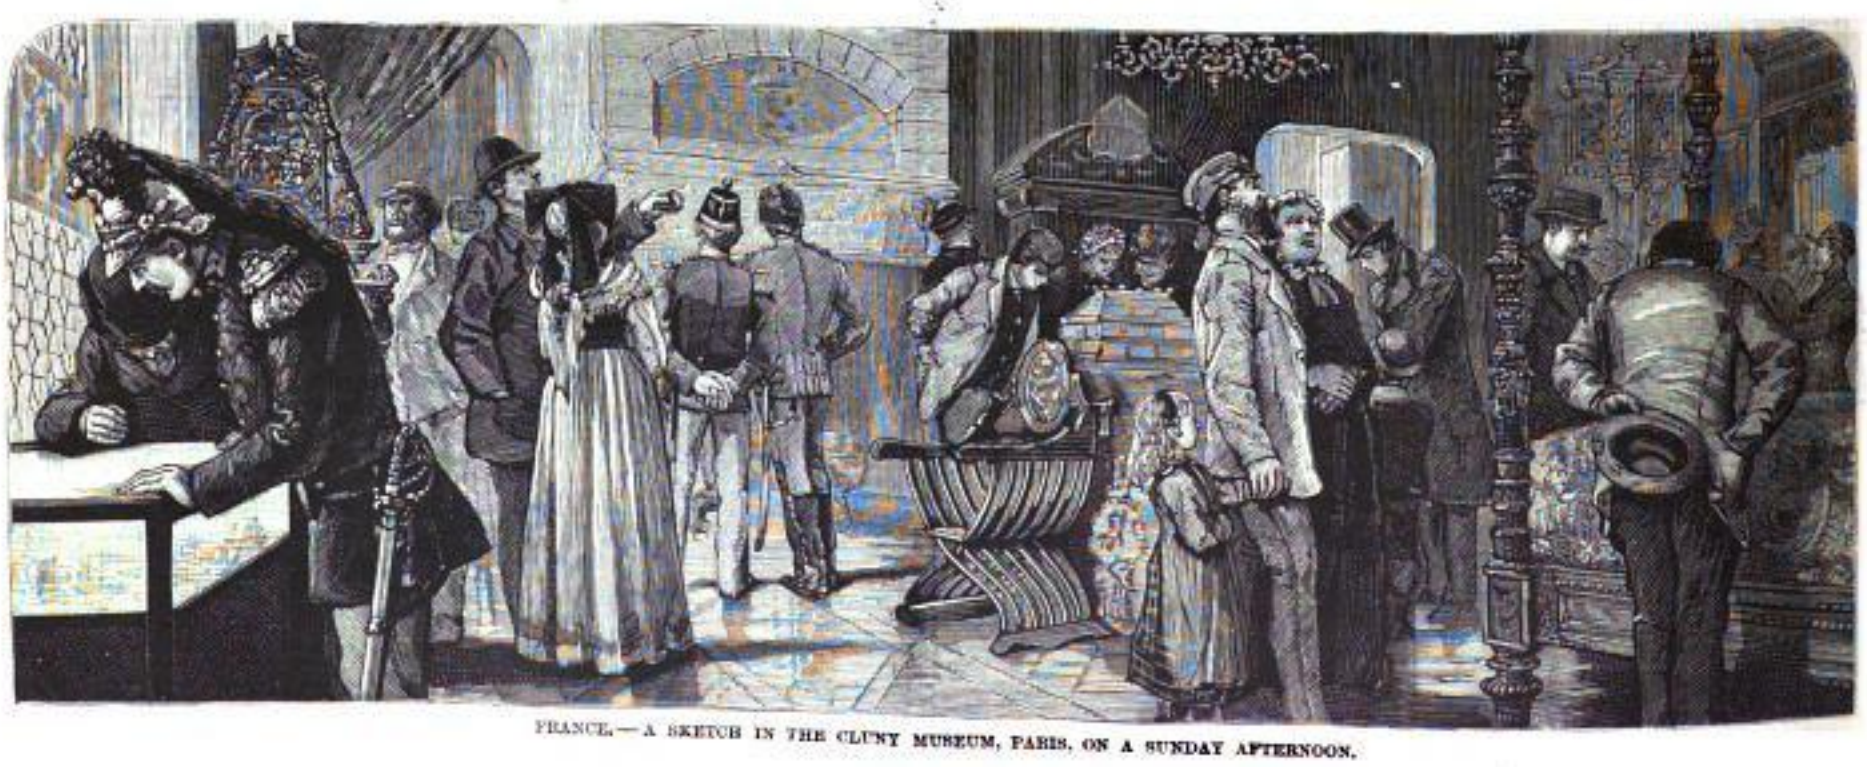
Digitized by Google



The Pictorial Spirit of the Illustrated Foreign Press.—See Page 139.



MONTENEGRO.—ALBANIAN WAR-DANCE IN THE CAMP NEAR DULCIGNO.



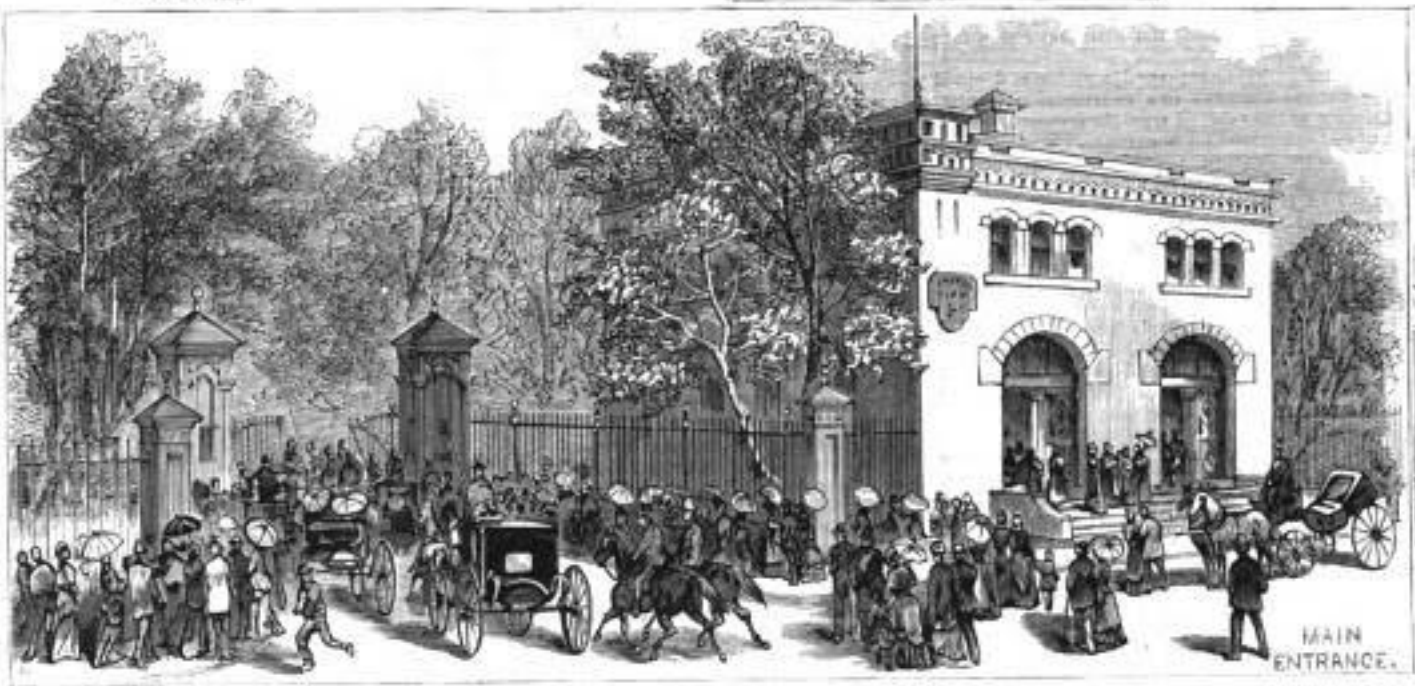
MONTENEGRO.—ALBANIANS CROSSING THE BOYANA TO OCCUPY DULCIGNO.

MONTENEGRO.—HEADQUARTERS AND CAMP OF THE COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF.

THE NEW EASTERN QUESTION.—THE CITY OF ANTIVARI, ON THE ADRIATIC.

FRANCE.—A SKETCH IN THE CLUNY MUSEUM, PARIS, ON A SUNDAY AFTERNOON.

Digitized by Google



AGRICULTURAL HALL

THE CASCADE

ART HALL.

MAIN ENTRANCE.

JOURNAL OF AGRICULTURE

MISSOURI.—TWENTIETH ANNUAL SHOW OF THE ST. LOUIS FAIR ASSOCIATION AT ST. LOUIS.—FROM SKETCHES BY ARMAND WELKER.—SEE PAGE 139.

NEW YORK CITY.—THE MASONIC GRAND LODGE OF NEW YORK LAYING THE CORNER-STONE OF THE FOUNDATION FOR THE OBELISK IN CENTRAL PARK, OCT. 9TH.—SEE PAGE 139.

Digitized by Google

THE BLACK ROBE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

BEFORE THE STORY.

SECOND SCENE.—(CONCLUDED).

IX.

MY record of events approaches its conclusion.

On the next day we returned to the hotel in London. At Romayne's suggestion, I sent the same evening to my own house for any letters which might be waiting for me. His mind still dwelt on the duel: he was morbidly eager to know if any communication had been received from the French surgeon.

When the messenger returned with my letters, the Boulogne postmark was on one of the envelopes. At Romayne's entreaty, this was the letter that I opened first. The surgeon's signature was at the end.

One motive for anxiety—on my part—was set at rest in the first lines. After an official inquiry into the circumstances, the French authorities had decided that it was not expedient to put the survivor of the duelists on his trial before a court of law. No jury hearing the evidence would find him guilty of the only charge that could be formally brought against him—the charge of "homicide by premeditation." Homicide by misadventure, occurring in a duel, was not a punishable offense by the French law. My correspondent cited many cases in proof of it, strengthened by the publicly-expressed opinion of the illustrious Berryer himself. In a word, we had nothing to fear.

The next page of the letter informed us that the police had surprised the card-playing community with whom we had spent the evening at Boulogne, and that the much-bejeweled old landlady had been sent to prison for the offense of keeping a gambling-house. It was suspected in the town that the General was more or less directly connected with certain disreputable circumstances, discovered by the authorities. In any case, he had retired from active service. He and his wife and family had left Boulogne, and had gone away in debt. No investigation had thus far succeeded in discovering the place of their retreat.

Reading this letter aloud to Romayne, I was interrupted by him at the last sentence.

"The inquiries must have been carelessly made," he said. "They ought to have applied to the police. I will see to it myself."

"What interest can you have in the inquiries?" I exclaimed.

"The strongest possible interest," he answered. "It has been my one hope to make some little atonement to the poor people whom I have so cruelly wronged. If the wife and children are in distressed circumstances (which seems to be only too likely), I may place them beyond the reach of anxiety—anonymously, of course. Give me the surgeon's address. I shall write instructions for tracing them at my expense—merely announcing that an Unknown Friend desires to be of service to the General's family."

This appeared to me to be a most imprudent thing to do. I said so plainly—and quite in vain. With his customary impetuosity he wrote the letter at once, and sent it to the post that night.

X.

On the question of submitting himself to medical advice (which I now earnestly pressed upon him), Romayne was disposed to be equally unreasonable. But in this case events declared themselves in my favor.

Lady Patrick's last reserves of strength had given way. She had been brought to London in a dying state while we were at Vange Abbey. Romayne was summoned to his aunt's bedside on the third day of our residence at the hotel, and was present at her death. The impression produced on his mind roused the better part of his nature. He was more distrustful of himself, more accessible to persuasion than usual. In this gentler frame of mind he received a welcome visit from an old friend, to whom he was sincerely attached. The visit—of no great importance in itself—led, as I have since been informed, to very serious events in Romayne's later life. For this reason I briefly relate what took place within my own hearing.

Lord Loring—well known in society as the head of an old English Catholic family, and the possessor of a magnificent gallery of pictures—was distressed by the change for the worse which he perceived in Romayne when he called at the hotel. I was present when they met, and rose to leave the room, feeling that the two friends might, perhaps, be embarrassed by the presence of a third person. Romayne called me back. "Lord Loring ought to know what has happened to me," he said. "I have no heart to speak of it myself. Tell him everything, and if he agrees with you, I will submit to see the doctors." With those words he left us together.

It is almost needless to say that Lord Loring did agree with me. He was himself disposed to think that the moral remedy in Romayne's case might prove to be the best remedy.

"With submission to what the doctors may decide," his lordship said, "the right thing to do, in my opinion, is to divert our friend's mind from himself. I see a plain necessity for making a complete change in the solitary life that he has been leading for years past. Why shouldn't he marry? A woman's influence, by merely giving a new turn to his thoughts, might charm away that horrible voice which haunts him. Perhaps you think this a merely sentimental view of the case? Look at it practically, if you like, and you come to the same conclusion. With that fine estate—and with the fortune which he has now inherited from his aunt—it is his duty to marry. Don't you agree with me?"

"I agree most cordially. But I see serious difficulties in your lordship's way. Romayne dislikes society; and, as to marrying, his coldness towards women seems (so far as I can judge) to be one of the incurable defects of his character."

Lord Loring smiled. "My dear sir, nothing of that sort is incurable, if we can only find the right woman."

The tone in which he spoke suggested to me that he had got "the right woman," and I took the liberty of saying so. He at once acknowledged that I had guessed right.

"Romayne is, as you say, a difficult subject to deal with," he resumed. "If I commit the slightest imprudence, I shall excite his suspicion—and there will be an end of my hope of being of service to him. I shall proceed carefully, I can tell you. Luckily, poor dear fellow, he is fond of pictures! It's quite natural that I should ask him to see some recent additions to my gallery—isn't it? There is the trap that I set! I have a sweet girl to tempt him, staying at my house, who is a little out of health and spirits herself. At the right moment, I shall send word up-stairs. She may well happen to look in at the gallery (by the merest accident) just at the time when Romayne is looking at my new pictures. The rest depends, of course, on the effect she produces. If you knew her, I believe you would agree with me that the experiment is worth trying."

Not knowing the lady, I had little faith in the success of the experiment. No one, however, could doubt Lord Loring's admirable devotion to his friend, and with that I was fain to be content.

When Romayne returned to us, it was decided to submit his case to a consultation of physicians at the earliest possible moment. When Lord Loring took his departure, I accompanied him to the door of the hotel, perceiving that he wished to say a word more to me in private. He had, it seemed, decided on waiting for the result of the medical consultation before he tried the effect of the young lady's attractions; and he wished to caution me against speaking prematurely of visiting the picture gallery to our friend.

Not feeling particularly interested in these details of the worthy nobleman's little plot, I looked at his carriage, and privately admired the two splendid horses that drew it. The footman opened the door for his master, and I became aware, for the first time, that a gentleman had accompanied Lord Loring to the hotel, and had waited for him in the carriage. The gentleman bent forward, and looked up from a book that he was reading. To my astonishment, I recognized the elderly, fat and cheerful priest, who had shown such a knowledge of localities, and such an extraordinary interest in Vange Abbey!

It struck me as an odd coincidence that I should see the man again in London so soon after I had met with him in Yorkshire. This was all I thought about it at the time. If I had known then, what I now know, I might have dreamed, let us say, of throwing that priest into the lake at Vange, and might perhaps have reckoned the circumstance among the wisely-improved opportunities of my life!

To return to the serious interests of the present narrative, I may now announce that my evidence as an eye-witness of events has come to an end. The day after Lord Loring's visit domestic troubles separated me, to my most sincere regret, from Romayne. I have only to add that the foregoing narrative of personal experience has been written with a due sense of responsibility, and that it may be depended on throughout as an exact statement of the truth.

JOHN PHILIP HYND,
Late Major, 110th Regiment

THE STORY.

CHAPTER I.—THE CONFIDENCES.

IN an upper room of one of the palatial houses which are situated on the north side of Hyde Park two ladies sat at breakfast, and gossiped over their tea.

The elder of the two was Lady Loring—still in the prime of life; possessed of the golden hair and the clear blue eyes, the delicately-florid complexion, and the freely developed figure, which are among the favorite attractions popularly associated with the beauty of Englishwomen. Her younger companion was the unknown lady admired by Major Hynd on the sea-passage from France to England. With hair and eyes of the darkest brown; with a pure pallor of complexion, only changing to a faint rose tint in moments of agitation; with a tall, graceful figure incompletely developed in substance and strength—she presented an almost complete contrast to Lady Loring. Two more opposite types of beauty it would have been scarcely possible to place at the same table.

The servant brought in the letters of the morning. Lady Loring ran through her correspondence rapidly, pushed away the letters in a heap, and poured herself out a second cup of tea.

"Nothing interesting this morning for me," she said. "Any news of your mother, Stella?"

The young lady handed an open letter to her hostess, with a faint smile.

"See for yourself, Adelaide," she answered, with the tender sweetness of tone which made her voice irresistibly charming, "and tell me if there were ever two women so utterly unlike each other as my mother and myself."

Lady Loring ran through the letter, as she had run through her own correspondence.

"Never, dearest Stella, have I enjoyed myself as I do in this delightful country house—twenty-seven at dinner every day, without including the neighbors—a little carpet dance every evening—we play billiards, and go into the smoking-room—the hounds meet three times a week—all sorts of celebrities among the company, famous beauties included—such dresses! such conversation!—and serious duties, my dear, not neglected—high church and choral service in the town on Sundays—recitations in the evening from 'Paradise Lost' by an amateur elocutionist! Oh, you foolish child! why did you make excuses and stay in London, when you might have accompanied me to this earthly Paradise?—are you really ill?—my love to Lady Loring—and, of course, if you are ill, you must have medical advice—they ask after you so kindly here—the first dinner-bell is ringing, before I have half done my letter—what am I to wear?—why is my daughter not here to advise me, etc., etc., etc."

"There is time to change your mind, and advise your mother," Lady Loring remarked, with grave irony, as she returned the letter.

"Don't even speak of it!" said Stella. "I really know no life that I should not prefer to the life that my mother is enjoying at his moment. What would I have done, Adelaide, if you had not offered me a happy refuge in your house? My 'earthly paradise' is here, where I am allowed to dream away my time over my drawings and my books, and to resign myself to poor health and low spirits, without being dragged into society, and (worse still) threatened with that 'medical advice' in which my poor dear mother believes so implicitly. I wish you would hire me as your 'companion,' and let me stay here for the rest of my life."

Lady Loring's bright face became grave while Stella was speaking.

"My dear," she said, kindly, "I know well how you love retirement, and how differently you think and feel from other young women of your age. And I am far from forgetting what sad circumstances have encouraged the natural bent of your disposition. But, since you have been staying with me this time, I see something in you which my intimate knowledge of your character fails to explain. We have been friends since we were together at school, and, in those old days, we never had any secrets from each other. You are feeling some anxiety, or brooding over some sorrow, of which I know nothing. I don't ask for your confidence; I only tell you what I have noticed, and I say with all my heart, Stella, I am sorry for you."

She rose, and with intuitive delicacy, changed the subject. "I am going out earlier than usual this morning," she resumed. "Is there anything I can do for you?" She laid her hand tenderly on Stella's shoulder, waiting for the reply. Stella lifted the hand, and kissed it with passionate tenderness.

"Don't think me ungrateful," she said; "I am only ashamed." Her head sank on her bosom; she burst into tears.

Lady Loring waited by her in silence. She well knew the girl's self-contained nature, always shrinking, except in moments of violent emotion, from the outward betrayal of its trials and its sufferings to others. The true depth of feeling which is marked by this inbred modesty is most frequently found in men. The few women who possess it are without the communicative consolations of the feminine heart. They are the noblest, and but too often the unhappiest of their sex.

"Will you wait a little before you go out?" Stella asked, softly. She had conquered her tears, but her head still drooped while she spoke.

Lady Loring silently returned to the chair that she had left—hesitated for a moment—and then drew it nearer to Stella. "Shall I sit by you?" she said.

"Close by me. You spoke of our school days just now, Adelaide. There was some difference between us. Of all the girls, I was the youngest—and you were the eldest, or nearly the eldest, I think?"

"Quite the eldest, my dear. There is a difference of ten years between us. But why do you go back to that?"

"It is only a recollection. My father was alive then. I was at first homesick and frightened in the strange place, among the big girls. You used to let me hide my face on your shoulder and tell me stories. May I hide in the old way and tell my story?"

She was now the calmest of the two. The elder woman turned a little pale, and looked down in silent anxiety at the darkly beautiful head that rested on her shoulder.

"After such an experience as mine has been," said Stella, "would you think it possible that I could ever again feel my heart troubled by a man—and that man a stranger?"

"My dear! I think it quite possible. You are only now in your twenty-third year. You were innocent of all blame, at that wretched bygone time which you ought never to speak of again. Love and be happy, Stella—if you can only find the man who is worthy of you. But you frighten me when you speak of a stranger. Where did you meet with him?"

"On our way back from Paris."

"Traveling in the same carriage with you?"

"No—it was in crossing the Channel. There were very few travelers in the steamboat or I might never have noticed him."

"Did he speak to you?"

"He never even looked at me."

"That doesn't say much for his taste, Stella."

"You don't understand—I mean, I have not explained myself properly. He was leaning on the arm of a friend; weak and worn and wasted, as I supposed, by some long and dreadful illness. There was an angelic sweetness in his face—such patience! such resignation! For heaven's sake keep my secret. One hears of men falling in love with women at first sight. But a woman who looks at a man, and feels—oh, it's shameful! I could scarcely take my eyes off him. If he had looked at me in return, I don't know what I should have done—I burn when I think of it. He was absorbed in his suffering and his sorrow. My last look at his beautiful face was on the pier, before they took me away. The perfect image of him has been in my heart ever since. In my dreams, I see him as plainly as I see you now. Don't despise me, Adelaide!"

"My dear, you interest me indescribably. Do you suppose he was in our rank of life? I mean, of course, did he look like a gentleman?"

"There could be no doubt of it."

"Do try to describe him, Stella. Was he tall and well dressed?"

"Neither tall nor short—rather thin—quiet and graceful in all his movements—dressed plainly, in perfect taste. How can I describe him? When his friend brought him on board, he stood at the side of the vessel, looking out thoughtfully towards the sea. Such eyes I never saw before, Adelaide, in any human face—so divinely tender and sad—and the color of them that dark violet blue, so uncommon and so beautiful—too beautiful for a man. I may say the same of his hair. I saw it completely. For a minute or two, he removed his hat—his head was severed, I think—and he let the sea breeze blow over it. The pure light-brown of his hair was just warmed by a lovely reddish tinge. His beard was of the same color; short and curling, like the beards of the Roman heroes one sees in pictures. I shall never see him again—and it is best for me that I shall not. What can I hope from a man who never once noticed me? But I should like to hear that he had recovered his health and his tranquillity, and that his life was a happy one. It has been a comfort to me, Adelaide, to open my heart to you. I am getting bold enough to confess everything. Would you laugh at me, I wonder, if I——"

She stopped. Her pale complexion softly glowed into color; her grand dark eyes brightened—she looked her loveliest at that moment.

"I am far more inclined, Stella, to cry over you than to laugh at you," said Lady Loring. "There is something, to my mind, very sad about this adventure of yours. I wish I could find out who the man is. Even the best description of a person falls so short of the reality!"

"I thought of showing you something," Stella continued, "which might help you to see him as I saw him. It's only making one more acknowledgment of my own folly."

"You don't mean a portrait of him!" Lady Loring exclaimed.

"The best that I could do from recollection," Stella answered, sadly.

"Bring it here directly!"

Stella left the room, and returned with a little drawing in pencil. The instant Lady Loring looked at it, she recognized Romayne, and started excitedly to her feet.

"You know him!" cried Stella.

Lady Loring had placed herself in an awkward position. Her husband had described to her his interview with Major Hynd; and had mentioned his project for bringing Romayne and Stella together, after first exacting a promise of the strictest secrecy from his wife. She felt herself bound—doubly bound, after what she had now discovered—to respect the confidence placed in her; and this at the time when she had betrayed herself to Stella! With a woman's feline fineness of perception, in all cases of subterfuge and concealment she picked a part of the truth out of the whole, and answered harmlessly without a moment's hesitation.

"I have certainly seen him," she said, "probably at some party. But I see so many people, and I go to so many places, that I must ask for time to consult my memory. My husband might help me, if you don't object to my asking him," she added, slyly.

Stella snatched the drawing away from her in terror. "You don't mean that you will tell Lord Loring!" she said.

"My dear child, how can you be so foolish? Can't I show him the drawing without mentioning who it was done by? His memory is a much better one than mine. If I say to him, 'Where did we meet that man?'—he may tell me at once—he may even remember the name. Of course, if you like to be kept in suspense, you have only to say so. It rests with you to decide."

Poor Stella gave way directly. She returned the drawing, and affectionately kissed her artful friend. Having now secured the means of consulting her husband without exciting suspicion, Lady Loring left the room.

At that time in the morning, Lord Loring was generally to be found either in the library or the picture gallery. His wife tried the library first.

On entering the room, she found but one person in it—not the person of whom she was in search. There, buttoned up in his long frock coat, and surrounded by books of all sorts and sizes, sat the plump, elderly priest who had been the especial object of Major Hynd's aversion.

"I beg your pardon, Father Benwell, said Lady Loring; "I hope I don't interrupt your studies?"

Father Benwell rose and bowed with a pleasant paternal smile. "I am only trying to organize an improved arrangement of the library," he said, simply. "Books are companionable creatures—members, as it were, of his family to a lonely old priest, like myself. Can I be of any service to your ladyship?"

"Thank you, Father. If you can kindly tell me where Lord Loring is——"

"To be sure! His lordship was here five minutes since—he is now in the picture gallery. I pray permit me!"

With a remarkably light and easy step for a man of his age and size, he advanced to the further end of the library, and opened the door which led into the gallery.

"Lord Loring is among the pictures," he announced. "And alone." He laid a certain emphasis on the last word, which might or might not (in the case of a spiritual director of the household) invite a word of explanation.

Lady Loring merely said, "Just what I wanted; thank you once more, Father Benwell"—and passed into the picture-gallery.

Left by himself again in the library, the priest walked slowly to and fro, thinking. His latent power and resolution began to show themselves darkly in his face. A skilled observer would now have seen plainly revealed in him the habit of command, and the capacity for insisting on his right to be obeyed. From head to foot, Father Purwell was one of those valuable soldiers of the Church who acknowledge no defeat, and who improve every victory.

Digitized by Google

After a while, he returned to the table at which he had been writing when Lady Loring entered the room. An unfinished letter lay open on the desk. He took up his pen, and completed it in these words: "I have therefore decided on trusting this serious matter in the hands of Arthur Penrose. I know he is young – but we have to set against the drawback of his youth the counter merits of his incorruptible honesty and his true religious zeal. No better man is just now within my reach – and there is no time to lose. Romayne has recently inherited a large increase of fortune. He will be the object of the basest conspiracies – conspiracies of men to win his money, and, worse still, of women to marry him. Even these contemptible efforts may be obstacles in the way of our righteous purpose, unless we are first in the field. Penrose left Oxford last week. I expect him here this morning, by my invitation. When I have given him the necessary instructions, and have found the means of favorably introducing him to Romayne, I shall have the honor of forwarding a statement of our prospects so far."

Having signed these lines, he addressed the letter to "The Reverend the Secretary, Society of Jesus, Rome." As he closed and sealed the envelope, a servant opened the door communicating with the hall, and announced:

"Mr. Arthur Penrose."

(To be continued.)

THE KING'S MOUNTAIN CENTENNIAL.

THE celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the battle of King's Mountain began on the battle-ground on Tuesday, October 5th. The following military companies were encamped on the grounds, Tuesday: Richmond Howitzers, from Richmond, Va.; Cleveland Guard, from Shelby, N. C.; Jenkins Rifles, from Yorkville, S. C.; King's Mountain Military School Cadets, from Yorkville, S. C.; King's Mountain High School Cadets, from King's Mountain, N. C. Late in the afternoon there arrived the Salisbury Rifles, from Salisbury, N. C., and the Carolina Military School Cadets, from Charlotte, N. C., under charge of Captain G. W. Evans, of the United States Army. One of the most important features of the occasion was the United States Post Band, from McPherson Barracks, who discoursed most excellent music during the day.

The programme for the first day was the reunion of States. There were about 5,000 people on the grounds, half of whom attended the speaking. The speakers' stand was in the form of an amphitheatre, with standards bearing the initials of the original thirteen States. On the stand were seated the speakers of the day, executive committee of the Centennial Association, commanding officers of the different military companies, reporters and other prominent men.

The ceremonies were opened with prayer by the Rev. Ellison Caper; Governor Jeter of South Carolina was the first speaker, and, on the conclusion of his remarks, introduced the other speakers in the following order: Judge Daniel G. Fowle, of North Carolina; Judge T. N. Van Dyke, of Tennessee; Rev David E. Butler, of Georgia; Hon. S. W. Williams, of Arkansas, and J. M. McNeal, of Mississippi.

Colonel Coward said he thought he would be doing injustice to the States not represented on this occasion if some allusion were not made about the gallant part they performed in freeing our country from British tyranny. He then proposed three cheers for each of the States of Virginia, New Jersey, Rhode Island, New York and Massachusetts, which were given with a will. The ceremonies of the day were then announced as closed, and the audience dispersed while the band played "Yankee Doodle."

On Wednesday a dress parade, under the command of General Hunt, of the United States Army, was held at 12 o'clock. The balance of the day was spent by the multitudes in roaming over the battle-ground looking at the curiosities and searching for relics. At the foot of the hill is a rude monument, placed there years ago to commemorate the battle. On it is an inscription stating that Colonel Ferguson was here slain, and giving the names of some of the American officers killed. About half way up the hill is a slab marking the spot on which Ferguson fell. The Relic House was a point of considerable interest. Among the relics on exhibition were a wooden canteen and sword used by Benjamin Ormand in the battle. The sword is apparently home-made, with the words "Victory or death" etched on the blade. There is also etched on the blade several arrows shooting out of a cloud towards a crown. Also a Bible printed in 1769, owned by the same man, and taken from him by the Tories; a piece of epaulet; piece of shoe-buckle and knee-buckle worn by Colonel Joe McDowell; watch-chain dug from Ferguson's grave; sword captured in the battle; powder-horn used in the battle, and a sword, complete the list. The latter is worthy of special notice. It is a fine Toledo blade, and has engraved on the reverse side the Spanish motto, "No me cobraes sin razon," which is translated, "Sheathe me not without honor"; on the obverse, "No me sagues sin razon"—"Draw me not without reason." Tennessee, through her Historical Society, represented by Mr. S. A. Cunningham, a commissioner, furnished for the entertainment of visitors to the celebration the sash worn by Ferguson in the battle of King's Mountain, the sword worn by Colonel Du Puyster, who finally surrendered the British forces, and the elegant dress sword presented by North Carolina to Colonel John Sevier for gallantry in that battle.

On Thursday, which was the anniversary day proper, there was a very large concourse of people. The exercises began with a national salute at sunrise by the Richmond (Va.) Howitzers, and at 10 A. M. a review of all the troops was held by General Hunt, of the United States Army, after which the large assemblage crowded around the speakers' stand, which had been erected in one of the ravines which led down the side of the mountain. Seats had been provided for five hundred people on the stand, and these, with the seats on the side of the mountain for the audience, formed one vast amphitheatre. A lyric, written by Mrs. Clara Dargan McLean, of Yorkville, S. C., and set to music by Professor E. W. Limeback, of Salem, N. C., was sung by an improvised choir with fine effect, led by the Fifth United States Artillery Band. The rostrum was decorated by one immense United States flag and others representing the thirteen original States. After this came the reading of an ode written for the occasion by Paul H. Hayne, of South Carolina. The reader was Colonel Charles C. Jones, of Augusta, Ga. Hon. John W. Daniel then delivered the oration, which was universally pronounced to be a magnificent effort. After the speaking a procession was formed and marched to the monument, a few hundred yards distant, and the ceremony of unveiling it was conducted by four young ladies, supported by Governors Jarvis of North Carolina, Holliday of Virginia, Jeter of South Carolina, and General Campbell of Tennessee, the vast audience singing the Doxology. The Eutaw flag, the Hornet's Nest Riflemen's flag, and the flag of the Charlotte Grays were brought upon the stand and kept there during the exercises. At 5 o'clock a dress parade was held, and at night the ceremonies were concluded by a grand pyrotechnic display.

In May of last year the people of the village of King's Mountain formed a "King's Mountain Centennial Association," with Colonel Asbury Coward, of Yorkville, S. C., as president. The Legislatures of North and South Carolina were memorialized, and last Winter they appropriated $2,500 for the erection of a monument. Six hundred dollars was raised by individual subscriptions, and the work was begun. The massive column as it lifts its head above the summit of the mountain impresses the beholder with the idea of substantial workmanship and durability combined with symmetry of form. It presents rather an unfinished and bald appearance, and seems to be lacking in appropriate ornamentation. The base and pile are of solid gray granite, hewn out of a quarry in York County, only six miles distant. The stone is fine-grained and of the very best quality, being similar to that of which the Capitol building in Columbia, S. C., is constructed. The shaft rises in pyramid form to a height of twenty-nine feet. On one side there is a beautiful tablet of snow-white Vermont marble. Upon this tablet are engraved all the names of the Americans who fell in the battle. Only twenty-eight names appear on the slab now, but when others are obtained by the committee they will be added, so as to make the record complete. When completed it will be surmounted by a bronze figure of heroic size of a Southern soldier of one hundred years ago, clad in the garb of a frontiersman and loading in his hand a long rifle, which he is busy loading while he ascends the mountain.

THE ST. LOUIS FAIR.

THE St. Louis Fair has grown to be an institution not only of pride to the city but to the people of Missouri and several adjacent States. They look forward to its annual recurrence as if it was something in which they were deeply interested pecuniarily, and the result is a grand success every year, with the prospect of a greater triumph the following season.

Monday, October 4th, was opening day, and it was also children's day. The public schools closed their doors, the private institutions had suspended for a day, and fully 30,000 little people turned out to review the sights and scenes of the previous year and see what changes and additions had been made. They never wearied of the Zoo Zoo. Around the cages of the happy family and the den of grizzly bears hundreds of them were congregated throughout the day. The sea-lions proved to be the greatest curiosities on the ground. So great was the throng constantly around the pool that a guard was required apparently for the purpose of affording protection to the two black, ugly inhabitants of the stagnant pond, but really for keeping order among the little sight-seers and preventing them from injuring each other in their anxiety to get a good view. After seeing the lions of the sea and then those of the jungle, the mass would surge over to the departments and review them with as much tardiness as the superintendents and assistants would allow them.

The main Art Hall was not opened to the general public. The reason for this was that on the school-children's day last year a great amount of damage was done to the pictures by the youngsters and their erratic guardians; and this year, there being tenfold the value of paintings, it became absolutely necessary to keep the hall closed. The insurance on the pictures in Art Hall and in the annex this season is $183,000. This will give a rough idea of the importance of taking all precautions necessary to prevent damage.

The exhibits of agricultural implements, textile fabrics, machinery, fruits and vegetables, cattle, sheep, poultry and dogs, were far more numerous than in previous fairs of the association. In the line of entertainment, a variety of races was provided daily in the amphitheatre, and the premium lists for all manner of displays aggregated a liberal sum of money.

THE OBELISK'S CORNER-STONE.

THE laying of the corner-stone of the Egyptian obelisk in Central Park, near the Museum of Fine Arts, on October 9th, was attended by imposing ceremonies. The stone was laid by Most Worshipful Jesse B. Anthony, Grand Master of Masons in the State of New York, assisted by the Grand Lodge and some 250 Masonic lodges, and escorted by the Grand Commandery of Knights Templar and ten commanderies of New York and Brooklyn and four visiting commanderies. The day was delightfully fine, and the result was a full representation of the best lodges in the jurisdiction. The commanderies and lodges formed on the side streets, their right resting on Fifth Avenue. The avenue and the side streets in the vicinity were thronged with spectators from Fifteenth Street to Twenty first Street. The different bodies marched into line in Fifth Avenue soon after two o'clock, and began their march to Eighty-second Street

When the head of the procession arrived at the East Eighty-second Street gate of the Park, ranks were opened, and through them rode the Grand Lodge, preceded by Anglo-Saxon Lodge. They were escorted by the Grand Marshal and his staff. The District Deputy Grand Masters and the Masters and Wardens of lodges followed the Grand Master. When they had all passed through the open ranks, the ranks closed, and the entire line moved through the Park to the site of the monument. Blocks of masonry had been laid on a rocky summit, and one large block was suspended from a derrick. Directly beneath it was the square cavity into which it was to be lowered. While the throng of 2,000 or 3,000 persons were waiting for the arrival of the procession, many memorial nickel medals were sold at twenty-five cents each. On one side they bore the legend, "The Egyptian obelisk was transported from Egypt and erected in Central Park, N. Y., in 1880." This legend inclosed a representation of the obelisk. On the other side were represented a Masonic square, a compass, a Templar cross and the letter "G." About these symbols was the legend, "Corner-stone laid by the Grand Lodge, F. & A.M., State of N. Y., Oct. 9, 1880."

Upon reaching the site of the obelisk, Grand Master Anthony and the other officers took their places on the foundation, and the commanderies and lodges were massed around it as near as possible, and in as much order as the irregularities of the rocky ground would permit. The Masonic ceremonial was then gone through with. The square, the plumb and the level were applied to the stone by different officers of the Grand Lodge, and then Grand Master Anthony dropped some cement into the cavity beneath the stone from a silver trowel. As the stone was lowered Lieutenant Commander Derringe laid hold of it and aided the contracting mason to steady it into place. When the chain that had held the stone was relieved of its strain, the Grand Master struck it three times with a mallet and declared in a loud voice that the stone was plumb, level and square, and that it was well-formed, true and trusty, and duly laid. The Deputy Grand Master then poured upon the stone a few grains of wheat from a silver cup, while he repeated the appropriate words of the ritual. Past Grand Master Simmons poured wine upon the stone, explaining that it was the emblem of joy and gladness. Past Grand Master Ralph E. Prime poured oil upon the stone. Then Grand Master Anthony lifted his face to the sky and prayed that blessings might fall upon the structure and upon all interested in it. He prayed especially that no accident might befall the workmen engaged in the work. He wore an apron, and the right lapel of his coat was emblazoned with the golden symbols of Masonry. Above these symbols was a small red buttonhole bouquet. From his waist on his left side depended a blue cord and tassel. He is a spare featured, light-complexioned man of medium height, and with a pleasing address.

After the prayer the Grand Marshal presented Lieutenant-Commander Gorringe to the Grand Master, who formally congratulated him on the success of his work, and assured him that what he had done would carry his name down to the remotest posterity. The Grand Master, then taking his stand on one side of the stone, and, speaking in a loud voice, proclaimed the stone duly laid. He closed his proclamation with the words: "This from the South." This proclamation was repeated in the same way from the West and from the East. After this he led the Grand Lodge and all the other Masons within hearing in giving three times three claps with the palms of the hands.

Mr. Anthony made an address, in which he dwelt upon the learning of the ancient Egyptians, declaring that the obelisk was itself a book of history. He contended that Masonry was the natural outgrowth of ancient societies engaged as operative bands—societies which had left their traces in monuments, temples and pyramids—though it was true that many of these societies combined religious forms and ceremonies entirely foreign and antagonistic to Masonry.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

The New Eastern Question.

The issue raised between the Montenegrin and Albanian populations of the countries on the east shore of the Adriatic is not a new one; but is a renewal of a secular struggle, in which the two nationalities have ebbed and flowed over the shores of the Scutari Lake and to the Drin. The whole of what is now Ghegaria or Northern Albania was, previous to the Turkish conquest, in undisturbed occupation of the Serbs of the Zeta, of which kingdom Scutari was at one time the capital. Five hundred years ago, and down to the moment of the great crisis of the struggle between the Servian and Turkish Empires, marked by the battle of Kossovo, the whole of the country north of the Drin was subject to Servia. The League of Albanian tribes, which is resolved to resist Montenegro, as well as Greece, with respect to the transfer of Albanian territory decided upon in Berlin, has only existed for a short period of time. It was founded by the Mohammedan class in Northern Albania and, from its very commencement was favored by the Government at Constantinople. This latter foresaw the occupation of Bosnia and the Herzegovina by the Austrians, and regarded it as the first great stride of the advance to Salonica, to which it was the Porte's object to oppose an insurmountable barrier in the shape of an Albania carefully organized for vigorous resistance. The Conference of this year at Berlin resolved that Montenegro should be put in definitive possession of the seaport town and district of Dulcigno, on the west side of the Lake of Scutari, forming the strip of land between that lake and the Adriatic. The Montenegrins had indeed captured Dulcigno, as well as Antivari and Spizza, during the late war, but had been induced to relinquish the first-named place at the time of the Congress of Berlin. The Turkish Government formally agreed to the cession of Dulcigno, but the Albanian League prevented the execution of that agreement.

While keeping watch and ward on the frontier, the Faithful among the Skipetars, or Albanians, will not omit the strict ceremonial of their great fast of Ramazan, though by the letter of the law they can claim exemption. After the prescribed fast, lasting from dawn to sunset, is over for the day, and when the evening meal is finished, the Moslem makes merry in his staid fashion, with music and dancing. The scene here depicted is truly picturesque. The Skipetars are squatting in a circle, with the dancer in the middle, lighted up by the scant rays of the lanterns, and in the background is the Adriatic, on which they are soon to see the ships of the six Powers of Europe. After the introductory step, the dancer, getting more excited, throws away the handkerchief and spins round the circle with a short, jerking movement; or, changing his step, throws himself on one knee, now and then, bounding up again after the fashion of a bare-back rider of the equestrian circus. Suddenly the music changes, and the dancer walks slowly round, stopping to borrow from Ibrahim Beg and the chief next him their yataghans, splendid with silver-gilt filigree handles, and having keen blue steel blades, inlaid with verses from the Koran. These he draws from the chased silver scabbards, and, placing the bare points in his girdle, with arms outstretched resumes his dance, quickening from his slow polka step until he is wildly springing round in the centre, with the gleaming blades stretching from his hands to his waist. Again there is a pause, and then he executes another figure. This time the blades are placed under the armpits, and in this position the dancer goes through the process of bumping, first on one knee, then on the other, round the ring of lookers-on. Faster and faster grows the dance, till, disdaining to fall any more on his knees, the performer spins wildly in the middle of the ring, and so continues until music and dancer stop suddenly, and one of the onlookers vociferates a "Well done!" as the only applause due to what is really a most arduous performance.

On the last day of the Mohammedan festival of Bairam the Scutari levies marched to defend their frontier. The artist has chosen the moment when they crossed the bridge over the Bojana to make his sketch of their marching array. At the head of the column marched the Zagari, playing their wild music on a sort of Eastern drum, and just behind them rides a stalwart Hadji, clad in full mountain costume, even to the yataghan and pistols, and with no sign of his sacred office but the full white turban on his head. The Begs and their retainers follow, also dressed in mountain costume. Across the bridge, and rising straight up from the Bojana and the Bazaar, is the gray craggy rock on which is perched the old castle of Scodra, or Scutari, frowning down on the three rivers and the plains, and guarding the outlet of the beautiful lake. Below the castle, on the left, lies the city itself, half hidden among the many trees of its gardens and courtyards, with little more than the stately minarets and broad red-tiled roofs showing above the sea of green tree-tops.

A Continental Sunday.

Nothing strikes an Englishman on his first trip abroad, or a foreigner making a first visit to England, than the difference between the aspect of England on Sunday and that of any Continental town. In all English cities everything is simply closed save the churches, the cigar-shops, and the public-houses, and the streets wear a rigidly Sabbatarian air. On the Continent Sunday is a very different day. There the divine principle that the Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath is amply carried out. Abroad, whether in France or in Germany, the museums may be seen thronged with members of the humbler classes—whole families may be heard discussing the merits of this and that work of art, or asking questions of the attendants in a manner which shows a very fair grasp of the subject. Take the Cluny Museum at Paris, for example, that marvelous collection of antique furniture, grand old tapestries, and porcelain of every form and epoch. Could a boy destined to be a workman—whether carpenter or mason, worker or painter, or what not—spend a more profitable afternoon than there?

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

—CHILI and Peru have accepted the offer of mediation by the United States.

—THERE is a great insurrection of the Mahommedans in Kashgar against the Chinese.

—KING THEEBAW, of Burmah, is preparing to make war against the British with an army of 2,000 men.

—GENERAL ROCA has been proclaimed President of the Argentine Confederation. Perfect tranquility now prevails.

—ICE-MANUFACTURING machines have been sent out to military posts in Central Asia to supply the Russian troops with ice in hot weather.

—DURING their five weeks' service in July and August the special medical corps of New York City visited 36,640 houses, 210,966 families and 6,328 patients, and gave 5,135 prescriptions.

—THE Grand Lama of Thibet is seriously ill, and the Emperor of China has been asked to select a successor to whom the dying Lama can impart his divine attributes. The income of the Lama is over $2,000,000 yearly.

THE last new gun at Woolwich weighs 101 tons, is 34 feet long, 6 feet 6 inches in diameter at the breech, and 2 feet 6 inches at the muzzle. It is charged with 425 pounds of pebble powder and carries a shot 2,021 pounds in weight.

—THE Kurds who recently entered Persian territory have sacked the towns of Miraudad and four larger villages and massacred the inhabitants. A Persian force is proceeding against them, but it will take ten days to reach the scene of action.

—IN view of possible coming troubles, extensive military preparations are now making in the West of Ireland. The constabulary have asked for 67,000 additional rounds of buckshot. Two more men have been arrested in connection with the Lord Mountmorres murder.

—IT has been decided in the Treasury Department that the payment of the value of a destroyed bond to a claimant not the legal owner does not deprive the real owner of the right to subsequent payment, and that such payment should be charged to an account for relief by Congress.

—JUVENILE delinquents in England are now to be whipped in most cases, instead of being imprisoned, and supplies of birch-rods are being sent to all the police stations. A physician must always be present at a whipping, a precaution never taken at English public schools of the Eton, Winchester, Charterhouse type, it may be observed.

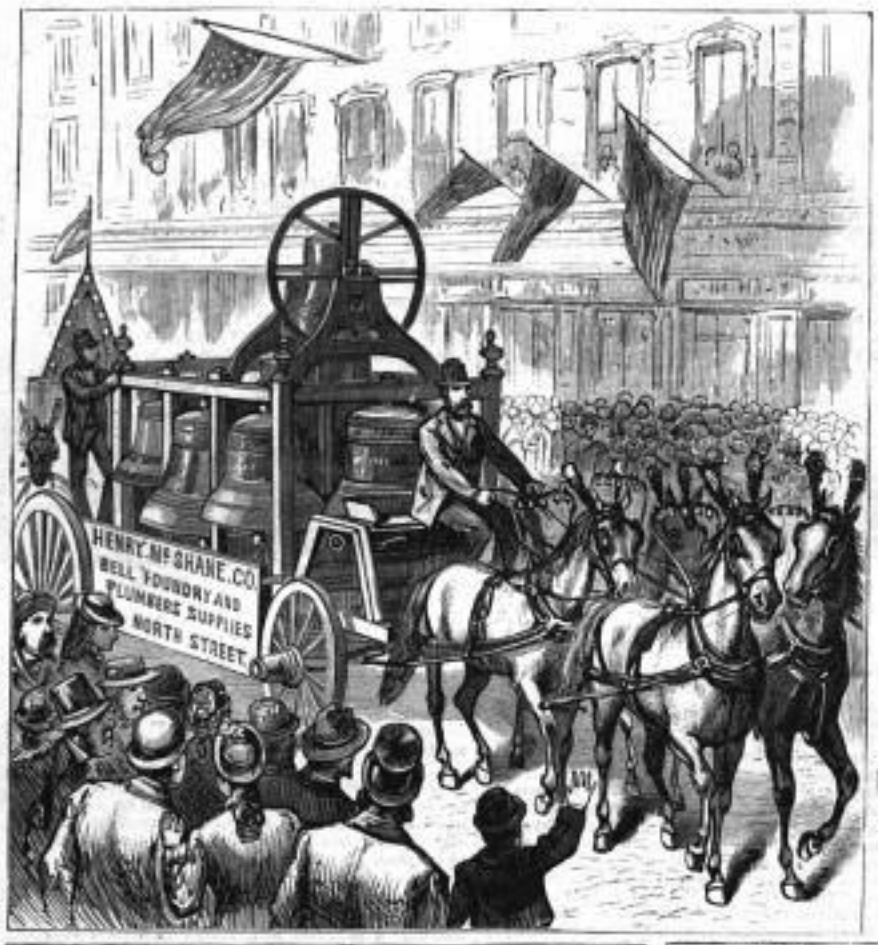
—LARGE quantities of pottery are manufactured in Brazil from the hard, silicious bark of the carapicera tree. In the process, the ashes of the bark are powdered and mixed with the purest clay that can be obtained from the beds of the rivers—this kind being preferred, as it takes up a larger quantity of the ash, and thus produces a stronger kind of ware.

—ON the 10th inst. the United States Immigration Commission had its first conference with the representatives of the Chinese Government—Tao Heun and Li Hung Tsao. These gentlemen, who are the Plenipotentiaries on the part of China, are said to be friendly to the objects of the Commission, and it is now believed that the business of the mission will be rapidly dispatched.

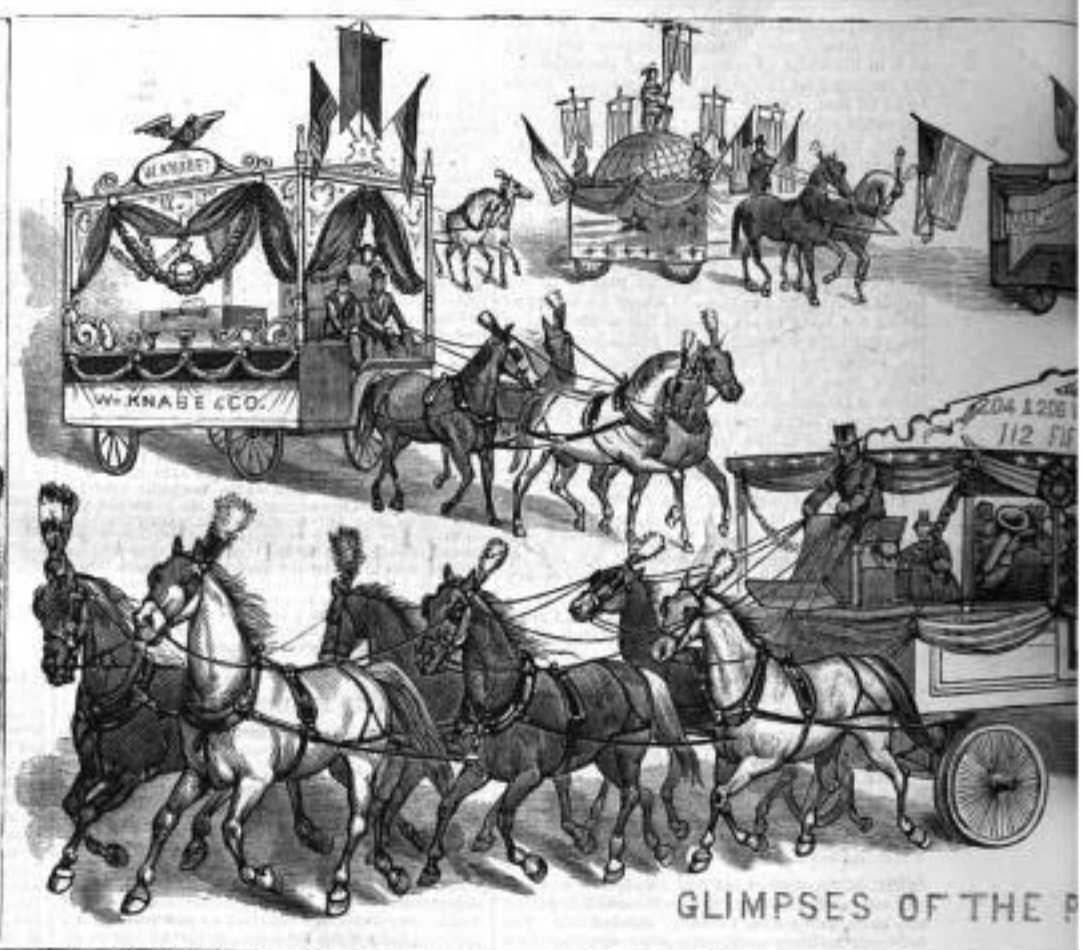
—THE little town of Correggio has at last awakened to the honor conferred upon her by the painter Antonio Allegri, having been born and having lived and died within its walls, and a statue was erected to him on the 17th inst. The statue, unfortunately, can only be a work of imagination, for no authentic portrait of Allegri is known to exist, though one given in many biographies has long passed for his.

—THE Mormon Conference, which adjourned on the 10th inst., was chiefly notable for the filling of the first presidency, which has been vacant since the death of Brigham Young. John Taylor was elected President, with George Q. Cannon as first and Joseph F. Smith as second Counselor. John Taylor was the ranking member of the Twelve Apostles. Mr. Cannon is regarded as the ruling spirit—the power behind the throne.

—THE export business in apples continues to be unusually extensive. It is estimated that between 75,000 to 100,000 barrels will leave this port by steamer for Liverpool alone during the current month, besides which a great many are being shipped from the northern part of the State via Montreal, and a great many more are going on sailing vessels via Boston. Another extraordinary fact in this connection is that apples are being exported to the West Indies and South America.



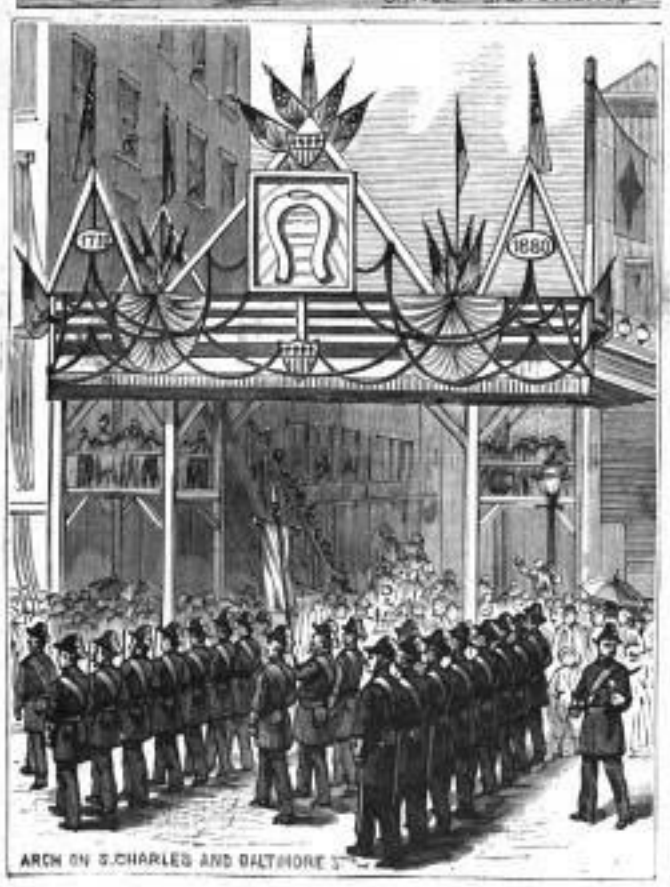
—A GERMAN Colonization Association has been organized in Wilmington, Delaware. It is composed of the leading and wealthy German citizens of Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore, with a capital stock of one hundred thousand dollars. The intention is to establish German colonies in Delaware, and the present object of the association is to effect the purchase of Bombay Hook Island and name it Humboldt City. Sixteen thousand acres is the amount of land to be bought. The association is in correspondence with emigrants from the Volga and other portions of Southern Germany.



—THE Swedish and Norwegian Press are discussing in somewhat heated terms the agitation prevailing among a section of Norwegians for the repeal of the act of union between Sweden and Norway, and the establishment of a Norwegian republic. The Swedish journals, while hinting that the separation of Norway would be a good riddance, maintain that the honor of Sweden is involved, and that, if necessary, strong measures must be employed to reawaken the loyalty of the Norwegians. The relations between the Norwegian Deputies and the King are greatly strained, the right of the King to a final veto having been denied by a large majority.

—CHICAGO has become a great fruit market within a few years. The volume of business is represented by a money value of about $6,000,000 annually. This includes from $240,000 to $300,000 credited to Colorado fruits, and about $225,000 to West India fruits. Ten years ago two or three carloads of California fruits made up the supply for the season. Members of a Chicago firm resident in that State saw the possibilities of the trade, and perfected arrangements that made the city the supply depot for a large part of the country. The receipts of the one firm are now about 150 carloads annually. This year the trade in tropical fruits has increased nearly thirty per cent, and the trade in California specialties in almost the same proportion.

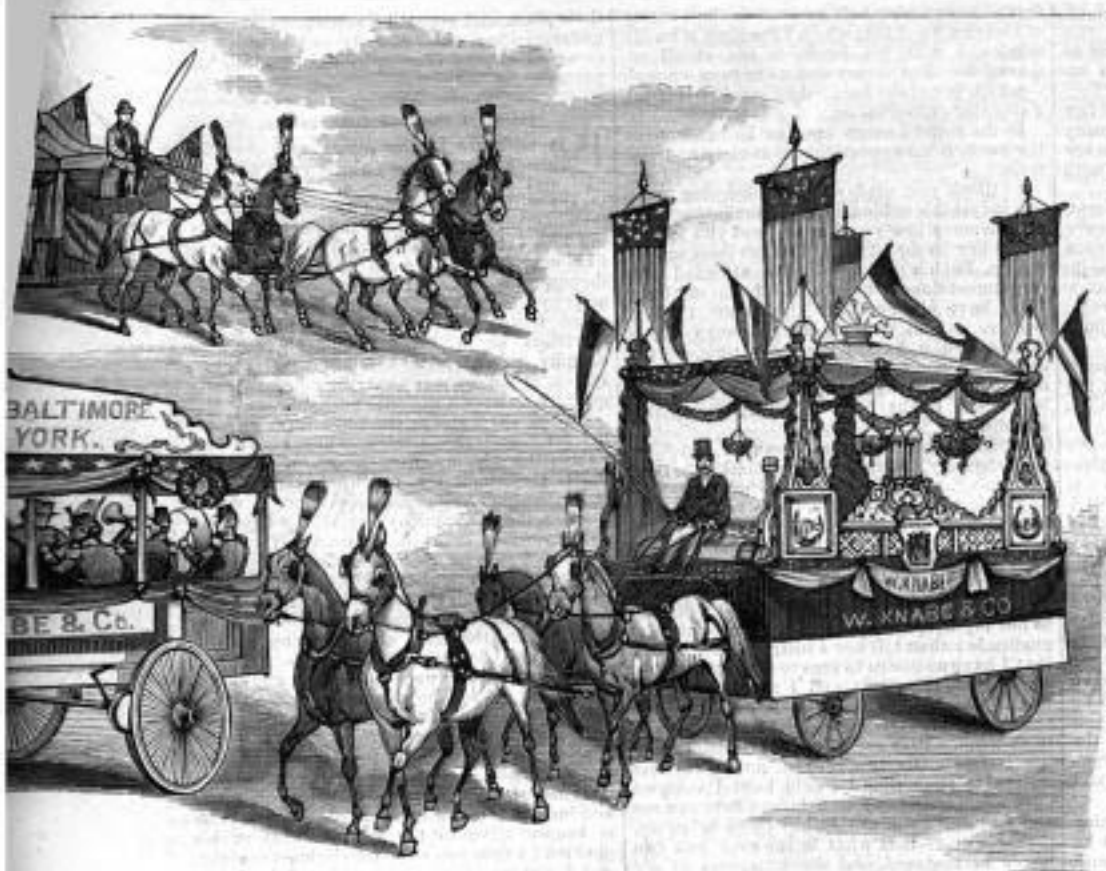
—DURING the last eight months the business of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company has been phenomenal. It is expected that the company will have a surplus of fully $10,000,000 over last year to meet the extraordinary expenses contemplated at Philadelphia and elsewhere along the main line. This year the company shows a gain of $2,848,926 on the eastern lines. The United Companies of New Jersey have already earned $250,000 more than for the first eight months of last year, and the deficit is likely to be reduced to $600,000. The Philadelphia and Erie which was short on its fixed charges last year $332,287, has already made up that loss and more too by a gain of $372,899 net for the first eight months. The Pennsylvania Company is also $2,116,193 ahead of last year already.



Digitized by Google

GLIMPSES OF THE P

BATTLE MONUMENT



ARCH ON S. CHARLES AND BALTIMORE ST.

MARYLAND.—CELEBRATION OF THE ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE

Digitized by Google

SION OF INDUSTRY.

TTLEMENT OF BALTIMORE, OCTOBER 11TH-16TH.—FROM SKETCHES BY OUR SPECIAL ARTISTS.—SEE PAGE 143.

Digitized by Google

FOR EVER AND A DAY.

THEY walked together by the sea,
And talked of days that were to be,
And hand in hand upon the hill
They paused to see the white sails fill
With warm winds from the west; and he Said, softly, "So our argosy
We hope will come from isles afar,
Where all life's countless treasures are,
And bring to us, for coming years,
All happy things, and naught for tears."

"Blow softly, softly, Summer wind,"
She said; and looking far away
To where the freshening breezes thinned
The mists that fringed the edge of day,
She watched to see the shining sail
Of homeward-faring argosies
Flash out in sunshine. "Let no gale
Beat round the bark that brings to me
The treasures of the Happy Lands.
Blow softly, wind, from far away,
And bring the gladness to my hands
That lasts for ever and a day."

A cloud arose and hid the sun;
Gray shadows fell ere day was done.
They heard the moaning of the waves
Like midnight voices over graves.

The morning shows upon the bar
A white, dead face, a broken spar.
The ship they waited for has come,
But, ah! the helmsman's lips are dumb;
No treasures from the Happy Lands
Await their eager, outstretched hands.

"Dear heart," she says, and smiles thro' tears,
"Think what is left for coming years!
Dead hopes we bury in the sea,
But love remains to you and me!
And, oh, my darling, come what may,
That lasts for ever and a day!"

THE SCHAFFUSKIE LANDS.

BY ANNIE DUFFELL,

AUTHOR OF "IN THE MESHES," ETC.

CHAPTER XLV.—LADY JET IS RESOLVED.

TWO weeks after the events narrated in the last chapter, Madame Polleskie enters Lady Jet's apartment, and finds the young lady seated in her favorite attitude upon a divan, deeply engrossed in a huge book—a treatise upon medicine.

"Good heavens!" says madame, languidly, "are you turning into a doctor?"

"No," is the brief response, as the young girl continues her perusal. In her eyes is a feverish fire and her face is deeply flushed.

"What is the matter?"

Lady Jet looks up—a swift, searching glance, and her eyes again seek the book.

"Have you anything new to tell?" she inquires, rather absently.

"Nothing," drearily. "To my knowledge, he has not yet been to the mines, but he cannot resist much longer. He is like an insane man. He is wild over her loveliness. It is like a volcano—all fire and lava within—and it will soon burst forth. The more she resists him the more desperate it makes him. He comes of a swift, silent race, and I believe that if he can gain her in no other way, he is mad enough to take her by force and secrete her somewhere in the country where he can visit her, and have her entirely to himself. Heaven pity her—and me! Is anything the matter with you? You look ill."

Lady Jet sits silent a moment, then flings herself by her companion's side.

"You are shivering," cries madame, in surprise, "and yet you are consumed with fever. What in the world is the matter?"

"I will tell you," replies the girl, controlling her excitement with a desperate effort. "You have made me your confidant, and I will return that confidence. Madame, there is an innocent man who has been confined to the labor and degradation of the mines for nearly fifteen years. He is guilty of no crime whatever; he merely incurred the envy and hatred of his rivals by his patriotism and the favor shown him by the Czar. For that, an offense was fastened upon him; he was tried, condemned and exiled. Madame, I determined that that man should escape, and to-morrow night I put that determination into execution."

Madame Polleskie stares at her companion as if that young lady had gone mad.

"Are you serious?" she cries, after a pause.

"I am!" The small rosebud mouth shuts tightly.

"You are mad!" she exclaims. "Are you aware that you will be committing one of the greatest crimes against your country, and that you stand in danger of being exiled yourself?"

A dreary, bitter smile crosses the girl's face.

"Will that be anything new? Have I not been exiled all my life?"

"But, great heavens! how can you accomplish it—you, a girl! It cannot be done!"

"It can, and it shall be done!"

The lion courage of her race rises warm in her breast as she speaks.

"What is your course?"

"First of all, promise that, come what will, you will not betray me."

"I swear it!"

"Thank you. My plan of action is simple. It is merely upon to-morrow night to go to the mines, drug the guards with chloroform, have my horse in waiting, and as the affair will not be discovered until morning, the count, I hope, will be able to make good his escape."

"You speak as if it were a common occurrence to assist prisoners of the Emperor to escape," cries madame. "Pray who is 'merely to drug the guards and have the horse in waiting,' and assist the exile to escape?"

"Nick and I," is the calm reply.

"Nick! Surely you would not trust him!"

"I would trust him further than any man I know."

"It is the wildest scheme I ever heard of. I tremble for you, my child. What if you should be discovered? And you are sure to be; why, even the horse would attract attention."

"I have prepared for that by every few nights taking horseback rides in the vicinity of the mines. If any one should chance to see the horse that night, they will think it me with it."

"My poor child, it is a desperate attempt, and all for a man! I tell you he will never repay you for it; he will not even experience gratitude. It is always the way, those who do the most are the least rewarded."

"I do not care," says the girl, bravely, "whether he is grateful or not. Save him I will."

"And that book," observes madame, after a pause, "is for the purpose of investigating the nature of chloroform?"

"Yes."

"Where shall you procure the drug?"

"I already have it. Papa is only convalescent now, and this morning I got his keys unnoticed, entered the drug-room and got all I wanted. I am looking now to see in what quantities it should be administered."

Madame is confounded at the girl's resolution and daring.

"I implore you," she says, earnestly, "not to commit such a rash act. Think of your father, of your proud name, of the terrible risk you run!"

"I think of nothing," says the girl, "save that noble life and its martyrdom. He shall be rescued."

"But if he is so fortunate as to elude the guards what will become of him then?" urges madame. "He can go nowhere in the convict garb, as he would instantly be detected."

"I shall have a suit of clothing awaiting him as soon as he reaches the horse. These he can put on over his other garments and with only a few minutes' delay. In the pockets of them will be all the money that I have been able to collect for a year past, which will be sufficient for him until he can devise some plan for his future support."

Madame Polleskie is compelled to admiration by the courage and coolness of the girl. At the same time she fully realizes that the perilous undertaking may result in shame and disaster. For an hour she pleads with Lady Jet to abandon it, but in vain. Then she leaves her, and, as she is about to step out in the hall, comes face to face with the haggard, anxious countenance of Phedora.

"I want to speak with you, madame," says the woman, and follows her down the stairs out into the open air. Here she turns to her with clasped hands and streaming eyes.

"Oh, madame, you have heard?" she cries. "For heaven's sake try to persuade her from her madness."

"If you mean your mistress, my poor woman, it is useless. I have already implored her to desist, but she refuses to listen to me."

"She will be discovered and ruined, I know," wails Phedora. "And it is not worth the risk. I am not saying but that he is a noble and unfortunate gentleman, but it is the romance of the thing, I believe, that attracts her—it is her imagination. Why, he does not love my poor, headstrong child; he has not one thought of her; she is as a baby to him. It is that lovely Greek lady that he adores; I have watched him and discovered his secret. I believe he will refuse to be saved. I think he will never escape and leave the lady of his love in the mines. Now, if it were she who were going to be rescued he would be much more likely to listen to it."

"Stop, Phedora; let me think," says madame, sharply. Into her eyes has come a quick, strange gleam; her hands clinch, and from her face slowly recedes the little color it possesses.

A long time passes, and then she turns slowly to her companion.

"I am going back to your mistress," she says, simply, and leaves Phedora in the path.

Lady Jet looks up in surprise as she enters the room.

"I have been thinking," says madame, "of what you have told me. And while I still strongly disapprove of it, I am always interested in anything that concerns you. I see, my child, that you make a mistake in giving such a short notice to the count. He should be apprised of it now, and by a person who could converse with him intelligently upon the subject."

Lady Jet sinks down upon a divan in despair.

"What shall I do?" she exclaims.

"If you would like me," says madame, "I will see the count to-night. It will arouse no suspicions, as I am in the habit of visiting the mines. Being the wife of an official, I have also the privilege of conversing with the convicts."

With a wild cry of joy the impulsive girl flings her arms around madame's neck and indulges in the most extravagant caresses. But the weight of those soft, clinging arms seems to stifle the secretary's wife, for she turns white—still whiter—even to the lips, and, escaping as soon as possible, she hastens from the room. On the outside she lifts her haggard, wretched face.

"God forgive me," she mutters, "but I do it for him—for him!"

By her indomitable will and perseverance, towards night madame succeeds in gaining a few minutes' private conversation with Count Smoloff, who is working slightly apart from the rest, under the pretense of examining the metal he is employed in digging from the rocks. Madame is somewhat of a favorite in the mines, and, being the wife of a prominent official, she is allowed any liberty she desires, and, being herself something of a geologist, it is not infrequently that she spends hours in the mines examining the rock and minerals. Consequently, upon the present occasion the fact of her passing half an hour in the vicinity of Convict No. 3,571, who at the time is busily employed with his work, is not at all remarkable. But if any one were near enough—which is not the case—they would overhear a singular conversation.

In the count's stern face, as he bends over the rock, is an expression of anxiety and distress.

"I thank you, madame, for conveying to me her ladyship's noble and generous intentions," he murmurs, lowly; "but I beg of you to persuade her to desist from this perilous undertaking. Such a course would be attended with the utmost danger to herself. I will not deny that I have observed her kind interest in my welfare, which, while I have always highly appreciated it, has, at the same time, deeply distressed me, for fear that, out of the generous impulses of her young and inexperienced heart, she might involve herself in trouble and disaster."

"I have endeavored to persuade her," replies the lady, in the same cautious tone, and examining, with every evidence of interest, a huge piece of metal which she holds in her hands; "but it is useless. She has possessed herself with your unfortunate history, and is determined that you shall be emancipated."

"But it is madness!" returns the count. "Show her the danger of her course; convey to her my deepest appreciation and sincerest gratitude; then tell her I instruct you to say that I have no desire to escape from the mines. My fate has been cast, and I am now content to abide by it. There are some evils that are only made greater by an attempt to escape from them. Mine are of such an order. My life is irremediably wrecked, and I am less miserable here than I would be if I mingled once again with my fellow-men. Between me and all human companionship there is an impassable gulf—that what is for ever lost can never be restored, and the bitterness of my life can never be ameliorated by the course Lady Zickwoff, in her innocence and generosity, has proposed. Besides this, there are other and weightier ties that bind me to this place. A motive actuates me that no guerdon could ever tempt me to abandon. Believe me, madame, I would not leave these mines to be elected sovereign of the most powerful throne that ever existed."

Madame's hand trembles slightly as it strays among the metal; he is approaching the subject nearest her heart.

"I never can convince Lady Jet that you are resolute in your refusal," she says, after a pause. "In spite of all that I can say she will have the horse here to-morrow night, and her plan, I must confess, is admirably conceived, and would be sure, I think, to be executed with success. It will be a glorious opportunity for some one to escape. It were almost a pity that no person is to be benefited by it."

Madame speaks carelessly, and for a moment her words, with their hidden motive, take no effect. Then the noble's hands close convulsively upon the ax-handle, and he draws in his breath sharply. The woman sees that in this moment has come to him a vague, desperate hope, yet one so wild that he scarcely has the courage to utter it.

"You have a proposition to make?" she says, looking at him questioningly, and purposely encouraging him.

"I have an idea, madame," he says, while in his excitement his breath breaks from him in labored gasps; "an idea that I scarcely know how to convey to you."

"You may confide in me to the utmost," she returns, lowly.

"Thank you." His voice is deep with emotion. "I will tell you the short story and trust to your instincts for assistance. Madame, in these mines there is a woman exiled for life, but one who is as innocent of crime as yourself. I have not time to explain her history; suffice to say, she is a martyr. I, who for over a half score years have dragged through this wretched existence, know well the horror and agony that existence holds. If my life could save her from the torture of the future, with its endless bitterness, how gladly would I yield it up for such a sacred purpose; but, unfortunately, I cannot aid her. But worse than all physical persecution is the deadly peril in which her proud womanhood stands. Madame, she has been so unfortunate as to attract the passion of a man who, I believe, is as merciless as a wild brute in securing his own desires. He loves her with the desperate, soulless passion of a strong animal nature, and I know that he will never rest till he drags her down into his possession. For myself I ask no favor, but for this poor, helpless, endangered martyr I do beseech your intercession."

"And she shall have it," interrupts his companion, sternly. "That man who is enamored of this woman and is persecuting her is my husband. I believed that you would act thus. Through a combination of circumstances, I to-day became aware of your interest in the Greek exile. From that moment came to me the conviction that a man of your race would not accept liberty while the woman of his love was in bondage. Deeply as I have suffered from my husband's guilty passion, I have felt no emotion for this lady save pity and respect. She is a true woman, and accepted the peril of his hatred, the toil and agony of the mines, rather than sacrifice her proud purity. And while I acknowledge that in forming my resolution I was actuated by selfish designs, I nevertheless felt thankful that it might be in my power to assist in plucking her from her danger and restoring her to a different life."

Across the shrunken, weary face of the noble flashes a light divine. But his emotion is too intense to admit of many words.

"May God bless you for this act!" he says, solemnly.

After a brief silence his companion reveals their plans, and, after all is settled in a thorough understanding, she leisurely and by degrees, so as to arouse no suspicions, takes her departure.

CHAPTER XLVI.—A LOVE DIVINE.

IT is midnight in the mines, and over the gloomy subterranean abode rests a death-like and oppressive silence. The convicts, weary with the toil of the day, lie in a particular chamber excavated for the purpose, sleeping like exhausted brutes. The long tunnel-like corridor—the main apartment, which through the day is such a scene of bustle and activity—is entirely deserted, save here and there where the form of a night-watch is stretched on a blanket, himself sleeping soundly, as, under the discipline and perfect system of the management, the office of night-guard is merely a nominal position.

By the shaft sleeps the huge form of Karl the lamp and trap tender, while above him yawns the gloomy, dark length of the shaft itself, stretching far, far up beyond to the outer world. At the foot, and close to which reposes the unconscious Karl, is the huge machinery which creaks and groans through the day as it makes its tireless revolutions between the surface and the bowels of the earth. And down through this gloomy and perilous passage comes a small form, clinging to the iron ropes that elevate the trap, and lowering himself swiftly and dexterously by the small, firm hands. At last he reaches the trap, and climbing lightly over it, he stands motionless beside the lamp lighter. It is Nick, with his face a trifle pale, and his eyes bright and keen with suppressed excitement. Despite his mischief and heedlessness, and that peculiar quality of imagination that gives to his ideas fantastic and ludicrous turns, in this perilous moment he is keenly alive to the responsibility of his position; a faux pas, even the slightest mistake, and discovery is inevitable, and with discovery disaster and ruin. In his hands he holds the destiny of his beloved Jet.

He stands for a moment motionless, then, with the noiseless, stealthy movement of a cat, approaches the snoring Karl. From his pocket he takes a bottle and a sponge, saturating the latter with the contents of the vial. For one instant he hesitates, one of the chief figures of a remarkable scene. Beside the huge and prostrate form of the man stands that diminutive figure, looking even smaller in the wan, uncertain light of the night-lamps. Far away stretches the long, grim tunnel, with its sleeping guards, and close beside him is the gigantic machinery of the trap, like some huge mastodon in slumber. Then, bending over the unconscious man, he extends the sponge towards the great, quivering nostrils, gradually approaching it nearer and nearer the nose. There is a sharp convulsion of the muscles of the mouth, an occasional twitching of the eyelids, then a supernatural stillness settles over Karl, and he is safely under the influence of the drug. This process is repeated with all of the guards, and with preternatural success. Then back again to the shaft speeds Nick, the color back to his face, and eyes dancing with exultation. In such a wild state of exhilaration is he that, without the slightest difficulty, he seizes the oil can, drags it to the trap, and, turning the spigot, deluges the machinery with oil—a proper precaution against the groans and squeals with which it performs its duty during the day, and which would be particularly detrimental to their plan of secrecy. Then springing upon the trap, he commences his ascent. As he gains the top he is met by Madame Polleskie, whose eyes scintillate with excitement. As she sees the boy she draws a long breath of relief, and says a little prayer of gratitude to her patron saint.

"Are you all safe?" she whispers, and her voice is scarcely steady.

"Sound as a drum!" affirms Nick, in the wildest state of animation and brandishing his small fists, while from his pockets is exhaled a pungent odor of chloroform. "They are sleeping down there like as if they would never wake. I gave 'em a good dose—wasn't stingy with my medicine. Bet I could dance a jig upon Karl's breast and he'd never know it. St. Michael! but it's the best spree I ever was on. Don't mind it in the least," beaming with oppressive cheerfulness upon madame, who is uncomfortably conscious of their deadly peril.

"Is everything ready?" she inquires, impatiently.

"Yes."

"How am I to get down?" gazing blankly at the gloomy well, upon whose brink they are standing.

"I will have to go down again and raise the trap. Guess it will go easy enough"—grinning: "I oiled it well."

"Great heavens, child!" murmurs madame, with a shudder. "You don't seem to know the meaning of fear. I shiver when I see you swing yourself over this yawning precipice."

"Seems to me Jet is late," observes Nick, giving a preparatory jerk to his straps and buckles before commencing his descent.

"Lady Jet is not very well, and has sent word by Phedora—who is off in the shadow with the horse—that she will not be able to join us," replies madame. But she does not tell the boy that the young peeress, owing to the overpowering excitement under which she has been laboring for the past week, is now tossing upon her bed in raving delirium. And Nick, unconscious of the danger of his idol, steps to the brink of the shaft. There, standing with his back to his companion, he pauses an instant. Madame, clinging to the framework and stepping cautiously, approaches him, and sees that with unusual celerity the boy is secreting some light object in his chest pocket.

"What is the matter?" she inquires.

A queer, abashed look steals into the mouse-like eyes of the boy, and under his companion's wondering gaze he strongly resembles a thief detected in his depredations.

Digitized by Google

"It is my Veronica," he says, with a shame-faced, embarrassed grin. "Not that I believe in it," with unnecessary warmth and defiance, "but then—I thought—that is for her sake, if there was any truth in it, I'd keep it with me."

Before madame can commend him for this unusual piety, he leaps over the railing and again disappears. In an incredibly short time—for for one of his size it is a herculean task to set the mammoth wheels in motion—the trap noiselessly glides to the mouth, and madame, stepping in, is soon lowered to the mines. Then, without a word or a moment's delay, side by side they speed down the corridor, past the unconscious guards, who lie like felled trees, and on to the cave, where the convicts lie slumbering in that deep, dreamless unconsciousness of exhaustion.

As they pause for a moment in the dim light, Count Smo off, who fortunately lies close beside them, lifts his head in token of his knowledge of their presence. Madame takes from the boy the sponge of chloroform, and, stepping lightly over the intervening figures, pauses beside the noble who lies chained to a huge, brutal African, who has fallen under Russian jurisdiction. In a few minutes he is entirely under the influence of the narcotic, and then commences the difficult task of picking the lock of the handcuffs, which, however, is finally accomplished, and the count, rising to his feet, follows his companions to the outer corridor.

(To be continued.)

THE SESQUI-CENTENNIAL OF BALTIMORE.

THE one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the settlement of the City of Baltimore was appropriately opened on Sunday, October 10th, when special services were held in the various churches. At sunrise on Monday 100 guns were fired from the United States ships Pandalia and Kearsarge, lying in the harbor, off Fort McHenry. The city in every direction was dressed in holiday attire, and the principal streets along which the procession went were brilliant with flags and streamers and beautiful banners. Before 8 o'clock the streets were filled with people. Hundreds of platforms, many of them seating several thousand persons, had been erected at many points, and all were crowded. The programme for the first day of the festivities was a grand procession to illustrate the history and industries and progress of Baltimore—her life of one hundred and fifty years in all branches of science, of industry and trade.

The various divisions formed on Broadway and the adjacent streets, and the march began at the intersection of Broadway and Canton Avenue promptly at 9:30 A. M. Deputy City Marshal Frey, with twenty-five mounted police, led the column, followed by Chief Marshal Joseph Kalber, with Colonel H. D. Loney as chief of staff, and thirty assistant marshals. Next came the Mayor of Baltimore, General F. C. Latrobe, with 250 mounted aids, with white sashes and rosettes, and the Committees of Arrangements, the clergy and the orators of the day in eighteen carriages. Representatives of the soldiers of 1730 followed, wearing the uniform of that time.

The second division, which is the subject of one of our illustrations, was headed by two heralds of the period of 1730, preceded by noblemen of the same time, and followed by Indian warriors on foot and mounted. The first tableau was an Indian wigwam with Indian squaws and pappooses lying around; the second one represented Captain John Smith and his men in a boat exploring Chesapeake Bay; the third, the first settlers in their log cabin; the fourth, the old City Court House, long since destroyed by fire; and fifth, camp-life at Valley Forge in midwinter in the Revolutionary War, followed by minute-men on foot and on horseback. Next came an exhibition of the telephone, and an electric clock, keeping time. Horticulture and floriculture were lavishly displayed on large platforms loaded with tropical trees and plants bearing fruit and wagons filled with various vegetables.

The allegorical tableaux were followed by a procession of associations, the trades, industrial and mechanical interests. In this division there were many very handsome and extensive displays by individual firms and corporations, but outside the monstrous demonstration of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, there was probably nothing superior, if at all equal, to the display made by William Knabe & Co., the world-famed Baltimore piano manufacturers. At early morn there came forth from their great five-story factory—which is one of the largest establishments of the kind in this country, covering whole acres of ground and employing hundreds of skilled artisans, some of whom have been in their employ nearly half a century—a procession of brilliantly decorated vehicles, of varied sizes, styles and forms, which would have made a very respectable procession alone. Within a massive gilded chariot leading the line were seated the famous Fifth Regiment Band of Balbo, and on the sides thereof were neatly inscribed signs of the Baltimore warerooms—204 and 206 West Baltimore Street—and their New York house, at 112 Fifth Avenue. There were thirty-four pieces in the band, and the chariot was drawn by six gayly caparisoned grays. First after the band came a neatly-decorated vehicle, containing one of the rarest musical relics of the age. It was an ancient-looking harpsichord, made in London in the year 1780 by Johannes Broadwood, and was owned by Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, Md., favorite signer of the "immortal Declaration." There are but two instruments of its kind and age in this country, this one and its mate, once the property of George Washington and now a treasured relic at Mount Vernon. Next came a Triumph Wagon of massive proportions, 16 feet long and 15 feet high, gorgeously finished in white and gold with rustic carvings, rich upholstery, splendid carpets, pretty pictures and a variety of beautiful flower and evergreen decorations, all entwined with Stars and Stripes and black and gold. Within it was a grand piano of the finest make. Following this came platform wagons four in number, representing the mechanical department of the works, neatly trimmed in black and gold, Lord Baltimore's colors, each with ten men busily engaged at work. The next eight wagons represented the case-making department, with workmen engaged in fitting up cases to contain the musical mechanism. Next followed four wagons with the sounding-board makers working away like bees in the labor of their special department. Then followed four other wagons, with ten men in each, brushes in hand, varnishing and polishing the cases. Four more wagons followed with the finishers, ten men to a wagon, also at work. The last vehicle was another Triumph Car, similar in size and style to the first one, containing upright and square pianos, the historic dates 1730 and 1880 being prominently displayed. Gilded eagles formed the side panels, and a Maryland coat-of-arms the rear end, with two boys appropriately clad to represent the figures beside the shield. These huge cars—in fact, the whole pageant was universally admired by the thousands assembled along the route.

One of the most attractive features of the tenth division, which comprised iron, steel, brass, marble, ice and engine exhibits, was the display of Henry McShane & Co., the well-known bell-founders. The first truck, which was handsomely decorated, contained a full chime of nine bells arranged on a frame, with the largest bell on top, as if set up in a church tower, and was drawn by six horses, each of which sported a chime of five bells attached to its harness. A second truck contained the last bell cast at the foundry—a 3,000-pounder, ordered for a church in Winchester, Ind. Next to this was a carouche containing Mr. McShane, and following him marched 350 of his employés, in sections of 115 each, each section dressed to represent the national colors—the first, red shirts; the second, white shirts; and the third, blue shirts. Following the men came a wagon, handsomely decorated, with a pyramid formed of various designs in bronze-work, tastefully and uniquely arranged. During the passage of the procession the large chime was played by Professor William Brown, the chimer of St. Stephen's Church of Philadelphia, the tones of the popular melodies ringing out clear above the cheers and expressions of enthusiasm that greeted the performance.

Another conspicuous and attractive display was that of James D. Mason & Co., of the Maryland Steam Bakery. Fifteen wagons and one hundred uniformed men gave an effective and realistic presentation of the extent and character of their business in a manner which did great credit to the good taste and liberality of the house. All the wagons were finely decorated, and some especially notable. One, devoted to the cracker department, was loaded with barrels, filled with the goods, arranged in a graceful pyramid, on the top of which stood the statue of Ceres holding a sheaf of wheat. Beautiful urns, filled with flowers, decorated each corner. Upon another were piled packages of fruit butter, and at each corner was stationed a lad carrying the national flag. The horses were wreaths of flowers; and the entire display was notable for its combination of artistic effect and industrial interest. In addition to their extensive street display, the buildings of the firm were fully decorated, and a magnificent arch, spanning the street, attracted general attention.

Messrs. Hennegen, Bates & Co., the well-known jewelers, made a very unique display of ancient watches in their large show windows, embracing the first stem-winding watch ever made, three watches made in the year 1700, a striking watch over 200 years old, five clocks ranging from 150 to 250 years, a drum used by John Lightner in the Revolutionary War, afterwards used by Henry Lightner at the battle of North Point, one pair of silver candlesticks 150 years old. The exterior of the building was tastefully decorated.

The arch of the Shoe and Leather Board of Trade was one of the most beautiful objects on the street. In the first place, the arch was a beautifully designed and handsome one, and in the second place, it was well lighted. Over the top of the arch was a row of shaded jets, among which occurred, at intervals, red lights. Surmounting the structure was a big boot in gas lights, and on either side was a large illumined star. The pillars of the arch were lighted by interlacing threads of gas jets, making a pretty effect.

Below this arch nearly every building was decorated and illuminated, some of them to the extent of almost hiding the structures, such as the five-story iron front warehouse of Armstrong, Cator & Co., who are said to do the largest business in their special line in this country. The exterior of the building was lavishly dressed with United States and Maryland State flags, streamers, etc., while large banners and tasseled waves from the roof. Surrounding each window was a line of gas jets, and an immense eagle also in gas jets spread its wings over the main entrance. In the evening when the 5,000 jets were lighted the effect of the decorations was greatly intensified, and thousands of spectators complimented the enterprise of the firm by deserved cheering. The site of this establishment was the property and office of David Poe, United States Deputy Quartermaster-General from 1777 to 1782. General Lafayette lodged in the building frequently, and after the surrender of Lord Cornwallis the Count Rochambeau, Baron Viomenil and other French officers had their headquarters there.

On Tuesday the procession consisted of Knights Templar, Royal Arch and Third Degree Masons, the cadets of the Baltimore City College, the boys of the public schools of the city, white and colored; students of Rockhill College and of the Catholic parochial schools. The line of procession was formed on Park Avenue, the right resting on Richmond Street. A large number of Masonic lodges led the line. Immediately following the Masonic line were two barouches with the Municipal Committee, F. P. Stevens, Esq., Chairman, accompanied by the Mayor of Montreal.

The street demonstration on Wednesday consisted of a procession of the city, and visiting military, firemen, police, etc., under the chief marshalship of Gen. James R. Herbert. On Thursday the procession was made up of all the benevolent, religious, social, medical and temperance societies, and Orders of Catholic Knighthood, with James Donnelly as chief-marshal. Friday was devoted to a parade by the Odd Fellows, Knights of Pythias and other secret societies, with Judge George W. Lindsay as chief marshal. On Saturday afternoon there was a grand marine carnival, consisting of various manœuvres by ships, steam vessels, tugs, etc. A grand sacred concert was given in Druid Hill Park on Sunday afternoon, and on Tuesday, 19th, the festivities were brought to a close by a general illumination of the city and pyrotechnic display in commemoration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the foundation of Baltimore City, and of the ninety-ninth anniversary of the surrender of Lord Cornwallis at Yorktown.

During the entire week the city was a blaze of gas jets and electric lights after sunset, and the streets were crowded until long after midnight. The City Hall was the object that attracted more attention than any other. The great dome seemed literally in a blaze of fire. Series of gas jets ran up and down the angular ridges, and around each window was a circle of fire. There were 3,100 jets altogether. The Battle Monument was another beautiful piece of illumination, the wreath which the Goddess holds above her head being converted into a blazing circlet. The electric lights on Baltimore Street—and there were seven of these—received most of the exclamatory "Oh's" and "Ah's" that the multitude had to spare. The American building boasted three lights, but on the one on the tip of the tall tower the greatest care had been lavished, and the result was that when it shot up it made the people with their backs turned to it up as far as Hanover Street turn and look to see from what quarter this new and bright illumination came. The other two lights were slung from wires into the middle of the street, and could be seen for an immense distance, as they were so clear and bright that they cast the shadows of the pedestrians below on the pavements in inky blackness. Both the News and the Sun offices were also provided with electric lights.

M. CONSTANTIN STERNBERG,

THE NEW PIANIST.

CONSTANTIN STERNBERG, the Russian piano virtuoso, who made his début in this city some two weeks since, comes to us with a high professional reputation acquired in Russia, but with none of the blowing of trumpets which has preceded the advent of many other artists. He seems to be quite content to be judged upon his merits. His manner, as a man and as an artist, is simple, straightforward, dignified and free from all pretense and affectation. His style is refined, replete with artistic feeling, clear in statement of the musical thought, and without mannerism or exaggeration. Foreign critics assign him, deservedly, a front rank among living pianists, and in New York he has awakened genuine enthusiasm among the most critical and cultivated patrons of the highest forms of musical interpretation.

Mr. Sternberg was born in St. Petersburg in 1853, and early developed indications of unusual talent. When twelve of age he entered the Leipsig Conservatory, where he made such rapid progress in acquiring a musical education that he completed the regular course of study in two years—three years being usually required. He was then, at fourteen years of age, appointed conductor of the orchestra of one of the principal theatres of Leipsig, filling the position with great credit. During the next few years he filled positions as orchestral director, and gained a steadily-growing reputation, spending his every spare hour in pianoforte study. Subsequently, he studied under the celebrated master, Theodor Kullak, in Berlin, in whose school he was also appointed a professor. He made his début in Berlin during a week of piano concerts by four other artists, and received the most emphatic indorsement of critics, musicians and the public. The Grand Duke of Schwerin invited him to that city, and, with his financial assistance, Sternberg founded an Academy of Music, which became so popular under his direction that it soon had enrolled nearly two hundred students. The Grand Duke became warmly attached to him and, in order to retain the artist in Schwerin, gave a series of piano recitals in the palace, which were attended by the élite of society, with a full representation of men of letters, art and science.

Ultimately, clinging to his dream of a wide career, Sternberg proceeded to Breslau, where he made his début in October, 1878, achieving a great success. Later he won, in St. Petersburg, an equally distinguished triumph, and from that time forward his career has been marked by continued successes. Last Spring he played in the presence of the Shah of Persia, at his capital, Teheran, and was presented by him with a number of costly gifts, as an evidence of the admiration excited in the royal mind. Prior to coming to this country he had appeared at a course of one hundred concerts in Russia.

Sternberg's répertoire is one of the most extensive possessed by any pianist of the present time, and he is justly regarded as among the most brilliant expounds of the works of the five representative composers of the day—Grieg, Tschaikowsky, Moszkoski, Scharwenka and Saint-Saens—who have opened up new and rich veins of musical thought which have enchained all musical Europe for the past few years. Doubtless he will add in this country to the list of triumphs which he has already achieved.

NEW RESERVOIR AT LOUISVILLE, KY.

ONE of the best evidences of the progress of the times is found in the very general disposition of the authorities of large cities to make provisions against the occurrence of a water famine. Just now a large part of the City of Paterson, N. J., whose great silk mills and manufactories depend upon a large and steady water supply, is shut off from the use of that element, and besides the immediate domestic annoyance caused thereby, several thousand operatives find themselves without work. In Brooklyn there has been considerable fear lest the supply should run short; and when the Board of Aldermen refused to sanction a low-rate contract for the construction of additional reservoirs, the Mayor ordered the work to proceed, guaranteeing the price asked, which was several thousand dollars less than that of a contract which the Aldermen wished to put through. In a recent issue we gave an illustration of the new reservoir for supplying Jersey City, and this week we show what is being done just beyond the limits of Louisville, Ky., in the same direction. The capacity of the reservoir now under construction will be 100,000,000 gallons, and it is believed that, unless a long period of drought should occur, this will be sufficient to avert the calamity which is now rowing upon Paterson.

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

According to a Report by Dr. Delpech on Apiculture in Paris, it appears that the bees, when they penetrate into sugar refineries, will not touch treacle if pure syrups are to be found, and in places where both cane and beet-root syrups are in store, they completely ignore the latter.

With the View of promoting agricultural improvement in Bengal and encouraging the study of scientific agriculture, the Bengal Government has created two annual special scholarships of $1,000 each, to be held by science graduates of the Calcutta University at Cirencester College.

The Smithsonian Institution has received from Professor Peters, of Clinton, the announcement of the discovery by himself on October 11th, of a planet of the ninth magnitude, in one hour twenty-six minutes and twenty seconds right ascension, eight degrees fifty-three minutes south declination, with a daily motion of fifteen minutes south.

Three French Expeditions are being organized, One, by M. Revoil, to Aden, in the country of the Somalis; another by M. Mesadron, to the northern coasts of New Guinea, which, if practicable, is to advance beyond the points reached by Raffray, Meyer, and Albertis; and the third by M. Fichant, to the Polar Seas, in conjunction, probably, with Nordenskjöld.

Another Lake Village, assigned by experts to the age of Bronze, has been discovered at Auvernier, near Neuchâtel. Several millstones quite new, others half made, have been brought to light, from which it is inferred that the place may have been the seat of a manufactory of these articles. Another conclusion drawn from this find is that these pile buildings served as actual dwellings for the primeval inhabitants of the land, and were not, as has been supposed, used merely as store-houses.

The Association Scientifique de France has not continued the observations of meteors which was begun by Leverrier, its founder. No steps have been taken by the Observatory to fill up this important gap in the scientific work of the nation. The interest of observations taken during the last two years in the display of August meteors and the forthcoming inauguration of Leverrier's statue have attracted public attention to this circumstance, and it is hoped these observations will shortly be resumed.

A Congress of Hygiene was held at Hamburg on September 13th, 14th, 15th. The number of members was about 200. At the first sitting the hygiene of hospitals and public buildings was discussed; at the second the hygiene of shipping, after the delivery of an address by Dr. Reincke; and on the third day the ventilation of private dwellings and other similar subjects. A resolution, proposed by Dr. Rotschel, of Dresden, was passed to induce public authorities to study practically the ventilation of buildings, and another, by Dr. Frath, of Dresden, that sanitary inspection should always take place by duly qualified officers.

Karl Petterssen, after a very extensive series of researches, concludes that the rounding and smoothing of the surfaces of rocks, the grooving and scoring of their sides, are not always of unquestionably glacial origin. They are often post-glacial, since it can be shown that similar phenomena are in the course of origination in the present littoral zones. The conclusions based upon the glacial theory, as to the alternations in the level of the Scandinavian peninsula during the post-tertiary times, cannot, as a whole, be pronounced scientifically justified. There is no direct proof that the Scandinavian peninsula during the last portion of the Glacial epoch was more elevated than at present, nor that it has been subject to a continental depression during the latter portion of the same epoch. It is, however, a fact that the peninsula has been rising in the Post-tertiary period.

PERSONAL GOSSIP.

THE King of Bavaria has bestowed on the eminent orientalist, Professor Spiegel, the honor of the nobility.

THE death is announced of Captain Hobson, who discovered the remains of Sir John Franklin in the Arctic regions.

A FRENCH statesman, presuming to speak for Gambetta, says the latter would much rather have a German alliance than a war with Germany.

MISS EMILY A. SMITH, Assistant State Entomologist of Illinois, was duly elected a foreign member of the Entomological Society of London on September 1st.

ONE of the murderers of Dr. Parsons, the American missionary, has been condemned at Constantinople to death, and the other two to fifteen years' penal servitude.

WHEN Miss Alice Liddell—the original "Alice in Wonderland"—was married the other day, she wore among her ornaments a horseshoe of pearls, the gift of Prince Leopold.

SENHOR PONTES PEREIRA DE MELLO, the ex-Prime Minister of Portugal, has negotiated the marriage of the heir apparent to the throne of Portugal with a Russian princess.

SENOR ZAMACONA is not going to France as the first Mexican Minister since the Maximilian tragedy, but will return to his old post at Washington, with his family, at the close of the present month.

FRANK VENABLE, son of Professor Charles S. Venable, LL.D., of the University of Virginia, Charlottesville, Va., has accepted the position of Professor of Chemistry in the University of North Carolina.

MME. THIERS, for the purpose of erecting an imposing monument to the memory of the first President of the third Republic, has paid $33,000 for a plot of ground adjoining the grave of her husband in the Père-la-Chaise Cemetery.

CHIEF-JUSTICE MOSS has been re-elected as Vice-Chancellor of the Toronto University, and Dr. H. E. Bogbin has been chosen as the representative of the Senate of the University to the Council of the College of Physicians and Surgeons.

THE Rev. Hugh O. Pentecost, of Hartford, Conn., a brother of Pentecost, the revival preacher, who has been working with Mr. Moody, was married on the 14th of October to Miss Ida Gatling, daughter of the inventor of the Gatling gun.

ON his late visit to Portsmouth, the Prince of Wales wore the uniform of the Royal Naval Reserve, and it is always observed with satisfaction that whenever His Royal Highness goes down to a naval port he never forgets to pay this compliment to the service.

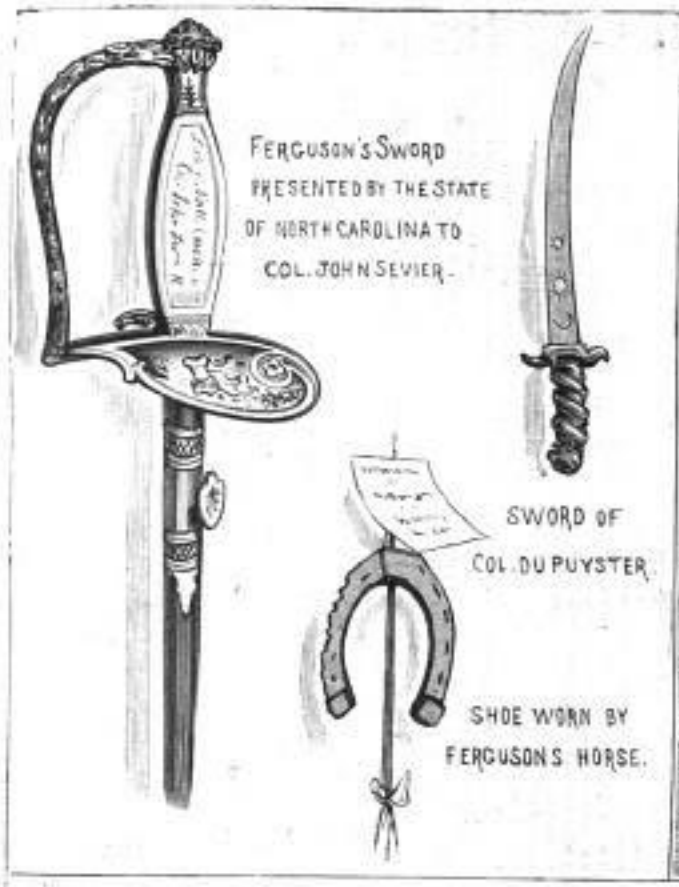
SENOR ROMERO, formerly Minister at Washington, has started from Mexico for the United States, partly on account of his health and partly for railway business. It is reported that he intends to organize a railway company for Mexico in conjunction with General Grant.

HON. PELEG SPRAGUE died in Boston, October 13th, aged eighty-seven. In 1821 and 1822 he was in the Nineteenth Congress, and went to the Senate in 1829, serving until 1835. He was afterwards Judge of the United States District Court for Massachusetts from 1840 to 1866.

THE Spanish Government has granted Calixto Garcia, the insurgent leader of Cuba, liberty on parole in Spain. Señor Garcia, in an interview with the Minister of Foreign Affairs, confessed that he believed the pacification of Cuba to be complete. Seventeen thousand men will return from Cuba this Autumn.

THE young Grand Duke Constantine, who accompanied the Grand Duke Alexis on his last visit to New York City, is competing with his two cousins, the sons of Michael and Nicholas, for a place on the Staff of General Skobeleff, in the expedition against the Turcomans. They are using all their resources to influence the Emperor. Constantine's chances are slim, since he was educated for the navy.

IT is reported in Paris that Prince Philippe de Bourbon, the son of the Count d'Aquila, is about to espouse, not Miss Ayer, of Lowell, Mass., as was at first rumored, but the widowed mother of that young lady. The bride of that gentleman, whoever she may be, will be entitled to claim consanguinity by marriage with many of the crowned heads of Europe, including Alfonso of Spain, Humbert of Italy, the Queen of Portugal and the King of the Belgians.

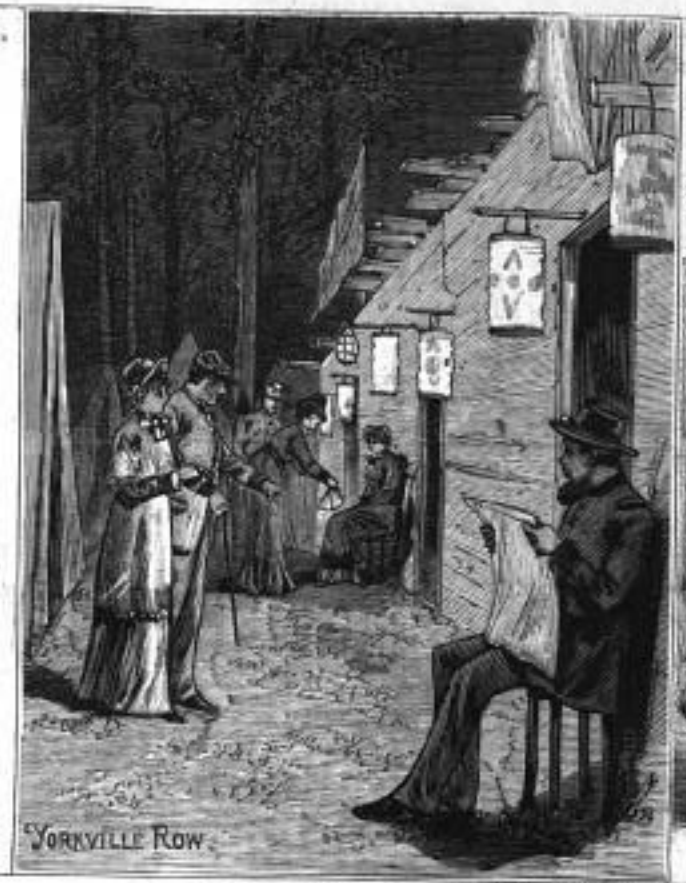


MR. BARTHELEMY ST. HILAIRE, the new French Minister, leads a life thoroughly Republican in its simplicity. He labors as hard at his present advanced age as if he were a fresh young student. He has never been ambitious for place, title or honors. For many years he has lived upon his modest yearly income as an Academician. He scarcely ever uses a carriage, and, like another great Frenchman, Victor Hugo, prefers a seat on the "imperial" of an omnibus to any other vehicle.

A ST. PETERSBURG correspondent vouches for the statement that the Czar's marriage with the Princess Dolgoroski was solemnized in the chapel of the Imperial Palace on the 19th (O. S.), in the presence of the Grand Duke Nicholas and the Minister of War, and that the newly-married pair are now in Livadia, the Czar having purchased for his consort the palace of the Grand Duchess Catharina. The Czarewitz and the Grand Dukes Constantine and Vladimar have gone abroad in order that they might not be compelled to witness the ceremony.

M. BARTHELEMY SAINT-HILAIRE, the new French Foreign Minister, has translated the Iliad into French verse. When a friend asked him how he ever found time to make so many rhymes, he replied that he had done much of the work while riding back and forth in the omnibus, and that he had found the regular movement of the horses and the monotonous noise of the vehicle a stimulant to the poetic faculty, and their regular cadence also marked the cadence in the verse. "Pegasus supplanted by omnibus horses!" exclaims Le Figaro, with mock horror.

THE will of the late Mary Shields, of Philadelphia, was admitted to probate on October 15th. She bequeaths a large amount for public purposes. Laurel Hill Cemetery receives $20,000 upon trust, the interest and income for keeping the Shields vault in perfect order, and any surplus is bequeathed to the Foster Home Association. The Northern Home for Friendless Children receives $5,000 after the death of a relative, and so does the Pennsylvania Society to Protect Children from Cruelty. The City of Philadelphia is bequeathed $10,000 in trust, to be converted into a loan and the interest applied to the purchase and distribution of coal in the Fall and Winter months "to indigent widows, single women and men, without respect to color." The remainder of the estate is bequeathed as follows: One-sixth part each to the Deaf and Dumb Asylum, Institution for the Blind, Old Man's Home, Home of Mercy (Episcopal) for the Care of Consumptive, Indigent Widows and Single Women's Asylum (Protestant), and one-twelfth each to the Pennsylvania Hospital for the relief of the sick and insane poor, and to the City of Philadelphia for the sick and poor in the Almshouse. It is estimated that the whole estate amounts to nearly half a million.



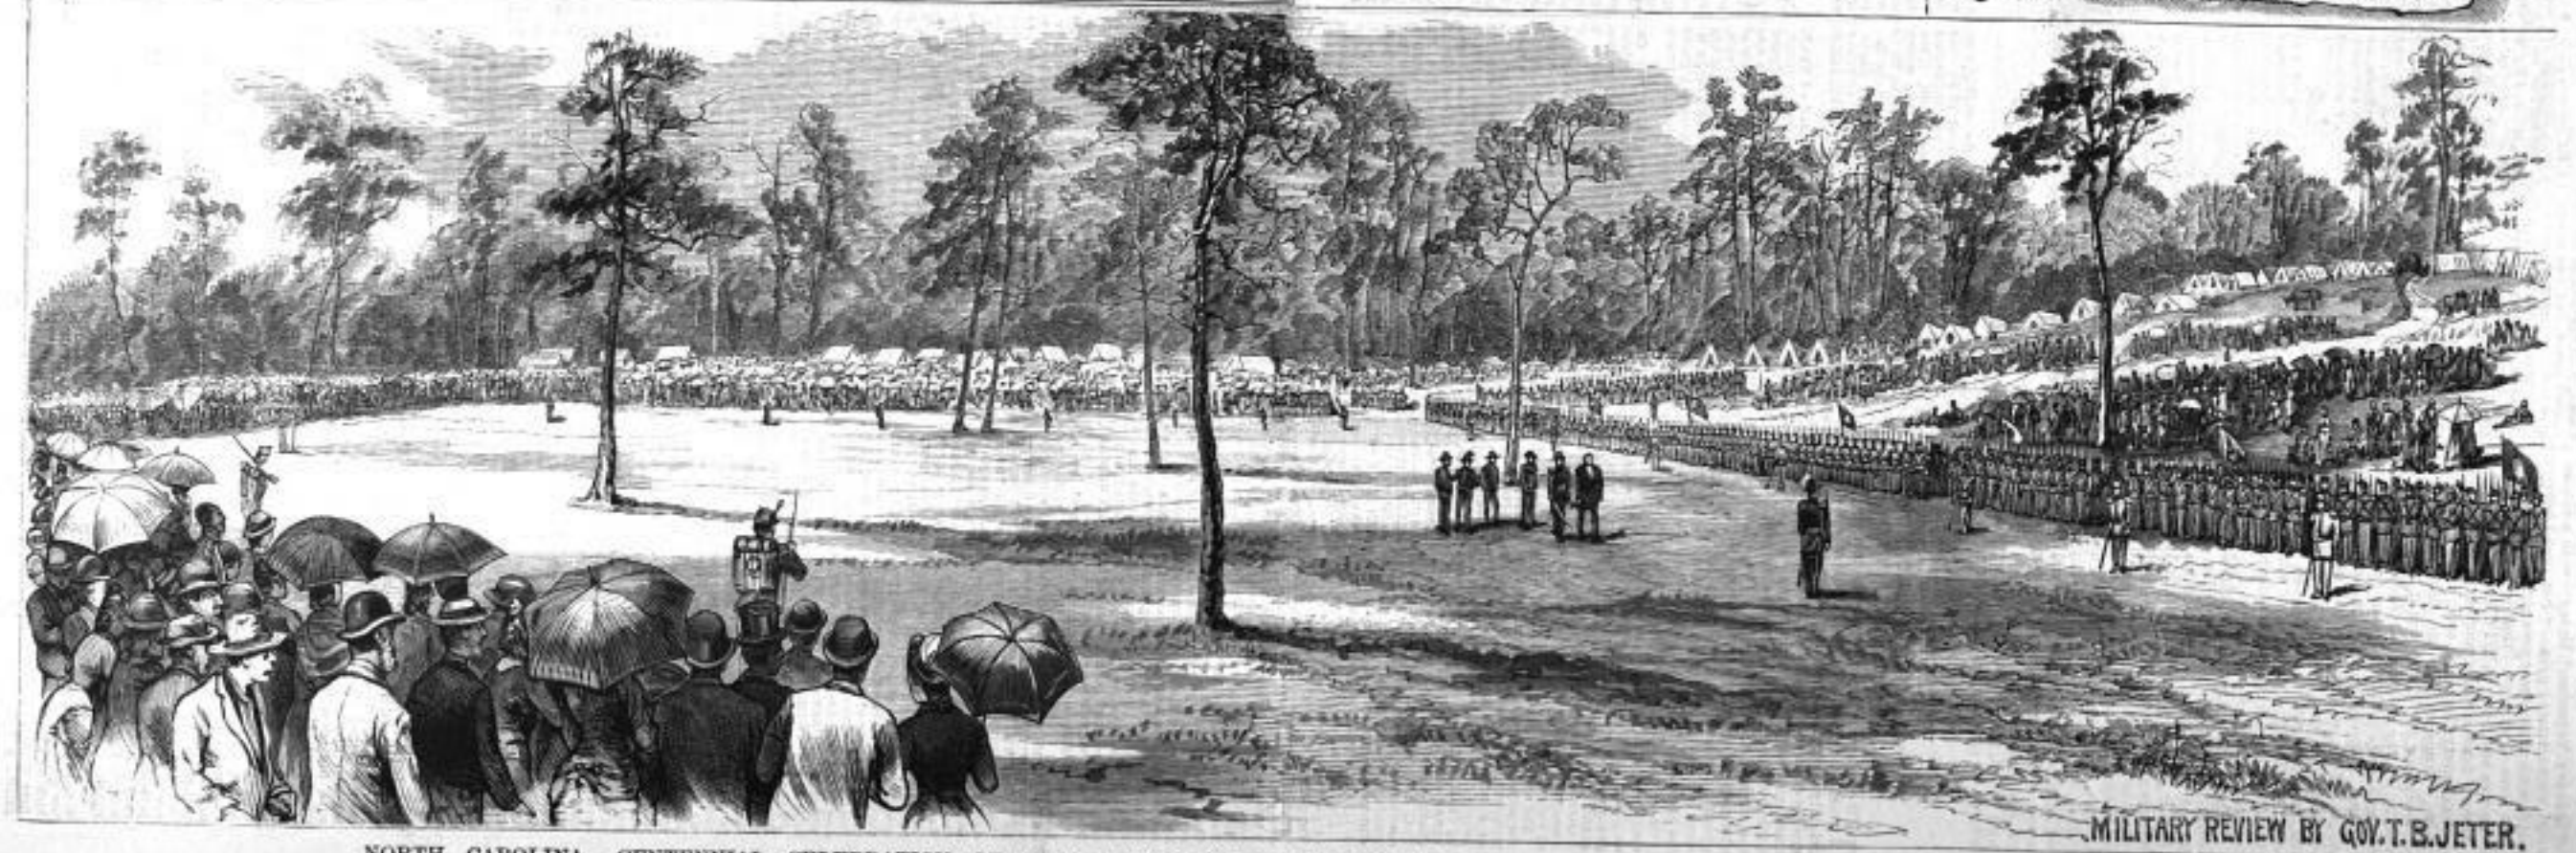
Digitized by Google

FERGUSON'S SWORD PRESENTED BY THE STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA TO COL. JOHN SEVIER.

SWORD OF COL. DU PUYSTER.

SHOE WORN BY FERGUSON'S HORSE.

YORKVILLE ROW.



AN INFANT MILITARY PRODIGY.

SASH WORN BY GEN. FERGUSON WHEN KILLED.

NORTH CAROLINA.—CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION OF THE BATTLE OF KING'S MOUNTAIN, OCTOBER 7TH.—FROM SKETCHES BY JAS. H. MOSER.—SEE PAGE 139.

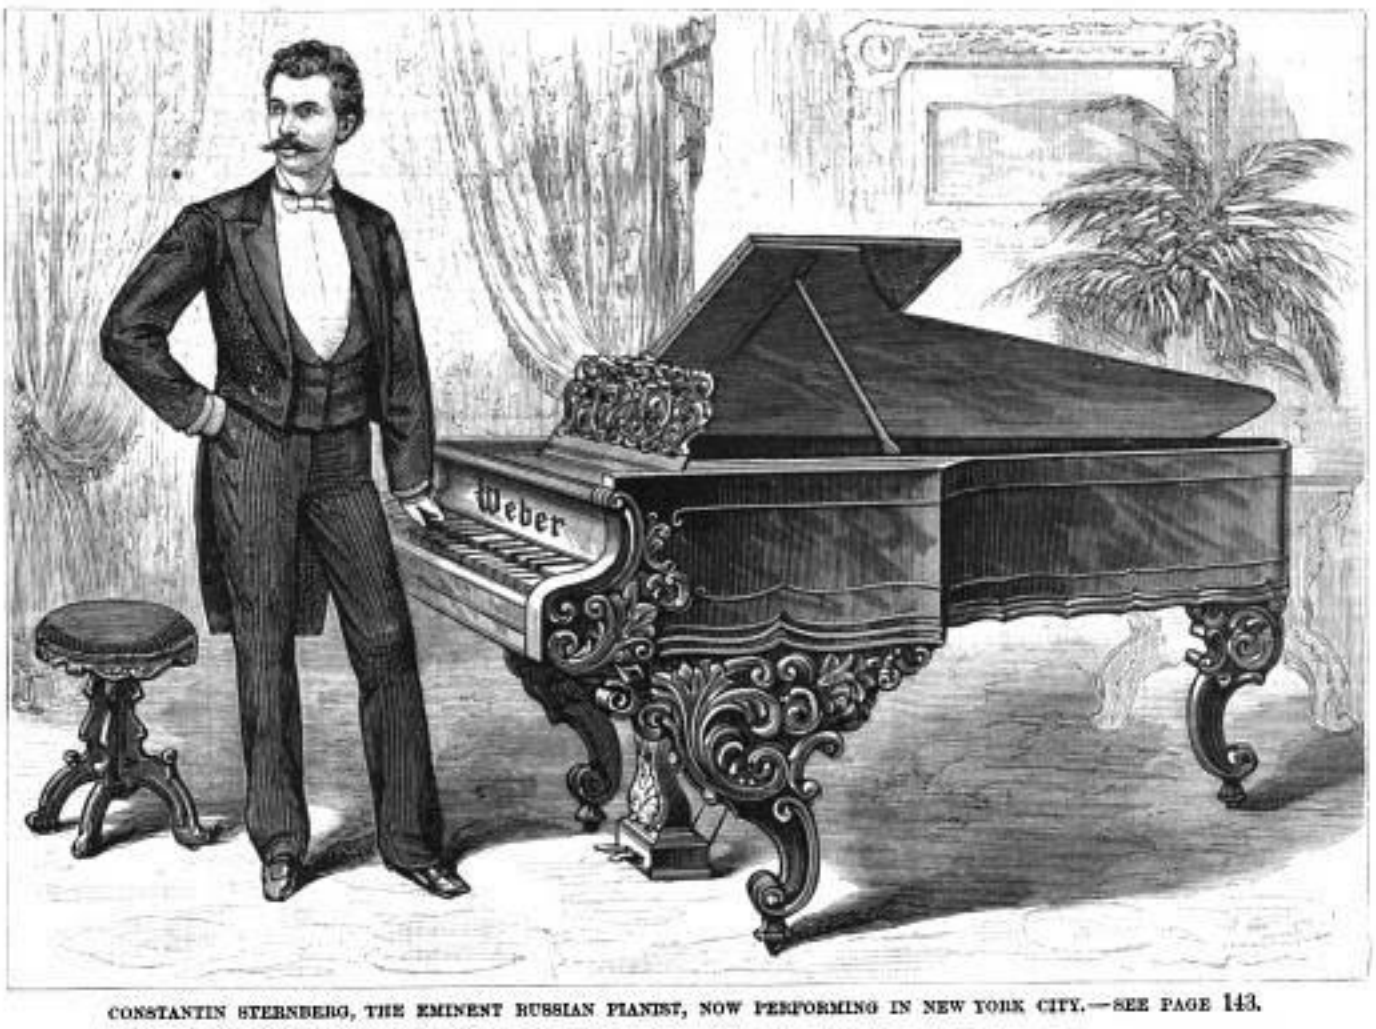
Digitized by Google

HON. FERDINAND C. LATROBE, MAYOR OF BALTIMORE.
FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BUSEY.

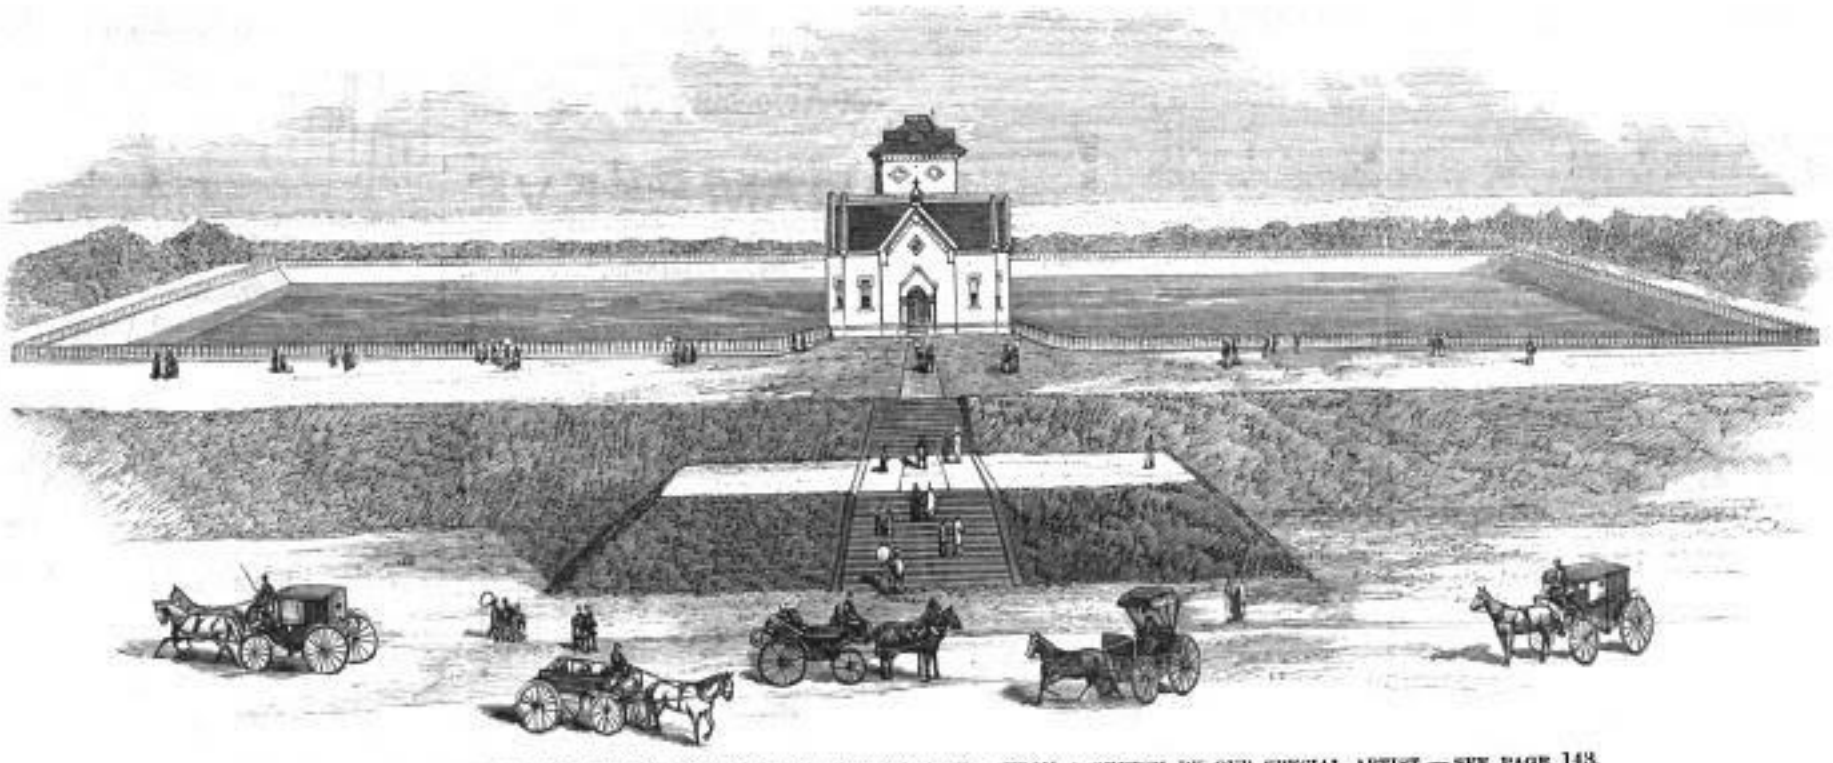
HON. FERDINAND C. LATROBE.

HON. FERDINAND C. LATROBE, Mayor of the City of Baltimore, was born October 14th, 1833, in that city. His father, John H. B. Latrobe, has for half a century been a leading member of the Baltimore Bar, and is distinguished for high mental culture and scholarly attainments; for many years he has been the President of the American Colonization Society, succeeding Henry Clay in that office, and is now President of the Maryland Historical Society. The paternal grandfather of Mayor Latrobe was Benjamin H. Latrobe, the celebrated architect, whose name is associated with the Capitol—a man of rarest accomplishments in all branches of science and art, and during his life the associate of the most distinguished men of his time. The mother of Mayor Latrobe was Charlotte Virginia Claiborne, daughter of General Ferdinand Leigh Claiborne, of the United States Army, from Mississippi, who was directly descended from William Claiborne, son of Edmond Claeborne, Esq., of Claeborne Hall, County of Westmoreland, England, whose connection with the early days of Maryland not merely as a politician but as a military leader is of itself one of the most prominent features in the history of the State.

Mayor Latrobe was educated at the College way honorable to himself and his State. He was born at Lawrenceburg, Ind., April 20th, 1824, at which place he lived until over twenty years of age. He attended college at Hanover, and afterwards at Asbury University, Greencastle, where he graduated in 1843, during the Presidency of Bishop Simpson. He studied law at Lawrenceburg, and afterwards went to Indianapolis, where he has ever since resided. He was admitted to the Bar in 1845, and began the practice of law. He was chosen City Attorney, and for several years was a member of the Common Council of Indianapolis. He was appointed reporter of the Supreme Court in Judge Blackford's time, and published five volumes of reports. His first law partner was his father-in-law, Hiram Brown, one of the pioneers of the Bar in Central Indiana. Afterwards he was a partner of the Hon. Lucian Barbour, and this connection continued until the election of Mr. Barbour to Congress in 1854. Mr. Porter then became a partner of Hon. David McDonald, with whom he remained until the election of Mr. Porter to Congress in 1858, when he defeated Hon. Martin M. Ray, of Shelbyville, Democrat, by 10,776 votes to 9,716. He was re-elected to Congress in 1860 and served during the stormy period of the first months of the civil war. The interests of his family required him to decline a renomination for Congress. Mr. Porter renewed his partnership with Judge of St James, Washington County, Md., and was admitted to the Baltimore Bar in 1858. He was soon after made the Assistant Counsel of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, and represented that great corporation in many important cases: he has also been the counsel and confidential business agent of the late Thomas Winans and Messrs. Winans & Co. In 1867 he was elected to the Maryland Legislature, was made Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and was appointed by Governor Swann Judge Advocate General. In 1869 he was re-elected to the Legislature and made Speaker of the House of Delegates, distinguishing himself in that trying position. He was a candidate in 1873 for the Democratic nomination for the Mayoralty of Baltimore, but was defeated by the then incumbent, Hon. Joshua Vansant, after a very animated contest. He was, however, nominated, in 1875, for the Mayoralty without opposition, and elected over Henry M. Warfield, Esq. During his first term of two years many important reforms in the municipal government were inaugurated. Among them was the abolition of the Port Warden's Department and the creation of the Harbor Board, which has deepened the harbor of Baltimore to twenty-four feet, so as to receive any vessel that can enter the port of New York. Other important improvements and reforms were introduced, and a reduction of nearly $400,000 in the municipal expenses was effected during the first year of his administration. But the crowning act of Mayor Latrobe's first term was the negotiation at par of five millions of five per cent. bonds as a substitute for the five million six per cent. loan of 1875, thus effecting a saving of $50,000 per annum. In June, 1877, Mayor Latrobe failed to receive a renomination, the late Colonel George P. Kane receiving the mayoralty nomination; but on the death of Colonel Kane, in 1878, Mayor Latrobe was recalled to office by a unanimous nomination and an overwhelming popular vote. He was again elected to the Mayoralty of Baltimore in 1879, defeating William J. Hooker, the Republican nominee, by a large majority. Mayor Latrobe is personally very popular in his native city, and has demonstrated that he possesses executive ability of a high order. No doubt higher political honors await him.



HON. ALBERT G. PORTER, GOVERNOR-ELECT OF INDIANA.



HON. ALBERT G. PORTER,

GOVERNOR-ELECT OF INDIANA.

THE election of Hon. Albert G. Porter as Governor of Indiana has occasioned widespread satisfaction in that State and throughout the West, where he is greatly esteemed. Governor Porter's career has been an eminently active one, and in every CONSTANTIN STERNBERG, THE EMINENT RUSSIAN PIANIST, NOW PERFORMING IN NEW YORK CITY.—SEE PAGE 143.

KENTUCKY.—NEW RESERVOIR NOW BEING CONSTRUCTED AT LOUISVILLE.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—SEE PAGE 143.

Digitized by Google

McDonald, and this continued until the appointment of the latter by President Lincoln, as United States District Judge of Indiana. Mr. Porter was afterwards in partnership with Mr. W. P. Fishback; and when General Ben Harrison returned home after service in the army, he became a member of the firm, which existed for a number of years. He was afterwards a member of the law firm of Porter, Harrison & Hines, and continued in active practice until he was appointed to the position he now holds. Mr. Porter was a candidate for Presidential Elector on the Hayes ticket in 1876, and in March, 1878, he was appointed by President Hayes First Comptroller of the Treasury, which position he has ever since held. He has been an active member of the Republican Party since its organization, having cast his lot with it primarily on account of his emphatic opposition to the extension of slavery.

Military Marriages in Europe.

IN the Austrian, German, French, Italian, and other European armies, regimental officers may not wed the objects of their affections until they shall have deposited a certain sum of money, varying between $4,000 and $6,000, with the State exchequer, the interest of which, in addition to their pay, is considered a sufficient income to keep them financially unembarrassed as husbands and fathers. A sort of matrimonial epidemic has recently set in among the subaltern officers of the Austrian army, in which the amount of the so-called "cassion" money is fixed at $6,000: and so numerous have been the applications for permission to wive within the last few months, that the authorities contemplate doubling the amount in question for officers up to the rank of captain, while leaving it unaltered for majors and lieutenant-colonels. A profound sensation has been created in junior military circles of the Empire by the announcement that this measure is about to be submitted to the approval of the Emperor; and it is possible that His Majesty, who has practically illustrated his predilection for early marriages somewhat conspicuously in his own family, may refuse to sanction so arbitrary an edict.

Relics of the Famous Theban Band.

THERE have been few events in the annals of antiquarian research more interesting than the recent discovery of the remains of the Theban "Sacred Band," who all perished to the last man before the overwhelming rush of the Macedonian phalanx, headed by the young Alexander in person, on the fatal field of Chæronsia, August 3d, 338 B.C. On that day the catastrophe, so long foreseen by the prophetic genius of Demosthenes, finally came to pass, and the independence of the ancient Greek cities went down for ever. As Plutarch and Pausanias relate, King Philip himself attacked the Athenians, while the fiery valor of the future conqueror of Asia was directed against the soldiers of Thebes, who were still inspired by the memories of Pelopidas and Epaminondas. Refusing to surrender, the famous three hundred died in their ranks, and were buried on the spot of their glorious death. For centuries the colossal "Lion of Chæronsia" stood above their traditional burial-place, until a short time ago a story of hidden treasure caused some vandals to attempt its destruction with gunpowder. The searches which were made with this sordid object led, however, to a surprising discovery. Within a walled inclosure, some thirty yards long by twenty wide, covered up by the tumulus of Chæronsia, were found laid, in parallel rows of forty bodies each, the remains of the "Sacred Band," their moldering skeletons showing in fractured skulls and ribs the traces of the Macedonian handiwork which struck them down. In several cases fragments of spears and lance-blades fell among the bones on attempting to move them. One hundred and eighty-five bodies have been discovered down to the present, and search is being diligently made for the remaining relics of the three hundred heroes of ancient Thebes.

How to View Jupiter.

NO ONE who feels any interest in the earth's sister planets should lose the present opportunity to view Jupiter and his system of satellites through a telescope. It will be twelve years before the earth is so near this, the chief of all planets, again. It is not necessary to visit an observatory in order to enjoy fine views of Jupiter. Even a good opera-glass will show one or two of his moons, and a modern three-inch achromatic will give probably a better view of the planet than the astronomers were able to obtain with their largest telescopes a hundred years ago. The telescopes of street-exhibitors are often of excellent quality, and they will show the shadows of Jupiter's moons upon his surface when the moons are between him and the sun. The times of these transits, as they are called, may be obtained from the nautical almanac. Much may be done with ordinary spy-glasses. A pocket spy-glass will show the moons, and one whose object-glass is much above an inch in diameter can, by a very simple device, be made powerful enough to show the main belt in a good atmosphere. The eye-piece of an ordinary spy-glass consists of two little brass tubes, each containing two glasses. By separating these tubes three or four inches further than usual the magnifying power is greatly increased. This may be managed with a piece of card-board, or an optician, for a few dimes, will make a neat brass tube that will admirably answer the purpose. In this way a spy-glass with an objective one and a half inches in diameter may be made to show Jupiter's equatorial belt, and the disappearance of his moons when they go into his shadow. It will also plainly show Saturn's rings; but, of course, it will not separate the two rings or reveal the mysterious gauze-ring. A first-rate three or four-inch telescope, however, will do all this and much more. Jupiter passed his nearest point to the earth on October 6th, and we are now being rapidly whirled away from him, but he will be the most conspicuous object in the evening sky for a long time to come.

How the Pyramids were Built.

THE pyramids are the tombs of the early kings. Perfectly adjusted to the cardinal points of the horizon, they differ in breadth and height, as is shown by the measurements of the three oldest, as follows: 1. The Pyramid of Khufu — in height, 450.75 feet; breadth, 746 feet. 2. Pyramid of Khafra—height, 447.6 feet; breadth, 690.75 feet. 3. Pyramid of Menkara—height, 203 feet; breadth, 352.75 feet. The construction of these enormous masses has long been an insoluble mystery, but later generations have succeeded in solving the problem.

As soon as the king mounted the throne, he gave orders to a taskmaster, the master of all the buildings of his land, to plan the tomb and cut the stone. The kernel of the future edifice was raised on the limestone soil of the desert, in the form of a small pyramid built in steps, of which the well-constructed and finished interior formed the king's eternal dwelling with his stone sarcophagus lying on the rocky floor. A second covering was added, stone by stone, on the outside of the kernel; a third to this second, and to this even a fourth; and the mass of the giant building grew greater the longer the king enjoyed existence. And then, at last, when it became almost impossible to extend the area of the pyramid further, a casing of hard stone, polished like glass, and fitted accurately into the angles of the steps, covered the vast mass of the sepulchre, presenting a regular triangle on each of its four faces.

More than seventy such pyramids once rose on the margin of the desert, each telling of a king of whom it was at once the tomb and monument. Had not the greater number of these sepulchres of the Pharaohs been destroyed almost to the foundation, and had the names of the builders of those which still stand been accurately preserved, it would have been easy for the inquirer to prove and make clear by calculating what was originally, and of necessity, the proportion between the masses of the pyramids and the reigns of their respective builders.

FUN.

A CHINESE ADAGE.—Love 'oo little, love Oolong.

ALL reports to the contrary, the ice crop for 1881 has not yet been damaged by frost.

WHY is the money you are in the habit of giving to the poor like a newly born babe? Because it's precious little.

AN exchange asked: "Do butchers play a skin game?" That they do is evidenced by the number of greenhorns hanging around their establishment.

WHY is the meat in your sandwich like the large middle class of society? Don't you see that? Well, because it lies between the upper crust and the under bred.

A JUNIOR was heard to remark on a recent Sunday, after Prof. —— had preached an eloquent sermon: "That was a splendid sermon. Had 108 single gestures and 13 double."

GEORGIE (four years old, at the tea table:—"Mamma, may I have some sardines?" Mamma: "Wait till I'm ready, Georgie." Georgie (surprised): "Why, ma, it's me 'at wants 'em!"

AN exchange remarks that "the Chinese can handle mortars and produce great destruction." Inexperienced drug clerks can compete with Chinese cheap labor in this respect and give them points, besides.

NOT QUITE WHAT HE MEANT, THOUGH.—Milkman: "Tell yer mother she'll 'ave to pay ready money for milk in futur'; I ain't a-goin' to chalk up any more." Boy: "Wat are yer a-goin' to use instid then, Mr Simpson?"

A PENNSYLVANIA politician who had suddenly become very wealthy, recently attended a dinner party at which there was the usual fillet of beef with mushrooms. While engaged upon the beef he whispered to his neighbor: "Do you eat the clothes-pin heads, too?"

ONE of the prettiest compliments ever reported was recently paid to the owner of a pair of bright eyes who lives on Prairie Avenue. She took a child upon her lap, and, after gazing intently into her face for a few moments, the little one asked naively: "Are your eyes new?"

A LITTLE Galveston boy visited his uncle on his birthday, and congratulated him. He then asked his uncle if he had washed himself. "Why so?" asked the uncle, patting the innocent little prattler on the head. "Because papa said if you did the clean thing you would give me a dollar, at least."

A GENTLEMAN dropped into a saloon, and in an off-hand way remarked: "Murphy, you wouldn't take a man's last cent for a cigar, would you?" "Certainly I would," remarked the proprietor. "Well, here it is, then," passing over a cent, "give me the cigar." Murphy handed over the cigar, but he says it will be a cold day for the next man who tries the same dodge.

A VISIT TO BEATTY'S FACTORY, WASHINGTON, N. J.

THE HON. DANIEL F. BEATTY, Mayor of Washington, N. J., the piano and organ man, extends a cordial invitation to all to visit his manufactory at Washington, N. J. Those of our readers who desire to purchase either a piano or organ, can then have an opportunity to personally select the instrument they want. Besides, it is quite a treat to go through an establishment so large as that of Mayor Beatty's. He has made a wonderful success of his business, and it is said to be the largest of its kind in the world. A series of illustrations showing the processes of organ manufacture, as carried on by Mr. Beatty, is now in preparation, and, accompanied by suitable descriptive matter, will soon appear in FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

BURNETT'S FLAVORING EXTRACTS. The superiority of these extracts consists in their perfect purity and great strength. They are warranted free from the poisonous oils and acids which enter into the composition of many of the fictitious fruit flavors now in the market. They are not only true to their names, but are prepared from fruits of the best quality, and are so highly concentrated that a comparatively small quantity only need be used.

JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston, Manufacturers and Proprietors. For sale by all Grocers and Druggists.

THE ST. NICHOLAS HOTEL, Broadway, New York, so long the leading Hotel of the great city, fully maintains its high standard of excellence, and in comfort and luxury has no superior in this country or in Europe. Its location for healthfulness and the convenience of travelers is the very best. On account of its thorough good order, safety, and superior rooms, it is especially adapted for families and ladies traveling without escort, who are treated with every respect and consideration. The proprietor, with his family, resides in the Hotel, giving to it his constant personal supervision: the result is that the ST. NICHOLAS is, in every respect, the Model Hotel.

WE would recommend all to try DR. BROWNING'S TONIC AND ALTERATIVE, as it is a perfect Blood Purifier, Makes new Blood, Reddens old Blood, Enriches poor Blood, and Gives Vigorous Health. The dose is but one teaspoonful for an adult, and smaller in proportion for children, and it is exceedingly pleasant to take. For sale by the Proprietor, W. Champion Browning, M. D., 1117 Arch Street, Philadelphia, and all Druggists. Price 50 cents and $1.

THE most efficacious stimulants to excite the appetite are ANGOSTURA BITTERS, prepared by Doctor J. G. B. Siegert & Sons. Beware of counterfeits. Ask your grocer or druggist for the genuine article. J. W. HANCOX, Agent, 51 Broadway, N. Y.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE

IN NERVOUS DEBILITY, LOSS OF APPETITE, ETC.

I used Horsford's Acid Phosphate in nervous debility brought on by overwork in warm weather, with good results. Also in loss of appetite from want of tone of stomach and bowels.

TIPTON, IND. G. M. COLLINS, M. D.

HECKER'S BAKING POWDER steadily grows in favor as its merits become known. The favorable reputation of the firm among housekeepers is the best guarantee of its standard strength and purity.

Now is the best season of the year for painting dwellings, barns, fences, etc., on account of freedom from fires, dust, Summer heat and showers. We are constantly in receipt of letters similar to the following:

LAKE VIEW HOUSE, Latonia, N. Y., Feb. 9th, 1880.
H. W. JOHNS MFG. CO., 87 Maiden Lane, N. Y.:
DEAR SIRS: We have used your Asbestos Liquid Paint on our buildings, and find one coat goes as far and covers as well as two coats of lead and oil. Yours truly, E. R. BOLLES.

FISK & HATCH,
Bankers,
AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT BONDS,
And other desirable Investment Securities,
No. 5 Nassau St., New York,

Buy and sell all issues of Government Bonds, in large or small amounts, at current market prices, and will be pleased to furnish information in reference to all matters connected with investments in Government Bonds.

We are prepared to give information in regard to first-class Railway Securities, and to execute orders for the same.

Buy and sell all marketable Stocks and Bonds on commission, at the Stock Exchange and in the open market.

Receive accounts of Banks, Bankers, Merchants and others, and allow interest on daily balances; and for those keeping accounts with us we collect United States coupons and registered interest, and other coupons, dividends, etc., and credit without charge.

☞ We give special attention to orders from Banks, Bankers, Institutions and investors out of the city, by Mail or Telegraph, to buy or sell Government Bonds, State and Railroad Bonds, Bank Stocks, Railroad Stocks, and other securities.

We have issued the Seventh Edition of "Memoranda Concerning Government Bonds," copies of which can be had on application.

FISK & HATCH.

Stuttering cured by BATES'S APPLIANCES. Send for description to SIMMONS & Co., Box 2230, New York.

EPPS'S COCOA.

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately flavored beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.

Sold only in sealed tins, ¼, ½ and lb., labeled:

JAMES EPPS & CO., Homœopathic Chemists,
LONDON, ENG.

Amusements.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC,
OPENING NIGHT OF THE SEASON.
Donizetti's Opera,
LUCIA DI LAMMERMOOR.
Director of Music and Conductor, ... Signor Arditi.
Wednesday, October 27th, 1880, Donizetti's Opera, LA FAVORITA; Leonora, Miss Annie Louise Cary. The incidental divertissement will be supported by Mlle. Malvina Cavallazzi and the Corps de Ballet.

Friday, October 29th, 1880, Gounod's Opera, FAUST; Marguerite, Mlle. Alwina Valeria (her first appearance this season). First Grand Matinée Saturday, October 30th, at 2 o'clock. Doors open at 1:30. The opera will commence at 2. Box office now open and daily from 9 till 5, under the direction of Mr. Perry.

(A Medicine, not a drink,) contains Hops, Buchu, Mandrake, Dandelion, and the Purest and Best Medical Qualities of all other Bitters.

It is a preventive and cure for Weakness and General Debility, for Fever and Ague, and all Kidney and Liver Diseases.

A little Hop Bitters saves big doctors bills, and "C.O.D. will be paid for a case they will not cure or help."

HOP BITTERS MFG. CO., Rochester, N. Y., and Toronto, Ont.

Frank Leslie's

BUDGET.

A MONTHLY VARIETY MAGAZINE,

Spicy and Entertaining.

Each Number contains 96 pages quarto, and over 100 beautiful illustrations.

Published on the 1st of every month, and for sale by all Newsdealers. Annual subscription, $1.50; single copies, 15 cents. Sent postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Brain and Nerve Food.

VITALIZED PHOS-PHITES.

Composed of the Vital or Nerve-giving Principles of the Ox-Brain and Wheat-Germ.

IT GIVES VITALITY TO THE INSUFFICIENT BODILY OR MENTAL GROWTH OF CHILDREN; FEEDS THE BRAIN AND NERVES; PREVENTS FRETFULNESS; GIVES QUIET, REST AND SLEEP. AN ILL-FED BRAIN LEARNS NO LESSONS, AND IS EXCUSABLE IF PEEVISH. RESTLESS INFANTS ARE CURED AS IT PROMOTES GOOD HEALTH TO BRAIN AND BODY. IT IS A CURE FOR NERVOUSNESS AND DEBILITY IN YOUNG OR OLD.

Paywaxia, a have pre-cribed 400,000 packages.
For sale by Druggists, or by mail, $1.

F. CROSBY, 664 & 666 Sixth Ave., N. Y.

SILK ORNAMENTS

PREPARED TO APPLY TO
Silks, Satins, Muslins, and any other Fabric,
By simply moistening the back of the picture, and pressing same with a hot iron.
Patented November 13th, 1878.

Mineral Decalcomanie

For Burning in on Porcelain, Artistic or Decorative, etc., etc.

PALM & FECHTELER, {781 BROADWAY, Opp. A. T. Stewart's} NEW YORK.

CATALOGUE SENT FREE ON APPLICATION.

50c. and $1 Sample Packages of Silk Ornaments will be sent on receipt of amount.

THE WILSON PATENT Adjustable Chair,

WITH THIRTY CHANGES OF POSITIONS.
Parlor, Library, Invalid Chair, Child's Crib, Bed or Lounge, combining beauty, lightness, strength, simplicity and comfort. Everything to an exact science. Orders by mail promptly attended to. Goods shipped to any address, C. O. D. Send stamp for Illustrated Circulars. Quote FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER. Address the WILSON ADJUSTABLE CHAIR MANUF'G CO., 661 Broadway N.Y.

WELLING

Compressed Ivory Mfg. Co.,

231 Centre St., New York.

Pool Balls, striped same as ivory, 2¼in.,	$30 per set.
" " solid colors, ... 2⅛	26	"
Billiard Balls 2⅜	8	"

Warranted for 12 months.

Also Martingale Rings, Poker Checks, Sleeve Buttons, Hair Brushes, Table Mirrors, etc. Established 1855. High Golden Elephant.

An Absorbing New Novel.

ADAM AND EVE.

By the Author of "Dorothy Fox," "Hero Carthew," etc.

8vo. Extra Cloth, $1.00. Paper Cover, 60 Cents.

"A production of remarkable force, naturalness and fidelity."—Germantown Telegraph.

"A story of very high merit."—Philadelphia Evening News.

"A deeply interesting story."—Indianapolis Journal.

"." For sale by all Booksellers, or will be sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of the price by

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO., Publishers,
715 and 717 Market Street, Philadelphia.

WORSTEDS BY MAIL.

Twenty Skeins, assorted colors, postage free, for 25cts. in stamps. W. C. ROGERS, 66 Court Street, Boston, Mass.

A 5-LINE ADVERTISEMENT inserted one week in 750 newspapers for $50. 100-page pamphlet free. GEO. P. ROWELL & CO., 10 Spruce St., N. Y.

Latest and Best Dictionary Extant!

HANDY, RELIABLE

DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

The most extensive and comprehensive book of the kind ever published. It contains the exact Spelling, Pronunciation and Definition of more than Twenty-five Thousand Words as used by the best Speakers and Writers in America and England.

It also contains a number of

Most Valuable Tables

and other Articles, giving information about WEIGHTS AND MEASURES to ascertain use the METRIC SYSTEM; ABBREVIATIONS used in WRITING; FOREIGN WORDS, PHRASES and PROVERBS, &c., making it indispensable to every READER, WRITER and THINKER. Fully illustrated. Price, 10 Cts. By mail 15 cts. extra.

Before ordering Books elsewhere, send for catalogue of standard Books at very low prices.

THE CHEAPEST BOOK STORE in the WORLD.
Address, AMERICAN BOOK STORE, 943 Broadway, N. Y.

$10 invested in Railroad Stocks on 1 per cent margin doubles every day. Some profit on larger amounts. Investments made from $10 and upwards. Official quotations mailed free. Address, CHILD & Co., Bankers, 35 Wall Street, N. Y.

CANDY

Send one, two, three or five dollars for a retail sample box, etc., by express, of the best Candies in America, put up elegantly, and strictly pure. Refers to all Chicago.

C. F. GUNTHER, Confectioner, 78 Madison St., Chicago.

The OLDEST and BEST of the JUVENILE PUBLICATIONS.

Frank Leslie's

Boys' & Girls' Weekly

is now publishing the following admirable serial stories all beautifully illustrated:

"The Lost Trail; Or, On the Wild North Border." By W. H. THOMES.
"'Swappy': Or, The Adventures of a Yankee Boy." By NAT CURTIS.
"Trap-door Tom."
"Jim Jeffs; Or, The Mystery of the House by the River." By NED MARCY.
"Left to Himself." By CORNELIUS AR LOOS.
"The Pearl of the Sahara; Or, The Adventures of Two American Boys." By CORNELIUS REMY.
"Hal Harkforward and Tom Tallyho's Schooldays." By SHACKSPEARE HARTOG (Jack Harkaway).

Sold by all newsdealers. Price 5 cents a copy; $2.60 a year, postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Digitized by Google

Carpets,

NEW FALL STYLES.

WE ARE NOW OFFERING LARGE LINES OF NEW DESIGNS AND STYLES IN CARPETINGS RECEIVED FROM

OUR OWN FACTORIES,

WHICH WILL BE FOUND TO COMBINE TO AN UNUSUAL EXTENT

Elegance in Style and Finish,
Durability in Wear,
and Economy in Prices.

WE ALSO OFFER AN EXTENSIVE ASSORTMENT OF TURKISH, PERSIAN AND EAST INDIAN CARPETS AND RUGS, AND OTHER POPULAR FLOOR COVERINGS, AT EXTREMELY MODERATE RATES.

J. & J. DOBSON,

40 & 42 WEST 14TH STREET, N. Y.,

JOHN VAN GAASBEEK, Manager.

PHILADELPHIA WAREROOMS, 809 & 811 Chestnut Street.

BOSTON WAREROOMS, 525 & 527 Washington Street.

READ! READ!! READ!!!

Wilkie Collins's

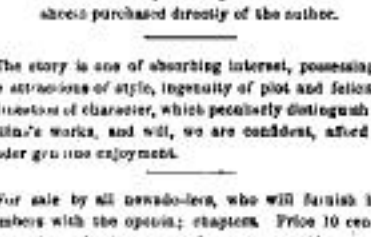
DEEPLY INTERESTING SERIAL NOVEL,

"THE BLACK ROBE,"

IN

Frank Leslie's

ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.



Published exclusively in this journal from advance sheets purchased directly of the author.

The story is one of absorbing interest, possessing all the attractions of style, ingenuity of plot and felicitous delineation of character, which peculiarly distinguish Mr. Collins's works, and will, we are confident, afford the reader genuine enjoyment.

For sale by all newsdealers, who will furnish back numbers with the opening chapters. Price 10 cents a copy. Annual subscription, $4, sent postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

NEW EDITION.

Published by G. & C. MERRIAM, Springfield, Mass.

LATEST—LARGEST—BEST.

Contains over 118,000 Words,
1928 Pages, 3000 Engravings,
4600 NEW WORDS and Meanings,
Biographical Dictionary of over 9700 NAMES.

YOUNG MAN OR OLD, [illegible] HALL, Box 1500, Boston, Mass. (Please note.)

SCHMITT & KOEHNE.

Central Park Brewery

AND

Bottling Company

Brewery, Bottling Department and Office, 160—168 East Fifty-ninth Street. Icehouse and Rock-vaults, Fifty-sixth and Fifty-seventh Street, Avenue A and East River, N. Y.

BOHEMIAN and LAGER BEER.

The finest Beer for family use. The best Shipping Beer in bottles, arranged to keep in any climate for months and years.

ETIQUETTE OF VISITING CARDS,—Latest rules for style, sizes, turning corners, etc.; Mail, 7 c. HOWARD & CO., Box 2,828, New York.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. Address, H. HALLETT & Co., Portland, Maine.

MANNARIAL BALM restores and develops the beard. Warranted sure and safe. Price, $1. NEW ENGLAND MEDICAL INSTITUTE, 24 Tremont Row, Boston, Mass.

THE STAGE by Jas. E. Murdoch, Veteran Comedian and Tragedian. A series of Dramatic Sketches rich in Anecdote and reference to favorite Actors and Actresses. Price, $2. Special Terms to Agents.
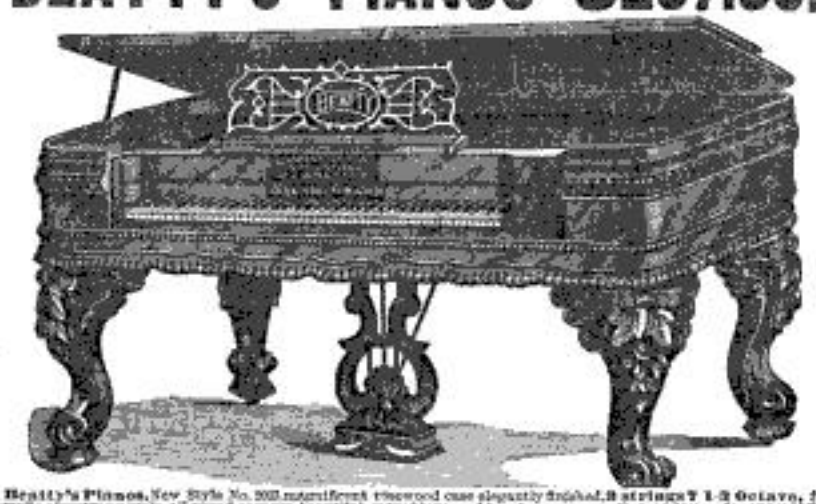
J. M. STODDART & CO., Philadelphia.

AGENTS WANTED. $5 PER DAY made selling our PLATFORM FAMILY SCALE. Weighs up to 25 lbs. Retail price, $2. A BOOK FOR AGENTS. Exclusive territory free. Terms and full line sample Agents. DOMESTIC SCALE CO., Cincinnati, O.

---

50 Elegant, All New, Chromo & Scroll Cards, no 2 alike, Name Nicely printed, 10c. Card Mills, Northford, Ct.



---

50 Landscape, Chromo Cards, etc., name on, 10c. 20 Gilt edge Cards, 10c. CLINTON & Co., North Haven, Ct.

---

20 New Chromo Cards, Bouquet, Motto or Moss Rose, with name, 10 cts. NASSAU CARD CO., Nassau, N. Y.

BEATTY'S PIANOS $297.50.

Beatty's Pianos, New Style No. 2021 magnificent rosewood case elegantly finished, 3 strings 7 1-3 Octaves, full serpentine overstrung scale, all round corners, beautiful carved legs and lyre, heavy serpentine and large fancy panelled round entire case, back finished same as front, Beatty's celebrated Grand Action, Capped Hammers, in fact every improvement which can in any way tend to the perfection of the instrument has been added.

☞ My price for this instrument boxed & delivered on board cars at Washington, N. J. with the Piano Cover, Stool, Book, & Music, only $297.50.

The Piano will be sent on test trial. Please send reference if you do not send money with order. Cash sent with order will be refunded and freight charges paid by me both ways if Piano is not just as represented in this Advertisement. Thousands in use. Send for list of names of persons who are using them in their own homes. Grand Square and Upright Pianos in great variety. $1000 rewards. (See Catalogue.) Every Instrument fully Warranted for six years.

ORGANS, 14 Stops 4 Set Reeds only $60. Pipe, Chapel and Parlor Organs $65 upwards. Sent on trial. Those desiring to purchase are requested to visit my Manufactory at Washington, New Jersey, and select the Instrument in Person. ☞ Illustrated Catalogue and Advertisers, Holiday Edition, sent Free.

Address or call on ☞ DANIEL F. BEATTY, Washington New Jersey.

☞ Piano Post above Advertisement is a Conspicuous Place.—72

Rupture

DR. J. A. SHERMAN—AND THE ONLY DR. SHERMAN, known to the public for the past 35 years or more for his successful method of treating Rupture without the annoyance and injury trusses inflict—may now be consulted weekly at the New York and Boston offices. Dr. Sherman is the discoverer of the only known cure for Rupture by local external treatment.

Patients from abroad can receive treatment and leave for home same day. During treatment any kind of active exercise or labor can be performed without interference with the treatment, and with safety from the danger of strangulated Rupture. HIS BOOK ON RUPTURE gives the most reliable proofs from distinguished professional gentlemen, clergymen and merchants of his successful practice and popularity therefrom throughout this country and the West Indies. The afflicted should read it and inform themselves.

It is illustrated with photographic likenesses of extremely bad cases before and after cure, and mailed to those who send ten cents. PRINCIPAL OFFICE, 251 Broadway, New York.

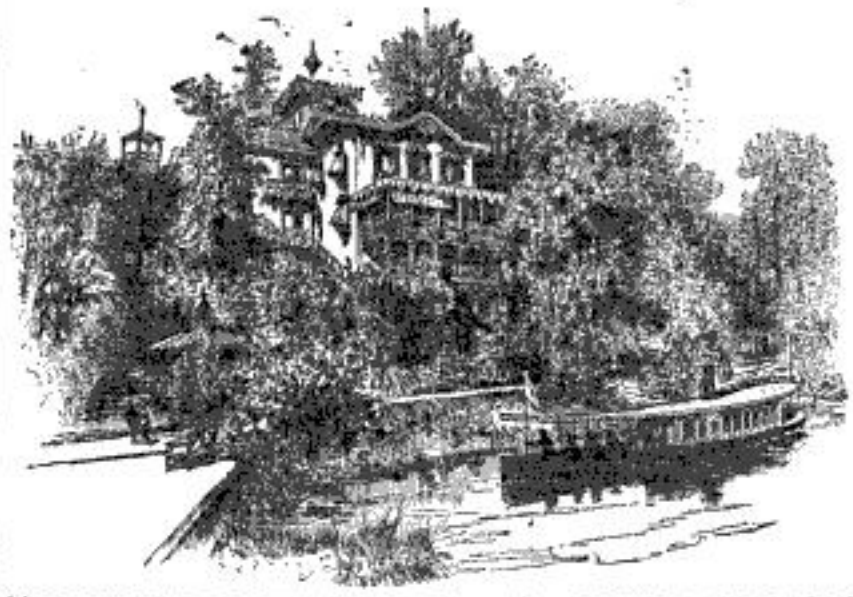
H. W. JOHNS' ASBESTOS

LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING, BOILER COVERINGS
Steam Packing, Sheathings, Fireproof Coatings, Cements
Send for Samples, Illustrated Pamphlet and Price List.
H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO. 87 Maiden Lane, N.Y.

Imitation Gold Watches. $2, $3, $5, $10 and $20 each; Chains $1 to $12 to match. Jewelry of the same. Sent C.O.D. by Express. Send stamp for Illustrated Circular. COLLINS METAL WATCH FACTORY, 25 Broadway, N. Y. Box 3086.

$72 A WEEK. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly Outfit free. Address TRUE & Co., Augusta, Maine.

SCARCE GOODS.—Books, Photos, &c. Sample Catalogue 3c. Paris Book Co., Chicago, Ill.



---

50 New Style Cards, Illuminated in bright colors, 10c. 50 Agt's Samples 10c. Conn. Card Co., Northford, Ct.

---

50 Elegant Cards, New Chromo, Shells, Glass-etc, etc., with name, 10c. G. A. SPRING, Northford, Ct.

FOR SALE,

"INTERLAKEN,"

THE COUNTRY HOME OF THE LATE FRANK LESLIE, ESQ.,

Consisting of 62 acres, situated on LAKE SARATOGA, and extending back to Lake Lonely.

The house contains twelve rooms, gas and water.

The stable, finished in fine woods, has six box-stalls.

Finely appointed billiard-room, and three handsomely furnished sleeping-rooms over coach-house.

Gardener's cottage.

Conservatories profusely stocked with rare plants.

The furniture, steam-yacht, sail and row boats, French omnibus, etc., will be sold with the place.

Apply to

HOMER MORGAN, 2 Pine Street; or,
V. K. STEVENSON, 25 Pine St., and 661 Fifth Av

Agents Wanted.

IT PAYS to sell our Rubber Hand-Printing Stamps. Circulars free. G. A. HARPER & BRO., Cleveland, O.

BIG PAY to sell our Rubber Printing Stamps. Samples free. Taylor Bros. & Co., Cleveland, O.

$350 A MONTH—AGENTS WANTED—75 best selling articles in the world; 1 sample free. address Jay Bronson, Detroit, Mich.

AGENTS WANTED EVERYWHERE to sell the best Family Knitting Machine ever invented. Will knit a pair of stockings, with HEEL and TOE complete, in 20 minutes. It will also knit a great variety of fancy-work for which there is always a ready market. Send for circular and terms to the Twombly Knitting Machine Co., 409 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

HISTORY OF

POLITICAL PARTIES

AND OF THE

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT,

From Colonial Days to the Present Date.

The most Valuable Publication of the age. Entirely Non-Partisan.

Entirely new in design, comprehensive and exhaustive, with beautifully-colored MAPS and DIAGRAMS, showing at a glance the continuous or Political Events of the Country from 1607 to 1880, including concise Biographical Sketch of all the Presidents, Governors, and other high officials, their popular and electoral vote, causing the mind to imbibe and retain the facts which are given both to the eye and the thought. The most ignorant through this Concise can be informed upon these subjects, and read with pleasure and save the researches of years reduced to hours. Should be in every household, school, and library. Issued in Book Form at $5, and as a Chart at $2. AGENTS WANTED everywhere at once. Big Pay. SHANGER, DAVIS & CO., Pub's, Indianapolis, Ind.

JUDGE FOR YOURSELF By sending 25c. money or 40c. postage stamps, with age, you will receive by return mail a correct picture of your future husband or wife, with name and date of marriage. Address, W. FOX, Box 38, Fultonville, N.Y.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING

Presses and outfits from $3 to $500. Over 2,000 styles of type. Catalogue and reduced price list free.
H. HOOVER, Philadelphia, Pa.

---

40 Lovely Chromo Cards, New Designs just out, with name, 10c. STAR PRINTING CO., Northford, Ct.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address, STINSON & Co., Portland, Maine.

---

53 Gilt Edge, Chromo, Snowflake, Glass, Lace & Ecrd. Name on 10c. Franklin Prt'g Co., Fair Haven, Ct.

---

40 New Styles Chromos, with name 10c. 40 Agents Samples 10c. CANADA CO., Northford, Ct.

$777 A YEAR and expenses to agents. Outfit free. Address, P. O. VICKERY, Augusta, Maine.

THE CHEAPEST MAGAZINE IN THE WORLD.

Frank Leslie's

POPULAR MONTHLY.

THE NOVEMBER NUMBER NOW READY,

Profusely illustrated, and with the following brilliant table of

CONTENTS:

"BOSTON, IN HER TWO AND A HALF CENTURIES OF EXISTENCE." Sixteen Illustrations.

"SCENES FROM LONDON LIFE—FROM HAND TO MOUTH." By T. E. Rhys Rees. Nine Illustrations.

"INDIA." Nine Illustrations.

"BOLOGNA." By Lucy Blanche Murphy. Six Illustrations.

"BELGIUM—PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE." By Godfrey A. Hodson. Fifteen Illustrations.

"SOME GOSSIPING PAPERS" (No. 3). By Aunt Fanny (Mrs. Herbert).

"THE TREASURE OF THE ILEX." By M. T. Caldor. Illustrated.

"HORATIO NELSON." By Alfred E. Guernsey. Seven Illustrations.

"HOW HAIL-STONES ARE FORGED IN THE CLOUDS." By Robert James Mann. Five Illustrations.

Serial and Short Stories.—"The Ant or Witch," by the author of "The House with an L" (Chapters VI.-XI.); Illustrated. "Hopkins's Portrait." "He Cursed Me with my Heart's Desire," by Mrs. J. G. Austin; Illustrated. "The Widow has It"; Illustrated. "Strange Case"; Illustrated. Etc., etc.

Sketches, Adventures, etc.—"Aunt Stephen's Story"; Illustrated. "The Use of Tortures in England." "Converted by a Bon Conservateur"; Illustrated. "Fishing Days in Canada." "The Knighting of the Black Prince"; Illustrated. "A Race for Life in the Jungle at Satpoora," by E. B. Smith, U. S. N.; Illustrated. Etc., etc.

Poems.—"Lines on the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Settlement of Boston" (1630), by Grenville Mellen. "On the River"; Illustrated. "A Parable," by Philip Bourke Marston. "A Mother's Songs"; Illustrated. "Once and for Aye"; Illustrated. "A Calm Day," by Wilfred Woollam. "The Ant—a Fable," by Kriloff. "Pretty Puss"; Illustrated.

Miscellany.—"Influence of the Mind on the Body." "Glass in Egypt." "The Metamorphoses of the Stag Beetle"; Illustrated. "The Antiquity of Cheese." "Coffee Culture." "Palimpsest Manuscripts." "Elizabethan Dress." "The Tombs of the Sempachers." "The Valley of Roses." "Raw Oysters Self-Digestive." "Ancient Goblet with an Arabic Inscription"; Illustrated. "The Apothecary"; Illustrated. Etc., etc.

"Recent Progress in Science" (with Illustration—Electromatic Motor Motor). "Entertaining Column." Etc.

128 QUARTO PAGES—OVER 100 EMBELLISHMENTS.

Colored Frontispiece, "THE CONDEMNED BOOKS," from the painting by Vibert.

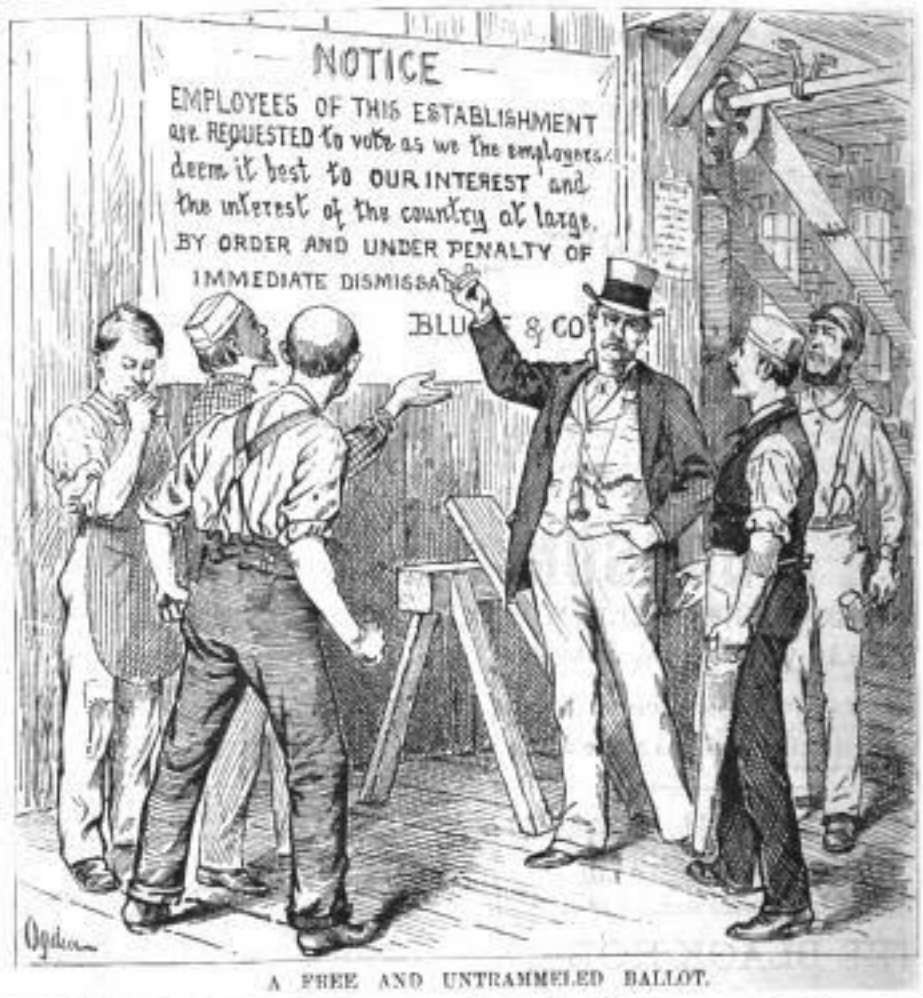
Single copies, 35 cents; annual subscription, $3; six months, $1.50; four months, $1. Sent post free.

SEND 25 CENTS FOR SPECIMEN COPY.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 and 57 Park Place, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Budget.

96 QUARTO PAGES—NEARLY 100 HANDSOME ILLUSTRATIONS.



Annual subscription price, $1.50, postpaid. Send 15 cts. for a specimen copy.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place New York.

Digitized by Google

GOLIAH AND THE LITTLE MAN WITH A BIG FIST.

A FREE AND UNTRAMMELED BALLOT.

HECKER'S PERFECT BAKING POWDER

PURITY AND STRENGTH GUARANTEED.

AN EXPERIENCE OF OVER THIRTY YEARS IN THE MANUFACTURE OF BAKING POWDER FOR USE IN MAKING SELF-RAISING FLOUR, WARRANTS US IN OFFERING THIS AS A PERFECT BAKING POWDER.

For Sale by all Grocers.

GEORGE V. HECKER & CO.,

CROTON FLOUR MILLS, 203 CHERRY ST., N. Y.

SAVE MONEY

By Ordering

FASHIONABLE CUSTOM CLOTHING FROM NEW YORK.

ELEGANT SUITS TO ORDER, $18, $20 and $25.

DRESS SUITS, $20 to $35.

TROUSERS, $5 to $8.

WE SEND FREE Samples of Cloths and Suitings, and Fashion Plates, with full directions for ordering Gents' Clothing and Furnishing Goods, by mail, with fit and satisfaction guaranteed. Send for samples, Mention color and price desired, and give trial order to

GEO. W. LOSS & SON, Fashionable Clothiers, 70 & 72 Fulton St., New York.

N.Y. Central & Hudson River R.R.

THE BEST ROUTE EAST OR WEST.

Through Cars between New York or Boston and Chicago or St. Louis.

See NIAGARA FALLS, SARATOGA and the HUDSON.

C. H. MEEKER, General Passenger Agent.

CHINA PAINTING

COLORS AND MATERIALS

HANCOCK & SON'S Celebrated Worcester Amateur Colors, Specially prepared for Painting on China and Earthenware, over and under the glaze. Largest variety in America of Mineral Colors, Lacroix's Tubes, etc. SEND FOR PRICE LIST.

J. Marsching & Co., 21 Park Place, NEW YORK.

14 STOP ORGANS SUB BASS & Oct. Coupler, 4 Set Reeds, $65 Pianos $125 and upwards, sent on trial. Catalogue free. Address, DANIEL F. BEATTY, Washington, N.J.

TRUSS EGGLESTON SENSIBLE TRUSS. Made on new principles. Send for Circulars. Eggleston Truss, Chicago, Ill.

OPIUM Morphine Habit Cured in 10 to 20 days. No pay till Cured. Dr. J. STEPHENS, Lebanon, Ohio.

IN TRAVELING, Use a Few Drops of Brown's Ginger in the Water you Drink. Frederick Brown, Philada.

The Ladies OF THE White House OR, IN THE HOMES OF THE PRESIDENTS

A History of every Administration from Washington to the present time. Includes much Personal and Private history never before published. Agents wanted. For full description address the Publishers, BRADLEY & Co., 66 North Fourth St., Philadelphia, Pa.

FISHERMEN! TWINES AND NETTING MANUFACTURED BY WM. E. HOOPER & SONS, Baltimore, Md.

☞ Send for Price-List, naming your County and State.

Columbia Bicycle

The Bicycle has proved itself to be a permanent, practical road-vehicle, and the number in daily use is rapidly increasing. Professional and business men, seekers after health or pleasure, all join in bearing witness to its merits. Send 3ct.-stamp for catalogue with price-list and full information.

The Pope Mfg. Co. 59 SUMMER STREET, Boston, Mass.

INMAN ROYAL MAIL STEAMERS For QUEENSTOWN and LIVERPOOL.

NOTICE.—The steamers of this line take Lieutenant Maury's lane routes at all seasons of the year.

CITY OF BRUSSELS.....Thursday, October 21, 7 A.M.
CITY OF BERLIN.....Saturday, October 30, 2 P.M.
CITY OF MONTREAL.....Thursday, November 4, 6 A.M.
CITY OF RICHMOND....Saturday, November 13, 2 P.M.

From Pier 37, North River, foot of Charlton St.

Cabin, $80 and $100. Return tickets on favorable terms. Steerage, $28. Drafts at lowest rates.

Saloons, state-rooms, smoking and bathrooms amidships.

These steamers do not carry cattle, sheep or pigs.

JOHN G. DALE, Agent, 31 and 33 Broadway, New York.
G. A. FAULK, 105 South Fourth Street, Philadelphia.
L. H. PALMER, 3 Old State House, Boston.
F. C. BROWN, 32 South Clark Street, Chicago.

NICOLL THE TAILOR. 620 Broadway and 139 to 151 Bowery, New York.

PANTS TO ORDER, $4.00 TO $10.00.
SUITS " " $15.00 " $40.00.
OVERCOATS " $12.00 " $40.00.

Samples and Rules for Self-Measurement sent by mail.

THE GREATEST NOVELTY OF THE AGE.

The Royal Top Spinning Pistol.

Explodes a Paper Cap and Spins a Top at same time. It cannot strike the hand, and is in no way dangerous. Can be used to spin the Top without firing the Cap, or to fire the Cap without spinning the Top. A good toy for girls or boys. Neat, compact, fun for all ages. Address JOHN P. LOVELL & SONS, 150 Boston, Mass.

A KEY THAT WILL WIND ANY WATCH AND NOT WEAR OUT

SOLD by Watchmakers. By mail 25 cents. Circulars free. J. Bilson & Co., 33 Dey St., N.Y.

A. T. Stewart & Co.

CONTINUE THEIR SPECIAL SALE OF

Black and Colored SATIN DE LYON

At $1.50 per Yard;

Former Price, $2.50 per Yard.

ALSO,

Bonnet and Ponson's BLACK SILKS

At 25 per cent. Reduction from Recent Prices.

Broadway, 4th Ave., 9th & 10th Sts.

KIDNEY-WORT

THE ONLY MEDICINE

That Acts at the Same Time on The Liver, the Bowels, and the Kidneys.

These great organs are the natural cleansers of the system. If they work well, health will be perfect; if they become clogged dreadful diseases are sure to follow with

TERRIBLE SUFFERING.

Biliousness, Headache, Dyspepsia, Jaundice, Constipation, Piles, Kidney Complaints, Gravel, Diabetes, Rheumatic Pains or Aches are developed because the blood is poisoned with the humors that should be expelled naturally.

KIDNEY-WORT WILL RESTORE

the healthy action and all these destroying evils will be banished; neglect them and you will live but to suffer.

Thousands have been cured. Try it and you will add one more to the number. Take it and health will once more gladden your heart.

Why suffer longer from the torment of an aching back? Why bear such distress from Constipation and Piles?

KIDNEY-WORT will cure you. Try a package at once and be satisfied.

☞ It is put up in Dry Vegetable Form. In Tin Cans one package of which makes six quarts of medicine. Also in Liquid Form, very Concentrated for those who cannot readily prepare it. It acts with equal efficiency in either form. YOUR DRUGGIST HAS IT. PRICE $1.00.

WELLS, RICHARDSON & CO., Prop'rs, (Will send the dry post-paid.) BURLINGTON, VT.

Liquid KIDNEY-WORT

In response to the urgent requests of great numbers of people who prefer to purchase a Kidney-Wort already prepared, the proprietors of this celebrated remedy now prepare it in liquid form as well as dry. It is very concentrated, is put up in large bottles, and is equally efficient as that put up dry in tin cans. It saves the necessity of preparing, is always ready, and is more easily taken by most people. Price, $1 per bottle.

LIQUID AND DRY SOLD BY DRUGGISTS.

WELLS, RICHARDSON & CO., Prop'rs, A Burlington, Vt.

Grand Central Hotel,

667 to 677 Broadway, New York.

NEW MANAGEMENT.

The Grand Central Hotel, the most centrally located Hotel for both business and pleasure-seekers, has recently changed hands, and is now under the management of Messrs. KEEPER, McKINNIE & Co., of the famous Manhattan Beach Hotel, and has been thoroughly renovated and refurnished, making it one of the most desirable hotels in the city, with its large airy rooms and wide halls. The house is kept on the American plan, at the low price of $3 per day, with a small charge for parlor and baths extra. A liberal arrangement can be made with persons remaining permanently.

KEEPER, McKINNIE & CO., of the Manhattan Beach Hotel, Proprietors.

ORGANS 14 Stops, 4 Sets Reeds, ONLY $65. PIANOS, $125 up. Paper free. Address Daniel F. Beatty, Washington, N.J.

"The Black Robe," "The Black Robe,"

For this new great serial novel, by the celebrated

WILKIE COLLINS, AND Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper.

Published every Wednesday. Single copies, 10 cents. Annual subscription, $4, postpaid. Sold by all newsdealers.

FIRM'S Can for Explosive Fluids.

PATENTED JAN. 21st, 1879.

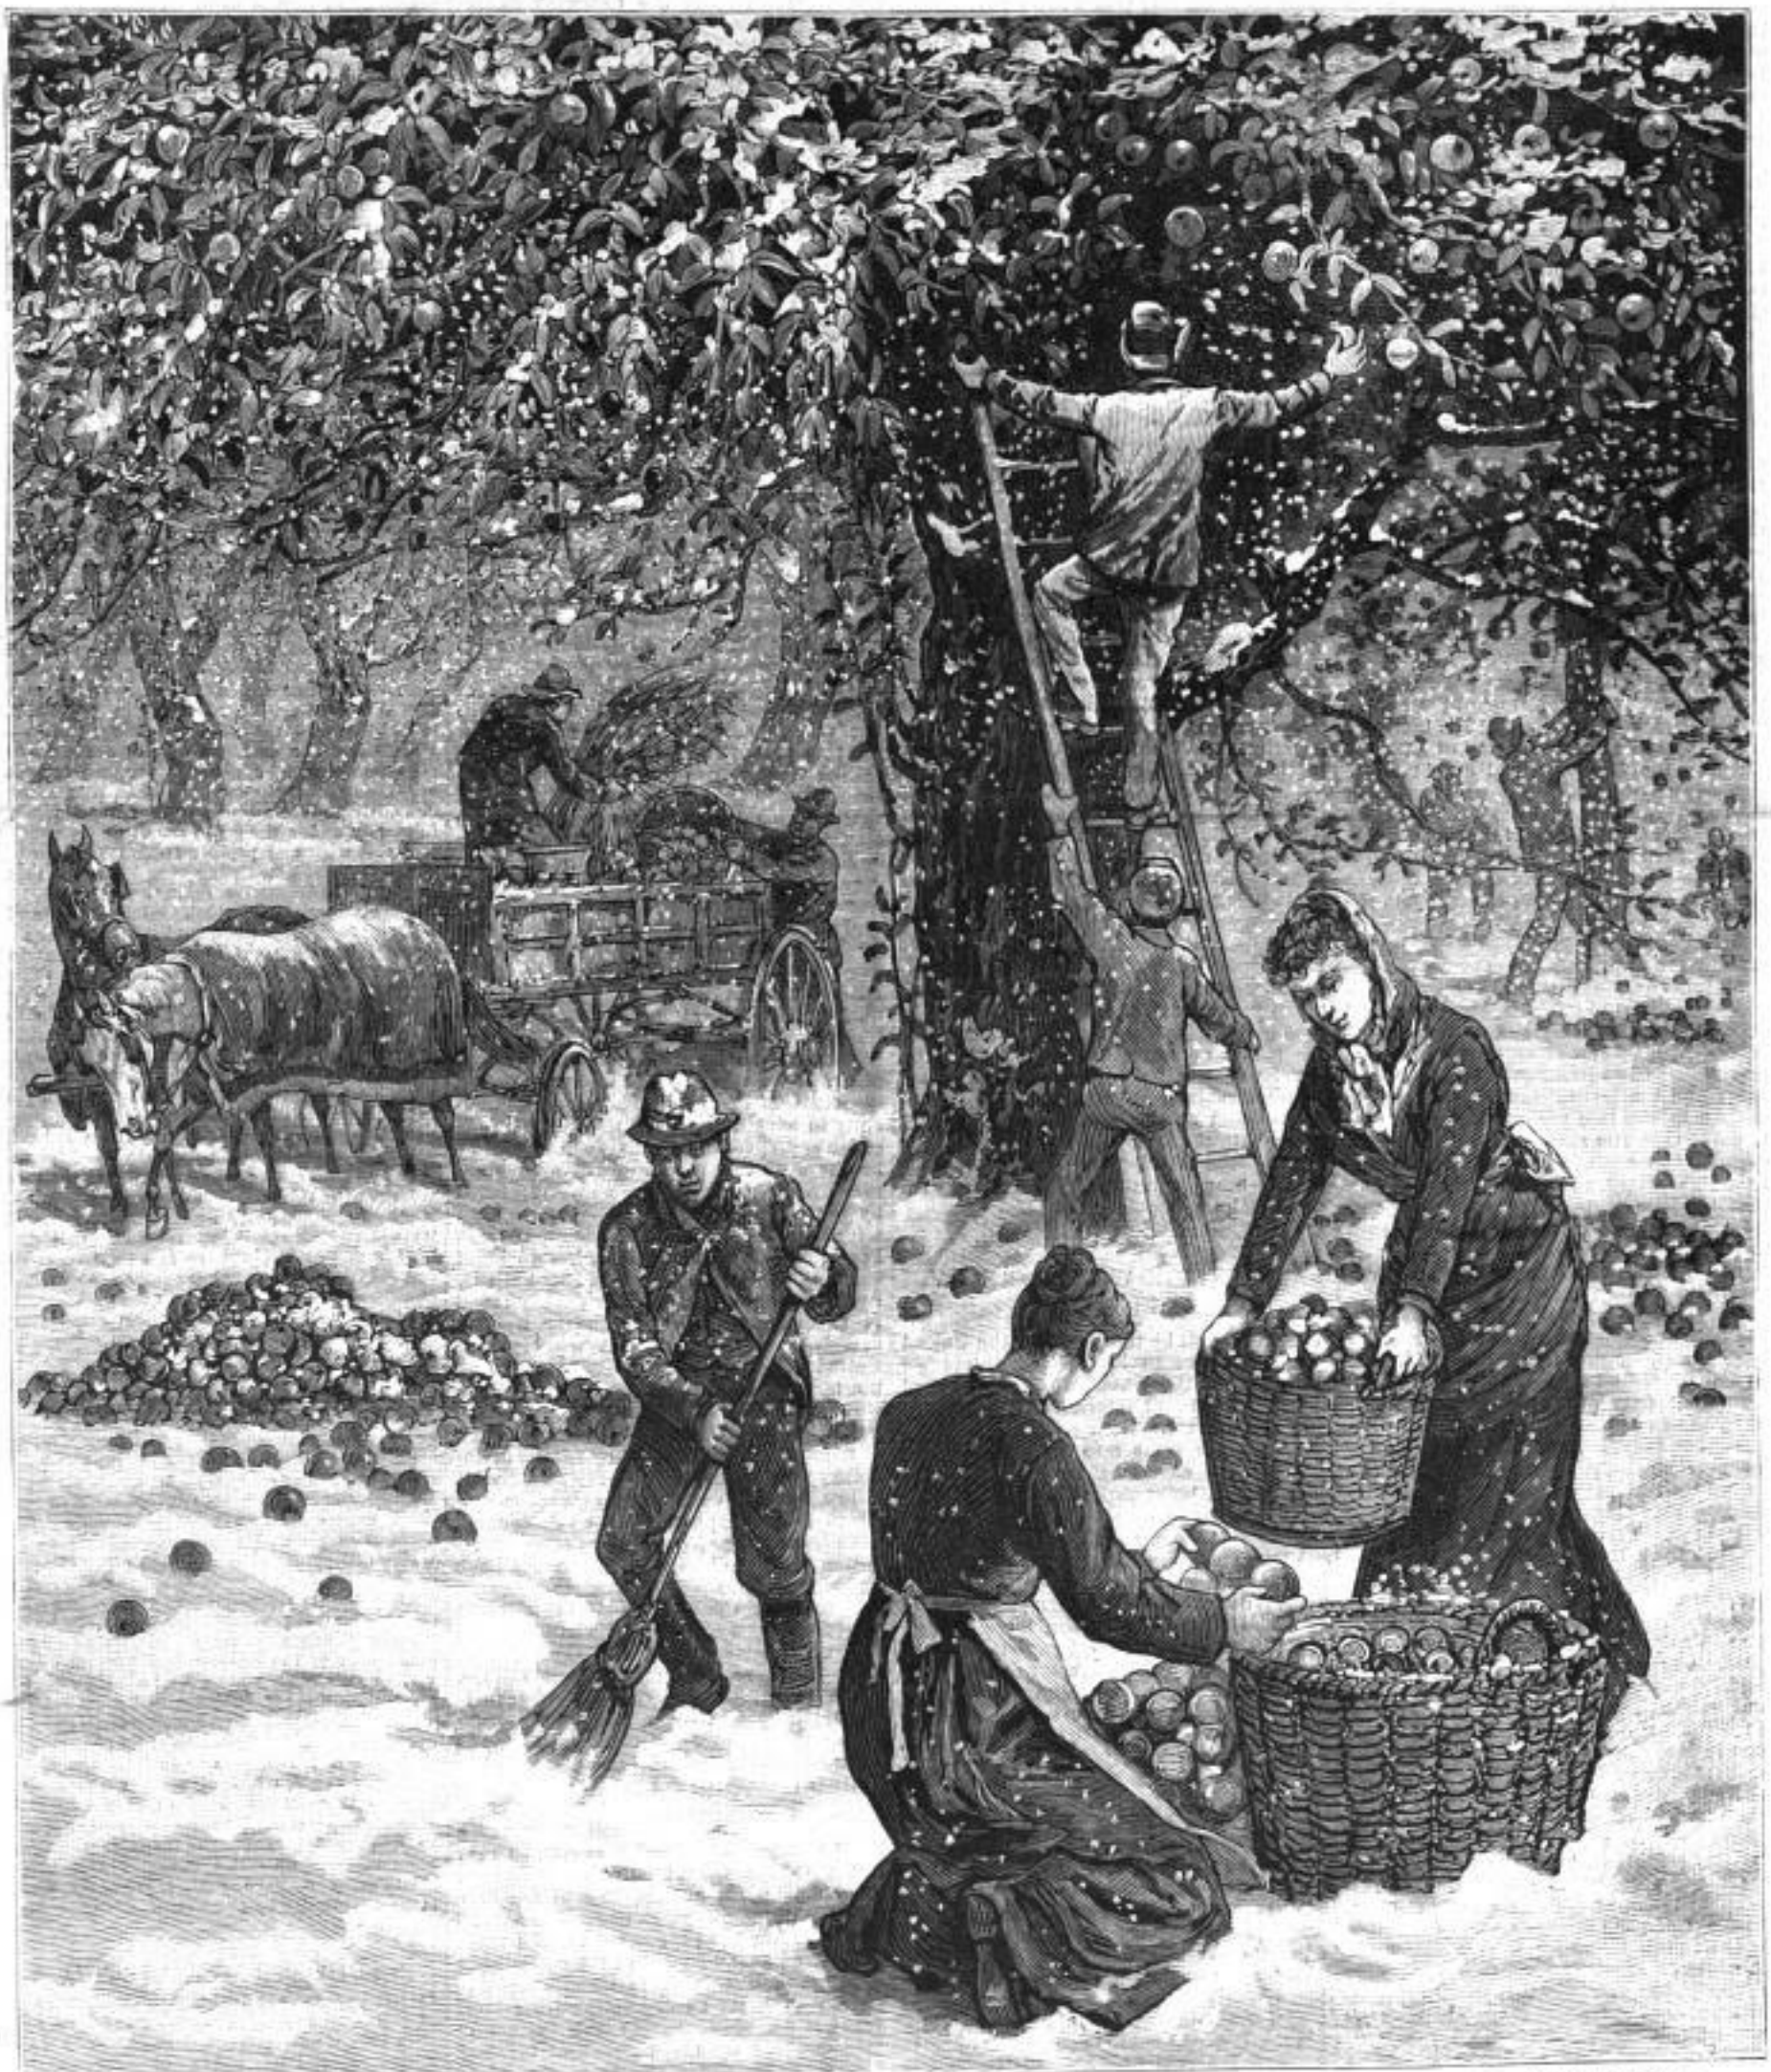
P. O. Box 4273, New York.

Frank Leslie's PLEASANT HOURS.

A MONTHLY PICTORIAL JOURNAL of LIGHT, PLEASING LITERATURE, INTERESTING AND BEAUTIFULLY ILLUSTRATED STORIES, COMPLETE IN EACH NUMBER.

PLEASING TALES, ADVENTURES, ANECDOTE, AND MIRTH-PROVOKING ILLUSTRATIONS.

For sale by all newsdealers, price 15 cents. Annual subscription, $1.50, postpaid.



Frank Leslie's Publishing House, 53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1880, by J. W. Edelano, Assignee, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.—Entered at the Post Office, New York, N.Y., as Second-class Matter.

No. 1310.—Vol. LI. NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 6, 1880. [Price 10 Cents. $4.00 Yearly, 13 Weeks, $1.00.

THE GREAT OCTOBER STORM.—FARMERS HASTILY GATHERING THEIR APPLES IN THE FACE OF THE SNOW-STORM IN WESTERN NEW YORK, OCTOBER 19TH.—From a Sketch by our Special Artist.—See Page 155.

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,
53, 55 & 57 PARK PLACE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 6, 1880.

NOTICE.

FRANK LESLIE'S PUBLISHING HOUSE,
53, 55 and 57 Park Place, New York City, N. Y.
P. O. Box 4121.

NEW YORK, January 17th, 1880.

Under the assignment, and with the assent of Mrs. Miriam F. Leslie, the widow of Frank Leslie, and his sole legatee under his will, the publications of the House will be continued as heretofore under the management of the undersigned.

All communications should be addressed to 57 Park Place, or to P. O. Box 4121, New York City, N. Y.

I. W. ENGLAND, Assignee.

THE TARIFF ISSUE.

OUR readers are aware that during the progress of the present political canvass we have frequently remarked on the absence of clear cut distinctions, of definite issues, and of substantial policies in the programme of both of the two leading parties of the country. And this want has been most remarkable in the case of the Democratic Party, which, as being in the opposition, was called by the very theory of its offensive attitude to present a bold front, and which, if it has any very particular aims, had the most to gain by a clear definition of its positions. The Republican Party, intrenched in place and power by its twenty years' possession of the Executive Government, might, perhaps, with some show of reason, "point with pride" to its recent achievements, and to its established policies, as presenting in themselves a continuing series of measures which dispensed its leaders from the necessity of making any new or more distinctly defined promises for the immediate future. To the Democratic appeal in favor of a "change" for the sake of a change (which was the thesis maintained by Mr. English in his letter of acceptance, arguing that twenty years was long enough possession of the Government by any party), the Republicans have replied by the prudential maxim which inculcates the expediency of "letting well enough alone."

As long as the Republicans put "the sectional issue" in the forefront of their order of battle, after the manner of Mr. Conkling in his speech at the Academy of Music in this city, the Democrats had a definite object set before them—the pacification of the country—but this object was set before them rather by the folly of their opponents than by their own wisdom, and was therefore liable to be taken away from them at any moment by a "spasm of sense" in the Republican management.

In fact, this spasm came when, in the later stages of the October canvass, the Republicans so far recovered from their midsummer folly as to send the "bloody shirt" standard to the rear, and betook themselves, with a show of earnestness, to the discussion of two living questions—the currency and the tariff. And by this change in their tactics they seem to have produced in the Democratic ranks something like the surprise and confusion created in an army by a night attack, and simply for the reason that the Democrats, as they now find out, were pretty much in the dark with regard to their own position on both of these questions. Hence their fright at the shadows cast by their own uncertain and dimly-defined principles under both of these heads, and hence the unsteadiness of their gait in playing at the game of politics as if it were a game of "Blind Man's Buff."

In the matter of the tariff, for instance, when the Democrats affirmed in their platform that they were in favor of "a tariff for revenue only," they ought to have known the full purport and precise significance of that phrase; for not to know what they meant by it was to expose an uncovered flank to the assault of the enemy at any point he might select, and was to make a mere feint as formidable and fatal as a serious attack. In fact, the Republicans have made a mere feint on the revenue tariff flank of the Democratic army, by boldly charging on the hustings in Ohio and Indiana that a declaration in favor of a revenue tariff is tantamount to a declaration in favor of absolute free trade at the earliest practicable day. But this feint has proved almost as effective in point of political strategy as a serious and deliberate onset; and its effectiveness has resulted entirely from the incertitude of the Democrats with regard to the value and significance of their own position on this subject. Hence, instead of strengthening themselves in their position, which if they only knew it might be made impregnable, they have rather shown a disposition to abandon it, and to run under the cover of the guns which the enemy has trained upon them.

For want of this precise definition in the Democratic attitude on the subject of the tariff, it has, with impunity, been permitted to Mr. Conkling that, in the name of a revenue tariff reform on "Democratic principles," he should conjure up frightful visions of dismantled shops and of extinguished iron forges if General Hancock should be elected, with a Democratic majority in both Houses of Congress, and that, at the same time, Mr. Henry Ward Beecher, speaking in New York in favor of General Garfield, should boldly avow himself to be "a free trader." "I believe," he said, "that the great principle of the future is free trade. The day will come when there will be no custom-houses, no duties." But he was careful to guard against the mischievous application of this principle by adding that "no doctrine of free trade can prevail at once. Time must give it ripeness."

The Democratic declarations in favor of a tariff for revenue only, if interpreted within the bounds of common sense and reason, do not give it the practical effects described by Mr. Conkling, and just as little do they give to it a theoretical scope commensurate with the Republican aspirations of Mr. Beecher. They simply import that the schedules of the present tariff need revision, and that when a revision is made it should be made with primary regard to the raising of revenue, and not to the levying of taxes on branches of productive industry for the purpose of building up and "protecting" the branches of industry that are not self-supporting. It is simply a question as to that incidence of taxation which shall fall the least heavily on the productive forces of the country. In deciding such a question, due regard must be had, of course, to the status of existing interests, that no shock be administered to our industrial system by rash and sudden changes; and whatever decision may be reached in the premises, there will be the chance of "incidental protection" to some kinds of industry so long as any duties are levied at all.

These are the first principles of all revenue reform—principles common to intelligent Republicans as well as to intelligent Democrats, whatever might be their differences with regard to the time, place and degree for the application of these principles. And for the want of being properly grounded in them the Democrats have allowed themselves to be shaken from their steadfastness; and even General Hancock, in restating his view of them, has borrowed in a measure the dialect of the "protectionists"—as, for instance, when in his recent letter to Senator Randolph he gives in his adhesion to the general features of the American tariff policy on the ground that it "has been largely instrumental in building up our industries, and keeping Americans from the competition of the underpaid labor of Europe." If the present tariff, because of the protective theory on which it is based, has been largely instrumental in building up our industries, then the theory on which it is projected should be maintained, and the Republicans are right in their political contention under this head. But if all such "building up" of our industry at the expense of others is a damage to such other industries, and so a damage to the public at large, in proportion to the amount substracted from the avails of remunerative labor, then this policy should be reversed at the earliest possible day, when, with the least loss to "protected interests," the principles of public economy can be brought into correspondence with the principles of public justice.

A PRESTIGE WORTH RECOVERING.

WHAT shall be the policy of the United States as to its foreign shipping? This is a question which, while of universal interest, admits of interminable argument and the most conflicting conclusions. It has just now come into fresh prominence through the efforts of the convention of ship-owners, builders and merchants held in Boston. The object of the convention was to further a satisfactory solution of the problem which for nearly twenty years has remained insoluble. The fact of the serious decline of our merchant marine is admitted on all hands; while the foreign trade of the United States has steadily increased, there has been a steady decay of the carrying trade of American vessels.

In 1850 our total exports and imports amounted to $329,000,000, of which amount American vessels carried $239,000,000. In 1860 the aggregate exports and imports had increased to $762,000,000, and the amount carried by our own ships was $507,000,000, nearly two-thirds of the total trade. In 1870 the decline of American shipping became strikingly apparent. Notwithstanding the foreign trade of the United States had increased to $980,000,000, only a little more than one-third, or $352,000,000, was carried in American bottoms. In 1879 there was again an increase in the total trade, and a falling off in American shipping. The aggregate exports and imports reached the sum of $1,183,000,000, while only $272,000,000 were carried in our own vessels. Startling as these figures may be, they fail to show the actual decadence of our shipping. Included in these figures is the amount of our coastwise trade, which, under our navigation laws, is confined to American bottoms. This trade has shown a steady increase since 1860, and this fact necessarily involves a greater loss in our foreign carrying trade than is apparent in the returns of the aggregate foreign and coastwise trade.

Bearing in mind that the coastwise trade is an increasing one, and that a corresponding increase in American shipping must be the result, the extent of the decline in our foreign carrying trade will appear more conspicuously from the following official statistics of ship tonnage. In 1850 the total tonnage of the United States was 3,535,000 tons; this amount increased to 5,353,000 tons in 1860; in 1870 it declined to 4,246,000 tons, and last year it was only 4,169,000 tons. In 1860 our tonnage equaled that of Great Britain, and we were the recognized rival of that country in not only the carrying trade, but in supplying ships to foreign countries. Then shipbuilding was one of the most important branches of trade in the United States. What we have lost in this respect the following figures strikingly show. In 1855 there were 381 ships and barks built in the United States; in 1878 there were only 81, and in 1879 only 37. Here there appears a decline of nearly 90 per cent. in shipbuilding as compared with 25 years ago.

Unfortunately our shipping has not been affected solely by a decline in shipbuilding; there has been a decisive falling off in ship-owning as well. During the four years of the late war it is estimated that nearly 800,000 tons of shipping were sold abroad, while in the three years 1854 to 1856 inclusive, only 167,000 tons were thus disposed of. But this decrease of tonnage, by sales to foreign buyers, has continued since the war, and is not an inactive factor at the present time. Last year there were 37,000 tons sold, while only 43,000 tons of registered vessels were built. These figures would represent an increase in tonnage for the year of 6,000 tons, but for the fact that there were abandoned 24,000 tons and were lost 87,000 tons, a total of 111,000 tons, making a real decrease in tonnage of 105,000 tons.

The insignificant position which the United States occupies as a common carrier is painfully apparent in the returns of the grain exports from New York for 1879. During the year, 1,075 steamships carrying 42,426,535 bushels of grain, and 1,822 sailing vessels carrying 59,892,033 bushels, left this port. There were only 74 of the sailing vessels owned in this country, the remaining 1,748 sailing and all the steam vessels belonging to foreign countries. The statistics of other ports exhibit a similar state of affairs, somewhat dwarfed, to be sure, by the enormous amount of business done in New York as compared with that of other cities. What the United States loses by having its carrying done by foreign countries is partly suggested in the statement that about $100,000,000 are paid annually to foreign ship-owners for transporting our produce.

For such an unsatisfactory condition of affairs there must be a cause, or rather a combination of causes. There is no difficulty in ascertaining the relation between cause and effect in this case, whatever may be the obstacles in the way of applying a remedy. A primary cause was furnished by the civil war, which imposed upon us a legacy of high prices, and took out of the hands of this country the power to build ships as cheaply as they could be built by its rivals. Another cause is readily found in the substitution of iron for wooden vessels. However easy it was for the United States to beat the world at building the latter, it found itself unable to compete with the Clyde shipbuilders in constructing iron vessels, not on account of lack of ingenuity and skill, but by reason of inability to obtain the necessary material at a low enough cost. The natural causes which have conspired against this country have found very efficient helps in the navigation laws, which, if not so intended, have at least had the effect to completely destroy our shipping. Under those laws the United States has been so thoroughly handicapped that every attempt to revive the shipping interest has resulted in a dismal failure. When to all these serious drawbacks is added the potent opposition of the countries resisting every attempt made by us to wrest from them our lost trade, it may be conceded that the lot of the American shipper is not a happy one.

The Boston Convention has suggested a number of reforms, which combined may result to the advantage of this interest. They embrace a modification of the laws relating to the discharge of seamen abroad and requiring the payment of three months wages; an abandonment of the compulsory pilotage system—a useless and expensive system at best; an exemption from local taxation; a regulation of the system of measurement for the purpose of taxation and tonnage; wider liberty in regard to the hiring of crews, and several other desirable changes. In conclusion, it recommends that a bounty be paid at a certain rate—not specified—per ton on the tonnage of each American vessel. The latter resolution was adopted despite the efforts of those who were in favor of free ships, and no doubt is very unsatisfactory to all who believe that protection is useless where there is nothing to protect. It is questionable, however, whether our shipping trade will ever assume the magnificent proportions of the past, unless Government subsidies are supplied as an offset to those of other countries. But even with the subsidies, it is still a matter of doubt whether our shipping trade will recover so long as American citizens are prevented from buying ships in the cheapest markets.

THE WOMEN'S CONGRESS.

THE time has gone by when men can dismiss the subject of women's associations with a shrug of the shoulders and a sneering allusion to women's rights. We may still regard Sorosis with a half-contemptuous tolerance, and speak of women's clubs as harmless vagaries in which the pretty dears should be indulged—that they should!—but such an assemblage of women as met the other day in Boston demands more respectful attention. The call to this meeting, which was the eighth annual congress of the Association for the Advancement of Women, distinctly traces the changes in public opinion upon the woman question which have taken place within the seven years of its existence to the influence of organization among women. If this claim be in any sense well founded, as those who have watched the growing power of such organizations as the Women's Christian Temperance Union will not feel disposed wholly to deny, then it becomes us all thoughtfully to consider the scope and tendency of such a work as is proposed by the association which has just met in council.

The object of the Association, as set forth in its Constitution, is "to receive and present practical methods for securing to women higher intellectual, moral and physical conditions, and thereby to improve all domestic and social relations." This object they propose to obtain mainly, if not entirely, through their annual congress, by means of the papers upon various subjects there presented, and the discussion which they provoke. Since no official action can possibly result from these discussions, the method proposed would seem to be wholly inadequate, did we not consider the immense personal influence upon a community of any assembly of people who have met together with definite aims and profound convictions.

Dr. Mary Putnam Jacobi, in a paper presented to the first congress, held in New York, in 1873, struck the keynote of the Society's work when she said, "If women are ever to obtain a voice and a place in the government of society, it will only be when they have demonstrated their ability to act independently in society under the government that exists." It is this wise and practical determination to make the best of existing circumstances that gives this Association a claim to respect.

That women can think intelligently and write convincingly upon topics of general interest, is needed not this congress to prove. In the papers presented, the principal point to be noticed is their practicality. They not only discuss an evil, but aim, as far as possible, to propose a remedy. If some of these should appear chimerical to the masculine intellect, we may, perhaps, with propriety, withhold too severe criticism until we are prepared to meet them with something more to the purpose. In several States of the Union, indeed, one class of remedies proposed by the Association in former congresses has been thought worthy of adoption. The fuller share in public work which they ask for has been given them; women are serving upon school boards and boards of public charities, and in several instances female prisoners are under the care of officers of their own sex.

In 1873 Dr. Jacobi said: "No association among women has hitherto been successful except such as were inspired by religious enthusiasm, or formed for purposes of political conspiracy." That this Association is a success, as it claims measurably to be, must then be owing to causes peculiar to itself. Setting aside the personal worth and influence of such women as Maria Mitchell, Frances Willard, and Mary Putnam Jacobi, we may find these causes in two principal points. The absence of all that agitation about "rights" which distinguished the women's associations of an earlier day; a recognition of the fact that such rights are unreal, if only conferred by decree without that superiority which can make them any other than a social injustice; and principally in the earnest and profound conviction that such rights, so far as acquired, bring with them the highest and most solemn duties. It is this underlying conviction of duty, this steady application of its members to the work which they have to do in the world as it now exists, which gives so much of dignity to the deliberations of this congress. When women come together in such a spirit, to discuss topics which through them, as women, bear upon all domestic and social relations, it may be well, indeed, for us to stand reverently by and listen.

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

THE proceedings looking to the cession of Dulcigno are in satisfactory progress. Riza Pasha has instructed the Turkish commissioner, who has charge of the surrender, as to the points upon which he must insist. These contain the following clauses: Montenegro is to assume a part of the Turkish debt proportionate with the ceded territory; liberty of emigration is to be allowed to the inhabitants; the Turkish laws are to be maintained; Ottoman property is to be guaranteed, and the vessels belonging to the port of Dulcigno are to carry the Turkish flag. The Turkish and Montenegrin commissioners are now at Rjeka discussing the propositions, and it is altogether probable that the cession of Dulcigno will take place without any further opposition upon the part of Turkey. Whether the wild Albanians will yield without striking a blow is more uncertain, but merely local opposition will not endanger the peace of Europe as Turkish interference would have done. But if the cession of Dulcigno promises to remove all danger of war, the rectification of the Greek frontier still promises to produce disturbance. The Turks are unwilling to make the changes which were ordered by the supplementary conference at Berlin, and the Greeks will most certainly insist upon a cession of the provinces then accorded to them. King George of Greece, who has returned from an extended tour through Europe, where he has been "lobbying" for the moral support of the Great Powers, made a speech at the opening of the Chambers in Athens, which leaves no hope of a withdrawal of the Greek claims. He told the Parliament that the decision at Berlin had imposed the necessity of a certain action upon his Government; that they must insist upon the strengthening and extension of their boundaries, and that various military and naval preparations had already been made. In these preparations money had been needed; the Government had arranged loans wherewith to procure the necessary funds, and that the Chambers were now required to ratify what had been done. The expression of these sentiments was received with every indication of satisfaction. Fortunately for the peace of Europe, Greece is so crippled with debt that it is scarcely possible that she will be able to borrow much money. For eighteen years her budget has shown a deficit, and only two years ago she was obliged to make a composition with her creditors. It is not likely that, under these conditions, Greece will be able to borrow much money in the lending centres of the world. Besides, it is not certain that the cession of Zanina and the other territory in dispute would add to her prosperity. It is usual in cases of the cession or conquest of territory for the country which acquired the new territory to take also its liabilities. But as the debt of Turkey is very heavy, and the burden which it would impose upon Greece very severe under her present bankrupt position, it is far from clear that the advantage of acquiring new territory would not be overbalanced by the imposition of new liabilities. Meantime affairs upon the borders of Greece and Turkey are in fearful anarchy. Murder is very common, and the Christians are supposed to be arming against the Mussulmans. It is probable that the clause of the surrender of Dulcigno, which provides for the emigration of Albanians, is to allow these lawless mountaineers to flock towards the frontier and overawe the peaceful inhabitants if the latter should be in favor of a quiet cession of Zanina.

Digitized by Google

There is little of interest in France. The Government seems determined to put down all seditious writing and speaking. Prince Jerome Bonaparte, who has been called upon to renounce his claims in favor of his son, Prince Victor, is likely to take some active steps before long. The Bonapartist organs are never tired of pointing out that the Republic is quite as tyrannical as the Empire ever was; that there is no greater freedom of action or speech, and that the guarantee of security which a monarchy gives is wanting in the present Government. The only way out of the present state of affairs is, according to the Bonapartists, in the appointment of a Dictator. At the same time it looks as if the Legitimists were willing to accept the Republic as a success. Certainly there is a decided falling off of the monarchical factions. At a recent manifestation in the Abbey of St. Germain Auxerrois there were scarcely any of the influential supporters of the old régime present.

The settlement of the Dulcigno controversy makes it likely that the British Parliament will not meet before Spring. A Winter session is always unpopular, and the late date of adjournment this year would make it doubly so. The working of the Ballot Act is most unsatisfactory, and it is quite on the cards that a return to the old system of open voting may take place. An agent of Sir Julian Goldsmith, when asked his opinion of the working of the Act, said that while formerly it was only possible for a voter to be bribed by one side, he now took bribes from both, and then voted as he wished. Enormous sums of money are spent upon every election. It is openly stated that no candidate has a chance of success without buying up votes.

The situation in Ireland is, if possible, worse. The landlords and agents are in constant fear of their lives. Honest tenants, who are willing to pay their rents, are afraid to do so, and invent all sorts of excuses, such as selling timber or hay, before they will visit their landlords' houses. When they do pay rent they are afraid to take a receipt lest it should be found in their possession by the Land Leaguers. An extraordinary meeting of landlords and other persons interested in a quiet state of things was recently held in Dublin, but so great is the terrorism prevailing that the doors were kept closed and nothing was made public concerning the proceedings. A number of influential Liberals are about forming a committee to support the Government in the attempt to put down this lawlessness. The prosecution of the Land Leaguers will certainly be proceeded with, and it is said that some of the leaders are already beginning to draw back. Immediate measures for the protection of life and property are being taken, and Mr. Gladstone's Cabinet is trying hard to make up for the almost criminal weakness of last Summer.

From Russia there is a rumor that in consequence of Court intrigues against General Melikoff he will retire to the Caucasus, and that the Committee of Ministers, which is antagonistic to Melikoff's policy, will be reorganized.

THE total number of immigrants arriving at United States ports during the year ending on the 30th of June last, was 457,257. Of this great total, 347,747 were from Europe, and 101,681 from points on the American Continent. The immigrants from Asia numbered about 6,000, of whom 5,802 were Chinese.

MR. JAY GOULD is meditating a fresh conquest in the field of railway enterprise. He has just completed arrangements for the construction of a short line of connecting railroad in Ohio, by which, it is said, he will obtain control of a direct line from New York to the Pacific Coast, by way of Buffalo and Cleveland. The entire cost of the new route from Buffalo to Chicago is placed at $25,000,000.

BOTH political parties have, this year, made exceptionally good Congressional nominations in the State. One of the best is that of Mr. Alexander Taylor, Jr., named by the Republicans of the Westchester District. Mr. Taylor is, in every sense, a worthy representative of the best element of that populous and important district. Capable, upright, and pronounced in his political views, he would prove a valuable acquisition to the ranks of his party in the House, and we cannot doubt that his high standing as a man and a citizen will secure for him the hearty support of many whose political affiliations are different from his own.

WE referred last week to the improved condition of affairs in Mexico, and to the evidences of substantial progress which are presented in many localities. Later accounts represent that the confidence of the people in the new President and in the permanence of peace is everywhere becoming stronger, and as a result business enterprises are commanding a degree of favor altogether exceptional. It is even said that capitalists who have for many years invested their money in Europe are now withdrawing it for local employment. The commerce of the country is steadily developing, and with the completion of the railroads now in progress, an era of genuine prosperity will no doubt be inaugurated in all parts of the Republic.

THE re-election of Hon. George F. Edmunds as United States Senator from Vermont secures to the country for six years more the services of one of the ablest and purest men now in public life. During the last fourteen years Mr. Edmunds has impressed himself more largely than any other Republican upon the policy of the party which has been responsible for the public administration. No member of the Senate, as another has truly said, "has contributed so much towards making the work of that body just, wise and efficient. An ardent Republican by conviction, he is far above the mere prejudice of partisanship, while his profound learning, his untiring industry, his courage, acumen, wit, and genuine eloquence have won the respect and admiration of the country."

THE coroner's jury, charged with inquiring into the cause of the recent disaster on the Pennsylvania Railroad, at Pittsburgh, seems to have done its duty fearlessly. Its verdict declares that the railroad company was guilty of criminal negligence in its failure to take due precaution against the occurrence of such a terrible catastrophe; it was negligent in failing to provide rules whereby the second section of the excursion-train could have been notified of the whereabouts of the first section, and in not guarding against the overloading of trains, and finally, in not employing a sufficient number of men to properly manage the trains. Now, it will be in order for the Grand Jury to take the matter in hand, and to direct such proceedings against the responsible parties as will secure the imposition of deserved penalties.

THE annual report of the Chief Signal Officer shows that the meteorological work of the Bureau has become so thorough that the average percentage of accuracy in the weather forecasts and pre-announcements was, last year, 90 3-10 per cent. The Bureau is now considering the advisability of establishing a large number of auxiliary stations in the cotton belt, to take rainfall and temperature observations, such stations to be in telegraphic communication with the cities of the South, so that all Cotton Exchanges may receive daily information by telegraph of the meteorological conditions affecting the cotton crop from April 1st to October 1st of each year. It is also proposed to make arrangements for observations by vessels engaged in the Atlantic coasting trade, so as to facilitate the determination of probable meteoric conditions in that quarter.

SOME anxiety has been manifested in Democratic circles as to the position which General Mahone, of Virginia, will occupy in the next United States Senate. Some have supposed that, as the result of the existing Democratic quarrel in that State, he would co-operate with the Republicans; but this suspicion, evidently, has no good basis. In a recent interview General Mahone said: "I shall be found on the Democratic side of the Senate; but not as a representative of that Democratic party which knows nothing and is not willing to learn anything—the men who opposed reconstruction and the men who refused to heed the few of us before the first amendment was adopted, when I told them that the best thing they could do would be to yield obedience and respect to the laws of the United States." General Mahone is evidently a man of very pronounced convictions, and it cannot be denied that he has shown true wisdom in accepting the results of the war in good faith, instead of standing out against them as some have conspicuously done.

THE Episcopal General Convention last week adopted a resolution for the appointment of a committee to observe the action of the Government on giving to Indians the rights and duties of citizens and doing away with their tribal relations, and to promote these measures by such means as the committee should deem expedient. This action was strongly urged on the ground that it is the duty of the Church to do all in its power to secure to the Indian his rights under the law, and further legislation, if necessary, to place him on a par with civilized men and bring him within the range of Christian work. A feeble minority opposed the resolution as proposing a departure from "that wise conservatism which has hitherto held this Church aloof from politics." To this it was effectively replied that there is a wide distinction between politics and a high philanthropy; that the treatment of the Indian is a foul blot on our civilization, and that Christians cannot afford to stand aloof from the subject. The action of the Convention will command the approval of the great body of right-thinking men of all parties and sects.

SENATOR WADE HAMPTON does not appear to advantage in his recent correspondence with Secretary Sherman. The points of the controversy, as disclosed in the correspondence, were briefly these: General Hampton resented being called a member of the Ku Klux Klan by Mr. Sherman, and asked the latter whether he had ever used language to that effect which was attributed to him. Sherman replied that he might not have used the exact language, but that he used words which meant that Hampton enjoyed political power which was the result of the atrocities of Southern intimidators, and thus was virtually a "co-partner with the Ku Klux Klan." Hampton answered that what Sherman said was false, and he knew it to be false, and added that his address would be so and so. This was a plain intimation that the South Carolinian was ready and anxious to settle the dispute by a resort to the code duello. But Secretary Sherman ignored the hint, and, instead of sending a friend to General Hampton with authority to settle the place of meeting, etc., simply addressed him a final note to the effect that he would give the correspondence to the press, and allow the public to judge which is the liar. In other words, he preferred that the controversy should be settled by facts rather than pistols. All sensible people will agree that the Secretary occupies the more dignified attitude of the two, and that if the Senator had wished to confirm the assertion that he is a co-partner of the Ku Klux Klan, he could not have adopted a better way to do it. The Democratic press of the North has very generally condemned the foolish action of the able but too impulsive South Carolina Senator.

THE growth of our export cattle-trade with Great Britain has been remarkable. The first American cattle for the English butcher were carried over the ocean in 1863. At the start great prejudice existed against the introduction of meat from the United States, and many efforts, Parliamentary and otherwise, were resorted to in order to curtail its rapid growth. Stories were manufactured as to plagues existing in American cattle regions, but the demand increased constantly. In 1879 there were landed at British ports 535 cargoes of animals, consisting of 76,117 cattle, 119,350 sheep, 15,180 swine; and the amount involved that year in the American trade for beef alone, was $7,382,910. During the first seven months of the present year the value of the live cattle imported into England from this country has been $22,730,385. In other directions American trade is making the same satisfactory progress. Thus the amount expended in Great Britain, in 1879, for American flour was $25,598,690, as against, in 1877, $7,746,405. For seven months, ending July 31st, 1880, America furnished 3,812,729 hundred-weight of flour, valued at $15,215,445. A London correspondent of the New York Times, writes:

"It may be said of the American trade that while the American meat is welcomed at the table of the aristocratic and wealthy in London, as well as at humbler boards, the cheese of the United States finds its way to the homes of the poor. For a midday meal the farm-hand has a pot of beer, a rasher of bacon, some bread and a bit of American cheese. Some one remarked at the American Exchange, a day or two since, that it was a pleasant thing to notice the good feeling existing between England and America. "Better keep it up," dryly interposed a Western gentleman present, "for if we get mad we will starve them to death over here." The same activity and growth in the meat and provision trade with Great Britain is noticeable in many other branches of business. European capital is seeking investment in America in greater amounts than ever before since the days of the war. The words "American Goods Sold Here," are hung in countless stores and shop-windows, and the wildest bull in Wall Street could scarcely, in his most imaginative moments, have hoped to see so great a demand for the products of his country as there is to-day in Great Britain. Canned fruits and acters, photographs, sewing-machines and cock-tails, washing-machines and Blue Point oysters (1s. a dozen), find a market and ready terms. Oysters from America may be had in many restaurants in London, and the lover of the bivalve has ample opportunity to gratify his taste in that regard. The well-known partiality for the American oyster by the Prince of Wales may have had something to do with the growth of this trade, now increased from a few bushels a year to thousands of barrels annually. America just now is the fashion and "has the call." Passing out of Smithfield market the other morning, the writer heard a "coster" loudly bellowing, "'Ere is yer Hamerican happles," and, turning, saw displayed for sale the "rusty-coats"—russet apples—of American schoolboy days."

NEWS OF THE WEEK

Domestic.

NEARLY all the mills in the Delaware Valley are closed in consequence of the drought.

THE total registration for three days in New York City was 187,863; total for three days last year, 138,972.

THE highest Republican plurality secured at the late election in Ohio was 25,041 for the party candidate for Supreme Court Judge.

THE United States General Convention of Universalists was held at Hudson, N. Y., last week, with a large attendance of delegates.

THE Secretary of State has been requested to send delegates to the Congress of the International Vaccination League shortly to be held in Paris.

A FAMILY of emigrants, consisting of one man and two women, was found frozen to death about six miles from Springfield, Minn., on Thursday last.

GOVERNMENT officers last week arrested in Chicago a man named Doyle, who had in his possession altered United States bonds to the amount of $210,000.

IT is probable that the proposition to reorganize the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad, made by Mr. Powell, the representative of the English bondholders, will be accepted.

GENERAL GRANT spent last week in this city. He attended several Republican meetings, and at the Stock and Produce Exchanges, where he was warmly received, made brief speeches.

THE Republicans of this city have nominated Mr. William Dowd, a well-known banker and financier, for Mayor. The nomination was tendered to Postmaster Thomas L. James, but was declined.

MR. W. W. ASTOR has been nominated for Congress by the Republicans of the Seventh District of New York City. In the Eleventh District, Mr. James W. Gerard has been nominated by the Democrats.

THE official plurality of Governor Porter, in Indiana, is 7,545. General Ben. Harrison is prominently named for United States Senator from that State. Both parties are preparing for the final grapple next week.

THE railroads between Chicago and St. Louis last week cut rates to such an extent that passengers were carried from city to city for fifty cents. A truce between the belligerents is now said to have been established.

DISPATCHES from Dakota say that Sitting Bull is willing to surrender, and that he will be informed that he must give up his arms and ponies and ultimately go to whichever of the Sioux agencies the Government may assign him.

THE House Committee on Appropriations will meet in Washington about November 19th, and it is expected that the Army, Navy, Pension, Military Academy and Diplomatic Bills will be in an advanced state of preparation by the time Congress meets on December 6th.

THERE are in Chicago 3,752 manufactories employing 113,807 hands, and representing a capital of over $80,000,000. The value of the product made per annum is $249,000,000. The value of the material used is $178,000,000. The amount of wages paid is $37,000,000.

THE Chairman of the Republican National Committee has issued an address to the Republicans of the South, urging them to register their votes at every polling-place in books of their own, in order that they may be able to "demonstrate to the country just how many votes they cast."

THE Superintendent of the Census hopes to have ready to transmit to Congress when it meets in December the tables showing the whole population of the country. This will render it possible for the present Congress to make a reapportionment of Representatives for the next ten years.

AT a convention of representatives of more than one hundred fire insurance companies doing business in the various States of the Union, as well as in Canada and Great Britain, held in New York City last week, steps were taken for a permanent national organization of the underwriting interest.

IN the Episcopal General Convention last week the question of refusing to consecrate churches hereafter, unless the pews and sittings are made free, was finally disposed of by the adoption of a report that, while it is desirable that all churches shall be free, the Episcopal Church in the United States is not at the present time in a condition to take such an important step.

THREE persons were killed and thirteen injured by a collision on the Raleigh and Gaston (N. C.) Railroad on October 20th. On the same day fifteen persons were injured by a collision on the Cincinnati, Hamilton and Dayton Railroad, nineteen miles north of Cincinnati, O. By an explosion in a distillery at Terre Haute, Ind., on the 20th, five workmen were killed and nine injured. At Cincinnati, on the same day, five women were burned to death in a shoddy mill.

Foreign.

THE Police Commissioners of Rennes, France, have resigned in a body rather than enforce the religious decrees.

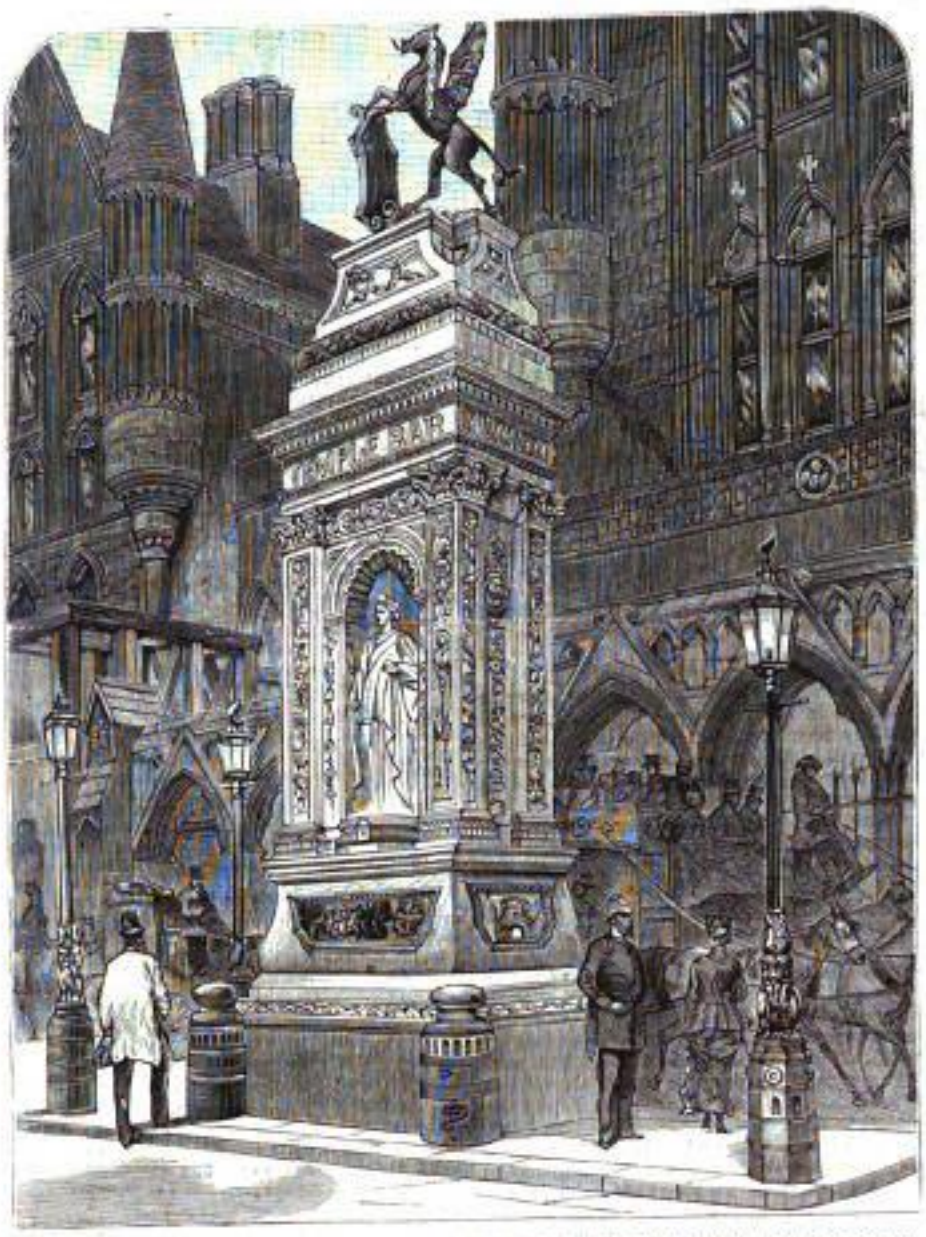
A SEVERE shock of earthquake, accompanied by a storm, was felt at different points all over Europe on October 23d.

IT is announced from Chili that Minister Christiancy carried back to Peru the basis for the preliminaries of peace.

JOHN S. CLARKE, the American comedian, is so very ill, in England, from an internal affection that it is feared he will never play again.

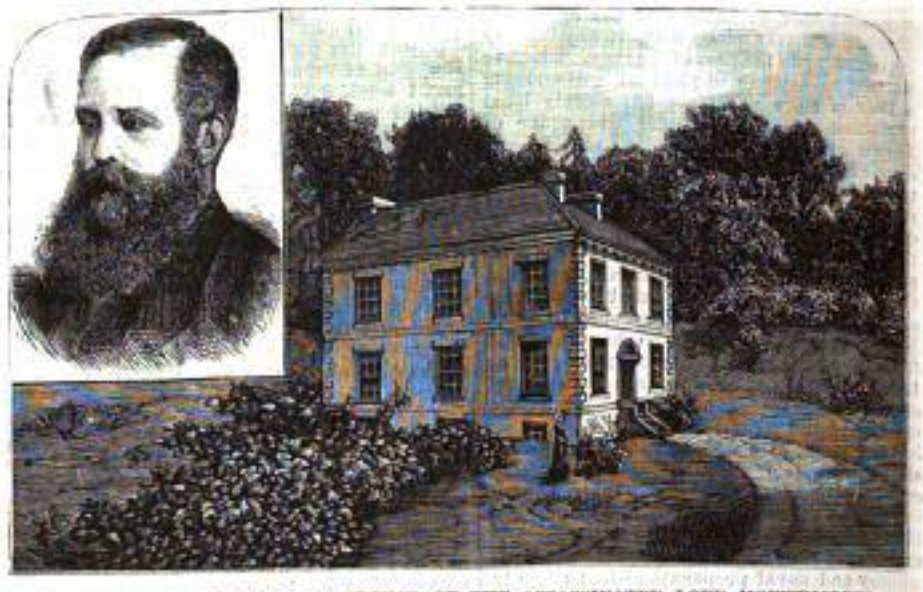
THE Prussian Government is reported to have serious intentions of granting amnesty to the Catholic priests deprived of their benefices by the Falk laws.

THE Commissioners of Scrutiny in the contested election case of Oxford, England, will probably disfranchise the town on account of the discovery of gross frauds.



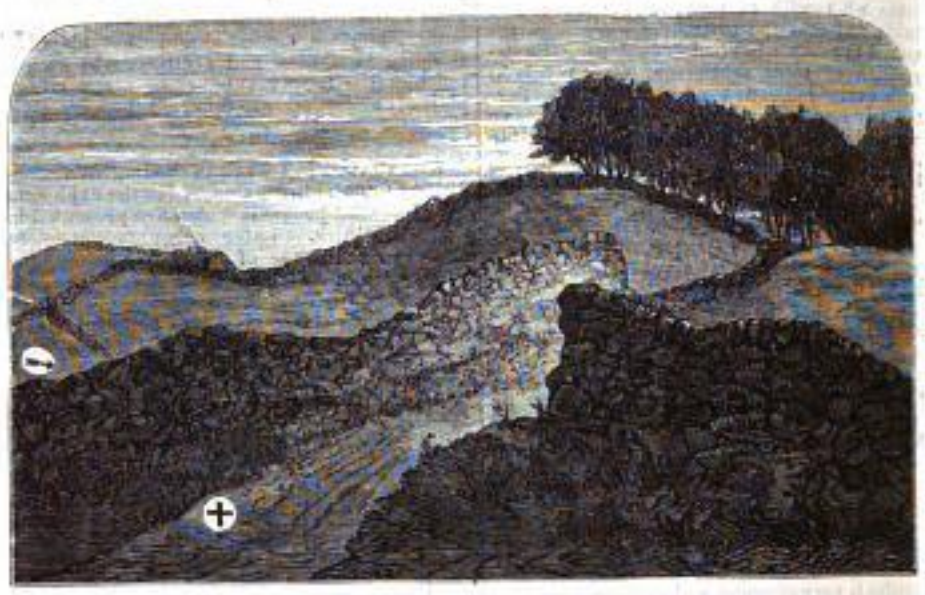
IT is authoritatively stated that Gambetta and the French Minister of Foreign Affairs are in favor of the immediate settlement of the Greek frontier in the sense urged by England.

M. WARSCHAPSKY, purveyor to the Russian army in the recent Russo-Turkish war, has been arrested for alleged frauds on the Government of 22,000,000 rubles. M. Boess, Chief Administrator during that war, was also arrested.

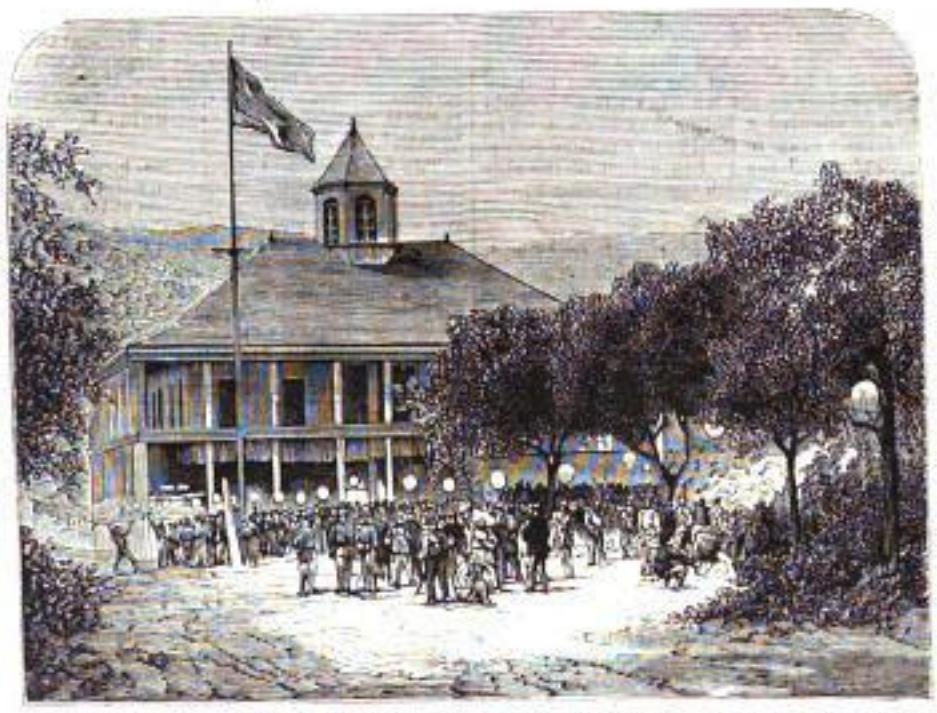


SOCIALISM holds its own in the German States. At one election last week in Saxony for a member of the Imperial Parliament, the sitting member, a High Conservative, who was re-elected, polling 4,211 votes, was closely followed by a Socialist, with 3,316 votes.

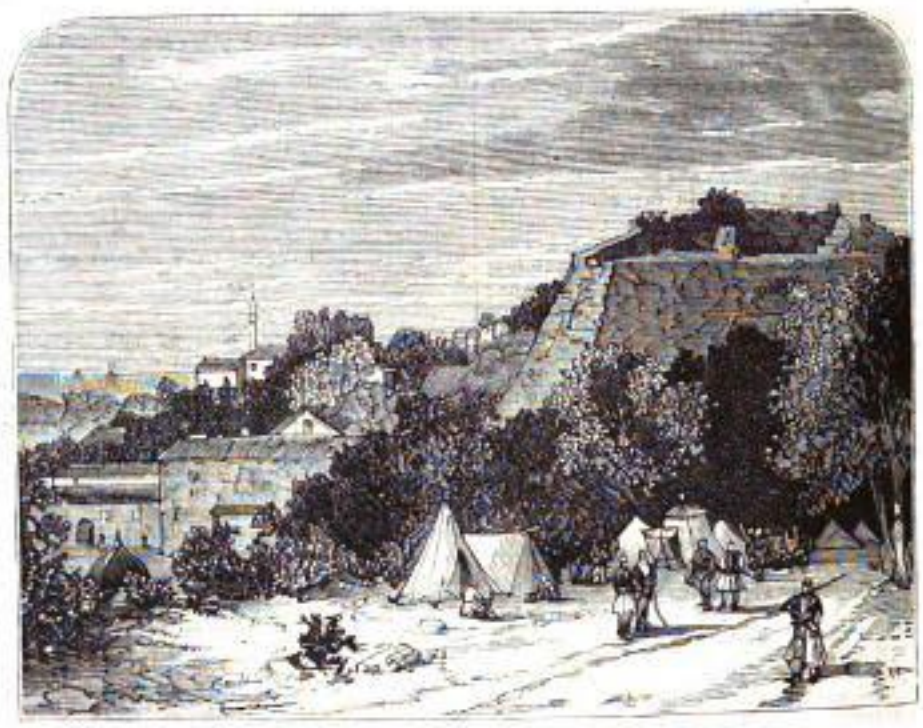
Digitized by Google



The Pictorial Spirit of the Illustrated Foreign Press.—SEE PAGE 155.



ENGLAND.—TEMPLE BAR MEMORIAL, NOW BEING ERECTED ON FLEET STREET, LONDON.



IRELAND.—EDOR HALL, RESIDENCE OF THE ASSASSINATED LORD MOUNTMORRES.

IRELAND.—RUSHEEN, WHERE LORD MOUNTMORRES WAS ASSASSINATED.

SOCIETY ISLANDS.—ANNOUNCING THE ANNEXATION TO FRANCE AT THE ROYAL PALACE.

MONTENEGRO.—CITADEL AND OLD TURKISH QUARTER OF DULCIGNO.

SPAIN.—BAPTISM OF THE ROYAL PRINCESS AT MADRID.

Digitized by Google

ARCHITECTURAL PROGRESS OF NEW YORK CITY.

THE VANDERBILT RESIDENCES ON FIFTH AVENUE.

UPON almost every prominent street in New York City one may now see buildings in course of erection which, architecturally considered, indicate a richness and variety of taste and a prodigality of means that have not hitherto been employed even in the construction and furnishing of our so-called palaces. To be sure, many buildings have been erected in the past for commercial and domestic purposes which represented quite handsome fortunes. Massiveness and durability appear, with few exceptions, to have been the main feature of construction. The gratification of personal taste, in the matter of embellishment, furniture and art adornment, has been left for indoor display. When the late A. T. Stewart completed his marble residence on Fifth Avenue and Thirty-fourth Street, and furnished it with the wealth of Europe, Asia and America, it was truly considered a palace. But now we have, either built or in the course of construction, other dwellings, which, in expense of outlay, richness of architectural work, both within and without, and elaborateness of arrangement and artistic display, far exceed that famous white pile. This unusual costliness of construction is not confined to dwellings alone. A stroll up and down Broadway and some of the intersecting streets will reveal business buildings which are just as remarkable in this respect. In both classes of buildings we now have, thanks to the liberality of wealthy citizens and corporations, structures not only unique in their design and finish, but the embodiment of the most advanced laws of sanitary science. The day of a perfect building, for whatever purpose designed, has dawned.

The growth of the aristocratic quarter of the city tends now very strongly northward along the line of Fifth Avenue. This avenue, from Thirty-fourth Street to the Park, has for years past been occupied as the choicest site for costly residences. Northerly, from Murray Hill, it descends by a gentle slope, and, at half a mile's distance, reaches a summit of equal elevation at Fiftieth Street. Around this locality are placed the Roman Catholic Cathedral and the R. C. Orphan Asylum, the Dutch Reformed Church, St. Thomas's, St. Bartholomew's and Dr. Hall's churches. Passing this hill so nobly occupied, the avenue proceeds on a descending grade another half-mile until it reaches, at Fifty-ninth Street, one of the grand entrances to Central Park. The neighborhood of Fifty-seventh Street, both on the avenue and on Fifty-seventh Street, where we find some of the finest dwellings in this city, is at present pre-eminently the aristocratic quarter of New York, and cannot fail to be one of the great architectural centres of the city. As we advance towards a superior style of houses we shall abandon the uniformity of four-story brown-stone houses, all of even width, which marked the period of the city's growth from Fourteenth to Fifty-fifth Street, and we shall learn the use and beauty of color and of variety of material.

The most notable buildings now being erected in this section are those which William H. Vanderbilt is putting up for himself and his married children. The dwellings are three in number, and occupy the whole front from Fifty-first to Fifty-second streets, on the west side of the avenue. Mr. Vanderbilt's own residence will be on the Fifty-first Street corner, a structure 88 feet wide and 116 feet deep.

It will be connected by a covered corridor with the double house, which will be 80 feet wide and 100 feet deep. This corridor will be of brown stone, with carved panels and fluted pillars, to correspond with those peculiarities of style that are common to both the great dwellings. The visitor will enter at the centre of the block, traverse a broad path, mount a broad flight of stairs, and enter the door in the centre of the corridor. The footman will direct the visitor to the left, if the call is upon Mr. Vanderbilt; to the right, if it is to the household of the daughters. The foundations are laid in solid rock, and the front, side and rear walls of both buildings will be of best Connecticut brown stone with panels highly ornamented. Each building will have an entrance in Fifth Avenue.

At the first glance the great houses look squatty. Although they are as tall as the four-story attic and basement building on the lower corner of Fifty-first Street, they seem not to be. This is because they are twice as broad and appear to be only three stories in height. A moment's study will prove these buildings to be well-proportioned. They are ornamented with wide bands of carving. The ribbon of grapes and grape leaves around the first story is broken by the broad projecting windows. The belt of floral scroll-work on the third story is cut here and there by round-topped sunken windows. Along the second story the carving is over the windows, and consists of a little block of simple design, a thousand times repeated. Fluted columns spring up between these bands. The roof line seems to be at the top of the third story; above this is a heavy and richly designed brown-stone balustrade which marks the fourth or servants' floor. The heavy stone lattice-work conceals the windows. In all these respects the houses are very nearly alike. They differ principally as to the fronts. Mr. Vanderbilt's house has a frontal projection thrown up to the top of the second story, as if the original idea contemplated an entrance there. In the house for his married daughters this projection rises only in front of the first story, while in the centre of the next story there is a richly designed and delicately-carved panel.

The cost of these buildings, that is, for ground and structure, is set down at $700,000. When furnished and supplied with the paintings, statuary and works of art owned by Mr. Vanderbilt, and largely augmented by purchases during the past Summer in Europe, the three buildings will represent a sum of more than $1,000,000.

Other members of the family are also building in this vicinity. Directly north of these two houses, on the northwest corner of Fifty-second Street, is to be the dwelling of William K. Vanderbilt. This house will be built of Indiana limestone, will be 84 feet front, 121 feet deep, 4 stories high, and surmounted by a combination of peaked and mansard roof. The cost of erection is estimated at $200,000.

On the northwest corner of Fifty-seventh Street, a residence is being built for Cornelius Vanderbilt. The basement will be granite and the upper walls brick and limestone. The dimensions are 48 feet front, 100 feet rear, 125 feet deep and 5 stories high.

GLIMPSES OF THE ARCHITECTURAL PROGRESS OF NEW YORK CITY.—THE VANDERBILT PALACES ON FIFTH AVENUE, BETWEEN FIFTY-FIRST AND FIFTY-SECOND STREETS.

NEW YORK CITY.—SKETCHES FROM THE THEATRICAL WARDROBE OF THE LATE CHARLES FECHTER.—SEE PAGE 159.

Digitized by Google

It will cost $750,000. No street in the world—except, possibly in London—represents, in the short space of two miles and a half, anything like the enormous aggregate of wealth represented by Fifth Avenue residences between Washington Square and Central Park. There are a score of families who derive yearly incomes from a capital of from $200,000,000 to $300,000,000, the greater part of which, with the exception of the Vanderbilt fortune, is invested in city real estate. These people, and thousands of others like them, not so prominent and not so well known, occupy residences fitted up in the most costly and lavish manner, with every luxury that money can procure or fine taste imagine. They have all traveled more or less abroad; are cosmopolitan in habits, and quite as much at home in London or Paris as in their Fifth Avenue houses or Newport villas.

THE BLACK KOBE.

BY WILKIE COLLINS.

CHAPTER II.—THE JESUITS.

FATHER BENWELL rose and advanced to meet the visitor with his paternal smile.

"I am heartily glad to see you," he said, and held out his hand with a becoming mixture of dignity and cordiality. Penrose lifted the offered hand respectfully to his lips. As one of the "Provincials" of the Order, Father Benwell occupied a high place among the English Jesuits. He was accustomed to acts of homage offered by his younger brethren to their spiritual chief.

"I fear you are not well," he proceeded, gently. "Your hand is feverish, Arthur."

"Thank you, Father; I am as well as usual."

"Depression of spirits, perhaps?" Father Benwell persisted.

Penrose admitted it with a passing smile.

"My spirits are not very lively," he said.

Father Benwell shook his head in gentle disapproval of a depressed state of spirits in a young man.

"This must be corrected," he remarked. "Cultivate cheerfulness, Arthur. I am myself, thank God, a naturally cheerful man. My mind reflects, in some degree (and reflects gratefully), the brightness and beauty which are part of the great scheme of creation. A similar disposition is to be cultivated. I know instances of it in my own experience. Add one more instance, and you will really gratify me. In its seasons of rejoicing our Church is eminently cheerful. Shall I add another encouragement? A great trust is about to be placed in you. Be socially agreeable, or you will fail to justify the trust. This is Father Benwell's little sermon. I think it has a merit, Arthur—it is a sermon soon over."

Penrose looked up at his superior, eager to hear more.

He was a very young man. His large, thoughtful, well-opened gray eyes, and his habitual refinement and modesty of manner, gave a certain attraction to his personal appearance, of which it stood in some need. In stature he was little and lean; his hair had become prematurely thin over his broad forehead; there were hollows already in his cheeks, and marks on either side of his thin delicate lips. He looked like a person who had passed many miserable hours in needlessly despairing of himself and his prospects. With all this, there was something in him so irresistibly truthful and sincere—so suggestive, even where he might be wrong, of a purely conscientious belief in his own errors—that he attached people to him without an effort, and often without being aware of it himself. What would his friends have said if they had been told that the religious enthusiasm of this gentle, self-distrustful, melancholy man might, in its very innocence of suspicion and self-seeking, be perverted to dangerous uses in unscrupulous hands? His friends would, one and all, have received the scandalous assertion with contempt; and Penrose himself, if he had heard of it, might have failed to control his temper for the first time in his life.

"May I ask a question, without giving offense?" he said, timidly.

Father Benwell took his hand. "My dear Arthur, let us open our minds to each other without reserve. What is your question?"

"You have spoken, Father, of a great trust that is about to be placed in me."

"Yes. You are anxious, no doubt, to hear what it is?"

"I am anxious to know, in the first place, if it requires me to go back to Oxford."

Father Benwell dropped his young friend's hand. "Do you dislike Oxford?" he asked, observing Penrose, attentively.

"Bear with me, Father, if I speak too confidently. I dislike the deception which has obliged me to conceal that I am a Catholic and a priest."

Father Benwell set this little difficulty right, with the air of a man who could make benevolent allowance for unreasonable scruples. "I think, Arthur, you forget two important considerations," he said. "In the first place, you have a dispensation from your superiors which absolves you of all responsibility in respect of the concealment that you have practiced. In the second place, we could only obtain information of the progress which our Church is silently making at the University by employing you in the capacity of—let me say—an independent Observer. However, if it will contribute to your ease of mind, I see no objection to informing you that you will not be instructed to return to Oxford. Do I relieve you?"

There could be no question of it. Penrose breathed more freely, in every sense of the word.

"At the same time," Father Benwell continued, "let us not misunderstand each other. In the new sphere of action which we design for you, you will not only be at liberty to acknowledge that you are a Catholic, it will be absolutely necessary that you should do so. But you will continue to wear the ordinary dress of an English gentleman, and to preserve the strictest secrecy on the subject of your admission to the priesthood until you are further advised by myself. Now, dear Arthur, read that paper. It is the necessary preface to all that I have yet to say to you."

The "paper" contained a few pages of manuscript relating the early history of Vange Abbey in the days of the monks, and the circumstances under which the property was confiscated to lay uses in the time of Henry the Eighth. Penrose handed back the little narrative, vehemently expressing his sympathy with the monks and his detestation of the King.

"Compose yourself, Arthur," said Father Benwell, smiling pleasantly. "We don't mean to allow Henry the Eighth to have it all his own way for ever."

Penrose looked at his superior in blank bewilderment. His superior withheld any further information for the present.

"Everything in its turn," the discreet Father resumed; "the time of explanation has not yet come. I have something else to show you first. One of the most interesting relics in England. Look here."

He unlocked a flat mahogany box, and displayed to view some writings on vellum, evidently of great age.

"You have had a little sermon already," he said. "You shall have a little story now. No doubt you have heard of Newstead Abbey—famous among the readers of poetry as the residence of Byron? King Henry treated Newstead exactly as he treated Vange Abbey! Many years since, the lake at Newstead was dragged, and the brass eagle which had served as the lectern in the old church was rescued from the waters in which it had lain for centuries. A secret receptacle was discovered in the body of the eagle, and the ancient title-deeds of the Abbey were found in it. The monks had taken that method of concealing the legal proof of their rights and privileges in the hope—a vain hope, I need scarcely say—that a time might come when justice would restore to them the property of which they had been robbed. Only last Summer, one of our bishops, administering a northern diocese, spoke of these circumstances to a devout Catholic friend, and said he thought it possible that the precaution taken by the monks at Newstead might also have been taken by the monks at Vange. The friend, I should tell you, was an enthusiast. Saying nothing to the bishop (whose position and responsibilities he was bound to respect), he took into his confidence persons whom he could trust. One moonlight night—in the absence of the present proprietor, or I should rather say, the present usurper, of the estate—the lake at Vange was privately dragged, with a result that proved the bishop's conjecture to be right. Read those valuable documents, Arthur. Knowing your strict sense of honor, and your admirable tenderness of conscience, I wish you to be satisfied of the title of the Church to the lands of Vange, by evidence which is beyond dispute.

With this little preface, he waited while Penrose read the title deeds. "Any doubt on your mind?" he asked, when the reading had come to an end.

"Not the shadow of a doubt."

"Is the Church's right to the property clear?"

"As clear, Father, as words can make it."

"Very good. We will lock up the documents. Arbitrary confiscation, Arthur, even on the part of a king, cannot override the law. What the Church once lawfully possessed, the Church has a right to recover. Any doubt about that in your mind?"

"Only the doubt of how the Church can recover. Is there anything in this particular case to be hoped from the law?"

"Nothing whatever."

"And yet, Father, you speak as if you saw some prospect of the restitution of the property. By what means can the restitution be made?"

"By peaceful and worthy means," Father Benwell answered. "By honorable restoration of the confiscated property to the Church on the part of the person who is now in possession of it."

Penrose was surprised an interested.

"Is the person a Catholic?" he asked, eagerly.

"Not yet." Father Benwell laid a strong emphasis on those two little words. His fat fingers drummed restlessly on the table; his vigilant eyes rested expectantly on Penrose. "Surely you understand me, Arthur?" he added, after an interval.

The color rose slowly in the worn face of Penrose.

"I am afraid to understand you," he said.

"Why?"

"I am not sure that it is my better sense which understands. I am afraid, Father, it may be my vanity and presumption."

Father Benwell leaned back luxuriously in his chair.

"I like that modesty," he said, with a relishing smack of his lips, as if modesty was as good as a meal to him. "There is power of the right sort, Arthur, hidden under the diffidence that does you honor. I am more than ever satisfied that I have been right in reporting you as worthy of this most serious trust. I believe the conversion of the owner of Vange Abbey is—in your hands—no more than a matter of time."

"May I ask what his name is?"

"Certainly. His name is Lewis Romayne."

"When do you introduce me to him?"

"Impossible to say. I have not yet been introduced myself."

"You don't know Mr. Romayne?"

"I have never even seen him."

These discouraging replies were made with the perfect composure of a man who saw his way clearly before him. Sinking from one depth of perplexity to another, Penrose ventured on putting a last question.

"How am I to approach Mr. Romayne?" he asked.

"I can only answer that, Arthur, by admitting you still further into my confidence. It is disagreeable to me," said the reverend gentleman, with the most becoming humility, "to speak of myself. But it must be done. Shall we have a little coffee to help us through the coming extract from Father Benwell's autobiography? Don't look so serious, my son! When the occasion permits it, let us take life lightly." He rang the bell and ordered the coffee, as if he was the master of the house. The servant treated him with the most scrupulous respect. He hummed a little tune, and talked at intervals of the weather, while they were waiting. "Plenty of sugar, Arthur?" he inquired, when the coffee was brought in. "No? Even in trifles I should have been glad to feel that there was perfect sympathy between us. I like plenty of sugar myself."

Having sweetened his coffee with the closest attention to the process, he was at liberty to enlighten his young friend. He did it so easily and so cheerfully, that a far less patient man than Penrose would have listened to him with interest.

CHAPTER III.—THE INTRODUCTION TO ROMAYNE.

"EXCEPTING my employment here in the library," Father Benwell began, "and some interesting conversation with Lord Loring, to which I shall presently allude, I am almost as great a stranger in this house, Arthur, as yourself. When the object which we now have in view was first taken seriously into consideration, I had the honor of being personally acquainted with Lord Loring. I was also aware that he was an intimate and trusted friend of Romayne. Under these circumstances, his lordship presented himself to our point of view as a means of approaching the owner of Vange Abbey without exciting distrust. I was charged accordingly with the duty of establishing myself on terms of intimacy in this house. By way of making room for me, the spiritual director of Lord and Lady Loring was attached, in some inferior capacity, to a mission abroad. And here I am in his place! By-the-way, don't treat me (when we are in the presence of visitors) with any special marks of respect. I am not Provincial of our Order in Lord Loring's house—I am one of the inferior clergy."

Penrose looked at him with admiration. "It is a great sacrifice to make, Father, in your position, and at your age."

"Not at all, Arthur. A position of authority involves certain temptations to pride. I feel this change as a lesson in humility which is good for me. For example, Lady Loring (as I can plainly see) dislikes and distrusts me. Then, again, a young lady has recently arrived here on a visit. She is a Protestant, with all the prejudices incident to that way of thinking, and avoids me so carefully, poor soul, that I have never seen her yet. These rebuffs are wholesome reminders of his fallible human nature to a man who has occupied a place of high trust and command. Besides, there have been obstacles in my way which have had an excellent effect in rousing my energies. How do you feel, Arthur, when you encounter obstacles?"

"I do my best to remove them, Father. But I am sometimes conscious of a sense of discouragement."

"Curious," said Father Benwell, "I am only conscious, myself, of a sense of impatience. What right has an obstacle to get in my way?—that is how I look at it. For example, the first thing I heard, when I came here, was that Romayne had left England. My introduction to him was indefinitely delayed; I had to look to Lord Loring for all the information I wanted, relating to the man and his habits. There was another obstacle! Not living in the house, I was obliged to find an excuse for being constantly on the spot, ready to take advantage of his lordship's leisure moments for conversation. I sat down in this room, and I said to myself, 'Before I get up again, I mean to brush these impertinent obstacles out of my way!' The state of the books suggested the idea of which I was in search. Before I left the house, I was charged with the re-arrangement of the library. From that moment, I came and went as often as I liked. Whenever Lord Loring was disposed for a little talk, there I was, to lead the talk in the right direction. And what is the result? On the first occasion when Romayne presents himself, I can place you in a position to become his daily companion. All due, Arthur, in the first instance, to my impatience of obstacles. Amusing, isn't it?"

Penrose was perhaps deficient in the sense of humor. Instead of being amused, he appeared to be anxious for more information. "In what capacity am I to be Mr. Romayne's companion?" he asked.

Father Benwell poured himself out another cup of coffee.

"Suppose I tell you first," he suggested, "how Romayne is marked out, by habits and disposition, as a promising subject for conversion. He is young; still a single man; romantic, sensitive, highly cultivated. No near relations are alive to influence him—he is not compromised by any illicit attachment. He has devoted himself for years past to books, and is collecting materials for a work of immense research, on the Origin of Religion. Some great sorrow or remorse—Lord Loring did not mention what it was—has told seriously on his nervous system, already injured by night-study. Add to this, that he is now within our reach. He has lately returned to London, and is living quite alone at a private hotel. For some reason which I am not acquainted with, he keeps away from Vange Abbey—the very place, as I should have thought, for a studious man."

Penrose began to be interested. "Have you been to the Abbey?" he said.

"I made a little excursion to that part of Yorkshire, Arthur, not long since. A very pleasant trip—apart from the painful associations connected with the ruin and profanation of a sacred place. There is no doubt about the revenues. I know the value of that productive part of the estate which stretches southward, away from the barren region round the house. Let us return for a moment to Romayne, and to your position as his future companion. He has had his books sent to him from Vange, and has persuaded himself that continued study is the one remedy for his troubles, whatever they may be. At Lord Loring's suggestion, a consultation of physicians was held on his case the other day."

"Is he so ill as that?" Penrose exclaimed.

"So it appears," Father Benwell replied. "Lord Loring is mysteriously silent about the illness. One result of the consultation I extracted from him, in which you are interested. The doctors protested against his employing himself on his proposed book. He was too obstinate to listen to them. There was but one concession that they could gain from him—he consented to spare himself, in some small degree, by employing an amanuensis. It was left to Lord Loring to find the man. I was consulted by his lordship; I was even invited to undertake the duty myself. Each one in his proper sphere, my son! The person who converts Romayne must be young enough and pliable enough to be his friend and companion. Your part is there. Arthur—you are the future amanuensis. How does the prospect strike you now?"

"I beg your pardon, Father! I fear I am unworthy of the confidence which is placed in me."

"In what way?"

Penrose answered with unfeigned humility.

"I am afraid I may fail to justify your belief in me," he said, "unless I can really feel that I am converting Mr. Romayne for his own soul's sake. However righteous the cause may be, I cannot find, in the restitution of the Church property, a sufficient motive for persuading him to change his religious faith. There is something so serious in the responsibility which you lay on me, that I shall sink under the burden unless my whole heart is in the work. If I feel attracted towards Mr. Romayne when I first see him; if he wins upon me, little by little, until I love him like a brother—then, indeed, I can promise that his conversion shall be the dearest object of my life. But, if there is not this intimate sympathy between us—forgive me if I say it plainly—I implore you to pass me over, and to commit the task to the hands of another man."

His voice trembled; his eyes moistened. Father Benwell handled his young friend's rising emotion with the dexterity of a skilled angler humoring the struggles of a lively fish.

"Good Arthur!" he said, "I see much—too much, dear boy—of self-seeking people. It is as refreshing to me to hear you as a draught of water to a thirsty man. At the same time, let me suggest that you are innocently raising difficulties where no difficulties exist. I have already mentioned as one of the necessities of the case that you and Romayne should be friends. How can that be unless there is precisely that sympathy between you which you have so well described? I am a sanguine man, and I believe you will like each other. Wait till you see him."

As the words passed his lips, the door that led to the picture-gallery was opened. Lord Loring entered the library.

He looked quickly round him—apparently in search of some person who might, perhaps, be found in the room. A transient shade of annoyance showed itself in his face, and disappeared again, as he bowed to the two Jesuits.

"Don't let me disturb you," he said, looking at Penrose. "Is this the gentleman who is to assist Mr. Romayne?"

Father Benwell presented his young friend. "Arthur Penrose, my lord. I ventured to suggest that he should call here to-day, in case you wished to put any questions to him."

"Quite needless, after your recommendation," Lord Loring answered, graciously. "Mr. Penrose could not have come here at a more appropriate time. As it happens, Mr. Romayne has paid us a visit to-day—he is now in the picture-gallery."

The priests looked at each other. Lord Loring left them as he spoke. He walked to the opposite door of the library, opened it, glanced round the hall and at the stairs, and returned again, with the passing expression of annoyance visible once more. "Come with me to the gallery, gentlemen," he said; "I shall be happy to introduce you to Mr. Romayne."

Penrose accepted the proposal. Father Benwell pointed with a smile to the books scattered about him.

"With permission, I will follow your lordship," he said.

"Who was my lord looking for?" That was the question in Father Benwell's mind, while he put some of the books away on the shelves, and collected the scattered papers on the table, relating to his correspondence with Rome. It had become a habit of his life to be suspicious of any circumstances occurring within his range of observation, for which he was unable to account. He might have felt some stronger emotion, on this occasion, if he had known that the conspiracy in the library to convert Romayne was matched by the conspiracy in the picture-gallery to marry him.

* * * * * *

Lady Loring's narrative of the conversation which had taken place between Stella and herself had encouraged her husband to try his proposed experiment without delay. "I shall send a letter at once to Romayne's hotel," he said.

"Inviting him to come here to-day?" her ladyship inquired.

"Yes. I shall say I particularly wish to consult him about a picture. Are we to prepare Stella to see him, or would it be better to let the meeting take her by surprise?"

"Certainly not!" said Lady Loring. "With her sensitive disposition, I am afraid of taking Stella by surprise. Let me only tell her that Romayne is the original of her portrait, and that he is likely to call on you to see the picture to day—and leave the rest to me."

Digitized by Google

Lady Loring's suggestion was immediately carried out. In the first fervor of her agitation, Stella had declared that her courage was not equal to a meeting with Romayne on that day. Becoming more composed, she yielded to Lady Loring's persuasion so far as to promise that she would at least make the attempt to follow her friend to the gallery. "If I go down with you," she said, "it will look as if we had arranged the thing between us. I can't bear even to think of that! Let me look in by myself, as if it was by accident."

Consenting to this arrangement, Lady Loring had proceeded alone to the gallery, when Romayne's visit was announced. The minutes passed, and Stella did not appear. Lord Loring thought it possible that she might shrink from openly presenting herself at the main entrance to the gallery, and might prefer—especially if she was not aware of the priest's presence in the room—to slip in quietly by the library door. Failing to find her, on putting this idea to the test, he had discovered Penrose, and had so hastened the introduction of the younger of the two Jesuits to Romayne.

* * * * * * *

Having gathered his papers together, Father Benwell crossed the library to the deep bow-window which lighted the room, and opened his dispatch-box, standing on a small table in the recess. Placed in this position, he was invisible to any person entering the room by the hall door.

He had secured his papers in the dispatch-box, and had just closed and locked it, when he heard the door cautiously opened.

The instant afterwards the rustling of a woman's dress over the carpet caught his ear. Other men might have walked out of the recess and shown themselves. Father Benwell staid where he was, and waited until the lady crossed his range of view.

The priest observed with cold attention her darkly-beautiful eyes and hair, her quickly-changing color, her modest grace of movement. Slowly, and in evident agitation, she advanced to the door of the picture gallery—and paused, as if she was afraid to open it. Father Benwell heard her sigh to herself, softly, "Oh, how shall I meet him?" She turned aside to the looking-glass over the fireplace. The reflection of her charming face seemed to rouse her courage. She retraced her steps and timidly opened the door. Lord Loring must have been close by at the moment. His voice immediately made itself heard in the library.

"Come in, Stella—come in! Here is a new picture for you to see; and a friend whom I want to present to you, who must be your friend, too—Mr. Lewis Romayne."

The door was closed again. Father Benwell stood still as a statue in the recess, with his head down, deep in thought. After a while he roused himself, and rapidly returned to the writing-table. With a roughness strangely unlike his customary deliberation of movement, he snatched a sheet of paper out of the case, and, frowning heavily, wrote these lines on it:

"Since my letter was sealed, I have made a discovery which must be communicated without the loss of a post. I greatly fear there may be a woman in our way. Trust me to combat this obstacle as I have combated other obstacles. In the meantime the work goes on. Penrose has received his first instructions, and has to-day been presented to Romayne."

He addressed this letter to Rome, as he had addressed the letter preceding it. "Now for the woman!" he said to himself—and opened the door of the picture-gallery.

(To be continued.)

THE GREAT OCTOBER STORM.

AN unusually heavy storm of wind and snow passed over portions of Minnesota, Dakota, Iowa, Wisconsin, Michigan, Illinois and Toronto, Canada, on the 15th and 16th of October. Along the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad in Minnesota the storm was more severe and the snow heavier than was experienced all last Winter. In the southern part of the State railroad cuts were filled with snow, and drifts of several feet appeared on the tracks, cutting off all travel for several days. St. Paul was completely isolated for twenty-four hours, and for three days had communication with Milwaukee only.

The first snow began to fall in western Iowa on the 13th, Friday. It was accompanied by high winds, which increased throughout the day and all Friday night. The snow at first melted as it descended, but the temperature soon grew colder and everything was frozen solid. A northwesterly gale set in, and, the snow continuing to fall all day Saturday, it soon became drifted in great heaps in every gully and hollow. Near Des Moines the ground was frozen to a depth of several inches. This unusually early frost will seriously damage the potato crop, about two-thirds of which is not yet dug.

On the 16th, all Northern New York and a large part of Canada were covered with a heavy mantle. A fearful storm prevailed at Buffalo all day and night, but no serious consequences resulted. Considerable snow fell, but melted at once. At Lancaster, ten miles east of Buffalo, snow fell to the depth of almost thirty inches. The fall seemed to be in a zone or belt of about fifteen miles in width. Much damage to fruit has resulted, as the leafy branches caught such quantities of sleet and snow that whole orchards of young trees are well-nigh destroyed. Many farmers set to work immediately, with all the help they could muster, to gather the apple crop, and many of the large orchards presented a curious sight during the entire day. The falling snow, the heaps of bright-red apples, the men, women, and even children, working like bees, formed a picture worthy of a painter's brush.

The storm gradually came eastward, raging with greatest fury over Lake Michigan. The passenger steamer Argosy, of the Goodrich line, which had for many years plied between Chicago and various ports on the eastern shore of the lake, was wrecked, and portions of the hulk which went ashore at Holland, Mich., showed the vessel to have been so rotten that it is surprising she had not gone to pieces long before. At the time of writing it was believed that all the passengers and crew, numbering about seventy, were lost.

The propeller Northern Queen, the first boat from below, reached Milwaukee on the 18th. Captain Campbell reported that on Saturday every nook and cranny in the vicinity of Two Rivers sheltered vessels at anchor. In twenty years on the lake he never saw such a sea. Between Death's Door and Milwaukee the Queen run through a large amount of lumber, shingles, ties and wood. There were twenty-two vessels in Bailey's Harbor.

The Manaynee pier, the Kilgore pier and the Higgins pier, at Bailey's Harbor, were destroyed, also the pile-driver was upset in the lake by the wind and was lost. At the ship canal one new crib, just sunk, with 100 cords of stone in it, was lifted, the stones were spilled out and the crib was carried away. The new work at the ship canal was destroyed and a stone scow was run into by the schooner Mabel Campbell, cut in two and sunk. Two other scows went ashore at Almeepee and were destroyed. A raft of lumber at the ship canal broke loose and is mostly lost.

A dispatch from Muskegon says that there is not a vestige left of the schooner Grenada, which went to pieces off shore there. The only survivors are William Russell, the mate, and Angus Tinklater, the captain's brother.

On Monday the river, from Detroit to the mouth, was full of vessels which had been at anchor. But as the wind went down with the sun and the water became calm the craft rapidly passed out into the lake.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

The Temple Bar Memorial.

When Temple Bar was pulled down it was justly thought that something should be done to perpetuate the memory of that historic structure, so that all recollection might not be lost of a building which had formed for well-nigh two centuries the most important landmark of the city. Acting upon this suggestion, the Corporation of London determined upon the erection of a monumental structure on the site of the ancient gateway. The memorial, which is rapidly approaching completion, is oblong in plan, the two broader sides facing north and south, and the narrower ones east and west. It will, when finished, consist of a solid base of granite 7 feet 8 inches long by 5 feet 2 inches wide, and 7 feet high. The upper portion of this base will be adorned with bas reliefs in bronze, representing old Temple Bar, a Royal Procession into the city, the Thanksgiving for the Recovery of the Prince of Wales, and the city insignia, with an inscription recording the object of the memorial. Upon the base will stand a structure, also oblong in form, supported by pilasters at its angles. The two wider sides, or those looking north and south, will be hollowed out so as to form niches which will be occupied by statues of the Queen and the Prince of Wales; the pilasters will be adorned with arabesques, and the entablature will bear an inscription. The top portion of the memorial will consist of a carved pedestal supporting a dragon holding the city shield between its paws. The pedestal, like all the upper portion of the memorial, will be of stone, but the dragon will be cast in bronze. The statues of the Queen and the Prince are of white marble.

The Murder of Lord Mountmorres.

This outrage took place on the evening of Saturday, September 25th. The deceased nobleman was riding home from a meeting of justices at Clonbur, when he was shot at a place called Rusheen, near Ballinrobe, about half a mile from his residence, Ebor Hall, Clonbur, County Galway. Suspicion was first aroused by his horse and car arriving at the hall unattended, and when search was made the nobleman was found lying in a pool of blood, and on examination it was found that he had received six rifle bullet wounds, four in the head and two in the body. At the inquest it was stated that when the body was discovered, the doctor who was summoned stated that he did not think life was quite extinct, and the police carried the body to the cabin of a man named O'Flanagan, who, however, refused to allow the police to enter, being in terror of what might happen to himself if he gave any assistance to the unfortunate nobleman.

Annexation of the Society Islands to France.

Tahiti—or Otaheite, which beautiful island, with its adjacent islands, has just been annexed to France—is the principal of the Society Islands, is situated in the South Pacific, in latitude 17 deg. 29 min. 2 sec. S., and longitude 149 deg. 29 min. W., and has been for some time a kind of headquarters for the French Navy in those seas. Its principal town and port is Papeete, and its population is somewhat over 9,000. In 1842 a protectorate was established over Tahiti by France, in virtue of a convention between the then Queen (Pomare) and Admiral Dupetit-Thouars, the Queen and her successors retaining their sovereign rights and also the administration of the country, but the foreign relations of the islands being under the control of the French Government. The illustration represents the demonstration in front of the king's palace at Papiete when the fact of the annexation was announced.

The Turkish Quarter at Dulcigno.

Dulcigno is divided into two distinct parts—the old and the new town. The old town, which is commanded by the fort, does not contain more than eighty houses, the greater part of which are old and ruinous, and of which only about fifty are inhabited; and the fort is not of any importance from a military point of view, as modern artillery, placed upon the heights of Monchora and Klanza, would have no difficulty in destroying it. The new town contains some 400 houses, and a population divided as follows: 2,100 Mussulmans; 80 Servian families, who belong to the Orthodox Greek Church; 40 Roman Catholics, and about 100 gypsies "without either religion or nationality." It was not until after 1858 that the Christians were allowed to dwell in the town and hold rights of citizenship.

The Infant Spanish Princess.

The Spanish Infanta, born on September 11th last, was in due season baptised and given a multiplicity of names. This religious ceremony, following the formal exhibition of the babe immediately after its birth, was all that strict Spanish etiquette demanded until the lapse of forty days from the day of birth, when the Queen was expected to make her first public appearance after the event. On October 21st, in compliance with this custom, Queen Christina visited the Chapel Royal, preceded by grandees, gentlemen, lords and generals, all in full court dress. The Queen took the Infanta Mercedes from the arms of her governess, the Duchess of Medina de las Torres, and knelt on a velvet cushion, holding her child while the Cardinal Patriarch read the Gospel of Purification over her. Bloody altar Mass was chanted the Papal Nuncio arrived at the Palace with a splendid alabaster and gold embossed casket, containing two magnificent dresses in satin, several embroidered robes for cushions destined for the Infanta, several precious relics for the Queen, and also a Papal brief and relic for each of the Infantas Isabel, Eulalia and Pax. The principal relic, a cross of brilliants, was immediately hung round the neck of the Infanta Mercedes, and ladies in waiting also swathed her in beautiful sashes, embroidered by Benina ladies and blessed by the Pope. On the 22d Queen Christina and Infanta Mercedes went in state to the Atocha Cathedral for a Te Deum, and on Saturday a levee was held in the Palace and a banquet of 120 covers given in the Hall of the Columns to the Ministers and the chiefs of the diplomatic corps.

OUR NATIONAL PROSPERITY.

DURING the quarter year ending September 30th, 1880, the number of failures in the United States was 979, with liabilities of $12,121,422, a decrease, as compared with the corresponding quarter of last year, of 1,383 failures and $3,154,126 liabilities. During the nine months ending September 30th, the number of failures was 3,470, with liabilities of $45,010,186, as against 5,350 failures, with $81,030,940 liabilities, during the corresponding period of 1879. In the Dominion of Canada the failures during the third quarter of the present year were 150, and 417 last year, and the liabilities respectively $1,219,763 and $6,998,617. During the nine months of 1880 the number of failures was 779, with liabilities of $6,680,631, while for the corresponding period of 1879 there were 1,484 failures with liabilities of $24,424,570.

THE Oregon salmon catch has risen from 227,500 cases in 1875 to 630,000 in 1880.

TEXAS has a cash balance of nearly $1,000,000 in her State treasury.

THE quantity of Southern pine lumber received at Boston from the 1st of January to 1st of October, 1880, comprised 16,096,769 feet of Southern pine timber and planks, and 8,800,505 feet of Southern pine boards—a total of 24,897,274 feet of lumber. During the same period of 1879 the quantity received here comprised 6,809,758 feet of timber and planks and 3,567,858 feet of boards—a total of 13,377,609 feet.

THE little port of Darien, Ga., exported 41,772,211 feet of lumber to foreign ports during the six months from January 1st to July 1st, 1880. Its domestic shipments in the same time were 14,642,327 feet, making a total of 55,792,538 feet. Savannah exported about 60,000,000 feet during the same period. Pensacola, Fla., shipped a total of 186,240,000 feet to foreign ports and 31,845,000 feet coastwise (a total of 182,185,000 feet) during the twelve months ending September.

WORTH, of Paris, has recently worked up some dress silk manufactured in Newark, N. J.

THE manufacture of agricultural implements has doubled within the last ten years. In 1850 this industry gave employment to 5,361 hands; this year it gives employment to 40,680.

IN the United States there are produced 300,000,000 pounds of cheese, 40 per cent. of which is exported, amounting to 120,000,000 pounds. The amount of butter produced is estimated at 1,000,000,000 pounds; of this only about 2 per cent. is exported, yet this small percentage amounts to 20,000,000 pounds.

THE war ended in April, 1865. On August 31st of that year the outstanding interest-bearing debt was at its highest, being $2,381,530,294.96. The total debt—less cash in the Treasury—at that date was $2,756,431,571.43. On the 1st of September of the current year the total debt—less cash in the Treasury, amounted to $1,909,717,234.40, the reduction accomplished in fifteen years and one month being $847,713,837.03, a financial achievement without a parallel in the history of nations.

THE annual report of the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad estimates the net earnings for the year 1880 at $1,300,000. The report says the company will have on hand November 1st nearly half a million dollars, and be prepared to pay two coupons on second mortgage bonds and two on the Springfield division bonds.

THE number of industrial establishments in Philadelphia by the last census is over 8,000, which is within 184 of the return of 1870. The increase in the number of hands is 25 per cent.

THE demand for lumber both in Maine and abroad is increasing, and operations on the upper waters of the St. John River will be much enlarged this Winter. Where one individual last year cut 2,000,000 feet of logs, this year five or six operators will cut from 3,000,000 to 6,000,000 feet.

THERE are in Georgia 88,822 colored men who own, by the tax receiver's returns for their respective counties, 615,199 acres of land.

IT is estimated that the rolling mills which are engaged in the production of steel rails have already received orders for 200,000 tons of rails for next year's delivery.

THE trade and population of Norfolk, Va., are both increasing, the whole business of the port for the year footing up $38,200,436. In this total is included $13,780,229 from cotton exports, and about $2,500,000 for coastwise cotton trade. The peanut crop is put down at $1,000,000, and the trucking business at $1,949,200. The total exports of the port of Norfolk for the year were $16,356,068, and the aggregate of clearances were 134,579 tons, of which only 15,499 tons was in American bottoms. Norfolk now ranks third among the cotton ports, this business, due to the great railroad connection of the place and its superior harbor, having grown from 6,174 bales in 1858-59 to 807,066 bales in 1879-80, these receipts representing a little over one-tenth of the entire crop.

THE shipments of bulk grain from St. Louis to foreign ports via New Orleans from January 1st to date, were 13,214,000 bushels, against 6,164,838 bushels for the same time last year.

GENERAL TOOMBS is about building a cotton factory at Washington, Ga., to cost $200,000. This example ought to be followed until the South has factories enough to manufacture all the cotton she grows.

ST. PAUL, Minn., has built $400,500 worth of business blocks this year, $168,000 of public buildings, $268,000 of mills, elevators, etc., $742,100 of private buildings and $270,000 worth of railroad structures. The new St. Paul elevator just finished cost $150,000, and there are some half a dozen new mills and factories whose average cost reaches $20,000. The public improvements by the railroad companies, in addition to the actual erection of buildings, has involved the expenditure of $210,000 the present season, while the public improvements by the city and street railroad, water and gas corporations have cost nearly $300,000 more.

THE aggregate value of the peanut crop of the United States of 1879-80 at the average prices which prevailed in the distributing markets is about $2,180,000, against $1,900,000 for the preceding year.

AN association has been formed to test the adaptation of the soil and climate of Washington Territory to the production of sugar from the beet. Professor Hilgard, of the University of California, reports the analysis of sugar-beets of Washington Territory as giving twelve per cent. of sugar and being free from the salts which interfere with the crystallization of sugar.

THE season thus far in California has been very favorable for the grape crop. The increase of new vineyards has been very large, and one of the best judges in the State estimates that the crop will exceed that of any other year by fifty per cent. He places the wine product for the year at 12,000,000 gallons, with a probability of more rather than less. The raisin crop will be fifty per cent. larger than last year.

NOW only in Mississippi and Alabama, but in all the Gulf States, wherever you may go, the interest in sheep-raising and wool-growing is rapidly on the increase. The flocks of the South are not only increasing in numbers, but they are being graded up by the introduction of pure-bred bucks. The demand for Merino bucks has been so great in the Gulf States that Tennessee has already about disposed of all her surplus stock, and the flock-masters who cannot secure what they want in the South are turning their eyes towards Kentucky, Missouri, Ohio, and even the New England States, to make their selections. Everywhere in the Gulf States sheep-husbandry is being fostered and encouraged, and promises to be the source of great wealth to the people.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

—THE work in the Hudson River Tunnel is to be continued on the original plan.

—IT is said that the Russian Finance Minister has decided on a complete revision of the tariff.

—A CIRCULAR just issued from the Census Bureau places the population of Delaware at 146,654.

—A STORM in Buenos Ayres, September 18th, destroyed about 700,000 cattle, 500,000 sheep and 250,000 horses.

—FIVE steamers have been ordered to be built on the Clyde for the new French company to trade with the United States.

—IN consequence of the suffering among the horses by epizootic, one-half of the regular street cars have been withdrawn in Richmond, Va.

—A FIRE in Charleston, S. C., October 17th, destroyed vessels, cotton and real estate at North Commercial Wharf to the amount of $584,000.

—THE United States exported during September $11,271,850 worth of domestic provisions and tallow, against $6,575,168 during September, 1879.

—A BRANCH devoted to the art of carriage building is to be established under the charge of the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York City.

—THE Oregon Senate and House have passed a constitutional amendment in favor of woman suffrage—the Senate by a vote of 21 to 9, and the House by 33 to 27.

THE so-called Lorillard contract asked for by M. Desiré Charnay as an authorization of his archæological investigations and excavations has been ratified by the Mexican Congress.

—TWENTY more Mormon missionaries sailed from this port last week. They go to England, Scotland, Wales and Scandinavia, whither thirty others have preceded them to gather recruits for the Mormon hell.

—THE Representative of Hamburg will shortly ask to have the city proclaimed in a state of siege on account of the Nihilists. Prussia will make a similar proposal in regard to Altona, Ottensen and Wandsbeck.

—THE Minister of Commerce of Santo Domingo has ordered the creation of a Central Board who shall arrange a project to reform the laws regarding marine commerce and customs duties, which are now defective in many respects.

—TRUSTWORTHY intelligence from the border land between Macedonia and Albania represents that the Christians are ripe for revolution. The Bulgarians and Mussulmans are armed, and assassinations on both sides are common occurrences. Anarchy reigns supreme.

—THE imports into France for the nine months ending on the 30th of September show an increase of 253,000,000 francs as compared with the same period last year. Of this increase 183,000,000 francs is in food. The exports during the same period increased 62,000,000 francs.

—ALBERT KINSLEY, Henry W. Burnham, George Campbell, Charles S. Joslyn, William A. Hinds and others have filed articles of association to be known as the Oneida Community (Limited). This is a reorganization of the association known by the same name, with the martial relations of its members changed.

—THE potato is a magnificent and astounding crop, such as has not been known in Ireland for over thirty years. Already, before the general crop has been dug out, which will not take place for a full month, potatoes are selling throughout the provinces at about half a dollar per 112 pounds, or threepence or less the stone.

—THE new steamship Furnessia, just launched in London, is the largest vessel ever launched in England, except the Great Eastern, and is intended for the Anchor Line service between Glasgow and New York. The steamer has accommodations for 200 cabin and 300 steerage passengers. The Furnessia will be ready for sea in two months.

—THE celebration of the sesqui-centennial of Baltimore closed October 19th with a general illumination of the city, commemorative of the ninety-ninth anniversary of the surrender at Yorktown. The City Hall, Washington and Battle Monuments glittered with thousands of gas-jets. Over 100,000 people were on Baltimore and the adjacent streets.

—THE Bill authorizing American troops to cross the Mexican frontier in pursuit of Indian depredators has passed the Mexican Senate, after encountering a bitter opposition in that body and in the press of the capital. The Bill is based on the condition that Mexican troops shall in like manner be permitted to cross the American frontier in similar circumstances.

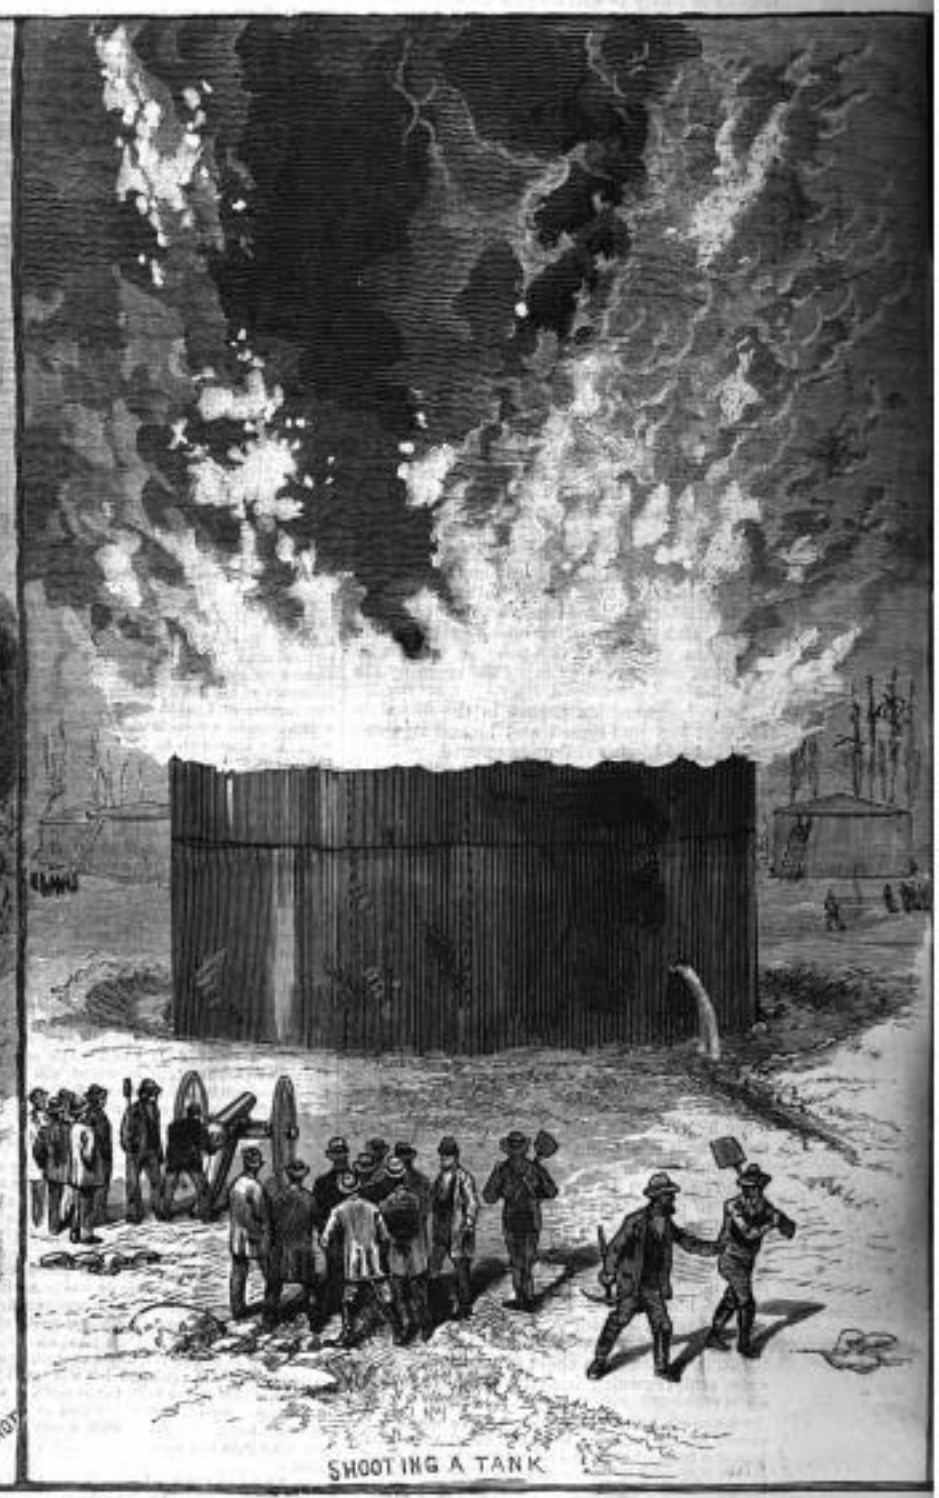
—FUNDS have been granted by the Russian Synod to erect a Greek-Russian church in San Francisco. A priest has been appointed to proceed to California. He will be accompanied by deacons, sub-deacons, acolytes and a full choir. Five thousand rubles have been granted for the preliminary expenses, and the necessary funds for the establishment will be forthcoming when the mission leaves St. Petersburg, which event is expected to take place shortly.

—THE French Minister of War, with a view to encouraging a taste for horse exercise and to develop a knowledge of horse-flesh in the cavalry, has instructed the commanders of this branch of the service to allow a certain number of officers to take part in horse races and steeplechases. In no case are they to run for money prizes, but only in such instances as the rewards consist of cups or works of art. In races got up by officers themselves they are to ride their chargers, but in public races they must run horses that are their own property, and must not ride in uniform.

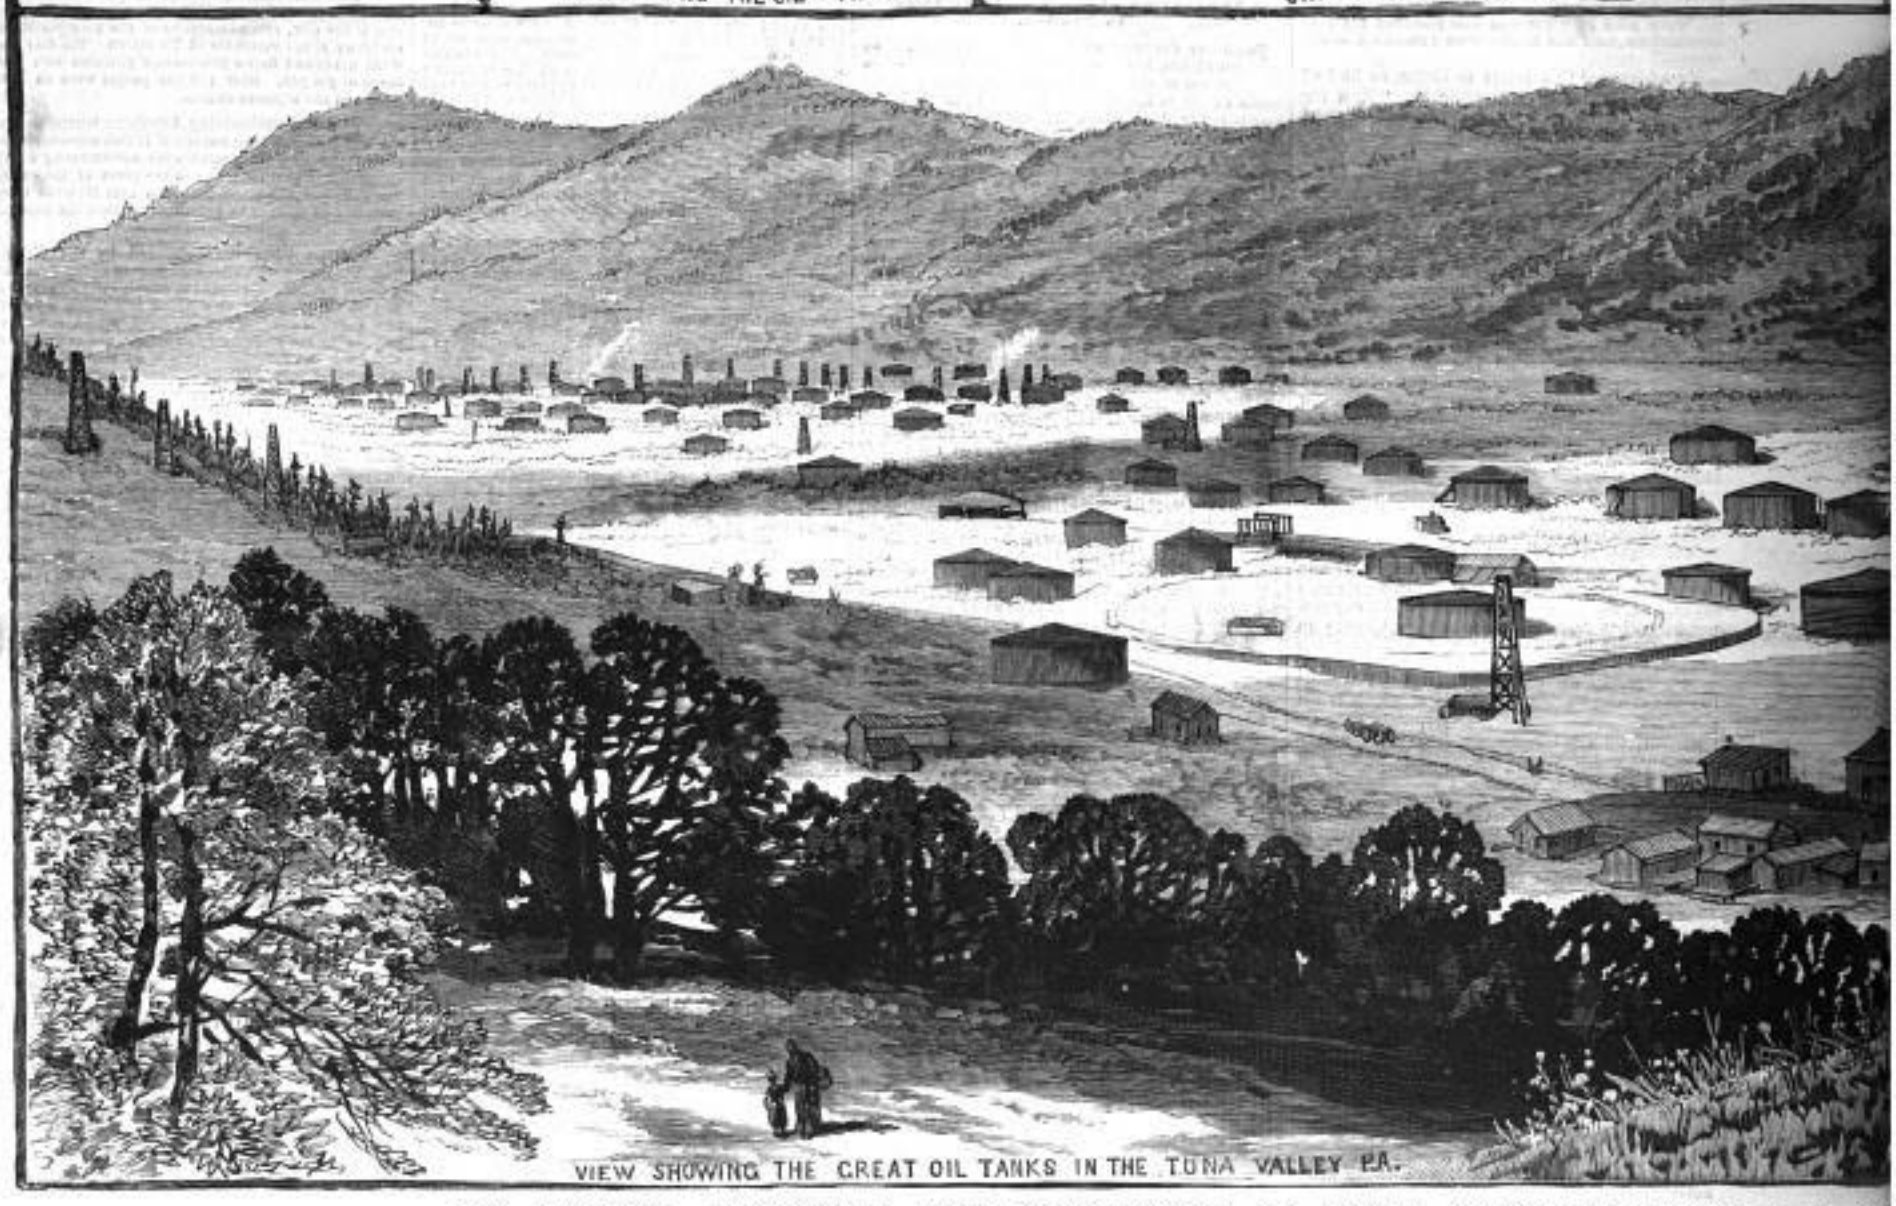
—A SPECIAL dispatch from El Paso says a letter received by Dr. Samaniego, of Paso Del Norte, from his brother at Corrisol, Mexico, avers that Asuata, a Lieutenant in the service of Governor Terazas, of Chihuahua, who came there for supplies, brought news that Colonel Terazas surrounded Victoria and his band on the 24th. The Indians were driven from their position, and at sunrise next morning the attack began again. At 9 A. M. the Mexican troops completed the victory, leaving Victoria with fifty grown Indians and 18 women and children dead on the field. Seventy women and children were also taken prisoners and 250 animals recaptured.

—A COMMISSION of inquiry has been appointed by the Newfoundland Government in Conception Bay to closely and carefully investigate the recent alleged outrages upon American fishermen. A letter from St. Johns says: "The general sense and sentiment of the people of Newfoundland are strongly antagonistic to these illegal and unjustifiable outbreaks of passion on the part of our fishermen against citizens of the United States peaceably exercising undoubted piscatorial rights secured to them by the Treaty of Washington. The only redeeming feature in these unruly displays of force is the circumstance that one and all have occurred in several settlements of the inland, chiefly inhabited by ignorant fishermen, who never heard the word treaty, and to whom notions of international rights or privileges of a reciprocal character are as dim as the musings of an oyster. In St. Johns, American fishermen are always welcome, and they take their bait and purchase their ice in the city and its neighborhood, perfectly secure from molestation."

Digitized by Google



LOWERING THE CARTRIDGE



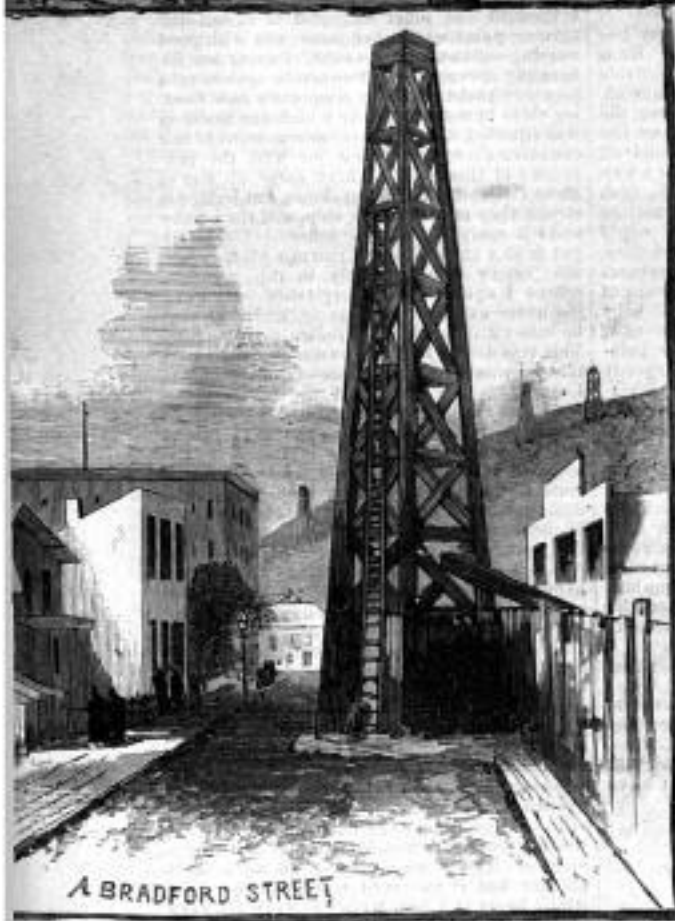
THE NITRO GLYCERINE WAGON

METHOD OF STARTING THE OIL – FIRING A SHOT

SHOOTING A TANK

VIEW SHOWING THE GREAT OIL TANKS IN THE TUNA VALLEY P.A.

OUR NATIONAL INDUSTRIES.—THE TRANSMISSION OF CRUDE PETROLEUM FROM THE GR

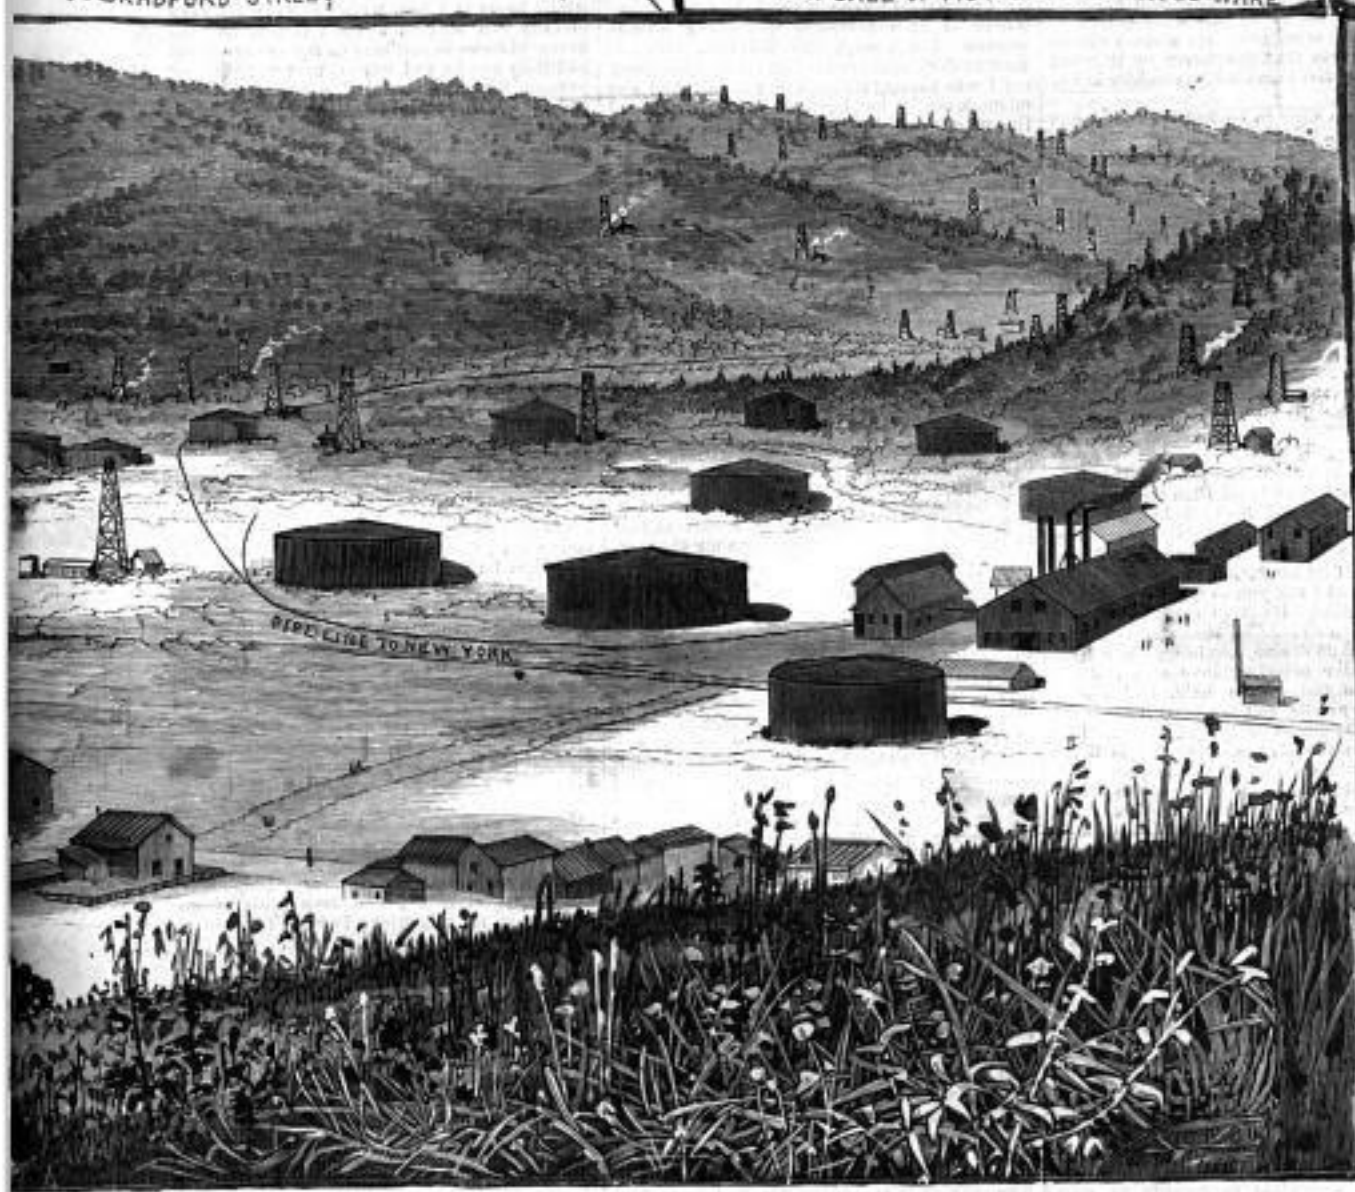


Digitized by Google

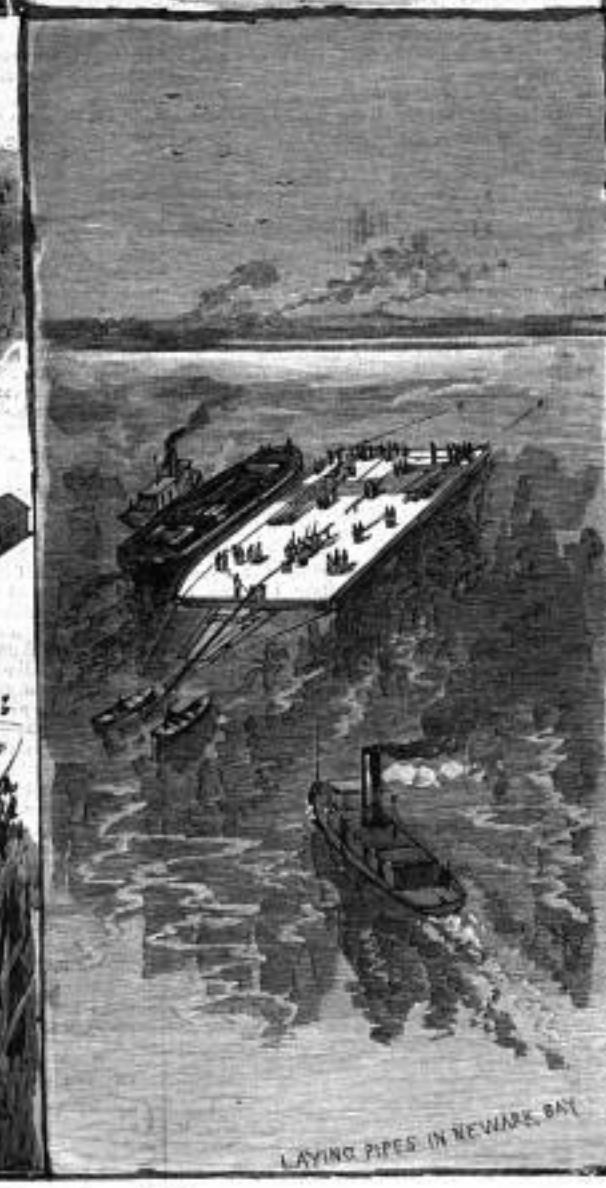
A SATURDAY EVENING LUXURY.

SUNDAY MORNING - THE BILED SHIRT MAN

A BRADFORD STREET.



AN AUCTION SALE OF PISTOLS AND PLATED WARE



A GAS LAMP

AN OIL COUNTRY STOVE.

OIL REGIONS OF PENNSYLVANIA TO TIDE WATER.—FROM SKETCHES BY JOSEPH BECKER.—SEE PAGE 159.

Digitized by Google

REST.

HIS mother was a prince's child,
His sire a crowned king;
There lacked not to his wishes wild
What the broad earth could bring;
Strong knees were supple at his word,
Swords glimmered at his will.
Brave fortune! but it wearied him—
His spirit thirsted still.

For him the glorious music rolled
Of singers silent long;
The Roman and the Grecian told
Their wars of Right and Wrong;
For him philosophy unveiled
Athenian Plato's lore;
Might these not serve to stead a life?
Not these! he sighed for more.

* * * *

He loved—the truest, newest lip
That ever lover pressed;
The queenliest mouth of all the South
Long love for him confessed.
Round him his children's joyousness
Rang silvery and shrill;
Thrice happy! save that happiness
Lacked something—something still.

It came! the studded sceptre lay
An unregarded thing;
Velvets and gold did tawsely hold
The body of the king.
Why! strange that Love, and Love and Sway
Looked ever on before,
And those pale, quiet lips of clay
Asked nothing—nothing more.

THE SCHAFFUSKIE LANDS.

BY ANNIE DUFFELL,

AUTHOR OF "IN THE MESHES," ETC.

CHAPTER XLVI.—(CONTINUED).

HALF an hour later, under the brilliant and glittering heavens, and a few steps removed from the shaft, stand the noble and the Greek exile, in the face of the latter a speechless amaze, bewilderment and gratitude.

"And do you think that I will accept this sacrifice?" she demands, in strong agitation, when he has made his brief explanation. "Do you think I will permit it? No! Sooner than accept my freedom at such a cost to a fellow-being, I will live and die in the mines!"

A sad, tender smile crosses the wan and weary face of the noble.

"For fifteen years," he says, in that rich, murmuring voice, "I have been confined in this place; for fifteen long and bitter years have I tasted every torture, agony and indignity that could fall to mortal, but I am repaid as no freedom could reward me, if you will accept your emancipation at my hands, if you will allow me to restore you to your liberty."

"You are too brave and noble," she cries, vehemently. "I will never—never—consent!"

"But you must," he urges, earnestly. "How can I move you? How can I make you understand how deeply engrafted into my soul is the desire to rescue you? Madame, now that you are going away from me—for you will consent to gratify me, after you know all—I will tell you of my love. Do you consider it an indignity—the affection of an exile? Perhaps so; but of one thing I am quite sure, no truer love have you ever had offered you. There is no torture that has touched me equal to the agony of seeing you subjected to this harrowing life—there is no madness that can come to me equal to that of feeling that for all the dreary future you must drag through this miserable existence; no death I fear save that of seeing your proud purity dragged down into the dust beneath the feet of your enemy. Ah, madame, I know the past; I read the history of your trial and temptation in your return from the office. I have been through all the bitter stages through which you have yet to pass if you remain here, and I know that I have seen the time when, maddened by torture and exhaustion that my brain was afire—that honor, manhood, virtue were nothing, and I would have sold my soul to escape from the torment of this living death. Much as you have passed through, you have only as yet tasted the horror and anguish of this life! And it is from this that I would save you—from your own self—for I know that human nature has its limits, that the persecuted body must and will triumph over the mind and every instinct of honor and purity. And do you think I will suffer to see you go? Not one pang! In your salvation is the reward for my past sufferings. It were a poor love that would hesitate to save its object at the price of its life."

Into the girl's eyes, hardened and embittered with her wretchedness, wells a flood of passionate tears.

"This is more than I deserve," she sobs. "I am not worthy of so grand a love! I will not yield to your entreaties. Save yourself while you may!"

"I will never leave these mines alive," he returns, mournfully. "If you refuse this opportunity, it will be lost. What matters to me a few years more or less? For me the trial of life is fast drawing to a close. Exhausted and abused by labor and neglect, my constitution is fast sinking, and the sands of my life are very near spent. And it is with the deepest gratitude and thankfulness that I view the approaching end. Death! what a blessed emancipator to the helpless and suffering! My ransom will be purchased, the burden lifted, my bondage laid down, the shame, degradation of years washed away—at last, I will have entered into eternal rest. And even into eternity I will carry with me the memory of you. Though you will enter into a new life, I will never—never let you go. I will never be alone. In the few more years that I have to live, in the days of labor, in the nights of woe, and in that last great hour of all, you will be in my heart, you will strengthen and comfort me."

As he speaks, in his face comes a "light never seen on land or sea." The lines and deep furrows fade away, the wan, haggard shadow vanishes, and upon his broad brow, where so often have stood the dank dews of anguish, is stamped the sublimity of sacrifice, and a grandeur that has never been there in the days of his youth—a sublime serenity, the peace, the gratitude, the rest with God and man of a soul which, after long years of travail and bitterness, is at last released from its burden and its brand.

In this holy hour the poisoned ashes of dead years drop away, the bitter memories of a slaughtered past fade out; the rankling, festering wounds lie quiet; the fierce, maddened rebellion for ever vanishes as he succors this woman from her thraldom and gives the touch of sublimity to human love. And in silence and awe the girl stands reverently before him. Before the divinity of that great and abiding love—before the grandeur and heroism of his renunciation—the bitterness of her earthly passion fades out of sight. She stands stripped of her hatred and revenge, shorn of the evil that was slowly but surely gaining root in her heart. The ice, the bitterness, the blasphemous mutiny melt for ever away as she looks up into that gray, stately, melancholy face and realizes this love, shorn of all earthly weakness and passion, and which no measure can compass. And yet she shudders and sickens with horror at thoughts of leaving this man to the agony of the life that has so long claimed him. He sees the irresolution, the heartsick misery of her lovely eyes.

"Do you still hesitate?" he says. "If you have any pity for my wretched and tortured life, I beseech you to accept this favor at my hands."

"But how can I!" she groans, and wrings her hands in her suffering.

"Can you find it in your heart to refuse one who stands upon the threshold of eternity? See, the grave will soon close over me;" he extends to her his emaciated arm, which already shows the approach of death. "Whether you go or stay, I will soon be among the unknown and nameless dead, and my rest will be sweet, dreamless, unbroken, if you are safe from the travail and pitfalls of this dead existence. If not, I think even the grave will refuse me oblivion. Will you go?"

"Since you desire it, I will." The consent is wrenched from her by his eloquent pleading. "But I swear by those heavens, I will return again and rescue you!"

"Do not attempt to do that," he murmurs. "It will be useless. Ere long I will be ransomed by a mightier hand than yours. If you desire to reward me, if you fancy my act entitles me to any consideration, all I ask of you is—remembrance! In the future, when happier days shall be yours, and the solace of a true love shall have effaced the agony of the past—if at such a time you will let one thought stray to him whose bones lie bleaching in a foreign land, it will be the richest guerdon you could give me. I crave no glowing tablet, no great recompense from the world that has slaughtered me; all I ask is one thought from you, and this I am assured I shall have."

Great choking sobs break from the woman who has borne the suffering of exile without a tear, and seizing the shrunken hand of her companion, she presses it again and again to her lips, while the great salt tears bedew it. But he quickly withdraws it; some tinge of earthly weakness that can never be usurped while the body lives makes him shudder at her caress.

"There is no time to be lost," he says, and for one instant his hands clinch. "Here is money that will be sufficient for you until you reach St. Petersburg, and once there, go to the Abbot of the Monastery of St. Michael. In his possession are my family jewels and half of my fortune. Upon this you can live for the remainder of your life in ease and luxury. And now you must start. Keep well to the east, and when the sun rises you will be far on your journey." He wraps around her a long, fur-lined cloak that entirely conceals her convict garb, and leads her towards the horse.

"But is there no message I can take for you—no commission I can perform in your old world?" she groans.

"Stay—yes!" The hollow, glazed eyes turn full upon her. "Sometimes it has come to me that between you and Count Toboskie there was a stronger bond than that of mere friendship. If so, and the turbulent ocean of life should ever again cast your lives together, I beseech of you not to harden your heart against him. If he has loved you once, it is for all eternity, and I ask you to make him happy in your affection. Do it in memory of me! And now, farewell!" One long, last look into the face with its divine loveliness—one final glance of tender, brooding love at the deep, dark eyes, at the golden hair, and she is placed in the saddle, and the good horse, cold and impatient with its delay, gathers itself for a start, and in the next moment she is being borne across the country at a swift pace. Almost stupefied with the past events, she finally turns in the saddle and looks back. Under the swaying shadows of the leafless trees she sees the tall, gaunt form of the exiled noble, his face, filled with its holy and sanctified light, upturned to the gleaming heavens, across which flashes the refulgent radiance of the aurora borealis, which seems to have risen in salutation to the grandeur of his renunciation. In the next moment a curve in the path shuts him out, and they separated until their spirits, purified and clothed in immortality, come face to face at the throne of the Son.

CHAPTER XLVII.—THE HISTORY OF THE PAST.

COUNT TOBOSKIE is alone in the gloomy silence of his private apartments. Never since the downfall of the woman of his love has he known human companionship. In his political life a certain conformity to state society is compelled of him; but in his private existence no monk of the monastery on the mountain peak could be more rigorous in self-denial and mortification of the flesh. It is the only solace he has—to feel that he, too, though in private, suffers from the same deprivations that mark her life.

Suddenly upon the door of his castle apartment sounds a knock, and before him appears his chamberlain.

"My lord, there is a messenger from the Hospital of St. Mary awaiting. He comes from one woman, Valentine Gabaudie, an inmate, who is thought to be dying, and who sends an urgent request for you to visit her at once."

The count springs to his feet. At that name a sudden tremor of excitement has seized him.

"Say that I will be there at once," he commands, hastily, "and order my carriage to be at the door as soon as possible. Dying! Every moment is precious."

A short time afterwards he alights at the hospital, and is shown to a small apartment wherein lies Valentine. A shudder of overwhelming horror convulses him as he looks down upon that figure.

"Good God!" he cries, shrinking back. "What is the matter with you?"

"Vitriol!" she says, grimly, and he notices that, despite the anguish she must be enduring, her voice is firm and strong. Never has any sight ever affected him as this does. He is actually faint with horror and uncontrollable disgust. The eyes and forehead are uninjured, but only serve to make more apparent the horrible condition of the lower portion of the countenance, which is disfigured beyond all recognition. The skin is entirely burnt away by the fatal drug, and in some places the flesh is eaten to the bone. If streams of molten lead had coursed down that face it could scarcely have wrought greater destruction. No trace of the once straight, dark features remains, while all attempt at concealment of the hideous spectacle is made impossible by the inability to apply bandages to the raw, quivering flesh. The suffering must be indescribable—worse than a hundred speedy deaths—yet that peculiar force of her character sustains her with remarkable strength. Expression, form, character, are entirely burnt out of her face, but her hands, beautiful as sculptured marble as they lie upon the counterpane, are uninjured, and, as usual, in them lie the expression which probably would be repressed from her countenance, even if it were uninjured. The flesh of the extreme portion of the straight and perfect fingers is agitated with a convulsive and tremulous quiver like the muscles of a sensitive mouth; and occasionally the entire hand clinches with a swift, sudden movement.

"How did it happen?" he inquires, sinking in a chair by the bed.

"It is a simple story; if any one believed in Providence they might say this was retribution, but I don't believe in such things. Conscience is the only soul of man, and that has been dead in me long ago. All my life I have been an atheist. I shall not turn now."

A defiant gleam shoots into her eyes, and her hands move restlessly upon the bed.

"But that is not answering my question," he says.

"I forget. I have not much to tell. Somewhere in St. Petersburg there is a jealous woman. For a week she had been lying in wait in dark corners for her rival. One evening I was passing through her street and she mistook me for her husband's siren. I gained this much from her ravings. Then came the vitriol. That is all."

"But I thought you accompanied Lady Ashhurst—or, rather, Lady Chatswood—to England."

"I preferred to remain in Russia. Fate at last deserted me. If I had gone to England this had not happened."

"But can nothing be done to alleviate your suffering?"

"Nothing; they tell me I am dying. But it will be a slow death; my vitals are uninjured; it is agony, sheer pain that is killing me."

"Have no traces of the perpetrator of this horrible deed been discovered?"

"None. My death will ever be unavenged. As I am dying, I sent for you to tell you the history of my life. In one or two points it may be interesting to you." The large, black eyes gleam up at him in malice and unmistakable hatred. "I believe, in all romances that I have read, a deathbed confession for the marplot is the proper thing. But, mind you, I do not tell you this through any weak emotion of repentance. I do not fear to die. I believe that the future holds nothing save oblivion. Count Toboskie, long ago, when we met in England, I read your character. I saw that you were ambitious, but with a lofty ambition that disdained gold; it was power, sway, finesse that you craved. You were cold, and proud of your coldness, even as you were, and are, proud of the unbending hauteur, the icy dominance of your nature. You believe that one of your race is infallible—that a Toboskie could not err in his judgment, but must be deferred to in private as well as state matters. Am I not right?"

He is silent, amazed at the accuracy with which this woman has read his nature.

"But, above all," continues the low, chill voice, "you are proud of your honor. It is to you what Christ is to other men. You would slay that man, even though he were your Emperor, who would dare to barter upon your integrity. Well, count, your goal is attained, even a Toboskie could crave no more fame—no more of power than are yours. But I have sent for you to show you that even you are human, and as such are liable to err. This will take me back into the early portion of my history:

"Twenty years ago and over there died upon one of the West India islands an Englishman named Vavasour. He had one child then about ten years of age, since whose birth he had been a widower. His wife was a native, in whose veins ran the blood of a royal princess of a barbarous tribe, whom her grandfather had met in his travels, become enamored of and bore her back to the Indies, where he made her his wife. That woman was also my grandmother, as I was the half-sister of Vavasour's wife. This story is closely connected with myself, and I must relate it as it is, even at the risk of having egotism imputed to me. Between my sister and myself existed that strong, passionate, affection of our Creole blood, which was also strongly impregnated with the barbarous instincts of our royal grandmother. And at her death she gave into my possession her babe, a few days old. It was a solemn and entire gift, and upon the child I soon grew to lavish all the affection I had centred upon the mother. I was her sole companion, even as she was mine, and her father's death made no alteration in our lives. I was left the legal guardian of Gypsy, and the entire possessor of the modest fortune to be expended upon our support. We lived, alone with our servants, quietly and happily, far removed from the companionship of the world. When Gypsy was twelve years old she was seized with one of those terrible fevers incidental to the climate. At one period I thought she must succumb to it, but the turning-point was in her favor, and with good nursing she came back to life. During her illness my servants had frequently spoken of a pleasure yacht that they frequently saw floating close to the coast, near which our mansion was situated, and, at the commencement of her convalescence, fate threw me with the proprietor of this yacht. There came up one of those swift and terrible cyclones, but before it struck they made fast the ship, and the owner and his companions came ashore. The latter put in at a small shanty upon our place, while the former came directly to the mansion, where I extended our hospitality. He gave his name as Claudio Despucio, and said that he was visiting the West Indies for pleasure. This was true; but I afterwards discovered that he was a Russian noble—Count Nicholas Lagors.

"I was then as unsophisticated, as much of a child, as Gypsy, and when the days passed and he accepted my eager invitation to the hospitality of our home, my heart, that was from the first impressed by his fierce, fickle, distinguished appearance, went entirely into his keeping. I loved him with all the strength, the passion, of my fiery and ardent nature. And when one night he told me of his love my happiness was complete. No doubt of him ever entered my heart. I believed in him as Christians believe in their God. I staked my all on him; if he failed me, even Heaven must be false. So I told our oldest servant, who had once been my nurse, and who with a keenness unusual read his fickle nature. All this time he had not once seen Gypsy, who was now almost restored. Though I trusted him fully, some instinct seemed to warn me to keep these two apart, and I forbade her to enter the parlors upon a weak pretense. Six months passed. Still he lingered under our roof, and still I was in a fool's paradise. The country was beginning to classify our names in an unenviable manner, but it mattered nothing to me; my whole heart and soul were his, even my very identity had become merged in his. All the fierce, idolatrous instincts of my savage blood had fully awoke and were concentrated in my passion for my lover. But one day I was rudely awakened from my dream of bliss; upon going to Gypsy's chamber I found her absent; upon a table lay a note in her little crooked handwriting. It took me hours to realize its contents, but finally I awoke to the bitter, crushing blow. Gypsy, the child of my love, had gone off in the yacht with my lover! All this time that I had believed I had kept her safe from his knowledge, he had known and loved her. I believe he stumbled upon her once as she lay half-naked in the grass, and from that moment their clandestine acquaintance commenced."

Toboskie remembers that picture once seen in Lagors's chamber, and marvels that he did not recognize in it some semblance to Lady Ashhurst. But he is silent, not even telling her that a portion of this narrative has been told him by Lagors, seeing that she must tell her story after her own fashion.

"I wonder that I did not go mad in those horrible, solitary days; it would have been a mercy if I had, but such a blessing was denied me. I lived, though my inner life was killed, my heart broken. At last I rose from my weakness, though never for one moment after the first shock did I feel anything but pity for the child—for she was nothing more, though maturing so early in the tropical climate in which she was born. It was always my faithless lover that roused my wrath. And as all the fierce and savage instincts of my uncivilized race were merged in my love for him, even so, after his perfidy, did these dangerous elements of my character centre in a swift but boundless hatred. Love in me and all power of loving were for ever killed, but that only made my capability for hatred all the greater. My whole soul became submerged with the one idea—revenge! He had abused my hospitality, had betrayed that grand, free faith of my youth, and for this injury I swore I would be avenged.

"One morning I was awakened early by a hand laid upon my brow. I looked up to see Gypsy standing by my bedside. The sudden sight of her briefly drove away the memory of my own injuries. Not until this moment had I fully realized how bitter and solitary my life had grown without her. I took her in my arms and wept over her; she had come back to me—this child of my love, this baby of my loved and lost sister. At last she told me her history—of the intense passion of her lover, of the delightful days spent in the world of gayety, of the different lords in the different countries that had fallen madly in love with her beauty, of the silks and satins and jewels in which she had been clad, and then of the waning love of her betrayer. It was the old, old story; why need I linger. She had been gone just eight months, and had grown lovelier and more womanly, while in her breast, awakened by the dream-like, idealic existence of those short months, burned all the wild, instincts of her gay and frivolous disposition. Last of all, she told me that in Athens she had given birth to a child. She was a mother—she who was nothing but a child herself, who it seemed but a few short days ago had been placed in my arms by her own dying mother! I stared at her, stupefied by a strange and deadly horror.

Digitized by Google

"'Where is the child?' I asked.

"'I left it in Greece. Nasty little thing! What could I have done with it?'"

(To be continued.)

A GREAT UNDERTAKING.

AN OIL PIPE LINE FROM PENNSYLVANIA TO THE SEABOARD.

ONE of the great enterprises of the time is that of the Standard Oil Company for the construction of a pipe line from the Pennsylvania oil regions to tide-water at Jersey City, by which the oil-carrying business can be transferred from the railway companies and concentrated in its own hands. The enterprise has, very naturally, encountered the sturdy opposition of the railroads heretofore enjoying this carrying trade, but it now seems likely to be pushed to a successful completion at an early day. Recently an attempt was made to prevent the laying of the pipes across Newark Bay, but it resulted in failure, and the line at that point is now ready for use. The route, as far as it has been selected in New Jersey, runs from Jersey City across the Hackensack meadows to near Kingsland's, on the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad. The bluff is climbed, and the line continued across the rising ground to West Rutherford. Then the hill is descended to the Passaic River, the pipe is laid across its bed, and then up the western bank and through Acquackanonck to the long hill known as Garret Mountain. Up the rocky bluffs the pipe is carried and across the mountains, passing down the Browertown Valley, and so on until the Passaic River is again reached, near the high bridge of the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad, half-way between Paterson and Little Falls. Beyond this point the line is to be continued westward from the Passaic River, where that stream is crossed the second time, and carried over the Preakness Mountain and across the Singack Valley to the Pompton Valley, up which it will be extended, generally along the route of the Montclair Railway, to Greenwood Lake, and thence in the most direct course to the New York, Lake Erie and Western Railroad, where the pipe line will, for the present, stop. There the oil will be received from that road, and pumped thence to the refineries at Greenville, on the edge of New York Bay, just below Jersey City. It is thought that this is all that can be laid of the line this season, but through the Winter the right of way will be secured through Pennsylvania, and next Spring the pipe will be continued until the company's works are reached in Butler County. The grants so far secured include the right of way to lay and keep in repair a six-inch pipe three feet below the surface, and also the right to erect and maintain telegraph-poles across the same property. The latter privilege is said to be for the purpose of maintaining a telegraph merely for the use of the company, but may be much more valuable some day.

The pipe is of six inches (inside) diameter, very heavy, weighing about fifty pounds per foot. It is made in long sections and thoroughly tested. The defective parts are cut out and the rest is used, the lengths being six or eight feet, more or less, and weighing from 300 to 400 pounds. Longer sections would be too heavy for easy handling. The pipes are laid three feet under ground where possible, the natural surface of the soil being followed, so that no grading is required and no damage is done to property. It is carried up hills and down mountains, up abrupt precipices and across valleys, through or under canals and along the beds of rivers, no bridges or trestles whatever being used. In this way the actual cost of laying will be small. The projectors of this great work estimate that 15,000 barrels of oil will be forced through the pipe daily, equivalent to, perhaps, 300 carloads. The saving on their freight bills, they say, will pay for the whole line in a very short time. They do not fear any difficulty from the pipe getting clogged with thick oil, nor from steep ascents, believing that the force used to drive the immense quantity of oil mentioned will serve to keep the pipe entirely free and clear.

There are few more interesting points to a visitor than Bradford, in Wayne County, Pa., where the oil interest now largely centres. There oil is truly king. Oil is everywhere, and at every turn one stumbles upon the appliances employed in utilizing it. Derricks and tanks crop up, as if out of the soil, in all directions; even the race-course is invaded by them. Lamps for the consumption of the surplus oil flame night and day, and country stores burn nothing but oil. Bradford itself is a town of pine-boards and mud, and social life wears rough and crude forms, but it is, all the same, a place of intense activity. The process of sinking wells, illustrated by our artist, has many points of interest. First a hole is dug, sometimes to the depth of a thousand feet; over this a square box casing is placed, and into this is let down, from the tail of a wagon, a can of nitro-glycerine containing 25 or 30 quarts. This is exploded by concussion from a heavy weight suddenly dropped upon it—the explosion opening the well, and being followed by a shower of stones, water, etc., and a steady flow of oil. The business of adjusting and exploding the cans of nitro-glycerine is full of danger, but casualties are of rare occurrence.

It sometimes happens that tanks of oil take fire from lightning or some other cause. Should the burning oil overflow and spread, of course great damage might result. To prevent this, ditches are made about the tank, and, when these are completed, a hole is made near the bottom of the tank by firing a ball into it from a cannon kept for the purpose.

The Standard Oil Company has eleven pumping stations between Bradford and New York. It controls over 400 tanks, holding over 11,000,000 barrels of oil. In laying the pipes, twenty-five men constitute a gang, and these lay 300 joints, or from two-thirds of a mile to one mile in a day. The highest altitude crossed by the pipes is 2,000 feet above the sea-level. Mr. Alfred Smedley is the general superintendent at Bradford.

THE AMERICAN INSTITUTE FAIR.

THE American Institute Fair, now in progress at the Hall on Third Avenue, New York City, is conceded on all hands to be superior to any of its predecessors. The list of exhibits covers many of the most notable products of industrial skill and enterprise, and the display as a whole shows conspicuously what great progress has been made in recent years in providing for the comfort and convenience of mankind. For the last forty-nine years every useful American invention has been exhibited at some time in this vast hall. Every coming season adds new interest to the place by the exhibition of fresh articles in the several departments, and this year the number of exhibits placed before the public for inspection is greater than ever. Among the many things likely to arrest the attention are the ponderous engines which generate the driving power and distribute it all over the edifice. The various mechanical contrivances in Machinery Hall are a marvel of ingenuity. Here a little saw, not stronger than the mainspring of a watch, will cut a set of miniature furniture out of a single block of wood not larger than a man's fist; and there the mighty pulverizing stone-crushers can reduce a rock of quartz to the dimness of powder while the spectator could only count two score. A color printing machine can be viewed at work, and a miniature press complete in all its parts may be inspected under a glass shade. Further along there is a machine for making cigarettes—quite a study in itself—and near by another invention appears which receives loose tobacco in a funnel, weighs it accurately, packs it in cloth bags for the pocket, presses it in shape, and delivers the filled bags at the rate of thirty a minute on a revolving table, where a man stands to draw the mouths of the bags together, and the operation is finished. A second person is needed to feed the empty bags to the machine. Other attractions are the glass-blowers, the telephones and type writers, and the art gallery, containing many photographs and crayon drawings. There is a large exhibit of furniture, with all manner of spring-beds and easy-chairs to please the weary. Prominent among the individual exhibits is the display of George V. Hecker & Co., a graceful pyramid, composed of the products of their various mills in New York City. More than a dozen different products appear in the collection, among them some whose names, from long and continuous use, have become as familiar as household words. The name of this house rests upon an honorable record of thirty-five years' successful business. The Hecker Mills, covering twenty-four city lots, on Cherry Street, are among the largest in the country, and capable of turning out over two thousand barrels of flour daily.

Near the exhibit of Hecker & Co. is one of oleomargarine. A comely pile of packages, with conspicuous invitations to try the substance, attract many visitors. The manufacturers and dealers in oleomargarine have always claimed that they were willing their product should stand and sell upon its actual merits, and the public, represented at the fair, appear perfectly willing to make the test, and on the whole seem well satisfied with its results. That oleomargarine has its merits and its purposes, has long since ceased to be debatable; that it is much better than poor butter, is almost as well demonstrated; and that the Commercial Manufacturing Company, Consolidated, and owners of the Mege patent, have a wide field and a large market for its productions is proved by the steady increase of its works, and its constant development of trade, both domestic and foreign.

The exhibits of philosophical instruments, including terrestrial globes with small clocks mounted in the area of the Arctic circle, are also objects of interest in the fair. In the botanical department are many rare specimens of cacti and the Mexican maguey. At the platform near the organ, close to the great fountain, whose crystal spray freshens the heated atmosphere, Arbuckle's band daily discourses the compositions of popular composers to the delight of the large crowds of visitors.

THE NEW COLORED COLLEGE AT ATLANTA, GA.

THE new building of the colored college of Atlanta, Ga.—Clark University—was formally dedicated on October 16th. The new building, known as Chrisman Hall, is exceedingly handsome and commodious, and, located on an elevated position, commands a fine view of the city. The building, which is four stories high and built of brick, cost $30,000, and the grounds, which comprise 450 acres, cost an additional $10,000, making the total cost of the building and grounds $40,000. Ten thousand dollars of this money was donated by Mrs. Eliza Chrisman, now of Topeka, Kansas, for whom the college was named, and the remainder was secured from the Freedman's Aid Society and by Bishop Haven through private subscriptions. The building contains four fine school-rooms, a chapel, parlor, library, reading-room, a kitchen, laundry, dining-room, etc., and dormitories for teachers and about one hundred students.

This college is the outgrowth of a school established in Atlanta by the Freedmen's Aid Society in 1869. At first this was a primary school, and the grade was not much raised for several years. After a time, theological and classical departments were added, and the school assumed the form of a seminary, which form it still holds essentially, considered from a New England standpoint. The students are mostly the children of parents formerly slaves, and many of them are extremely poor. The Atlanta Constitutionalist says of the institution: "Like the acorn, it grows slowly but surely. At the past rate of growth, a score of years will give it magnificent proportions. It is a good illustration of the vitality and power of that truly American idea, the voluntary principle, by which our people build their churches, pay their ministers, and erect nearly all their high schools and colleges. There is no taint of tithe or church tax about this field of four hundred acres, graced by this thirty thousand dollar building devoted to higher education. It is the offspring of the benevolence of our people North and South, but for the time being more from the former than the latter, but that is no reason it should continue so. We claim that as it is an ornament to the city, with a broad and comprehensive design, our own men of wealth and benevolence should lend it further support, which, we are glad to learn, they have begun to do in the work of furnishing the building. It may be well to add that the late General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church (North) enlarged the powers of that board of education under whose care this school has sprung up, to enable it to meet the wants of the white membership and the dependents of that church as well as of the colored, and we heartily wish that a building of equal magnitude and beauty may some day in the near future spring up within our city bounds, under the care of that board for the benefit of its white membership, nor do we see any good reason why the same board of trustees or regents should not supervise both."

The dedication exercises on the 16th were full of interest. The college chapel was filled to its utmost capacity with the friends of the institution, both white and colored, and upon the rostrum were a number of distinguished citizens, among them Governor A. H. Colquitt, Senator Joseph E. Brown, School Commissioner O. J. Orr, Ex-Governor Bullock, Mr. H. J. Kimball, Professor Slaton, of the city public schools, General Evans, Rev. Dr. Hoch, and many others. The exercises were opened with prayer by Bishop Turner. Dr. R. S. Rust followed with a brief preliminary address, referring to the history of the institution, its present prosperous condition, and its bright future. He read several letters which he had received from friends of the college, one from Mrs. Chrisman and one from John Greenleaf Whittier. Bishop Warren followed with a masterly address, which was greatly enjoyed by the audience. Senator Joseph E. Brown then made a few remarks tracing the history of slavery for several centuries past, and comparing the present condition of the colored race with what it was in England, New England and the South prior to the war. He said it was God's will that slavery should be "torn out by the roots," and that if it was in his power to place the blacks where they were before the war—if the turning over of his hand would do it—he wouldn't make the effort. Bishop Haven (cousin of the bishop who was so persistent in his efforts to build up this institution) said, in following Governor Brown, that he believed the South would rise from the ruins of the war brighter than ever before. Governor Colquitt, just elected by 40,000 majority, made a very strong address. He said he was very glad the election was over, for he hadn't said a favorable word about or to the colored men during the canvass that his opponents had not construed it as having a political significance. He spoke of the faithfulness of the blacks, and said, "The first free school" after the war was established on a plantation where the owner, although left very poor, still found money enough to buy books and build a little shanty and hire a teacher. "I don't know anything that did more towards bringing me home safely from the war than the prayers of those faithful colored people on my plantation at home."

Bishop Wylie, in an address, urged the colored people to disabuse their minds of the idea that the law can give them education, affluence or social position without effort on their part; that they must carve out for themselves their own glory or disgrace.

The college starts out under the most favorable auspices, almost filled with students, and has apparently a brilliant future before it. It has a corps of five teachers, under Mr. R. E. Bisbee, president, who are paid by the Freedmen's Aid Society, and the other expenses of the college are secured by an exceedingly low rate of tuition.

THE SALE OF FECHTER'S EFFECTS.

THE sale of the wardrobe of the late Charles A. Fechter, and the collection of miscellaneous properties belonging to him, which took place in New York City, October 13th, attracted a crowd of actors, actresses, managers, and other well-known persons. Many of the suits and articles of wearing apparel were in an excellent state of preservation, and were worth from three to five times what they brought. This was the case particularly with the costumes worn by the actor in "The Duke's Motto," in "The Corsican Brothers," in "Don Cæsar," and as Claude Melnotte. The large assortment of swords, rapiers, etc., brought nearly their market value, every blade being new, and the majority unsheathed for the first time since they were packed by the sellers on the other side of the water.

The first lots bid off comprised an extensively varied assortment of articles, such as cloaks, jackets, breeches, trunks and vests, in velvet, cloth, silk, and plush of high colors. The bidding on them was slow and tedious, the prices per lot ranging from $3 to $5. They found purchasers chiefly among the costumers of the city, who attended the auction in force. There was something more like competition when the costumes worn in "The Duke's Motto" were put up. The Hamlet dress, comprising a black shirt, black cloak, cap, chain, picture, shoes, black cloth cloak and embroidered shirt went off for $12.50. A lot comprising a black silk velvet vest, crimson cloth coat, sword-belt, spurs, black silk velvet breeches and gray cloth cloak, worn in the first act of "Hamlet" found a purchaser at $13. Lester Wallack took the two cream-colored cloth cloaks worn in "Othello," both handsome garments, for $23 each. A Mexican dress, worn in the last act of "The Golden Dagger," which was as rich a combination of colored silk and velvet as any in the entire wardrobe, was knocked down to Mr. Whiffen for $20. The same bidder carried off, for $5.25, the badly worn "Rouge et Noir" costume. It consisted of shirt and stockings, breeches, coat, a tattered felt hat with a rope band, and a beggar's canvas pocket, large enough to contain the contributions of a month's sitting on the curbstone of a crowded thoroughfare. Its value was due to the fact that it was the last costume in which Fechter appeared on the stage. A similarly dilapidated-looking suit, in which Fechter played the part of Jacques Strop in "Robert Macaire," was made up of a ragged coat, shirt, breeches, vest, handkerchief, dressing-gown, and a crushed tall hat. Lester Wallack paid $6 for it. Another purchaser secured a make-up, consisting of a scarlet cloth shirt, white shirt and white and gray pointed cloth cloak, trimmed with gold, worn in "The Duke's Motto," for $11.50. A lackey's dress, used in the first act of "Ruy Blas," fetched $21. A costume comprising black silk tights, black plush cloak, adorned with the Order of the Cross, a black silk velvet jacket and black silk velvet shoes and belt, for the second act of the same play, fell to Mr. Wallack for $14. The three costumes in which Fechter appeared in Don Cæsar were the cause of considerable competition. They went off for $41.50, that for the first act bringing $26, and that for the last $27. These were the highest prices paid for any one costume.

The collection of swords and rapiers included at least 100 pieces of fine steel. They were purchased, the auctioneer said, for the Lyceum Theatre just prior to the severance of Fechter's connection with it. The swords were sold in pairs and realized from $8.50 to $30 per pair. Mr. Wallack took an antique blade for $15. W. E. Sheridan got the four trick swords used in "The Corsican Brothers," while the weapon used in "Ruy Blas," together with its velvet and gold-plated scabbard, mountings and belt, was bid off for $18. Two daggers brought $3.50 each. For wigs, from $3 to $9 per pair was paid. The blue armor suit, comprising coat, pantaloons and helmet, worn by the Ghost in "Hamlet," brought $4. A brand-new steel armor suit, with breast-plate, neck-plate, helmet and gloves, went for $31; a pair of steel leggins and chain helmet, also new, for $22, and a pair of steel spurs for $3.

In round figures, the sale realized about $1,800. This sum will be applied to the monument which will be erected to Mr. Fechter's memory in Mount Vernon Cemetery, near Philadelphia, and which is now well under way towards completion.

A Bloodhound's Gratitude.

THE Detroit Free Press tells a remarkable story of a bloodhound's gratitude at Andersonville. The prisoners were allowed to go out in squads, strongly guarded, to collect firewood. One day it was the hero's turn to go, and for the first time since his imprisonment he caught sight of "Colonel Catcheem," the big bloodhound. The Michigander noticed that the dog limped painfully on one of his fore-feet, but gave the matter no special attention until, after being out for half an hour, he sat down to rest near one of the guards. The dog approached the guard as if to ask some favor, but was repulsed with an oath and a threatened blow. He then skulked around and came near the prisoner, who saw that he had an old horseshoe nail run into his foot. With a little coaxing he got the dog near and finally pulled out the nail, and the animal ran away seemingly well pleased. Twelve days after that, one night about midnight, a tunnel was ready. The prisoner was a long time getting clear of the neighborhood, and, weak and starved as he was, he was not more than two miles from the stockade when day broke, and "Colonel Catcheem" was put on his track. When he heard the hound coming he looked for a suitable tree to climb, but failed to find one. Armed with a club he took his stand, and determined to make a fight for it. The dog recognized the man, and began exhibiting every sign of friendship. After a few minutes the pursuers were heard in the distance. The dog at once trotted off in that direction, and was shortly baying and leading them over a fictitious trail. The prisoner pushed ahead for half an hour, and was then rejoined by the dog, who kept either close at his heels or just ahead of him all day, and lay beside him in the woods at night. This position of guardian or companion he maintained until towards night of the second day, when he returned to the stockade. The prisoner was then thirty miles away, but on the fifth morning he was recaptured. When he returned the hound met and caressed him. From that hour to the close of the war the dog would not take the trail of an escaping prisoner.

PERSONAL GOSSIP.

REV. THOMAS K. BEECHER, of Elmira, N. Y., is running as a Democratic-Greenback candidate for Congress.

THE Sultan of Morocco has sent a note to the Powers, declaring that all religions shall be respected throughout Morocco.

VISCOUNT LYMINGTON, Liberal Member of Parliament for Barnstaple, has sailed for New York. He intends to study the land system and agriculture in the United States.

SENATOR SHARON'S daughter Flora will be married to Sir Thomas Hesketh in San Francisco about the middle of December. The wedding reception will be held at Belmont.

MISS NELLIE CALHOUN, grand-niece of John C. Calhoun, made a very successful début at the Grand Opera House at San Francisco on October 19th as Juliet, and was accorded a gratifying reception.

LORD BRAYBROOKE'S agent at High Wycombe have, by his lordship's instructions, returned twenty per cent. of the half-year's rent just paid to all his tenants on the Hughenden Manor estate.

GENERAL CAMERON purchased a house in Maytown, Lancaster County, recently, which stands on the spot where he was born. He intends to present it to the Lutheran Church of Maytown for a parsonage.

SENATOR MCDONALD, of Indiana, is to be married in February to the widowed Mrs. Bernard, of Washington. Mrs. Bernard, who is a handsome elderly woman, has a son married to a niece of Secretary Sherman.

A MEETING of Bonapartists hostile to Prince Jerome Napoleon, after an excited discussion, has adopted a resolution summoning him to renounce his candidature and recognize Prince Victor Napoleon as the heir to the throne.

MONSIGNOR VANUTELLI succeeds Cardinal Jacobini as Papal Nuncio at Vienna, and will take charge of the negotiations between the Vatican and Germany. Cardinal Jacobini succeeding as Papal Secretary of State on the retirement of Cardinal Nina.

CARDINAL MANNING is now so far restored to health that he will immediately resume the active duties of his ecclesiastical office. After a working tour in the Midlands and the North of England, he has returned to London, looking more energetic than ever.

MARIE OF RUSSIA AND EDINBURGH is said to deeply desire to become known to, and popular with, the English people. Her want of popularity is probably partly owing to her devoted attachment to her father and to his ideas of politics and government.

GOVERNOR MURRAY of Utah, in his annual report to Secretary Schurz, suggests that a commission for the government of the Territory be constituted for the polygamous Legislature, and points out a precedent in late acts respecting the District of Columbia.

SIR HENRY BESSEMER has taken out no less than 114 patents. The freedom of the City of London has just been conferred upon him. Before his steel process was introduced into Sheffield the entire make of steel was 51,000 tons a year; now it is 830,000 tons.

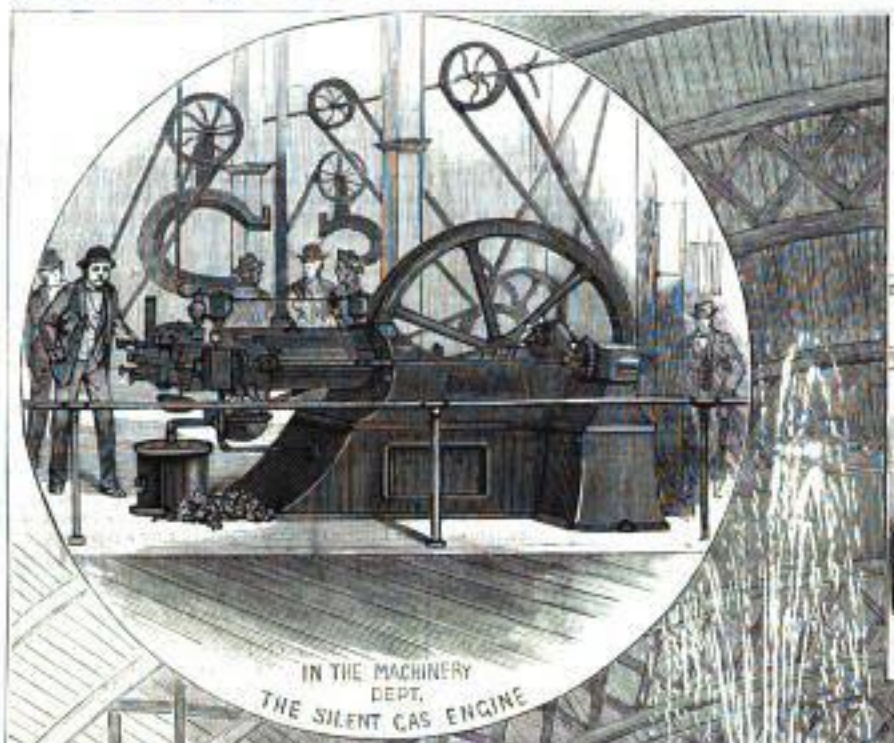
A DUBLIN correspondent says: "The state of the West of Ireland may be judged from the fact that Lady Mountmorres, who returned to her residence after the murder of her husband last month, has been subjected to such a system of persecution that she is obliged to leave."

THE remains of Father Meeker, the murdered agent of the White River Utes, taken up from the place of burial where his body was found after the agency massacre, are to have proper interment, their last resting-place being selected at Greeley, Col., the home of his family.

MR. THOMAS HUGHES, of London, was tendered a reception by the co-operative societies of Boston on the 19th inst. Mr. Hughes explained to the company the plans of co-operation adopted in England and other countries, and enlarged upon the moral and financial aspects of the subject.

THE sarcophagus of Roger of Tuscany, Bishop of Lausanne, who was buried in Lausanne Cathedral in 1230, was opened a few weeks ago. The body was almost intact, the features were perfectly recognizable, and the six and a half centuries had but sufficed to destroy the texture of his episcopal robes.

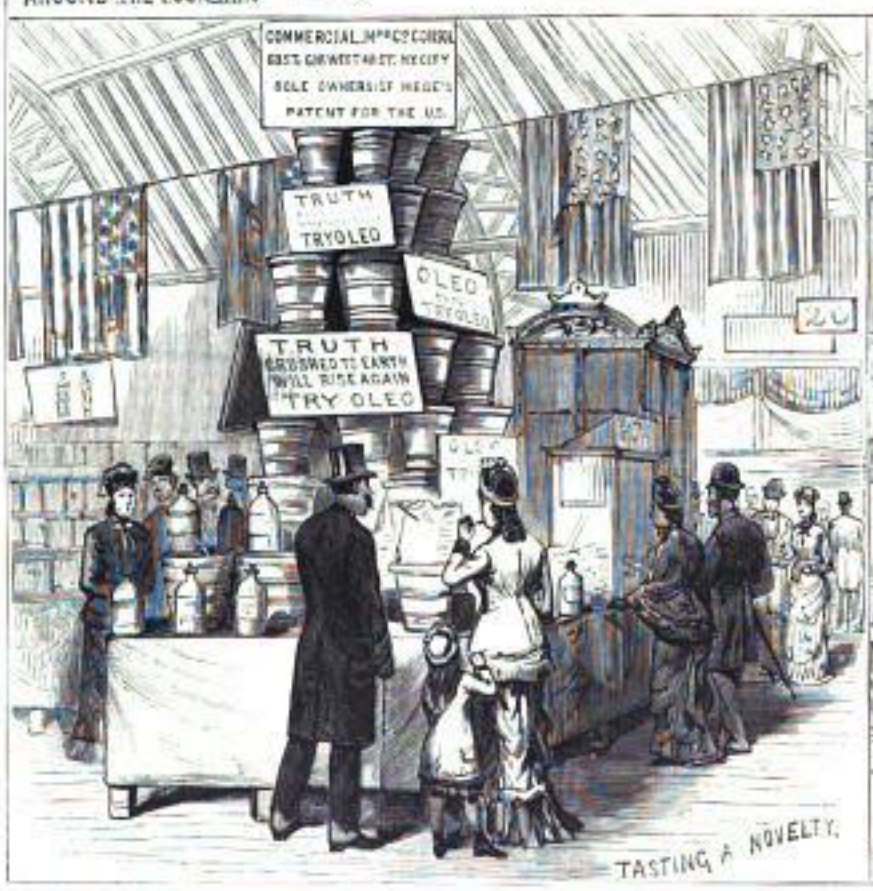
M. FELIX PYAT has been sentenced in Paris to two years' imprisonment and to pay a fine of 2,000 francs, for his article justifying the attempt of Berezowski, the Pole, to assassinate the Emperor of Russia in Paris in 1867, and M. Roberts, the manager of M. Pyat's paper, the Commune, has been sentenced to six months' imprisonment, and to pay a similar fine.



CAPTAIN EADS will sail from New Orleans for Mexico on November 4th, accompanied by a party of engineers, who will examine the Isthmus of Tehuantepec in order to verify the captain's ideas as to its adaptability to the purposes of a ship railway. Captain Eads will, at the same time, endeavor to secure Government sanction for his proposed survey and to ascertain what the Mexican Congress will be willing to do if he decides to make the railway.

MME. PATTI has resolved upon selling her Brecon seat, Craig-y-nos Castle, Wales, upon which she has latterly spent a great fortune. She has been surprised at the high assessment placed upon the castle, and has been displeased by the depredations made on her estate. The water-works which she erected at considerable expense have been destroyed, the river and land poached upon for fish and game, and the poachers have had the audacity to come to the door of the castle to offer their spoil for sale.

BISHOP COLENSO, of Natal, well known by his advanced views on the Pentateuch, lives very quietly at his residence near Maritzburg, where he is not often seen except on Sunday, when he conducts services in the church. He is described as elephantine in appearance, being almost seven feet high and of massive frame. He wears a wide-brimmed stovepipe beaver hat, of the old-fashioned cut, and a long coat of thin black material. He is regarded with awe and reverence by the natives, who salute him as supreme or great chief. The bishop is now sixty-six years old, but retains his vigor of mind. One of his daughters acts as his amanuensis, and Caffres are his printers.



OBITUARY.—The Rev. Dr. Samuel Adlain, for many years pastor of the First Baptist Church, Newport, R. I., died October 18th, aged 82; Reuben North, a well-known banker of Poughkeepsie, on the 20th, aged 75; Charles Hawy, banker, of Raleigh, N. C., on the 24th, aged 82; Valentine G. Hall, a prominent retired merchant of New York City, on the 20th, aged 82; Rt. Hon. Alfred H. Dosiger, Lord Justice of the Court of Appeals, at London, October 20th, aged 62; Mrs. Lydia Maria Child, the well-known author, at Wayland, Mass., October 20th, aged 78; Chief Justice Edward G. Ryan, of the Wisconsin Supreme Court, at Madison, October 20th, aged 76; Miss Maria Louise Charlesworth, the English authoress, at London, October 20th, aged 61; Hon. William B. Kinney, proprietor of the Daily Advertiser, at Newark, N. J., and formerly United States Minister to Sardinia, on October 21st, aged 81; Major Thomas L. Butler, who commanded the City of New Orleans during the battle of January, 1815, on October 21st, at Louisville, Ky., aged 91; Erastus C. Benedict, Chancellor of the University of New York, on October 24th, aged 86.

Digitized by Google

IN THE MACHINERY DEPT. THE SILENT GAS ENGINE

HECKER'S MODERN PYRAMID

AROUND THE FOUNTAIN

TASTING A NOVELTY.

IN THE ART GALLERY

NEW YORK CITY.—THE FORTY-NINTH ANNUAL EXHIBITION OF THE AMERICAN INSTITUTE AT THE HALL ON THIRD AVENUE.
SEE PAGE 159.

Digitized by Google

M. BARTHELEMY ST. HILAIRE, FRENCH MINISTER OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

THE NEW FRENCH PREMIER.

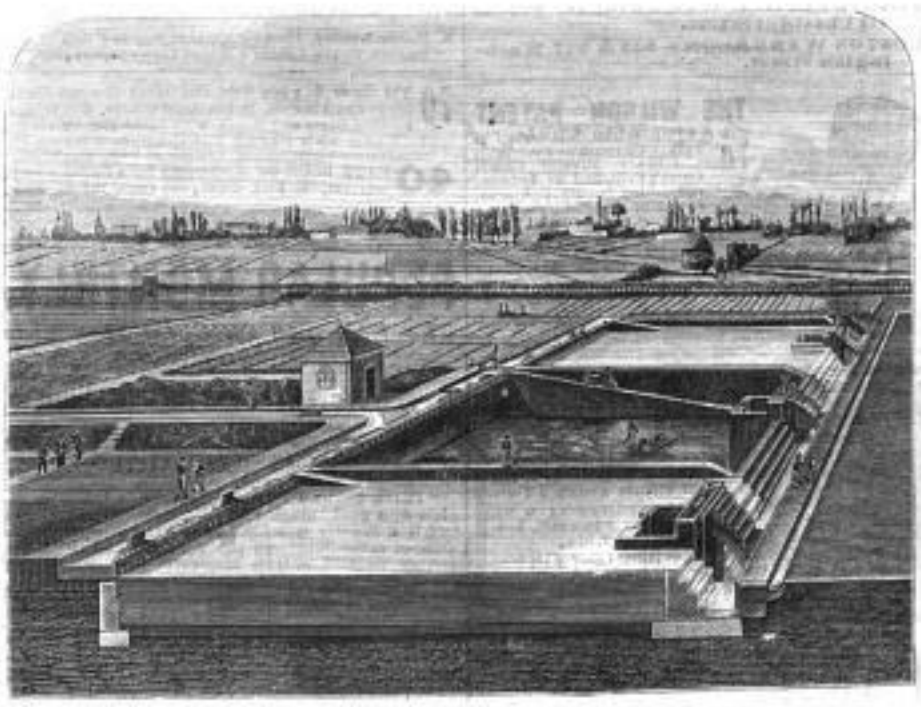
M. BARTHELEMY SAINT-HILAIRE, who has succeeded M. Freycinet as Minister of Foreign Affairs, was born in Paris on the 19th of August, 1805. In early life he was attached to the Ministry of Finance. He contributed largely to the opposition journals, and, as editor of the Globe, he signed the protest of the journalists against the ordinances of July, 1830. After the revolution he founded the Bon Sens, and, as a Liberal, took an active part in politics; but towards the close of 1833 he showed signs of a desire to renounce political life and to apply himself to literature. In 1834 he was made tutor of French literature in the Polytechnic School, and undertook, about the same time, a complete translation of the works of Aristotle, which served as a pendant to the translation of Plato, published by Cousin. For this service he was, in 1838, appointed to the Chair of Greek and Latin Philosophy in the College of France, and was admitted into the Academy of the Moral and Political Sciences.

In 1848 he re-entered the political arena, being chosen one of the representatives of the Department of the Seine-et-Oise in the Constituent Assembly. After the coup d'état of December 2d, 1851, and the downfall of the parliamentary system, he resigned his chair in the College of France, rather than swear fidelity to the Empire, and devoted himself exclusively to literary and philosophical works. At the general election of 1869 he again entered upon active political life, being returned to the Corps Legislatif as deputy for the first circumscription of Seine-et-Oise. After the fall of the Empire, M. Barthelemy St. Hilaire was elected a member of the National Assembly for the Department of Seine-et-Oise by 47,234 votes; and joined with Grevy, Dufaure, Leon de Malleville and Vitet in proposing that M. Thiers should be appointed Chief of the Executive power. He formed one of the committee of fifteen who were named to assist the Government in conducting the negotiations for peace with Prussia. He took his seat in the Left Centre, voted for the preliminaries of peace, the abrogation of the laws of exile, the treaty of commerce and the return of the Parliament to Paris.

In December, 1875, he was elected a Life-Senator, and in January last he was elected one of the four Vice-Presidents of the Senate. He was for many years the secretary and confidential friend of the late President Thiers. The old Republican used to speak of him in the kindest and most sympathetic manner: "St. Hilaire is my regulator; I never knew a thought of mine but was the better for being passed through his head."

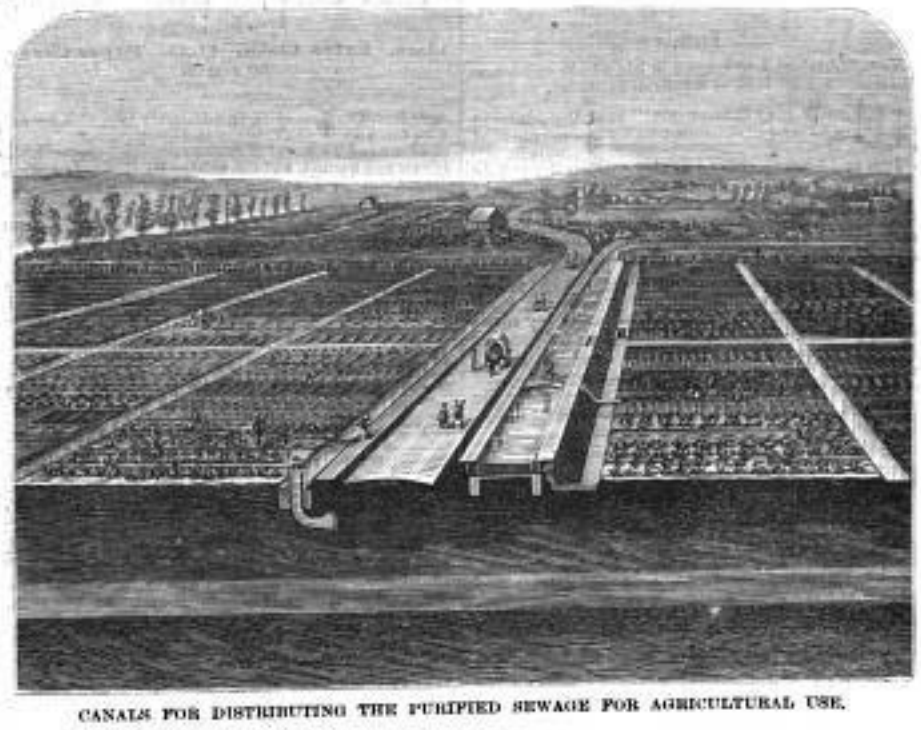
The principal literary productions of M. Barthelemy St. Hilaire are the following: "Politique d'Aristote" (Paris, 1837; second edition 1848); "De la Logique d'Aristote," a memoir which received the prize of the Institute (1838); "La Logique d'Aristote," translated into French for the first time (1839-44); "Psychologie d'Aristote: Traité de l'Ame" (1846); "Opuscules," translated for the first time (1847); "De l'Ecole d'Alexandrie," report to the Institute, preceded by an "Essai sur la Methode des Alexandrins et du Mysticisme (1845); "De Vedas" (1854); "Du Bouddhisme" (1855); "Le Boudha et sa Religion" (1866), and a translation of Aristotle's "Metaphysics," which appeared in May, 1879. The preface of this work contains a history of the influence of metaphysics on the study of science and other branches of learning, and forms nearly a volume by itself.

WILLIAM R. GRACE, DEMOCRATIC CANDIDATE FOR MAYOR OF NEW YORK.—FROM A PHOTO. BY O'NEIL.



MR. WILLIAM R. GRACE.

CANDIDATE FOR MAYOR OF NEW YORK.



MR. WILLIAM R. GRACE, who has been nominated by the Tammany and Irving Hall Democracy as their candidate for Mayor, is a representative New York merchant, and has been for years actively concerned in political, religious and philanthropic matters, without neglecting the details of a vast business. He is a native of Ireland, where he was born some fifty years ago. His father was a landed proprietor, and sent his son to school at Dublin. When he was nineteen years of age young Grace quitted Dublin and became a shipping clerk at Liverpool, in company with Mr. Coffey, late of the firm of Roach & Coffey, of New York, dealers with the West Indies and South America. In due time Mr. Grace engaged in business on his own account in Liverpool, his father assisting him. When he became twenty-one years old, he began to seek broader fields. South America at that time offered attractions for enterprising men, and the young merchant went to that country. He came first to the United States, and thence went to Callao in Peru, where he made the acquaintance of John Bryce, with whom he eventually formed a partnership, the firm being known as Bryce, Grace & Co. They did a large and profitable banking, shipping and commission business. It is said that to-day the house thus established does a larger banking and shipping business with the United States than any other house in Peru. It was this firm that sold to the late Henry Meiggs the large supplies of railroad and other material with which he carried on his immense enterprises. In 1865 Mr. Grace came to this city, leaving his brother, M. P. Grace, in charge of the Callao house. Here he established the firm of W. R. Grace & Co., of 87 Wall Street, the firm consisting of himself, his brother, M. P. Grace, and C. R. Flint. A house in San Francisco was also established, with himself, M. P. Grace, C. R. Flint and George Duval

GEORGIA.—NEW BUILDING OF THE CLARK UNIVERSITY, THE COLORED COLLEGE OF THE SOUTH, AT ATLANTA, DEDICATED ON OCTOBER 16TH.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH FURNISHED BY J. H. MOSER.—SEE PAGE 159.

RESERVOIRS FOR CHEMICALLY PURIFYING THE SEWAGE.

CANALS FOR DISTRIBUTING THE PURIFIED SEWAGE FOR AGRICULTURAL USE.

UTILIZATION OF THE SEWAGE OF PARIS.—SEE PAGE 162.

Digitized by Google

as partners. Four years ago John Eryce, whose residence was in Paris, and who was at the head of the Callao firm, retired, and Mr. Grace became the senior partner, the firm becoming Grace, Brothers & Co. The firm then consisted of himself, his brother, M. P. Grace, C. R. Flint, Manual Siaguno and Edward Eyre. This firm is well known in Europe, Baring Brothers being the correspondents in London.

Mr. Grace married a New England lady several years ago, and they have six children. Though not a politician, he has always voted the Democratic ticket, and two years ago was prominently named as a compromise candidate. He is well known as a shrewd business man; his fortune is large, and he has held many offices of trust and responsibility, among them a trusteeship of the Emigrants' Savings Bank and the directorship of the Marine National Bank. Mr. Grace is about five feet ten inches tall, well-proportioned, with light hair, gray eyes, and a face smoothly shaven, save the upper lip, where he wears a light mustache.

Mr. Grace is a prominent and active member of the Roman Catholic Church, and retains in a way characteristic of his fellow-countrymen his love for his native country. The practical nature of this attachment was clearly shown on March 16th, 1880, when he contributed one-quarter of the cargo of the ship Constellation dispatched with stores for the relief of sufferers in Ireland.

HOW TO PURIFY AND UTILIZE SEWAGE.

THIS question has occupied seriously the authorities of Paris for several years. When allowed to run into the Seine, the sewage rendered the river, as it traversed the city, and especially when the tide entered the mouth, disgusting and unhealthy. The first thought was to remedy this, and the sewage was carried below the city and there emptied into the river. The people living on the banks protested against this course, and steps were taken with a view of purifying the water so that it should enter the river in a pure state, and employing the solid parts for agricultural purposes. An establishment was accordingly erected at Clichy, where Messrs. Mille and Durand-Claye began their experimental operations in 1866. They have been continued with success and embrace a district between that village and Asnieres and the Seine. A large reservoir receives the matter, and from it lead a number of brick sewers, with sluices at intervals, enabling market-gardeners in the district to run the fertilizing matter into their fields at such times and to such amount as they desire, flooding, if needed, the whole field. What is not immediately used in this way goes into three large brick reservoirs. Into this enough sulphate of aluminum is thrown to clear a month's sewage. On coming in contact with this salt, the water becomes pure, depositing all matter held in solution, and this purified water then runs off into the river in a perfectly inoffensive stream. Every month the reservoirs are closed and the deposit removed, dried and sold as a fertilizer. The success of the experiment has led to the appointment of a board which is to undertake this system for the whole sewage of Paris.

The result is so satisfactory under every aspect that the adoption of the system cannot be neglected. The river will be kept absolutely pure and free from all substance to offend the nostrils, lungs and sight. The valuable fertilizing matter will be put within the reach of the kitchen-gardeners at little expense, and what they do not take will be reduced to a shape in which it can be readily sold to agriculturists in all parts of the country. One great advantage of the system is that it is free from complex machinery or treatment, and only one chemical has to be employed.

A USEFUL POLITICAL GUIDE.

HOUGHTON'S CONSPECTUS OF THE HISTORY OF POLITICAL PARTIES. Indianapolis: Granger, Davis & Co., Publishers. 1880.

WE have before us an invaluable political vade mecum in the work just published by Messrs. Granger, Davis & Co., of Indianapolis, Ind., and which we have already advertised, entitled, "Houghton's Conspectus of the History of Political Parties." A more useful guide to the great issues of the day it is impossible to conceive. The history of each party is minutely recorded from its birth, and by easy stages the student is led up to the inner life of the struggle of the hour. The value of this work to the present and rising generation can scarcely be over-estimated. Its great sale is a very powerful test of its usefulness, which, as it deals equally with all parties, Democrats, Republicans and Greenbackers are equally its purchasers.

THE AMATEUR POTTERY AND GLASS PAINTER. By E. Campbell Hancock. New York: J. Marsching & Co. 1880.

A more suitable and seasonable book could scarcely be found than Mr. Campbell's "Amateur Pottery and Glass Painter." Education having reached the æsthetic point, it behooves all who would be "of Society" to be able to speak authoritatively upon pottery, using the art-jargon anent enamel colors, rose-color heat, French colors, Worcester colors, underglaze colors, Lucca del Robbid, opaque majolica and Bernard Palissy. In this book a most delightful chapter is devoted to the amateur's domain, in which the suitability of stained glass for drawing-rooms, dining-rooms and staircases is discussed, and, further on, glass sheet, rolled antique, brittle pot-metal, flashed, opal and cathedral tints. The book is profusely illustrated, and the letter-press admirable. We recommend the "Amateur Pottery and Glass Painter" to every amateur.

FUN.

THE bobtailed horse spends his whole existence in lamenting his lack of terminal facilities.

"You can't play that on me!" said the piano to the amateur who broke down in a difficult piece of music.

IF it had been one of the apples seen on the public fruit stand, neither Adam nor Eve would have coveted it for a moment.

ONE of the first requisitions received from a newly-appointed railway-station agent was: "Send me a gallon of red oil for the danger lanterns."

MRS. YOUNGWOMAN wants to know "What is the best way to mark table-linen?" Leave the baby and a blackberry pie alone at the table for three minutes.

ONE of the old settlers of the Isle of Shoals seeing the name of Psyche on the hull of a yacht the other day, spelled it out slowly and then exclaimed: "Well, if that ain't the durndest way to spell fish!"

A GALVESTON woman, just married, wishing to impress her husband with her ability as a housekeeper, bawled out to the servant as she entered the door: "Matilda, bring me the washboard; I want to wash the potatoes for dinner."

PUNCH gives the following as an example of self-sacrifice: Boy (to lady visitor): "Teacher, there's a gal over there a-winkin' at me!" Teacher: "Well, then don't look at her." Boy: "But if I don't look at her, she'll wink at somebody else!"

IT seems almost incredible that the elephant has 40,000 muscles in his trunk; but after a man has experienced an elephant's gentle twist about his system, and been thrown the whole length of the menagerie tent, through the candy stand into the lemonade tub, he will be willing to take his oath that there are at least a million and a half muscles in that interesting animal's front tail.

FISK & HATCH
Bankers,
AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT BONDS,
And other desirable Investment Securities,
No. 5 Nassau St., New York,

Buy and sell all issues of Government Bonds, in large or small amounts, at current market prices, and will be pleased to furnish information in reference to all matters connected with investments in Government Bonds.

We are prepared to give information in regard to first-class Railway Securities, and to execute orders for the same.

Buy and sell all marketable Stocks and Bonds on commission, at the Stock Exchange and in the open market.

Receive accounts of Banks, Bankers, Merchants and others, and allow interest on daily balances; and for those keeping accounts with us we collect United States coupons and registered interest, and other coupons, dividends, etc., and credit without charge.

☞ We give special attention to orders from Banks, Bankers, Institutions and investors out of the city, by Mail or Telegraph, to buy or sell Government Bonds, State and Railroad Bonds, Bank Stocks, Railroad Stocks, and other securities.

We have issued the Seventh Edition of "Memoranda Concerning Government Bonds," copies of which can be had on application.

FISK & HATCH.

"USE Hedding's Russia Salve."

PREMATURE LOSS OF THE HAIR, which is so common nowadays, may be entirely prevented by the use of Hursell's Cocoine. It has been used in thousands of cases where the hair was coming out in handfuls, and has never failed to arrest its decay, and to promote a healthy and vigorous growth. It is at the same time unrivaled as a dressing for the hair. A single application will render it soft and glossy for several days.

POLAND SPRING WATER is the best of all cosmetics, because it cleanses the blood, brightens the complexion, and restores the system to health and vigor. O. Hutchinson, Agent, 18 Vesey Street, New York.

"WHERE shall I stop?" is the query frequently put by the visitor to New York. This question can easily be settled in favor of the ST. NICHOLAS HOTEL, now, as ever, the leader among metropolitan hostelries. Its furniture, fittings, apartments, conveniences and table are, beyond comparison, the most suited to please the fastidious taste. Rates only $3.50 a day, the ante-bellum price.

ANGOSTURA BITTERS are the best remedy for removing indigestion and all diseases originating from the digestive organs. Beware of counterfeits. Ask your grocer or druggist for the genuine article, manufactured by Dr. J. G. B. Siegert & Sons.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE is particularly recommended for Wakefulness, Hysteria, and other diseases of the nervous system.

THE HANDY RELIABLE DICTIONARY of the English language, published by the American Book Store, 751 Broadway, N. Y., is all that its name implies, and ten cents can scarcely be better invested than in a copy. The book contains all the latest additions to the vocabulary, and a method of pronunciation at once simple and correct.

THE wonderful MASON'S CHART reduced from $1 to 50 cents. It is a genuine article and musicians themselves praise it.

H. W. JOHNS' ASBESTOS ROOF PAINT forms the most durable and economical protective coating in the world for tin roofs, exposed brick walls, iron work, barns, fences, etc., for which it is in every respect equal to the best white lead, while it costs only half as much. It is made in a variety of beautiful colors, samples of which will be sent free on application to 87 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

EPPS'S CHOCOLATE ESSENCE. Product of a special refining process. It is Chocolate devoided of its over-richness and substantiality. Sugarless, and, when made, of the consistence of coffee. An afternoon Chocolate. Each packet is labeled JAMES EPPS & Co., Homœopathic Chemists, London.

NOW READY
Mrs. Forrester's New Novel.
ROY AND VIOLA,
BY THE AUTHOR OF
"Diana Carew," "Viva," "Mignon,"
ETC., ETC., ETC.
12mo. Extra Cloth. $1.25. Paper Cover, 50 cents.

"'ROY AND VIOLA' is an admirable tale, told by one who can vividly describe and incisively comment on the manners and personnel of modern society. The dialogue is easy and natural, and the writing fresh."—The London World.

 For sale by booksellers generally, or will be sent by mail, postpaid, upon receipt of the price by
J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO., Publishers,
715 and 717 Market St., Philadelphia.

WELLING
Compressed Ivory Mfg. Co.,
251 Centre St., New York.
Pool Balls, striped same as ivory, 2¼in., $30 per set.
" " solid colors.....2⅛ 25 "
Billiard Balls.....2⅛ 8 "
Warranted for 12 months.
Also Martingale Rings, Poker Checks, Sleeve Buttons, Hair Brushes, Toilet Mirrors, etc. Established 1855. Sign Golden Elephant.

THE BELMONTYLE OIL
Prevents Rust, Tarnish, etc., on Firearms, Machinery, Tools, Cutlery, Safes, Saws, Skates, Stoves, Hardware, etc., without injury to the polish. In use over 20 years. Highest testimonials. Samples, 30 cts.; three for $1—sent free of expressage. Send for circular.
BELMONTYLE OIL CO., Sole Manuf'rs,
150 Front Street, New York.

40 Lovely Chromo Cards, New Designs just out, with name, 10c. STAR PRINTING CO., Northford, Ct.

BOLLINGER CHAMPAGNE
BRAND ON CORK.
FOR SALE BY
PARK & TILFORD.
ACKER, MERRALL & CONDIT.

(A Medicine, not a drink,) contains Hops, Buchu, Mandrake, Dandelion, and the Purest and Best Medical Qualities of all other Bitters.

It is a preventive and cure for Weakness and General Debility, for Fever and Ague, and all Kidney and Liver Diseases.

A little Hop Bitters saves big doctors bills, and "$500 will be paid for a case they will not cure or help."

HOP BITTERS MFG. CO., Rochester, N. Y., and Toronto, Ont.

Amusements.

UNION SQUARE THEATRE.
MR. A. M. PALMER.....Proprietor and Manager.
MONDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 25TH,
AND
every Evening till Further Notice,
VICTORIEN SARDOU'S
GREAT PLAY, in FIVE ACTS, ENTITLED
DANIEL ROCHAT.
DANIEL ROCHAT. DANIEL ROCHAT.
DANIEL ROCHAT.
DANIEL ROCHAT. DANIEL ROCHAT.
DANIEL ROCHAT.
DANIEL ROCHAT. DANIEL ROCHAT.
SATURDAY, OCTOBER 30TH,
THIRD MATINEE,
DANIEL ROCHAT.
NEW SCENERY by RICHARD MARSTON.
NEW MUSIC by HENRY TISSINGTON.

Latest and Best Dictionary Extant!
HANDY, RELIABLE
DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

The most extensive and comprehensive book of its kind ever published. It contains the exact Spelling, Pronunciation and Definition of more than Twenty-five Thousand Words as used by the best Speakers and Writers in America and England.
It also contains a number of
Most Valuable Tables
and other Articles, giving information about WEIGHTS AND MEASURES in common use; the METRIC SYSTEM; ABBREVIATIONS used in WRITING; FOREIGN WORDS, PHRASES and PROVERBS, &c., making it indispensable to every READER, WRITER and THINKER. Fully illustrated. Price, 50 Cts. By mail 5 cts. extra.
Before ordering Books elsewhere, send for catalogue of standard Books at very low prices.
THE CHEAPEST BOOK STORE in the WORLD.
Address, AMERICAN BOOK STORE, 751 Broadway, N. Y.

A 5-LINE ADVERTISEMENT inserted one week in 345 newspapers for $25. 100-page pamphlet free. GEO. P. ROWELL & CO., 10 Spruce St., N. Y.

Brain and Nerve Food.
VITALIZED PHOS-PHITES.
Composed of the Vital or Nerve-giving Principles of the Ox-Brain and Wheat-Germ.
IT GIVES VITALITY TO THE INSUFFICIENT BODILY OR MENTAL GROWTH OF CHILDREN; FEEDS THE BRAIN AND NERVES; PREVENTS FRETFULNESS; GIVES QUIET, REST AND SLEEP. AN ILL-FED BRAIN LEARNS NO LESSONS, AND IS EXCUSABLE IF PEEVISH. RESTLESS INFANTS ARE CURED AS IT PROMOTES GOOD HEALTH TO BRAIN AND BODY. IT IS A CURE FOR NERVOUSNESS AND DEBILITY IN YOUNG OR OLD.
Physicians have prescribed 250,000 packages.
For sale by Druggists, or by mail, $1. F. CROSBY, 664 & 666 Sixth Ave., N. Y.

SILK ORNAMENTS
PREPARED TO APPLY TO
Silks, Satins, Muslins, and any other Fabric,
By simply moistening the back of the picture, and pressing same with a hot iron.
Patented November 12th, 1878.
Mineral Decalcomanie
For Burning in on Porcelain, Articles for Decorating, etc., etc.
PALM & FECHTELER, {781 BROADWAY, Opp. A. T. Stewart's.} NEW YORK.
CATALOGUE SENT FREE ON APPLICATION.
50c. and $1 Sample Packages of Silk Ornaments will be sent on receipt of amount.

Carpets,
NEW FALL STYLES.
WE ARE NOW OFFERING LARGE LINES OF NEW DESIGNS AND STYLES IN CARPETINGS RECEIVED FROM OUR OWN FACTORIES,
WHICH WILL BE FOUND TO COMBINE TO AN UNUSUAL EXTENT
Elegance in Style and Finish,
Durability in Wear,
and Economy in Prices.
WE ALSO OFFER AN EXTENSIVE ASSORTMENT OF TURKISH, PERSIAN AND EAST INDIAN CARPETS AND RUGS, AND OTHER POPULAR FLOOR COVERINGS, AT EXTREMELY MODERATE RATES.
J. & J. DOBSON,
40 & 42 WEST 14TH STREET, N. Y.,
JOHN VAN GAASBEEK, Manager.
PHILADELPHIA WAREROOMS, 809 & 811 Chestnut Street.
BOSTON WAREROOMS, 525 & 527 Washington Street.

THE WILSON PATENT
Adjustable Chair.
WITH TRIPLY UNIQUE OF POSITIONS.
Parlor, Library, Invalid Chair, Child's Crib, Bed or Lounge, combining beauty, lightness, strength, simplicity and comfort. Everything to an exact science. Orders by mail promptly attended to. Goods shipped to any address, C. O. D. Send stamp for Illustrated Circulars. Quote FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER. Address the WILSON ADJUSTABLE CHAIR MANUF'G CO., 861 Broadway, N. Y.

TO THE PUBLIC.
BOKER'S BITTERS.
BEWARE OF COUNTERFEITS AND IMITATIONS.
In accordance with the desire frequently expressed, both in the United States and abroad, these Bitters, so long and justly celebrated for their fineness as a cordial, and for their medicinal virtues against all diseases of, or arising from, the digestive organs, will hereafter be put up and sold not only in quart, but
ALSO IN PINT BOTTLES,
for medicinal, family, traveling, and other purposes. To be had at all the principal druggists', grocers', liquor-merchants', etc. L. FUNKE, JR., Sole Agent, New York, 78 John Street. Post Office Box 1,629.

CANDY Send one, two, three or five dollars for a retail sample box, etc., by express, of the best Candies in America, put up elegantly, and strictly pure. Refers to all Chicago.
C. F. GUNTHER, Confectioner, 78 Madison St., Chicago.

WITH $5 You can buy a whole
IMPERIAL AUSTRIAN 100 Florins Government Bond,
ISSUED IN 1864,
Which bonds are issued and secured by the Government, and are redeemed in drawings
FOUR TIMES ANNUALLY,
Until each and every bond is drawn with a larger or smaller premium. Every bond MUST draw a Prize, as there are NO BLANKS.
THE THREE HIGHEST PRIZES AMOUNT TO
200,000 FLORINS,
50,000 FLORINS,
15,000 FLORINS,
And bonds not drawing one of the above prizes must draw a Premium of not less than 200 Florins.
The next drawing takes place on the 1st of DECEMBER, 1880,
And every bond bought of us on or before the 1st of December is entitled to the whole premium that may be drawn thereon on that date.
Out-of-town orders sent in REGISTERED LETTERS, and inclosing $5, will secure one of these bonds for the next drawing.
For orders, circulars, or any other information, address
INTERNATIONAL BANKING CO.,
150 Broadway, New York City.
ESTABLISHED SINCE 1874.
☞ The above Government Bonds are not to be compared with any Lottery whatsoever, and do not conflict with any of the laws of the United States.
N. B.—In writing, please state that you saw this in the English FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

70 All New Styles Gold and Silver Chromo Cards, Birds and Flowers, in beautiful Colors, Gilt fringe, Frosted Glass and Motto, with name 10c. by return mail. CARD AND PAPER FACTORY, New Haven, Ct.

40 PAGE BOOK OF WONDERS for a 3-cent stamp. Address, B. FOX & CO., 391 Canal Street, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's
POPULAR MONTHLY.
The Best and Cheapest Magazine in America.
128 PAGES QUARTO. OVER 100 ILLUSTRATIONS.
The contents embrace every variety of literature, and of the highest standard.

"FRANK LESLIE'S POPULAR MONTHLY is before us, replete with good things. It is evidently no misnomer to call it a Popular Monthly. It is eminently worth the price of subscription—$3 per year. Our space forbids further mention of this invaluable periodical of 132 pages, only costing $3 per year. Address Frank Leslie, New York City."—Tarboro (N. C.) Sentinel.

Published on the 15th of every month. For sale by all newsdealers. Single copies, 25 cents. Annual subscription, $3. Subscriptions received for six months, $1.50; and for four months, $1. Sent postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Digitized by Google

DR. BROWNING'S

C. & C. CORDIAL

For Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis,
Tickling or Dryness of the Throat,
Sore Throat, Cold in the Head,
Cold in the Bowels, Asthmatic Coughs,
Whooping Cough, Croup, Influenza,
Hoarseness, and Relief of Consumptives.

Dr. BROWNING is a regular graduate of medicine, a skillful pharmacist and a thorough chemist. His "C. & C." (Cough and Cold) CORDIAL is not the result of mere chance, but of long scientific research in chemistry and medicine, as is very plainly seen by the rapidity of its action and its unparalleled efficacy. The expense of its manufacture is at least five times as great as that of any other medicine upon the market, and yet it is sold at the exceedingly low price of 50c. Sample bottles (for a short time only), 25c. For sale by all druggists and by the proprietor,

W. C. BROWNING, M.D.,
1117 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

H.W. JOHNS' ASBESTOS ROOF PAINTS

These are strictly first-class Paints, prepared ready for use, in six colors, especially for preserving Tin and other roofs; they contain no offensive or deleterious ingredients, and will not injure rain water. They possess a very elastic body, and are not liable to injury from being walked upon. Old leaky tin and other roofs can be restored and rendered serviceable for many years with these Paints (in connection with our ASBESTOS ROOF CEMENT). They are also superior to the best white lead paints for Out-buildings, Fences, Shingle Roofs and other rough wood-work, Brick Walls, Iron Work, etc., while they cost only about half as much.

☞ We guarantee these to be better and more economical Paints than have ever before been offered to the public for similar purposes.

Be sure to get the Genuine, which are manufactured only by

H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO.,
87 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK,

Sole Manufacturers of Genuine Asbestos Liquid Paints, Roofing, Boiler Coverings, Steam Packing, Sheathings, Cements, Coatings, etc.

☞ Descriptive Price Lists free by mail.

50c. A MARVEL OF INGENUITY, MASON'S CHART. 50c.

PRICE REDUCED TO WITHIN THE REACH OF ALL.

Copyrighted 1876. Pat. March 5, 1878. Beware of Infringements.

PIANO OR ORGAN PLAYING
ACTUALLY LEARNED IN ONE DAY.

This is not a new and untried invention. It has been before the public OVER 4 YEARS, and has gained for itself testimonials and praise from all parts of the world. IT IS NO HUMBUG. It is copyrighted, and duly and legally patented under the laws of the United States.

MASON'S CHART.

It is the most wonderful invention of the age. The most infallible test of its value is that over 50,000 have been sold in the United States alone. One Chart sold in a small town has brought as orders for a hundred from the same place. It is a new theory, and a decided departure from the old or any other method. Remember Piano or Organ playing by sight, and not by ear or memory. Mason's Chart is a machine which fits over the keys of a Piano or Organ, indicating exactly where and how the hands are to be placed, and the proper keys to strike, changing its position and arrangement to suit the key in which the piece is written that you wish to play. They are perfectly infallible in their results. If you can read you can play the Piano or Organ in one day better than a teacher could teach you in three months. If you have no Piano you can learn at some friend's house, and astonish all with your knowledge. DEXTER SMITH, the editor of the leading musical paper in the world, says: "They should find a place in every house, whether there is a Piano or Organ or not. They are to music what the multiplication table is to arithmetic." It gives decided satisfaction in every case. It cannot do otherwise, seeing, as it does, a hundred items to cost, and is its great simplicity lies its unequalled success. "I am perfectly satisfied too much cannot be said in its praise. It is the best thing in the world for both teacher and pupil."—JOHN STEVENS, Genoa, O. "The Chart received; gives perfect satisfaction. I apply for the agency."—JOHN J. BRUDZEET, Vicksburg, Miss. "Mason's Chart received yesterday; am highly pleased with it."—LESTER M. BRACKETT, Rochester, Ind. "The Chart my daughter bought gives perfect satisfaction."—W. S. HOLMES, Fairton, N. J. "The Chart received; it is every way complete. My wife wishes the agency."—ISAAC HUNTER, Springfield, Mo. We have thousands of letters like the above. MUSIC TEACHERS UNHESITATINGLY INDORSE IT. The original price of the wonderful Mason Chart was $2.00, at which figure over 10,000 sets were sold. Increased facilities for manufacture enabled us to place the price in 1878 at only $1.00 per set, and at that price over 50,000 sets have been sold all over the world, and thousands of testimonials from the highest musical authority have been received. Feeling that there are thousands who are yet unacquainted with this wonderful machine, and having by the largeness of our contracts and special and expensive machinery to greatly reduce the cost of manufacture, and furthermore, having secured a considerable reduction in the heavy royalty we have hitherto paid, we propose to offer this most wonderful invention during the next sixty days at about the cost of manufacture, hoping that thereby it will find its way into every home in the United States, and guarantee that it will yield a more satisfactory return than $50 invested in music lessons. Remember, if teacher wants by sight is a comprehensive and infallible manner; a child can understand it perfectly. On receipt of 50 cents we will send a complete set of Mason's Charts (latest improved, four forms), to any address, by express or mail, prepaid, 20 cents extra.

SPECIAL OFFER. We publish a bound Musical Album containing 16 pieces of the latest popular music, which could not be bought separately, at retail, for less than $4. To every purchaser of a Mason's Chart, who will state in what paper they saw this advertisement, and will agree to show the Chart to their friends, we will give, as a FREE PRESENT, our Musical Album, with $4 worth of music. Those wishing the Album sent by mail, prepaid, will inclose 20 cents extra, otherwise we will send it by express. No one will regret learning to play the Piano or Organ; it is the most popular of all accomplishments. Address The Turner Manufacturing Co., 17 Dock Square, Boston, Mass., who are Sole Agents.

DAY'S Kidney PAD

A CURE for the most prevalent and fatal diseases that afflict mankind FOUND AT LAST. Internal medicines never did nor never can cure KIDNEY DISEASE. STOP IT NOW! Apply Day's Kidney Pad AT ONCE, and be cured of all affections of the Kidneys, Bladder and Urinary Organs. It is the only treatment that will cure NERVOUS AND PHYSICAL DEBILITY, and that distressing complaint, "BACK ACHE." It will annually save many times its cost in medicines and doctors, which at best give but temporary relief. Sold by Druggists or sent by mail on receipt of price, $2. Our book, "How a Life Was Saved," giving a history of this new discovery and a large record of most remarkable cures, sent free. Write for it.

DAY KIDNEY PAD CO., Toledo, O.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address, STINSON & Co., Portland, Maine.

20 Gold and Silver Chromo Cards, with name, 10c., stop paid. G. I. REED & CO., Nassau, N. Y.

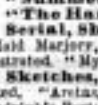
Do Your Own Printing.

Presses and outfits from $3 to $500. Over 2,000 styles of type. Catalogue and reduced price list free.

H. HOOVER, Philadelphia, Pa.

HOPE FOR THE DEAF

Garmore's Artificial Ear Drums



RESTORE THE HEARING and perform the work of the Natural Drum. Remain in position without aid, and are not observable. All Conversation and even whispers heard distinctly. We refer to those using them. Send for descriptive circular.

Address GARMORE & CO.,
S. W. Corner 5th & Race Sts., Cincinnati, O.

TAPE-WORM

INFALLIBLY CURED with two doses of medicine in 2-5 hours. For particulars, address, with stamp,
H. EICKHORN, 4 St. Mark's Place, New York.

PRINTING PRESSES, Types and Material. Send two 3c. stamps for catalogue. H. O. WOODS & CO., 49 Federal St., Boston, Mass.

My New Illustrated Price List describing over 150 Gold and Silver Waltham Watches sent for a 3c stamp. It tells how I send watches to all parts of U.S. to be examined before paying any money. Unbounded success. N.H. White, Jeweler, Newark, N. J.

50 Elegant Cards, New Chromos, shells, Gilt-edge, etc., with name, 10c. G. A. SPRING, Northford, Ct.

SCARCE GOODS.—Books, Photos, &c. Sample Catalogue 3c. Paris Book Co., Chicago, Ill.

50 New Style Cards, Lithographed in bright colors, 10c. 60 Ag'ts Samples 10c. Comn. Card Co., Northford, Ct.

MAMMARIAL BALM restores and develops the bust. Warranted sure and safe. Price, $1. NEW ENGLAND MEDICAL INSTITUTE, 24 TREMONT ROW, Boston, Mass.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. Address, H. HALLETT & Co., Portland, Maine.

20 NEW CHROMO Cards, No 2 Alike, 10c., or 50 Fancy Cards, 10c. With Name. J. B. HUSTED, Nassau, N. Y.

MUSTACHE AND WHISKERS.

JUDGE FOR YOURSELF By sending 35c. money or 40c. postage stamps, with age, you will receive by return mail a correct picture of your future husband or wife, with name and date of marriage. Address, W. FOX, Box 38, Fultonville, N.Y.

Imitation Gold Watches.
$5, $10, $15, $20 and $25 each; Chains $2 to $12 to match. Jewelry of the same. Sent C.O.D., by Express. Send stamp for Illustrated Circular. COLLINS METAL WATCH FACTORY, 239 Broadway, N. Y. Box, 3096.

$777 A YEAR and expenses to agents. Outfit free. Address, P. O. VICKERY, Augusta, Maine.

Agents Wanted.

$72 A WEEK. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly Outfit free. Address, TRUE & Co., Augusta, Maine.

$350 A MONTH—AGENTS WANTED—75 best selling articles in the world; 1 sample free. Address Jay Bronson, Detroit, Mich.

SALESMEN WANTED $105 A Month and Expenses paid to Retail our SAMPLE TRUNK. Send for STAMP to CIGARS. S. FOSTER & CO., Cincinnati, O.

KNOW THYSELF.

THE untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase the new medical work published by the PEABODY MEDICAL INSTITUTE, Boston, entitled THE SCIENCE OF LIFE; Or, SELF-PRESERVATION. Exhausted vitality, nervous and physical debility, or vitality impaired by the errors of youth or too close application to business, may be restored and manhood regained.

Two hundredth edition, revised and enlarged, just published. It is a standard medical work, the best in the English language, written by a physician of great experience, to whom was awarded a gold and jeweled medal by the National Medical Association. It contains beautiful and very expensive engravings. Three hundred pages, more than 50 valuable prescriptions for all forms of prevailing disease, the result of many years of extensive and successful practice, either one of which is worth ten times the price of the book. Bound in French cloth; price only $1, sent by mail, postpaid.

The London Lancet says: "No person should be without this valuable book. The author is a noble benefactor."

An illustrated sample sent to all on receipt of 4 cents for postage.

The author refers, by permission, to Hon. P. A. BISSELL, M.D., President of the National Medical Ass'n.

Address, Dr. W. H. PARKER, No. 4 Bulfinch Street, Boston, Mass. The author may be consulted on all diseases requiring skill and experience.

HEAL THYSELF

SCHMITT & KOEHNE.

Central Park Brewery AND Bottling Company.

Brewers, Bottling Department and Office, 160—165 East Fifty-ninth Street, Ice-house and Rock-vaults, Fifty-sixth and Fifty-seventh Street, Avenue A and East River, N. Y.

BOHEMIAN and LAGER BEER.

The finest Beer for family use. The best Shipping Beer in bottles, warranted to keep in any climate for months and years.

ELGIN WATCHES,
All styles, Gold, Silver and Nickel, $5 to $50. Chains, etc., sent C. O. D. to be examined. Write for Catalogue to STANDARD AMERICAN WATCH CO., PITTSBURGH, PA.

GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Send stamp for Catalogue.
Rifles, Shot Guns, Revolvers, sent c. o. d. for examination.

NO MORE RHEUMATISM

GOUT OR GRAVEL. Schlumberger is the only patentee in France. L. A. Paris, 102 W. 14th St., N.Y., is the only agent for the celebrated French Salicylates, which relieve at once, cure in four days, without dangerous consequences, their purity being controlled according to French laws by the Board of Pharmacy of Paris. Beware—The genuine has red seal and signature of agent on each box. $1, postpaid. Send stamp for pamphlet. Thousands of references.

ETIQUETTE OF VISITING CARDS.—Latest rules for style, uses, turning corners, etc.; mail, 25c. HOWARD & CO., Box 2,825, New York.

CHROMO cards—5 gold chromo, 5 silver chromo, 5 floral chromo, 5 floral motto, with name, 10c; 6 packs 50c. Royal Card Co., Northford, Conn.

53 Gilt Edge, Chromo, Snowflake, Glass, Lace & Cards. Name On 15c. Franklin Prtg Co., Fair Haven, Ct.

40 New Styles Chromos, with name 10c. 40 Agents Samples 10c. Canoma Co., Northford, Ct.

FOR SALE,

"INTERLAKEN,"

THE COUNTRY HOME OF
THE LATE FRANK LESLIE, ESQ.,

Consisting of 62 acres, situated on LAKE SARATOGA, and extending back to Lake Lonely.

The house contains twelve rooms, gas and water.

The stable, finished in fine woods, has six box-stalls.

Finely appointed billiard-room, and three handsomely furnished sleeping-rooms over coach-house.

Gardener's cottage.

Conservatories profusely stocked with rare plants.

The furniture, steam-yacht, sail and row boats, French omnibus, etc., will be sold with the place.

Apply to
HOMER MORGAN, 2 Pine Street; or,
V. K. STEVENSON, 25 Pine St., and 661 Fifth Av.

The Best, Cheapest and Most Attractive of the Sunday Periodicals!

FRANK LESLIE'S

SUNDAY MAGAZINE.

AN ENTERTAINING, EDIFYING AND FAMILY JOURNAL.

The November Number Now Ready.

Contents:

"The Greek Church in Russia and Siberia." By Rev. Henry Lansdell. Seven Illustrations.
"Dr. Parsons, and Mission Work in Turkey." Three Illustrations.
"The Empire of the Incas." By Godfrey A. Hudson. Seven Illustrations.
"Marriage in China." By Rev. Ross C. Houghton.
"The Story of Queen Esther." Illustrated.
"What Has Christianity Done for Us?"
"Summer Life at Chautauqua Lake." Illustrated.
"The Hans Christian Anderson Monument." Illustrated; etc., etc.

Serial, Short Stories, etc.—"Honor Morgan's Husband," by L. T. Meade (Chapters XXII. to XXIV.) "Maid Marjory," by the Author of "Little Hinges" (Chapters XIV. to XIX.) "The Rector," by R. A. Lee; Illustrated. "My Soldier's Grave," by Jane G. Austin; Illustrated. "Two Poems," by Eleanor Kirk; Illustrated. Etc.

Sketches, etc.—"Jean Ingelow;" Illustrated. "Jephthah"; Illustrated. "Elizabeth Woodville"; Illustrated. "Aretas, King of Arabia," by Herbert Lee; Illustrated. "The Niagara of Brazil"; Illustrated. "Edward Randolph's Portrait"; Illustrated. "John Knox"; Illustrated. "Mounts Sinai and Horeb"; Illustrated. "How to be Happy." "Lady Grizzel Baillie"; Illustrated. "Grandfather's Bank"; Illustrated. "Speaking the Truth in Love"; Illustrated. Etc., etc.

Poems.—"Death's Changed Face," by Rev. F. Langbridge. "The Weary Pilgrim to His Soul." "The Mother's Lament," by A. L. A. Smith. "Autumn Song" (Illustrated border). "The Church Month," by Frances Ridley Havergal. "Quatrains from the Persian." "Thoughts in a City Church." "At the Convent Gate," by Austin Dobson. "Is not this the Carpenter?" etc., etc.

Miscellany.—"Jonathan Edwards." "The Oberammergau Passion Play." "Bibles with Queer Names." "The Pawnee Indians." "Quiet Working for Christ." "The Revised Bible." "Our Fisher Folk in Church." "The Turkey." "Strange Warfare." "The Sphinx"; Illustrated. "The Dominican Church of St. Stephen"; Illustrated. "The Wandering Albatross"; Illustrated. "Pagodas"; Illustrated. "The Valley of the Shadow of Death"; Illustrated. "Ancient Monuments in the Island of Cyprus"; Illustrated. "Art in the Cloister"; Illustrated. "Clinging to the Rock." Etc., etc.

"Religious Notes and News." "Editor's Portfolio." "Obituary Notices." "Recreations for Sunday Afternoons." Music—"Harvest Hymn."

128 Pages, Quarto—100 Illustrations.

Single copies, 25 cents. Subscriptions, $3 a year; six months, $1.50; four months, $1. Postpaid.

SEND 25 CENTS FOR A SPECIMEN COPY.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House, 53, 55 and 57 Park Place, New York.

Digitized by Google

HECKER'S PERFECT BAKING POWDER

PURITY AND STRENGTH GUARANTEED.

AN EXPERIENCE OF OVER THIRTY YEARS IN THE MANUFACTURE OF BAKING POWDER FOR USE IN MAKING SELF-RAISING FLOUR, WARRANTS US IN OFFERING THIS AS A PERFECT BAKING POWDER.

For Sale by all Grocers.

GEORGE V. HECKER & CO.,

CROTON FLOUR MILLS, 203 CHERRY ST., N. Y.

N.Y. Central & Hudson River R.R.

THE BEST ROUTE EAST OR WEST.

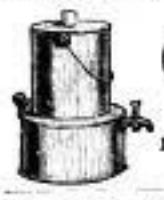
Through Cars between New York or Boston and Chicago or St. Louis.

See NIAGARA FALLS, SARATOGA and the HUDSON.

C. B. MEEKER, General Passenger Agent.

TRUSS EGGLESTON SENSIBLE TRUSS. Made on new principles. Send for Circulars. Eggleston Truss, Chicago, Ill.

NEW CHAMPION



SHOT GUN.

